Prosecutors were investigating the encounter captured by a TV crew Thursday night near the conclusion of protests over the death of George Floyd in Minnesota. The footage shows a man identified as Martin Gugino approaching a line of helmeted officers holding batons as they clear demonstrators from Niagara Square around the time of an 8 p.m. curfew.

Two officers push Gugino backward, and he hits his head on the pavement. Blood spills as officers walk past. One officer leans down to check on the injured man before another officer urges the colleague to keep walking.

"Why? Why was that necessary? Where was the threat?" asked Gov. Andrew Cuomo at his daily briefing Friday. The governor said he spoke to Gugino, who had been hospitalized in serious condition. "It's just fundamentally offensive and frightening. How did we get to this place?"

The police commissioner suspended two police officers without pay Friday, Mayor Byron Brown said.

In response, 57 members of the Buffalo Police Department's emergency response team quit the unit "in disgust because of the treatment of two of their members, who were simply executing orders," said John Evans, Police Benevolent Association president, according to WGRZ.

The resigning officers did not leave their jobs altogether.

Gugino and the officers all appear to be white, but details of their backgrounds were not released.

Buffalo officers suspended in shoving of 75-year-old man

Late Friday, the New York City Police Department announced the suspension of two other officers, including one seen on video shoving a much smaller, female protester who was hurled back and hit her head on the pavement.

The Buffalo confrontation raised concerns about more possible flare-ups in a city where, earlier this week, two officers enforcing a curfew were injured by an SUV that plowed into a large group of officers who had begun swinging batons and using police dogs to enforce the curfew.

Things looked to have calmed somewhat Friday evening, as a large group of about 300 protesters marched uptown peacefully but after the city's 8 p.m. curfew, accompanied by two police cars and a police helicopter.

Brown said contingency plans are in place "ensure public safety." Additional state troopers will be in the city through the weekend to assist Buffalo police, according to a state police spokesman. And Brown said they are working with other agencies.

"I want people out in our community to know that people peacefully protesting will be protected," Brown said at a news conference Friday.

Protests are expected to continue nationwide over the death of Floyd - a black man who died after a white police officer pressed a knee on his neck for several minutes.

Gugino was hospitalized and was "alert and oriented," according to a Friday morning tweet by Erie County Executive Mark Poloncarz.

Poloncarz at a briefing later in the day wished Gugino a "speedy recovery" and said the encounter "created a black mark, a stain on the city of Buffalo."

The district attorney's office "continues to investigate the incident," officials said in a news release.

Gugino is a retiree who lives by himself in the area, say friends who describe him as a veteran peace activist driven by his faith and a desire for social justice. He is involved with the Western New York Peace Center and Latin American Solidarity Committee, said Vicki Ross, the center's executive director.

"I can assure you, Martin is a peaceable person," Ross said. "There is no way that he was doing anything to accost or hurt. He made a judgment to stay out after the curfew because he feels that our civil liberties are so in danger, which they most certainly are."

His Twitter timeline includes tweets and retweets supportive of progressive causes and critical of police.

Ross said Gugino has been undergoing chemotherapy for cancer.

"It doesn't surprise me that Martin was standing there looking at these young cops in the eye," Mark Colville of the Amistad Catholic Worker said of his longtime friend.

Buffalo police initially said in a statement that a person "was injured when he tripped & fell," WIVB-TV reported, but Capt. Jeff Rinaldo later told the TV station an internal investigation was opened. Police later apologized and said they were "working with incomplete details during what was a very fast-moving and fluid situation."

The office of state Attorney General Letitia James tweeted that officials there were aware of the video.

Buffalo officers suspended in shoving of 75-year-old man

This story has been updated to correct that the source of the video was WBFO, not WFBO. Michael Hill contributed from Albany, N.Y.

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

End of Document

Coronavirus Saturday update: New cases slow, Ramsey County resident youngest to die

ARTICLE CCCXCII. CORONAVIRUS SATURDAY UPDATE: NEW CASES SLOW, RAMSEY COUNTY RESIDENT YOUNGEST TO DIE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 6, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 477 words

Byline: Josh Verges

Highlight: Minnesota health officials on Saturday reported 22 more deaths from COVID-19 and 526 newly confirmed cases of the coronavirus. The number of new cases has dropped off in the past week even as diagnostic testing has increased. At an average of 473 per day, the past week has seen the fewest new cases in more [...]

Body

Minnesota health officials on Saturday reported 22 more deaths from COVID-19 and 526 newly confirmed cases of the coronavirus.

The number of new cases has dropped off in the past week even as diagnostic testing has increased. At an average of 473 per day, the past week has seen the fewest new cases in more than a month.

Hospitalizations, at 473, and patients in intensive care, 206, are at their lowest points in over three weeks.

State officials will be watching closely whether those positive trends continue as restrictions ease on businesses, churches and group gatherings and following several days of large protests following the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody.

Starting Wednesday, bars and restaurants can serve customers indoors at half capacity for the first time since March 17. Masks will be required for employees and encouraged for customers, and patrons must make reservations and sit at least six feet from one another. Gyms and outdoor pools can reopen then, too, and churches can operate at half capacity, up from 25 percent.

The virus has played a role in 1,170 deaths so far. It has infected at least 27,501 Minnesotans, although that number figures to be much higher because of limited early testing and because some have no or mild symptoms.

Infections are distributed fairly evenly by age, but the overwhelmingly majority of Minnesotans who have died of COVID-19 have been residents of nursing homes. They've accounted for 936 deaths, or 80 percent of the total, through Friday.

Coronavirus Saturday update: New cases slow, Ramsey County resident youngest to die

The deaths reported Saturday include a Ramsey County resident in their 20s, who is the youngest in the state to die of the disease. A Minnesota Department of Health spokeswoman said they couldn't share information about any underlying health conditions that person may have had.

Meat processing employees and their relatives have accounted for a large number of Minnesota's rural coronavirus cases.

In Mower County, confirmed cases have doubled in just over a week as its largest employers, Hormel Foods and the adjacent Quality Pork Processors, have seen outbreaks in Austin. Neighboring Freeborn County has seen a substantial increase in cases, too.

The state has made significant progress in diagnostic testing. The three highest one-day totals for new tests have come in the past three days, for a total of more than 38,000.

Anyone with symptoms or who recently participated in a large protest is urged to get tested for the virus.

Coronavirus Wednesday update: 19 more Minnesota deaths and 352 new cases Crowded St. Croix River beach raises social-distancing concern; Washington County beaches reopen Ramsey County sheriff's office helps organize food drive for Somali community 'Like the first day of school': Fitness centers across Minnesota prepare to reopen What you need to know as Minnesota opens more businesses amid coronavirus

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

ARTICLE CCCXCIII. DRONE FLYOVER DURING PROTESTS STILL A MYSTERY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 6, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 1010 wordsByline: GREG STANLEY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

It's still unclear which government agency asked federal agents to circle a Predator surveillance drone 20,000 feet above Minneapolis last week during widespread protests over police brutality and the death of George Floyd.

U.S. Customs & Border Protection, which flew the drone over the Twin Cities in the late morning and early afternoon of May 29, declined to answer questions about the operation, saying in a statement only that the aircraft was sent "at the request of our federal law enforcement partners in Minneapolis."

Exactly who asked for the drone is important because Gov. Tim Walz signed a law in May that prohibits law enforcement agencies from using drones and certain advanced technologies such as facial recognition cameras or other mass data collection tools without a warrant. That state law doesn't apply to federal agencies, said state Rep. John Lesch, DFL-St. Paul, who co-authored the legislation.

One of the loopholes in the law, Lesch said, is that it can be difficult to verify if the request for drone support actually originated with a federal agency or with local law enforcement.

"I really want to know to what extent the feds are cooperating with local agencies," he said. "I want to know who's requesting this surveillance drone, who's getting the benefit of that federal data, who is using that data. I think we're entitled to know that."

FBI spokesman Kevin Smith said the bureau has had no use for a drone during the protests over Floyd's death, and that it is "not the agency in question" that ordered up the drone.

The Minnesota National Guard, which has its own military aircraft, also denies flying drones over the city and did not request any drone support from Customs & Border Protection, a spokesman said.

Walz has said he has been in touch with military authorities in Washington to discuss logistical and intelligence support as authorities worked last weekend to regain control of the streets in Minneapolis and St. Paul. His office didn't return phone calls and e-mails seeking comment.

Drone flyover during protests still a mystery

Knowledge of the drone was only made public after Jason Paladino, an investigative reporter with the Project On Government Oversight, posted images of its flight path online. He and other flight watchers used open-source flight data from ADS-B Exchange to trace the aircraft as it circled in an almost perfect hexagon above the city for more than an hour. The aircraft was identified as CBP104, a Customs & Border Protection Predator B drone based in Grand Forks, N.D.

The drone, an older model that carries no weapons, was originally designed by the military to locate and direct bombs in foreign wars. It is capable of spending up to 20 hours in the air and provides detailed live video on the ground from great distances, according to a Customs & Border Protection fact sheet.

The agency said it bought the drones to help its counterterrorism operations and to spot illegal border crossings, and it has been using Predator drones to help law enforcement agencies since 2005.

Customs "routinely conducts operations with other federal, state and local law enforcement entities to assist law enforcement and humanitarian relief efforts," a spokesman said in a statement.

The drone sent over Minneapolis was "preparing to provide live video" to law enforcement officers on the ground, "giving them situational awareness, maximizing public safety, while minimizing the threat to personnel and assets," the statement read. "After arriving into the Minneapolis airspace, the requesting agency determined that the aircraft was no longer needed for operational awareness and departed back to Grand Forks."

Members of the U.S. House Committee on Oversight Reform announced late Friday that they were starting an investigation into the use of the drone over Minneapolis.

In a letter to the secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, which oversees Customs & Border Protection, representatives demanded a list of all jurisdictions to which the drone was sent, any communication with local or federal agencies about the drone, whether any video was recorded or pictures taken over Minneapolis, and whether any federal or local agents used facial recognition technology, among other demands.

"The deployment of drones and officers to surveil protests is a gross abuse of authority and is particularly chilling when used against Americans who are protesting law enforcement brutality," read the letter, which was signed by five Democratic members of Congress.

Civil liberty advocates have denounced the use of the drone, citing the agency's lack of privacy protections and the potential impact military technology could have in tracking citizens who have broken no laws.

"The fear is that drones are small, quiet and they're uniquely suited for secret surveillance," said Julia Decker, policy director of the ACLU of Minnesota.

There is often very little transparency from the government in how data collected from advanced technologies such as drones are used, said Alan Rozenshtein, a professor at the University of Minnesota Law School and a former federal prosecutor and lawyer in the Department of Justice's National Security Division.

Drone flyover during protests still a mystery

"And when you can attach cameras to drones that can run through sophisticated facial recognition software and that can track people's locations in a large database, that obviously raises concerns," Rozenshtein said.

The common phrase that technology has outpaced legislation can be misleading, he added.

"It's not right to say, 'Oh, technology is ungovernable,' " he said. "It's governable. You just need to have a governing framework and we have failed to impose that."

One school of thought holds that law enforcement or federal agencies should be banned from using drones, Rozenshtein said. Realistically, they may simply be too effective and too cheap to eliminate, he said.

"It raises these hard questions of how effective do we want law enforcement to be and what is the cost of that effectiveness," he said. "Every day we are getting closer and closer to a decision point on that."

Greg Stanley · 612-673-4882

Load-Date: June 8, 2020

ARTICLE CCCXCIV.

FALSITIES LEAKED OUT DURING RIOT CHAOS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 6, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 1119 wordsByline: TOREY VAN OOT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Unverified information spread widely, even from trusted sources.Body

Soon after a tanker truck drove into a crowd of protesters on the Interstate 35W Bridge in Minneapolis, Minnesota House Majority Leader Ryan Winkler sent an alert to his thousands of Twitter followers.

"Protesters I know are saying truck driver drove into a crowd and intentionally ran into them," the Golden Valley Democrat wrote Sunday. "Confederate flags and white supremacist insignia."

The tweet spread quickly, racking up hundreds of shares. But it wasn't true. Confirmation of Confederate flags or symbols never surfaced. State officials now say they believe the driver was already on the road as it was being closed and was not trying to hit anyone. No charges have been filed.

Through the chaos of a riotous string of days following George Floyd's death under the knee of a Minneapolis police officer, Winkler was hardly the only public official to unwittingly disseminate false or unverified information about the facts on the ground.

St. Paul Mayor Melvin Carter apologized Saturday for saying "every single person we arrested last night" was from out of state, after data showed most were from Minnesota. The mayor said he received inaccurate figures before the briefing and has "taken further steps to safeguard our ability to provide relevant and accurate information."

Even Gov. Tim Walz, who criticized Winkler's now-deleted tweet as "not helpful," had to walk back some statements he gave as he led the state's response.

On Saturday morning, as the Twin Cities reeled from another night of unrest, the governor blamed outside agitators for the worst damage to Minneapolis and St. Paul. About 80% of protesters, he said, were from out of state. President Donald Trump amplified the claim in a tweet to his 81 million followers.

When pressed later on the source of his figure, the governor cited "reports from what we're getting on the streets" and "human intel." By Monday, Walz had backpedaled, saying he "got out over my skis a little bit" by sharing an exact number. While some arrests have involved alleged rioters from out of state, officials have not confirmed publicly who was responsible for the bulk of the damage. Investigations are ongoing.

Rumors and false claims about the aftermath of Floyd's death surged over the past week, fueled largely by social media. Media research company Signal Labs has tracked more than 1.7 million mentions of misinformation related to Floyd's death on May 25 and subsequent protests. Some top state officials have expressed concerns that some disinformation is being deliberately spread.

But public officials are not immune. In Minnesota, unconfirmed reports about drug cartels and white supremacists, a National Guard retreat and plans to block cellphone service during protests flourished after coming up through official channels.

The swirl of rumors during the Twin Cities' nights of arson and looting illustrated how relaying accurate information is crucial for ensuring public trust and safety, especially in times of crisis. The spread of misinformation, even when unintentional, can sow confusion and division.

For those reasons, public officials face "a higher bar" for getting things right, especially on social media, said retired Carleton College political scientist Steven Schier. But meeting that standard can be particularly challenging amid a "fog of conflict," he said.

"They're trying to make real-time assessments," he said. "A lot of that information is going to be fuzzy or false and they have to correct it as they occur."

Charlie Weaver, a former chief of staff to Gov. Tim Pawlenty who served as Minnesota Department of Public Safety commissioner during the 09/11 attacks, said he learned in those roles "to be honest and transparent about what we did know and what we didn't and when we made a mistake to acknowledge that and correct it as soon as possible."

"Mistakes are inevitable in chaotic situations," said Weaver, who now leads the Minnesota Business Partnership. "It's how you respond to them that matters and preserves your credibility."

In most cases, state and local officials did seek to quickly update or correct incomplete or inaccurate statements related to the unrest. A top Walz aide noted that the governor and public safety officials held multiple news conferences over the weekend in an attempt to provide updates as quickly as possible.

Winkler said he, too, was trying to share information of public interest in real time when he sent his tweet about the tanker truck. After the truck incident, he encountered a crowd of panicked protesters running his way. Someone he knew told him they had seen flags and symbols on the truck. The claim seemed "plausible" given top officials' earlier warnings about threats from white supremacists, so he shared the information, noting it came from a protester.

But when the DFL leader watched video footage of the incident later and "didn't see anything like that at all," he deleted his original tweet. In a follow-up post, he said he had shared inaccurate information amid a "chaotic scene and multiple reports."

"The eyewitness account seemed to square with outside facts," Winkler said in an interview. "What I have learned is people who are conditioned to see or believe a certain thing in a panicked moment can see it, even if it's not there."

Falsities leaked out during riot chaos

Emily Vraga, an associate professor at the University of Minnesota's Hubbard School of Journalism, said the sheer volume of misinformation in breaking news situations means "no one is immune" from inadvertently sharing false claims. But she said it "is incumbent on people who have a prominent platform to be especially careful."

"There is a special emphasis for people who do have that power, whose voice will not just be heard but have a lot of credibility, that they have to get it right to the extent they can from the get-go," she said.

Vraga recommends public-facing figures delete and correct inaccurate posts if possible to try to prevent the bad information from spreading further. But even when they act fast, it can be difficult to rein in a false claim online.

On Friday, as fires and violence ravaged parts of south Minneapolis, Council Member Alondra Cano tweeted that Walz "pulled out the national guard he had promised," leaving a gas station to burn. A Walz spokesman swiftly refuted the claim. But Cano's tweet, which remains online, was shared by hundreds of people online. In a separate post an hour later, she said she had confirmed "guard members are still in Minneapolis," just rerouted to other parts of the city. That clarification was retweeted just 32 times.

In an e-mail, Cano said she was focused on efforts to raise money to rebuild Lake Street and did not have time to discuss her tweets.

Torey Van Oot · 651-925-5049

Load-Date: June 8, 2020

ARTICLE CCCXCV. FEDERAL AID SOUGHT FOR RIOT DAMAGE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 6, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 265 wordsByline: STEPHEN MONTEMAYOR; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Minnesota officials are seeking federal help - including a disaster declaration - as the state begins picking up the pieces after a week of riots over the Minneapolis police killing of George Floyd

On Friday, Joe Kelly, the state's director of Homeland Security and Emergency Management, gave an early estimate of at least $27 million in damages across the Twin Cities metro area. But, citing ongoing local damage assessments, Kelly wrote that he expected that number to go higher.

In Minneapolis, hit hardest, local assessments are coming in at up to $150 million.

In a letter Friday, Kelly asked the Federal Emergency Management Agency to help conduct a joint assessment of damages in Anoka, Dakota, Hennepin, Ramsey and Washington counties that would help determine public assistance. Kelly noted Friday that the low-end figure of $27 million was three times higher than the state's indicator for public assistance needs.

Steve Grove, the Department of Employment and Economic Development's commissioner, told lawmakers Friday the state is working with Minneapolis and St. Paul officials - as well as the state's congressional delegation - on pursuing a disaster declaration to free up more resources.

As of Friday, at least 67 businesses have been completely destroyed by fire and nearly 500 across the Twin Cities experienced vandalism or looting, according to a Star Tribune database. Businesses along a 5-mile stretch of Lake Street in Minneapolis and a 1-mile stretch of University Avenue in St. Paul's Midway area experienced some of the heaviest damage.

Stephen Montemayor · 612-673-1755

Load-Date: June 8, 2020

ARTICLE CCCXCVI.

GATHERING PEACEFUL AT FARGO'S ISLAND PARK

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 6, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 6ALength: 413 wordsByline: KIM HYATT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Rather than fists, thousands of hands lifted flowers at Fargo's Island Park on Friday to wish Breonna Taylor happy birthday and demand justice for her and George Floyd.

Taylor was fatally shot in March by Louisville police officers who have not been arrested or charged. Floyd's death last week while in custody of four Minneapolis police officers, who have all been arrested and charged, sparked international protests and affected every state - including North Dakota, where Fargo was not immune to rioting seen across the country.

But organizers of the Island Park sit-in vowed the demonstration would remain peaceful and not repeat the violence of last weekend. In return, organizers asked Fargo police to forgo riot gear and shared with the sprawling crowd a list of demands of local elected leaders and police departments.

"We've had the knee of systemic oppression on our neck for too long," said organizer Joseph Lewis.

Despite pledging to be a peaceful gathering, the Minnesota and North Dakota National Guards remained on standby. Gov. Tim Walz ordered troops to Moorhead after what he said were credible threats that could affect that city, though Walz and Mayor Johnathan Judd didn't elaborate on those safety concerns.

"It is a precautionary measure just in case those outside influences ... show up with the ill intent to break what is going to be a good, positive celebration in this community," Judd said.

Whereas Judd said there wouldn't be "a Guard presence in Moorhead during the celebration," Fargo Mayor Tim Mahoney said the Guard would be protecting city buildings.

Tanks surrounded City Hall, where Friday's protest was initially planned, but organizers ultimately agreed to stay in Island Park and not march throughout Fargo-Moorhead.

Some downtown Fargo businesses boarded up windows out of fear of what happened during last Saturday's protest when thousands peacefully marched through the city, but then, as night fell, the protest turned violent.

Gathering peaceful at Fargo's Island Park

Police used tear gas and less-than-lethal munition on protesters, and so far they've arrested 17 people for rioting.

The city announced it would be closing the mall and City Hall "due to uncertainty surrounding events in downtown on Friday," and encouraged business owners to remove items around their property that could be used to cause harm or damage. But there was no sign of unrest in Island Park on Friday afternoon, and those in attendance hoped it would remain peaceful into the night.

Kim Hyatt · 612-673-4751

Load-Date: June 8, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CCCXCVII.

GREG MOORE: IT'S CLEAR WE LIVE IN DIFFERENT WORLDS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 6, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1376 wordsByline: Gregory L. MooreHighlight: I'm a 65-year-old black man, and I have literally spent most of my life doing everything possible to avoid encounters with police. My mother warned me when I was about 12 to beware of the police because even though I was a good boy, I could be killed with impunity. I'd be just another dead [...]Body

I'm a 65-year-old black man, and I have literally spent most of my life doing everything possible to avoid encounters with police.

My mother warned me when I was about 12 to beware of the police because even though I was a good boy, I could be killed with impunity. I'd be just another dead black boy supposedly mixed up in guns, drugs or gangs.

I wish I wasn't afraid of the police. I have never had a cop live on my street. I've known only two law enforcement officers socially; one is a former FBI agent who I met a decade ago and is a great guy, and the other is a black cop who I played street basketball with in the 1980s.

The vast majority of police never fire a weapon, but the bad deeds rightly get more attention because of the suffering.

As a journalist I did some of those stories. I wrote about suburban police officers using sap gloves to beat suspects. I wrote about a white cop who shot and killed an unarmed black man, who was on his way home from a party. The police officer had numerous complaints against him and was known in the department as the "Orkin Man," after a commercial for a pest-control company.

I've made it this far by being extremely careful. I've never hung out in bars, don't lose my temper with authority figures, and haven't had a fight since high school, all in an effort to avoid any dealings with the police.

Yet, I know the fear. I have been stopped at least 20 times by the police, fortunately without escalation.

Once I was stopped on an early Sunday morning as my family hurried to church. I was admittedly speeding. But you could feel the air being sucked in by my family as I pulled over and waited for the officer to approach.

Greg Moore: It's clear we live in different worlds

I rolled down the window, careful to put both hands in plain view on the steering wheel. The officer asked me if I knew why he stopped me. I quickly offered that I was late for church and was probably over the speed limit.

He said yes sir, that was correct, took my license and registration and walked to his cruiser. When he came back, he said he was giving me a warning. Shocked, I said thank you. He leaned into my car and replied: "Despite what you think, my job is not to make your day worse."

There have been other encounters like that. But there have been dark moments.

Returning from a concert with four black male college classmates in the 1970s, we were pulled over and ordered out of our car in the snow, some of us without our shoes or coats on, because we allegedly "fit the description" of robbery suspects. After standing in the cold for a half hour, we were let go after we checked out with no warrants.

Then, there was the time in the early 1990s when I was traveling with my family from Boston to Vermont to start vacation. We were driving along a deserted New Hampshire road around midnight when we passed a cop sitting at a closed gas station.

My wife and son were slumped down in the car asleep, but I immediately knew it was trouble when the cop car slowly rolled out behind me. After following me for a mile or so, the blue lights and siren came on. My wife jumped up in her seat and asked what was going on. I told her I didn't know.

I was driving the speed limit, so that couldn't be it. The officer tapped on the window and brusquely asked for my license and registration. I calmly asked him what was the problem, but he silently stalked off as my 8-year-old son came to life in the backseat.

As my blood began to boil, my wife and kid pleaded with me to stay calm. No other cars were on the road. After about 10 minutes, the officer came back and handed me my documents. My hands in plain view, I asked why he had stopped me. "You were driving too close to my vehicle," he snapped.

I sat there for a moment fuming, letting him take off before me. I told my wife that he stopped me simply because he saw a black man and suspected I was a criminal only to be surprised to find a family.

Then, there was the time the cops showed up at my house in Golden, Colo. My wife was in the car with our two daughters, and when she buzzed herself into our gated street she noticed a police car pull in behind her.

She assumed they were heading to a neighbor's house, but they pulled into our driveway and asked for her brother, who was living with us at the time. He is the nicest guy and has never been in trouble.

But apparently he had gotten into a verbal altercation with a white guy after he rolled through a roundabout and cut him off as they both turned into a gas station. The enraged white guy berated him, and my brother-in-law gave it back to him. As they both pumped their gas, the guy threatened to call the cops. My brother-in-law said go ahead, got into his car and headed home.

It's mind boggling that two cops showed up at our house simply based on the word of a white guy over a minor traffic dispute. No witnesses, no physical altercation, no evidence of a crime.

Greg Moore: It's clear we live in different worlds

After my wife in a tense exchange demanded the officers get off of our property as she held her brother in the garage, they finally left. Incredibly, he was issued a court summons, which was withdrawn after I called the police chief to object. It is the only time I have ever mentioned my position as editor during a personal complaint.

We were outraged and have no doubt that my brother-in-law would have been face down in our driveway or worse had he stepped outside of that garage. And for what?

Watching the life ebb from George Floyd on TV brought these memories flooding back. I literally said that could have been me under that officer's knee. And very few of my white friends can honestly say they had that feeling.

That speaks volumes. Over the years, I have had many discussions with white colleagues and friends about the police, and it's clear that we live in different worlds.

They have run from police, driven off from traffic stops, and flung clipboards handed to them across highways without any repercussions. I can't imagine a black person getting away with that.

Maybe that's because for many whites they know cops as fathers, brothers, cousins, friends and neighbors.

We, however, know them as a swaggering, disrespectful, and threatening presence.

The history of the police and black people dates back to the slave catchers and overseers. A lot of police officers in our country come to the job generationally with stereotypes and disdain toward black people that has been handed down from the old days.

Whether they want to admit it or not, it is part of the DNA of the profession, and it really doesn't matter what color the person is who wears the uniform. Those attitudes are ingrained in the culture.

So to fix the problem the culture has to be changed, which is no easy feat. We have had black police chiefs, and that has not made much of a difference. To change the culture you have to send police officers who murder innocent civilians to prison, plain and simple.

Police officers who abuse their power have to be held accountable, just like in any other profession. A clerk miscounts the money, they get fired. A journalist makes big mistakes, they get dismissed. You're sitting in the car when a companion robs a store, you go down, too.

The argument that we ask police to risk their lives and make split decisions is no excuse for them being wrong when making life-and-death decisions. They should have a higher standard to be right when using lethal force, not a lower one.

Reforming policing in America will require changing their culture, reinventing their training and unerring accountability.

I'm exhausted watching black men die at the hands of police. I hate seeing the fear in my daughters' eyes from knowing I could die, begging for air, under the knee of a police officer.

I don't hate cops. I fear them. But I'm about to turn 66 years old, and I'd like to exhale for a change.

Gregory L. Moore was the editor of The Denver Post from 2002 to 2016. He wrote this column for the Colorado Sun (coloradosun.com), a nonpartisan news organization.

Greg Moore: It's clear we live in different worlds

Charles Blow: Allies, don't fail us again Doyle McManus: Trump finds an unexpected center of resistance: the Pentagon Dellawar, El-Tayyab: There can be no getting along without reform John Kass: Will anyone take a knee for retired police Capt. David Dorn? Cass R. Sunstein: 'Union' is crucial word in Mattis' denunciation of Trump

Graphic

Gregory L. Moore (Courtesy photo)

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CCCXCVIII. HOW OUR GARDENS GREW

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 6, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 978 wordsByline: ALICIA ELER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Minnesota sculpture parks are seeing a surge in visitors as people look for a break from crisis.Body

It wasn't just another stroll in the park.

On a beautiful weekend, visitors flocked to the Minneapolis Sculpture Garden while protests continued over the death of George Floyd.

"I wanted to get out into the sun and relax with all the riots and stuff going on," Shawna Daly of Minneapolis said last Saturday as she examined a patch of wild plants. "I just need a calm place to relax."

Visits to the Sculpture Garden and Franconia Sculpture Park near Taylors Falls, Minn., have spiked since museums and galleries in the Twin Cities closed in mid-March - tripling that month compared with the year before. Outdoor sculpture parks offer a way to see art while also social-distancing and providing a mental break from the COVID-19 crisis.

On Saturday morning, Megan Schmit and Papa Diop of Minneapolis took a seat on a pair of white lawn chairs facing Claes Oldenburg and Coosje van Bruggen's iconic "Spoonbridge and Cherry" at the Minneapolis Sculpture Garden.

"I don't know if we came so much for the art as for the sunshine," said Schmit. "There might be a few pieces we haven't seen before."

Because of the coronavirus closing everything, Diop agreed that "there's not much else to do."

Daly said she originally wanted to stop by the Minnesota Landscape Arboretum in Chaska, but that destination - which also offers outdoor art - is seeing a surge in visitors, too, and all of its tickets for the day were gone. "This is one place you can go that doesn't need a reservation," Daly said.

Other visitors ended up at the Sculpture Garden by chance. Jacob Huff, Josh Dillingham and Ryan Wynn of Chicago happened to book a trip to the Twin Cities the previous Monday, just before Floyd's death.

How our gardens grew

"We couldn't get our money back from the Airbnb, so it was like 'All right, we're gonna come anyway,' " said Huff, who went to the University of Minnesota and wanted to show his friends around the city.

The three guys were on bikes and ended up at "Spoonbridge."

"We are a fan of the fine arts," said Huff. "They don't have stuff like this in Chicago - they have the big bean, the Lincoln monument, but not a specific park like Minneapolis."

Destination: nature

Franconia, a free, 43-acre park northeast of the Twin Cities, is good for a day-trip getaway. The park features more than 100 sculptures in a rural setting, many made by artist residents at the park. (Because of coronavirus, Franconia plans to continue the summer residency at half-capacity, phasing in residents and keeping them socially distant.)

Last Saturday, Deyvon Long of North Branch, Minn., and Laura Soulbrack of Burnsville walked down the dirt path that outlines the perimeter of the park. They were on a weekend-long date and decided to catch some art en route to a hike in Stillwater.

"For our first date I took him to a small art gallery, and so everywhere we've gone we try to find art," said Soulbrack.

They stood gazing at "Bodies Left Behind," a giant sculpture by Iranian-born, Minneapolis-based artists Pedram Baldari and Nooshin Hakim Javadi, made of several airplane wings hanging from a dome-like structure that referenced border crossing. The couple felt like being able to come to the sculpture park was a good compromise, since museums weren't open.

"The art here is more interactive, whereas at a museum it's more visual," said Long.

Franconia is taking advantage of its outdoor space to program live events throughout the summer, including a sculpture workshop Saturday afternoon and a film screening after sunset that night ("Kusama: Infinity," about Japanese contemporary artist Yayoi Kusama).

The park also provides space for kids to roam.

Nine-year-old Layla Soto swung from the yellow bars on "Infinite Play," a topsy-turvy ladder with a whimsical, tilted twist by artist Risa Puno. Leyla, her dad, Oscar Soto, and her sister stopped by the sculpture park instead of going hiking. The art reminded her of the jungle gym at school.

Friends Julie Stoltman of Hopkins and Ivy Balcer of Rockford stood in front of artist Bayeté Ross Smith's "Got the Power: Minnesota," one installment in a series of site-specific towers of now-obsolete cassette players and boomboxes that questions who controls imagery in a global society.

Stoltman isn't a huge art person, but the sculpture made her curious.

"You walk up to this and it's nostalgia," said Stoltman. "It turns on a memory."

The friends ended up at Franconia on the way back from a hike. With so much closed due to the coronavirus, everyone is figuring out more creative ways to spend their time.

"You have to reconnect in different ways," said Balcer. "You have to experience different things now."

612-673-4437 · @AliciaEler

A sampling OF Minnesota sculpture parks

Minneapolis Sculpture Garden, 725 Vineland Place, Mpls. 6 a.m.-midnight daily. Free. walkerart.org

Franconia Sculpture Park, 29836 St. Croix Trail, Shafer, Minn. Dawn to dusk daily. Free. 651-257-6668 or franconia.org

Caponi Art Park, a sculpture park that is a sculpture itself. 1220 Diffley Road, Eagan. 9 a.m.-8 p.m. Tue.-Sun. Free. 651-454-9412 or caponiartpark.org

Harrison Sculpture Garden at the Minnesota Landscape Arboretum, a sculpture park inside a natural haven. 3675 Arboretum Drive, Chaska. 9 a.m.-4 p.m. daily. $15. Reservations required at 612-301-7600 or arb.umn.edu

Western Sculpture Park, 15 large-scale works in the heart of St. Paul's historic Rondo neighborhood. 387 Marion St., St. Paul. Open 24 hours. Free. 651-266-8989 or publicartstpaul.org

Sculpture Garden at Anderson Center, a collection of outdoor gems from a statue of Moby Dick to a turtle with creation stories on its shell. 163 Tower View Drive, Red Wing. 8 a.m.-10 p.m. daily. Free. 651-388-2009 or andersoncenter.org

Teddy Bear Park, a kid-oriented park that includes a 10-foot-tall granite bear. 207 Nelson St. E., Stillwater. 8 a.m.- 8 p.m. daily, April-Oct. Free. 651-430-8800 or ci.stillwater.mn.us/teddy_bear_park

Load-Date: June 6, 2020

ARTICLE CCCXCIX.

IT TAKES AN ATHLETES' VILLAGE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 6, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 1CLength: 653 wordsByline: ANDREW KRAMMER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Sports figures team to fill void of resources in heavily damaged south Minneapolis neighborhoodBody

The bells of Kyle Rudolph's ice cream cart rang over a Lake Street parking lot, chimes summoning a south Minneapolis community stripped of many grocery stores and pharmacies following the aftermath of George Floyd's death in police custody.

Hundreds were served food and essential goods from diapers to dish soap Friday afternoon next to a heavily damaged Target and Cub Foods, where prominent Twin Cities sports figures volunteered to resupply neighborhoods in need as part of a grassroots campaign.

A Vikings virtual meeting on Monday led to a conversation about how to help, according to defensive end Danielle Hunter, who joined five teammates, Wolves guard Josh Okogie and coach Ryan Saunders and Gophers football coach P.J. Fleck, among others, at the pop-up supply station not far from the epicenter of many protests.

"Everyone needs to do their part," Hunter said. "We were just talking about how this is our community - our backyard. We needed to help."

Music brought dancing in front of loudspeakers. Nearby residents had medical needs evaluated at a tent with licensed pharmacists and medical professionals. Hunter, Fleck and employees from the Vikings, Wolves and Gophers carried full bags to cars and unloaded donations from others. Vikings center Garrett Bradbury and guard Dakota Dozier spent hours preparing food kits in paper bags.

About "50 to 100" volunteers were organized or simply showed up, according to Justin Castillo, who befriended Rudolph through the U's Masonic Children's Hospital. Justin and his sister, Kirsten, organized the event with Rudolph. The supply station became a priority after Rudolph and his teammates drove around south Minneapolis.

They first wanted to help shovel debris and clear sidewalks, but much of that work was underway.

"So, we were out asking what's the biggest need? How can we help?" Rudolph said. "As we stand here in the Cub parking lot, where this community would come and get its essential goods, it's under construction. They're putting it back together. To have a place where they can come get all this stuff was the bigger need."

Fleck said there was more to be gained for Gophers players and staffers.

"What we need to do right now is listen. Part of this is listening," Fleck said. "You show up here and see these people, see our community come together from devastation and understand the issues going on with social justice. We all need to be a part of the solution."

For Aviante Collins, a fourth-year Vikings offensive lineman, Floyd's death resonated particularly because he, like Floyd, grew up in Houston.

"It hits hard, close to home, because that was his home," Collins said. "A lot of diversity, especially in Houston. That's the good thing about that. A lot of times, things you might face somewhere else, you might not face down there, because you might have a Hispanic cop or a black cop that says, 'You know what, I understand. I grew up in the same neighborhood with him.' "

Between songs and ice cream, calls for sustained action and attention came from players and coaches. Wolves coach Ryan Saunders and his wife, Hayley, said they were particularly moved to restock the community's baby supplies as their son, Lucas, turns 1 year old on Saturday.

"To see some smiling faces today, you feel good," Saunders said. "But you know change needs to start and be sustained."

Friday's giveaway is not a "one-time deal," Justin Castillo said he told volunteers. His friend, Rudolph, said he wants to help organize more efforts. Other philanthropic ideas to rebuild south Minneapolis include a possible grant program for minority-owned small businesses in the area.

"This can't just be a one-time stop by and we'll give you some free food and essential goods and you're on your own," Rudolph said. "If we're going to change the community we live in, it can't be a flash in the pan. It has to be something that's sustainable and something we do for years to come."

Load-Date: June 8, 2020

Jazz for Justice sets mellow mood

ARTICLE CD. JAZZ FOR JUSTICE SETS MELLOW MOOD

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 6, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 10BLength: 77 wordsBody

A group of children rolled down the hill behind the band Glass Bead Games while they performed as part of the Jazz for Justice concert at Gold Medal Park in Minneapolis on Friday. Twin Cities jazz musicians performed a socially distanced show to honor the memory of George Floyd. The free event welcomed tips to donate to several organizations: Black Table Arts, Northside Business Support and Reclaim the Block.

RENÉE JONES SCHNEIDER · renee.jones@startribune.comLoad-Date: June 8, 2020

End of Document

Mall of America will open again on Wednesday

ARTICLE CDI. MALL OF AMERICA WILL OPEN AGAIN ON WEDNESDAY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 6, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 5B

Length: 285 words

Byline: NICOLE NORFLEET; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: The huge shopping center has been closed since March.

Body

The Mall of America will reopen Wednesday after being closed since March, first because of COVID-19 restrictions and then because of protests and riots after George Floyd died in Minneapolis police custody.

"Welcome back, we've missed you," the mall said on its website Friday afternoon.

The mall has been closed since March 17. It was scheduled to reopen June 1, but due to the unrest following the Memorial Day death of Floyd, mall management decided to postpone the opening.

On Friday, Gov. Tim Walz announced the state would lift more business restrictions designed to slow the spread of COVID-19 and allow limited indoor dining and entertainment and other uses. However, Mall of America spokesman Dan Jasper said mall leaders had already decided on the Wednesday date before the governor's announcement.

When customers go back, they will see floor markings that provide social distancing guidance, the mall said.

There also will be increased cleaning procedures, reduced seating in food courts and common areas and touchless hand sanitizers placed throughout MOA and plexiglass dividers set up between customers and employees.

Mall hours will be reduced at first to 11 a.m. to 7 p.m.

Nickelodeon Universe is unlikely to open under the latest state guidelines, but officials said the mall is trying to confirm if smaller attractions like the Moose Mountain Adventure Golf miniature golf course could reopen.

The mall, like other retail outlets, has struggled during the mandated closures.

Mall of America will open again on Wednesday

In May, mall officials confirmed that mall owners had not been making full mortgage payments and said the mall's revenue has dropped 85% since mid-March when it closed its doors.

Nicole Norfleet · 612-673-4495

Twitter: @nicolenorfleet

Load-Date: June 6, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDII. MINNEAPOLIS TO INCREASE TESTING FOR COVID-19

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 6, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 2BLength: 625 wordsByline: LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The city will be watching to see whether infections rise following protests.Body

Minneapolis health officials will be watching in the next three to four weeks to see if the large, peaceful protests or the unrest that followed George Floyd's death will lead to a spike in COVID-19 cases.

In the meantime, in an effort to minimize any further spread of the coronavirus, city Health Commissioner Gretchen Musicant told City Council members Friday that the city will set up additional testing sites.

Minneapolis has been particularly hard-hit by the coronavirus, accounting for roughly 13% of the state's COVID-19 cases, even though it has only 7.5% of the state's population, according to the latest statistics released by the city.

As of Thursday evening, the city had 3,579 confirmed cases and 569 hospitalizations. The pandemic has killed 142 people in the city. Another 2,854, were considered recovered.

The state had been awaiting the local peak of the coronavirus pandemic before the nights of protests, riots and memorials began.

"We're all looking for a leveling off," Council Member Cam Gordon said during Friday's public meeting.

He asked Musicant if there was evidence of that. She cautioned it was too early to tell. Data available so far largely reflects cases that were contracted before the large gatherings in Minneapolis.

"The state is seeing some positive turning of the peak, and so I'm hopeful that because we are contributing a significant amount to the statewide numbers, that our numbers are also doing that. But, we will have to wait and see," she said. "It does give us some sense of hope, but we'll see if that is well-placed."

Musicant, presenting data available earlier in the week, told the council that the COVID-19 pandemic has had a disproportionate impact on black and Hispanic residents. A community advisory group is preparing a report on racial disparities in COVID-19 cases and expects to release it in the next couple weeks, she said.

Minneapolis to increase testing for COVID-19

For the first time, the city also released a breakdown of cases by neighborhood. That data showed that 10 neighborhoods recorded more than 100 cases each. Those neighborhoods were East Phillips, Midtown Phillips, Phillips West, Ventura Village, Lind-Bohanon, Willard-Hay, Cedar-Riverside, Whittier, Central and Powderhorn Park. Council members noted that those neighborhoods are some of the most densely populated, and the data only showed raw case counts, as opposed to the rate of infection in those areas.

"This is a reflection of where people live," Musicant said. "They were not necessarily exposed where they live. They could be. Some of the exposures might be connected to their work."

Musicant said, starting next week, city officials hope to have COVID-19 testing set up at Sabathani Community Center, Native American Community Clinic, New Salem Baptist Church and another yet-to-be-determined location near the Third Precinct police headquarters, which was the focal point for many of the recent demonstrations and riots. The state recently updated its guidelines to recommend testing for anyone involved in large gatherings, such as protests or cleanup events.

In addition, city officials are working with the Minneapolis Public Housing Authority and a private landlord to increase testing in the densely populated, predominantly black Cedar-Riverside neighborhood, home to a cluster of infections.

The city noted in a statement that it expects it will be three to four weeks before officials know the full impact of recent unrest and cleanup efforts on the COVID-19 pandemic. City officials said they expect gatherings to continue this weekend, the incubation period for the virus can be up to 14 days, and there can be up to a week delay between testing and reporting the results.

Staff writer Miguel Otárola contributed to this report. Liz Navratil · 612-673-4994

Load-Date: June 8, 2020

ARTICLE CDIII. MORE BUSINESSES CAN RESUME JUNE 10

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 6, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1466 wordsByline: JEREMY OLSON; GLENN HOWATT; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Indoor restaurants, swimming pools, movie theaters, fitness clubs and other venues can resume limited business Wednesday as Gov. Tim Walz continues to dial back restrictions designed to slow the spread of COVID-19.

The governor's announcement Friday came amid indicators that the pandemic has at least temporarily "plateaued" in Minnesota, though state officials expect the coronavirus that causes COVID-19 to be a concern for months.

"COVID is still with us," Walz said, "but we gotta live with it."

No venues, indoor or outdoor, can host more than 250 people at once under the new guidance, but the level of reopening beyond that depends on the industry or activity. Churches, hair salons and indoor bars and restaurants can serve up to 50% of their capacities, while fitness centers, bowling alleys and movie theaters can serve 25% of their capacities as they reopen for the first time in more than two months.

With almost all businesses other than large concert and sporting venues allowed to resume, the more pressing statistic than building capacity is how many people they can serve while keeping unrelated groups 6 feet apart, said Steve Grove, commissioner of the Minnesota Department of Employment and Economic Development.

The risk of transmitting the novel coronavirus increases when people are face to face within 6 feet for 10 or more minutes, so businesses will need to maintain social distancing for workers and customers, Grove said.

"Social distancing ... is the bedrock principle of every single move that is made across this dial," Grove said.

Outdoor gatherings of 25 people and indoor gatherings of 10 people can now take place, as long as social distancing is observed, paving the way for small, belated graduation celebrations.

More businesses can resume June 10

Some competitive youth and adult recreational sports can resume but only if that spacing can be maintained. Tennis matches might be OK, but basketball games would present problems.

"You'd be a pretty bad basketball player if you're 6 feet apart from the person you are trying to defend," said Grove, who deferred to the state's COVID-19 web page for guidance on major summer sports such as baseball and soccer.

The announcement came as the Minnesota Department of Health reported 33 deaths and 712 newly confirmed cases of the infectious disease on Friday - an uptick from the daily numbers that had declined earlier in the week.

Case counts are now only doubling every 27 days in Minnesota - far less than the state's warning threshold of seven days.

"Something rather significantly changed from the second half of April, where we were really seeing ... logarithmic growth [in COVID-19 cases], to now this pattern of more of a plateau with small waves within it," said state Health Commissioner Jan Malcolm.

Case counts surged around the Memorial Day weekend, and Twin Cities hospitals reported running out of ICU space. But the number of hospitalizations for COVID-19 as of Friday was the lowest since May 17.

The improving situation fueled criticisms that Walz should remove restrictions entirely and let businesses decide for themselves what safety measures to install.

"We've got to get over the fear of this virus. ... We have to learn to live our lives," said Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, R-East Gull Lake.

The toll of the pandemic in Minnesota now stands at 26,980 known cases and 1,148 deaths, including 922 deaths of mostly elderly residents of long-term care and assisted-living facilities. Gazelka said restrictions should shift to this most vulnerable population only.

Restaurant owners supported Walz's move, although some felt whiplash after quickly creating or expanding outdoor dining areas to be ready by June 1, only to have indoor dining allowed June 10.

"I am as excited as can be," said Phil Weber, owner of the Park Tavern Bowling and Entertainment Center in St. Louis Park, where revenue declined 90% despite providing takeout food. "I get people calling all the time asking, 'Is your bowling open? Is your restaurant?'"

Consumer confidence could be fragile, so Brian Ingram of Hope Breakfast Bar in St. Paul said he hoped restaurants would make serious efforts to protect consumers and workers from infection.

He said he spent $30,000 getting ready with plexiglass partitions to separate tables and touchless fixtures in bathrooms.

"If one gets a bad reputation, it hurts all of us," he said.

Some businesses were ready to reopen, while others needed time. Life Time had opened some fitness clubs nationally already and plans to open all 23 Minnesota locations on Wednesday.

More businesses can resume June 10

Wearing of non-medical-grade masks is still encouraged, because of the high number of people with asymptomatic infections who can spread the coronavirus without knowing it. Restaurant servers must wear them, and stylists and their customers must both wear them.

A wave of COVID-19 cases is likely as people come in closer contact with one another, but whether it will be enough to result in renewed restrictions is unclear.

"We likely will be dealing with ongoing high levels of COVID-19 transmission for the months to come," said Malcolm, noting that a sudden steep decline in cases now could be a bad sign of a second wave that mimics the Spanish flu pandemic of 1918-1919.

Of particular concern is the spread of the virus among the thousands of protesters who turned out to the Minneapolis and St. Paul streets over the last week following the May 25 death of George Floyd while he was in police custody.

Singing, shouting and even labored breathing amid police use of tear gas to disperse protesters could have hastened the spread, Malcolm said. On the other hand, the outdoor air could have diffused the virus and reduced the threat of infection.

Health officials also are concerned that many protesters are black and that black people have suffered a higher rate of severe COVID-19. Black people make up less than 7% of Minnesota's population but more than 20% of its COVID-19 hospitalizations.

Black people suffer higher rates of chronic disease, which exacerbates COVID-19, but also are at higher risk of infection because they are employed in many essential, lower-wage jobs and can't work from home, Minnesota Department of Human Rights Commissioner Rebecca Lucero said.

Mobile COVID-19 testing sites are being developed to provide easier access for minorities or low-wage workers with less access to health care, she said.

Floyd tested positive for COVID-19 on April 3, but doctors said his asymptomatic case likely did not play a role in his death while restrained by police via a chokehold - and was more a symbolic reminder of a health inequity for black Minnesotans.

Critical businesses that were never required to close under Walz's prior stay-at-home order, which ended May 18 after 51 days, must now develop social distancing plans to minimize the risk of virus transmission for workers and customers, Grove said. People who can work from home will still be encouraged to do so, he added.

Increased testing is a key part of Minnesota's revised strategy. The state twice this week exceeded 10,000 daily COVID-19 tests - an amount that was unthinkable amid global supply shortages in the early stages of the pandemic.

Health officials emphasized on Friday that any protesters, first responders and volunteers should get tested for COVID-19, regardless of whether they have symptoms, five to seven days after participating in any mass events following Floyd's death.

The primary purpose of the business closures and social distancing restrictions was to slow the spread of the virus and buy time for health care providers to add testing capacity, ventilators and masks and other protective equipment for doctors and nurses.

More businesses can resume June 10

Hospitals in response added hundreds of intensive care beds and ventilators to the state's emergency supply.

Hospital officials remain concerned about a surge of cases that could overwhelm their capacities but support the easing of restrictions as long as they can be reinstated if necessary, said Dr. Rahul Koranne, chief executive of the Minnesota Hospital Association.

"Dials that turn up," he said, "should be turned down if metrics get worrisome."

Staff writers Briana Bierschbach, Torey Van Oot, Sharyn Jackson and Nicole Norfleet contributed to this report. Jeremy Olson · 612-673-7744

TRACKING CORONAVIRUS

Minnesota cases, daily change*

26,980 -- Total cases

712 -- June 5 new cases

*Chart data is a net count of new confirmed cases minus previously announced cases that were removed by MDH on that date.

Minnesota deaths, new daily

1,148 -- Total deaths

33 -- June 5

U.S. cases, new daily

1,883,033 -- Total cases

21,614 -- June 4

U.S. deaths, new daily

108,194 -- Total deaths

1,010 -- June 4

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete charts.)

Sources: New York Times, Minnesota Dept. of Health

Note: U.S. data lags a day behind Minnesota

Load-Date: June 8, 2020

ARTICLE CDIV. PAYING IT FORWARD, IN ABUNDANCE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 6, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 873 wordsByline: KATY READ; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Wayne Bugg got help to better his life. Now he's a quiet hero in his community.Body

Wayne Bugg gazed around the ransacked interior of the St. Vincent de Paul thrift store in Minneapolis - floors piled with broken glass, overturned office supplies, scattered jewelry - left by looters during protests and riots over George Floyd's death.

It looks bad now, but it was much worse a week ago, he said. "They just flipped over everything. It was complete chaos. I've never seen anything like this before."

For Bugg, that's saying a lot.

He's seen a lot of destruction. He understands the looters' pain and frustration; as a black man in America he has felt it himself. Struggles in his youth have left him with compassion and empathy for which he is widely admired.

Those qualities are evident as he works to put the thrift store at 2939 S. 12th Ave. back in order. Across the city, store owners are picking up the pieces. Not all have Bugg's patience and resolve.

"His life experience has given him enduring wisdom," said Minneapolis police Lt. Grant Snyder, who leads a homeless outreach unit and met Bugg at the thrift store. "No matter what your trouble is, it's like he's looking into your soul."

At 41, Bugg is the store manager and associate executive director of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul-Twin Cities. His home is not far from the corner where Floyd died. He lives comfortably with his wife and 10-year-old twins. They also have three grown kids.

But there was a time when that kind of future seemed out of reach.

Bugg grew up in Harvey, Ill., a poverty-stricken suburb just south of Chicago. In his teens, his mother and stepfather became addicted to crack - along with many of their neighbors. He would come home from school to find his parents with "their eyes glazed, almost like dementia." Having seen its damage, Bugg says he never used the drug. But it cast a shadow on his life.

"In the midst of the drug epidemic and gangs and poverty, at some point in school I lost hope."

He dabbled in liquor and marijuana. He wasn't violent but he misbehaved enough to get kicked out of high school.

His folks sent him to live with his aunt and cousins in Gary, Ind., which was just as blighted. Jobs were so scarce that an opening at McDonald's would draw a line of applicants two blocks long.

"So then I began to sell crack, which was sad because I became the very thing I hated, out of necessity," he recalled.

At about 20, he moved with his aunt and cousins to live in Minneapolis. They wound up on the south side. The man next door worked for the St. Vincent de Paul thrift store, three blocks away, and needed help moving donated furniture. Bugg agreed to help and eventually became a cashier. One day Darryl Bach, then president of the St. Vincent de Paul-Twin Cities Volunteer Council Board, changed Bugg's future.

"This old white man came up and told me I needed to do something with my life," Bugg said. "I was shocked, but it got my attention. ... I saw a man who cared enough to say something."

Bugg earned his GED; keep going, Bach said. Bugg earned a bachelor's degree in business management from Metropolitan State University. St. Vincent de Paul covered much his tuition.

Now, after 23 years at the store, he'll be next in line for the top job at the Twin Cities society, Executive Director Ed Koerner said. "I sleep so much easier at night, knowing that if I dropped dead tomorrow the ball's going to be picked up and he'll probably carry it farther than I could."

Koerner recalled the time Bugg told his life story to an audience of about 300 mostly older white people, at a St. Vincent de Paul regional meeting and "at the end there wasn't a dry eye in the room." Bugg had the same effect when he talked to a group of Richfield high school students, Koerner said. "I walked out of the gymnasium and you could hear kids crying."

He treats every store customer with respect, Koerner said. "In a normal day in our world down there it gets pretty crazy. Heroin addicts, homeless people who are intoxicated." Bugg gives them clothes if they need them and has been known to help them put on free shoes and socks. "It's always about the need of the person and the dignity of the person."

At the store on Thursday, Bugg found a man on the sidewalk outside shooting up what appeared to be heroin. Bugg stopped and talked to the man. He told him it wasn't safe to do that in public or to shoot up alone. Another person should be there in case someone overdoses.

"I don't agree with it, but I know the reality of people that are hurting - drugs camouflage that hurt," Bugg said.

So although he was dismayed when he found the store in shambles, he also understood how people would feel after witnessing an act Bugg compared to "somebody being lynched," why they'd be enraged when the officers weren't immediately charged.

After years of feeling their voices weren't being heard, he said, "people were mad and wanted to communicate their frustrations."

Paying it forward, in abundance

So now he's trying to address immediate needs. With some grocery stores trashed, the thrift store has given out hundreds of boxes of food every day. He is heartened to see the diversity of those gathering to pick it up.

"I see the silver lining in this - people coming together, white, black, Chinese, Hmong," Bugg said. "I wish it was like this all the time."

Katy Read · 612-673-4583

Load-Date: June 8, 2020

End of Document

PICK SIX

ARTICLE CDV. PICK SIX

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 6, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 6ELength: 329 wordsByline: JON BREAM; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Pick Six is a half-dozen cool things in music, from two points of view.

John Austinson of Robbinsdale:

1 John Taylor's "Stone Love Bass Odyssey." After he gives a bass guitar tutorial on a Duran Duran song, the band's bassist does a live chat with a special guest like Dave 1 from Chromeo. Aired at 1 p.m. Wednesdays on @duranduran Instagram, archived on YouTube.

2 Steve Cropper on "The Ronnie Wood Show." On this old AXS TV show, the Stones guitarist talked with the Memphis guitarist about Stax Records and writing "Sitting on the Dock of the Bay" with Otis Redding just before his death. The singer never heard the final version with the electric guitar that we all know and love.

3 Backyard jam on Thursdays. With the live music shutdown, two friends and I came up with an idea for a concert where we rotate lead vocals. We even have an intermission - and an encore. By night's end, we've covered 35-plus songs, ranging from Arcwelder to Frank Zappa and everything in between.

Jon Bream of the Star Tribune:

1 "Black" by Dave. The British rapper's performance at this year's Brit Awards was replayed this week on "The Late Late Show With James Corden." Sitting at a piano, Dave rapped about what it's like to be black. "Black is all I know, there ain't a thing that I would change in it." Powerful, dramatic and real.

2 The Steeles concert for healing. This livestreamed impromptu front-yard concert by these soul-stirring Twin Cities siblings was the musical tonic we needed. Highlights: India. Arie's "Better Way" and the prayerful "Let There Be Peace on Earth."

3 Musicians taking a stand for justice. After George Floyd's death in Minneapolis, musicians from around the world made their feelings known, whether it was donating to helpful organizations, participating in #BlackoutTuesday, speaking out in a full-page ad or sounding off on social media. Props to Jason Isbell for this tweet: " 'You're gonna lose some of your audience!' Maybe so, but I get to keep ALL of my SOUL."

PICK SIX

Load-Date: June 6, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDVI. AS TRUMP BLAMES ANTIFA, PROTEST RECORDS SHOW SCANT EVIDENCE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 7, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 2198 wordsByline: Michael Biesecker, Michael Kunzelman, Jake Bleiberg, Alanna Durkin RicherHighlight: WASHINGTON (AP) - Scott Nichols, a balloon artist, was riding home on his scooter from the protests engulfing Minneapolis last weekend when he was struck by a rubber bullet fired from a cluster of police officers in riot gear.Body

WASHINGTON - Scott Nichols, a balloon artist, was riding home on his scooter from the protests engulfing Minneapolis last weekend when he was struck by a rubber bullet fired from a cluster of police officers in riot gear.

"I just pulled over and put my hands up, because I didn't want to get killed," said Nichols, 40. "Anybody that knows me knows I wasn't out there to cause problems."

Nichols, who before the coronavirus pandemic made his living performing at children's birthday parties under the stage name "Amazing Scott," spent two days in jail before being released, facing criminal charges of riot and curfew violation.

President Donald Trump has characterized those clashing with law enforcement after George Floyd's death under the knee of a Minneapolis police officer as organized, radical-left thugs engaging in domestic terrorism, an assertion repeated by Attorney General William Barr. Some Democrats, including Minnesota Gov. Tim Walz and Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey, initially tried to blame out-of-state far-right infiltrators for the unrest before walking back those statements.

There is scant evidence either is true.

The Associated Press analyzed court records, employment histories, social media posts and other sources of information for 217 people arrested last weekend in Minneapolis and the District of Columbia, two cities at the epicenter of the protests across the United States.

Rather than outside agitators, more than 85% of those arrested by police were local residents. Of those charged with such offenses as curfew violations, rioting and failure to obey law enforcement, only a handful appeared to have any affiliation with organized groups.

As Trump blames antifa, protest records show scant evidence

Those charged with more serious offenses related to looting and property destruction - such as arson, burglary and theft - often had past criminal records. But they, too, were overwhelmingly local residents taking advantage of the chaos.

Social media posts indicate only a few of those arrested are left-leaning activists, including a self-described anarchist. But others had indications of being on the political right, including some Trump supporters.

The president has tried to portray the protesters and looters with a broad brush as "radical-left, bad people," ominously invoking the name "antifa," an umbrella term for leftist militants bound more by belief than organizational structure. Trump tweeted last Sunday that he planned to designate antifa as a terrorist organization.

"These are acts of domestic terror," Trump said in a Rose Garden speech Monday, moments after heavily armed troops and riot police advanced without warning on the largely peaceful protesters across the street from the White House.

Barr, put in charge of organizing the police and military response, activated the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force last weekend to target protest organizers.

"The violence instigated and carried out by Antifa and other similar groups in connection with the rioting is domestic terrorism and will be treated accordingly," Barr said in a statement issued Sunday.

There have been violent acts, including property destruction and theft. Police officers and protesters have been seriously injured and killed. But federal law enforcement officials have offered little evidence that antifa-aligned protesters could be behind a movement that has appeared nearly simultaneously in hundreds of cities and towns in all 50 states since Floyd's death.

The AP obtained copies of daily confidential "Intelligence Notes" distributed this past week to local enforcement by the Department of Homeland Security that repeat, without citing evidence, that "organized violent opportunists - including suspected anarchist extremists - could increasingly perpetrate nationwide targeting of law enforcement and critical infrastructure."

"We lack detailed reporting indicating the level of organization and planning by some violent opportunists and assess that most of the violence to date has been loosely organized on a level seen with previous widespread outbreaks of violence at lawful protests," the assessment for Monday says.

The following day, the assessment noted "several uncorroborated reports of bricks being pre-staged at planned protest venues nationwide."

"Although we have been unable to verify the reporting through official channels, the staging of improvised weapons at planned events is a common tactic used by violent opportunists," the Tuesday assessment says.

But social media posts warning that stacks of bricks have been left at protest sites in Atlanta, Boston and Los Angeles have been debunked by local officials who have explained that the masonry was out in the open before the protests or was for use in construction projects.

Nichols, the balloon artist, hardly fits the portrait of a radical.

As Trump blames antifa, protest records show scant evidence

He recently gained local notice for a giant balloon rabbit and other sculptures displayed in his front yard for Easter. He laughed when asked if he had any ties to antifa or other militant groups. A white man who lives less than a half mile from where Floyd was killed on May 25, Nichols said he protested to support of his neighbors, many of whom are black.

"It was the most insane thing I've seen in my life," he said. "The city was going crazy."

Nichols said he and a friend helped douse a dumpster fire near a laundromat. He remembers getting a text from his mother saying that Minneapolis had set an 8 p.m. curfew, but he thought it would be enforced loosely.

"Had I known that being out after curfew would be such a severe penalty, I would have never done it," Nichols said, adding that he missed his son's high school graduation while he was in jail.

Lars Ortiz, a 35-year-old classical musician, said he was driving just blocks from his Minneapolis home on May 29 after visiting a friend recovering from COVID-19 when officers pulled him out of his car at gunpoint. He said he had been unaware of the 8 p.m. curfew enacted that night.

Ortiz and another friend in the car with him were put in zip-tie restraints and forced to wait on a bus for hours before police took them to jail, where he would spend the weekend.

"It was scary. It was confusing. I felt violated," said Ortiz, a cellist who identifies as a biracial Mexican American.

Ortiz was held on a riot charge and curfew violation. He said he was told when he was released from jail on Monday the more serious rioting charge was dropped.

Lt. Andy Knotz of the Anoka County Sheriff's Office, whose deputies were deployed from the suburban county north of Minneapolis into the city to help with the unrest, said it was a "chaotic scene" and that Ortiz was coming from the direction of the protests. Knotz said Ortiz was removed from his car by the Minnesota State Patrol, and an Anoka deputy took him to the police station.

"In chaos like that you can't determine who is legit and who isn't," Knotz said.

Natalie Cook, 43, who's white, said she had never before participated in a protest, but wanted to be there to support and protect her 24-year-old son, who's black.

"Not only did I want to go to be an ally to black people, but I wanted to go to support my son," Cook said. "Also, I was afraid to send him out by himself."

Cook said they were marching peacefully with about 100 protesters for hours when police started using tear gas and shooting rubber bullets. As they tried to get away, they were pepper sprayed and her son was hit at close range by a rubber bullet, she said. They were both jailed and released on Monday, charged with riot and violating curfew.

Cook said her son was deeply affected by Floyd's death and she doesn't have any regrets about going out to make their voices heard.

"My son was really struggling with it," she said. "We couldn't just sit by and watch."

As Trump blames antifa, protest records show scant evidence

AP filed public records requests seeking arrest reports and other documents that might show what evidence law enforcement officers have against Nichols, Ortiz the Cooks and others arrested in Minneapolis. Those records have not yet been provided.

In Washington, the D.C. Metropolitan Police arrested at least 81 people last weekend, including some as young as 13. Most were charged with curfew violations and felony rioting, which could result in up to 180 days in jail and $5,000 in fines.

Among the highest profile arrests made by federal authorities in the last week was Matthew Lee Rupert. Prosecutors allege the 28-year-old Illinois man traveled to Minneapolis to participate in riots and then posted videos on a Facebook page showing him looting stores and handing out explosives.

In one video, Rupert, a convicted felon, says: "We come to riot, boy! This is what we came for!"

Though Rupert is alleged to have targeted police officers, there is no evidence cited in his indictment he is affiliated with any organized group. Among the few indicators of his political beliefs was a series of Facebook posts celebrating Trump's 2017 inauguration. "Trump is my president but I'm not racist," he wrote, adding that he loves Mexican food.

Rupert, who made an initial court appearance Friday, remains in federal custody. A federal public defender assigned to represent him did not respond to a voicemail message seeking comment.

Michael German, a former FBI agent and fellow with the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University, said people often travel and cross state lines to participate in protests and that not all of them have peaceful intent. He said politicians and law enforcement often cite the presence of out-of-towners to justify greater police force against protesters.

"It's an old tactic for law enforcement policing protests to suggest that the problems are being caused by outside agitators," German said. "It opens up the opportunity for greater police violence in response."

Among those who traveled to Minneapolis to protest Floyd's killing was Tara Houska, a 36-year-old attorney and member of the Couchiching First Nation from northern Minnesota. An activist for indigenous rights, she was arrested in Minneapolis last Saturday night and charged with not complying with a peace officer.

Houska, who attended college and law school in the city, said she was with a group a couple blocks from where Floyd died when police told them they were breaking curfew. They replied they were going home, she said, and then the officers hit them with pepper spray and zip-tied their hands.

"Almost everyone that was in our holding tank with us was from Minnesota," Houska said.

Sierra West, 29, of Kansas City, Missouri, said she drove to Minneapolis with a friend because she is "so angry about what is happening" with police brutality and wanted to peacefully protest.

After marching for hours, West broke away from the crowds and was walking back to her car through an alley alone when police arrested her early Saturday on riot and curfew violation charges. She said she did nothing to provoke the four officers who confronted her.

"They were hiding, and they literally jumped out of the shadows with guns drawn on me," she said. "The street was completely empty."

As Trump blames antifa, protest records show scant evidence

West, who is white and describes herself as a strong supporter of the Black Lives Matter movement, was freed from jail on Monday afternoon.

University of Minnesota Law School student Santana Boulton, 23, said a police officer pepper-sprayed her in the face on May 28 before she was tear-gassed two days later and then arrested on Sunday, charged with unlawful assembly and violating a curfew.

About 15 minutes before the 8 p.m. curfew, Boulton said she and her boyfriend joined a large crowd of marchers on Interstate 35. People linked arms and kneeled before two lines of police officers formed near the protesters. She said she never heard any orders to disperse.

"It was nothing like a riot. It was a sit-in," she said.

Boulton, a white woman who moved from Michigan to Minneapolis to attend law school, was arrested and spent 16 hours in custody. She described herself as "philosophically an anarchist," but "not a revolutionary."

"Antifa isn't even real," Boulton said. "As an actual person who identifies with the political label of anarchist, the only thing anarchists do is have meetings where they argue for five hours and get nothing done."

Kunzelman reported from Silver Spring, Maryland, Bleiberg from Dallas and Durkin Richer from West Harwich, Massachusetts. Associated Press writers Brian Slodysko and Ashraf Khalil in Washington, Amanda Seitz and Don Babwin in Chicago, and Lori Hinnant in Paris contributed to this report.

Follow Associated Press Investigative Reporter Michael Biesecker at <http://twitter.com/mbieseck>

Have a tip? Contact AP's global investigative team at Investigative@ap.org

This story has been corrected to reflect that Trump's remarks in the Rose Garden came after, not before, authorities advanced on protesters across the street from the White House. Correctional officers of color who say they were segregated from Derek Chauvin: Why isn't Ramsey Co. jail superintendent on leave? America disrupted: Troubles cleave a nation, and a city White woman charged after racist Central Park confrontation It's been 4 years since Philando Castile died. His mother thinks about him 'every breathing day.' In troubled times: Independence Day in a land of confusion

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

'Playground' for renegade cops

ARTICLE CDVII. 'PLAYGROUND' FOR RENEGADE COPS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 7, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1537 wordsByline: LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITER; ANDY MANNIX; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Long before former officer Derek Chauvin knelt on George Floyd's neck, the Third Precinct in south Minneapolis had a reputation for being home to police officers who played by their own rules.

One officer kicked a handcuffed suspect in the face, leaving his jaw in pieces. Officers beat and pistol-whipped a suspect in a parking lot on suspicion of low-level drug charges. Others harassed residents of a south Minneapolis housing project as they headed to work, and allowed prostitution suspects to touch their genitals for several minutes before arresting them in vice stings.

These and more substantiated incidents, detailed in court records and police reports, help explain a saying often used by fellow cops to describe the style of policing practiced in the Third: There's the way that the Minneapolis Police Department does things, and then there's the way they do it "in Threes."

Between 2007 and 2017, the city paid out $2.1 million to settle misconduct lawsuits involving Third Precinct officers. Judges have thrown out cases for "outrageous" conduct of the officers, and prosecutors have been forced to drop charges for searches found to be illegal, according to court records.

The brand of aggressive policing on display in the Floyd video has long been standard practice for some Third Precinct officers when dealing with suspects of nonviolent, low-level crimes, often involving people of color, said Abigail Cerra, a commissioner for Minneapolis' Police Conduct Oversight Commission.

"My clients were constantly getting anal searches," said Cerra, who also has been a public defender. "Not at the hospital. At the Third Precinct."

Chauvin and the other three officers who assisted in Floyd's arrest - all of whom worked at the Third Precinct - have been fired and now face criminal charges. That has not satisfied protesters, who continue to call for more action from city officials, ranging from drastically overhauling to dismantling the police force.

'Playground' for renegade cops

The officers who participated in Floyd's killing, they say, are a reflection of broader issues that have shadowed the Minneapolis Police Department for decades. Its strained relations with minority communities, reflected in part by the troubling disparities in its use of force and the deaths of other unarmed black men, are now drawing unprecedented national scrutiny.

While 40% of the city's residents are people of color, 74% of all Minneapolis police cases with force involve them. Black people are on the receiving end of officers' force 63% of the time, according to the most recent department data available. And, despite the implementation of de-escalation training and body cameras, complaints against officers continue to rise, according to a 2019 annual report.

Public defender Jordan Deckenbach said the Floyd footage "is 100% consistent with the hours and hours and hours of body camera footage I've watched over the years."

Last week, the Minnesota Department of Human Rights announced it would investigate the past decade of the Police Departments policies and procedures to determine if officers have engaged in systemic discrimination against minorities. U.S. Sen. Amy Klobuchar has asked the Department of Justice for a similar review at the federal level, and U.S. Rep. Ilhan Omar is calling for a new federal agency focused on criminal misconduct of police.

In a statement, police Chief Medaria Arradondo said that after taking over the department he released a "vision statement" outlining his expectations for every officer on the force.

"There is no precinct, shift or staff member that is exempt from these expectations," Arradondo said. "Staff that deviates from these expectations shall be subjected to corrective action to bring them into compliance with expectations."

Combustible mix

Cerra believes the Third Precinct's culture dates to the infamous Metro Gang Strike Force. The state shut down the task force in 2009 after an investigation revealed officers stole money, cars and other evidence, and routinely beat suspects, including, in one case, an officer kicking a 2-year-old child in the head. The state has paid out more than $3.6 million to victims of the strike force's misconduct.

Some task force officers ended up in the Third Precinct.

Greg Hestness, a retired Minneapolis deputy chief, thinks the precinct's cocky, swaggering culture dates to the 1980s, when a flood of transfers from downtown's First Precinct and the then-recently shuttered Sixth Precinct brought a combustible mix of "old timers" and "young Vietnam vets."

"The Third Precinct was kind of sleepy until then," said Hestness. Almost overnight, the precinct's culture changed, he said, suddenly overrun with a new brand of "go-getters and hard chargers."

The third covers Minneapolis' largest geographic area, bound by Interstate 35W, I-94 and the Mississippi River. It includes some of the most racially diverse neighborhoods in Minneapolis such as Little Earth, a housing project that has long been the heart of the region's urban American Indian population.

While department data show that officers in the First and Fourth precincts use force more often, officers in the Third are more likely to use it when responding to a call. Years of overaggressive policing had driven a wedge between nearby communities and the precinct.

'Playground' for renegade cops

"It was kind of like a playground for rogue cops," said Paul Applebaum, an attorney who specializes in civil police misconduct cases. He said he had a hard time producing witnesses to come forward when he filed suits involving residents of Little Earth, because many feared retaliation from officers.

Jeff Jindra, a former supervisor for the Metro Gang Strike Force, served as sergeant for the Third Precinct's community response team, a task force that specialized in drugs, prostitution and other quality-of-life issues. Jindra, who has since retired, racked up several complaints and lawsuits for excessive use of force over the years. In one highly publicized case, the city paid out $110,000 to a murder suspect who sued Jindra for brutality, alleging the veteran officer kicked him while handcuffed and broke his jaw in several places, requiring metal plates to put it back together.

It was the community response team that arrested Victor Gaten, a black man, in 2015 on E. Lake Street, just blocks from the Third Precinct, on suspicion of drug possession. After tackling him, one officer hit him with the sight on the top of his pistol. Another, Christopher Reiter, punched Gaten so hard that he threw his back out and needed an ambulance, according to court records.

"They could have killed me right there," Gaten later told Hennepin County Judge Toddrick Barnette.

The officers recovered drugs, but Barnette dismissed the charges due to the officers' "outrageous" conduct, saying he didn't believe some of the officers' testimony.

"This is one of the reasons why some citizens in Minneapolis have problems with Minneapolis police," Barnette, now the county's chief judge, said of the officers in a 2015 court hearing.

Reiter was eventually fired from the department and convicted in 2017 of kicking a handcuffed suspect in the face, breaking the man's jaw and teeth and leaving him with a traumatic brain injury.

In January, officers from the Third Precinct stopped Troy Carlton Donicht after seeing him driving a car that had been reported stolen. One officer shouted, "I'm going to shoot you right in the head!" as another ripped him from the car, according to a transcript of body camera video. Last Monday, in the aftermath of the Floyd protests, prosecutors dropped the charges.

A few problem cops?

Defenders of the Third say that the problem lies with a few problem cops, not with the entire precinct.

Al Berryman, a past president of the police union, says that it's easy for the department's critics to point fingers after the Floyd controversy.

"If this guy was doing it all along, then why was he out there?" Berryman said of Chauvin, who racked up at least 17 civilian complaints, only one of which led to discipline. "It always bothered me that there's so much chatter about what has not been done, and yet the mayor's the head of the department: Why has the mayor not done anything about some of these people?"

Margarita Ortega, a community organizer at Little Earth, said that the precinct's officers have made more of an effort in recent years to reach out to residents, including two Police Athletics League officers who coach a youth girls softball team called the PAL Red Bears.

But because of countless bad police run-ins over the years, "Our community tends to not call the police as often because they don't know what the reaction is going to be," she says.

'Playground' for renegade cops

The simmering resentment over police conduct exploded into widespread protests and rioting after Floyd's death. The South Side police headquarters at 3000 Minnehaha Av. quickly became a focal point of protesters' rage.

Demonstrators laid siege to the building on May 28 and stormed it after police abandoned their post. After looting the building, they set it ablaze.

Staff writers Liz Navratil and Jeff Hargarten contributed to this report.

libor.jany @startribune.com 612-849-5440 · Twitter: @StribJany

andy.mannix@startribune.com 612-673-4036 · Twitter: @AndrewMannix

Load-Date: July 2, 2020

End of Document

Protesters march to defund Mpls. police

ARTICLE CDVIII. PROTESTERS MARCH TO DEFUND MPLS. POLICE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 7, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 10ALength: 487 wordsByline: JANET MOORE; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Protesters peacefully took to the streets in Minneapolis on Saturday in a plea to defund the Minneapolis Police Department - a demand that Mayor Jacob Frey told them he could not support.

There was no official estimate of the crowd's size, but organizers say several thousand attended the march.

The protest was one of many nationwide over the death of George Floyd after a Minneapolis police officer knelt on his neck for nearly nine minutes. Floyd's death has sparked a national conversation about defunding or downsizing police departments.

Organized by the Minneapolis advocacy group Black Visions, the event began at Bottineau Field Park, passed by the Minneapolis Police Federation's union headquarters, and ended outside Frey's home.

While several members of the Minneapolis City Council support disbanding the department in favor of a model calling for community-led safety, Frey has said he favors reforms instead.

As protesters stopped near his home, Frey emerged and said, "I have been coming to grips with my own responsibility, my own failure in this." When protesters asked whether he will defund the department, Frey said, "I do not support the full abolition of the Police Department." He was then told to leave the gathering, and did.

The march featured poetry readings, indigenous prayers, dancing, placards of all sorts and chants of "George Floyd!" and "Black Lives Matter!"

When the throng pulled up outside police union headquarters on University Avenue, which is surrounded by chain-link fence, they shouted, "You are about to lose your job!" A banner that stated "Closed for Business" was draped from the building.

The police presence at the march appeared to be limited to a few officers on bicycles who kept their distance. March organizers, wearing bright orange and yellow vests, some on bicycles, redirected traffic away from the marchers' path.

Protesters march to defund Mpls. police

Participants pushed strollers, hoisted toddlers on their shoulders and walked dogs.

Addressing the crowd, Rep. Ilhan Omar, D-Minn., said the time for departmental reform has passed. "The Minneapolis Police Department is rotten to the root and so when we dismantle it, we get rid of that cancer and we allow for something beautiful to rise."

Natasha Byers of Bloomington said she attended the march and supports the cause because "police are destroying black folks, they're killing us for no reason."

Others said they hope change will occur. "I want to be able to walk outside my home and not be afraid that I'm going to be attacked" by police or die, said Jaz Cousin of Minneapolis. "It's our generation; this is the world we live in."

The City Council voted Friday to ban police officers from using chokeholds and neck restraints and strengthened rules for officers to intervene if a colleague is using excessive force. The action needs a judge's approval.

Staff writer Cathy Roberts contributed to this report. Janet Moore · 612-673-7752 · Twitter: @ByJanetMoore

Load-Date: July 2, 2020

ARTICLE CDIX. MASSIVE GEORGE FLOYD PROTESTS ACROSS US DEMAND
POLICE REFORM

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 7, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1295 words

Byline: Steven Sloan, Justin Pritchard, Tom Foreman Jr.

Highlight: WASHINGTON (AP) - Massive demonstrations against racism and police brutality filled some of the nation's most famous cityscapes Saturday, with tens of thousands of people marching peacefully in scenes that were more often festive than tense.

Body

WASHINGTON - Massive demonstrations against racism and police brutality filled some of the nation's most famous cityscapes Saturday, with tens of thousands of people marching peacefully in scenes that were more often festive than tense.

Wearing masks and urging fundamental change, protesters gathered in dozens of places from coast to coast while mourners in North Carolina waited for hours to glimpse the golden coffin carrying the body of native son George Floyd, the black man whose death at the hands of Minneapolis police has galvanized the expanding movement.

Collectively, it was perhaps the largest one-day mobilization since Floyd died 12 days ago and came as many cities began lifting curfews that authorities imposed following initial spasms of arson, assaults and smash-and-grab raids on businesses. Authorities have softened restrictions as the number of arrests plummeted.

Demonstrations also reached four other continents, ending in clashes in two European cities. In the U.S., Seattle police used flash bang devices and pepper spray to disperse protesters hurling rocks, bottles and explosives, just a day after city leaders temporarily banned one kind of tear gas.

The largest U.S. demonstration appeared to be in Washington, where protesters flooded streets closed to traffic. On a hot, humid day, they gathered at the Capitol, on the National Mall and in neighborhoods. Some turned intersections into dance floors. Tents offered snacks and water.

Pamela Reynolds said she came seeking greater police accountability.

"The laws are protecting them," said the 37-year-old African American teacher. The changes she wants include a federal ban on police chokeholds and a requirement that officers wear body cameras.

Massive George Floyd protests across US demand police reform

At the White House, which was fortified with new fencing and extra security measures, chants and cheers could be heard in waves. President Donald Trump, who has urged authorities to crack down on unrest, downplayed the demonstration, tweeting: "Much smaller crowd in D.C. than anticipated."

Elsewhere, the backdrops included some of the nation's most famous landmarks. Peaceful marchers filed across the Golden Gate Bridge in San Francisco and the Brooklyn Bridge in New York, where officers pulled back on enforcing a curfew that has led to confrontations. They walked the boulevards of Hollywood and a Nashville, Tennessee, street famous for country music-themed bars and restaurants.

They also gathered in places as far flung as a St. Louis suburb and cities in the Deep South.

Many wore masks - a reminder of the danger that the protests could exacerbate the spread of the coronavirus.

Roderick Sweeney, who is black, said he was overwhelmed to see the large turnout of white protesters waving signs that said "Black Lives Matter" in San Francisco.

"We've had discussions in our family and among friends that nothing is going to change until our white brothers and sisters voice their opinion," said Sweeney, 49. The large turnout of white protesters "is sending a powerful message."

In Philadelphia and Chicago, marchers chanted, carried signs and occasionally knelt in silence. At a massive showing near the Philadelphia Museum of Art and its famous "Rocky" steps, protesters chanted "No justice, no peace!" before heading for City Hall.

Seattle police said on Twitter that several officers were injured by "improvised explosives" thrown by a crowd. Officers responded with pepper spray. Earlier, a large crowd of medical workers, many in lab coats and scrubs, marched to City Hall, holding signs reading, "Police violence and racism are a public health emergency" and "Nurses kneel with you, not on you" - a reference to how a white officer pressed his knee on Floyd's neck for several minutes.

Atop a parking garage in downtown Atlanta, a group of black college band alumni serenaded protesters with a tuba-heavy mix of tunes. Standing within earshot, business owner Leah Aforkor Quaye said it was her first time hitting the streets.

"This makes people so uncomfortable, but the only way things are happening is if we make people uncomfortable," said Quaye, who is black.

In Raeford, North Carolina, a town near Floyd's birthplace, people lined up outside a Free Will Baptist church, waiting to enter in small groups. At a private memorial service, mourners sang along with a choir. At the front of the chapel was a large photo of Floyd and a portrait of him adorned with an angel's wings and halo.

"It could have been me. It could have been my brother, my father, any of my friends who are black," said Erik Carlos of nearby Fayetteville. "It made me feel very vulnerable at first."

Floyd's body will go to Houston, where he lived before Minneapolis, for another memorial in the coming days.

Massive George Floyd protests across US demand police reform

Protesters and their supporters in public office say they're determined to turn the outpouring into change, notably overhauling policing policies. Many marchers urged officials to "defund the police," which some painted in enormous yellow letters on the street leading to the White House near a "Black Lives Matter" mural that the mayor had added a day earlier.

Theresa Bland, 68, a retired teacher and real estate agent protesting at the Ohio Statehouse in Columbus, envisioned a broader agenda.

"I'm looking at affordable housing, political justice, prison reform," she said.

Some change already has come.

Minneapolis officials have agreed to ban chokeholds and neck restraints and require that officers stop colleagues who are using improper force. California Gov. Gavin Newsom ordered the state's police-training program to stop teaching officers a neck hold that blocks blood flowing to the brain.

The police chief in Bellevue, a wealthy city near Seattle, largely banned officers from using neck restraints, while police in Reno, Nevada, updated their use-of-force policy.

Congressional Democrats are preparing a sweeping package of police reforms, which is expected to include changes to immunity provisions and creating a database of use-of-force incidents. Revamped training requirements are planned, too, among them a ban on chokeholds.

The prospects of reforms clearing a divided Congress are unclear.

While police in some places have knelt in solidarity with protesters, their treatment of some marchers also has generated more tension.

Two officers in Buffalo, New York, were charged Saturday with second-degree assault after a video earlier this week showed them shoving a 75-year-old protester, who smashed his head on the pavement. Both pleaded not guilty.

Most protests in Europe were peaceful. In London, however, clashes with police erupted after thousands gathered amid a cold rain. In the French city of Marseille, authorities fired tear gas and pepper spray as protesters hurled bottles and rocks.

Back in North Carolina, the Rev. Christopher Stackhouse recounted the circumstances of Floyd's death for the congregation.

"It took 8 minutes and 46 seconds for him to die," Stackhouse said at the memorial service. "But it took 401 years to put the system in place so nothing would happen."

Pritchard reported from Los Angeles and Foreman from Raeford, North Carolina. Associated Press staff from around the world contributed to this report, including Jeff Chiu in San Francisco; Jill Colvin in Washington; Jeff Amy in Atlanta; Julie Carr Smyth in Columbus, Ohio; John Leicester in Paris; and David Crary and Brian Mahoney in New York. Correctional officers of color who say they were segregated from Derek Chauvin: Why isn't Ramsey Co. jail superintendent on leave? America disrupted: Troubles cleave a nation, and a city White woman charged after racist Central Park

Massive George Floyd protests across US demand police reform

confrontation It's been 4 years since Philando Castile died. His mother thinks about him 'every breathing day.' In troubled times: Independence Day in a land of confusion

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

End of Document

Dellawar, El-Tayyab: There can be no getting along without reform

ARTICLE CDX. DELLAWAR, EL-TAYYAB: THERE CAN BE NO GETTING ALONG WITHOUT REFORM

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 7, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 659 words

Byline: Shukria Dellawar and Hassan El-Tayyab

Highlight: For decades, video cameras have captured incidents of police brutality involving people of color. Yet despite this documented record of cruelty, our criminal justice system has failed to bring justice and accountability to victims and policymakers have failed to end racial injustice across America. Now, in the midst of protests over the police killing of [...]

Body

For decades, video cameras have captured incidents of police brutality involving people of color. Yet despite this documented record of cruelty, our criminal justice system has failed to bring justice and accountability to victims and policymakers have failed to end racial injustice across America.

Now, in the midst of protests over the police killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis, we are again called to transform our country and heal our communities.

Back in 1992, when a jury acquitted the officers who mercilessly beat him, Rodney King famously asked, "Can we all get along?" It appears that, for now, the sad answer is still no. We can't. It's not possible to "get along" when George Floyd's last words were "I can't breathe."

The truth is, racial injustice, racial inequality, white supremacy and police brutality have been around since our country's founding. To address these painful truths, we must take a hard look at our history, and ourselves. We must reflect on our conditioning and come together around common values of equality and justice.

Though this cannot happen overnight, we must start now and with urgency, as lives do in fact depend on it. We cannot and must not stay silent. Even as our cities have been set ablaze with rage, Americans must come together to heal each other's wounds and address systemic racism. We must find ways to bring change in the struggle for equality.

An important starting point is to learn about black history in America, from slavery to the present day. Books including Ibram X. Kendi's "Stamped from the Beginning: The Definitive History of Racist Ideas in America" and Michelle Alexander's "The New Jim Crow: Mass Incarceration in the Age of Colorblindness" can help us grasp how deep the problem is.

Dellawar, El-Tayyab: There can be no getting along without reform

We must acknowledge that we are a nation in great need of repentance, healing, forgiveness and justice. Only by accepting the existence of systemic racism can we confront it in all of its forms and be ready for the healing and growth needed on both an individual and societal level.

We must also recognize that white Americans benefit from privilege on a daily basis, in countless ways. This system helps maintain a racial hierarchy in this country, which allows things like police brutality to exist in the first place.

Finally, we must become allies to oppressed communities. That means reaching out to fellow community members, holding town hall meetings and working to recognize each other's pains and fears. Let's work together to come up with solutions that consider everyone's needs.

As #JusticeForFloyd protests continue, let us echo the calls for justice and equality while condemning hate and violence in all forms. More hate won't fix anything and will make our existing problems worse. Only love and compassion can bring our communities together.

In the words of Martin Luther King Jr., "Man must evolve for all human conflict a method which rejects revenge, aggression and retaliation. The foundation of such a method is love."

We truly are a nation in need of evolution and love, not just for ourselves but for communities in pain. Let us show each other - and the world - that we can rise above this moment.

Shukria Dellawar and Hassab El-Tayyab work for the Friends Committee on National Legislation. Dellawar is the coordinator of its Prevention and Protection Working Group, El-Tayyab is its legislative manager for Middle East policy. The views expressed in this op-ed do not necessarily represent the organizations they are affiliated with. This column was edited by the Progressive Media Project, which is run by The Progressive magazine, and distributed by Tribune News Service.

Doyle McManus: To judge monuments, think about their meaning Eli Lake: How Biden can punish Putin Chris Reed: Ascendant progressives face three big obstacles Cole, Scheck: DNA testing isn't enough. We need the right to fingerprint matching Noah Smith: Coronavirus brings American decline out in the open

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

Good riddance to neck-restraint tactic

ARTICLE CDXI. GOOD RIDDANCE TO NECK-RESTRAINT TACTIC

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 7, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 14ALength: 701 wordsHighlight: It's been in the MPD policy manual and has been put to use.Body

It wasn't easy to tell from the swirl of discussion whether the tactic Derek Chauvin used against George Floyd was a sanctioned use of force under Minneapolis police procedures. The early word from people like Mayor Jacob Frey and police spokesman John Elder was no. And perhaps by that they meant the length of time Chauvin kept his knee on Floyd's neck, or the fact that Floyd was already handcuffed, or the fact that he died.

Yet there it was in the Police Department's Policy and Procedure Manual, section 5-311, "Use of neck restraints and choke holds," with dates of last prior revision:

Neck Restraint: Non-deadly force option. Defined as compressing one or both sides of a person's neck with an arm or leg, without applying direct pressure to the trachea or airway (front of the neck). Only sworn employees who have received training from the MPD Training Unit are authorized to use neck restraints. The MPD authorizes two types of neck restraints: Conscious Neck Restraint and Unconscious Neck Restraint. (04/16/12)

Conscious Neck Restraint: The subject is placed in a neck restraint with intent to control, and not to render the subject unconscious, by only applying light to moderate pressure. (04/16/12)

Unconscious Neck Restraint: The subject is placed in a neck restraint with the intention of rendering the person unconscious by applying adequate pressure. (04/16/12)

Consider that gone. Under an agreement approved unanimously by the City Council on Friday, officers would be forbidden from using both neck restraints and chokeholds. They also would be required to intervene when inappropriate force is used. The moves are part of a preliminary injunction in the lawsuit filed against the Minneapolis Police Department last week by the Minnesota Department of Human Rights.

It was clearly necessary to abolish the tactics. Last week NBC News, citing the MPD's use-of-force records, reported that officers in the city had used neck restraints 237 times since 2015, and in 44 of those instances - 16% of the time - had rendered people unconscious. Since Floyd's death, law enforcement experts have widely denounced the technique as inherently dangerous, although that is not new knowledge. Merely leaving someone handcuffed and facedown for too long, let alone with added pressure, poses risks.

NBC's data was supported by a separate comment to the Star Tribune by Mary Moriarty, chief public defender in Hennepin County. "We look at bodycam, we look at dashcam," she said, "and we frequently see officers put their knees in a client's back or neck."

But Chauvin and the three officers on the scene with him were fired and face various charges ranging from second-degree murder (for Chauvin) to aiding and abetting murder (for the others). The policy that will apply to their cases is that which was in force when they encountered Floyd. So what was it - beyond the painfully obvious - that was not in keeping with established practice in the city?

Here again, the manual offers hints. It said the "unconscious neck restraint" shall be applied only on a subject who is exhibiting active aggression, or for lifesaving purposes, or on a subject "who is exhibiting active resistance in order to gain control of the subject; and if lesser attempts at control have been or would likely be ineffective."

It added, in the sweetly named "After Care Guidelines," that "after a neck restraint or choke hold has been used on a subject, sworn MPD employees shall keep them under close observation until they are released to medical or other law enforcement personnel."

Tragic results notwithstanding, the MPD has made an effort to improve its use-of-force policy in recent years, emphasizing de-escalation and the "sanctity of life." And it deserves credit for keeping use-of-force records - the NBC report noted that a lack of such data from other departments made it impossible to compare police use of neck-restraint tactics by city.

The City Council is beginning to discuss ambitious changes in how public safety is maintained. Its passion is both inspiring and a bit fearsome. Careful scrutiny is warranted for many of the ideas floated in recent days, but the agreement advanced on Friday is a solid first step.

Load-Date: July 2, 2020

Majority of Minneapolis City Council pledges to disband police force

ARTICLE CDXII. MAJORITY OF MINNEAPOLIS CITY COUNCIL PLEDGES TO DISBAND POLICE FORCE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 7, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 585 words

Byline: The Associated Press

Highlight: A majority of the members of the Minneapolis City Council said Sunday they support disbanding the city's police department.

Body

A majority of the members of the Minneapolis City Council said Sunday they support disbanding the city's police department, an aggressive stance that comes just as the state has launched a civil rights investigation after George Floyd's death.

Nine of the council's 12 members appeared with activists at a rally in a South Minneapolis park Sunday afternoon and vowed to end policing as the city currently knows it. Council Member Jeremiah Ellison promised that the council would "dismantle" the department.

"It is clear that our system of policing is not keeping our communities safe," Lisa Bender, the council president, said. "Our efforts at incremental reform have failed, period."

Bender went on to say she and the eight other council members that joined the rally at Powderhorn Park are committed to ending the city's relationship with the police force and "to end policing as we know it and recreate systems that actually keep us safe."

Floyd, a handcuffed black man, died May 25 after a white officer pressed his knee into Floyd's neck for nearly nine minutes, ignoring his "I can't breathe" cries and holding it there even after Floyd stopped moving. His death sparked protests - some violent, many peaceful - that spread nationwide.

Community activists have criticized the Minneapolis department for years for what they say is a racist and brutal culture that resists change. The state of Minnesota launched a civil rights investigation of the department last week, and the first concrete changes came Friday in a stipulated agreement in which the city agreed to ban chokeholds and neck restraints.

A more complete remaking of the department is likely to unfold in coming months.

Disbanding an entire department has happened before. In 2012, with crime rampant in Camden, N.J., the city disbanded its police department and replaced it with a new force that covered Camden County. Compton, Calif., took the same step in 2000, shifting its policing to Los Angeles County.

Majority of Minneapolis City Council pledges to disband police force

It was a step that then-Attorney General Eric Holder said the Justice Department was considering for Ferguson, Mo., after the death of Michael Brown. The city eventually reached an agreement short of that but one that required massive reforms overseen by a court-appointed mediator.

The move to defund or abolish the Minneapolis department is far from assured, with the civil rights investigation likely to unfold over the next several months.

On Saturday, activists for defunding the department staged a protest outside Mayor Jacob Frey's home. Frey came out to talk with them.

"I have been coming to grips with my own responsibility, my own failure in this," Frey said. When pressed on whether he supported their demands, Frey said: "I do not support the full abolition of the police department."

He left to boeing.

At another march Saturday during which leaders called for defunding the department, Verbena Dempster said she supported the idea.

"I think, honestly, we're too far past" the chance for reform, Dempster told Minnesota Public Radio. "We just have to take down the whole system."

Ramsey County one of three sites in nation to pilot program aimed at revamping prosecution to address racial disparities 1 officer charged in George Floyd death seeks case dismissal Three non-profits create fund for minority-owned businesses in Twin Cities Correctional officers of color who say they were segregated from Derek Chauvin: Why isn't Ramsey Co. jail superintendent on leave? America disrupted: Troubles cleave a nation, and a city

Graphic

Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey addresses protesters at a Defund the Police march to protest the killing of George Floyd in police custody in Minneapolis, June 6, 2020. A sea of protesters yelled, "Go home, Jacob, go home," and "Shame," when he would not, on the spot, commit to abolishing the police department. (Victor J. Blue/The New York Times)

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

Days of anguish. Nights of fear. How the death of George Floyd has affected many of us.

ARTICLE CDXIII. DAYS OF ANGUISH. NIGHTS OF FEAR. HOW THE DEATH OF GEORGE FLOYD HAS AFFECTED MANY OF US.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 7, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 2930 words

Byline: Pioneer Press

Highlight: The images of the past two weeks have been shocking. First the video as the life of George Floyd was taken out of him under the knee of a Minneapolis police officer. Then large protests erupted on our streets. Followed by the looting and flames destroying parts of our community that were broadcast around the [...]

Body

The images of the past two weeks have been shocking.

First the video as the life of George Floyd was taken out of him under the knee of a Minneapolis police officer. Then large protests erupted on our streets. Followed by the looting and flames destroying parts of our community that were broadcast around the globe. Then an outpouring of support that gave many a cause and hope.

Residents of the Twin Cities told us those images left many feeling betrayed by their community yet again, scared for their safety, and determined that this time, it would be different.

Here are a few of their stories.

THE ORGANIZER: He uses his bullhorn to unite his community

Every day since Floyd's death, Tommy McBrayer has grabbed his bullhorn and headed to 38th Street and Chicago Avenue in South Minneapolis to unite and rally the thousands of people who show up. McBrayer is a community organizer at Central Area Neighborhood Development Organization (CANDO), a nonprofit on Chicago Avenue located just steps from where Floyd died.

"I'm making sure the message focuses on the positive," he said.

Last week, McBrayer, a 30-year-old who grew up in the neighborhood, greeted Floyd's younger brother Terrence Floyd when he visited the site for the first time.

"When his knees buckled when he got close, that was hard to see," McBrayer said.

Days of anguish. Nights of fear. How the death of George Floyd has affected many of us.

McBrayer stood near him when he addressed the crowd and media from across the world, and also spoke - calling for justice.

He said he's learned that getting through to people doesn't always involve using a bullhorn. He demonstrates by having a white man lie face down on the Chicago Avenue pavement and three black men on top and restraining him.

"I can show our white allies, our white friends, how it would look different," he said.

A Roosevelt High School graduate, McBrayer hasn't wandered far from the Central neighborhood - by choice - with the exception of when he attended college in northern Minnesota - first in Ely, then in Brainerd.

"I got a little taste of everything up there," he said. "Being there definitely got me my Minnesotan badge."

In the weeks before Floyd's death, McBrayer and staff at CANDO were helping the Central neighborhood keep informed about the coronavirus pandemic. They were also planning an event around Prince's birthday; the late music legend was a graduate of the neighborhood's defunct Central High School.

"We Minnesotans have been the front-runners in this protest and standing up for justice," McBrayer said Wednesday, after three more Minneapolis police officers were charged in Floyd's death. "So it was definitely a two thumbs up today. But we have a long way to go. We the people, we're using our voice and we're doing what we can."

- Nick Ferraro

THE SHOP OWNER: He hid as looters ransacked his store

Jim Segal was in the back office at Ax-Man Surplus on May 28 when he heard the shattering of glass followed by chaos inside his store on University Avenue in St. Paul.

He had closed a couple of hours earlier, sending his employees home amid the unrest throughout the Twin Cities.

That said, Segal decided to stay behind, partially to keep an eye on his store, and partially to finish up some work.

"I probably should've left," said Segal, who has owned Ax-Man Surplus for the past 20 years. "I guess I wasn't fully aware of what was coming."

While he was already locked inside the back office as looters ransacked his store, Segal barricaded himself inside the bathroom as extra precaution.

"I was trying to be as quiet as possible, so I called 911 and whispered our address," Segal said. "I think from the time I called to the time the police were able to clear the building, it was probably about 15 minutes. Even though that might not sound like a lot of time, it felt like a lot longer given all the commotion."

The police told him to go home and let him know there was "a 50/50 chance" that his business wouldn't be standing in the morning. A couple of hours later, Segal got a call from his store manager who lives nearby, alerting him that the store was still being looted.

Days of anguish. Nights of fear. How the death of George Floyd has affected many of us.

Upon his arrival, Segal shoed people away before deciding to return to his car.

"I just realized I was trying to protect property, which didn't make sense," Segal said. "I sat in my car across the street and basically for the next few hours, I watched people take items from my store."

As harrowing as the experience was for Segal, he was adamant that he does not see himself as a victim, and wanted to shift the focus back to Floyd.

"It's just stuff at the end of the day for me and pales in comparison to what happened to Mr. Floyd and what has happened others," Segal said. "It's not even in the same ballpark."

He hopes to reopen Ax-Man in a few weeks. He estimates an excess of $100,000 worth of damage and is grateful he has insurance.

"We are hoping we can do it sooner rather than later," Segal said. "We also want to be prudent about it and safe about it. We have been around for a long time and that's something that we take pride in."

- Dane Mizutani

THE ADVOCATE: Haunting memories return for uncle of Philando Castile

The tragic death of Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police has triggered bad memories for Clarence Castile.

In 2016, Castile's nephew, Philando Castile, was pulled over while driving in Falcon Heights. Philando Castile was reaching for his license and registration when St. Anthony police officer Jeronimo Yanez fatally shot him five times. Yanez was found not guilty after being put on trial.

"It brings back memories, and they are haunting," Clarence Castile said.

In the four years since his nephew's shooting, Castile has been working to reduce the use of deadly force by police. He was appointed to the Minnesota Board of Peace Officer Standards and Training and joined the St. Paul Police Department as a volunteer reserve officer.

The use of excessive force by police against black men "cannot continue," Clarence Castile said. "That's the way we felt back when Phil was killed. It's got to stop. People have done peaceful protests, and it has continued. Philando wasn't the only one who has been shot and killed by police."

Floyd's death was especially horrific, Castile said, because bystanders begged officer Derek Chauvin to stop; Chauvin has been fired, arrested and charged with second-degree murder.

"That's why people are so upset," he said. "This person had no feelings, no humanity, no empathy, no sympathy, no nothing ... and you expect to hide behind a shield and say, 'I was doing my job,' and, 'The procedure I used was in the police manual,' and, 'It was a perfectly good police maneuver to restrain a person'? That's not going to get it."

Castile said he was not surprised that protests have erupted around the world in response to Floyd's death.

"People are sick and tired of seeing it now," Castile said. "... This should be it. This should be done. All of these guys should go to jail. A new standard should be made that law enforcement officers are not above the law. They can and will go to jail."

Days of anguish. Nights of fear. How the death of George Floyd has affected many of us.

- Mary Divine

THE MAYOR: 'Peace, not patience'

St. Paul Mayor Melvin Carter's grandfather, Melvin Carter Sr., was a Navy veteran who played trumpet for four U.S. presidents.

Yet as a black man working as a Pullman porter, Melvin Sr. "didn't even have a right to his own name" - they were all called George, Carter wrote a week after George Floyd died.

"This is so personal because without a suit on, I am #GeorgeFloyd," Carter wrote on social media. "We all are. #PeaceNotPatience."

That message of "peace, not patience" has been Carter's rallying cry.

"As unacceptable as the destructive behavior was, my hope is we'll identify an unlimited number of constructive ways to express all the anger and rage and sadness that exists in our country now," Carter said.

Carter's days and nights have been a blur - he's been at the St. Paul Emergency Operations Center to coordinate response to peaceful protests, along with the earlier arson and looting; he's taken part in digital round tables with community, faith and business leaders.

He went to a protest outside the Governor's Residence - not to speak, but to be among community members, which he said was healing.

A priority for Carter when he became mayor was updating police use-of-force policies, which they did with the community and the police.

Fatally shot Minneapolis pregnant woman ID'd Correctional officers of color who say they were segregated from Derek Chauvin: Why isn't Ramsey Co. jail superintendent on leave? Spring Lake Park man arrested after shooting SWAT vehicle in second armed standoff in two weeks St. Paul police looking for man who fired over child in his front seat, seriously injured other motorist 'Hands are what kill.' New traffic stop instructions follow Philando Castile's death But the work goes beyond St. Paul - Carter said legal precedence, state law, police union contracts and upholding discipline against officers needs to be addressed.

"People keep referring to this problem as something that started in Minneapolis," said Carter, the son of a retired St. Paul officer. "For me, this is absolutely not something that started in Minneapolis. ... We've seen it over and over again and the truth is I've lived what it feels like to be pulled over for driving while black. ... Unfortunately, I think part of our rage is how historically unsurprising George Floyd's murder is."

- Mara H. Gottfried

THE PUBLISHER: Searching for the right words to tell the story

Tracey Williams-Dillard broke down in tears last week when she saw the Minnesota Spokesman-Recorder offices boarded up with plywood.

Days of anguish. Nights of fear. How the death of George Floyd has affected many of us.

She made the decision to do it over the weekend amid the unrest throughout the Twin Cities following the killing of Floyd.

She wasn't overcome with emotion, though, until she saw it in person.

"It took my breath away," said Williams-Dillard, who took over as publisher 11 years ago. "I was devastated to see it like that."

She was practically raised in that building.

Her grandfather Cecil E. Newman launched the Minnesota Spokesman-Recorder as separate newspapers - the Minneapolis Spokesman and the St. Paul Recorder - back in 1934. The Spokesman-Recorder is the oldest black-owned newspaper in Minnesota.

He moved the operation to its current location in 1954 and both newspapers operated out of that building until they merged shortly before Williams-Dillard took over.

Located off of East 38th Street and Fourth Street South in Minneapolis - five blocks from where Floyd died - Williams-Dillard remembers doing odd jobs around the office as a kid long before she knew she was going to have a career in journalism.

That long-standing connection with the community has made the past couple of weeks extremely tough.

She was in the office last month when some of the peaceful protests started right up the road.

She credits her talented staff with the way it's covered the biggest news in recent memory.

"They have the pulse of the community," Williams-Dillard said. "They are able to make sure the news we report is of interest to our community and they know exactly how to cover it."

She watched the coverage from her home over the weekend, at a complete loss for words as parts of the Twin Cities burned.

She said it seems like more people are listening now and is hopeful it will spark actual change moving forward.

"I certainly hope we are heading in a better direction after all of this," Williams-Dillard said. "But history hasn't shown it, so now it's about action."

- Dane Mizutani

THE VOLUNTEER: She answered the call for help

On a morning last week, Allie Lawler barked orders to hundreds of volunteers in the parking lot of Bethlehem Lutheran Church on Roy Street in St. Paul.

What started May 28 with a dozen or so people treating protesters with burning eyes caused from tear gas has morphed into a massive daily effort to feed the community. From noon to 4 p.m., Monday through Saturday, cars come and go - they are picking up and dropping off food, diapers and household goods. Volunteers pack bags with the items, make curb runs and deliver them to 80 area apartment buildings.

Days of anguish. Nights of fear. How the death of George Floyd has affected many of us.

"Around noon, it's just madness here," said Lawler, a 28-year-old software consultant who has been coordinating a group of volunteers that now totals 500.

When rioting shut down the Super Target, Aldi and dozens of other stores along University Avenue, people became cut off from their food sources.

"When it started quieting down in the area on Friday and Saturday that first week, we very quickly realized that the community has needs and that we're going to scale and change and get it done," Lawler said.

During those first three days, she made a bed of blankets and slept on the church floor instead of driving back to her St. Louis Park home.

Now, demand is so great that they have set aside Sunday - from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. - strictly for donations.

"We are so low, low, low (on items) come Sunday," she said.

The group of volunteers, she said, is a "healthy mix of church members, other organizations looking to help and individuals who want to spend their time here. We are putting the word out on social media, letting people know when we need folks and what we need done, and the community is answering the call."

- Nick Ferraro

THE SWAT MEDIC: Responding to arson, looting

St. Paul's Midway was ablaze on May 28. While firefighters responded to building after building to extinguish them, Deputy Fire Chief Ken Adams was embedded with a team of police officers who were called to report after report of looting and property damage.

"There were a lot of rocks and bricks being thrown," he said. "There were a lot of angry people and we were trying to keep them back from burning buildings."

Adams oversees the St. Paul Fire Department's emergency medical services and he's also a SWAT medic who's in charge of their crew. They're part of the police SWAT team when they're called up.

"We're there for the officers, we're there for the citizens, we're there for whomever may get injured in a situation," Adams said. Fortunately, there weren't serious injuries during the St. Paul unrest, he said.

Firefighters responded to 295 calls in a 24-hour period on May 28 and May 29. There were about 55 fires and more than 100 locations that reported damage. Adams worked 23 hours then and has continued to put in long hours - all as he has coordinated the fire department's EMS response to the coronavirus pandemic, which had him working seven days a week for the past few months.

Officers and firefighters in St. Paul felt people's rage directed at them on the streets, though Adams said the officers he's talked to about what happened to Floyd have harsh words about the Minneapolis officers who were involved.

"How could they be so cold and callous to refuse help, to not pay attention to what they're doing to somebody who was under control?" Adams said. "They absolutely can't believe that somebody did that."

Days of anguish. Nights of fear. How the death of George Floyd has affected many of us.

- Mara H. Gottfried

THE TOP COP: Keeping the peace, fearing the unknown

As Minnesota's commissioner of public safety, John Harrington's days begin as an adviser and end as a field general.

He collects information several times a day to brief Gov. Tim Walz - on matters related to both Floyd and the coronavirus - and spends his afternoon and evening in "the MAC," the Multi Agency Command Center to coordinate the unprecedented law enforcement, fire response and National Guard presence in the Twin Cities for more than a week.

Harrington, a former cop who served as St. Paul police chief before being elected to the state Senate, said nothing he's ever worked on has compared to this - and that's included a number of major security events.

"I had 18 months and $50 million to get ready for the Republican National Convention," he said, referring to the 2008 event, hosted in St. Paul, that featured mass protests, mass arrests and police use of tear gas the likes of which hadn't been seen before in the capitol city. "I had a year and a half of working with Minneapolis to get ready for the (2014 Major League Baseball) All-Star Game and for the (2018) Super Bowl. And I had about 12 hours, maybe, to get ready for this."

Peaceful protests that turned violent had suddenly erupted into rioting, looting and arson that left one police station and more than 170 businesses damaged or destroyed. Harrington, who had publicly described Floyd's killing as "a murder," is the guy Walz turned to, to reclaim the streets.

"There's a moment, if you've ever sent cops or anybody else into danger, where your stomach just tightens up," he said. "We had gun play and we had Molotov cocktails.

Three non-profits create fund for minority-owned businesses in Twin Cities Correctional officers of color who say they were segregated from Derek Chauvin: Why isn't Ramsey Co. jail superintendent on leave? America disrupted: Troubles cleave a nation, and a city White woman charged after racist Central Park confrontation It's been 4 years since Philando Castile died. His mother thinks about him 'every breathing day.' "I'm sending troopers who drove all night from Thief River Falls to get down here to get into a turtle suit, and to jump into the fray. I've got DNR guys, who were working lakes the day before, who are in a turtle suit down here, and they've never actually done this together. And they're doing it with a bunch of National Guard guys who just got pulled in. And I'm doing it with a bunch of really tired Minneapolis cops who've been just going through the emotional roller coaster.

"And I remember thinking, 'God I hope this works.' Because there was a lot of reason to think that it might not. But it was the right thing to do."

- Dave Orrick

Graphic

Days of anguish. Nights of fear. How the death of George Floyd has affected many of us.

Tommy McBrayer of the Central Area Neighborhood Development Organization speaks at a rally June 1 in front of the Cup Foods in Minneapolis, on the one-week anniversary of George Floyd's death. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

Jim Segal, the owner of Ax-Man on University Avenue in St. Paul was in his business when the store was broken into and looted last Thursday, he barricaded himself in the bathroom, June 3, 2020. His employees are getting the store ready for reopening. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

Clarence Castile, uncle of Philando Castile and a member of the board of the Peace Officer Standards & Training Board, speaks about the reasons to keep Philando Castile's name on a training fund, in St. Paul, Thursday, July 27, 2017. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

St. Paul Mayor Melvin Carter listens in on a conversation about gun violence during a community meeting his office organized at Central Baptist Church on Nov. 7, 2019. (Nick Woltman / Pioneer Press)

Tracey Williams-Dillard, the publisher of the Minnesota Spokesman-Recorder, the oldest black-owned newspaper in the state. (Courtesy of the Minnesota Spokesman-Recorder)

Allie Lawler, holding a megaphone, heads up a food and medical assistance program out of Bethlehem Lutheran Church in St. Paul's Midway, June 4, 2020. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

St. Paul Fire Department Deputy Chief Ken Adams, right, works with a pair of SWAT team members from the St. Paul police department as they practice CPR and how to secure a breathing way during a training session in November 2019 in St. Paul. (Courtesy of Ken Adams)

Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington announces that Minneapolis Police Officer Derek Chauvin has been taken into custody by the BCA in the death of George Floyd during a news conference in St. Paul, Minn. Friday, May 29, 2020 (Glen Stubbe/Star Tribune via AP, Pool)

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

ARTICLE CDXIV. CHIEF IS CAUGHT IN HIS FORCE'S RACIAL LEGACY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 7, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1637 wordsByline: LIBOR JANY; MARISSA EVANS; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

As the hearse carrying George Floyd pulled up to North Central University, Minneapolis police Chief Medaria Arradondo tucked his cap into the crook of his arm and dropped to one knee. It was a symbolic gesture of solidarity with a growing movement against police brutality, popularized by former NFL quarterback Colin Kaepernick.

Arradondo has been a visible and vocal presence in the tumult that has engulfed the city and nation since Floyd, a black man, died under the knee of a white Minneapolis police officer on Memorial Day. He condemned and fired the four officers involved. He visited the location where Floyd was killed. He spoke directly to Floyd's family members on national television. He pledged to cooperate with the state's probe into his department's practices and make "substantive policy changes."

In an interview, Arradondo called Floyd's death "absolutely pivotal" in the city's history.

"This moment in time is writing its own chapter in the history of our city," he said. "The best that I can hope for is that everything that has occurred to this point, all of the work that all of us were trying to do to move forward, it's not done in vain."

But the city's first black police chief now finds himself in a harsh national spotlight, the face of a mostly white department that killed another black man. Last week, the Minnesota Department of Human Rights launched an investigation, and some elected officials are pushing to disband the police department altogether.

Arradondo's defenders credit his willingness to speak out about the pains of racial trauma and the need for police reform. They say it's unrealistic to think that he would be able to overturn more than a century of institutionalized racism in just three years on the job.

His chief of staff, Art Knight, agrees that "something has to be done on holding our cops accountable," but he questioned the timing of the state's human rights probe.

CHIEF IS CAUGHT IN HIS FORCE'S RACIAL LEGACY

"When the investigation looks at policy and procedures, we're 100% completely with them, and maybe they do find something that's of concern and needs fixing and we'll work with them to fix it," Knight said. "When we had white chiefs in office nothing was done, but now that we have the first African-American chief and now you want to sue the department?"

So far Arradondo has drawn praise for quickly firing the officers involved in Floyd's death. In past scandals, from undercover marijuana stings that critics say unfairly targeted blacks to allegations that his officers were urging paramedics to sedate agitated people, he also acted fast.

But Floyd's death has City Council members, the MPD and community members grappling over the future of policing in the city.

"We know that a lot of times when you are placed in a role when you've got to make systemic change and you've got to change the police culture, that does not happen overnight," said Ramsey County sheriff's commander Suwana Kirkland, head of the state's chapter of the National Black Police Association. Right now, the death of Mr. George Floyd has been devastating to the profession, the community, to his family, to his friends."

Violent crime has been on the rise since the protests following Floyd's death, and officers say morale is falling after the torching of the Third Precinct station. Adding to the pressure, a high-ranking police official sent out a departmentwide e-mail suggesting that some officers walked off the job or retired abruptly in protest.

Besides that, Arradondo has faced criticism about the department's lack of women and people of color and being too slow to discipline officers accused of on-the-job misconduct. In addition, police use-of-force rates - which are greatly affected by call volumes - have risen over the past three years after a long decline, with blacks bearing the brunt in nearly two-thirds of such cases.

Andrea Brown, a public defender who once chaired the Police Conduct Oversight Commission, a department watchdog, said that union boss Lt. Bob Kroll's defense of the officers involved in the death of Floyd and his public alignment with President Donald Trump damages trust in the MPD.

"I think it completely destroys any reconciliation that could happen," she said. "The union is real. ... Cops who don't actually uphold the service and protect for all, they feel like they have its backing."

Arradondo has been seen as the MPD's silver lining by the black community. The 53-year-old Minneapolis native joined the force in 1989, starting as a patrol officer in the precinct covering north Minneapolis. He's remained visible as chief, attending barbecues and basketball games citywide and visiting barbershops. He also talks with unusual bluntness about the historical mistreatment of minorities by police, and in 2007 was one of the lead plaintiffs in a discrimination lawsuit against the department.

But critics say the use of tear gas and rubber bullets on those protesting Floyd's death is a sign of how little the department's culture has changed.

They also wonder why Derek Chauvin, the subject of at least 17 civilian complaints and who had been involved with several police shootings, was still working on the same shift. Some claims that the department's early intervention system - designed to identify potentially troubled officers and get them help - has failed.

CHIEF IS CAUGHT IN HIS FORCE'S RACIAL LEGACY

And having a black chief didn't stop officers from using deadly force, said Sam Sanchez, an organizer with the activist group Twin Cities Coalition for Justice 4 Jamar.

"People are talking about rebuilding, but you can't rebuild something that never worked for the people in the first place," said Sanchez, pointing out that Arradondo is a product of the same system that he says he wants to reform. He said any proposed reforms in the months ahead should include community input.

Arradondo is also being asked to answer for the strained race relations of past years, says retired Hennepin County Judge Pamela Alexander. While more reform is needed, she says that the department has improved in many ways.

"There are ways to substantially improve the system without totally breaking it down, but it does need to have a broader, more expansive view," she said. "It's going to take time and that's unfortunate, but maybe this crisis will then show [rank-and-file officers] why it's necessary to have allies in the community and to improve those relationships."

But there needs to be an honest assessment of how the police can contribute to or harm community health and public safety, said Tabitha Montgomery, executive director of the Powderhorn Park Neighborhood Association. Not all incidents in south Minneapolis need police intervention, and there should be discussions about finding solutions for other inequities in the area, she said.

"Just the reliance on police is not getting us better outcomes, it's not driving fewer disparities when it comes to what we are expected to endure in south Minneapolis," she said. "I have no evidence to suggest there is a further erosion [of trust in police] whether it be black people in the community or other people from other ethnicities and racial groups, but what I do know for sure is ... a life that should've been deemed equal to any other was demonstrably illustrated to be less than."

With the Floyd investigation, people are "looking for a fall guy" with Arradondo, and seek to weaken his power, says Resmaa Menakem, a clinical social worker who has led cultural awareness training sessions with the MPD. He said Arradondo understands better than most of his predecessors that nothing will change until something is done about systemic racism that criminalizes people of color.

"The system is sick, the structure is sick, America is sick - and it stands to reason that if America is sick, the spear and weapon it uses, which is the police department, is also going to be sick," said Menakem. "It's not addressing the bad apple cop - it's addressing the structure that alienates and brutalizes black and brown bodies, and poor white bodies."

Even after Floyd's death all is not lost, said Korey "XROSS" Dean Sr., founder and executive director of the Man Up Club, an organization focused on mentoring black males, teaching them about conflict resolution, interactions with the police and civic responsibility.

He still believes in Arradondo, calling him "a good man." Dean said one of the ways to overhaul the department is to build up its diversity, including encouraging black men like Arradondo to sign up for the police academy.

"I'm optimistic about the future of the relationship between the police and that's only because of the leadership that I know [Arradondo] has, but at the same time I will say that young black males are still in fear of the police," Dean said. "That is the current relationship that exists between young black males in the inner city and the police department, and there is no relationship there."

CHIEF IS CAUGHT IN HIS FORCE'S RACIAL LEGACY

Staff writers Jeff Hargarten and Liz Navratil contributed to this report.

Libor Jany · 612-849-5440

Twitter: @StribJany

Marissa Evans · 612-673-4280

Twitter: @marissaaevans

UNEQUAL USE OF FORCE

Use-of-force reports by the MPD show a disproportionate number of reports in areas with high nonwhite populations.

Distribution of use-of-force calls by precinct, 2008-2020

Precinct, Percentage of calls with use-of-force report, Percentage of police calls, Nonwhite population

1st, 31.8%, 21.1%, 41.9%

4th, 26.8, 15.2, 67.9

3rd, 17.6, 23.1, 43.7

5th, 10.5, 21.5, 23.8

2nd, 8.9, 18.7, 29

Force rates curve up

The rate at which Minneapolis officers use force against people per 10,000 police calls has climbed after years of decline.

Use of force rate per 10,000 calls

2020: 34.7*

Note: As of May 30

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete chart.)

Source: Minneapolis Police Dept.

THE MAKEUP OF THE FORCE

86% Male

14% Female

74% White

2% Native

CHIEF IS CAUGHT IN HIS FORCE'S RACIAL LEGACY

7% Asian

9% Black

6% Latino

2% Other

Load-Date: July 2, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDXV. OTHER VOICES: PROTESTING INJUSTICE IS YOUR SACRED RIGHT AS AN AMERICAN

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 7, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 857 wordsByline: Los Angeles Times Editorial BoardHighlight: "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or the rights of the people to peaceably assemble or "to petition the government for a redress of grievances." These crucial First Amendment protections also limit state government action, thanks to the 14th Amendment, and embody essential values that created and have sustained this nation: [...]Body

"Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or the rights of the people to peaceably assemble or "to petition the government for a redress of grievances." These crucial First Amendment protections also limit state government action, thanks to the 14th Amendment, and embody essential values that created and have sustained this nation: People can, should and will protest against perceived injustice.

That's a principle with special resonance today, as the nation witnessed angry protests over the police killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis and similar injustices directed at African Americans and others relegated to second-class status in our society. The demonstrations come amid a movement by some state lawmakers to falsely equate lawful protest and civil disobedience with crime and terrorism. These chilling moves against fundamental liberties must not stand.

A May report from PEN America, an organization dedicated to literature, human rights and free expression, documents 82 state bills considered or adopted by 32 states to criminalize assembly and speech. One of the offending states, as it happens, is Minnesota. Lawmakers there appear motivated by environmental protests in neighboring North Dakota and Black Lives Matter protests in their own state.

One such instance followed the police killing of a young African American man named Jamar Clark in November 2015. Turned back from a planned protest at a shopping mall, demonstrators temporarily disrupted traffic at the Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport.

Minnesota lawmakers responded with a bill to punish traffic obstruction with up to a year in prison - an astonishingly excessive term far out of proportion to the offense. Blocking traffic is of course already prohibited in Minnesota and elsewhere, and protesters who march onto airport roads or freeways can expect to face legal consequences. But it is a nonviolent act of civil disobedience, and the temporary inconvenience it poses to drivers does not warrant the kind of penalty generally reserved for serious criminals. According to PEN, the bill's sponsor, Rep. Nick Zerwas, acknowledged that the purpose was dissuade potential protesters. The measure was passed but vetoed by the governor.

Other voices: Protesting injustice is your sacred right as an American

A separate Minnesota bill to criminalize protests against "critical infrastructure" was inspired by the 2016 demonstrations against the Dakota Access Pipeline through the Standing Rock Indian Reservation in North Dakota. So-called critical infrastructure bills in other states penalize protests on or near railroad tracks or telephone poles. A Kentucky bill carries a sentence of up to five years. Those proposals stalled.

"Under such statutes," PEN reports, "a protester who merely crosses onto land hosting a pipeline could be held criminally liable."

One of the more chilling provisions of anti-protest laws considered in several states would impose criminal liability for property damage caused by others participating in the same action. A person joining a protest but causing no damage could be held liable for up to $1 million for damage caused by others.

Other bills give police greater leeway to characterize protests as "riots" and to charge peaceful protesters with rioting because of the actions of others in their presence. A New Jersey bill, if passed, would have imposed up to five years in prison for participating in a protest in which any other person caused damage of more than $2,000.

That would have categorized protesters against the brutal killing of George Floyd as rioters, not because of any act they committed, but because they expressed their dissent at the same time or in the same place as violent lawbreakers.

"One person's decision to resort to violence does not strip other protesters of their right to freedom of peaceful assembly," as PEN quotes United Nations special rapporteurs for freedom of expression and assembly. "This right is not a collective right; it is held by each of us individually."

Other proposals seek to turn protesters into terrorists. A North Carolina bill, for example, would create the crime of "economic terrorism" and permits prosecution against any person who has committed obstruction with the intention to influence government action.

In other words, an act of temporary civil disobedience would be an act of terrorism. Such a law would make Susan B. Anthony a terrorist for pushing a ballot into a ballot box. It would make other American heroes terrorists for taking a seat on a bus or at a lunch counter, walking across a bridge, stopping work or doing any of the other things that have won Americans some of their most cherished rights and liberties.

Watch out for attempts to intimidate people who would protest the gap between what we know to be legal and what we know to be just.

- Los Angeles Times

Other voices: Drawing a line in Atlanta after the murder of a child Doyle McManus: To judge monuments, think about their meaning Other voices: Will Voice of America now lose credibility? Other voices: The feds build a case against Ghislane Maxwell; it must not stop there S.D. town moves to remove Confederate flag from police patch

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

Other voices: Protesting injustice is your sacred right as an American

End of Document

ARTICLE CDXVI. READERS WRITE DON'T PIGEONHOLE HER

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 7, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 14ALength: 1146 wordsBody

KLOBUCHAR'S VP PROSPECTS

Regarding the May 31 commentary "Black voters don't want Klobuchar on the ticket," I'd like to say very loudly and clearly that I hate when anyone inserts themselves as the speaker for a whole group of people. I'm Jewish, and I wouldn't pretend to speak for every Jew in the world, our nation, the state, Minneapolis, or even my particular congregation.

As for writer Jonathan Capehart's views about Klobuchar, I have a black cousin in Ames, Iowa, who caucused for Klobuchar for president, and based on my conversations with him I know he'd have no problem at all having her on the Democratic ticket with Joe Biden. Capehart is certainly free to lay out reasons why he thinks blacks shouldn't support Klobuchar, but he's stepping over the line saying that blacks in general won't support her. Especially with the insensitivity toward anything even approaching reasonable being exhibited by our current administration, I'm guessing that most blacks, Hispanics, Asians, East African immigrants, nonbinary citizens, etc., won't find it very difficult to support a Biden-Klobuchar ticket if that's what comes to pass.

Larry A. Etkin, Minneapolis

. . .

I strongly disagree with Jonathan Capehart that Elizabeth Warren or Kamala Harris should be Biden's running mate. First, as to Warren, she did not score well with African-American voters in the presidential primary; she did not even score well in her home state of Massachusetts, coming in third behind Biden and Sanders. As for Harris, she comes from California, a state that is securely blue. As to her appeal to black voters, progressives - and right-wing trolls - have also hammered Harris for her résumé as a state attorney general and local prosecutor.

The Democratic tent is very large. Coming from a state that is more purple than blue, Amy Klobuchar appeals to independents, swing voters, and moderate Republicans and Democrats. We cannot ignore those voters, too, in hopes of winning back the White House.

Deborah Deutsch, Minneapolis

COVID-19

That photo spread of victims didn't reflect victims as a whole

While I appreciate the tribute to those who lost their lives in Minnesota's COVID-19 outbreak ("1,000 we've lost," May 31), I find it interesting - in these days of protest and rioting over the senseless loss of George Floyd's life - that of the 30 Minnesotans highlighted by the presentation, only one or two were people of color.

An associated article states that the virus has "taken a significant toll on people of color, who are dying in disproportionate numbers." We Minnesotans need to see the beautiful black and brown faces of those who have lost their lives to this pandemic. We need to hear stories that these people were loved and treasured and important parts of the community.

Could this be a further symptom of bias in our community? If we hope to make our communities truly supportive of all, we need to take a deep look at how our entire community is valued and supported through all of our public institutions.

Melinda Bennett, Plymouth

POLICE REFORM

The lesson from St. Anthony

George Floyd's death has rekindled the sadness and despair I felt after Philando Castile was killed by a St. Anthony cop in 2016. After Philando's death I worked with my predominantly white neighbors to push for structural change in St. Anthony and its small police department of 20 sworn officers. We sought to end systemic racism and police brutality against people of color in our city and neighboring communities. We failed.

Our Police Department is widely beloved among us white homeowners in St. Anthony. We get friendly responses and lots of patrols. We get to feel safe. After Philando's death, the "other" St. Anthony Police Department had just a little light shone on it. We heard stories in public meetings from people of color about racist and brutal policing against them right here in St. Anthony. When we pressed for more information, we found shoddy record-keeping on issues related to racial profiling and biased policing.

St. Anthony's solution to bad press, public testimony and public outcries after Philando's death was to keep up the friendly policing to white homeowners and aggressively suppress dissent. We found legitimating cover by participating in a technical assistance program for police from the U.S. Department of Justice, despite there being no public accountability measures and little acknowledgment of fault.

Those of us who pushed for better reform and acknowledgment of systemic racism and brutality against people of color in policing were silenced and derided as "anti-police" by the mayor and City Council, and by many of our white neighbors. Notably absent in this debate was any significant presence and voice of the people of color who live in St. Anthony. I suspect that many already knew what the outcome was likely to be and didn't bother to participate.

I am in despair that St. Anthony failed to bring significant change to our Police Department after Philando's death. I can only bear witness today that there was no meaningful change. Our city and Police Department continue to be part of the problem, as we confront American policing after the death of George Floyd.

Nancy Robinett, St Anthony

RACE IN GENERAL

Such a fine line

Bill Bryson said it best in his book "The Body: A Guide for Occupants": "People act as if skin color is a determinant of character when all it is is a reaction to sunlight. Biologically, there is actually no such thing as race - nothing in terms of skin color, facial features, hair type, bone structure, or anything else that is a defining quality among peoples. And yet look how many people have been enslaved or hated or lynched or deprived of fundamental rights through history because of the color of their skin." He went on to say that about a millimeter thick of skin was so thin as to be translucent. "That," he wrote, "is where all your skin color is. That's all race is - a sliver of epidermis."

Richard Haines, Hopkins

MAIL DELIVERY

The Postal Service rocks!

Recently, as rioters burned and looted four of our post office stations, I was waiting for a package. The tracking had it out for delivery a week ago Thursday and I was thinking the worst after the preceding Tuesday and Wednesday. Being a retired postal employee, I understand what might have happened to it during the chaos - small potatoes in the big picture. Imagine my pleasure when a city carrier dropped it off on my doorstep last weekend, on a Sunday no less.

Thank you to the postal employees who kept the country's mail safe during a horrible week. Not only struggling because of the coronavirus, riots and fires, looting, now we have buildings to replace. Losing a piece of mail wouldn't have been the worst thing to happen, and I'm sure we did lose some, but thank you for doing everything you could to ensure the sanctity of the mail.

Cathy Hanson, Minneapolis

Load-Date: July 2, 2020

A true patriot sees flag as more

ARTICLE CDXVII. A TRUE PATRIOT SEES FLAG AS MORE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 7, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 1C

Length: 656 words

Byline: JIM SOUHAN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

Aaron Rodgers is my quarterback.

Drew Brees is not.

During a week that should change American history, should change America into what it always has professed to be, the Packers' quarterback offered a simple, accurate view of the constitutionally protected right to free speech and peaceful dissent.

"A few years ago we were criticized for locking arms in solidarity before the game," Rodgers posted. "It has NEVER been about an anthem or a flag. Not then. Not now. Listen with an open heart, let's educate ourselves, and then turn word and thought into action."

He used the hashtag symbol to promote a number of slogans, including "Liberty and justice for all."

Last week Brees, the Saints' quarterback, said he will "never agree with anybody disrespecting" the U.S. flag, taking aim at Colin Kaepernick and other NFL players who have peacefully protested the epidemic of cops killing unarmed black men.

Saints teammates and other NFL players were among those who criticized Brees. He received praise from Donald Trump. Three apologies and clarifications later, Brees was running the fastest 40-yard dash of his life away from his initial comments, acknowledging that his black peers were not attacking the flag or the national anthem but were instead peacefully protesting systemic injustice.

NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell even issued a statement acknowledging that his league had not listened attentively enough to black players, although he stopped short of apologizing to Kaepernick.

Rodgers did not need to revise his stance, because his stance was simple and humane. He offered empathy.

Brees, in his first comments, provided the definition of white privilege.

A true patriot sees flag as more

Brees was saying what so many white Americans believe - that no matter how horribly our country has treated black people, they do not have the right to peacefully protest.

It's time for Americans to choose: Do you care about citizens or symbols?

If you care about symbols above the lives of black Americans, you should at least make an effort to understand what those symbols represent to them.

Standing during the national anthem is a point of pride for sports fans who have already gotten through the beer line. Many, like Brees, argue that the anthem honors soldiers who gave their lives in service to our country.

But if you were black, would you revere an anthem that was written by an outspoken slave owner, Francis Scott Key? Do you know that there is a verse of the anthem, rarely played, that references slaves?

So many Americans have come to identify the flag as a symbol of military might and sacrifice. Wouldn't a more reasonable view be that the flag represents American history? And isn't American history laced with racism?

One hundred years after the Civil War ended, cops were beating black marchers and "Whites Only" signs populated the South.

To pretend America or its sports are about equality is to proclaim the most simple-minded form of white privilege.

Modern sports leagues offer lip service to diversity but are far better at promoting symbols than promoting equality.

Every year, Major League Baseball celebrates Jackie Robinson Day.

Know what Robinson said after suffering racial abuse for years? "I cannot stand and sing the anthem. I cannot salute the flag; I know that I am a black man in a white world."

To downplay or dismiss racism in America, or racism in sports, is to use the flag as a blindfold and the anthem as white noise.

Since the killing of George Floyd we have heard from innumerable black athletes who have detailed the systemic abuse and prejudice they face daily.

And as they speak, we are all one click away from innumerable videos from every corner of the country revealing white cops beating peaceful protesters of all ethnicities.

Robinson, the patron saint of American sports equality, would be as disgusted today as he was in 1947.

Jim Souhan's podcast can be heard at TalkNorth.com. On Twitter: @SouhanStrib. · jsouhan@startribune.com

Load-Date: June 8, 2020

ARTICLE CDXVIII. WHITE COATS FOR BLACK LIVES: MEDICAL PROS AND STUDENTS PROTEST IN ST. PAUL

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 7, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 156 wordsByline: John AuteyHighlight: Medical professionals, students, family and friends protested the death of George Floyd as part of a "White Coats for Black Lives" demonstration Saturday on the lawn of the state Capitol in St. Paul. White Coats for Black Lives is a national organization focused on "eliminating racial bias in the practice of medicine and recognizing racism [...]"Body

Medical professionals, students, family and friends protested the death of George Floyd as part of a "White Coats for Black Lives" demonstration Saturday on the lawn of the state Capitol in St. Paul.

White Coats for Black Lives is a national organization focused on "eliminating racial bias in the practice of medicine and recognizing racism as a threat to the health and well-being of people of color," according to its website. It has Minnesota chapters at the University of Minnesota Medical School and Mayo Medical School.

Correctional officers of color who say they were segregated from Derek Chauvin: Why isn't Ramsey Co. jail superintendent on leave? America disrupted: Troubles cleave a nation, and a city White woman charged after racist Central Park confrontation It's been 4 years since Philando Castile died. His mother thinks about him 'every breathing day.' In troubled times: Independence Day in a land of confusion

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

ARTICLE CDXIX. CARYN M. SULLIVAN: NAVIGATING OUR TROUBLED TIMES

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 7, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 936 wordsByline: Caryn M. SullivanHighlight: Protestors with masks on freeways, a fuel truck bearing down, horn blaring. It's one of many powerful images reflecting the surreal state of affairs in 2020. For months we've been told to quarantine, furlough employees, avoid family, friends, churches and gyms, all to protect personal and public health. We complied, for the call to honor [...]Body

Protestors with masks on freeways, a fuel truck bearing down, horn blaring. It's one of many powerful images reflecting the surreal state of affairs in 2020.

For months we've been told to quarantine, furlough employees, avoid family, friends, churches and gyms, all to protect personal and public health.

We complied, for the call to honor the social compact was persistent and persuasive.

Thousands put funerals on hold. We postponed weddings and vacations; pivoted to online learning and working from home.

We waited.

Two weeks ago, the curtain was poised to lift. Restaurants, salons and places of worship were on the verge of re-opening. We were nibbling at the edges of a renaissance.

Then on the day we remember those who died while serving our country, one man's actions and others' inaction ignited a chain reaction around the world.

Our fragile social compact shattered after we watched a 9-minute video shot on a cellphone.

A horrific scene supplanted a pandemic, triggering different responses depending on our life experiences.

Previously compliant shut-ins catapulted from their homes.

Daily briefings shifted from COVID deaths to arson and systemic racism.

I fear we haven't seen the end of the unrest, for, as horrific as the circumstances of George Floyd's death are, the prosecution must prove beyond a reasonable doubt the elements of the crimes of murder and aiding and abetting murder.

And here's a stark truth that might be lost in the roar of outrage, the river of tears.

It will take months of hard work to prosecute these charges, as Attorney General Keith Ellison has said.

Our visceral reaction to a horrific act is not enough to convict a person of murder.

In the past week, anger, angst, and tears have flowed.

Social distancing concerns became secondary to making space for citizens to exercise their First Amendment rights to assemble and speak out.

Thousands threw COVID caution to the wind and headed to the streets, many with masks, some without.

Young, old, black, white, and brown, citizens marched. A few looted and burned, while others watched, eyes glued to screens, afraid to watch, afraid not to watch.

Would arsonists torch our homes, our vehicles, our businesses? Would armed law enforcement personnel station themselves outside our doors? Would anyone else die?

As information, misinformation, and disinformation flooded traditional and social media, we were left to grapple with frightening and conflicting accounts of who was decimating our cities.

As I witnessed both the grief and goodness of strangers, a question festered: Now what?

We were already living in a cloud of uncertainty. The cloud has become bigger and more threatening, filled with complex issues that are close to some, more distant for others.

We're still waiting, now in fear and wonderment, as work has shifted from protestors and protectors to prosecutors and change agents.

Massive reforms are promised. Will they work? Will they effect meaningful and lasting change?

We'll listen to daily reports on testing, hospitalizations, and deaths and, depending on the COVID numbers, learn whether months of precautions and sacrifices were warranted. We'll see whether previously compliant citizens and business owners will continue to follow COVID rules.

Emotions are raw, coping mechanisms stretched.

How are we to manage? People with - and without - mental health challenges such as anxiety and depressive mood disorder were already struggling.

I posed these questions to Janet Yeats, licensed marriage and family therapist and specialist in trauma, grief, and loss.

None of us is dealing with the pandemic or the Floyd death in a vacuum, she said. We've all brought our life experiences, stressors, and emotions to the present situation.

We need to offer ourselves some grace, permission to acknowledge we are struggling, even if we're impacted in different ways.

"Situations like this just remind us of how much control we don't have," Yeats said. "To develop a practice in our lives that focuses on what we can do and how we can control ourselves becomes very critical because so much is outside our control."

The best place to start is with self-care, she said, though in troubled times, self-care is often the first thing we abandon. And, while we're quick to encourage others to take care of themselves, we might not walk the talk.

"We must engage in some sort of self-care activity every day to balance out the situations in the world that threaten to shatter us," Yates said.

"Part of the ability to take care of ourselves includes being able to recognize all the ways in which we're hurting right now. It's going to be different for everyone," Yeats said.

Fear and stress can paralyze us. Instead of berating ourselves because we couldn't get our act together, she encourages compassion.

There is no one prescription for self-care. It might involve meditating, creating art or walking the dog. It might be delivering groceries to families who can't purchase their own. It could mean limiting time on social media, or listening to music.

There's power in recognizing that, while we can't always control what happens around us, we can control our response.

"I think that's ultimately the message that I would want to put forward," Yates said. "What can you do for yourself? How can you respond in your truest, best self?" Patrick Hill: The other 'First Minnesota' Raihala: Sexual misconduct allegations rock tight-knit local music community Rosario: Talk about burying the past ... Greg Egan: Minnesota needs to change its 'felony-murder' doctrine. Racial inequities are one reason Soucheray: What is going on? Does anybody know?

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

As St. Paul's Midway business corridor reopens, some look to an uncertain future

ARTICLE CDXX. AS ST. PAUL'S MIDWAY BUSINESS CORRIDOR REOPENS, SOME LOOK TO AN UNCERTAIN FUTURE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 7, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1770 words

Byline: Frederick Melo, Katrina Pross

Highlight: More than a week after the sudden violence following the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis, key questions remain.

Body

Singed but still standing tall, a large Super Target display along St. Paul's University Avenue business district welcomed customers on Wednesday to what's thought to be the busiest Target in the state of Minnesota, if not the nation.

It would be the first day that Target resumed a regular schedule at the location, nearly a week after looting and rioting damaged or destroyed at least 70 buildings citywide, according to numbers available to the Midway Chamber of Commerce.

As workers wiped down service counters at the Starbucks within the Midway Super Target, federal agents with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives inspected the charred husk of what had once been the nearby Big Top Liquors store along University Avenue.

In some ways, it would be just another pandemic-era Wednesday morning in St. Paul. University Avenue groceries such as Target, Cub Foods, Shuang Hur and Sun Foods have reopened, reminding guests to don face masks and keep six feet apart in light of the novel coronavirus.

West of Dale Street, storeowners along the business corridor had just begun peeling protective plywood off storefronts such as SugaRush Donuts and Ishita Ramen.

Closer to Snelling Avenue, a Discount Tire shop whose garage bay door had been rammed repeatedly by a looter in a vehicle welcomed its first customer in days.

"I hope everything starts to get back to normal," said store manager Mike Sarauer, 36. "It will be nice to see more businesses start to reopen."

Just outside, a long caravan of armored trucks and humvees carrying Minnesota National Guard troops rolled past. Across the intersection, a white man sweating through 83-degree heat blasted music from a portable stereo and held aloft a sign: "Stop Killing Black People."

As St. Paul's Midway business corridor reopens, some look to an uncertain future

In every direction, heaps of blackened rubble still dotted the Midway, remnants of what had been a sportswear shop, an Ethiopian restaurant, a rental car destination, a video game store, a Napa auto parts vendor, a century-old pharmacy.

WHAT DOES FUTURE HOLD?

More than a week after the sudden violence following the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis, key questions remain.

How long will it take for St. Paul's largest remaining retail corridor to rebuild?

How many ruined storefronts will remain vacant or become converted into vacant lots, and which ones will be replaced by new uses entirely, such as multi-family residences or chain vendors?

Could some of the destruction lend itself to new opportunities to reconfigure strip malls or re-imagine buildings to be even more inviting and pedestrian-friendly than in the past?

Bonnie Vogel, CEO of Vogel Mechanical Inc., is optimistic. She said rebuilding the Midway area will serve as an opportunity to improve construction practices. It's even possible that historical economic and racial disparity gaps can be narrowed.

"We should look at creating true partnerships and involving minority communities from the ground up," she said.

FULL EXTENT OF DAMAGE STILL HIDDEN

Ricardo Cervantes, director of the St. Paul Department of Safety and Inspections, informed the city's Business Review Council on Wednesday morning that of the 117 businesses that his department had identified as damaged citywide, 28 of those could not yet be reoccupied. Three were so badly damaged, they had to be razed.

"Many buildings remain boarded so full assessments are not possible to complete given the proximity to recent events," said Suzanne Donovan, a spokeswoman for the Department of Safety and Inspections.

A neighborhood association, the Hamline-Midway Coalition, was conducting its own assessment, going door to door to talk to business owners where they could find them. It's been difficult to find an open door.

"That impact isn't just on the looting and the rioting," said Kate Mudge, executive director of the Hamline-Midway Coalition. "People are afraid now to come support the businesses that are open."

Given the high cost of rebuilding a store - even one that is well-insured may face huge deductibles - the most heavily impacted small-business owners face big choices in the days ahead. Some devastated shops, like Lloyd's Pharmacy and , have already raised hefty sums toward reopening through online fundraisers.

Still, "a lot of them are still unsure what their next steps are going to be," Chad Kulas, executive director of the Midway Chamber of Commerce, said Wednesday. "A lot of them are unsure if they want to rebuild, if they can afford it. But the ones that are really dedicated, they've hit the ground running."

Still, the decisions may not be entirely up to them. A number of destroyed or heavily damaged stores sit in strip malls or buildings owned by commercial landlords who may have a different vision of the future.

As St. Paul's Midway business corridor reopens, some look to an uncertain future

If major building remodels result in rent increases, that could displace current tenants, which is roughly what happened when TCF Bank Stadium opened in Stadium Village in Minneapolis in 2009. Chain vendors soon followed.

"You previously had a lot of locally owned business," Kulas said. "Then the stadium came in, rents went up and national chains took their place. That would change the flavor of the Midway."

Residents have longed for years to see major changes to the Midway Shopping Center around Allianz Field. Recent plans call for "United Villages at Midway," two towers of housing over a parking podium connected to additional retail and co-working spaces.

With multiple storefronts destroyed at the east end of the shopping center, could that hasten a significant redevelopment, or just delay it?

A spokesman for master developer M.A. Mortenson Co. of Golden Valley released a brief written statement Thursday: "Our hope is to help create opportunities for the neighborhood and places that celebrate the incredible community spirit and culture of St. Paul. We are confident in the future of the Midway neighborhood and continue to put the key pieces in place as we work with the city to get to a point when construction can begin."

A year ago, Kraus-Anderson purchased the 324,000-square-foot Midway Marketplace, home to Cub Foods, LA Fitness and other retail outlets, for $31 million. It, too, was damaged by looters and fires.

"We are currently assessing the extent of that damage and next steps are still to be determined," said Jeff Hildahl, senior vice president with Kraus-Anderson Realty, in a written statement. "That said, we believe in this neighborhood and its potential. We still see this as a tremendous location."

Kraus-Anderson's development teams are currently working on a series of projects along University Avenue, including the 590 Park micro-apartments under construction near Rice Street, and a project at University and Raymond avenues still in planning. The Midway Marketplace sits in the middle.

"Midway will rise again, and we think stronger than before," Hildahl said.

Thomas Fierst, an insurance agent who represents at least a dozen impacted properties in Minneapolis and St. Paul, worries about speculators simply washing their hands of badly damaged buildings they had little commitment to in the first place. That would leave behind a number of vacant lots.

He points to this hypothetical example: Imagine buying a somewhat tired commercial building for $600,000 with the intention of flipping it over, probably to residential multi-family developers, once the mixed-income neighborhood gentrifies.

Rather than insure for the full cost of reconstruction - something in the vicinity of $2 million - you might be tempted to go cheap and take out $300,000 or $400,000 in insurance, somewhat like buying the cheapest available insurance for a junk automobile.

"That would happen in the Midway, absolutely," Fierst said. "It happens more with older buildings than newer ones. ... Sometimes people buy buildings for tax write-offs."

Bole Ethiopian cuisine If that's the case, and the cost of reconstruction far exceeds insurance coverage, "that's where you could see a problem," Fierst said.

As St. Paul's Midway business corridor reopens, some look to an uncertain future

How common a scenario is that in Minneapolis or St. Paul? It may take a while for building owners to gather their paperwork and submit claims, so it's tough to tell.

"I've got clients that ... can't make a police report yet," Fierst said. "They have time."

While not all businesses in the Midway area received direct damage from the protests, some are still wary of what's to come.

Tetra Constantino, 41, the owner of Elsa's House of Sleep furniture store on University Avenue, said business has already been difficult given the COVID-19 pandemic. Sales were just beginning to start up again before the protests.

"People still need a place to sleep and a place to sit in their home," he said. "We serve our community and we serve our neighborhood, people know us."

Constantino and other black business owners near the University-Snelling intersection stayed out all night during the protests guarding their businesses, hoping to prevent damage. Volunteers came to help board up the storefront, and Constantino had to close his business completely for several days.

He emphasized that it's important to not forget that the world is in the midst of an unprecedented pandemic and to prioritize safety for staff and clients. But systemic change needs to take place as a result of George Floyd's death, he said.

"Everybody here at this store, we are as diverse as the communities that we serve. We are all praying that there is some type of equitable resolution that can be brought forth to bring justice and healing," Constantino said.

Tim Wilson, 53, owns the record store Urban Lights Music next door. While Wilson's store hasn't received any damage, he said he received threats from white supremacist groups as the riots escalated. Like Constantino, he also stayed up overnight for several nights in a row to protect his shop.

\$200K loan helped Minn. Senate president's business hang on U.S. hiring soared in May as mass layoffs eased Judge orders Dakota Access pipeline shut down pending review Stores focus on cleaning to get shoppers back to spending Otto Bremer Trust to partner with community development corporations for pandemic relief Once protests started, Wilson said he stood outside the store and asked people to not damage his business. His business was still boarded up on Wednesday, and he wasn't sure when he would feel comfortable taking the plywood down.

Wilson's business has been running for 26 years and he said he doesn't want to see it go.

"I get the outrage, I'm outraged. But this is the narrative of 2020," he said. "The hope is that things will change because so many people who maybe didn't want to look at America in the mirror now are looking at things differently."

Graphic

As St. Paul's Midway business corridor reopens, some look to an uncertain future

Minnesota National Guard troops are stationed at a Discount Tire store on University Avenue in St. Paul on Tuesday, June 2, 2020. (John Autey / Pioneer Press)

Big Top Wine and Spirits was damaged by fire. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

The Big Top Wine store across the street from a burned-out Sports Dome apparel store in St. Paul's Midway shopping area. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDXXI. CHILD CARE ESSENTIAL TO ECONOMY'S RECOVERY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 7, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 973 wordsByline: LEE SCHAFFER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The report on "saving Minnesota's child care sector" during the COVID-19 pandemic arrived in the middle of an already exhausting week, following the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis and the eruption of anger, grief and violence that followed.

It was the kind of report that seemed easy to put aside amid talk of bigger problems. Until reaching the end, where its message was simply stated: No child care, no economic recovery.

Parents who need to leave the house for work still need child care, and nearly half now allowed to work from home still do, too, according to one survey. That's why you see the involvement of business groups like the Minnesota Chamber of Commerce in the coalition that produced this latest paper.

In a conversation last week with the economist Art Rolnick, who sent me the white paper, he referred to child care as early childhood education, making the good point that providing for a high-quality place for little kids is an investment that generates returns.

He has been an advocate of additional funding for the youngest kids for years, a project that really goes back to the early 2000s and his role then as research chief at the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis.

Early childhood education might be what others called child care, but it's really mostly the same thing. In addition to being kept safe, active and fed, kids in a high-quality child care program are building fine motor skills and learning all about shapes, colors, letters, numbers and other things that will help them do well once they get to kindergarten.

Among the groups that participated in this latest paper on the crisis in early childhood education is one called Close Gaps by 5, where Rolnick and several business leaders serve as board members. The term "gaps" reflects one key notion in their work, that the early childhood education system as it existed really disadvantaged kids from lower-income families, a big contributor to what's called the achievement gap in education.

In a continuation of the work that Rolnick once participated in, the Minneapolis Fed reported last fall that Minnesota has some of the largest gaps in the nation on educational outcome measures by race and economic status.

There's an easy argument to make that it's not just immoral to allow that to continue, because it also saps the potential for more broadly shared and greater prosperity in the state years down the road.

For those in the Twin Cities who somehow haven't noticed, there has been one story after another in the news in the past week or so that has shown that some of the worst disparities in the country between the lives of black and white people are in Minnesota.

Household wealth is one telling measure, often illustrated by different rates of owning a house, a common path to building some family wealth. As of the most recent data based on U.S. Census Bureau numbers, it was 75% for non-Hispanic white households in the Twin Cities, and 25% for black households. The black homeownership rate has fallen since 2000 but held steady for white households.

Groups such as Close Gaps by 5 say it makes sense to work on the problem of gaps developing well before kids get to kindergarten, and to let parents help solve the problem.

The main policy idea was to give scholarship money to low-income families that might have the toughest time finding good programs for their kids or the money to pay for them. With money to spend, the parents would help bring the right kind of supply into their own market.

"We really wanted to highlight for policymakers the idea that you could get a two-for-one," said Ericca Maas, executive director of Close Gaps by 5. "You could address child-care shortages at the same time the investments could help address achievement gaps."

"In the last month or so," she added, "we were increasingly seeing evidence that both crises were going to be made worse by the pandemic."

The policy recommendations in the most recent paper went beyond stimulating demand for good child-care programs by arguing also for swift action to direct more money to child-care providers to help keep their doors open.

In a market that was already losing providers before the health crisis, costs will increase to manage the potential spread of COVID-19, from staff members missing work as result of illness or self-isolating to the increased cost of cleaning and supplies.

In one estimate, the increased cost was about 20% for small child-care operations and even more for larger centers.

Many providers also face limits on how many kids they can safely let back into their programs.

"The providers I've spoken with are thinking if they could reach 50% capacity that is as high as they are going to be able to go without a vaccine. They are planning for a year." Maas said. "When I asked about whether that was sustainable from a business perspective, the answer was basically 'no.' "

Another Minnesota nonprofit in child care, Think Small, is about to release findings from calling the nearly 1,700 providers in Hennepin and Ramsey counties in late April and May, said Barb Yates, the organization's president.

Part of the reason to call was to offer support, reaching more than half of them, but they also gathered information. The industry tracks capacity as "slots," meaning the number of kids the center is licensed to have, and since the pandemic crisis blossomed in March, nearly 20% of the capacity has gone at the providers they reached, Yates said.

It might not mean a permanent reduction, she added, but they also can only guess at how many of the providers they weren't able to reach in their calling might have closed down.

"It's a problem across the country, it's not just in Minnesota," Yates said. "It's just a really stressed financial model that doesn't much work anymore, if it ever did."

lee.schafer@startribune.com · 612-673-4302

Load-Date: June 7, 2020

ARTICLE CDXXII. COVERING A CRISIS LIKE NO OTHER

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 7, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 10ELength: 577 wordsByline: NEAL JUSTIN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: National correspondents from CBS and CNN reflect on once-in-a-lifetime assignments.Body

Sara Sidner makes sure to never cry at work, not while covering the Libyan civil war, Mumbai terrorist attacks or riots in Ferguson, Mo.

Last Sunday, she broke her rule.

It happened when Minneapolis Police Chief Medaria Arradondo unexpectedly dropped by the site where George Floyd perished and agreed to chat with the CNN correspondent. At one point, Sidner relayed a question from the victim's brother, who was listening in from the family home.

When the cameras switched off, Sidner handed her microphone to a crew member, told everyone to leave her alone and sat down on a nearby stoop. Then, she lost it.

"I just started bawling," she said the next day, speaking from her car at the same location, minutes before going back on the air. "I've never done that before in the presence of other people. I'm a woman, and I want to show I can handle it, that I can shoulder anything. But that was hard. I couldn't be reporter Sara. I was just human Sara. There was something about the compassion that the chief showed and the reaction from the Floyd family. I couldn't suppress my emotions anymore."

It didn't help that the veteran reporter was operating on just a couple hours of sleep, standard operation since she flew into the Twin Cities on May 27. But maybe it was also the idea that a city best known for Mary Richards' sunny-side-up spirit and Prince's feel-good music had turned into a war zone.

"No one is ever going to think of Minneapolis the same way again," she said.

CBS correspondent Jeff Pegues has also had difficulty recognizing the city he lived in during the mid-1990s while working on a short-lived UPN show.

He can't shake the images: a white woman casually looting a Target store with her two kids in tow; a crew member getting shot with a rubber bullet; the protester who insisted that this was all an uprising; drunks chasing his team around, threatening bodily harm.

"There has been danger. There have been moments when you have to be worried more about safety than covering the story," said Pegues, who wrote the book "Black and Blue: Inside the Divide Between the Police and Black America." "I've had situations like that in the past, but never as many in one week."

But the veteran reporter has also seen examples of the Minnesota Nice he remembers, like watching residents clean up debris with a sea of brooms or the stranger who approached him last Sunday just as he was about to go on "Face the Nation."

"He just walked up and said, 'I'm not black. I'm not white. I'm human,' " Pegues said. "We elbow bumped. I think he just felt the need to latch on to the positive."

Sidner has also found kindness.

"In Ferguson, there was initially a lot of screaming at me, but here the protesters have embraced us," she said. "There was a conspiracy theorist following me around the other day, calling me all kinds of names. Protesters stepped in and said, 'We know who she is and we know the story she is telling. Get away from her right now.' That's never happened before."

Four nights after landing in Minneapolis, Pegues took a break between appearing on the evening news and reporting from the streets to drive around the Lake of the Isles and Loring Park, where he had bought his first townhouse. It was a rare break from the action.

"It reminded me of the Minneapolis I remember," Pegues said. "People outdoors enjoying the good weather, riding bikes around the lakes. It was nice."

Neal Justin · 612-673-7431 ·

Njustin@startribune.com Twitter: @nealjustin

Load-Date: June 7, 2020

ARTICLE CDXXIII. COVID-19 PLATEAU WON'T MEAN THAT MINNESOTANS CAN RELAX

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 7, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1073 wordsByline: CHRISTOPHER SNOWBECK; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Minnesota is adding hundreds of new COVID-19 cases every day, but a recent slowing in the growth rate is one reason health officials think the pandemic may be plateauing.

The decline comes as demand has flattened for hospital and ICU beds. It also coincides with an increased testing capacity that has helped the state better identify cases, said Kris Ehresmann, infectious disease director at the Minnesota Department of Health.

Those factors explain why health officials are beginning to think COVID-19 cases in Minnesota might be leveling off - although they are quick to add caution.

"I do think we may have reached a plateau at this point," Ehresmann said Saturday. "The reason that we're all so hedge-y is because this is a new virus. ... It may decide to go sideways on us."

She added: "It means that we can feel more comfortable about the opening up that has happened, but it doesn't mean it's a free-for-all."

Twenty-two more people have died of COVID-19 in Minnesota, health officials reported Saturday, bringing the statewide toll to 1,170 people. The new deaths include a Ramsey County resident in the age range of 20 to 29 who is the youngest pandemic victim reported thus far in the state.

Whereas most Minnesotans who have died from COVID-19 have been residents of long-term care or had underlying health conditions, Ehresmann said neither was a factor for the young Ramsey County resident.

On Friday, Gov. Tim Walz announced that restrictions designed to slow the spread of COVID-19 would be reduced again this week, with limited resumption of business for indoor restaurants, swimming pools, movie theaters and fitness clubs. After being closed for two months, those businesses can reopen to serve 25% of their capacities.

Churches, hair salons and indoor bars and restaurants can serve up to 50% of their capacities. The changes begin Wednesday; unrelated groups must stay 6 feet apart.

COVID-19 plateau won't mean that Minnesotans can relax

On Saturday, 473 COVID-19 cases required hospitalization, down from 589 just one week ago. Whereas the state reported 263 patients with COVID-19 in intensive care one week ago, the ICU tally on Saturday was down to 206.

The trend is significant but shouldn't be misinterpreted, said Dr. Tim Sielaff, chief medical officer at Allina Health System. As the state loosens more restrictions this week designed to control the spread of the disease, Sielaff urged people to continue to practice social distancing, wash hands and stay home when sick to control the spread.

"These numbers are good, not because it's gone away - they're good because we've been doing the right things," Sielaff said.

The count for positive test results grew by 521 confirmed cases statewide on Saturday. That's a relatively small number compared with many recent Saturday reports. In all, 27,501 Minnesotans have tested positive for COVID-19.

A Star Tribune review of state data shows averages over recent seven- and 14-day periods also indicate case counts have been trending downward. Jan Malcolm, the state health commissioner, described similar signs to reporters on Friday.

"It appears that we may be at a plateau in case growth," Malcolm said, adding: "I'm not in a position to say we definitely know now we're going to have a plateau, not a peak."

Case counts might increase over the next two to three weeks, she said, following group protests over the May 25 death of George Floyd while in police custody. It's also possible that the state could see a sustained decline in cases over the next couple of months, although Malcolm said that's not her expectation.

Even if there's a plateau in cases, many Minnesotans likely will be infected over the next few months, she said. And there's great debate over what will happen in the fall or winter.

"Something changed between April and May - we're in a more stable situation at the present," Malcolm said. "I would say it's more likely than not that we will stay in a situation where we're going to continue to have a fair degree of COVID in the community for quite some time to come, which is why a sustainable strategy of openings of society coupled with some really vigilant public health measures is what we've landed on."

Public health officials say the reported case count in Minnesota understates the number infected and sickened because testing supplies have been limited. Those limits also explain why hospitals can't be too sure about predicting ICU volumes based on the apparent plateau in cases, Sielaff said.

"It's just not quite as actionable as we'd like it to be," he said.

In the wake of Floyd's death, anyone who attended a demonstration, vigil or community cleanup should get tested right away if they have COVID-19 symptoms, health officials say. The symptoms range from fever, cough and shortness of breath to muscle ache, headache and new loss of taste or smell.

People without symptoms should wait five to seven days after the event. Some who have followed the advice have been turned away from testing nonetheless due to miscommunication or technical problems, Ehresmann said Saturday.

COVID-19 plateau won't mean that Minnesotans can relax

"There were a few hiccups between the time that people heard about being tested and when it was more readily available," she said. "So, certainly call back and check back with your provider, because things have changed."

COVID-19 is a viral respiratory illness caused by a new coronavirus that surfaced late last year. Since the first case was reported in Minnesota on March 6, 3,336 people have been hospitalized.

People at greatest risk include those 65 and older, residents of long-term care facilities, and those with underlying medical conditions, which range from lung disease, serious heart conditions and cancer to severe obesity, diabetes and kidney problems requiring dialysis.

A total of 22,253 Minnesotans who were infected with the novel coronavirus no longer need to be in isolation, up from 21,864 people at Friday's data release.

Christopher Snowbeck · 612-673-4744

TRACKING CORONAVIRUS

Minnesota cases, daily change*

27,501 -- Total cases

526 -- June 6 new cases

*Chart data is a net count of new confirmed cases minus previously announced cases that were removed by MDH on that date.

Minnesota deaths, new daily

1,170 -- Total deaths

22 -- June 6

U.S. cases, new daily

1,911,725 --Total cases

28,692 -- June 5

U.S. deaths, new daily

109,304 -- Total deaths

1,112 -- June 5

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete charts.)

Sources: New York Times, Minnesota Dept. of Health

Note: U.S. data lags a day behind Minnesota

Load-Date: July 2, 2020

COVID-19 plateau won't mean that Minnesotans can relax

End of Document

ARTICLE CDXXIV. DON'T BET ON THIS MARKET UPTURN

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 7, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 5DLength: 423 wordsByline: CHRIS FARRELL, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

These are hard days. COVID-19 has taken more than 100,000 lives. The public-health lockdown to contain the coronavirus has pushed the unemployment rate to Depression-era levels. The police killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis has led to civil unrest across the country.

Yet investors seem impervious to the turmoil and pain. Analysts largely agree the main factor behind investor optimism is the belief the Federal Reserve will do what it takes to keep the markets functioning. Support also comes from the realization that America's high-tech titans will emerge from the COVID-19 crisis more powerful than before. Many investors seem to harbor hopes that the rebound will be quick and fast.

The Wall Street analysis has the aura of conviction, yet I find it far from comforting or convincing. Yes, a year from now we could find out that the optimists were right. Yet I can't dismiss the historic insight that bubbles always seem crazy once we have the benefit of hindsight. Then we wonder, "how could so many people be so stupid with their money"?

More importantly, I don't think corporate America can profitably thrive considering the long-term trend toward growing inequality and stagnant to declining incomes for a majority of Americans. Too many people are living precarious financial lives these days. Widespread discrimination by leadership in hiring, training and promotions decisions are undermining society. Without concerted action - not words - we will all be the poorer.

This means households must emphasize the basics of personal finance. Here are what I think are the four keys to managing household finances well, especially now.

First, save more and slash debts. A margin of safety protects you against downside risks and also allows for sensible risk-taking. Second, keep it simple. Complex financial strategies cost more measured in time and fees. They usually disappoint, too. Third, embrace frugality. Examine your spending habits and focus on emphasizing the activities and experiences you value. That's frugality.

Don't bet on this market upturn

Finally, embrace giving. When we give our money away and volunteer our time, we ask the right question: How can we make a difference?

The combination of conservative consumerism, keeping it simple, building a margin of safety and putting giving at the core of managing household money feeds off, reinforces and draws energy from each other - whatever the stock market may or may not do in coming months.

Chris Farrell is senior economics contributor for "Marketplace" and a commentator on Minnesota Public Radio.

Load-Date: June 7, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDXXV. IN MINNEAPOLIS, THE BLUE LIGHT'S LAST GLEAMING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 7, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 834 wordsByline: JOHN EWOLDT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The Lake Street Kmart, both obstacle and neighborhood anchor, is finally closing.Body

Volunteers from urban-outreach group Source painted over graffiti on plywood last week at Kmart on Lake Street in Minneapolis. A planned mural could soon encase the Kmart until the building is torn down.

The building now is being cleaned out, marking an unceremonious end to one of the most profitable Kmart's in the country. The liquidation sale stopped soon after it started with discounts ranging from 25 to 75% off merchandise as it wound down to the planned June 30 closure.

Instead, the looting and violence that followed the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police accelerated the closing.

As Kmart ends its run across the country, the Lake Street location was the one still operating in Minnesota after nearly 50 existed in the state in the 1990s. The Kmart stubbornly stayed put despite multiple attempts by Minneapolis officials to displace it. Early last week as city employees surveyed the damage, Kmart employees swept up broken glass and debris in the entryway and mopped up pools of water on the store floor.

"Kmart provided needed low-cost goods and services within walking distance for many residents and those along the transit corridor," said Steve Poor, director of developmental services for Minneapolis' Community Planning & Economic Development (CPED) office. "The building appears to have no structural damage but since the sprinkler system went off, we have to get rid of the water to avoid mold. We're considering temporary uses of the space."

Rebecca Parrell, CPED's project supervisor, said there is no timeline for the building to be razed after last week's destruction. "Back in March the City Council said demo would begin at the end of 2020 but that was before this happened. Now it's in a period of assessment."

Todd Finney of Medford stopped by on Tuesday to help paint over graffiti on the walls. He grew up in the neighborhood populated by Latinos, blacks and African immigrants.

In Minneapolis, the blue light's last gleaming

"It was both a pleasure and a pain for the neighborhood," he said. "A lot of people don't realize it, but it was the main bloodline in the neighborhood. There was lots of foot traffic."

Parrell said the lack of cars in Kmart's parking lot was deceiving. "People felt as if it was never busy because there weren't a lot of cars in the lot, but that was because so many people walked or took public transit."

Renee Cottier, who checked last week to see if Kmart was still open, lives two blocks away and shopped there for 25 years.

"It's an unbelievable loss to the neighborhood," she said. "First we lost Supervalu, and then Kmart became the only place you could buy clothes, shoes, food, and gifts in one spot. With Kmart, Cub and Target closed in the area, I'll have to find someone to take me to the suburbs."

The need for Kmart contrasted with constant calls for a face-lift or complaints that it was a roadblock that cut Nicollet Avenue in two at a critical juncture.

In the early 1970s, the city had big plans for the Nicollet-Lake district that would remake it into a mini Southdale with apartments, offices, a movie theater and restaurants. Land was cleared by 1974 but financing dried up.

With its back against the wall to prevent taxpayers from footing the nearly $2 million bill for bonds coming due, the city hastily accepted an offer from Kmart that included the Nicollet closure.

That decision has been the core of countless attempts to move the store and reopen the thoroughfare since Kmart opened its doors in March 1978 - all deflected by Kmart or its subsequent owners.

Residents dubbed its stark north exterior the "Berlin Wall" or "Nicollet Wall" and requested a second entrance there. Kmart officials rejected the request, but paid $3,500 to commission a mural on the wall with a design chosen by a committee of five neighborhood groups and painted by six local artists. Parts of the mural remain on the back wall.

Fewer than 35 Kmart stores remain in the U.S. as its blue light dims. The St. Paul, International Falls and Rochester stores closed last year. But at its peak, the S.S. Kresge chain operated more than 2,100 stores.

By the 1990s, competitors Walmart and Target began to seal its fate. In 2002, the company declared bankruptcy. Many saw its merging with Sears in 2004 as hastening its demise.

Minneapolis began serious attempts to take back the space when in 2017 it paid $8 million for the 7 acres beneath the store site, becoming Kmart's landlord for a mere $10,000 a month.

Earlier this year, the city bought out Kmart's lease for $9.1 million, nullifying a contract that extended to 2053.

What began by a city willing to ignore the wishes of a neighborhood for a cash infusion is now ending for a retailer desperate for cash.

The city is still assessing its options for redeveloping the site.

In Minneapolis, the blue light's last gleaming

"This is a loss of services to the community, but with community engagement and a new street, we are considering those needed goods and services for the neighborhood in the new development," said project manager Parrell.

John Ewoldt · 612-673-7633

SEE MICROFILM OR PDF FOR MAP.

Load-Date: June 7, 2020

End of Document

Meet Nic Zapko. Her face and hands explain Gov. Tim Walz's words to the deaf.

ARTICLE CDXXVI. MEET NIC ZAPKO. HER FACE AND HANDS EXPLAIN GOV. TIM WALZ'S WORDS TO THE DEAF.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 7, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1230 words

Byline: Mary Divine

Highlight: Her work has been featured in newscasts around the world, and she has been praised on social media for her expressive delivery.

Body

Nic Zapko was stopped at a stoplight near Fort Snelling on Monday when the man in the car next to her realized who she was.

He smiled, rolled down his window and gave her a thumbs up.

"He just lit up. He said, 'Hey! Good job! Good job!' That human connection - that's my favorite part of this," said Zapko, who provides American Sign Language interpretation during Gov. Tim Walz's daily briefings on George Floyd and the coronavirus.

Zapko, 49, of Bloomington, was introduced to television and online audiences in March as Walz began regular briefings dealing with the coronavirus pandemic. The death of Floyd while a Minneapolis police officer knelt on his neck, and the unrest that followed, has only increased her profile as Walz's briefings have increased - sometimes to three times a day.

Her work has been featured in newscasts around the world, and she has been praised on social media for her expressive delivery.

I don't know this woman personally, but she obviously lives near me, so when all this is over, I owe her a drink...

...because she NAILED this description so well that I thought "I understand it all now." #ASL pic.twitter.com/IzuTcrJ7Nv

- Jay Joseph (@JayJoseph2020)

Zapko knows what high-quality ASL interpretation means to members of the deaf community.

She is deaf herself.

Meet Nic Zapko. Her face and hands explain Gov. Tim Walz's words to the deaf.

'EXPRESSION IS PART OF IT'

The national Registry of Interpreters for the Deaf has called for certified deaf interpreters at news conferences because they are the best at "conveying highly consequential information to large and diverse populations of deaf people."

Hiring a deaf interpreter to interpret at Walz's briefings is about providing access to information for a marginalized community in a format that is most readily understandable, according to Zapko.

"The deaf community has been asking for this for a long time," Zapko said through an interpreter on Wednesday. "It's about equal access, and communication access is equal access for the deaf community."

Zapko, a trained actor who toured with the National Theatre of the Deaf, uses facial expressions and gestures to convey the tone of the message. It means deaf people can watch the briefing at the same time as hearing people and understand the subtleties of what is being said, she said.

"ASL is a language that has a very visual component to it - and expression is part of it," she said. "Many people say, 'Wow, you're so expressive.' But to be honest, it's equivalent to your voice tone and inflection and style and speed and everything. I take that on." #Minneapolis May 30, 2020

It's a big deal. She explains: "We're not having to ask people what is being said, or how."

Take the words "stay home," for example. Is it a statement? A question? a demand?

"Our thinking is, 'Stay home? OK, what does that mean?' " Zapko said. "The tone is not there. It's, like, 'Are you staying home?' 'Do I need to stay home?' It's, like, 'Oh! Stay home!' "

DRESSED TO COMMUNICATE

Zapko wears a dark suit and black shirt to highlight her hands and facial expressions. The suit is to "dress as an equal" to those in the briefings and "to honor and respect the environment," she said, while the black is for visual impact.

There are members of the state's deaf-blind community who have low vision, and contrasting colors can be confusing, she said. "I wear all one color, monochromatic, so I keep creating that backdrop."

Zapko is one of the first deaf interpreters to work for the state. Because she is deaf, Zapko relies on a second interpreter sitting under the camera - a "feed interpreter" named Patty McCutcheon - to convey what Walz and other officials are saying.

Zapko delivers information in a way that is "relevant and important and causes people to pay attention," said McCutcheon, CEO of Keystone Interpreting Service, the St. Paul-based company that has the state contract to provide deaf interpreters for briefings.

At the briefing on Sunday after the driver of a tanker truck drove into a crowd of protesters on the Interstate 35W bridge, Zapko "made extraordinary sign decisions to re-create the way that truck entered the bridge and the way it stopped just short of a bicycle that tipped over and how people stormed," McCutcheon said.

"She just has such a command of the language that she pulls that information together with lots and lots of training and honing, but she pulls it together and makes it look like it's so easy," McCutcheon said.

Meet Nic Zapko. Her face and hands explain Gov. Tim Walz's words to the deaf.

Zapko, for her part, does her homework. She keeps up on local news, especially when she knows there is going to be a news conference later in the day. "It helps me get that visual image of what is going on," she said.

When she watched the truck plow into protesters, she knew to "show the bridge and people making their way across the bridge and the truck coming and almost hitting someone," she said. "That whole visual I had seen because I had the TV on all day."

'SO EASY TO UNDERSTAND'

Approximately one in five Minnesotans is deaf or hard of hearing, said Darlene Zangara, executive director of the Minnesota Commission of the Deaf, Deaf Blind and Hard of Hearing.

Zapko is "one of the top-notch interpreters in Minnesota," said Zangara, who is deaf. "Her ASL language skills are incredible. She is so clear that many non-signers have said that they understand her."

Among Zapko's fans is Zangara's 78-year-old mother, Carol Stremmel, who also is deaf.

"She is awesome - so easy to understand," Stremmel said. "It's less stressful than trying to read captions. Captions don't always help me because the English words are not in my vocabulary."

Because of Zapko, Stremmel is now "able to follow the news," Zangara said. "She has more confidence, and she has more interest in knowing what is going on than she ever had in the past. It amazes me because she typically had relied on me for information, but now she watches all of the updates and the press conferences. It's great to see that."

FINDING TIME TO REGENERATE

Zapko, who grew up in Pennsylvania and Ohio, is a program manager for Sorenson Communications. She and her wife live in Bloomington and have two children. Her hobbies include swimming and camping.

"I love to be outside - that's my thing," she said. "We have a beautiful back yard, and it's become our escape, our oasis. I love to camp, I grew up camping, but with COVID-19, it's not available, so the back yard has become my little campground. I have a small pool. I have a fire pit."

Walz moves \$56.6 million in coronavirus relief to MN child care providers MN lawmakers to return Monday to St. Paul to take up unfinished work Gov. Walz asks that Twin Cities riots be declared federal disaster Minnesota governor, insulin activists blast industry lawsuit With hundreds of COVID-19 cases tied to bars, Walz threatens stricter actions Between briefings, Zapko said she often runs home and jumps into the pool to relax and "regenerate," she said. "Then I put my work suit back on and go back."

The work is both exhausting and energizing, she said.

"It's challenging - that processing time, the mental work, getting it all right, the tone, the environment, the monitoring, the situation and, obviously, it's a stressful thing to take in, so I do get exhausted," she said. "At the same time, I enjoy the work. It gives me energy. It's overwhelming. It's inspiring. I'm thrilled to have this kind of thing happen. Because in our community, it's a huge deal. I mean, really, a huge deal."

Graphic

Meet Nic Zapko. Her face and hands explain Gov. Tim Walz's words to the deaf.

American sign language interpreter Nic Zapko, right, appears on screen as Minnesota Gov. Tim Walz gives a media briefing May 31, 2020, in St. Paul. Zapko has been praised on social media for her spirited delivery during the briefings, with fans taking to Twitter to share their love for her. (Image captured from pool video)

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

End of Document

REBUILDING COULD COST $500 MILLION

ARTICLE CDXXVII. REBUILDING COULD COST \$500 MILLION

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 7, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1592 wordsByline: JEFFREY MEITRODT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Business owners assess damages, physical and emotionalBody

It was just after midnight when Ali Barbarawi saw looters break into his dental clinic on Chicago Avenue.

As he monitored the security cameras from his home miles away, Barbarawi watched someone try to rip the big-screen TV off the wall in the waiting room. Then they moved on to his office, destroying $5,000 dental chairs and $1,500 surgical tools. The rioters took their time, he said, before they decided to set the place on fire.

Barbarawi begged the city to protect his property. But he said he was told the police and fire departments couldn't reach the building until 6 a.m. By that time, Chicago Lake Family Dental was in ruins.

"Why didn't the city help us?" asked Barbarawi, who said it will cost about $1 million to rebuild the business. "They could have stopped this. I feel the city has a responsibility to protect not only the people but the businesses as well."

More than 500 shops and restaurants in Minneapolis and St. Paul have reported damage when protests on five nights turned violent over the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police. Dozens of properties burned to the ground.

Owners and insurance experts estimate the costs of the damage could exceed $500 million. That would make the Twin Cities riots the second-costliest civil disturbance in U.S. history, trailing only those in Los Angeles in 1992, which were also sparked by racial tensions with police and had $1.4 billion in damages in today's dollars.

In the Twin Cities, the most severe damage was concentrated along a 5-mile stretch of Lake Street in south Minneapolis, an area that for more than a century has harbored new ventures by immigrants and, in the past decade, enjoyed a resurgence from the latest influx of new arrivals and the overall surge in the economy.

REBUILDING COULD COST $500 MILLION

Now, many owners will probably be stuck paying for repairs out of their own pocket. Surveys indicate fewer than half of all small businesses in the U.S. have property insurance, and even those with coverage say they probably won't get enough money to cover their rebuilding costs and operating losses.

Allison Sharkey, executive director of the Lake Street Council, fears that half of the businesses damaged in the riots won't be able to reopen if they don't get help from the government. Sharkey met recently with state legislators to discuss a state relief package that could operate like the federal Paycheck Protection Program, which provided forgivable loans to businesses hurt by COVID-19. But she said it may be a tough sell this year considering the state's virus-related budget deficit.

"It is going to be a long road," Sharkey said. "It is going to be years before a lot of this is rebuilt."

Many owners will be forced to start over. On Snelling Avenue in St. Paul, there's nothing left of Lloyd's Pharmacy except a pile of rubble. Owner Jim Stage is planning to open a dramatically scaled-down version of the store in a nearby storage space this summer, but he said it will take at least a year to build a new pharmacy, even though he was fully insured.

In Minneapolis, Steve Krause hasn't decided whether he will reopen Minnehaha Lake Wine & Spirits, a fixture on East Lake Street since the 1930s. "What made us unique is we were in a great neighborhood. And that value is gone unless the neighborhood comes back," he said.

Erik Otteson, who has operated a used-car lot on Lake Street for 30 years, said he believes city officials allowed the rioting to spin out of control because they want to redevelop the neighborhood. Gov. Tim Walz decried the city's response to the riots as an "abject failure."

"They have been trying to get rid of us for years," said Otteson, whose dealership was vandalized but remains open. "The city does not want small businesses here. They want five-story apartment buildings. Small businesses are in the way."

Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey said it is "heart wrenching" to hear such complaints, and he vowed to spend the rest of his term making property owners whole again. He said he will ask the Legislature for at least $100 million in grants and loans for small businesses without insurance.

Frey said the city was simply overwhelmed by the riots, noting that every fire truck was operating every night during the protests, with police escorting those crews to ensure their safety.

"We are not interested in replacing these local entrepreneurs, especially those of color, who have made these neighborhoods such wonderful corridors," Frey said. "They need to stay, and we're going to help them."

A neighbor's long comeback

Glen Luedtke, who owns a flower shop a few blocks from some of the heaviest rioting, said he feels bad for the neighborhood businesses that are now shuttered, which include a Speedway he visited every day for coffee.

"What started out as a peaceful protest is now hurting the very people who need to be working," he said. "With this COVID thing, a lot of people probably weren't going to reopen anyway because everyone is on a short margin here."

REBUILDING COULD COST $500 MILLION

In 2006, a burglar broke into his shop on West 38th Street and stole the safe before setting the place on fire. Luedtke said dealing with his insurance company was the easiest part of the process.

"I probably had that check within a week at the most," Luedtke said.

Though he collected $55,000 from the insurance company, Luedtke said that represented less than a third of what it cost to rebuild Petersen Flowers. The problem: His policy covered only the value of the property, not the cost of replacing it.

"It was an old building, so it wasn't worth much," he said, echoing the concerns of many small-business owners hurt by the riots.

Luedtke reopened the shop a year after the fire, just as the Great Recession started hammering the economy. His sales dropped in half. To keep the store going, he took a second job as a charter bus driver for five years. Luedtke would work 30 to 35 hours a week at the shop and another 20 to 40 hours on the road.

"It's a hell of a tough road back, I'll guarantee you that," said Luedtke, who is still paying off the loan he took out to rebuild his shop.

Online generosity

Out of desperation, some business owners are turning to charity for help.

At least 63 small-business owners in Minneapolis and St. Paul whose shops were burned or looted have set up GoFundMe accounts, to which anyone can contribute. So far, they've raised more than $3 million.

Though some people have already achieved their fundraising goals, others have gotten little or no support.

As of Friday afternoon, Barbarawi had collected $40,699, well short of his goal of $500,000, which is how much he expects to pay to rebuild the practice after maxing out his insurance policy. He said the city should compensate property owners for their losses.

"They should give us something to help us rebuild, and rebuild fast," said Barbarawi, whose dental practice provided care to 2,000 mostly low-income residents.

The riot casualty with the most success on GoFundMe is a new bar and restaurant on East Lake Street destroyed before it had even opened. Brooklyn Center firefighter Korboi Balla, who spent less than $50,000 to create Scores Sports Bar, said he was astonished to find more than $1 million in the account late last week. Balla said he had no insurance on the property.

Balla said he still intends to build a sports bar, but it will be at a different address and perhaps in a new neighborhood. With the extra money, he has decided to buy his own property rather than lease.

"With COVID-19, I am not going to rush into anything," Balla said.

Balla said he will use only a portion of the GoFundMe money for the venture and turn the rest over to the Lake Street Council or other groups trying to rebuild the neighborhood.

"I am going to find a way to pay it forward," he said.

REBUILDING COULD COST $500 MILLION

Kianmehr Ehtiatkar said his expectations are much lower. He started a GoFundMe page for his father's vandalized car lot on East Lake Street at the suggestion of two local attorneys, who told him it would be a waste of time to sue the city or the police department for not protecting the property. The business, A Auto Mall, had no insurance to cover the 13 cars stolen during the riots, he said.

"They said I should start right away, while people are heated up," said Ehtiatkar, whose family moved to Minnesota from Iran 12 years ago. "But my father grew up in a culture where people didn't accept help like this. For the first two days, he was begging me to return the money."

Though the East Lake Street business sustained about $150,000 in losses, Ehtiatkar couldn't imagine asking for that much money. He figured $10,000 was the limit. Within hours of launching a GoFundMe page, however, A Auto Mall had already surpassed that target. By Friday, the counter was up to $47,617, with donations coming from 998 people from around the world.

"The power of social media and peoples' compassion is amazing," Ehtiatkar said. "I was getting notes from random people in Hong Kong and other countries around the world who said they were feeling oppression from their police departments. It was chilling."

jeff.meitrodt@startribune.com 612-673-4132

COSTLIEST U.S. CIVIL DISORDERS

Amount in 2020 dollars

Los Angeles, April 1992, $1.4 billion

Los Angeles, August 1965, $357 million

Detroit, July 1967, $322 million

Miami, May 1980, $204 million

Washington, D.C., April 1968, $179 million

New York, July 1977, $118 million

Newark, July 1967, $115 million

Baltimore, April 1968, $104 million

Chicago, April 1968, $97 million

New York, April 1968, $30 million

Baltimore, April 2015, $26 million

Source: Insurance Information Institute, ISO-Verisk

Load-Date: July 2, 2020

Sunday coronavirus update: 16 more MN deaths, 388 new cases

ARTICLE CDXXVIII.

SUNDAY CORONAVIRUS UPDATE: 16 MORE MN DEATHS, 388 NEW CASES

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 7, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 418 wordsByline: Katrina Pross

Highlight: As Minnesota mourns the deaths of another 16 people from COVID-19 that were announced on Sunday, the number of patients in state hospitals has dropped to its lowest level in nearly a month. The additional deaths raise the pandemic's death toll in Minnesota to 1,186. Of the state's total deaths, 949 were long-term care of [...]

Body

As Minnesota mourns the deaths of another 16 people from COVID-19 that were announced on Sunday, the number of patients in state hospitals has dropped to its lowest level in nearly a month.

The additional deaths raise the pandemic's death toll in Minnesota to 1,186. Of the state's total deaths, 949 were long-term care of assisted living center residents, according to Minnesota Department of Health data updated Sunday morning.

The Health Department also reports another 388 confirmed infections, increasing Minnesota's total number of cases to 27,886. The actual number of cases is likely much higher as the data only represents those who have been tested for the virus, state officials say.

The latest figures were released as the St. Paul community learned that public school board chair Marny Xiong had died of the virus Sunday morning at the age of 31. Xiong had been hospitalized for the past month in critical condition. She is one of the youngest people in Minnesota to have died of the virus.

While the number of news cases have decreased over the past week, state officials will be monitoring the situation for outbreaks following large protests and gatherings surrounding the death of George Floyd.

This Wednesday also marks the first day that restaurants and bars can open for indoor dining, though at half capacity. Fitness centers can also open at 25 percent capacity.

HOW ARE PATIENTS DOING? There were 22,992 patients Sunday that no longer need to be isolated as they have recovered enough. This is an increase from 22,253 yesterday. There were 450 patients with COVID-19 in Minnesota hospitals, a decrease from 473 the day before. This is the lowest hospitalizations have been since May 10, when there were 434 hospitalizations. Of those patients in hospitals, 199 are in intensive care, a decrease from 206 on Saturday. This is the lowest intensive care levels have been since May 13, when there were also 199 hospitalizations. WHO IS GETTING SICK? Number of health care workers with COVID-19: 2,956 The age group with the most infections remains 30- to 39-year-olds with 5,648 cases. The age group with the most deaths remains 80- to 89-year-olds with 408 deaths. Wednesday coronavirus update: 8 more MN deaths, 463 additional cases New in a pandemic: These restaurants are serving guests despite all odds 'Desperation science' slows the hunt for coronavirus drugs U to help international students comply with ICE directive Trump pushes state, local leaders to reopen schools in fall

Sunday coronavirus update: 16 more MN deaths, 388 new cases

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

End of Document

Duty to intervene: Minneapolis cops who helped arrest George Floyd spoke up but didn't step in

ARTICLE CDXXIX. DUTY TO INTERVENE: MINNEAPOLIS COPS WHO HELPED ARREST GEORGE FLOYD SPOKE UP BUT DIDN'T STEP IN

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 8, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1155 words

Byline: Bernard Condon, Todd Richmond

Highlight: "This is a lesson for every cop in America: If you see something that is wrong, you need to step in."

Body

Minneapolis was among several cities that had policies on the books requiring police officers to intervene to stop colleagues from using unreasonable force, but that didn't save George Floyd and law enforcement experts say such rules will always run up against entrenched police culture and the fear of being ostracized and branded a "rat."

Power dynamics may have been magnified in the Floyd case because two of the four officers involved were rookies and the most senior officer on the scene was a training officer, Derek Chauvin, a 19-year police veteran who was seen putting his knee on the back of the black man's neck despite his cries that he couldn't breathe.

Even though lawyers for the rookie officers say both men voiced their concerns about Chauvin's actions in the moment, they ultimately failed to stop him. Chauvin is now charged with second-degree murder, and his three fellow officers are charged with aiding and abetting.

"This is a lesson for every cop in America: If you see something that is wrong, you need to step in," said Joseph Giacalone, a former New York police sergeant who now teaches at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice. "There are a lot of gray areas in policing, but this was crystal clear. ... You're better off being ostracized by the group than going to prison for murder."

Added Andrew Scott, a former Boca Raton, Fla., police chief who testifies in use-of-force cases: "They're suffering the effects of an organizational culture that doesn't allow that or reward that behavior. The fraternity of law enforcement is a tight fraternity and fraternities have a group think."

Attorneys for the two rookies, Thomas Lane and J. Alexander Kueng, emphasized their place in police hierarchy in the now-fired officers' initial court appearance this past week. They noted both were on just their fourth day as full-fledged cops at the time of Floyd's May 25 arrest in South Minneapolis, while Chauvin was an authority figure as a designated training officer for new cops.

Duty to intervene: Minneapolis cops who helped arrest George Floyd spoke up but didn't step in

"They're required to call him 'Sir,'" Lane's attorney, Earl Gray, told the judge in Hennepin County District Court. "He has 20 years' experience. What is my client supposed to do but to follow what the training officer said? Is that aiding and abetting a crime?"

Gray noted that Lane questioned Chauvin's actions during the arrest, and Kueng's lawyer Thomas Plunkett said his client told fellow cops, "You shouldn't be doing this."

But according to the criminal complaints that detailed Floyd's arrest on suspicion of passing a counterfeit bill, the officers didn't back up their words with actions.

Lane held Floyd's legs and Kueng held his back while Chauvin, who is to have his first court appearance Monday, placed his knee on Floyd's head and neck. That's when Floyd repeatedly said "I can't breathe," "Mama" and "please." At one point, Floyd said, "I'm about to die." Nevertheless, Chauvin, Lane and Kueng didn't move. And a fourth officer, Tou Thao, continued standing nearby keeping onlookers back.

Moments later, Lane asked "should we roll him on his side?" Chauvin replied: "No, staying put where we got him." Lane said he was worried Floyd would experience excited delirium, a condition in which a person can become agitated and aggressive or suddenly die, according to the documents.

"That's why we have him on his stomach," Chauvin replied.

Despite his concerns, Lane didn't do anything to help Floyd or to reduce the force being used on him, the complaint said. Neither he, nor Keung and Chauvin moved from their positions until an ambulance came and took Floyd to Hennepin County Medical Center, where he was pronounced dead.

Minneapolis police added a "duty to intervene" policy in 2016, saying officers are required to "either stop or attempt to stop another sworn employee when force is being inappropriately applied or is no longer required." City officials moved Friday to strengthen that duty by seeking to make it enforceable in court, and to require officers to immediately report to their superiors when they see use of any neck restraint or chokehold.

Similar "duty to intervene" policies and initiatives had been in place for years in New York City, Miami and New Orleans. And since the Floyd case, Dallas and Charlotte, N.C., are among the places that have enacted such policies.

But, Scott said, "There's policy and then there's practice. More likely than not, practice and custom will prevail over policy."

Departments often don't reward officers for interfering with their colleagues or reporting that they broke policy, Scott said. And officers who do intervene risk being ostracized by their fellow officers and branded as an informer in the ranks.

"In law enforcement, if you're considered an individual who can't be trusted, you're not going to have the timely back-up from other officers," Scott said. "That's a legitimate fear factor."

Geoff Alpert, a criminology professor at the University of South Carolina, said that when Lane questioned Chauvin in the moment, he was undoubtedly "scared to death."

But ultimately, Alpert said, "he wasn't courageous enough" to physically intervene to stop him. "He knew he would get hell from the 19-year veteran and all his buddies."

Duty to intervene: Minneapolis cops who helped arrest George Floyd spoke up but didn't step in

Lost in the furor over Floyd's case and the national protest and debate over issues of race and police brutality is the fact that half of the four officers involved in his arrest were minorities, hired as part of a Minneapolis police program credited with helping to diversify the largely white force.

Thao, a 34-year-old of Southeast Asian Hmong descent with more than a decade on the force, and Kueng, a 26-year-old African-American rookie who previously worked as a department store security guard, were both part of the community service officer program that brings in recruits to work part-time with the goal of making them regular members of the force.

Chauvin, 44, is white, as is Lane, though he is an outlier of a different sort, a 37-year-old rookie who joined the police after working as a juvenile detention guard.

Chuck Wexler, executive director of the Police Executive Research Forum, a Washington-based think tank, said getting officers to take action, sometimes against more experienced colleagues, is at the heart of stopping abuses by police.

"These new officers are put in a position where they're told, 'This is your mentor. He will teach you,'" he said. "A 20-year veteran is supposed to know what he is doing and clearly he didn't. He made every mistake possible."

Ramsey County one of three sites in nation to pilot program aimed at revamping prosecution to address racial disparities 1 officer charged in George Floyd death seeks case dismissal Three non-profits create fund for minority-owned businesses in Twin Cities Correctional officers of color who say they were segregated from Derek Chauvin: Why isn't Ramsey Co. jail superintendent on leave? America disrupted: Troubles cleave a nation, and a city

Graphic

Former Minneapolis police officers, from left, Derek Chauvin, Tou Thao, Thomas Lane and J. Alexander Kueng

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

Officer charged in Floyd's death held on $1 million bail

ARTICLE CDXXX. OFFICER CHARGED IN FLOYD'S DEATH HELD ON $1 MILLION BAIL

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 8, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 754 words

Byline: Steve Karnowski

Highlight: MINNEAPOLIS (AP) - A judge on Monday kept bail at $1 million for a former Minneapolis police officer charged with second-degree murder in George Floyd's death.

Body

By STEVE KARNOWSKI

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) - A judge on Monday kept bail at $1 million for a former Minneapolis police officer charged with second-degree murder in George Floyd's death.

Derek Chauvin, 44, said little during an 11-minute hearing in which he appeared before Hennepin County Judge Jeannice M. Reding on closed-circuit television from the state's maximum security prison in Oak Park Heights. He wore a mask and handcuffs as he sat at a table, where he answered yes or no to routine housekeeping questions and confirmed the the spelling of his name and address. He did not enter a plea; a step that usually comes later in Minnesota courts.

A judge raised Chauvin's bail from $500,000 to $1 million when a second-degree murder charge was added on Wednesday. Monday's hearing was a chance for arguments over the higher bail. Prosecutor Matthew Frank argued for keeping the higher bail, saying the seriousness of the charges and the "strong reaction in the community, to put it mildly," made Chauvin a flight risk. The judge agreed with the state's request for $1.25 million unconditional bail, or $1 million with standard conditions including surrendering firearms, remaining law-abiding and making all future court appearances.

Chauvin's attorney, Eric Nelson, did not contest the bail amount and didn't address the substance of the charges, which also include third-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter.

Nelson did not speak with reporters afterward. He has not commented on the case publicly since Chauvin's May 29 arrest.

Attorneys for two of the three other ex-officers charged in the case made it clear at separate first appearances for their clients on Thursday that a key element of their defenses will be to argue that their clients were rookies who tried to intervene verbally to help Floyd, but that they had no choice but to defer to Chauvin, the most senior officer at the scene.

Officer charged in Floyd's death held on $1 million bail

Chauvin's next appearance was set for June 29 at 1:30 p.m.

Floyd, a handcuffed black man, died May 25 after the white police officer pressed his knee into his neck for several minutes even after Floyd stopped moving and pleading for air. His death set off protests, some violent, in Minneapolis that swiftly spread to cities around the U.S. and the globe. Chauvin and three other officers on the scene were fired the day after Floyd's death.

The other three officers - J. Kueng, Thomas Lane and Tou Thao - are charged with aiding and abetting second-degree murder and with aiding and abetting second-degree manslaughter. They remain in the Hennepin County jail on $750,000 bail. If convicted, they potentially face the same maximum penalty as Chauvin: up to 40 years in prison.

Lane's family has set up a website seeking donations to help him post bond. The site highlights Lane's relative lack of experience - he had only recently completed his probationary period - and his questions to Chauvin about whether Floyd should be rolled onto his side. It also noted his volunteer work.

Floyd's death has ignited calls to reform the Minneapolis Police Department, which community activists have long accused of entrenched racial discrimination and brutality. A majority of Minneapolis City Council members said Sunday that they favor disbanding the department entirely, though they have yet to offer concrete plans for what would replace it.

"Nobody is saying we want to abolish health or safety," Council Member Alondra Cano told WCCO-AM on Monday. "What we are saying is we have a broken system that is not producing the outcomes we want."

The state last week launched a civil rights investigation of the department. On Friday, the council approved a stipulated agreement that immediately banned the use of chokeholds and neck restraints and included several other changes. That investigation is ongoing.

Associated Press writer Todd Richmond contributed from Madison, Wis.

This version corrects that Chauvin's bail was raised to $1 million on June 3 and Monday's hearing was a chance for his attorney to contest that. The name of the judge and the location of the prison where Chauvin is being held have also been corrected. Minneapolis council members pledge thoughtful police revamp Monuments and statues are falling. But what comes next? Ramsey County Attorney's Office named pilot site for national program aimed at reducing racial disparities in criminal justice system Officer Chauvin to George Floyd: 'It takes ... a lot of oxygen to talk' Three non-profits create fund for minority-owned businesses in Twin Cities

Graphic

Derek Chauvin.(Hennepin County Sheriff via AP)

Officer charged in Floyd's death held on $1 million bail

Load-Date: July 9, 2020

End of Document

When protesters cry 'defund the police,' what does it mean?

ARTICLE CDXXXI. WHEN PROTESTERS CRY 'DEFUND THE POLICE,' WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 8, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1032 words

Byline: Michael Balsamo

Highlight: Protesters are pushing to "defund the police" over the death of George Floyd and other black Americans killed by law enforcement. Their chant has become a rallying cry - and a stick for President Donald Trump to use on Democrats as he portrays them as soft on crime. But what does "defund the police" mean? [...]

Body

Protesters are pushing to "defund the police" over the death of George Floyd and other black Americans killed by law enforcement. Their chant has become a rallying cry - and a stick for President Donald Trump to use on Democrats as he portrays them as soft on crime.

But what does "defund the police" mean? It's not necessarily about gutting police department budgets.

WHAT IS THE "DEFUND THE POLICE" MOVEMENT?

Supporters say it isn't about eliminating police departments or stripping agencies of all of their money. They say it is time for the country to address systemic problems in policing in America and spend more on what communities across the U.S. need, like housing and education.

State and local governments spent $115 billion on policing in 2017, according to data compiled by the Urban Institute.

"Why can't we look at how it is that we reorganize our priorities, so people don't have to be in the streets during a national pandemic?" Black Lives Matter co-founder Alicia Garza asked during an interview on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Activists acknowledge this is a gradual process.

The group MPD150, which says it is "working towards a police-free Minneapolis," argues that such action would be more about "strategically reallocating resources, funding, and responsibility away from police and toward community-based models of safety, support, and prevention."

"The people who respond to crises in our community should be the people who are best-equipped to deal with those crises," the group wrote on its website.

When protesters cry 'defund the police,' what does it mean?

WHAT ARE LAWMAKERS SAYING?

Sen. Cory Booker said he understands the sentiment behind the slogan, but it's not a slogan he will use.

The New Jersey Democrat told NBC's "Meet the Press" that he shares a feeling with many protesters that Americans are "over-policed" and that "we are investing in police, which is not solving problems, but making them worse when we should be, in a more compassionate country, in a more loving country."

Rep. Karen Bass, D-Calif., chairwoman of the Congressional Black Caucus, said part of the movement is really about how money is spent.

"Now, I don't believe that you should disband police departments," she said in an interview with CNN. "But I do think that, in cities, in states, we need to look at how we are spending the resources and invest more in our communities.

"Maybe this is an opportunity to re-envision public safety," she said.

President Donald Trump and his campaign view the emergence of the "Defund the Police" slogan as a spark of opportunity during what has been a trying political moment. Trump's response to the protests has sparked widespread condemnation. But now his supporters say the new mantra may make voters, who may be otherwise sympathetic to the protesters, recoil from a "radical" idea.

Trump ramped up his rhetoric on the issue on Monday, tweeting: "LAW & ORDER, NOT DEFUND AND ABOLISH THE POLICE. The Radical Left Democrats have gone Crazy!"

Trump's 2016 campaign was built on a promise of ensuring law and order - often in contrast to protests against his rhetoric that followed him across the country. As he seeks reelection, Trump is preparing to deploy the same argument again - and seems to believe the "defund the police" call has made the campaign applause line all the more real for his supporters.

IS THERE ANY PUSH TO ACTUALLY DEFUND POLICE DEPARTMENTS?

Yes, or at least to reduce their budgets in some major cities.

In New York City, Mayor Bill de Blasio said Sunday that the city would move funding from the NYPD to youth initiatives and social services, while keeping the city safe, but he didn't give details.

In Los Angeles, Mayor Eric Garcetti vowed to cut as much as $150 million that was part of a planned increase in the police department's budget.

A Minneapolis city councilmember said in a tweet on Thursday that the city would "dramatically rethink how we approach public safety and emergency response."

"We are going to dismantle the Minneapolis Police Department," Jeremiah Ellison wrote. "And when we're done, we're not simply gonna glue it back together." He did not explain what would replace the police department.

A majority of the members of the Minneapolis City Council said Sunday they support disbanding the city's police department. Nine of the council's 12 members appeared with activists at a rally in a city park Sunday afternoon and vowed to end policing as the city currently knows it.

When protesters cry 'defund the police,' what does it mean?

"It is clear that our system of policing is not keeping our communities safe," Lisa Bender, the council president, said. "Our efforts at incremental reform have failed, period."

Disbanding an entire department has happened before. In 2012, with crime rampant in Camden, New Jersey, the city disbanded its police department and replaced it with a new force that covered Camden County. Compton, California, took the same step in 2000, shifting its policing to Los Angeles County.

HOW HAVE POLICE OFFICIALS AND UNIONS RESPONDED?

Generally, police and union officials have long resisted cuts to police budgets, arguing that it would make cities less safe.

The Los Angeles Police Protective League, the union for the city's rank-and-file officers, said budget cuts would be the "quickest way to make our neighborhoods more dangerous."

"Cutting the LAPD budget means longer responses to 911 emergency calls, officers calling for back-up won't get it, and rape, murder and assault investigations won't occur or will take forever to initiate, let alone complete," the union's board said in a statement last week.

"At this time, with violent crime increasing, a global pandemic and nearly a week's worth of violence, arson, and looting, 'defunding' the LAPD is the most irresponsible thing anyone can propose."

—

Associated Press writers Zeke Miller in Washington and Michael R. Sisak in New York contributed to this report.

Minneapolis council members pledge thoughtful police revamp Monuments and statues are falling. But what comes next? Ramsey County one of three sites in nation to pilot program aimed at revamping prosecution to address racial disparities Officer Chauvin to George Floyd: 'It takes ... a lot of oxygen to talk' Three non-profits create fund for minority-owned businesses in Twin Cities

Load-Date: July 9, 2020

ARTICLE CDXXXII. A VOW TO ABOLISH THE MPD

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 8, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1257 wordsByline: LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Nine on council take pledge, acknowledge uncertain path forwardBody

In their boldest statement since George Floyd's killing, nine Minneapolis City Council members told a crowd Sunday that they will "begin the process of ending the Minneapolis Police Department."

"We recognize that we don't have all the answers about what a police-free future looks like, but our community does," they said, reading off a prepared statement. "We're committed to engaging with every willing community member in the City of Minneapolis over the next year to identify what safety looks like for you."

Their words - delivered one day after Mayor Jacob Frey told a crowd of protesters he does not support the full abolishment of the MPD - set off what is likely to be a long, complicated debate about the future of the state's largest police force.

With the world watching, and the city's leaders up for re-election next year, the stakes are particularly high. While Minneapolis has debated the issue in the past, Floyd's death at the hands of Minneapolis police has added a sense of urgency, and the calls for police departments to be disbanded have echoed in other cities around the country.

Council members have noted repeatedly since Floyd's death that Minneapolis has the chance to redefine policing. On a sunny Sunday afternoon, nine of them walked onto a stage at Powderhorn Park to support members of advocacy group Black Visions, who were calling for the end of the MPD. On stage were Council President Lisa Bender, Vice President Andrea Jenkins and Council Members Alondra Cano, Phillippe Cunningham, Jeremiah Ellison, Steve Fletcher, Cam Gordon, Andrew Johnson and Jeremy Schroeder.

"Decades of police reform efforts have proved that the Minneapolis Police Department cannot be reformed and will never be accountable for its actions," they said. "We are here today to begin the process of ending the Minneapolis Police Department and creating a new, transformative model for cultivating safety in Minneapolis."

A vow to abolish the MPD

While some council members have provided hints of what the changes might mean - sending mental health professionals or social workers to respond to certain emergencies, for example - the group did not present a single, unified vision for how they would replace policing in Minneapolis.

Organizers with Black Visions said they too don't have all the answers about what would replace the police department, but they said police can't be reformed through initiatives like training and body cameras. This is the beginning of the process of putting together a "police-free future," they vowed, by investing in more community initiatives like mental health and having community members respond to public safety issues.

"We have never looked to the police for our safety," said Kandace Montgomery, executive director of Black Visions.

The group called the council members' statement "historic" and gave them a standing ovation.

It was a sharp contrast to the reception Frey received the day before, when Black Visions led a protest that ended outside his home. When the protesters reached his home, Frey came outside. The crowd chanted for him to come up to a stage where some had gathered. They asked if he would abolish the police department.

"I do not support the full abolition of the police department," he said.

The crowd jeered. "Go home, Jacob. Go home." As he walked away, they shouted, "Shame. Shame. Shame."

Frey said in an interview Sunday that he supports a "new transformative model" but does not support eliminating the department entirely. "People continue to require service in many forms from our public safety offices, whether in times of domestic violence, or assistance in some of the most dire conditions," he said.

On Friday, Frey and the council approved a tentative agreement with the Minnesota Department of Human Rights that would ban chokeholds, strengthen the requirements for officers to intervene if they see a colleague using inappropriate force and increase public transparency on some officer disciplinary decisions.

The agreement - which still requires a judge's approval - is expected to be the first of many changes to come as the state investigates whether the Minneapolis Police Department engaged in racial discrimination over the past 10 years.

Frey said he would like to see additional changes to the police union contract, which is currently being negotiated, and to the arbitration process that allows some disciplinary decisions to be overturned.

"I have tremendous faith in the police chief, [Medaria] Arradondo, and by channeling all of this anger and energy toward a full restructuring, we can give him, our first black police chief, the opportunity to remake this department in his image," Frey said. "He has my full support. This is an opportunity to do it right."

Others in the city have said they want to make changes to the police department but are not ready to disband it entirely.

A vow to abolish the MPD

Council Member Linea Palmisano watched in Powderhorn Park as her colleagues delivered their statement. "I'm not here to sign a pledge," she said, "I am here to talk about alternatives to policing. I took an oath of office. I pledged to uphold the safety of our city, and by that I mean, everybody in our city, and that means different things to different people."

Signing the pledge, to her, would have meant making "a promise at all costs."

"I think we need to have a lot of discussion before we take the next step here, and I'm really open to that discussion," she said.

Council Members Lisa Goodman and Kevin Reich, who like Palmisano did not participate in the statement calling for the end of the MPD, could not immediately be reached.

After the nine other council members made their joint statement, Jenkins, who did participate, sat by herself on the stage and said she felt conflicted about taking the pledge.

"There are 431,000 people in this city that call this city home," she said. "Everyone has to have a voice in this conversation. This is a very beautiful, very gorgeous crowd out here right now, but this is not the entirety of Minneapolis."

Asked why she took the pledge if she felt conflicted, Jenkins said: "This is the moment. This is the time. Because nothing has worked. We've got to change this. It's possible to be conflicted and know what the right thing to do is."

The effort to defund police departments has gained some momentum. Last week, Los Angeles Mayor Eric Garcetti said the city would look to cut $100 million to $150 million from its nearly $2 billion annual police budget to redirect to black communities. Mayor Bill de Blasio pledged for the first time to cut New York City's police funding following 10 nights of mass protests against police violence and mounting demands that he overhaul a department whose tactics have caused widespread consternation.

The mayor declined to say precisely how much funding he planned to divert to social services from the New York Police Department, which has an annual budget of $6 billion, representing more than 6% of de Blasio's proposed $90 billion budget.

On Sunday, Acting Homeland Security Secretary Chad Wolf said that calls to defund police were a "political statement."

He said that slashing police budgets would harm law enforcement oversight and leadership.

"If you're concerned about the racial injustice, if you're concerned about needing to reform different police departments or law enforcement agencies, you want to make sure that you are giving them the right training," Wolf said.

Staff writers Kelly Smith and Miguel Otárola and the New York Times and Bloomberg News contributed to this report.

Liz Navratil · 612-673-4994

Load-Date: July 2, 2020

A vow to abolish the MPD

End of Document

ARTICLE CDXXXIII.

DIVERSITY STEPS UP IN JUSTICE FIGHT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 8, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1185 wordsByline: MAYA RAO; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

During George Floyd's memorial service, Somali-Americans erected a large portrait of him down the street and offered passersby markers to write messages in his honor. They wore Black Lives Matter shirts and handed out sambusas, or stuffed pastries, to mourners in Elliot Park.

"We're also black, and we go through a lot of the same things that the African-American community goes through: police brutality, just the way people see us," said Fatuma Ahmed, 24, of Minneapolis.

Massive demonstrations following the police killing of Floyd, who was African-American, are unfolding in a far more varied and expansive racial landscape than that of the Minneapolis riots in 1967 during the civil rights movement.

At that time, Minnesota was 98% white, 1% black, and had few foreign-born residents like Ahmed. Now people of color who are not black descendants of slaves are talking about how to show up in the fight for equality, acknowledging in some cases that past battles for civil rights led by African-Americans opened up opportunities for other minority groups.

Among nonwhite people - who now comprise 16% of all Minnesotans - African immigrants and refugees have been the most obvious allies in the Black Lives Matter movement. Though their families arrived here from war-ravaged Somalia in the last few decades rather than on slave ships centuries ago, they say white society in the United States essentially views both groups as the same: black.

But other minority groups are stepping up, too. The family of Fong Lee, a Hmong teenager shot dead by Minneapolis police in 2006, is calling on the Southeast Asian community to unite with African-Americans in fighting police brutality.

And Latino immigrants, who lost many businesses on Lake Street to arson and vandalism, are pledging their support to fighting racial injustice alongside black immigrants as they rebuild.

"We're MINORITIES too," reads a sign outside Mercado Central, a Lake Street market of 35 Latino businesses that saw vandalism and looting. "We aren't against you, we are with you."

DIVERSITY STEPS UP IN JUSTICE FIGHT

State Sen. Patricia Torres Ray, DFL-Minneapolis, issued a call for black and brown unity last week, noting that African-Americans led the way during the civil rights movement and Latinos followed. The Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. and Mexican-American civil rights activist Cesar Chavez had a common goal of unity in the face of oppression, she said.

"As we mourn George Floyd's murder, we must remain united," wrote Torres Ray, who represents the district where Floyd was killed and was the first Latina to serve in the state Senate.

Referring to the city's main Latino and African-American corridors, she added: "As we rebuild our small businesses along Lake Street and in north Minneapolis, we must do so as one."

In 1967, riots protesting racial injustice erupted along Plymouth Avenue on the North Side of Minneapolis. Fires engulfed several blocks; the National Guard was deployed. Uprisings demanding equal rights for black people spread across the U.S. in the late 1960s much as they have now.

The civil rights movement helped pave the way for the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965 that transformed predominantly white America by opening the border to millions of newcomers from Asia, Latin America and Africa. Much of Minnesota's increased ethnic diversity emerged out of resettlement of refugees from Somalia and Laos.

Outside of East Village Grill in Elliot Park, where Somali-Americans posted a display with Floyd's image, Ahmed said that she grew up in America hearing older Somali relatives speaking negatively of African-Americans.

"We're slowly trying to parse that out and dissect that and say that's not OK," Ahmed said.

She noted that her community also was recently affected by police violence. Isak Aden, a Somali-American man, was shot to death last year by Eagan police during a standoff. Dakota County Attorney James Backstrom said police were justified in using deadly force.

"I think just with the amount of Somali people that have come out with the protests, that just shows that solidarity is there," Ahmed said.

Ahmed's husband, Abdi Sheikh, 23, said Somali-Americans face the same racial disparities in the U.S. as African-Americans. "We might be Somali, but at the end of the day, people see us as black," he said.

He said Somali-Americans owe much to African-Americans for the civil rights movement that opened doors for black newcomers. Sheikh's family came here for salvation, he added, "and there's better opportunities in America due to the African-American community, the civil rights movement and all the rights they've been fighting for. It only makes sense to stand in solidarity."

Abdullahi Farah recently went out to Lake Street with other volunteers to distribute donated food and supplies. Though Farah, executive director of Abubakar As-Saddique Islamic Center, was born in Somalia, he said that any black person in the U.S. is considered African-American.

"The Somali community, we are hurting, we are in pain," he said of Floyd's death.

State Rep. Jay Xiong, DFL-St. Paul, said in an e-mail that there is anti-blackness in the Asian community that has to be confronted and worked on. And there's complexity as "we find ourselves searching for our souls now," he said, because one of the three officers charged with aiding and abetting Floyd's killing, Tou Thao, is Hmong.

DIVERSITY STEPS UP IN JUSTICE FIGHT

"It is important for our community to stand with black communities - our values and our missions are bound together," said Xiong. "Hmong-Americans today owe much of their own freedoms to the black people who were enslaved on this continent."

The family of Fong Lee has been urging fellow Hmong citizens to support the black community just as African-Americans supported them when police killed the 19-year-old man. The white officer who shot Lee remained on the job in Minneapolis after a jury ruled he did not use excessive force.

As the Lee family demanded answers, they had supporters from the black, Native American and Latino communities "to help us voice our concerns and our fight for justice for our son's death," said Fong's father, Nou Kai Lee, in remarks interpreted from Hmong by activist Tou Ger Xiong during a Facebook Live discussion Thursday.

"And so this is important because now George Floyd's family is going through the same thing we went through," he said, "and we need to come together to support them to find justice because we are in this together."

"What does George Floyd have to do with Fong Lee?" asked Pakou Hang, chief program officer at VoteRunLead, a nonprofit that trains women to run for political office. "It's the collective anguish and injustice of our people without any type of accountability by police officers."

Hang, who lives a few blocks from the site of Floyd's death, said the toxic nature of police culture is embedded in white supremacy. Until that's untangled, she maintained, police will kill racial minorities without repudiation.

"White culture and white supremacy does not value people of color's lives, and you see that just with the pattern of people being killed over and over," she said.

Maya Rao · 612-673-4210

Load-Date: July 2, 2020

THE DEATH OF GEORGE FLOYD

ARTICLE CDXXXIV.

THE DEATH OF GEORGE FLOYD

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 8, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 11ALength: 705 wordsByline: STEPHEN GREGO, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Prosecution of the four officers won't be easy // Here, I offer some of the main legal challenges.Body

Minnesota Attorney General Keith Ellison and his office will face some unique challenges in seeking convictions of four former Minneapolis police officers charged in the Memorial Day death of George Floyd. As the attorney general himself noted last week, convicting police officers of murder is no easy task.

Former officer Derek Chauvin is charged with second-degree and third-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter. Three other former officers have each been charged with aiding and abetting second-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter.

Here are some specific challenges prosecutors may face:

First, as noted in "Does Derek Chauvin have a chance at a fair trial?" (June 1), inflammatory statements from elected officials may have created substantial pretrial prejudice. This pretrial publicity almost assures that Chauvin's trial will occur outside Hennepin County, which in turn could decrease minority juror representation.

Second, causation will likely play a key role at Chauvin's trial. In Minnesota homicide cases, the state must prove that a defendant's actions played "a substantial causal factor" in causing the victim's death. All three charged crimes against Chauvin require proof of causation. Competing autopsies from the medical examiner and doctors hired by the Floyd family further complicate this issue.

No doubt Chauvin's defense will highlight the Hennepin County medical examiner's findings of "fentanyl intoxication" and "recent methamphetamine use" to argue that Chauvin's actions did not cause Floyd's death.

Third, the new unintentional second-degree murder charge against Chauvin requires the prosecution to prove that he caused Floyd's death while committing an underlying felony. Here, the underlying felony alleged is third-degree assault, meaning that if Chauvin intended to assault Floyd and committed substantial bodily harm, he may be found guilty of felony murder.

THE DEATH OF GEORGE FLOYD

Importantly, the state does not need to show that Chauvin intended to cause Floyd's death. Yet it is important to remember that Minnesota law gives police officers broad discretion to use force when arresting a suspect.

Fourth, the aiding and abetting charges against the other three former officers present a significant obstacle. To secure a conviction for aiding and abetting (also called accomplice liability), prosecutors will have to show both that: 1) These other officers knew Chauvin would commit a crime and 2) that they intended their presence or actions at the scene to further his commission of that crime.

Based on the so far limited publicly available evidence, this standard seems difficult to surpass because we have no direct proof of what the other three officers knew while Chauvin knelt on Floyd's neck for about nine minutes. Instead, we must infer their knowledge and intent.

A key issue could be one officer's observation that Floyd lost a pulse followed by Chauvin's decision to continue applying pressure to Floyd's neck without intervention or objection from the other officers.

Lastly, it is important to highlight that Chauvin is charged both with second-and third-degree murder. Third-degree murder is a unique crime in Minnesota, normally involving situations where a defendant acts with a "depraved mind," a phrase equivalent to recklessness, without regard for a particular person. In fact, it is an open question in Minnesota whether a defendant can have a "depraved mind" and direct his or her actions toward a specific person, as Chauvin undoubtedly did here.

Former officer Mohamed Noor is currently raising this issue before the court of appeals after being convicted of the same charge last year in the shooting death of Justine Damond.

In short, Ellison and his prosecutors face a tough test. These cases will likely meander for many months before trials occur. In the end, a jury or judge will weigh the parties' evidence and arguments and decide whether the state has proved the charged offenses beyond a reasonable doubt.

The public should recognize that despite the seemingly clear video evidence, convictions for any of these former officers will not come easily.

Stephen Grego, of Mendota Heights, is a lawyer who works as a judicial law clerk. The views expressed here are solely his own.

Load-Date: July 2, 2020

ARTICLE CDXXXV. JAMES BENNET RESIGNS AS NEW YORK TIMES OPINION EDITOR

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 8, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1208 wordsByline: Marc TracyHighlight: James Bennet resigned on Sunday from his job as the editorial page editor of The New York Times, days after the newspaper's opinion section, which he oversaw, published a much-criticized op-ed by a U.S. senator calling for a military response to civic unrest in American cities. "Last week we saw a significant breakdown in our [...]"Body

James Bennet resigned on Sunday from his job as the editorial page editor of The New York Times, days after the newspaper's opinion section, which he oversaw, published a much-criticized op-ed by a U.S. senator calling for a military response to civic unrest in American cities.

"Last week we saw a significant breakdown in our editing processes, not the first we've experienced in recent years," said A.G. Sulzberger, the publisher, in a note to the staff on Sunday announcing Bennet's departure.

In a brief interview, Sulzberger added: "Both of us concluded that James would not be able to lead the team through the next leg of change that is required."

At an all-staff virtual meeting on Friday, Bennet, 54, apologized for the op-ed, saying that it should not have been published and that it had not been edited carefully enough. posted late Friday noted factual inaccuracies and a "needlessly harsh" tone. "The essay fell short of our standards and should not have been published," the note said.

The op-ed, by Sen. Tom Cotton, R-Ark., had "" as its headline. "One thing above all else will restore order to our streets: an overwhelming show of force to disperse, detain and ultimately deter lawbreakers," he wrote. The piece, published on Wednesday, drew anger from readers and Times journalists. Bennet declined to comment.

Bennet's swift fall from one of the most powerful positions in American journalism comes as hundreds of thousands of people have marched in recent weeks in protest of racism in law enforcement and society. The protests were set in motion when George Floyd, a black man in Minneapolis, died last month after being handcuffed and pinned to the ground by a white police officer's knee.

James Bennet resigns as New York Times opinion editor

The foment has reached other newsrooms. On Saturday night, Stan Wischnowski resigned An editors' note Send In the Troops as top editor of The Philadelphia Inquirer days after an article in the newspaper about the effects of protests on the urban landscape carried the headline "Buildings Matter, Too." The headline prompted an apology published in The Inquirer, a heated staff meeting and a "sickout" by dozens of journalists at the paper.

Bennet's tenure as editorial page editor, which started in 2016, was marked by several missteps. Last spring, the Times apologized for an anti-Semitic cartoon that appeared in the Opinion pages of its international edition.

Last August, a federal appellate court found that Sarah Palin, the former vice-presidential candidate, could proceed with a defamation lawsuit against The Times over an editorial edited by Bennet that inaccurately linked her statements to the 2011 shooting of a congresswoman.

During Bennet's first year on the job, two Times national security reporters publicly objected to an op-ed by the journalist Louise Mensch, who cited her own reporting on U.S. law enforcement's purported monitoring of the Trump presidential campaign. Times reporters who had covered the same story, along with reporters at other outlets, were skeptical of her claim.

Bennet worked and held key jobs in the Times newsroom from 1991 until 2006, when he left the newspaper to become the editor of The Atlantic. Since his return, he had widely been considered a possible successor to Dean Baquet, who has been in charge of the newsroom for six years.

In his four years as editorial page editor, Bennet sought to expand Opinion's range, making it more responsive to breaking news and better positioned to cover the tech industry. While he hired several progressive columnists and contributors, he also added conservative voices to the traditionally liberal department.

He reduced the number of unsigned editorials and encouraged editorial board members to write more signed opinion pieces; one editorial board member, Brent Staples, won the Pulitzer Prize for editorial writing last year for a series of opinion columns on race in America.

Under Bennet, the opinion section also published investigative journalism, developed newsletters and a podcast. It also published a much-discussed op-ed by an anonymous Trump administration official who described a "quiet resistance" within the federal government.

The most prominent conservative columnist hired by Bennet, Bret Stephens, angered many readers with his inaugural Times column, in which he chastised the "moral superiority" of those who look down on climate-change skeptics. Late last year, Stephens published another column, headlined "The Secrets of Jewish Genius," that led to widespread criticism. to remove a reference to a study cited in the original version after it was revealed that one of the study's authors had promoted racist views.

Bennet is the brother of Michael Bennet, a U.S. senator from Colorado, and he recused himself from presidential campaign coverage during his brother's unsuccessful run for this year's Democratic nomination.

, a deputy editorial page editor, will be the acting editorial page editor through the November election, Sulzberger said in his memo to the staff. Jim Dao After a review, the editors appended a note to the

James Bennet resigns as New York Times opinion editor

column and reedited it Katie Kingsbury, the deputy editorial page editor who oversees op-eds, is stepping down from his position, which was on the Times masthead, and taking a new job in the newsroom. Baquet, the executive editor, said Sunday that he and Dao had just started discussing possible jobs for Dao. Dao did not reply to a request for comment.

Kingsbury, 41, was hired in 2017. Previously she was on The Boston Globe's editorial board, and edited another Pulitzer-winning series.

In a note to the Opinion staff Sunday, Kingsbury, who declined to comment for this article, said that until a more "technical solution" is in place, anyone who sees "any piece of Opinion journalism - including headlines or social posts or photos or you name it - that gives you the slightest pause, please call or text me immediately."

Cotton's op-ed prompted criticism on social media from many Times employees from different departments, an online protest that was led by African-American staff members. Much of the dissent included tweets that said the op-ed "puts Black @NYTimes staff in danger." Times employees objected despite a company policy instructing them not to post partisan comments on social media or take sides on issues in public forums.

In addition, more than 800 staff members had signed a letter by Thursday evening protesting the op-ed's publication. The letter, addressed to high-ranking editors in the opinion and news divisions, as well as New York Times Co. executives, argued that Cotton's essay contained misinformation, such as his depiction of the role of "antifa" in the protests.

Sulzberger said at the Friday town hall meeting and in his note on Sunday that a rethinking of Opinion was necessary for an era in which readers are likely to come upon op-eds in social media posts, divorced from their print context next to the editorial page.

Window into virus surge: Death, recovery at Houston hospital where she won a Pulitzer for editorial writing Monuments and statues are falling. But what comes next? U.S. hiring soared in May as mass layoffs eased America disrupted: Troubles cleave a nation, and a city Virus in Florida: Hospitals near capacity as Miami closes eateries

Graphic

James Bennet, the editorial page editor of The New York Times, top center, looks on as Katie Kingsbury, a deputy editorial page editor, addresses the newsroom during announcement of a Pulitzer Prize for Editorial Writing for Brent Staples (not in photo), on April 15, 2019, in New York. AG Sulzberger, the publisher of the New York Times, announced on June 7, 2020, that Bennet had resigned and Kingsbury would be the acting editorial page editor through the November election. At left is Dean Baquet, executive editor of the Times. (Hiroko Masuike/The New York Times)

James Bennet resigns as New York Times opinion editor

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDXXXVI.

ARTS GROUPS REGROUP AFTER RIOTING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 8, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 681 wordsByline: ALICIA ELER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Juxtaposition Arts, the Somali Museum and Hmong Cultural Center all suffered damages.Body

The art wasn't burned, but several arts organizations, including three run by people of color, are recovering from looting and vandalism following the death of George Floyd in police custody.

The Hmong Cultural Center in St. Paul, Juxtaposition Arts in north Minneapolis and the Somali Museum of Minnesota in Minneapolis are among more than 360 Twin Cities businesses that were ransacked or damaged.

At Juxtaposition Arts, aka JXTA, a community watch guarded its VALT Space and Artist Co-op at 1108 W. Broadway the night of May 28 until 2:30 a.m. After warding off unwelcome visitors, they retired for the night. According to security camera footage, a dozen young people broke into the space about 30 minutes later.

JXTA's chief cultural producer, Roger Cummings, estimates the damage to be less than $10,000, including broken windows and the theft of three desktop and two laptop computers.

"They didn't take any art," he said. "It was probably worth more than those computers."

Three or four looters also tried to damage JXTA's gallery and shop at 2007 Emerson Av. N., but North Side organizer Roxxanne O'Brien stopped them from throwing a brick through the window, Cummings said.

JXTA, which owns three buildings on the North Side, is using its donation page to replace the stolen goods and to fund community policing from sunset to sunrise through the summer.

At least 17 North Side businesses have been damaged, most of them on W. Broadway. There are already street patrols there, banding together to guard the neighborhood's remaining grocery store, So Low Grocery Outlet.

Arts groups regroup after rioting

"We are looking at community policing models," said Cummings. "People stand outside, and when it becomes nighttime, they'll make sure everybody is OK at [JXTA's] skate park, the four corners, back of the buildings."

What struck Cummings was that the youths who looted JXTA could've been employed there. The organization is an incubator for artists aged 12 to 21, building skills that are both empowering and entrepreneurial, and offering the opportunity to work with professional artists. Since its founding, JXTA has helped 3,000 children and young adults through its training programs. Currently it employs 77 young people a year.

"If they register for the summer, they could buy their own computer," he said. "We could provide them with jobs and purpose and place."

The Hmong Cultural Center, at 375 University Av. W., also was damaged on the night of May 28. Vandals broke windows on the side and back of the building.

"We were specifically concerned about the one in the back because people could've come in," said Mark Pfeifer, director of programs. The next morning, the center's staff boarded up the windows and moved key artifacts to staffers' homes.

Pfeifer was unsure about the financial damage, but "it could've been a lot worse." Closed since the coronavirus pandemic started, the Hmong Center had planned to reopen soon, but now things are up in the air.

The Somali Museum of Minnesota, at 1516 E. Lake St., holds more than 700 objects, and is a hub for education on Somali culture. The museum did not respond to a request for comment, but according to its GoFundMe page, some artifacts were lost, and others in the gift shop were damaged. The museum has raised more than $28,000 toward repairs, and has moved most of its objects to secure storage.

"We empathize with the anger and the pain of our community," said a statement on the museum's GoFundMe. "The unjust killings of our black brothers and sisters has to end. We pray that everyone stays safe during this time, we pray that Allah protects the protesters fighting for justice."

St. Paul nonprofit Springboard for the Arts also experienced fire and property damage on May 28. Executive Director Laura Zabel declined to elaborate, saying only that "the Springboard building will be OK," and emphasizing that people are more important than property.

"We want the focus to be on justice for George Floyd and the many organizers who are demanding an end to the white supremacy and racism that is baked into our systems and our city."

612-673-4437 · @AliciaEler

Load-Date: June 8, 2020

Larry Fitzgerald Jr.: This is not the Minneapolis of my youth

ARTICLE CDXXXVII.

LARRY FITZGERALD JR.: THIS IS NOT THE MINNEAPOLIS OF MY YOUTH

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 8, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1375 words

Byline: Larry Fitzgerald Jr.

Highlight: For as long as I have known it, Minneapolis has been a city of peace, family and contentment. But not right now.

Body

Editor's note: Larry Fitzgerald Jr., the Arizona Cardinals star wide receiver, wrote this on June 7, 2020, about the present-day unrest and recalls a more peaceful time in his hometown of Minneapolis.

The city of Minneapolis taught me about love.

I was baptized at New Beginnings Baptist Tabernacle Church, learned to catch a football at Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. Park, and instilled with values by a loving family and a supportive community.

My mother and father raised us in this beautiful city full of life and diversity. Minneapolis is home to diverse people from all over the world: Somali and Ethiopian refugees forging new lives, Hmong families building successful businesses, and a thriving arts community that attracts talented performers from around the globe.

What you're seeing on the news is not the hometown of my youth. The businesses you see ablaze used to receive the Minnesota Spokesman-Recorder, , on their front steps. He's been a journalist in the city for over 40 years. The streets you see in chaos now are the same streets I walked with my mother as she taught me about being active in the community. We would spend hours downtown and in nearby neighborhoods passing out educational materials on family planning and healthy lifestyles. Those same neighborhoods have literally been on fire the last few days - fires that in some ways symbolize decades of disappointment, anger and frustration.

For as long as I have known it, Minneapolis has been a city of peace, family and contentment.

But not right now.

The events of the last several days have turned Minneapolis, and our nation, upside down. Injustice, death, destruction, pain, violence, protests and riots have made it clear: We as a nation are not OK. We are not healthy. The violent death of George Floyd in police custody is yet another example of a systemic problem we have yet to solve. A cancer we are failing to cut out. People and communities are suffering, lives are being lost, and futures are being destroyed.

Larry Fitzgerald Jr.: This is not the Minneapolis of my youth

Growing up, I never personally experienced harassment from the police, but I knew there were issues, and I saw situations where people of color were not given the same benefit of the doubt and the same respect that was afforded to others.

When will this terrible cycle end? When will love and respect for our fellow man replace hatred and injustice? When will healing come?

Sadly, this is not new territory for our America. The words of Martin Luther King Jr. resonate as clearly today as when he first uttered them in a speech titled "The Other America," given over 50 years ago:

"So I will continue to condemn riots and continue to say to my brothers and sisters that this is not the way. And continue to affirm that there is another way.

"But at the same time, it is as necessary for me to be as vigorous in condemning the conditions which cause persons to feel that they must engage in riotous activities as it is for me to condemn riots.

"I think America must see that riots do not develop out of thin air. Certain conditions continue to exist in our society which must be condemned as vigorously as we condemn riots. But in the final analysis, a riot is the language of the unheard. ...

"And so in a real sense our nation's summers of riots are caused by our nation's winters of delay. And as long as America postpones justice, we stand in the position of having these recurrences of violence and riots over and over again."

We are not listening to one another. Our winter of delay continues to result in cold hearts and lifeless bodies. The language of the unheard has broken the silence, and our willful deafness has led to death and destruction. While our nation has struggled under the weight of a biological pandemic, we also find our communities ravaged by the insidious disease of injustice.

People of color across this nation are screaming to be heard.

Stop killing our sons and daughters. Stop terrorizing our communities. Give us justice. When those screams fall on deaf ears, the pain of being unheard bears down on your soul. Have you ever been frustrated at being in an intimate relationship where you feel your concern is unheard and disregarded? When you try to communicate, but your voice does not get through? In those moments, the wounds of disrespect can lead us to raise our voices and behave in less-than-civil ways. Our intrinsic need to be understood intensifies our reactions. Our desperation to be heard can override our better judgment.

The screams of disrespected voices are ringing out in our nation right now. We must never condone violent riots that take lives and destroy futures, but we must also hear the desperate voice of protest that is calling out for justice.

Imagine the desperation of the family of George Floyd and countless other people of color who have suffered injustice in communities across America. Can you hear them? Will their pain and their voices continue to go unheard? Leaders, elected officials, influencers and people in power must listen. We must refuse to allow the screams of the unheard to be disregarded. We must act. Good people may find themselves a part of a broken system but must take it upon themselves to bring about the needed change. If you are silent and passive, you are complicit in upholding the status quo.

Larry Fitzgerald Jr.: This is not the Minneapolis of my youth

Systemic injustice births desperation, and desperation rarely leads to a healthy outcome.

But even in the midst of the current tragedy, I'm hopeful. We have a tremendous opportunity to ensure that all voices are heard. People of color are asking for radical, meaningful change that eliminates injustice in the legal system, roots out systemic racism in American society, and where authority protects rather than threatens.

There are other voices that deserve to be heard as well. Monologues rarely result in understanding. No matter your color, you have a unique experience that deserves respect. Your perspective matters and can make us better.

I appreciate many of my colleagues in professional sports who have issued heartfelt statements and shown themselves to be true allies to people of color as we appeal for a better America. They deserve to be heard.

There are many men and women in law enforcement who have spoken out against the injustice George Floyd suffered. They have an extremely difficult job that has been made all the more challenging by this tragedy. They deserve to be heard. The unthinkable acts of some do not require that we paint the whole with broad brush strokes of hatred.

There are tens of millions of Americans from every race, religion, background and socioeconomic status that are trying to listen to one another and effectuate change, trying to imagine what it's like to be George Floyd or Ahmaud Arbery or the people who love them, trying to imagine what it's like to be a business owner who has lost everything to rioters over the last few days, trying to imagine what it's like to see through their neighbor's eyes and live in their skin color.

We must work together to heal this divide and rebuild our communities by committing to let no voice go unheard. Our first step must be to listen to one another - to sincerely lean in and hear what the person who is different from us is saying.

George Floyd, in your final gasps for breath, we hear you.

Ahmaud Arbery, as your footsteps pounded the ground, running for your life, we hear you.

Victims of violence, poverty and injustice, we hear you.

Communities and lives torn apart by riots, we hear you.

People of privilege learning a better way, we hear you.

Mothers and fathers of every race doing the best you can to teach your children to love and not hate, we hear you.

May God give us all ears to hear so that the cries of the unheard are never again compelled to scream in desperation.

Ramsey County one of three sites in nation to pilot program aimed at revamping prosecution to address racial disparities essay for the New York Times the newspaper my father writes for 1 officer charged in George Floyd death seeks case dismissal Three non-profits create fund for minority-owned businesses in

Larry Fitzgerald Jr.: This is not the Minneapolis of my youth

Twin Cities Correctional officers of color who say they were segregated from Derek Chauvin: Why isn't Ramsey Co. jail superintendent on leave? America disrupted: Troubles cleave a nation, and a city

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDXXXVIII.

GOOD SIGNS ON PANDEMIC FRONT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 8, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 7ALength: 875 wordsByline: JOE CARLSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Testing rises, new cases fall as state enters a new round of reopeningsBody

The growth rate of newly diagnosed cases of COVID-19 is slowing in Minnesota, even as the number of tests to detect the viral respiratory illness continues to climb, the latest data showed Sunday.

The moderating trends are happening as the state prepares for its latest round of loosening restrictions on businesses and public places.

An executive order from Gov. Tim Walz will allow limited reopenings of dine-in restaurants, gyms and smaller entertainment venues on Wednesday, if the businesses take steps to control the spread of the virus.

"As we face the likelihood of many more months of this disease spreading at various levels in our communities, we must find a way to live with it — accepting a certain level of risk while taking steps to prevent a wave of cases overwhelming our health care sector," Minnesota Health Commissioner Jan Malcolm said in Friday's announcement of the changes.

On Sunday, the Minnesota Department of Health added 388 people to its overall tally of confirmed COVID-19 cases, the second-lowest daily total since April 28.

The growth rate of new cases has been slowing for two weeks. Using rolling averages to smooth out daily fluctuations, the daily increase in confirmed case counts has been declining on both a seven-day and a 14-day basis since hitting a high-water mark of about 700 new cases on May 24.

Delays in the system for reporting new confirmed cases make it difficult to precisely track trends over the prior week, but state health officials acknowledged over the weekend that the growth rate of new cases may have plateaued.

Change is also evident in the number of people getting intensive and regular levels of COVID-19 care in hospitals.

Good signs on pandemic front

On Sunday, there were 199 people in hospital intensive-care units being treated for COVID-19, the lowest total since May 13. An additional 251 people were getting care in regular hospital beds Sunday, the lowest since May 10.

Of the 1.9 million cases of COVID-19 that have been diagnosed nationally, 27,886 have been in Minnesota, including nearly 3,000 health care workers. About 23,000 Minnesotans have recovered from their symptoms and no longer need to remain in isolation, according to the Health Department.

Of the 16 new Minnesota fatalities reported Sunday, 14 of the people lived in long-term care, assisted living, or group homes for behavioral health. All of the new deaths except one in Hennepin County were people who were at least 60 years old.

The average rate of newly reported deaths has been relatively steady for weeks - the seven-day average has floated between 20 and 25 since May 20.

All told, 1,186 Minnesotans have died with confirmed cases of the illness. More than 90% of those were 60 or older, according to a Star Tribune analysis of the state data.

People at higher risk for severe cases include the elderly and people in group-living facilities, where social distancing and pandemic hygiene are difficult. Underlying health factors contribute to higher risks, including lung disease, moderate to severe asthma, serious heart conditions, immunocompromise, obesity with BMI over 40, diabetes, liver disease, and chronic kidney disease requiring dialysis.

The virus that causes COVID-19 makes some people very ill, while some feel no physical effects at all.

Around 80% of people who get the virus experience mild to no symptoms, while as many as 5% require critical care in a hospital.

Common mild symptoms include fever, body aches, cough, fatigue, chills and loss of smell, though some people have more significant symptoms like a high fever, severe coughing or shortness of breath that may indicate pneumonia.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention says emergency medical attention should be sought for people who have trouble breathing, persistent pain or pressure in the chest, new onset of confusion, inability to wake or stay awake, or "bluish" lips or face. Symptoms generally appear within five days of exposure but can take up to 14.

Monday marks the 14th day since the death of George Floyd, a black man who died after a white Minneapolis police officer, Derek Chauvin, knelt on his neck for more than eight minutes.

Outrage stemming from Floyd's death brought thousands of people to the streets to protest and demonstrate, causing public health officials to urge everyone who protested in Minnesota to get tested for COVID-19.

June 3 saw the highest number of test results for COVID-19 reported in a single day, with more than 15,000 tests performed by private labs.

Totals from the current week are subject to change, and some people in the state have been tested more than once.

Good signs on pandemic front

Saturday marked the fourth consecutive day of more than 10,000 test results being reported.

Joe Carlson · 612-673-4779

TRACKING CORONAVIRUS

Minnesota cases, daily change*

27,886 -- Total cases

388 -- June 7 new cases

*Chart data is a net count of new confirmed cases minus previously announced cases that were removed by MDH on that date.

Minnesota deaths, new daily

1,186 -- Total deaths

16 -- June 7

U.S. cases, new daily

1,934,201 -- Total cases

22,478 -- June 6

U.S. deaths, new daily

110,032 -- Total deaths

728 -- June 6

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete charts.)

Sources: New York Times, Minnesota Dept. of Health

Note: U.S. data lags a day behind Minnesota

Load-Date: July 2, 2020

St. Paul man wore stolen police gear after helping to torch 3rd Precinct, charges say

ARTICLE CDXXXIX. ST. PAUL MAN WORE STOLEN POLICE GEAR AFTER HELPING TO TORCH 3RD PRECINCT, CHARGES SAY

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 8, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 388 words

Byline: Sarah Horner

Highlight: He was fired June 3 from his security job at Menards on University Avenue after the store learned of social media reports that identified him as a participant in the May 28 rioting.

Body

A St. Paul security guard was wearing stolen police gear when he was arrested Wednesday, six days after he's accused of helping to burn down the Minneapolis Police Department's 3rd Precinct during riots following the death of George Floyd.

Branden Michael Wolfe, 23, was fired June 3 from his security job at Menards on University Avenue after the store learned of social media reports that identified him as a participant in the May 28 rioting.

A Menards employee called police after Wolfe tried to enter the store later that day wearing stolen body armor and a law enforcement duty belt and carrying a police baton, according to a complaint filed Monday in U.S. District Court.

St. Paul police found him in a vehicle several miles from the store, still wearing the body armor and duty belt, which was affixed with handcuffs, a baton, a knife and an ear piece. His name was handwritten on duct tape attached to the back of the body armor, according to the complaint.

In a police interview, Wolfe admitted he stoked the 3rd Precinct fire by pushing a wooden barrel into the flames.

He also reportedly admitted to stealing several items from inside and identified himself in multiple photographs that showed a man standing in front of the East Lake Street precinct holding a police baton as the building burned behind him.

Police searched Wolfe's St. Paul apartment and found several items belonging to Minneapolis police, including a riot helmet, 9 mm magazine, police radio and police drug overdose kit, charges say.

Wolfe was charged in federal court Monday with aiding and abetting arson.

Anyone with information about the 3rd Precinct fire or business fires in the Twin Cities can call 1-888-ATF-TIPS, email ATFTips@atf.gov or submit information anonymously via ReportIt.com.

St. Paul man wore stolen police gear after helping to torch 3rd Precinct, charges say

The FBI also is looking for people who "may have incited or promoted violence of any kind." Anyone with digital material or tips can call 1-800-CALLFBI or submit images or videos at FBI.gov/violence.

Man shot on Tuesday night in South Minneapolis dies on Wednesday Minneapolis council members pledge thoughtful police revamp After complaints about 'chaos, disorder' at St. Paul's Mears Park, police arrest/cite 10 Man charged with fatally shooting pregnant woman at George Floyd Memorial 1 killed, at least 5 others wounded in Minneapolis shootings

Graphic

Branden Michael Wolfe.(Courtesy of the Hennepin County Sheriff's Office)

Load-Date: July 9, 2020

End of Document

Street art honored George Floyd. Now advocates want to preserve it for history.

ARTICLE CDXL. STREET ART HONORED GEORGE FLOYD. NOW ADVOCATES WANT TO PRESERVE IT FOR HISTORY.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 8, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1073 words

Byline: Kristi Belcamino

Highlight: Across the country, murals and other street art have become a symbol of those protesting the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police - and now people are trying to document and preserve these art pieces for posterity as symbols of change. One of the most recognizable murals towers above the crowds [...]

Body

Across the country, murals and other street art have become a symbol of those protesting the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police - and now people are trying to document and preserve these art pieces for posterity as symbols of change.

One of the most recognizable murals towers above the crowds in Minneapolis at East 38th Street and Chicago Avenue South - the corner where Floyd died. It was created by North Minneapolis artist Peyton Scott Russell, who said he grew up on that corner and later moved to the North Side.

That 12-foot-by-12-foot black-and-white mural of Floyd's face was one of two Russell painted in a Casket Arts Building art studio in Northeast Minneapolis, Russell said in a video interview with North News. The murals took him three days to complete, he said. The second nearly identical one is at 1930 Glenwood Ave. N.

In the interview, Russell said when he first heard of Floyd's death, he wanted to participate in the outcry against it.

"I wanted to actually participate in a pretty brutal way," Russell told North News. But then he said that because he has two children and didn't want to jeopardize their health and safety, he took another avenue.

"My creative, artistic tools are the best way I can fight," he said. "I'm a graffiti artist, street artist, and for something like this it's just my most powerful tool to use so I decided to do something pretty large and place it ... sort of (in) a guerrilla format so it has a really high impact."

Pictures of the image have been shared around the world.

Street art honored George Floyd. Now advocates want to preserve it for history.

When asked about the importance and significance of the murals, Russell said he hoped the image of Floyd would "hopefully create the start of some real change - to have a visual that will continue to remind people that something really has to happen."

Nearby - on the wall of the Cup Foods - a predominantly yellow and blue mural with an image of Floyd surrounded by his name, has also been shared around the world and turned into a memorial site laden with flowers and signs.

Three artists, Xena Goldman, Greta McLain, and Cadex Herrera, said they painted the mural to give the community a place to mourn.

"Hopefully, it's a reminder that this should never happen again, and people need to step up in every way that they can to stand up against these corrupt systems," Goldman said in a KARE-TV interview.

"We feel so helpless by the life that was taken away from us, and a system that feels so big, and scary, and out of our control," McLain said.

With so many murals and art pieces appearing around the world, efforts are being made to document and preserve them by several organizations, including the University of St. Thomas.

The Urban Art Mapping Project at St. Thomas is asking for people to take pictures of any street art honoring George Floyd or promoting anti-racism so it can preserve the photos in its database.

"From the smallest sticker or tag to the largest mural or street painting - if you see a George Floyd memorial or Anti-racist street art, take a pic and use this google form to upload it."

The project participants ask people to photograph all the street art they see, including "murals, written text on walls, stickers, graffiti, projections, posters, and more," saying the art "represents a powerful call for change."

They're seeking images from around the world so their database "will serve as repository for images and a future resource for scholars and artists."

Urban Mapping Group is also asking those who take down any plywood with street art on it to contact their group so it can be preserved.

Another group, Preserve Minneapolis, is seeking images of street art honoring Floyd that it will "layer" on a virtual map of historic Minnesota sites.

A "public, online exhibition of this outpouring of street art as a way of showing solidarity," the group said in an Instagram post.

"We want this to be a way to preserve and share these signs of community with those within and beyond our city," they wrote. "And help us all better understand how we related to each other and our built environment."

"Send a picture of a work of street art from your neighborhood (+ the address where it was taken) to: rcoffman@preserveminneapolis.org."

Street art honored George Floyd. Now advocates want to preserve it for history.

#blacklivesmatters #blm #justiceforgeorgefloyd #minneapolis #history #heritage #urbandesign #mappingchange #artforchange #streetart #muralart #preserveminneapolis #minneapolisishistorical #uptown #downtown #welovelakestreet #longfellow #nearnorth #northeast #northminneapolis #southminneapolis #calhounisles #camden #central #nokomis #phillips #powderhorn #southwest #university

A post shared by PreserveMinneapolis (@preserveminneapolis) on Jun 5, 2020 at 10:28am PDT

On Sunday, Springboard for the Arts, hosted an event where black artists painted murals with messages of "solidarity, anger, solace and hope" on plywood along University Avenue between Rice and Dale streets in St. Paul.

The event included artists such as Alex Smith, Aurum Oro, Canaan Ray-Strong, Geno Okok, Myc Daz, Noval Noir, Seitu Jones, Tony Johnson and Ta-Coumba Aiken.

One of the artists, Seitu Jones, made a stencil to memorialize George Floyd. The stencil and instructions are available for free at seitujonesstudio.com/blues4george/

A call for artists. #StPaul

- Mary Divine (@MaryEDivine)

While some of the art is the result of organized efforts (such as that of the Springboard for the Arts and the Uptown Association, which organized pic.twitter.com/sbZVNgeGJD June 6, 2020 some murals on plywood boarding businesses in the Uptown area), other displays have simply emerged as a natural symbol of protest, such as the art and signs being hung on the fence surrounding the White House.

The fence outside the White House has been converted to a crowd-sourced memorial wall - almost like an art gallery - to black men and women who lost their lives at the hands of police.

Hundreds are strolling, looking, adding names and paintings and posters. pic.twitter.com/mXlZpfMAeX

- Hannah Natanson (@hannah_natanson) June 7, 2020

Ramsey County one of three sites in nation to pilot program aimed at revamping prosecution to address racial disparities 1 officer charged in George Floyd death seeks case dismissal Three non-profits create fund for minority-owned businesses in Twin Cities Correctional officers of color who say they were segregated from Derek Chauvin: Why isn't Ramsey Co. jail superintendent on leave? America disrupted: Troubles cleave a nation, and a city

Graphic

(Dave Schwarz/St. Cloud Times via AP)

Picardo Perez, right, and Sebastian Rivera paint a mural in honor of George Floyd on the side of a law firm on East Lake Street, Minneapolis, June 4, 2020. The prickly pear cactus known as nopal in Mexico and Texas (Floyd was from Houston) are mixed with local flowers like black-eyed susans, as a tribute to the artists' roots and local Minnesota culture. The mural also depicts fires burning at night and calm in the day. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

Street art honored George Floyd. Now advocates want to preserve it for history.

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDXLI. MOURNERS GATHER TO BEAR WITNESS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 8, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 863 wordsByline: KIM HYATT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Back when the world's attention was on Standing Rock Reservation during the Dakota Access pipeline protests a few years ago, LeeAnn Eastman said African-Americans came to the encampments to stand in solidarity. Now she said that mutual respect is being shown as Indigenous people come to Minneapolis in the aftermath of George Floyd's killing.

"We've been in this movement and struggled together for a long time," Eastman said. "Indigenous people all over support Black Lives Matter."

Eastman traveled from Sisseton, S.D., with about 20 other relatives and friends Sunday to pay their respects at the Floyd memorial site sprawling across the intersection of 38th Street and Chicago Avenue. She said they came to sing prayer songs and offer encouragement "to keep this going."

"I wanted to see where George passed away," said Alvin Village Center of Standing Rock. "I felt sad, hurt thinking about black people and Natives being treated the same way."

From surrounding states like the Dakotas and Wisconsin to neighboring suburban communities, mourners have flocked to the memorial site to pay respects and bear witness to where Floyd took his last breaths under a Minneapolis police officer's knee. It's been two weeks since he cried out for help as officers killed the unarmed 46-year-old man, sparking international protests and demands for justice.

Marches still carry on across the country as the memorial continues to take on new sculptures, signage and murals.

The collection of flowers seems to grow with every passing hour and there is a steady stream of people taking pictures, handing out free food and water, and bringing life to a landmark defined by tragedy.

"We wanted to bring some flowers and pay our respects. Living in rural Hudson, you feel a little removed from it, so it made sense to come," said Johan Nielsen of Hudson, Wis. Nielsen's girlfriend, Susan Roeder of Stillwater, said visiting the memorial was "very moving, as you would expect." They brought along food to donate and were encouraged to make the trip thanks to Roeder's two teenage daughters, who she said will not tolerate injustice.

"Two weeks feels like a lifetime. You can't imagine how the world could change already in such a short amount of time," she said. "With the pandemic and to have Minneapolis be the center of the universe, it was surreal."

Erin Heep MacEwen, 47, invited her parents, Bert and Diane Heep, to make a day trip from Ely down to Minneapolis on Sunday.

The family was tearful as they reflected on the experience of seeing the places they've watched on television and online the past two weeks.

MacEwen said it's all heartbreak mixed with shame, which is why they want to show solidarity with the movement as white people from rural Minnesota.

"It's been said many times and it almost sounds trite, but in this dark time for our state and country, we can make some progress," MacEwen said.

Like the feelings that follow a funeral, the Heeps said there was a sense of fellowship at the memorial.

Once they got over the initial stages of grief, from horror in seeing where Floyd died, they felt hope settle in. Though peaceful and serene just four hours north, Bert Heep said that sense of calm was almost superficial knowing what happened in the Twin Cities.

"You try to hold onto hope - you don't want it to die. You don't want the intensity of what you feel to go away," he said.

"You look at other people and wonder why they are here. What do the black people think of white people: 'Are they just pandering to us?'" he added. "You wish you could wear a sign that says, 'I really care.'"

Yolanda Pierson made the drive to the memorial from Blaine along with her two sons, Todd, 17, and Wayland, 8. She said already her teenager has been to three protests, including those for Philando Castile, Trayvon Martin and now Floyd.

"I hope by the time they're adults they don't have to protest," she said. "I hope it gets to the point where their joy isn't taken."

As she overlooked the Say Their Names Cemetery, a green open space blocks away from 38th and Chicago that memorializes dozens of black people killed by police, she said, "That's a lot of names, and it's heartbreaking as a mother. I don't know if other people fear that, but as a black mother, you fear that."

Since Floyd's death, 22-year-old Meghan Schuler of Owatonna has been wanting to visit the memorial.

But she spent that time educating herself on issues of racism and signing pledges instead. Sunday she finally went with two friends from Bethel College to pray and pay her respects.

"It's emotional to see all the people are still here," she said, adding that it's especially touching to see so many families out with children taking part in this moment in history.

Mourners gather to bear witness

Joelle Nde of Shakopee brought her children, ranging in age from 4 to 20, out to the memorial with the hope that "there will not be more George Floyds in the future."

She said while it's great to see people of all backgrounds and races come together, she prays it's the first and last time she would have to bring her children to a site like this.

"We are not perfect, but we have to use justice to solve issues, not brutality," she said.

Kim Hyatt · 612-673-4751

Load-Date: July 2, 2020

End of Document

ATF offers $5,000 reward to identify arsonist in St. Paul fires that followed George Floyd death

ARTICLE CDXLII. ATF OFFERS \$5,000 REWARD TO IDENTIFY ARSONIST IN ST. PAUL FIRES THAT FOLLOWED GEORGE FLOYD DEATH

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 8, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 410 words

Byline: Kristi Belcamino

Highlight: The U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives is offering a $5,000 reward for information leading to the identify of a man they believe set several arson fires in St. Paul during the civil unrest that followed the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody. The reward is for "information that leads to [...]"

Body

Expand

The U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives is offering a $5,000 reward for information leading to the identify of a man they believe set several arson fires in St. Paul during the civil unrest that followed the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody.

The reward is for "information that leads to the positive identification, arrest and conviction of a man responsible for setting fire to a neighborhood school and several St. Paul businesses during the recent unrest," the ATF said Sunday .

"This individual was seen at multiple locations igniting fires in our community, (including) the Gordon Parks High School that serves disadvantaged youth," said Assistant Special Agent in Charge Jon Ortiz of the ATF's St. Paul Field Division. "We're hoping the reward money will help convince those who may know the suspect to come forward with information. He may or may not be from the Twin Cities area."

ATF is investigating the case with the St. Paul Fire Department, St. Paul Police Department, Minnesota State Fire Marshal Division and the FBI.

They ask anyone with information on the whereabouts of the man seen in surveillance photos to call 1-888-ATF-TIPS (1-888-283-8477), email ATFTips@atf.gov or submit information via or the Report It mobile app, available on Google Play or Apple Apps Store. Anyone who uses Report It should select "ATF - St. Paul Field Division" as the reporting agency.

They ask people to give as much information as they can about the man's identity and whereabouts. The information can be provided anonymously but in order to collect the reward, people should also include contact information.

ATF offers $5,000 reward to identify arsonist in St. Paul fires that followed George Floyd death

$5,000 REWARD for info leading to the positive identification/arrest of a man responsible for setting fire to a neighborhood school and several St. Paul businesses. Call 1-888-ATF-TIPS. Investigating with @StPaulFireDept in a news release www.ReportIt.com @sppdmn @FBIMinneapolis

- ATF St. Paul (@ATFStPaul) June 7, 2020 @MnDPS_SFMPic.twitter.com/oalodq2804

Ramsey County one of three sites in nation to pilot program aimed at revamping prosecution to address racial disparities 1 officer charged in George Floyd death seeks case dismissal Three non-profits create fund for minority-owned businesses in Twin Cities Correctional officers of color who say they were segregated from Derek Chauvin: Why isn't Ramsey Co. jail superintendent on leave? America disrupted: Troubles cleave a nation, and a city

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

End of Document

MN health officials urge those protesting George Floyd's death to get tested for coronavirus. Here's how.

ARTICLE CDXLIII. MN HEALTH OFFICIALS URGE THOSE PROTESTING GEORGE FLOYD'S DEATH TO GET TESTED FOR CORONAVIRUS. HERE'S HOW.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 8, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 279 words

Byline: Katrina Pross

Highlight: The Minnesota Department of Health recently announced additional COVID-19 testing sites for those who attended protests, vigils and neighborhood events surrounding the death of George Floyd.

Body

The Minnesota Department of Health recently announced additional COVID-19 testing sites for those who attended protests, vigils and neighborhood events surrounding the death of George Floyd.

The Health Department is encouraging anyone who attended these events to get tested for the coronavirus. While many of those protesting wore masks, the large gatherings made it hard to keep a safe social distance, officials note.

The new testing sites are specifically designed for those who live in the most impacted neighborhoods and the surrounding community. Individuals who do not live in these neighborhoods are encouraged to get tested at a local clinic near them.

Testing at these locations will be free, and will be available to individuals even if they don't have symptoms of the virus. Those who wish to get tested should schedule an appointment online to help reduce wait times.

WHEN WILL THE TESTING TAKE PLACE? Tuesdays and Wednesdays: June 9, 10, 16, 17, 23, 24
Time: 12-6 p.m. WHERE TO GET TESTED IN ST. PAUL: Oxford Community Center, 270 N. Lexington Parkway, St. Paul, MN 55104 WHERE TO GET TESTED IN MINNEAPOLIS: Holy Trinity Church, 2730 31st St. East, Minneapolis, MN 55406 Sabathani Community Center, 310 38th St. East, Minneapolis, MN 55409 New Salem Baptist Church, 2507 Bryant Ave. North, Minneapolis, MN 55411
Thursday coronavirus update: 5 more MN deaths, 589 additional cases Window into virus surge: Death, recovery at Houston hospital Could virus surges elsewhere affect MN testing capability? Officials monitoring. New in a pandemic: These restaurants are serving guests despite all odds 'Desperation science' slows the hunt for coronavirus drugs

Load-Date: July 9, 2020

MN health officials urge those protesting George Floyd's death to get tested for coronavirus. Here's how.

End of Document

ARTICLE CDXLIV. READERS WRITE FOR WISDOM, READ THE POETS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 8, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 10ALength: 1188 wordsBody

RACISM

During this pandemic isolation, I have read Madeleine Albright's "Prague Winter," which chronicles the complicated Czech history up to and including World War II.

In the last chapter, she speaks of the bigotry and racism that sadly remain in our world, even after the Holocaust of WWII. She recalls the renowned Czech poet Otokar Brezina (1868-1929). She quotes:

"It is no longer possible to strangle one's brethren unheard. Somebody will always hear the cry of agony and let it fly from mouth to mouth throughout the land like a hurricane that blows the holy fires into flame."

This voice from long ago echoes loudly today. Let's listen this time.

Patsy Ramberg, White Bear Lake

POLICE

Encourage the sort of officer we want

There will always be a few in the "thin blue line" who lack the moral discipline necessary to protect and serve. Those few bad actors poison the relationship between citizens and police officers. The selfless work of the rest of the blue line goes unrecognized, especially when violence arrives. When we most need our police, we see violence against the police. Understandable, since this time, the immediate focus was on the uniformed thug who callously squeezed the life from yet another black man.

Now that more peaceful forces have begun to prevail, it's time to express appreciation for the police who defended people and neighborhoods in the aftermath of rage and violence. Instead, organizations are withdrawing support from the police: corporations, museums, the teacher's union and law firms want to sever existing ties.

Yes, the Police Department needs to purge its known incorrigibles. Its persistent, shameful failure to do so resulted in the death of George Floyd. Yes, drastic reform is needed to select and train officers. Yes, new leadership of the Minneapolis police union is imperative. But those necessary changes need community input and encouragement. Think of a teacher punishing an entire class for the actions of a few students, then ignoring the class to further the punishment.

For a healthy lawn, don't spray poison on every weed. Focus instead on nurturing thick grass, which will crowd out unwanted weeds. Police reform can happen, if we can nurture and preserve the best values that our police force represents.

Linda Bergman, Eden Prairie

RACE AND SPORTS

Brees and society still don't get it

New Orleans Saints quarterback Drew Brees, in his initial apology for recent public remarks, maintains that even if his remarks were wrong, he has always been an ally ("Saints' Brees takes first step toward mending relationships," StarTribune.com, June 5). But he never addressed until later the fact that Colin Kaepernick and others said their kneeling was not about disrespecting the flag or the armed forces. Instead, Brees insisted the black players should be ruled by his white interpretation of what they were doing, his white criteria for what is proper protest. He doesn't see that this is a crucial aspect of white supremacy: Only white people get to decide what is the truth, only white people get to decide what is patriotism, only white people get to decide if black protest is proper or improper, is legitimate or illegitimate.

Black people have been voicing complaints about police brutality for more than a century but white people never believed them. As so many have said, the main difference now is that we have video proof of that brutality, but everyone knows absent that visual proof, the vast majority of white people did not and would not believe the word of black people.

On any racial issue in American history, black people have been on the side of righteousness, justice and history, and always at first, the majority of white people have opposed them, have been morally wrong, unjust and on the wrong side of history. Why is it, in the present, white people have not said: "Well, we got it wrong in our history while black people have been right. Maybe we should now listen to you and follow your lead, because history has always been on your side."

Perhaps, just perhaps, this might be a time when this will happen, when white people will not only listen to black people but follow their lead. Our country's future depends upon that.

David Mura, Minneapolis

...

I live six blocks from where George Floyd was killed and two blocks from the fires that ravaged Lake Street. As a white male, I have had the privilege of deciding when and when not to be part of the struggle for racial justice.

For over 60 years I have also been a baseball fan (my wife would say a fanatic). However, my enthusiasm for baseball is seriously on the line, but not for the reasons sports columnist Jim Souhan poses ("Lost season would cost already reeling MLB more fans," May 31).

The bickering between the "millionaires" (the players) and the "billionaires" (the owners) is disheartening given the challenges facing our country. Here's how baseball can retain my passion and build a dedicated fan base for the decades ahead: Create a meaningful financial commitment to employment and education programs for young people of color in every major league city.

By meaningful I mean several billion dollars. Let's start with each major leaguer contributing 50% of their salary (let's use 2021 salaries, not the truncated 2020 salaries) and each owner making a 2:1 match to their players' contribution. Here in the Twin Cities that would mean about $150 million.

And I bet that even after this significant contribution, each owner and player would still have enough left in their pocket for a beer and burger, which may not have been not true for our brother George Floyd in all periods of his life. If any one of the players or owners does not, call me and I will treat you.

Michael Troutman, Minneapolis

TRUMP

Happy to comment, unless he isn't

President Donald Trump's numerous lies and misleading statements have been well-documented by authoritative sources including the Washington Post.

What hasn't been counted is equally dangerous - the numerous times when Trump administration officials refuse to comment about issues of vital national importance. The June 3 story "Barr ordered removal of protesters at park" is a recent example: Officers used smoke canisters, batons, riot shields and troops on horseback to disperse peaceful - which means legal - protesters; when asked for an explanation of this violation of citizens' constitutionally guaranteed freedom of expression, "several federal agencies involved in the response declined to answer questions about who ordered the use of force. A White House spokesman declined to comment The Secret Service declined to comment."

This same silence has been the president's typical response to questions about climate change, the environment, voting rights, a host of other big issues. He can't keep his finger off the Twitter trigger, but he clams up whenever an honest answer would make clear that he's a failure as a human being and a president. And that makes sense in a Trumpian sense: Not even Donald Trump is foolish enough to publicly defend the indefensible.

Steve Schild, Winona, Minn.

We want to hear from you. Send us your thoughts here.

Load-Date: July 2, 2020

St. Paul police: Video shows officer isn't 'Umbrella Man'

ARTICLE CDXLV. ST. PAUL POLICE: VIDEO SHOWS OFFICER ISN'T 'UMBRELLA MAN'

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 8, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 597 words

Byline: John Shipley

Highlight: St. Paul Police have released surveillance video they say clears one of their officers of being the riot provocateur known on social media as "Umbrella Man." The officer, Jacob Pederson, had been accused on social media of being the man dressed in black, wearing a gas mask, holding an umbrella and using a hammer to [...]

Body

St. Paul Police have released surveillance video they say clears one of their officers of being the riot provocateur known on social media as "Umbrella Man."

The officer, Jacob Pederson, had been accused on social media of being the man dressed in black, wearing a gas mask, holding an umbrella and using a hammer to break windows in a south Minneapolis Auto Zone on the evening of May 27 - just before the protests over the death of George Floyd while in police custody escalated into large-scale property damage in the area of East Lake Street.

The next day, a Twitter account identified Pederson as the perpetrator based on a text he received from a "close friend" in Minneapolis who ostensibly had been married to Pederson. The posted messages were anonymous and not definitive but spread widely on the internet.

Police immediately pushed back on the accusation, saying Pederson was not in Minneapolis, and on Monday released surveillance video they say exonerates the officer.

RUMOR CONTROL ...

We are aware of the social media post that erroneously identifies one of our officers as the person caught on video breaking windows in Minneapolis.

We've seen it. We've looked into it. And it's false.

- Saint Paul Police Department (@sppdmn) May 29, 2020

In a montage of time-stamped surveillance video from the Richard H. Rowan Public Safety Training Center at 600 Lafayette Road, police identify Pederson as one of a handful of officers leaving the building to at 6:38 p.m., six minutes after the broken windows set off an alarm, police say, at the Auto Zone at 2610 East Lake Street in Minneapolis.

St. Paul police: Video shows officer isn't 'Umbrella Man'

The distance between the two buildings is about 10 miles.

Pederson declined to comment through St. Paul police spokesman Steve Linders, who added that Pederson is "exploring his legal options at this time" regarding the accusations on social media.

In a statement, the police department said it released a series of videos - including surveillance at every entrance and exit at the public safety training center - because social media posts are still identifying Pederson as "Umbrella Man."

"This type of disinformation can jeopardize the officer's reputation and safety and chip away at the trust this police department has worked so hard to build with its community," St. Paul Police Chief Todd Axtell said in a statement.

Minneapolis police, the local agency responsible for investigating the incident, said information related to the incident and who "Umbrella Man" might be is investigative and unavailable for release.

Kevin Smith, a spokesman for the Minneapolis branch of the FBI, said his agency is investigating the civil rights case looking into Floyd's death by asphyxiation and incidents of violence during several days of protests.

"We have agents all over the Metro trying to identify violent actors," Smith said, as well as analysts looking at photos and videos of the violence during the protests. He encouraged those with video and photos to submit them to fbi.gov/violence.

"We're looking through copious amounts of video and pictures, and the more the better," Smith said. "A lot of what we see isn't actionable, but you never know when you'll find the nugget that is." Minneapolis council members pledge thoughtful police revamp Monuments and statues are falling. But what comes next? Ramsey County Attorney's Office named pilot site for national program aimed at reducing racial disparities in criminal justice system Officer Chauvin to George Floyd: 'It takes ... a lot of oxygen to talk' Three non-profits create fund for minority-owned businesses in Twin Cities

Load-Date: July 9, 2020

St. Paul school board postpones meeting on school police after chairwoman's death

ARTICLE CDXLVI. ST. PAUL SCHOOL BOARD POSTPONES MEETING ON SCHOOL POLICE AFTER CHAIRWOMAN'S DEATH

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 8, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 149 words

Byline: Josh Verges

Highlight: The St. Paul school board has postponed a meeting scheduled for Tuesday following the death of board chairwoman Marny Xiong. Xiong, 31, died Sunday from COVID-19, the disease caused by the coronavirus, after spending a month in two hospitals. The board was planning to discuss next year's budget and whether to continue paying to place [...]

Body

The St. Paul school board has postponed a meeting scheduled for Tuesday following the death of board chairwoman Marny Xiong.

Xiong, 31, died Sunday from COVID-19, the disease caused by the coronavirus, after spending a month in two hospitals.

The board was planning to discuss next year's budget and whether to continue paying to place St. Paul police officers inside its high schools. The Minneapolis school board last week ended its contract with Minneapolis police after George Floyd was killed in police custody.

A new date for the meeting has not been set. St. Paul schools budget sees big enrollment loss, pandemic uncertainty Newly-retired Johnson basketball coach Vern Simmons left a lasting impact, on and off the court St. Paul school board removes police officers from high schools on 5-1 vote St. Paul Public Schools weighs removal of police officers following George Floyd's death

Load-Date: July 9, 2020

Meet Kamryn Johnson, the 9-year-old who has raised more than $50,000 for Minneapolis

ARTICLE CDXLVII. MEET KAMRYN JOHNSON, THE 9-YEAR-OLD WHO HAS RAISED MORE THAN \$50,000 FOR MINNEAPOLIS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 8, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 783 words

Byline: Dane Mizutani

Highlight: Kamryn Johnson put down the yarn and bashfully covered her face while standing in her driveway over the weekend. Her empire rested about 10 feet away.

Body

Kamryn Johnson put down the yarn and bashfully covered her face while standing in her driveway over the weekend. Her empire rested about 10 feet away.

It doesn't look like much upon first glance. There are a couple of folding tables, a few lawn chairs, a cooler with some juice boxes, and a group of her friends from the neighborhood.

Look a little closer, though, and it's impossible to miss the colorful bracelets pinned to a nearby bulletin board. That's how this 9-year-old is making a difference.

In the wake of George Floyd's death a couple of weeks ago and the destruction that followed, Kamryn saw some of the aftermath while watching the news with her parents Ron and Shani.

"I was really sad," Kamryn said. "I wanted to help."

She chatted with some of her friends and they decided to make bracelets as a way to raise some money for people in need. That was about a week and a half ago and it's grown into something bigger than anyone could've ever imagined.

As of Monday afternoon, Kamryn has helped raised more than $50,000, and most recently made an appearance on "Good Morning America" with Robin Roberts to continue to spread the word. There is also that recently eclipsed more than $10,000.

"She just told me she wanted to do it so I helped promote it on social media," said Ron, a former Gophers standout who spent a couple of seasons in the NFL and now spends plenty of time on-air as a FOX 9 football analyst. "I'm on record saying I think she was going to sell like a half a dozen bracelets. It shows that it doesn't matter what age someone is. There's always some way to help."

Meet Kamryn Johnson, the 9-year-old who has raised more than $50,000 for Minneapolis

While the walk up sales have started to take off - they raised nearly $2,500 in a single day last week - some larger donations have rolled in from big names like Vikings safety Harrison Smith and former Vikings linebacker Chad Greenway.

"It's something that gives people hope during a tough time when people are lost asking, 'What can I do?'" Ron said. "If they see a bunch of 9-year-olds doing this I hope that shows them they can do something to help."

Asked who her favorite person to show up so far was, Kamryn paused before replying, "Umm. I think Harrison Smith."

Just as important as the money raised, though, is the conversation this has created. It seems like people want to listen and learn more than ever before, and Kamryn has unknowingly helped catalyze that dialogue within her neighborhood in Chanhassen.

"Our neighborhood is like 95 percent white and maybe like 5 percent minority," Ron said. "We are the only black family within this little block. The fact that people that might not have known us, or might not have felt right to approach us, are stopping by to talk and ask questions is a good thing. That's really important right now."

That's something Shani has noticed, too, as strangers from all over have stopped by to donate. She recalled a man that drove up from Lakeville last week and brought ice cream for the kids. They talked for awhile and the man started to cry.

"He just said, 'I'm so sorry,' " said Shani, a former standout with the Gophers that qualified for the 2008 Summer Olympics the triple jump. "The compassion of that statement was super meaningful."

Now the key is pushing the conversation forward. As much as people are willing to talk about racism and injustice during this moment in time, Ron said, it doesn't mean those issues are going to magically go away. There needs to be a continued focus on change.

"We have to find a way to continue to talk about these things," Ron said. "I hope people understand that."

In the meantime, though, he wants to make sure Kamryn and her friends have fond memories about this experience in particular.

"I want them to be able to see what their work and their ingenuity did for a community," Ron said. "I also want to make sure they are still having fun with it. I don't want them to look back on it and be like, 'Oh my god. That was so much hard work.' I want them to enjoy this moment because at the end of the day they are a bunch of 9 year olds."

Because of that it's likely Kamryn and her friends won't fully understand the impact until much later in life. They are simply hanging out, making bracelets, and raising money.

"It gives me hope for the next generation," said Shani, her eyes starting to well up with tears. "Hopefully they will do things differently."

'A hot mess': Americans face testing delays as virus surges, a Go Fund Me page, Supreme Court OK's employers limiting free birth control on religious grounds, Window into virus surge: Death, recovery at

Meet Kamryn Johnson, the 9-year-old who has raised more than $50,000 for Minneapolis

Houston hospital St. Paul City Council approves wide-ranging tenant protections New in a pandemic: These restaurants are serving guests despite all odds

Load-Date: July 9, 2020

End of Document

Minneapolis mayor unveils coalition to lead rebuilding, promises to center black voices

ARTICLE CDXLVIII. MINNEAPOLIS MAYOR UNVEILS COALITION TO LEAD REBUILDING, PROMISES TO CENTER BLACK VOICES

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

June 8, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 504 words

Byline: Dylan Thomas

Body

Pledging to "rebuild as a stronger, more equitable and more inclusive city," Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey on Monday announced the formation of two groups that will guide the city's recovery from the fire and destruction unleashed during the unrest that followed the police killing of George Floyd on Memorial Day.

One of those is the Minneapolis Forward: Community Now Coalition, tasked with providing support to business and property owners whose insurance won't cover the total loss from fire, flood, looting or other property damage stemming from the unrest. Their mission also extends to meeting the immediate needs of the most affected neighborhoods and helping them retain local businesses, even if the property owner chooses not to rebuild.

Minneapolis mayor unveils coalition to lead rebuilding, promises to center black voices

It is co-chaired by a trio of local business leaders: Allison Sharkey, executive director of the Lake Street Council; Felicia Perry, executive director of the West Broadway Business and Area Coalition; and Jonathan Weinhagen, president and CEO of the Minneapolis Regional Chamber.

The other is the Minneapolis African American Commission on Economic Inclusion, a group Frey said would elevate the voices of black community members, creating a "feedback loop" that will guide the city's recovery efforts. It will be led by Shauen Pearce, a Frey staffer who serves as the mayor's director of economic development and inclusion policy.

Additional members for both groups are expected to be announced later this week.

"We are a region that strives to bring prosperity to all, and there is no doubt we haven't hit that mark, we haven't always made that ideal. Through the Minneapolis Forward: Community Now Coalition, we can and we will bring people together from across our city who are prepared to lead with justice and an intentional approach to delivering systemic solutions," Frey said during an event held at Sabathani Community Center, a South Minneapolis neighborhood hub located just six blocks from the 38th & Chicago intersection where Floyd, who was black, died under the knee of a white police officer.

Frey also announced that the Minneapolis Foundation would serve as the fiscal agent for recovery efforts, corralling what is sure to be a massive fundraising effort. Both the Lake Street Council and West Broadway Business and Area Coalition already have individually raised millions for their commercial districts, but early estimates for the total cost of rebuilding range into the tens or even hundreds of millions. Hundreds of individual businesses were damaged or destroyed.

Although the city is expected to expedite business permitting and licensing to speed rebuilding efforts, the mayor did not say how much the city would commit financially to rebuilding or identify an overall fundraising goal for the coalition. He said the coalition and the Minneapolis African American Commission on Economic Inclusion needed some time and space to begin their work.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: June 9, 2020

ARTICLE CDXLIX. MONDAY CORONAVIRUS UPDATE: 11 MORE MN DEATHS, 338 ADDITIONAL CASES

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 8, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 537 words

Byline: Katrina Pross

Highlight: Minnesota on Monday added another 11 deaths from the coronavirus - which included a Hennepin County resident in their 20s with no underlying health conditions - raising Minnesota's death toll to 1,197. Of the state's total deaths, 955 were long-term care or assisted living center residents, according to Minnesota Department of Health data updated Monday [...]

Body

Minnesota on Monday added another 11 deaths from the coronavirus - which included a Hennepin County resident in their 20s with no underlying health conditions - raising Minnesota's death toll to 1,197.

Of the state's total deaths, 955 were long-term care or assisted living center residents, according to Minnesota Department of Health data updated Monday morning.

The health department reports another 338 confirmed infections, increasing Minnesota's total number of cases to 28,224. The actual number of cases is likely much higher as the data only represents those who have been tested for the virus, state officials say. Just over 10,000 new tests were reported Monday, a step toward the state's goal to get to 20,000 tests a day.

While the number of new cases reported daily has been lower than previous weeks and hospitalizations are apparently trending downward, health officials emphasized that they do not know what will happen going forward, especially given recent large gatherings and protests surrounding George Floyd's death.

The news comes as the state prepares Wednesday to open up restaurants and bars for indoor dining, though at half capacity. Salons and barber shops can also operate at half capacity, and fitness centers can open at 25 percent capacity.

HOW ARE PATIENTS DOING? There were 23,657 patients Monday that no longer need to be isolated as they have recovered enough. This is an increase from 22,992 yesterday. There were 452 patients with COVID-19 in Minnesota hospitals, a slight increase from 450 the day before. Sunday was the lowest hospitalizations had been since May 10, when there were 434 hospitalizations. Of those patients in hospitals, 198 are in intensive care, a slight decrease from 199 on Sunday. This is the lowest intensive care hospitalizations have been since May 11, when there were 194 such hospitalizations. WHO IS GETTING SICK? Number of health care workers who have tested positive for COVID-19: 2,973 The age group with the most infections remains 30- to 39-year-olds with 5,724 cases. The age group with the most deaths remains 80- to 89-year-olds with 411 deaths. THE IMPACT ON CARE CENTERS

Monday coronavirus update: 11 more MN deaths, 338 additional cases

There are four long-term care centers in the metro area with more than 100 confirmed infections, according to Health Department data released last Friday. Three of those centers have at least 38 deaths.

The data was released in response to a request from Republican State Sen. Karin Housley of St. Mary's Point, who voiced concern over the amount of cases and deaths coming out of long-term care facilities.

North Ridge Health and Rehab in New Hope had the highest case count, with nearly 300 cases.

St. Therese of New Hope had the highest death toll, with 67 deaths.

In the east metro, West St. Paul's Southview Acres Healthcare Center reported 153 confirm cases of the coronavirus among staff and residents; 38 of those residents had died.

Window into virus surge: Death, recovery at Houston hospital Could virus surges elsewhere affect MN testing capability? Officials monitoring. New in a pandemic: These restaurants are serving guests despite all odds 'Desperation science' slows the hunt for coronavirus drugs U to help international students comply with ICE directive

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

Pandemic, protests and ice cream. 2 Scoops Ice Cream Eatery seeks to heal us.

ARTICLE CDL. PANDEMIC, PROTESTS AND ICE CREAM. 2 SCOOPS ICE CREAM EATERY SEEKS TO HEAL US.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 8, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1202 words

Byline: Mary Divine

Highlight: Opening an ice cream parlor during the middle of a pandemic and unparalleled protests might seem like a bad idea. But the owner of 2 Scoops Ice Cream Eatery on Selby Avenue says it's actually the perfect time. What the world needs now, he says, is ice cream.

Body

Opening an ice cream parlor during the middle of a pandemic and unparalleled protests might seem like a bad idea.

But Brian White Jr., the owner of 2 Scoops Ice Cream Eatery on Selby Avenue, says it's actually the perfect time. What the world needs now, he says, is ice cream.

"My father always says, 'Timing is everything,'" White said. "Right now, 2 Scoops is needed. ... Ice cream is one of those things that is universal. It makes everyone happy. It brings people together."

Since 2 Scoops opened on May 30 at the corner of Selby and Milton, it has become a small oasis of "peace and happiness" in the neighborhood, White said.

While other businesses in St. Paul were damaged by looters and arsonists in the aftermath of the killing of George Floyd, 2 Scoops, with plywood boards covering its windows, remained intact.

"It's no secret that we are a black-owned and -operated business, and we stand behind that," said White, who owns the ice cream parlor with his parents, Brian White Sr. and Rdella White. "During these times, I think we're getting a lot more support because of what happened with Mr. Floyd. We are wrapping our arms around how we can use these times to figure out how we can come together and work through these things and show support to the community."

GAINING COMMUNITY'S SUPPORT

When St. Paul residents Andreas Schramm and Jen Ouellette-Schramm heard that a black-owned ice cream parlor had opened on Selby, they drove over to buy a couple of cones - a split scoop of salted caramel and strawberry cheesecake for him and a single scoop of chocolate for her.

Pandemic, protests and ice cream. 2 Scoops Ice Cream Eatery seeks to heal us.

"We're trying consciously to support local businesses right now, especially minority-owned businesses," Schramm said.

Jeremy and Angelica Imhoede and their 3 1/2-year-old son, L.J., made the trek from New Hope after learning about 2 Scoops on social media.

"We always want to support black-owned businesses, but especially during this time," Jeremy Imhoede said.

Said Angelica Imhoede: "We just hope they can continue to stay afloat in this community during this time. It's disgusting what happened, but this is part of our journey - having generational wealth and building our own businesses and our own economies to help sustain our communities."

NOW WAS THE TIME

Brian White Jr. and his family began discussing opening a business three years ago. When they learned Golden Thyme Coffee Shop was moving to a new location, just down the block, they jumped at the opportunity to take over the space.

"The stars aligned," he said. "The location is just great. We wanted to be a part of the Rondo neighborhood and its rich history. That was part of our motivation in opening here: we wanted to continue that legacy of a black-owned business in (Rondo). We're excited and proud of how things are going so far. The reception from the community, and the support, has just been tremendous."

The White family completely remodeled the space, adding ceiling fans, red tables and chairs and a red-and-white checkered floor. One wall is devoted to "The Cream of the Crop," framed photos of St. Paul athletes who have gone on to play college or professional ball.

"We're big sports fanatics," said White Jr., who was a running back at North Dakota State University. "Anything Minnesota sports - Vikings, Timberwolves, Gophers, you name it. We've had the opportunity to rub elbows with a lot of the up-and-coming sports talent out of St. Paul."

Anytime a featured athlete comes into the eatery, they are asked to sign their photo, he said.

Among those pictured: Ohio State defensive tackle Jashon Cornell, recently drafted by the Detroit Lions. "He's my cousin," White Jr. said.

"Phil Archer came in just the other day," he said, referring to the former professional football player. "That's a photo of him sacking Aaron Rodgers. We're big Vikings fans, so we love to see that."

How does ice cream fit into an athlete's diet? "It's high in protein," White Jr. explains.

2 SCOOPS 4 KIDS

The most popular flavors at 2 Scoops to date are Birthday Cake and Cotton Candy Twist for kids and Ultimate Oreo and Espresso Oreo for adults, he said, adding that his favorite is Cotton Candy Twist, a bright-blue and pink concoction.

"It's just to die for," he said. "I love it. I eat it every opportunity that I get. I'm trying not to put on the pounds, but it's tough when you're standing in an ice cream shop all day and everything is smelling great - those waffle cones and brownies and cookies."

Pandemic, protests and ice cream. 2 Scoops Ice Cream Eatery seeks to heal us.

Mark Korbel, the State Farm insurance agent whose office is right across the street, is having the same problem. "I've been there every day since it opened," Korbel said, with a laugh. "We head over around 3 p.m. because we want sugar. It's awesome, but it could get dangerous. Luckily, it's summertime so we can get outside and burn some of the calories off."

Korbel was the inspiration behind "2 Scoops 4 Kids" - a fund dedicated to free ice cream for kids in the neighborhood. He donated the first $100 to the fund on Tuesday.

"Nothing puts a bigger smile on a kid's face then an ice cream cone," said Korbel, who has worked in the area for 2 ½ years. "I just wanted to extend a welcome and, hopefully, get some kids some ice cream."

When word spread that Korbel had started the fund, other donors stepped up to help. "The biggest way you can show love to a community is to support them locally and take care of the ones around you," Korbel said. "This is all about the kids."

White Jr., the father of six children, said he has been gobsmacked by the "2 Scoops 4 Kids" donations. "Sometimes, during times of tragedy, people begin to band together," he said. "This is a perfect example of that. I can definitely see it growing. That's what this place is all about."

ST. PAUL PROUD

Ice cream might not be the answer to all that ails us, but it certainly can't hurt.

"I've watched people come in the door with a frown - just because of the heaviness of what is going with these times," White Jr. said. "But when they walk out the door, they are all smiles and laughs. It's just an awesome thing."

Since the eatery opened, he said he has watched people of all races and ethnic backgrounds come together and show their support. "We've shown love and received love back," he said. "I think this is a great example of what things could be, and what we should strive to have things be like. 2 Scoops is exemplifying that at this moment, so we're happy about that."

"I'm more proud than ever to say I'm from St. Paul and from this community," he said. "We see a lot of bad stuff in the news, but a lot of times, what doesn't get talked about is the good things that are happening, and how we are working to heal and try to get back to where we need to be."

2 Scoops Ice Cream Eatery LOCATION: 921 Selby Ave., St. Paul HOURS: 11 a.m. to 8 p.m. Monday - Thursday; 11 a.m. to 9 p.m. Friday - Saturday, and 11 a.m. to 7 p.m. Sunday New in a pandemic: These restaurants are serving guests despite all odds In Bloom, fine dining restaurant at St. Paul's Keg and Case, closes permanently Photos: NYC's restaurants get creative for street eating Two St. Paul restaurants reopen as two more Minneapolis spots close With hundreds of COVID-19 cases tied to bars, Walz threatens stricter actions

Graphic

Pandemic, protests and ice cream. 2 Scoops Ice Cream Eatery seeks to heal us.

Customers eye the varieties of ice cream at Two Scoops Ice Cream Parlor in St. Paul on Wednesday, June 3, 2020. (John Autey / Pioneer Press)

Customers queue up for ice cream at Two Scoops Ice Cream Parlor in St. Paul on Wednesday, June 3, 2020. (John Autey / Pioneer Press)

Brian White, owner of Two Scoops Ice Cream Parlor in St. Paul, hands over a banana split to Lena Young on Wednesday, June 3, 2020. (John Autey / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

End of Document

Protesters should get a COVID-19 test

ARTICLE CDLI. PROTESTERS SHOULD GET A COVID-19 TEST

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 8, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 10A

Length: 634 words

Highlight: Mass gatherings' risk factors require responsible action from those who marched for justice.

Body

Protesters, those who watched nearby, and those who volunteered with neighborhood cleanup need to get tested for COVID-19 preferably five to seven days after participating or sooner if they feel sick. The historic marches after George Floyd's tragic death happened during a still unfolding pandemic. Those who joined the calls for justice must take action to prevent themselves from becoming vehicles for viral spread.

COVID-19 is still circulating in Minnesota and elsewhere even as mitigation measures ease. Crowding and close contact for sustained periods of time can fuel the pathogen's transmission. Droplets containing the virus expelled during singing or talking at loud volume also appear to enhance contagion. Unfortunately, these risk factors have been widespread as thousands came together after Floyd's May 25 death to call for police reform or mop up the aftermath when violence occurred.

It's best for those infected to get prompt medical care. Precautions are also needed to alert family and friends to prevent further spread, a step that also helps protect seniors because infections in elder care centers appear to be introduced by staff or contractors who have the virus. In addition, testing provides public health professionals with vital surveillance information about the disease. If hot spots are developing, medical providers can prepare for hospitalizations and disease control experts can act to contain an outbreak.

Testing is still recommended even if you don't feel sick. People who have COVID-19 can be contagious even if they don't have symptoms of this disease, such as a cough, fever or shortness of breath. Typically, symptoms occur five to seven days after exposure, which is why health officials urge waiting about a week to get a test after attending a protest. Because symptoms can take up to two weeks to appear after exposure, they recommend a follow-up test in 12 to 14 days even if the first test was negative.

Officials recommend that those seeking a test start by contacting their medical providers. The state Health Department has a list of testing locations on its website: tinyurl.com/y8mbqklk. Temporary community testing sites may soon be added in locations where the protests occurred.

As of late last week, this online resource said many clinics were not doing testing for those without COVID-19 symptoms. But state health officials also sent out an alert asking providers to test both symptomatic and asymptomatic people who were involved in large gatherings. This should help open the door for testing, although some health care systems may not have the capacity to do asymptomatic testing. Calling ahead is prudent.

Protesters should get a COVID-19 test

Paying for the test is also likely a concern for many, even those with health insurance. But recent changes in federal law in response to COVID-19 require comprehensive private health plans to cover testing and related services without cost-sharing (such as deductibles or copays). Again, the best bet is to call your insurer first.

State-run programs such as Medical Assistance and MinnesotaCare do not have out-of-pocket costs for COVID-19 testing. Seniors on Medicare or Medicare Advantage should also be shielded from testing costs.

That still leaves those who don't have insurance. Many without coverage could be eligible for medical assistance or MinnesotaCare (enroll throughout the year at MNsure.org). Health officials also note that many providers have received grants to cover the uninsured or can apply for federal funds to cover testing for those without coverage. "People who are uninsured should be able to get tested," a Health Department spokesman said Thursday.

Getting a COVID-19 test isn't just sensible. It's an extension of why so many marched for justice - because they are committed to the community's future well-being.

Load-Date: July 2, 2020

Sabor Chuchi restaurant owner after fires: 'Your whole life is there, and it's gone'

ARTICLE CDLII. SABOR CHUCHI RESTAURANT OWNER AFTER FIRES: 'YOUR WHOLE LIFE IS THERE, AND IT'S GONE'

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

June 8, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 423 words

Byline: Iain Carlos

Body

Exhausted from two straight nights of defending his restaurant, El Sabor Chuchi, owner Luis Jose Tamay stayed home on Friday, May 29, four days after the killing of George Floyd. That night, browsing Facebook, he came across a live video of Sabor Chuchi burning.

"I was in shock. Your whole life is there, all your things, and it's gone," Tamay said. "We don't know how to react yet."

Tamay hails from the Cañar province of Ecuador. There, he made a living harvesting plantains, but dreamed of opening a restaurant in the United States. He came to Minneapolis in 2003 and worked his way up in the restaurant business. He went from washing dishes to preparatory work to cooking. When he saved enough money, he opened Sabor Chuchi in 2015, building the kitchen himself in leased space.

Sabor Chuchi restaurant owner after fires: 'Your whole life is there, and it's gone'

The East Lake Street restaurant provided members of Minneapolis' Ecuadorian community a taste of home. After a night of carousing, some would make their way to Sabor Chuchi on Sunday mornings to soothe their nerves with encebollado - a stew made with tuna, yucca, plantains and onion, Tamay said.

The restaurant also served as an anchor for Tamay's family - employing his two brothers, Manuel and Segundo, and providing for his two children, Jenri and Brandon.

Now that the business is gone, Tamay's savings and his wife's job as housekeeper have kept his immediate family afloat for now. But he's worried that next month's bills will leave him strapped for cash.

Even before the protests, Tamay's earnings had taken a hit by the Covid-19 pandemic and state-ordered shutdown of restaurant dining rooms. He reopened Sabor Chuchi exclusively for delivery, but his earnings hovered around 50% of what they were before the virus struck and shut down foot traffic. The earnings from his neighboring store, Chuchi Market, were crucial for Tamay during the pandemic, but it closed when the protests started. He's hoping to get Chuchi Market open again as soon he can, he said.

As Sabor Chuchi was uninsured, he's hoping his landlord will help him rebuild. Otherwise, he'll have to restore his restaurant on his own. His nephew, Javier Tamay, set up a GoFundMe page to raise money - it's drawn more than $105,000 in contributions so far, easily eclipsing both the original $60,000 goal and then an extended goal of $100,000.

The kindness of the donations has spurred Tamay's optimism for moving forward. "A lot of good people, a lot of good hearts," he said.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: June 8, 2020

Chauvin's bail raised to $1.25M

ARTICLE CDLIII. CHAUVIN'S BAIL RAISED TO \$1.25M

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 903 wordsByline: GREG STANLEY; CHAO XIONG; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Prosecutor says severe charges and public outrage make fired officer a flight risk.Body

Unconditional bail for former Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin was raised by $250,000 to $1.25 million Monday afternoon in the May 25 killing of George Floyd while in police custody.

Chauvin made his first court appearance by video feed, handcuffed in an orange jumpsuit sitting at a small conference room table in the Hennepin County jail.

In a hearing that lasted just 15 minutes, prosecutor Matthew Frank argued that the severity of the charges and the strength of public opinion against Chauvin made him a more likely flight risk. Frank asked District Judge Jeannice Reding to raise his bail from $750,000 to $1 million with conditions, and from $1 million to $1.25 million without conditions.

The conditions include: that he remain law abiding, that he not have any contact with Floyd's family, that he not work in law enforcement or security, that he surrender any firearms and licenses to carry, that he remain in Minnesota under court supervision, and that he sign a waiver of extradition upon his release.

Neither Chauvin nor his lawyer, Eric Nelson, objected.

Chauvin, 44, of Oakdale, faces charges of second-degree murder without intent, third-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter.

Chauvin did not enter a plea at the hearing. His next court appearance was set for 1:30 p.m. June 29.

First appearances are typically procedural: The charges can be read to a defendant, although most attorneys waive the reading, bail is argued and another hearing date is set.

Chauvin was charged four days after he killed Floyd, a 46-year-old black man from St. Louis Park, on May 25. He is being held at the state prison at Oak Park Heights.

The courtroom was mostly empty, occupied only by a handful of sheriff's deputies, reporters and lawyers. Plastic covers had been added along the bar separating the audience and lawyers as a precaution against the pandemic. Two large flat-screen televisions were placed in front of the judge's bench to show a live feed of Chauvin, who sat with jail personnel in a separate conference room.

Chauvin's bail raised to $1.25M

Chauvin waived a reading of the complaint against him.

Frank quickly summarized the charges and what has been seen by millions from around the world in witness videos of the arrest and subsequent death of Floyd.

Chauvin kept his knee on Floyd's neck "while he went limp and eventually lifeless," Frank said. "Obviously, the death of George Floyd has had a strong reaction in the community, to put it mildly."

Chauvin sat with his hands under a table for most of the hearing, at times looking like he was leaning forward to better hear questions from the judge and the video stream.

Nelson, Chauvin's lawyer, quickly ducked out of a side door at the courthouse after the hearing as dozens of reporters from around the country waited outside.

"I'm not making any comments at this time," Nelson said.

Chauvin's former colleagues, J Alexander Kueng, Thomas Lane and Tou Thao, are charged as accomplices.

A video recorded by a bystander showed Chauvin kneeling on Floyd's neck as he told the officers he couldn't breathe and that he was going to die. Lane and Kueng were out of view restraining Floyd's body.

The video also showed bystanders begging the officers to stop, and Thao standing watch nearby dismissing witnesses' concerns.

All four were fired days after Floyd was killed on Memorial Day.

Kueng, Lane and Thao are each charged with one count of aiding and abetting second-degree murder and aiding and abetting second-degree manslaughter.

The three are being held at the Hennepin County jail on $1 million bail without conditions or $750,000 bail with conditions.

Attorneys for Kueng and Lane told a judge during their clients' first appearances last week that they were rookies with just a few days' experience and looked to Chauvin, the most senior officer at the scene, for guidance.

"At all times Mr. Kueng and Mr. Lane turned their attention to that 19-year veteran," Kueng's attorney, Thomas Plunkett, said last week. "[Kueng] was trying - they were trying to communicate that this situation needs to change direction."

Lane's attorney, Earl Gray, argued last week that his client had asked two times if they should roll Floyd onto his side, but Chauvin said no.

"What was [Lane] supposed to do ... go up to Mr. Chauvin and grab him and throw him off?" said Gray, who plans to argue at a future hearing that there's not enough evidence to prosecute his client.

Chauvin's bail raised to $1.25M

Lane and Kueng had responded about 8:08 p.m. to a call that a man used a counterfeit $20 bill at the Cup Foods on the corner of Chicago Avenue and E. 38th Street. They found Floyd sitting in a car nearby, handcuffed him and attempted to put him in their squad car. Chauvin and Thao arrived to assist.

While charging documents said Chauvin pulled Floyd out of the squad, Gray said last week that Floyd resisted arrest, "asserted himself" and later "flew out" of the squad through his own actions.

Lane restrained Floyd's legs, Kueng held onto his back and Chauvin knelt on his neck as he lay in the street.

At one point, Kueng took Floyd's pulse and told his former colleagues he couldn't detect one. Chauvin is accused of keeping his knee on Floyd's neck for about two minutes after Kueng's statement.

Chauvin's knee was on Floyd's neck for 8 minutes and 46 seconds total, according to the complaint.

Kueng, Lane and Thao are scheduled to make their next court appearance on June 29.

Chao Xiong · 612-270-4708

Greg Stanley · 612-270-4882

Load-Date: June 10, 2020

ARTICLE CDLIV. NEW FLASH POINT: POLICE REFORM

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 929 wordsByline: MIGUEL OTAROLA; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: No road map for Mpls. to defund, scrap policeBody

Protesters in Minneapolis and across the country have found a new rallying cry: Abolish the police. And they're determined to make the city where George Floyd died a national example of radical change.

They may differ on what it means to dismantle or defund the police. But the idea has gained momentum across the country, with activists asking people to redefine public safety without armed, uniformed officers of the law.

Black Visions Collective and Reclaim the Block, advocacy organizations that have pushed to defund the Minneapolis Police Department in recent years, have now captured the attention of the city's leaders and its residents.

Kandace Montgomery, executive director of Black Visions, said the process to create something in its place begins now.

"So much of our existence has been the lies fed to us that police keep us safe, and no other alternative has really been presented," Montgomery said Monday. "What happens here in Minneapolis is going to shape the rest of the country and, I believe, the world, so we want to get it right."

This week, movement leaders have forced elected officials to take a public stand. On Saturday, Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey was heckled and sent away by protesters after he told them he did not support a full abolishment of the police department.

The next day, in front of a massive crowd at Powderhorn Park, a majority of City Council members stood on a stage and said they would "begin the process of ending the Minneapolis Police Department."

But doing so means more than just creating a "police in T-shirts" model, Montgomery said. It means investing in other facets of society that lead to a safe and healthy population, such as education, housing and health care.

New flash point: Police reform

It also means building a different structure to respond to danger that is "culturally appropriate and competent," she said. Instead of officers responding to calls of domestic assault, substance abuse or mental-health issues, they would be handled by professionals in those fields.

And while a majority of council members made a commitment to end the department, Montgomery acknowledged there needs to be education on the history of the police department - and on the disproportionate violence enacted by police against black people - to sway those who support it.

"We offer an opportunity for those individual officers as well as the institutions to be in a real process of truth and reconciliation," she said. "It's clear that not everybody is going to come with us."

Black Visions was formed in 2017 in part by people who helped establish the local chapter of Black Lives Matter, Montgomery said. After defining the collective's message, the group held a protest in front of Frey's home in 2018 asking him to divest from the police department.

Their push for police divestment continued and strengthened when they joined forces with Reclaim the Block. Their campaign in part influenced the city to create its Office of Violence Prevention within the city's Health Department, Montgomery said.

After a wave of violent crime in downtown Minneapolis last year, a survey showed a majority of Minneapolis residents supported Police Chief Medaria Arradondo's request for hundreds more cops in the coming years. The City Council voted to increase funding of the Minneapolis Police Department in last year's budget from $184.9 million to $193.3 million.

But Floyd's killing, and the resulting violent clashes between police and protesters around the nation, convinced many city leaders to listen to the defund police movement.

Council members on the stage Sunday said they would now begin to tackle dismantling the police department through budget negotiations.

Those pushing for the end of the police department said they believe it cannot be patched through reforms.

"We have had citizen review boards, body cameras and a black chief," sMiski Noor, an organizer with Black Visions, said at Sunday's rally at Powderhorn Park. "But we are still here, watching black people get murdered and tear gassed in our streets.

Noor continued: "We are here to rebuild our city on a different foundation. A foundation of real safety, protection for black people, for native people, for immigrants, for disabled folks, for queer and trans people."

The previous day, thousands marched in northeast Minneapolis toward Frey's home, demanding the defunding of the Minneapolis Police Department.

Huda Yusuf, who was at the protest with her 12-year-old son, Jamal Farah, said that while she supported defunding the police, she did not know if it was realistic.

"You know when an executive comes into a corporation and then cleans house and then hires people? You need to clean house," she said. "To me, defunding the police really means that the community is looking at other options."

New flash point: Police reform

Farah agreed and had his own solutions, including changing officer training and requiring officers to live in the city they serve.

"People say that there's some good cops and some bad cops," he said. "But the good cops are in a bad corporation. They should change the police or just abolish the police, in my opinion."

Another protester, Maisah Outlaw, said the police department is beyond reform, citing how officers voted in Bob Kroll to become president of the Police Officers Federation of Minneapolis.

She said she'd rather see money go toward experts who treat mental health and substance abuse.

"This isn't the first time an institution that is rooted in racism has been abolished. It's not impossible," she said. "We don't need to scare people and beat people into submission."

Miguel Otárola · 612-673-4753

Load-Date: June 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDLV. DISMANTLE MINNEAPOLIS POLICE DEPARTMENT? ACTIVISTS' CALL SETS OFF DEBATE IN CITY

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1198 words

Byline: Amy Forliti

Highlight: George Floyd's death was the breaking point for some Minneapolis civic leaders, who now say the only way to fix the city's embattled police department is to take it apart. But it's not clear how they would do that, and groups that have spent years shining a light on police brutality aren't even sure it's [...]

Body

George Floyd's death was the breaking point for some Minneapolis civic leaders, who now say the only way to fix the city's embattled police department is to take it apart. But it's not clear how they would do that, and groups that have spent years shining a light on police brutality aren't even sure it's the answer.

"We're dismantling our police department," City Council Member Jeremiah Ellison tweeted on Sunday, the same day he and a majority of the council proclaimed support to disband the force to cheering protesters at Powderhorn Park in South Minneapolis. "And we won't be silent. We'll be loud. We'll fight. We'll win."

But dismantling an entire department is exceedingly rare. It was done in Camden, N.J., and was talked about - though ultimately discarded - in Ferguson, Mo., after the death of Michael Brown. Such a move comes with legal issues, including a city charter that stipulates a police force, plus a union-protected workforce.

"Saying that they're going to defund the police or that they're going to ban the police or whatever they're talking about, that was optics, guys," said Michelle Gross, president of the Minneapolis chapter of Communities United Against Police Brutality. "Just plain optics."

Sam Martinez, an activist with Twin Cities Coalition for Justice for Jamar, a group formed after the 2015 death of Jamar Clark in a confrontation with police, said just getting rid of a police department doesn't solve the problem.

"If they attempted to defund the police or reduce the police force, we know they can't do it, and what comes after that? Will they turn over the power to the (Hennepin County) sheriff ... who has had no accountability either?" Martinez said.

Dismantle Minneapolis Police Department? Activists' call sets off debate in city

Community activists have criticized the Minneapolis department for years for what they say is a racist and brutal culture that resists change. The state of Minnesota launched a civil rights investigation of the department last week, and the first concrete changes came Friday in a stipulated agreement in which the city agreed to ban chokeholds and neck restraints.

Steve Cramer, a former City Council member who now serves as president and CEO of the Minneapolis Downtown Council, called rhetoric about ending policing as the city knows it "exhilarating to some but terrifying to others."

"Until we really understand how this kind of evaluation and planning process is going to move forward, there's this vacuum that people are going to fill with their own thoughts," he said. " ... I think that's just a hard place that some of our elected officials have put our community in at a very vulnerable time."

Protesters nationwide are demanding police reforms, and calls to "defund the police" over the death of Floyd and other black Americans killed by law enforcement have become a rallying cry. Supporters say the movement isn't about eliminating police departments or stripping agencies of all of their money. Instead, they say it is time for the country to address systemic problems in policing in America and spend more on what communities across the U.S. need, such as housing and education.

Gross' group, along with others including Minnesota's Council on American-Islamic Relations and two Black Lives Matter chapters, presented their own 40 recommendations for police reform on Monday. They gathered at the remnants of the Third Precinct station, which was set ablaze by protesters at the height of violence following Floyd's death.

Among the recommendations, officers would be required to carry their own professional liability insurance, an idea that aims to hike out-of-pocket insurance rates for officers who engage in high-risk conduct. Some of the worst offenders would become uninsurable and forbidden from working as a police officer.

The groups also are seeking an independent agency to investigate and prosecute critical incidents involving police; mandatory psychological testing for officers; and community participation in negotiating police union contracts. They would end so-called "warrior" training for officers and the use of no-knock warrants, while banning military equipment in community policing as well as neck restraints and chokeholds.

In Ferguson, where the 2014 shooting death of Brown, an unarmed 18-year-old, galvanized the fledgling Black Lives Matter movement, the city and U.S. Justice Department entered a consent agreement that required massive reforms overseen by a court-appointed monitor. Among the results are a department with significantly more black officers, a police use-of-force policy and progress in use of body-worn and in-car cameras.

Ferguson spent $1.1 million in the first three years of the consent agreement and expects to spend another $1 million over the next three years - a significant investment for a city with an annual budget of less than $13 million.

Changes are being talked about elsewhere, too. In New York City, Mayor Bill de Blasio said Sunday that the city would move funding from the NYPD to youth initiatives and social services, while keeping the city safe, but he didn't give details. In Los Angeles, Mayor Eric Garcetti vowed to cut as much as $150 million that was part of a planned increase in the police department's budget.

Dismantle Minneapolis Police Department? Activists' call sets off debate in city

Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey, who was booed at a rally Saturday outside his house when he said he does not support abolishing the department, repeated that stance Monday. In an interview with ABC's "Good Morning America," he said he looked forward to "deciphering" what council members mean by such talk.

He said he favors "a full-on cultural shift in how our Minneapolis Police Department and departments throughout the country function."

"We have difficulty both terminating and disciplining officers, and then getting that termination or discipline to stick," Frey said. "We're going after the police union, the police union contract, the arbitration provisions that mandate that we have arbitration at the end of the process, and oftentimes that reverts the officer to right back where they were to begin with."

Alondra Cano, one of the nine council members who said they support disbanding, called impending change "a process" that is just beginning. Meanwhile, she said the council will look at redirecting funding from the police department toward the city's office of violence prevention and other community safety strategies that will "help inform and bring life to that new public safety system that we all want to create".

Ellison said the city will continue to fund safety initiatives like the Group Violence Intervention program, which started in 2017 with the aim of reducing gun violence.

"I think that we owe it to ourselves as a community to sort of put our resources behind those things that we already know are working," Ellison said. "But we are not going to hit the eject button without a fully realized plan."

George Floyd transcript: Read it in full here Minneapolis council members pledge thoughtful police revamp Monuments and statues are falling. But what comes next? Ramsey County Attorney's Office named pilot site for national program aimed at reducing racial disparities in criminal justice system Officer Chauvin to George Floyd: 'It takes ... a lot of oxygen to talk'

Graphic

People hang a sign in front of the State Capitol building during a protest in St. Paul on Tuesday, June 2, 2020, part of national demonstrations following the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey addresses protesters at a Defund the Police march to protest the killing of George Floyd in police custody in Minneapolis, June 6, 2020. A sea of protesters yelled, "Go home, Jacob, go home," and "Shame," when he would not, on the spot, commit to abolishing the police department. (Victor J. Blue/The New York Times)

Load-Date: July 9, 2020

ARTICLE CDLVI. MPLS. COPS DISCIPLINED IN FRACTION OF CASES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1414 wordsByline: JENNIFER BJORHUS; LIZ SAWYER; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Each year, hundreds of complaints of police misconduct - from citizens and from inside the Minneapolis Police Department itself - land before a civilian review board tasked with investigating them.

Only a tiny fraction result in the discipline of an officer.

Instead, the civilian review authority and the MPD have increasingly relied on "coaching" officers accused of misconduct, a Star Tribune analysis of data compiled by the city's Office of Police Conduct Review shows. This gentler form of corrective action for low-level violations has a decided benefit for police. Most disciplinary records are public information, but the department does not recognize coaching as a form of discipline; complaints classified this way are, by state law, kept closed and out of view.

It's possible that some of the 16 misconduct complaints against now-fired Minneapolis officer Derek Chauvin that were closed with no discipline, for example, were addressed with coaching.

There is no way for the public to know.

The May 25 death of George Floyd under Chauvin's knee spurred international outrage and renewed calls to restructure or abolish the department. Council members and activists calling for the action often cite union protections - along with the department's unwillingness or inability to discipline its own - as a barrier to changing its culture and improving relationships with distrustful minority communities.

In Minneapolis, the state's largest police force, only about 3% of misconduct complaints result in discipline. That number strikes civilian watchdogs and academics alike as low for a department of nearly 850 sworn officers. Comparisons are difficult, however, because there is no central repository for tracking police misconduct in the United States, and every agency counts things differently, said Susan Hutson, president of the National Association for Civilian Oversight of Law Enforcement.

Two departments under federal consent decrees show very different results. In Seattle, roughly 20% of citizen and internal misconduct complaints combined result in discipline. In New Orleans, 14% of outside civilian complaints were sustained with discipline in 2018, while 53% of internal complaints were sustained with discipline.

Mpls. cops disciplined in fraction of cases

Around the country, civilian oversight commissions are frequently criticized for lacking the necessary authority to hold officers accountable for their actions. Yet the vast majority lack funding for investigative auditors and don't have subpoena power, she said.

"We are sometimes fighting with one hand tied behind our back," Hutson said. "We need unfettered access to all the data. Period."

Imani Jaafar, a lawyer who directs the Minneapolis Office of Police Conduct Review, defended what she called "a very good layered civilian oversight system." Minnesota law does not permit any civilian oversight group to discipline law enforcement officers, Jaafar said, and that is not the review board's purpose. All it can do is try to help ensure a just process so officers are held responsible within the confines of the law, she said.

When asked if the 3% discipline outcome and use of coaching was acceptable, Jaafar said that was a question for the police department. Only A-level violations - such as foul language, speeding through a neighborhood or not turning on a body camera at the start of a call - are eligible for coaching.

Jaafar said her main frustration is the inability to provide information on cases that don't result in discipline, such as coaching cases. Minnesota's public records law does not allow it. That's a "huge problem," she said.

The Minneapolis Police Department did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Velma Korbelt, who heads the city's Department of Civil Rights, which houses the civilian oversight group, said the low discipline rate and use of coaching are both the result of factors "outside of the Office of Police Conduct Review oversight." She pointed squarely at the discipline matrix Minneapolis police use to sort out infractions.

The state Department of Human Rights investigation of the Minneapolis Police Department underway will look at both, she said. "That is something that absolutely must be looked at in Minneapolis," Korbelt said. "I think everything should be on the table. Now is the time."

Michelle Gross, president of Citizens United Against Police Brutality, called the discipline rate "unconscionable." She blames it on the ineffectiveness of the civilian review process, which she said is too dominated by law enforcement and city employees.

Gross estimates the national average for discipline from civilian oversight bodies handling civilian misconduct complaints about 7 to 9%. "It makes us the low end outlier for the entire country," said Gross.

Of the 1,600 police misconduct complaints filed in Minneapolis from 2013 through 2018 - the last year of completed data - only 45 resulted in an officer being disciplined. Most of it was a mix of reprimands and suspensions. Five officers were successfully fired during that six-year period, and one was demoted.

During that time more than 270 misconduct allegations were resolved with nondisciplinary coaching.

In Minneapolis, police officers are sometimes not disciplined even when the city pays significant sums to settle allegations that their use of force crossed the line and violated civil rights.

Mpls. cops disciplined in fraction of cases

Tou Thao, videotaped watching Chauvin pressing his knee into Floyd's neck, was sued in 2017 for allegedly beating Lamar Ferguson while he was handcuffed, breaking his teeth. The city paid $25,000 to settle the lawsuit. Thao was never disciplined for his actions, according to police records.

The low rate of discipline troubles Michael Friedman, executive director of the Minneapolis Legal Rights Center, a nonprofit law firm specializing in criminal defense and restorative justice. He said he doubts outcomes have changed much since he chaired the Civilian Review Authority, the earlier version of the oversight board that collapsed in 2012 amid concerns about effectiveness.

"That concerns me because I don't think that could possibly reflect the rate of the misconduct that's being noted by investigators," said Friedman. "I have no reason to think that the overall pattern has changed."

Two retired senior Minneapolis police officials told the Star Tribune that the department leans heavily on coaching because it offers an immediate corrective action. It's faster and more effective to stick an officer in the hot seat in their supervisor's office, they said, than to deal with paperwork, combative union representatives and hearings - which often lead to arbitration. A formal internal affairs investigation could take more than a year before discipline happens. By then the officer has moved on.

"It's kinda like if I whacked my dog an hour after he [misbehaved]," said one former senior official, who is not authorized to speak publicly on the matter.

But others are adamant that coaching shouldn't be used to address deeper problems.

"You can't coach race-based policing," said Merrick J. Bobb, a court-appointed monitor overseeing the federal consent decree that the Seattle police department is operating under.

Bobb and others noted that coaching and its secrecy in Minnesota invite misuse.

"It's not just an administrative workaround; it might also be an intentional way of misleading the public about the true nature and extent of officer misconduct and discipline in the police department," said Metropolitan State University Prof. James Densley.

That's what concerns Friedman. He called Minnesota's public records law "the fundamental issue" complicating efforts to hold Minneapolis police accountable. It says that if an allegation of misconduct does not result in discipline, then all details about who did what are off limits and not open to the public.

"It creates a built-in incentive for police management to let things go so as to avoid public scrutiny for major incidents and preserve their credibility as witnesses," said Friedman.

Bobb was shocked by this provision in state law.

"I find it astounding and disturbing that Minnesota would have a law that prevents citizens from finding out ... what the underlying conduct that was coached was," Merrick said. "One would think that in the wake of the death of George Floyd that coaching and all disciplinary records should be open and transparent to the public."

Jennifer Bjorhus · 612-673-4683 jennifer.bjorhus@startribune.com

Liz Sawyer · 612-673-4648 liz.sawyer@startribune.com

Mpls. cops disciplined in fraction of cases

Load-Date: June 10, 2020

End of Document

MN Gov. Tim Walz orders moment of silence to honor George Floyd at 11 a.m.

ARTICLE CDLVII. MN GOV. TIM WALZ ORDERS MOMENT OF SILENCE TO HONOR GEORGE FLOYD AT 11 A.M.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 216 words

Byline: Isabel Saavedra-Weis

Highlight: The moment of silence will last 8 minutes and 46 seconds, the same amount of time former police officer Derek Chauvin knelt on Floyd's neck.

Body

Minnesota Gov. Tim Walz orders a moment of silence for George Floyd at 11 am on June 9. The moment of silence will last 8 minutes and 46 seconds, the same amount of time former police officer Derek Chauvin knelt on Floyd's neck. Floyd died in police custody on May 25.

After memorial services in Minneapolis and North Carolina, Floyd's body will be buried in Houston, next to his mother's grave.

"The world watched in horror as George Floyd's humanity was taken away from him," Walz wrote. "The local, national, and international mourning for George Floyd is about more than one tragic incident."

On June 5, the Walz-Flanagan administration announced a proposed court order that bans chokeholds and requires other officers to intervene if an officer uses unauthorized force. The administration also announced a civil rights investigation into the Minneapolis Police Department.

Floyd's burial service begins in Texas at 11 a.m.

George Floyd transcript: Read it in full here Minneapolis council members pledge thoughtful police revamp Monuments and statues are falling. But what comes next? Ramsey County Attorney's Office named pilot site for national program aimed at reducing racial disparities in criminal justice system Officer Chauvin to George Floyd: 'It takes ... a lot of oxygen to talk'

Load-Date: July 9, 2020

ARTICLE CDLVIII. [TRUMP PUSHES CONSPIRACY THEORY ABOUT BUFFALO
PROTESTER](#)

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 971 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: WASHINGTON (AP) - President Donald Trump ignited fresh controversy over his hard-line "law and order" push Tuesday by peddling yet another unfounded conspiracy theory, this time trying to raise suspicions about a 75-year-old protester who was hospitalized after being shoved by police and falling.Body

By JILL COLVIN and CAROLYN THOMPSON

WASHINGTON (AP) - President Donald Trump ignited fresh controversy over his hard-line "law and order" push Tuesday by peddling yet another unfounded conspiracy theory, this time trying to raise suspicions about a 75-year-old protester who was hospitalized after being shoved by police and falling.

Trump tweeted without evidence that the confrontation in Buffalo, New York, may have been a "set up" as he once again sided with police officers over protesters and demonstrated anew his willingness to spread and amplify bogus charges cooked up by far-right outlets.

The move comes as Trump, who has labeled himself "your president of law and order," has taken a tough line against the protesters who have been demonstrating across the nation following the killing of George Floyd, a black man who died in police custody in Minneapolis after a white police officer pressed a knee into his neck.

Aides have been urging Trump to strike a more unifying tone, worried that his divisive response to the protests is animating parts of the Democratic base and benefiting his rival, Democrat Joe Biden, months before November's election.

Two Buffalo police officers have been charged with second-degree assault after video captured protester Martin Gugino falling to the ground after being pushed by police. He was seen bleeding from his head as officers walk away. The officers, who could face prison sentences of up to seven years if convicted, have pleaded not guilty.

The video is one of several that have emerged in recent weeks showing police using seemingly excessive force against protesters as Trump has demanded that governors and mayors across the nation take control of their streets using all means necessary. He has repeatedly urged local leaders to call up the national guard and threatened to deploy active-duty military to American cities if he deems local efforts insufficient.

Trump pushes conspiracy theory about Buffalo protester

"Buffalo protester shoved by Police could be an ANTIFA provocateur," Trump wrote in his tweet. "75 year old Martin Gugino was pushed away after appearing to scan police communications in order to black out the equipment. @OANN I watched, he fell harder than was pushed. Was aiming scanner. Could be a set up?"

There is no evidence to suggest that anything of the sort took place. Trump was referencing a report on One America News Network, a far-right news channel that he often praises.

Trump's tweet was criticized by both Republicans and Democrats.

"It's a serious accusation, which should only be made with facts and evidence. And I haven't seen any yet," said Sen. John Thune of South Dakota, the No. 2 Republican in the Senate. Asked by reporters if the president should not be making it, Thune said: "Well, I think that's a given."

Sen. Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska, who last week said she's "struggling with" whether to support Trump in November, reacted to the tweet in the Capitol after a reporter handed her a printout.

"Oh lord. Ugh," she said. "Again, why would you fan the flames? That's all I'm going to say."

New York Democratic Gov. Andrew Cuomo called on Trump to apologize for a "wholly unacceptable" tweet.

"How reckless, how irresponsible, how mean, how crude. I mean if there was ever a reprehensible, dumb comment, and from the president of the United States," Cuomo said at his daily press conference.

"At this moment of anguish and anger, what does he do? Pour gasoline on the fire," he added. "Show some decency. Show some humanity. Show some fairness. You're the president of the United States."

As for the substance of the tweet, the president's claim is "so technically incomprehensible, I'm not even sure where to start," said Matt Blaze, a professor of computer science and law at Georgetown University.

It is possible to disrupt police radio -an illegal action often called "jamming"- but hackers can only do that by attacking receiving stations, not with handheld devices that target an individual police officer's radio, Blaze said.

"Any radio system is subject to interference, but it doesn't work by pointing some sort of ray gun and interfering," Blaze said.

As he has tried to malign protesters as "radical-left, bad people" engaging in domestic terrorism, Trump has frequently invoked the label "antifa," an umbrella term for leftist militants bound more by belief than organizational structure. Trump has blamed antifa for the violence that has erupted during some of the protests. But federal law enforcement officials have offered little evidence that antifa-aligned protesters are behind the efforts seen in hundreds of cities and towns in all 50 states since Floyd's death.

Trump's campaign has run ads calling on Facebook users to applaud the president for saying he would declare antifa a terrorist organization.

Trump pushes conspiracy theory about Buffalo protester

Gugino, who is out of the intensive care unit but remains hospitalized, has been described by friends as a retiree and veteran peace activist driven by his faith and a desire for social justice. He is involved with the Western New York Peace Center and Latin American Solidarity Committee, the center's executive director has said.

Gugino's attorney, Kelly Zarcone, told The Associated Press that Trump's accusations "are utterly baseless and ridiculous."

Gugino, she said, "has always been a peaceful protester because he cares about today's society."

"No one from law enforcement has even suggested anything otherwise, so we are at a loss to understand why the president of the United States would make such dark, dangerous, and untrue accusations about him," she said.

Erie County District Attorney John Flynn declined to comment Tuesday on the president's tweet and said he would have no further comment on the Gugino case because it remains under investigation.

Thompson reported from Buffalo. Associated Press writer Amanda Seitz in Chicago contributed to this report.

Load-Date: July 10, 2020

ARTICLE CDLIX. PEACEFUL PROTEST IS CHANGING MINDS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 8ALength: 475 wordsHighlight: Shows of solidarity for George Floyd have the power to lead to needed systemic reforms.Body

After the violence and destructive chaos that erupted after George Floyd's cruel death on a Minneapolis street, we are being reminded anew of the power of peaceful protest.

Instead of dissipating, the anger at the injustices of our system instead is gathering strength, drawing thousands of Americans to march in every state in the nation and countries abroad, all with the same message: Black lives matter.

That show of solidarity has the power to change the conversation and the culture that has kept us bound far too long to the systemic racism that leaves so many behind. What seems different this time, and more hopeful, is that there is less of a wish to return to "normal," and a greater recognition that what passed for normal wasn't working for a whole lot of people.

And that includes corporations, whose involvement can signal a change in national sentiment, as when many supported same-sex marriage. Increasingly, they are supporting the Black Lives Matter cause. Amazon put up a Black Lives Matter banner on its website recently, with owner Jeff Bezos declaring that he was "happy to lose" customers who objected.

PetSmart on Monday issued a statement that said, "We must all commit to standing with our Black communities, to taking meaningful action, to being held accountable, and to saying what we must until it is no longer necessary: Black Lives Matter." From Netflix: "To be silent is to be complicit."

It is easy to doubt the sincerity of such gestures, just as some have decried the videos that show some police officers hugging protesters, joining with them, line-dancing in solidarity. But those gestures add up. Each one can embolden and inspire others to join in.

On Sunday, Republican former presidential candidate and current U.S. Sen. Mitt Romney joined the thousands marching on the White House. Asked why, he replied, "We need to end violence and brutality, and to make sure that people understand that black lives matter."

On Monday a group of Democratic congressional leaders started their day by kneeling for 8 minutes and 46 seconds in Emancipation Hall - the precise amount of time former Minneapolis Police Officer Derek

Peaceful protest is changing minds

Chauvin can be seen on video applying his knee to Floyd's neck, squeezing the breath from him. Some protesters have chosen to sprawl facedown on the pavement for that period of time or have stood in silence.

These simple yet powerful gestures speak far louder than the violence that caused so much destruction. They draw support. They make room for conversion. They persist long after rage and hate burn themselves out.

Dare we hope that we are finally prepared to root out the rot that has tainted our democracy for so long? We do. But when it comes, it is more likely to be the result not of rage and destruction, but of a peaceful but persistent demand for lasting change that calls out the best in us.

Load-Date: June 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDLX. CHARLES BLOW: ALLIES, DON'T FAIL US AGAIN

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 810 wordsByline: Charles M. BlowHighlight: In 1964, during what was called Freedom Summer, over 700 mostly white young liberals descended on Mississippi to help register black voters. The attention that effort generated helped convince the powers in Washington to pass the Civil Rights Act of 1964. In fact, white liberals were involved in many parts of the civil rights movement, [...]Body

In 1964, during what was called Freedom Summer, over 700 mostly white young liberals descended on Mississippi to help register black voters.

The attention that effort generated helped convince the powers in Washington to pass the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

In fact, white liberals were involved in many parts of the civil rights movement, in participation, organization and funding.

But the backlash was quick. A New York Times survey conducted just months after the Civil Rights Act was passed found that most white New Yorkers believed that the civil rights movement had gone too far.

Two years later, when Martin Luther King Jr. moved to Chicago to begin the Chicago Campaign to push for fair housing, he was met by vicious, violent protests from white mobs and resistance from many of the same white legislators who had supported the Civil Rights Act.

At one protest King was hit so hard by a rock that it knocked him to the ground. As the Chicago Tribune reported, a riot broke out that day:

"At least 30 people were injured, some by a hail of bricks and bottles accompanied by racial epithets. Some counter demonstrators were clubbed by baton-wielding police officers. More than 40 people were arrested when a crowd of whites blocked adjoining streets and cursed the police, several of whom were hurt."

King would say after the riot, "I have seen many demonstrations in the South but I have never seen anything so hostile and so hateful as I've seen here today."

In a 1967 speech at Stanford, King bemoaned:

"I'm convinced that many of the very people who supported us in the struggle in the South are not willing to go all the way now. I came to see this in a very difficult and painful way. In Chicago the last year, where I've lived and worked. Some of the people who came quickly to march with us in Selma and Birmingham weren't active around Chicago. And I came to see that so many people who supported morally and even financially what we were doing in Birmingham and Selma, were really outraged against the extremist behavior of Bull Connor and Jim Clark toward Negroes, rather than believing in genuine equality for Negroes."

Many of the white liberals who supported the movement had been moved by embarrassment, moved by images of cruelty rather than the idea of genuine, equitable inclusion.

White allies had disappointed, once again.

One of the most hopeful and heartening features of the current protests has been the images of people of all races, in this country and around the world, openly supporting anti-racism, carrying Black Lives Matter posters and using more sophisticated language in discussing the matter of state violence against black people.

The challenge here is to sustain the current sentiment and not let this version of Freedom Summer be yet another moment when allies fail.

We must make sure, make a statement, that this is a true change in the American ideology and not an activist-chic, summer street festival for people who have been cooped up for months, not able to go to school or graduate, not able to go to concerts or bars.

This is not the social justice Coachella. This is not systemic racism Woodstock. This has to be a forever committed, even after protest eventually subsides.

Once again, many white allies, to some degree, have been moved by the embarrassment at intransigence and by the image of public cruelty, in much the same way as it happened in the 1960s.

This feels bigger; it is bigger.

But we must resist efforts to simply pacify and quell, to simply stop the awful images. We must strike at the root: that the entire system operates in a way that is anti-black, that it disadvantages and even punishes blackness, that part of your privilege is built on my oppression.

We will have to come to see and accept that this system of oppression has been actively, energetically designed and deployed over centuries, and it takes centuries of equally active and energetic efforts to dismantle it.

We must make ourselves comfortable with the notion that for the privileged, equality will feel like oppression, and that things - legacy power, wealth accumulation, cultural influence - will not be advantaged by whiteness.

Walter Mondale, who was a young senator from Minnesota in the 1960s, seemed to agree, saying: "A lot of Civil Rights was about making the South behave and taking the teeth from George Wallace." But, he continued, Fair Housing "came right to the neighborhoods across the country. This was Civil Rights getting personal."

Charles Blow: Allies, don't fail us again

How will our white allies respond when this summer has passed? How will they respond when civil rights gets personal and it's about them and not just punishing the white man who pressed his knee into George Floyd's neck? How will they respond when true equality threatens their privilege, when it actually starts to cost them something?

Charles M. Blow writes a column for the New York Times.

-

Load-Date: July 9, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDLXI. READERS WRITE GET RID OF THIS STRUCTURE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 8ALength: 1238 wordsBody

MINNEAPOLIS POLICE

It is time to ask ourselves, "What does our police department do?" Make a list, look at each function and ask: 1) Is it worth doing? 2) Who could do it better than the police? I think once we lay it out, we'll find that police officers are the wrong people to be doing many of their assigned jobs. They aren't trained social workers; they aren't EMTs; most are not crime-solvers; and they are demonstrably bad at preventing crime. They are an armed force deployed to intimidate, not protect and serve.

They cannot operate effectively in a diverse culture because they have a racist culture of their own. The problem with the police force is not a few bad apples, but a culture that is rotten to the core. And even good cops, of whom there are plenty, get dragged down to the level of what we saw displayed in the George Floyd arrest.

The Minneapolis City Council has it right ("A vow to abolish the MPD," front page, June 8). Time to begin systematically dismembering this monstrous, ineffective structure and reassigning work to more competent and cost-effective people.

Robert Veitch, Richfield

. . .

The reckless and ill-planned decision by the young and naive Minneapolis City Council to support disbanding the Minneapolis Police Department has major repercussions that our radical city government never realized.

It was obvious after watching TV interviews with Council Members Lisa Bender and Jeremiah Ellison that neither had a clue what this new paradigm will look like and how essential police and first responder services will be provided to the community.

They should have worked on a plan before making an announcement that only created panic in the community. All that they accomplished was to worsen an already demoralized police department. I predict more police officer departures and worsening crime rates and police response times in the city of Minneapolis.

The knee-jerk emotional reaction has also sent shock waves through the business community. Good luck trying to entice business conventions to our Minneapolis Convention Center, business investment or revitalization, or tourism to a city that does not appear safe or stable. Get ready for a mass exodus of businesses and residents to the suburbs as crime and police services worsen too.

The City Council should recognize that it represents far more constituents than those yelling the loudest at a protest. Someone needs to be the adult in the room and recognize the broad impact of this decision.

Corby Peltó, Minneapolis

. . .

Words matter. If protesters persist in using the terms "abolish" the police or "defund" the police, they'll walk right into the tiger trap of the president and succeed in snatching defeat from the jaws of victory. Better to call for a "re-envisioning" or "reimagining" of the Police Department and commit to creating a sensible strategy for accomplishing it that involves all participants - oppressed minorities, police, experts in social and criminal reform, psychologists, elected officials, concerned citizens, etc. Don't lose a tight match by kicking the ball in your own goal.

James Peterson, Minneapolis

. . .

As a former president of the Minneapolis City Council who served during the protests that took place in the wake of Martin Luther King Jr.'s assassination, I am familiar with the role city officials must play in dealing with the issues that are arising today in the wake of the killing of George Floyd. Yes, reforms are necessary, but abolishing the police would be counterproductive. What I would like to have done is not less police presence, but more.

We should require members of the police force to live in the city. That was the law until the police successfully lobbied to have the requirement removed by the Legislature. I believe that if a person is employed by the city and draws their income from the city, paid for by taxes on city residents, then they should share that responsibility.

I also believe that having a cop in the neighborhood, even just as a resident, automatically increases police protection for the whole neighborhood. It means a lot fewer burglaries, because burglars case their targets before they strike, and they don't care to mess around when they know a cop is a few steps away. It means a 24-hours-a-day cop presence, not just an 8-hour shift. It means the cops get to know the neighborhood and the neighborhood gets to know the cops. And you will see them in church. Or in the mosque. They will be part of your life. And you will be part of theirs.

Dan Cohen, Minneapolis

PROTESTS

Friendly advice: Don't skewer allies

I'm an old, ex-hippie, progressive white guy. I've been demonstrating for peace and civil rights since the early '60s. I've been spat upon, punched out and forcefully arrested. I will not waste my quota of words on President Donald Trump or his minions. Instead, I would like to address the leader of the demonstration who treated Mayor Jacob Frey so despicably ("Protesters march to defund Mpls. police," June 7).

You just damaged this movement as disastrously as the fringe idiots who looted and burned. Time and again I've watched wonderful impulses get hijacked by mic-drunk extremists who witlessly make a mockery of a righteous cause.

Demanding a "yes or no" on-the-spot answer to gutting the police force from your movement's best ally and highest-ranking official, and then enforcing your compelled answer by appealing to an assembled mob, is gutless and imbecilic. Or maybe you understand this rhetoric better: It's counterproductive and counterrevolutionary.

"Leaders" like you unerringly seek out the politician most in tune with their agenda and then shove him into an abyss with infantile screams for not just the unreasonable but for the utterly impossible. What does humiliating Frey get you? And how on earth are you one whit better in that regard than Donald Trump?

Or do you just want to re-elect him? This cockamamie "defund the police" ultimatum will succeed in doing just that. It may even push us one step closer to civil war. Give your mic to somebody else. Climb down off your soap box and wise up before you hurt the good people fighting to achieve peace and justice.

Dennis J. Reardon, Bloomington, Ind.

OFFENSIVE POSTS

Local shops take the gutless route: Shunning Holy Land

Several years ago, the owner of Holy Land Brand Inc.'s daughter posted some racist and anti-Jewish musings on social media. Rather than seeing this as an opportunity for healing and education, the "language police" have decided that only punishment will do ("Holy Land deli loses business over racist posts," June 6). The good folks of Lunds & Byerlys, Seward Co-op, etc., fearing the wrath of their customers and members, have decided that CEO Majdi Wadi's products must be banished from their shelves. In today's political climate, he is persona non grata.

Is this the world we want to live in? Is everyone beyond forgiveness? I don't like the language and sentiments that were posted - I happen to be Jewish myself. The reaction, however, is cowardly and hysterical. It is not virtue that is driving this boycott; it is passivity and fear. It is easier to shun people than to talk with them, so what is easy is being done.

I live in northeast Minneapolis and see Holy Land as an asset to the neighborhood. It is my hope that the business will continue to thrive despite this setback.

Charlie Meyers, Minneapolis

We want to hear from you. Send us your thoughts here.

Load-Date: June 10, 2020

READERS WRITE Get rid of this structure

End of Document

ARTICLE CDLXII. FAQ

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 6ALength: 499 wordsByline: ROCHELLE OLSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Details are few in plan to defundBody

Defunding or dismantling the Minneapolis Police Department has become a cohesive cry from protesters since the death of George Floyd under the knee of a city officer two weeks ago.

On Sunday, nine Minneapolis City Council members told a crowd they were prepared to "begin the process of dismantling the Minneapolis Police Department."

Q: Why is the City Council talking about dismantling or defunding Minneapolis police?

A: The killing of Floyd, captured on video by a bystander and considered by many to be a modern-day lynching, shocked the community's conscience and launched two weeks of global protests from one Minneapolis street corner. But the problem is longstanding. The city's poorer and minority residents on whom police disproportionately use force are often wary of police.

Q: What do Minneapolis City Council members mean by dismantling the department?

A: The Council has not released specifics. The council members have articulated support for the concept, but the details will be more difficult. There are clues. Last Friday, the Council met in an emergency session and banned chokeholds and neck restraints in all circumstances.

Even before Floyd's death, the current City Council refused requests from Mayor Jacob Frey to increase the number of police on city streets.

Q: Is dismantling different from defunding?

A: Dismantling implies abolition of the current structure. Defunding refers to shaving the budget. Behind both is the idea of shifting resources from a paramilitary police force to education and social services with the aim of reducing socioeconomic disparities.

Q: Will there be police on Minneapolis streets this summer?

FAQ

A: Yes. The council for now has nine members agreeing on the concept of dismantling the department, but there are no agreements on the details or a plan of action for next steps.

Q: Can the Council "defund" the police and stop paying them?

A: Not entirely. The Council must follow the City Charter, which requires the funding of "a police force of at least 0.0017 employees per resident, and provide for those employees' compensation ..."

Q: What would replace police?

A: The idea generally would be to have a social services-based approach, possibly using the fire department to handle drug overdose calls, and health care and social services professionals to tend to mental health matters instead of militaristic, uniformed officers with guns. But even council members who want to dismantle the police aren't yet articulating detailed agreement on a new approach.

Q: Has any U.S. city done this?

A: There have been attempts at shifting focus. The police force in Camden, N.J., shifted training into heavily emphasizing de-escalation tactics where restraints and force were used as a last resort. Los Angeles Mayor Eric Garcetti has embraced removing $150 million from the $2 billion police budget. Last year, 911 operators in Austin, Texas, began asking callers whether they were seeking police, fire or mental health assistance.

Rochelle Olson · 612-673-1747

Load-Date: June 10, 2020

Man, 23, charged in fire at precinct

ARTICLE CDLXIII. MAN, 23, CHARGED IN FIRE AT PRECINCT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1B

Length: 580 words

Byline: DAVID CHANEN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: A St. Paul security guard boasted on social media about the fire, gear theft.

Body

A former Menards store security guard was charged Monday with arson that damaged the Minneapolis Police Department's Third Precinct building following the May 25 killing of George Floyd in police custody.

Branden M. Wolfe, 23, of St. Paul, is the first person to be charged in connection with the Third Precinct building fire. Hundreds of businesses were damaged in south Minneapolis and St. Paul in the aftermath of Floyd's death on Memorial Day.

The Third Precinct was overrun and heavily damaged from vandalism and arson May 28. Investigators identified several separate fires started in the building. In an interview with law enforcement, Wolfe admitted to being inside the Third Precinct the night of the arson, according to a criminal complaint filed Monday in U.S. District Court in St. Paul.

He took property from the building and pushed a wooden barrel into the fire, the complaint says. Wolfe also identified himself in several photographs depicting him in front of the Third Precinct building holding a police baton, with smoke and flames visible in the background, the complaint says.

It says Wolfe confirmed that he pushed a wooden barrel into the fire, knowing that it would help keep the fire burning. Investigators recovered charred metal barrel rings from the scene.

Wolfe was arrested Wednesday after St. Paul police received a complaint that he was trying to enter the Menards home improvement store on University Avenue. He had been a security guard at the store but had been fired earlier Wednesday after he referred to social media posts about him stealing items from the Third Precinct.

When he was arrested, Wolfe was wearing body armor and a police-issued duty belt and carrying a baton. The belt had handcuffs and a knife, and his name was written in duct tape on the back of the body armor, the complaint says.

Man, 23, charged in fire at precinct

Law enforcement later recovered from Wolfe's apartment additional items belonging to the Minneapolis Police Department, including a riot helmet, a 9-mm pistol magazine, a police radio and a police-issued overdose kit.

Wolfe has been convicted of a petty-misdemeanor trespass charge and interfering with a 911 call, which is a gross misdemeanor. On the 911 case, charges of domestic assault, property damage, trespass and disorderly conduct were dismissed. He is on probation in that case until September 2021.

Wolfe's father, Robert Wolfe of Macon, Ga., said he knew nothing of his son's legal troubles or his political leanings. He said his son was raised by his mother and home-schooled in a suburb of Pensacola, Fla.

"He has grandiose ideas, a lot of them ... and zero common sense," Robert Wolfe said.

As for the alleged arson, he said, "I'm still proud of him, whether he burned down the police station or not. He didn't hurt nobody, did he?"

Branden Wolfe has split time recently between Florida and the Twin Cities, where he has lived for about a year and where he and woman have a toddler daughter, his father said.

Wolfe is scheduled to make his initial appearance in federal court Tuesday afternoon.

The ATF and FBI urge the public to report suspected arson, use of explosive devices or destructive acts associated with the recent unrest.

Anyone with information specifically related to the Third Precinct fire or other business fires in the Twin Cities can call 1-888-ATF-TIPS (1-888-283-8477), e-mail ATFTips@atf.gov or submit information anonymously via ReportIt.com.

Staff writer Paul Walsh contributed to this report.

David Chanen · 612-673-4465

Load-Date: June 10, 2020

POLICING

ARTICLE CDLXIV. POLICING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 9ALength: 576 wordsByline: MINDY GREILING, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Separating policing, mental health response isn't easy // The entire mental health system overlaps with the judiciary system.Body

When I read in the Star Tribune ("A vow to abolish the MPD," June 8) that some City Council members are calling for dismantling the Minneapolis Police Department, suggesting instead to send mental health professionals to respond to certain emergencies, I thought of my son's first mental health crisis.

His psychologist had recommended calling the police.

"The police?" I remember shrieking. "Why not you or some other medical person?"

He assured me that this was the fastest way to get Jim into the mental health system.

It seemed crazy to me, but I soon found that the entire mental health system overlaps with the judicial system - from police crisis calls to sheriff transports to civil commitment courts to jails and prisons being "providers" of last resort.

Over the last 20 years, our family has dealt with more mental health providers than I care to count. Their after-hours answering machines - when mental health crises tend to occur - all routinely say, "If this is an emergency, hang up [your phone] and dial 911." That means the police. They are equipped to come the fastest and are trained to deal with violence. When I have called county crisis teams, they sometimes advise calling the police. In our experience, it's a rarer mental health professional than we have ever found who dares to show up at such times without police backup.

Being the mother of a son with a serious mental illness gives me a very small glimpse into the quandary African-American families face all the time when dealing with police. In a front-page June 5 Star Tribune article, a mental health worker said that what happened to George Floyd made her think of her clients, who are also at risk because of a lack of understanding between law enforcement and marginalized people. During one crisis with our son that went beyond my coping ability, I called 911. As always, my heart was in my throat. At the time, there had been several examples of people in mental health crisis who had been killed by the police. I weighed the odds carefully.

POLICING

A compassionate officer picked me up so I could move my car, which Jim had been driving, off a busy street. When I arrived on the scene, three or four officers had Jim on the ground, kneeling over him. I asked if he had been shot and started toward them. The officer in charge yelled at me to get back and kept on berating me, as if this were a crime scene instead of a medical emergency. The other officers looked at me with sympathy but didn't intervene. When an ambulance arrived we were back in medical mode but I never forgot how being yelled at, as if I were an accomplice to a crime, made me feel.

I thought of Jim pressed into the ground by those officers when I saw the videos of George Floyd. No ambulance came for him until he was dead.

The mental health worker quoted in the Star Tribune didn't call for dismantling the Police Department, however. She talked about better-educated, better-trained police. In 2016, I co-chaired a local Roseville Area League of Women Voters study about the police in our five cities. We made similar recommendations. We concluded, as I'm sure the mental health worker knows and our family knows, that, like it or not, police are often needed when psychosis and substance abuse crises are involved.

Mindy Greiling is a former member of the Minnesota House and is the author of "Fix What You Can: Schizophrenia and a Lawmaker's Fight for Her Son," forthcoming in October. On Twitter: @MGreiling.

Load-Date: June 10, 2020

Tires slashed by officers in Mpls. unrest

ARTICLE CDLXV. TIRES SLASHED BY OFFICERS IN MPLS. UNREST

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 565 wordsByline: PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Two law enforcement agencies acknowledged Monday that officers patrolling Minneapolis during the height of recent protests knifed the tires of numerous vehicles parked and unoccupied in at least two locations in the midst of the unrest.

Video and photo images posted on the news outlet Mother Jones show officers in military-style uniforms puncturing tires in the Kmart parking lot at Lake Street and Nicollet Avenue on May 30.

Images from S. Washington Avenue at Interstate 35W also showed officers with knives deflating the tires of two unoccupied cars with repeated jabs on May 31. Department of Public Safety spokesman Bruce Gordon confirmed that tires were cut in "a few locations."

"State Patrol troopers strategically deflated tires ... in order to stop behaviors such as vehicles driving dangerously and at high speeds in and around protesters and law enforcement," Gordon said.

Gordon said the patrol also targeted vehicles "that contained items used to cause harm during violent protests" such as rocks, concrete and sticks.

"While not a typical tactic, vehicles were being used as dangerous weapons and inhibited our ability to clear areas and keep areas safe where violent protests were occurring," he said. As in all operations of this size, there will be a review about how these decisions were made."

Deputies from Anoka County followed state orders and joined the patrol and also cut the tires on vehicles on Washington Avenue, said Anoka County Sheriff's Lt. Andy Knotz.

Knotz said the deputies got their directions from the state-led Multiagency Command Center [MACC], which was coordinating law enforcement during the protests connected to the death on May 25 of George Floyd.

Towing the vehicles was not an option, Knotz said, because "you could not get any tow trucks in there" because of the mass of people in the area.

Tires slashed by officers in Mpls. unrest

Val Ebertz, who was at the protests, witnessed police slashing tires in the Kmart parking lot at Lake Street and Nicollet Avenue in the midst of protests on May 30.

She added these were the same officers who "were tear-gassing and shooting us with rubber bullets to try to push us farther back into the Kmart parking lot."

Kyla Cook was with Ebertz and said "all of us were in shock" when she and others in the Kmart lot saw one member from a line of officers in riot gear knife the tires of an unattended pickup truck.

Among the vehicle owners whose tires were damaged was Star Tribune reporter Chris Serres, who was covering the protests the night of May 30 and returned to the Kmart lot about 1 a.m. to find that his car was among a few dozen with flattened tires.

"As far as I could see, it looked like all their tires had been slashed," Serres said.

Los Angeles documentary and television producer Andrew Kimmel said his tires were similarly slashed while parked in the Kmart lot. His video of the damage on Twitter has been viewed more than 1.25 million times as of Monday afternoon.

"It was every single car that was in the parking lot," said Kimmel, who has covered more than 100 protests in the past several years and added, "I've never seen the tire slashing before, particularly in a parking lot."

Spokesmen for the Minneapolis Police Department, Hennepin County Sheriff's Office and the National Guard said their personnel were not the ones shown damaging tires in the videos and photos that are making the rounds on social media.

Paul Walsh · 612-673-4482

Load-Date: June 10, 2020

Disbanding Duluth Police Department unlikely, officials say

ARTICLE CDLXVI. DISBANDING DULUTH POLICE DEPARTMENT UNLIKELY, OFFICIALS SAY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3B

Length: 447 words

Byline: KATIE GALIOTO; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

DULUTH - A day after nine Minneapolis City Council members pledged to launch efforts to end the state's largest police force, city leaders in northeastern Minnesota's urban hub said they plan to engage the community as they consider public safety reforms.

"The authority of any police department comes from the people in the community," Duluth Police Chief Mike Tusken said at a news conference Monday. "To show that's important here, we build policies and practices with our community."

Tusken has condemned the actions of Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin, who knelt on George Floyd's neck for almost nine minutes as the 46-year-old black man pleaded that he couldn't breathe, slipped into unconsciousness and later died.

"I think we are seeing a constituency in Minneapolis who has rejected the police and their authority," said Tusken, referencing calls from the Twin Cities to defund or dismantle police departments.

City Council President Gary Anderson said Monday that he has received numerous e-mails from Duluth residents asking the council to broach the subject of reforms that would shift dollars now allocated to law enforcement to other community needs.

Duluth Mayor Emily Larson said she expects all city departments to face cuts in the coming year due to the coronavirus pandemic, which has carved a potential $38 million shortfall in Duluth's budget. She added Monday that conversations about how the city wants to invest in public safety can be a part of the process of budgeting for 2021 that will happen over the next few months.

"A budget is a moral document," Larson said. "It will demonstrate your values."

City officials touted previous policies developed after extensive dialogue with residents - most recently, Duluth's Citizen Review Board developed a policy dictating when police can wear protective riot gear.

Disbanding Duluth Police Department unlikely, officials say

The city is taking applications for two spots on the advisory body, which was created to serve as link between Duluth residents and the police.

Tusken also said Duluth police practice versions of the use-of-force policies recommended by the "8 Can't Wait" campaign, a national movement urging cities to implement eight guidelines that organizers say can reduce police killings. Among the campaign's recommendations are a ban on chokeholds and required warnings from officers firing a shot.

Archie Davis, the president of the Citizen Review Board, said though he thinks "there's still a lot of fear" surrounding how police treat people of color, right now he's not hearing cries in Duluth to disband law enforcement agencies.

"I don't foresee that here in Duluth," he said. "I think we're a little bit further advanced."

Katie Galioto · 612-673-4478

Load-Date: June 10, 2020

ARTICLE CDLXVII. BREAKING BARRIERS, AND THE INTERNET

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 1264 wordsByline: ROHAN PRESTON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Nic Zapko is feeling the love.

With her close-cropped hair and charismatic presence, the ASL interpreter is drawing huzzahs for her strength and expressive interpreting of Gov. Tim Walz's news conferences during the COVID-19 and George Floyd emergencies. Buzzy profiles have appeared in City Pages, the Daily Mail and on WCCO-TV. Ordinary people have taken screenshots of Zapko at work and posted them on social media.

But as she brings visibility, hope and inclusive messaging to the deaf community, she's not just internet-famous. People who recognize her in the real world sometimes reach to touch or hug her, both no-nos in this era of social distancing.

Zapko, 49, is bashful about all the fuss.

"I'm just a person - a mother, a sister and a friend," Zapko said during an interview in St. Paul. "I've been a mentor, trainer, actor, interpreter. People around me got my back and support me as I move forward. It's definitely not a one-woman show."

The greater world may be getting to know her now, but her gifts are well known in the Twin Cities performing arts scene.

"She's extraordinarily smart and a great communicator with a very powerful presence," said director Zaraawar Mistry. "But beyond her compelling gifts as a performer, she's also committed and incredibly hardworking. When you combine those traits with being loving and kind, you get a very special person."

Her career has been shaped by current events before. Zapko was about to open in "The Transposed Heads," Ragamala Dance Company's trilingual English, dance and ASL adapta tion of Thomas Mann's Indian folklore story, just as the Sept. 11 attacks hit in 2001. The terror strikes wiped away the show's audience, but the company brought the show back a few years later under the same team, including Mistry.

Mistry would later stage and help write Zapko's solo autobiographical work, "A Look in the Mirror," first produced at Dreamland Arts in St. Paul in 2009 before going on a national tour.

Craving communication

"Mirror" told of some of the challenges she faced in her youth. Born in Pittston, Pa., near where NBC's "The Office" is set, she grew up craving clear communication, stability and a sense of belonging in 1970s America.

"ASL wasn't recognized as a language back then," Zapko said through interpreter and friend Patty McCutcheon, the CEO and co-owner of Keystone Solutions, with whom Zapko works. "There really was this mix of speaking and signing at the time called Total Communication.

"But what really impacted me was my mother. She emphasized that I could do what I want, be my own person. She said, 'Go forward and don't let people tell you what you can't do,' and that you're not able. That stuck with me."

Zapko's mother died suddenly when she was 13, throwing her life into turmoil.

"I ended up moving around from [her] sister to sister, and that's how I ended up moving to Ohio with my deaf brother," Zapko said. "My mom's death was horrible, and from then on, I basically raised myself."

A period of poverty and privation followed, worsened by how society treated the deaf.

"In the '70s, there wasn't a lot of access for a deaf person like myself," Zapko said. "I had to show that I was bigger than that, and when people thought I couldn't do something, I had to show them that I could.

"The things that inspire me come from those tragedies - they're one in the same."

Zapko moved to the Twin Cities in the 1990s, attended St. Paul College and found her footing in theater. It was an arena where she got to learn about the wider world, even as it opened doors for her. The tools of the field included "just being able to observe people, absorb their energy and thoughts, then give that back - that's a gift," Zapko said.

That gift is what people see on-screen as she interprets.

Harder than it looks

People who do something well often make it look easy. Think Simone Biles on the balance beam, Michael Jordan above a basketball rim or Meryl Streep before a camera.

Zapko is no exception, even as she's quick to point out that it gets hectic and she's the face of a team effort.

"I'm sweating up there," Zapko said. "I have a whole crew that helps lift me and gives me ground."

That team includes McCutcheon, who sits in front of the podium and interprets in real time as Walz, Attorney General Keith Ellison and other officials talk.

"I'm a real-time relay station," McCutcheon said. "My job is to manage the speed that the information is being delivered to me and then back to Nic and still be able to get to the point and get the message clear and concise."

The team does a lot of homework so that they can be clear and competent in the moment.

"We ask, what's the message, the mood and what is the goal of the message, is it to move people, to calm people, to reassure and build trust," McCutcheon said. "Oftentimes, press conferences are very secretive until the end. We sometimes get no heads-up. We remain calm and true to the person we're interpreting for."

"In English, we have exclamation points to make emphasis, and commas to show intonation," Zapko added. "The interpreter delivers that information to me, and I then put my ASL equivalent message on my face to show tone to match his intent, his tenor. Is it a serious tone versus a little bit of humor versus getting your attention? There's a huge range of emotion so that the audience sees what kind of person Gov. Walz is."

For hearing people, gesture follows sound, the primary communication mode. But ASL is three-dimensional, with its own syntax. When Zapko is signing, she's almost like a dancer, so fluid with her expression.

"English has its own rules of grammar and is more linear as a language," Zapko said. "ASL is very dynamic. Its structure - noun, verb, subject order - is completely different. It's more visual, and that's why you have to show the language."

Sound barrier

The hearing world presents a bewildering barrier to a person who is deaf, including a fear by people who don't speak ASL. The deaf can't hear the cacophony of the world. And don't get her started on a place like the airport, where everything is oriented for the hearing.

"Information, whether you're hearing or seeing it, is something we lack in general," Zapko said. "At the airport, there's announcements all the time that people are listening to and following. They're getting news. I see people's heads move, look up, receive information that I'm not receiving, and I have to figure out what it is. It adds an extra burden."

Sometimes, getting that information can mean the difference between life and death.

"In other states, if there's a hurricane or a fire, the last people to know are always deaf people," Zapko said. "Access to information is far from equal for us."

She is glad to be able to transmit vital information to Minnesotans. "People are so grateful this is happening so they can get it in real time instead of getting arrested and finding out, oh, I violated curfew," Zapko said. "These are major things for us."

While this is the biggest stage for her work thus far, Zapko got another brush with buzzy renown when Minnesota achieved marriage equality. On Aug. 1, 2013, the first day that same-sex couples could wed, Zapko tied the knot with partner Lisa Zapko. Minneapolis' then-Mayor R.T. Rybak presided.

Her experience coming through trauma colors her worldview, Zapko said, and gives her hope for a nation confronting COVID-19 and this latest social eruption against systemic racism and police brutality.

"As heart-wrenching and sad as things are, you get clarity," Zapko said. "That's what keeps me rolling."

Rohan Preston · 612-673-4390 · @rohanpreston

Load-Date: June 9, 2020

End of Document

PROSECUTION

ARTICLE CDLXVIII. PROSECUTION

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 9ALength: 563 wordsByline: BRIAN S. CARTER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Now is not the time to abandon Minneapolis // A mutually beneficial arrangement for pro bono work by a law firm has ended, but those of us who work for the city will continue to serve the public good.Body

On June 3, this paper reported that the Dorsey & Whitney law firm has ended its pro bono prosecution program with the Minneapolis city attorney. For 42 years, attorneys from Dorsey have volunteered as special prosecutors for the Minneapolis City Attorney's Office. It has been an arrangement of mutual benefit. Minneapolis gained help with its crushing load of misdemeanor prosecutions, and Dorsey got its lawyers jury-trial experience that would otherwise be hen's-tooth rare.

Now, asserting that their pro bono hours are better spent elsewhere and not wanting to "support" the Minneapolis Police Department in any way, Dorsey has ended the program. The underlying statement is unmistakable: The city attorney's work is not for the public good.

For all of us, but especially those of us who forwent lucrative careers at a big firm to serve the community as civil servants, Dorsey's move is a gut punch. It is a hard time to be a Minneapolis employee, but now is the time to continue our hard work it is not the time to jump ship.

The Minneapolis city attorney does good work and it does it well. Our office has been on the cutting edge of cash bail reform, diversion programs, and specialty courts like DWI and veterans' courts. These programs seek to treat social ills with social solutions rather than incarceration and fines. Beyond this, there is the meat-and-potatoes work of our trial teams who prosecute crimes to gain justice for victims of drunken driving, theft, assault and domestic violence. And we have - absolutely - prosecuted police officers.

Further, our client services attorneys support all facets of the city's operations, from public works, to the Fire Department, to the Department of Civil Rights. And while our litigators defend - as required by Minnesota statute - the city and its employees, including police officers, we do so with integrity and pursuant to our ethical obligations to our clients.

PROSECUTION

Finally, our human-resources attorneys work hard to support management's personnel decisions. These cases often involve the union's challenges to discipline and termination of police officers. More often than not, it seems, the discipline and terminations are overturned by arbitrators who "split the baby" and courts that second-guess management's hard decisions. The city attorney's practice is diverse and complicated, but the office is composed of good public servants dedicated to making the city a better place by discharging their duties.

Moreover, the city attorney's lawyers and staff work hard to improve equity and inclusion in the office and citywide. As one of many founding members of the office's equity and inclusion team, I have seen firsthand the hard and sincere work of our lawyers and staff on this front. Lawyers and staff who are drawn from all backgrounds: immigrants, people of color, LGBTQIA individuals, veterans, and, yes, even people with last names like "Anderson."

So, to my colleagues at the office: As civil servants, it is our job to help make things better, and I know you will double your efforts in these difficult times. I am proud to work side-by-side with you. I expect all of us to take a hard look at what we do and how we do it. We will make hard choices and hard changes, but, like always, we will strive for the public good - pro bono publico.

Brian S. Carter is an assistant city attorney for the city of Minneapolis.

Load-Date: June 10, 2020

19-year-olds charged with arson of St. Paul store during George Floyd unrest

ARTICLE CDLXIX. 19-YEAR-OLDS CHARGED WITH ARSON OF ST. PAUL STORE
DURING GEORGE FLOYD UNREST

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 275 words

Byline: Kristi Belcamino

Highlight: A Brooklyn Park man and a Ramsey woman, both 19, have been charged with conspiracy to commit arson in connection with a deliberately set fire in St. Paul following the death of George Floyd in the custody of Minneapolis police. Samuel Elliott Frey of Brooklyn Park and Bailey Marie Baldus of Ramsey made their first [...]

Body

A Brooklyn Park man and a Ramsey woman, both 19, have been charged with conspiracy to commit arson in connection with a deliberately set fire in St. Paul following the death of George Floyd in the custody of Minneapolis police.

Samuel Elliott Frey of Brooklyn Park and Bailey Marie Baldus of Ramsey made their first court appearance Tuesday in U.S. District Court in St. Paul in connection with the May 28 arson fire at the Great Health Nutrition store at 1360 W. University Ave.

According to the criminal complaint, after circulating images of the arsonists taken from video surveillance, the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives received numerous tips and was able to identify Frey and Baldus as two of the people in the video.

In the surveillance video footage at the Midway store, Frey can be seen pouring flammable hand sanitizer onto a shelving unit and setting it on fire.

Anyone with information specifically related to business fires in the Twin Cities can call 1-888-ATF-TIPS (1-888-283-8477), email ATFTips@atf.gov or submit information anonymously via ReportIt.com.

In addition to fires, the FBI is looking for people who may have incited or promoted violence of any kind. Anyone with digital material or tips can call 1-800-CALLFBI (800-225-5342) or submit images or videos at FBI.gov/violence.

'We don't think we did this all right': State leaders weigh in on response to Minneapolis riots Medical experts: Floyd's speech didn't mean he could breathe George Floyd transcript: Read it in full here Minneapolis council members pledge thoughtful police revamp Monuments and statues are falling. But what comes next?

19-year-olds charged with arson of St. Paul store during George Floyd unrest

Load-Date: July 10, 2020

End of Document

As Gov. Tim Walz tours damage in St. Paul, insurance group says losses to Twin Cities businesses could top $100M

ARTICLE CDLXX. AS GOV. TIM WALZ TOURS DAMAGE IN ST. PAUL, INSURANCE GROUP SAYS LOSSES TO TWIN CITIES BUSINESSES COULD TOP \$100M

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 880 words

Byline: Mara H. Gottfried

Highlight: Insurance claims from Twin Cities businesses damaged in rioting could easily exceed $100 million, according to an estimate Monday from a Minnesota insurance association.

Body

Insurance claims from Twin Cities businesses damaged in rioting could easily exceed $100 million, according to an estimate Monday from a Minnesota insurance association.

St. Paul is still tallying the losses, and Minneapolis estimated at least \$55 million in damages as of last week.

Gov. Tim Walz walked along St. Paul's University Avenue on Monday, where he surveyed the damage left behind from looting, arson and other destruction that came primarily on May 28 and 29. He also took in murals painted by black artists - with messages of solidarity, anger and hope - on boarded-up windows, an effort coordinated by Springboard for the Arts.

Walz heard from business owners, community leaders and elected officials about the help needed to restore businesses economically and their desire to keep the business community diverse.

In the wake of the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody on May 25, thousands of people have protested peacefully, though there were also days of widespread unrest.

Speaking inside Elsa's House of Sleep - a black, family-owned furniture store in St. Paul's Midway area - Walz said he understands in Minneapolis and St. Paul that there is "fear that we'll do a typical rebuilding thing with big government setting up grant programs and picking winners and losers, and losing the sense of community that we have and of fear of gentrification."

That's why "the solutions will come from the community," Walz said.

Courtney Henry spoke up Monday, saying he and his father are owners of McDonald's restaurants, including in the Midway. They have been part of the St. Paul business community for nearly 30 years.

"This tragic murder of George Floyd has brought a lot of things forward," said Henry, who is a black business owner. "It's been painful going through this personally."

As Gov. Tim Walz tours damage in St. Paul, insurance group says losses to Twin Cities businesses could top $100M

Henry said they want to see social justice and for the small-business community to have a seat at the table to keep the Midway area diverse.

Walz and members of Congress have said they'll seek federal aid for rebuilding. The governor said Monday that he's also exploring whether bonding - which is typically for public infrastructure in Minnesota - could be used to help private businesses.

Sen. Sandy Pappas, DFL-St. Paul, said she and other legislators - Democrats and Republicans, from suburban and rural areas - would be back on Tuesday to see the damage in St. Paul and Minneapolis.

Legislators, who will be having a special session, are putting together an economic relief package that will focus on small and minority-owned businesses, said Rep. Rena Moran, DFL-St. Paul.

In St. Paul, officials are compiling information for U.S. Small Business Association recovery loans and there are more than 240 damaged properties on the list, according to the Department of Safety and Inspections.

Property Claim Services, a unit of a Verisk Analytics, designated the riots in the Minneapolis area as a catastrophe, which indicates losses will be at least $25 million, according to a Sunday statement from the national organization.

That designation allows insurers to call in catastrophe adjusters, according to Mark Kulda, vice president of public affairs for the Insurance Federation of Minnesota, which represents about 45 insurance companies.

Kulda said Monday he estimates businesses in the Twin Cities will make insurance claims totaling at least $100 million - from buildings that were burned down or damaged, merchandise stolen or ruined, and lost revenue.

That estimate doesn't include damage to public infrastructure, such as the 3rd police precinct in Minneapolis, or large corporations because they are self insured, Kulda said. Also not included are businesses that didn't have insurance.

Kulda said he's been told some insurance companies have already made payments to businesses.

Before Monday's meeting, Tetra Constantino showed Walz around the 8,000 square-foot showroom of Elsa's House of Sleep and told him about his business. His mother, Elsa Rezene, got it off the ground in 1997 with her credit cards and while she was in remission from cancer.

She was born in Eritrea and moved to the United States when she was 16.

"When she came to this country, she had no choice but to realize all of the racial strife and all of the injustices," Constantino said. "She really was adamant about there being justice and building your own business, so she was able to provide goods and services for her community and for everybody."

Constantino stayed at the store overnight on May 28 to stand watch. An activist brought over signs that said, "This is a black-owned business."

He wasn't going to hang them in the windows - "I said, 'Everybody here knows us,'" but Constantino said his employees insisted, "just in case there were a lot of outsiders here."

As Gov. Tim Walz tours damage in St. Paul, insurance group says losses to Twin Cities businesses could top $100M

They had some cracked windows and attempts to start fires, but were able to open up again on Wednesday, Constantino said. Minneapolis council members pledge thoughtful police revamp Monuments and statues are falling. But what comes next? Ramsey County Attorney's Office named pilot site for national program aimed at reducing racial disparities in criminal justice system Officer Chauvin to George Floyd: 'It takes ... a lot of oxygen to talk' Three non-profits create fund for minority-owned businesses in Twin Cities

Load-Date: July 9, 2020

End of Document

Price tag to call up National Guard for Twin Cities disturbances: Nearly $13M

ARTICLE CDLXXI. [PRICE TAG TO CALL UP NATIONAL GUARD FOR TWIN CITIES
DISTURBANCES: NEARLY \$13M](#)

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 224 words

Byline: Mara H. Gottfried

Highlight: It cost $12.75 million to use the Minnesota National Guard to respond to civil disturbances in the Twin Cities after the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody, according to the state's budget commissioner. Most of the price is for payroll; also included are meals, vehicles and fuel. The funding is expected to be [...]

Body

It cost $12.75 million to use the Minnesota National Guard to respond to civil disturbances in the Twin Cities after the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody, according to the state's budget commissioner.

Most of the price is for payroll; also included are meals, vehicles and fuel. The funding is expected to be eligible for reimbursement from the Federal Emergency Management Agency, Commissioner Myron Frans wrote in a letter to legislators last week.

Gov. Tim Walz activated the National Guard on May 28 after people began looting, setting fires and causing property damage in St. Paul and Minneapolis. He took the unprecedented step on May 30 of fully mobilizing the Guard after destruction continued.

With many law enforcement officers also on the streets and nightly curfews in place, officials said order was restored. Large peaceful protests have continued.

There were more than 7,000 Guard members mobilized at the peak and fewer than 1,000 activated as of Tuesday, according to the National Guard. 'We don't think we did this all right': State leaders weigh in on response to Minneapolis riots Medical experts: Floyd's speech didn't mean he could breathe George Floyd transcript: Read it in full here Minneapolis council members pledge thoughtful police revamp Monuments and statues are falling. But what comes next?

Load-Date: July 10, 2020

Aerial views of St. Paul, Minneapolis show the extent of destruction from riots

ARTICLE CDLXXII. AERIAL VIEWS OF ST. PAUL, MINNEAPOLIS SHOW THE EXTENT OF DESTRUCTION FROM RIOTS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 301 words

Byline: Mara H. Gottfried

Highlight: On the streets of St. Paul and Minneapolis, there is block after block of charred buildings and windows that were boarded up for protection during rioting. From an aerial view, the extent of the damage is even more apparent. Minneapolis was harder hit than St. Paul with looting and arson after the death of George [...]

Body

On the streets of St. Paul and Minneapolis, there is block after block of charred buildings and windows that were boarded up for protection during rioting.

From an aerial view, the extent of the damage is even more apparent.

Minneapolis was harder hit than St. Paul with looting and arson after the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody. More than 1,050 properties were damaged - ranging from minor to destroyed, according to the city.

More than 240 properties sustained damage in St. Paul, according to information from the city Tuesday.

The work of St. Paul's disaster assessment response team continues and the numbers are likely to rise as assessments continue, said Suzanne Donovan, St. Paul Department of Safety and Inspections spokeswoman.

"The city of St. Paul is working closely with our business community, and neighborhood and community leaders to support businesses and residents impacted by the civil unrest this past week, including mobilizing all available resources," Donovan said. "We also continue to partner with the new Pay It Forward joint initiative, for which St. Paul's business community has begun mobilizing a corps of volunteers to help small businesses access what they need to repair and rebuild."

There has been an outpouring of community support - from cleaning up to raising money for businesses. Politicians have said they'll seek federal aid for rebuilding, and state legislators said they're putting together an economic relief package. 'We don't think we did this all right': State leaders weigh in on response to Minneapolis riots Medical experts: Floyd's speech didn't mean he could breathe George

Aerial views of St. Paul, Minneapolis show the extent of destruction from riots

Floyd transcript: Read it in full here Minneapolis council members pledge thoughtful police revamp Monuments and statues are falling. But what comes next?

Load-Date: July 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDLXXIII. TORCHED FACTORY WON'T BE REBUILT IN MINNEAPOLIS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 682 wordsByline: JEFFREY MEITRODT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

A Minneapolis manufacturing company has decided to leave the city, with the company's owner saying he can't trust public officials who allowed his plant to burn during the recent riots. The move will cost the city about 50 jobs.

"They don't care about my business," said Kris Wyrobek, president and owner of 7-Sigma Inc., which has operated since 1987 at 2843 26th Av. in south Minneapolis. "They didn't protect our people. We were all on our own."

Wyrobek said the plant, which usually operates until 11 p.m., shut down about four hours early on the first night of the riots because he wanted to keep his workers out of harm's way. He said a production supervisor and a maintenance worker who live in the neighborhood became alarmed when fire broke out at the $30 million Midtown Corner affordable-housing apartment complex under construction next door.

"The fire engine was just sitting there," Wyrobek said, "but they wouldn't do anything."

Two days after the riots began, Gov. Tim Walz described the city's response as an "abject failure." Walz ordered the National Guard into Minneapolis to restore order at the request of Mayor Jacob Frey. The violence sometimes overshadowed peaceful protests over the death last month of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police officers.

Frey said Monday that he was unaware of 7-Sigma's decision to move, and he declined to say whether the company's decision reflects the challenges facing city leaders as they try to persuade business owners to rebuild in Minneapolis. Many business owners have criticized the city, saying their pleas for help went unanswered.

Frey said the city was overwhelmed by the riots. He said every fire truck was operating during the protests.

Torched factory won't be rebuilt in Minneapolis

"This was a Guard-sized crisis and demanded a Guard-sized response," Frey said. "And once we had the full presence of the National Guard - which by the way hasn't been deployed since World War II - there was a significantly different result."

The city's first survey of property damage shows that nearly 1,000 commercial properties in Minneapolis were damaged during the riots, including 52 businesses that were completely destroyed and 30 other locations that sustained severe damage.

Owners and insurance experts estimate the costs of the damage could exceed $500 million. That would make the Twin Cities riots the second-costliest civil disturbance in U.S. history, trailing only those in Los Angeles in 1992, which were also sparked by racial tensions with police and had $1.4 billion in damage in today's dollars.

To accelerate the recovery, Frey announced Monday the creation of Minneapolis Forward: Community Now Coalition, which includes representatives of local business and community groups. Frey said the group will seek input from black residents and business owners to make sure rebuilding efforts accommodate their needs.

"George Floyd moved to Minneapolis for a fresh start," Frey said. "In honoring his memory and generations of black people who have been victimized before him, we will rebuild as a stronger, more equitable and more inclusive city."

Frey said the coalition will seek financial help from a broad range of private and public partners, but he refused to say how much money the city of Minneapolis is willing to commit to the rebuilding effort, saying that would be "premature." He said the group does not yet have a fundraising goal.

"The city will need to do its part, as well," said Frey, noting that he will request that any new permits or license be "expedited as much as possible."

Wyrobek said it is too late to keep his company in the city. 7-Sigma is a leader in the production of precision rollers used in high-speed printing systems used to produce bank statements and social security checks.

When asked if he thought of relocating before the riots, Wyrobek said, "not in my wildest nightmare." On Monday, he was sorting through the remnants of his business, figuring out how to get up and running again.

"We are cautiously optimistic we can do that," he said. But we are certainly not able to do that in Minneapolis."

Jeffrey Meitrodt · 612-673-4132

Load-Date: June 9, 2020

7-Sigma, manufacturer burned in riots, will leave Minneapolis

ARTICLE CDLXXIV.

7-SIGMA, MANUFACTURER BURNED IN RIOTS, WILL LEAVE MINNEAPOLIS

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 174 words

Byline: Mark Reilly

Body

A manufacturing facility that burned down in the violent nights that followed the death of George Floyd will reopen - but not in Minneapolis, its owner says.

The Star Tribune talks with Kris Wyrobek, president and owner of 7-Sigma Inc., which makes a variety of industrial products, including rollers for high-speed printing presses and mannequins used for medical training. Since 1987, business has been based at 2843 26th Ave. S., just across from the Target and Cub stores that were looted in the first night of riots and next to a partially built apartment complex that burned to the ground.

Fires struck 7-Sigma, too, and Wyrobek criticized city leaders, saying that firefighters never arrived to help battle the blaze. Mayor Jacob Frey said that the city's fire department was overwhelmed by the extent of the violence, which quieted only after Minnesota fully mobilized its National Guard units.

7-Sigma employs about 50 people.

7-Sigma, manufacturer burned in riots, will leave Minneapolis

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: June 9, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDLXXV. 24 GET BUSH FOUNDATION FELLOWSHIPS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 382 wordsByline: KELLY SMITH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Each winner will receive $100,000 for projects.Body

Guy Bowling is empowering fathers of color in Minneapolis and wants to improve police relations. In Maple Grove, Farhio Khalif is advocating for East African women and girls. In Lauderdale, police officer Matthew Koncar wants to boost public trust of police.

The three are among 24 winners of the Bush Foundation's competitive annual fellowship, the St. Paul organization announced Tuesday. While the selection process occurred long before the death of George Floyd, which has galvanized the Twin Cities and the world around racial justice and police reform, the community leaders - two-thirds of whom are people of color - are part of that push for change, said Anita Patel, the leadership programs director at the Bush Foundation.

"This group is really committed to racial equity in real ways," she said. "This is an investment in leaders for decades to come."

Each of the fellows will receive $100,000 over a year or two to fund a college degree, networking, coaching, workshops or training to boost their leadership skills.

Of the 24 winners, 16 are Minnesotans. Besides Bowling, Khalif and Koncar, the Minnesota winners are Amira Adawe of St. Paul, Evva Karr of St. Paul, Kirsten Kennedy of North Branch, Ani Ryan Koch of Minneapolis, Allen Lewis of Virginia, Dr. Brittany Lewis of Minneapolis, Dr. Essa Mohamed of Rochester, Vayong Moua of Eagan, Benjamin Schierer of Fergus Falls, Jenna Udenberg of Two Harbors, Kayla Yang-Best of St. Paul, Dave Anderson of Minneapolis and Roque Diaz of Minneapolis.

Recipients from North Dakota are: David Archambault II of Cannon Ball, Laetitia M. Hellerud of West Fargo and Matuor Dot Alier of Fargo. From South Dakota: Valeriah Big Eagle of Rapid City, Joseph Brings Plenty of Eagle Butte, Amanda Carlow of Pine Ridge, Beau J. White of Kyle and Dr. Meghan Curry O'Connell of Elk Point.

About 750 people applied for the annual award, which is open to anyone who is 24 years old and older in the three states or American Indian communities within those states.

24 get Bush Foundation fellowships

The fellowship program has been around since the Bush Foundation was founded in 1953 by a 3M executive. More than 2,300 people - including community leaders such as former Minnesota Gov. Arne Carlson and author and storyteller Kevin Kling - have gone through the program.

Kelly Smith · 612-673-4141

Load-Date: June 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDLXXVI.

ANTI-RACISM INITIATIVE GAINS VITAL VOICES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 1CLength: 841 wordsByline: SARAH MCLELLAN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Hockey Diversity Alliance, begun independent of NHL, has tolerance as a key goal.Body

The NHL is aiming to return this summer, but players aren't waiting in the wings. They're speaking out - and not just about finishing the season.

After many NHLers condemned racial injustice in the aftermath of George Floyd's death in Minneapolis, several minority players - including the Wild's Matt Dumba and former Wild forwards Joel Ward and Chris Stewart - launched the Hockey Diversity Alliance with a goal of eradicating racism and intolerance in hockey.

The group plans to promote diversity through community outreach and engagement with youth while attempting to make the sport more affordable and accessible.

Although independent of the NHL, the alliance is hopeful it will work with the league.

"We are confident we can inspire a new generation of hockey players and fans," the group said in an announcement. "We are hopeful that anyone who puts on skates or sits in the stands will do so without worrying about race, gender or socioeconomic background and will be able to express their culture, identity, values and personality without fear of retribution."

Akil Aliu and San Jose forward Evander Kane are co-heads of the alliance; Dumba, Flyers winger Stewart, Ward, Detroit defenseman Trevor Daley and Buffalo forward Wayne Simmonds are on the executive committee.

In November, Aliu revealed former Calgary coach Bill Peters used racial slurs against him when both were in the minors during the 2009-10 season. Peters later resigned from the Flames. Aliu, who most recently played overseas after a brief stint in the NHL, met with league brass about his push for change.

Big names donate

Kane was among the first NHLers to speak out, posting on Twitter that he signed a petition demanding the four officers involved in Floyd's arrest at the time of his death May 25 be arrested.

Anti-racism initiative gains vital voices

Soon, more NHLers - including high-profile stars Sidney Crosby and Connor McDavid - shared comments on social media. Dallas' Tyler Seguin and Boston's Zdeno Chara posted about attending protests, and New Jersey's P.K. Subban said he made a $50,000 donation to the GoFundMe for Floyd's daughter that the NHL matched. Boston forward Patrice Bergeron also announced he was donating $25,000 to the Boston branch of the NAACP and $25,000 to Centre Multiethnique de Quebec.

Among the most vocal have been Minnesota native and Winnipeg captain Blake Wheeler and Iowa Wild forward J.T. Brown, who raised his fist during the national anthem in 2007 while with Tampa Bay.

Dumba has also been visible, posting a statement that, in part, read, "I am an anti-racist" and "#blacklivesmatter." He also took part in a roundtable discussion on race in hockey for TSN alongside Wheeler, Brown and former Wild player Kurtis Gabriel. Dumba is scheduled to address the media Tuesday.

Voices ring out

In addition to making a statement on Floyd's death, the Wild also released comments from forward Zach Parise, who pledged to use his voice and platform "to help end racial injustice for good."

Parise, Brown and General Manager Bill Guerin participated in a video organized by former NHLer and current broadcaster Anson Carter supporting racial equality. The message also included Commissioner Gary Bettman and NHL Players' Association executive director Don Fehr.

Both have been hashing out the league's return to play plan, which took a step forward Monday when teams were allowed to open their facilities to players for small, voluntary workouts.

The ice at TRIA Rink, the Wild's practice facility, is scheduled to go in next week, and that's when players are expected to begin training there. Hosting training camps before returning with a 24-team format are the next milestones the league is eyeing, but logistics have yet to be announced.

Making words count

Wrapping up a season that was stalled March 12 by the coronavirus pandemic, however, isn't the league's only focus. According to NHL.com, the league was already in the process of creating the Executive Inclusion Council and its first meeting will be in July. The council, which will be comprised of five owners, five presidents and two GMs, will receive recommendations from three committees representing different stakeholders: the Player Inclusion Committee, the Fan Inclusion Committee and the Youth Inclusion Committee.

Kim Davis, the NHL's senior executive vice president of social impact, growth initiatives and legislative affairs, also told NHL.com that the league would create a task force focused on the development of coaches and officials; the league gave the NHL Coaches' Association 14 names of people of color to be invited to a coaching development program.

"The emotional moment of the words and the tweets and the videos are nice, and it makes people feel good," Davis told NHL.com. "What I care about are the actions that follow, and so that's what I'm going to be paying attention to. That's what I'm going to be measuring.

"Two weeks from now, two months from now, two years from now, what are you doing to change how we look and what we do and what we say and how we show up as a sport? That's what's important."

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDLXXVII.

ART GROUPS FINDING NEW WAYS TO SERVE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 835 wordsByline: CHRIS HEWITT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: In the wake of unrest and a pandemic, shuttered arts organizations are finding ways to build community.Body

With their programs postponed, Twin Cities arts organizations are finding new ways to open doors to the communities they serve.

The compounding crises of the COVID-19 pandemic, higher unemployment and unrest after the death of George Floyd have made life more precarious for many in the Twin Cities, and people in the arts are among those who are stepping up.

Springboard for the Arts' parking lot has been a site for distributing food and other necessities. All My Relations Arts became a food and neighborhood protection site. Victoria Theater Arts Center has hosted community healing events. Catalyst Arts has sponsored events around uniting artists. Pillsbury House Theatre created a pantry and supplied water to mourners at Thursday's memorial service for Floyd.

Perhaps most dramatically, Mixed Blood Theatre has transformed itself into a big-box store. The shuttered theater is now offering food and other essentials to its neighbors on Minneapolis' West Bank.

"The intent started with the Somali community here in Cedar-Riverside. We were going to set out a few tables to pass out food, but now we look like a Costco, with items spread out all over the place," said Catherine Campbell, who has pivoted from production manager of the theater to helping keep the neighborhood fed and safe.

That was the impulse for efforts at nearby All My Relations, too. With the gallery closed and volunteers using its Franklin Avenue parking lot as a central point for protecting the American Indian cultural corridor during unrest following Floyd's death, organizers put out a call for help in keeping the protectors nourished.

"People started bringing everything in, so the gallery turned into a holding space for all the supplies: fire extinguishers and water and diapers, anything that could help the community that had been impacted by the destruction," said Angela Two Stars, director of All My Relations. "It was a special thing to see - especially since the American Indian Movement was created out of a response to police brutality in the '60s against the American Indian community - to be able to rely on our people to protect the Phillips neighborhood."

Two Star said All My Relations is eager to get back to sharing art; it had public artists out creating murals last weekend. She said the best way to keep up with the rapidly changing situation at All My Relations is its website or through the Native American Community Development Institute.

Produce, toiletries, paper goods, menstrual products and baby items are among the offerings at Mixed Blood. They can be picked up from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. daily. Donations also are accepted at Mixed Blood, 1501 S. 4th St., with high-priority needs including milk, flour, sugar, eggs, detergent and reusable bags.

The impromptu pantry is set up like a store, in which patrons "shop" for the things they need. Mixed Blood is attempting to observe physical distancing, restricting the "store" to a few families at a time. About 300 families came on the first official day, June 1.

Mixed Blood employees, who have plenty of experience at building things, also have worked to secure the neighborhood, boarding up dozens of local businesses.

Props designer Abbee Warmboe has been keeping track of donated goods and funds while making sure businesses have supplies they need.

"Theater has trained us to be able to step in quickly," said Warmboe. "We see a need and we fill a need. Our instinct is to go and be productive. In terms of what's happening in our city right now, that's the best way I can put myself to use."

Like everyone, Mixed Blood employees don't know how long they'll need to be useful in this new way or how long the theater will be idle. It recently commissioned theater artists to create short works in response to recent events.

"We're not going to have this going for two weeks and then say we're done. That's not what fighting for justice is about or working for our community is about," said Campbell, who said the plan is to strengthen partnerships with other neighborhood groups to continue to assist Cedar-Riverside.

Seven miles to the east on University Avenue, Springboard for the Arts' St. Paul parking lot has become a temporary pantry and donation site.

"We are really invested in trying to, first and foremost, be a good neighbor and be part of what our neighborhood and community needs in Rondo and Frogtown, in particular supporting black artists and black businesses," said Laura Zabel, Springboard's executive director.

Zabel emphasized that she sees Springboard's role as listening to and supporting the many efforts already in place.

"Our goal for that space in St. Paul has always been that it's in service to the community," said Zabel, whose organization moved into the new location just two weeks before the pandemic forced it to shutter. "Part of why being in that neighborhood is important is that arts and culture should be about meaning-making. And that includes supporting and thinking about the needs of a community."

Art groups finding new ways to serve

Chris Hewitt · 612-673-4367

Load-Date: June 9, 2020

End of Document

As more of Minnesota reopens, will coronavirus statistics continue to improve?

ARTICLE CDLXXVIII.

AS MORE OF MINNESOTA REOPENS, WILL CORONAVIRUS STATISTICS CONTINUE TO IMPROVE?

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 686 words

Byline: Christopher Magan

Highlight: Trends in the number of patients hospitalized, the daily number of fatalities and test positivity rates are all on the decline.

Body

The data health officials use to track Minnesota's coronavirus outbreak are generally heading in the right direction as the state moves to relax more restrictions put in place in March to slow the its spread.

Trends in the number of patients hospitalized, the daily number of fatalities and test positivity rates are all on the decline. Minnesota is testing more people for the coronavirus, but finding fewer infections. Serious cases appear to be on the decline and 85 percent of the state's confirmed patients have recovered enough they no longer need to be isolated.

Those are goods signs as many businesses move Wednesday to expand services and fitness and other activity centers begin to reopen. Minnesotans haven't been able to work out at a gym or eat inside a restaurant since March.

That doesn't mean Minnesota's outbreak couldn't quickly change course and head in the wrong direction. State leaders have estimated the state's infection peak will come sometime this summer.

Health officials continue to wait to see the impact of thousands of demonstrators in close proximity for days protesting the death of George Floyd. Anyone who participated in the demonstrations is encourage to get tested for the coronavirus.

On Tuesday, the state Department of Health said that neighborhood testing sites in Minneapolis and St. Paul had booked all their appointments for Tuesday and Wednesday.

Walk-in availability is limited, though wait lists are being offered.

Appointments for the next two weeks are not yet available for booking. The department said it was looking to add future testing capacity as well.

Those who want to get tested sooner should contact their health care provider or find a testing site on the Minnesota COVID-19 Response website at mn.gov/covid19.

As more of Minnesota reopens, will coronavirus statistics continue to improve?

It can take up to two weeks for symptoms to emerge after someone is infected. Health officials estimate as many as 40 percent of the people who catch the coronavirus may show no symptoms at all.

A DEEPER LOOK AT THE NUMBERS

The state is still losing, on average, more than 20 people per day to COVID-19. There were 455 patients sick enough, as of Monday afternoon, to need to be hospitalized with 199 of them in critical condition.

On Tuesday, the Department of Health reported 299 more coronavirus infections, bringing the statewide total to 28,523. There were also another 20 COVID-19 fatalities and those who died ranged in age from their 30s to their 90s.

Older Minnesotans continue to be the most likely to die after contracting COVID-19. Just 10 of the 1,217 Minnesotans who've died after catching the virus were under the age of 40.

Residents of congregate care, such as nursing homes, assisted living and rehabilitation centers, continue to account for about 80 percent of the state's deaths. The state has identified 286 long-term care facilities with at least one resident or worker testing positive for the coronavirus.

Facilities with fewer than 10 residents have not been made public to protect patient privacy.

PUSH TO REOPEN CONTINUES

All this data and more will be under consideration this week as Gov. Tim Walz announces the state's next steps in its coronavirus fight. Minnesota has been under a peacetime state of emergency since mid-March that has allowed Walz to make all of the big decisions regarding how government responds to the pandemic.

The GOP-led state Senate has vowed to vote to challenge those emergency powers, but it is unlikely the Democratic-controlled House will do the same. The Legislature will be called into special session if Walz extends his emergency powers another 30 days.

Minnesota looks a lot different than it did three months ago when Walz first exercised those emergency powers.

More than 750,000 Minnesotans have filed for unemployment assistance since March after the widespread closure of many businesses. As the state moves toward reopening, masks and social distancing will be required - health officials continue to plead with residents to stay home if they're sick.

Coronavirus testing continues to become more readily available. For more information on how and when to get tested, go to www.mn.gov/covid19/.

Load-Date: July 9, 2020

ARTICLE CDLXXIX. COMMUNITY'S CORNER

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 1CLength: 803 wordsByline: CHIP SCOGGINS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Surge of supplies for ravaged neighborhood leads boxing gym to repurposeBody

The boxing ring in a small gym off Lake Street in south Minneapolis is filled with diapers. Boxes and boxes of diapers, stacked high, free to anyone in need.

Equipment used to train boxers has been moved to a hallway to make room for canned food, cereal boxes, bottled water and toiletries. A fresh shipment of flour tortillas arrived earlier in the day. Volunteer workers scurry to fill bags to be delivered in a caravan of cars or to distribute to community members who arrive on foot.

The irony of this scene is jarring.

Here at Circle of Discipline, a 1,500-square-foot sweatbox less than a mile from the street corner where the police killed George Floyd and businesses were burned and looted, people come to learn how to box. The sport's fundamental objective is to knock down your opponent.

The mission at Circle of Discipline last week espoused just the opposite.

The boxing gym lifted people up.

A call to serve the community has long been COD's overarching platform. But a spontaneous outpouring of goodwill that coursed through the gym last week surprised even those who have made south Minneapolis home for decades and admit to being hardened by injustice.

We've all witnessed sadness and rage engulf Minneapolis. A boxing gym also revealed the city's goodness, a display of kindness and solidarity that began with a flier posted on social media.

Adonis Frazier works at COD as a coach and program advocate. He had an idea after seeing devastation caused by the riots. He offered to use the gym's van to drive elderly folks in senior centers to get groceries, knowing that stores were destroyed or boarded up, and also mindful that some residents likely were scared to venture outside.

Somebody misunderstood his flier and brought food to the gym. Then someone else did the same thing. And then another. Word quickly spread.

"It just started snowballing," Frazier said.

Before long, COD resembled a grocery store. The Sheridan Story, a nonprofit that fights childhood hunger, delivered four large boxes of food items. The Link organization in north Minneapolis and churches shared food when inventory ran low. Individual families brought food, diapers, toothpaste. A few restaurants catered to feed an army of volunteers who came to pack grocery bags and deliver them to seniors.

So many companies and people chipped in that organizers lost count. Young and old. Men and women. Black, white and myriad other ethnicities. They all felt a call to help. To do something.

By week's end, the gym delivered more than 2,500 grocery bags of food and served hundreds more who came in person. A community shaken to its core rose and showed its heart.

"Every morning we would go out to see what damage was done," says Sierra Samuels, the mother of pro boxer Jamal James and a longtime staff volunteer at the gym. "I was really just hopeless and depressed. This is very therapeutic. It's been so amazing."

Samuels took the entire week off from work to organize volunteers and keep the operation moving. She's 49 and has lived in south Minneapolis her entire life. She loves her community.

Same with Frazier, age 43, a southside lifer. He's proud of the response but he wants credit shared. Many emergency food banks have popped up across the metro, he notes, not just his gym. Healing requires group effort.

"People want to help right now," he says. "They want to be part of the solution."

His volunteer workforce included Gophers athletes Gabe Kalscheur and Benny Sapp III, who spent multiple days packing and delivering food along with Frazier's son, Dasan, a football player at Morehouse College.

"Brothers and sisters have come together as a community and reached out to one another," says Kalscheur, a junior guard on the Gophers basketball team. "And that's really what a community is. Reaching out to help."

There is a movement taking place around the world in response to Floyd's death. An awakening to racial injustices has unified protesters in seeking change - real, fundamental change - and started a conversation that has allowed voices once muffled or ignored to be amplified.

"It took a man 8 minutes and 46 seconds of having a guy on his neck on camera for the world to finally understand this," Frazier said.

Frazier sees hope, too. He felt it last week in a gym where he trains boxers. Donations of food and essential items, from people he knows and total strangers, kept arriving. Volunteers refused to take breaks because they wanted to make sure people had enough food and diapers for their children.

Sunday marked the final day of the gym's food bank. Soon, the equipment will be brought back out and boxers will return to the ring to spar.

Frazier hopes the spirit he witnessed in his gym last week doesn't recede.

"I don't want that to wear off," he says. "How long will people stay engaged?"

chip.scoggins@startribune.com

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDLXXX. COVID-19 TESTS FOR PROTESTERS HIT SHORTAGES AND STARTUP CHALLENGES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 1094 wordsByline: JEREMY OLSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Attempts to track outbreaks of COVID-19 among Twin Cities protesters through mass testing are being complicated by a supply shortage at some clinics and concerns among protesters about the information they'd have to disclose if they tested positive.

M Health Fairview is not testing anyone who is asymptomatic for now, despite an advisory from the Minnesota Department of Health to test anyone involved in mass demonstrations over the past week - whether they appear to be sick or not.

"While M Health Fairview is working quickly to increase our COVID-19 testing capacity to include asymptomatic individuals who were involved in recent mass public events, national shortages of lab testing supplies require us to prioritize testing for those admitted to our care facilities and symptomatic individuals at this time," said Dr. Mark Welton, M Health Fairview's chief medical officer.

State health officials worry about a surge of COVID-19 cases involving protesters, first responders and others at recent mass events - right as cases appear to be trending downward in Minnesota.

The state reported 339 lab-confirmed cases of COVID-19 and 11 deaths on Monday - down from daily highs of roughly 840 confirmed cases on May 23 and 35 deaths on May 28. Hospitalizations for COVID-19 reached their lowest levels since mid-May.

The trends were favorable enough that state Health Commissioner Jan Malcolm said on Monday that Minnesota could see the resumption of youth baseball, basketball and soccer games by the end of June - though new sports guidance now prohibits those games due to the risks of spreading the coronavirus that causes COVID-19.

Malcolm said health officials aren't confident enough yet to project a normal start to the school year in the fall.

"We just don't know what the state of the epidemic is going to be," she said.

COVID-19 tests for protesters hit shortages and startup challenges

One reason for concern is the protests following the death of George Floyd in police custody - with thousands of people packing together and singing and shouting in ways that could have increased viral transmission.

Many of the protesters were black, and state health data have shown that black people suffer higher rates of severe COVID-19 due in part to their higher instances of chronic diseases that exacerbate their infections. Black people make up less than 7% of the state population but more than 20% of the patients hospitalized for COVID-19.

"There seem to be converging concerns here," Malcolm said.

Hennepin Healthcare is scheduling tests for people involved in protests, regardless of whether they have symptoms.

HealthPartners is testing asymptomatic protesters as well and has updated its online Virtuwel site to permit these patients. Priority will still go to patients with symptoms if supplies run short, though, the health system said in a written statement.

As many as 80% of COVID-19 infections cause mild or no symptoms, raising concerns that protesters could have been spreading the virus without knowing it.

Some people are worried if they test positive that they will have to disclose who they were with during protests as part of state contact tracing to identify others who may be at risk for infection.

VJ Smith of MAD DADS said he can understand such concerns but ultimately recommends that people who participated in protests get tested, especially if they live with elderly parents or others who are vulnerable.

"It's about who you are around and the people that you care about," he said.

The state is providing free testing on Tuesdays and Wednesdays for the next three weeks through local community organizations that people trust. The sites are Holy Trinity Church, Sabathani Community Center and New Salem Baptist Church in Minneapolis; and at Jimmy Lee Recreation Center in St. Paul.

"There's a lot of public health education to be done about why this is so important to help protect not only individuals themselves but their loved ones and the larger communities," Malcolm said.

Contact tracing has been used to track infectious diseases for years - long before COVID-19 - and can involve the asking of sensitive questions, even about sexual partners or illicit activities, but is used exclusively to identify the spread of a virus and other people at risk, said Kris Ehresmann, state infectious disease director.

"There is no part of our work that is beyond that," she said.

If people are uncomfortable disclosing their contacts at the time they became infected, Ehresmann said health officials still want to talk to them and encourage them to tell contacts on their own about their infection risks.

COVID-19 tests for protesters hit shortages and startup challenges

The state has identified 28,224 cases of COVID-19 through diagnostic testing so far. The state death toll of 1,197 people includes 955 residents of long-term care facilities and mostly people who are older or have chronic health conditions.

However, the state on Monday reported its second COVID-19 death of a Minnesotan 29 or younger with no apparent underlying health conditions.

As of Monday morning, 452 people with COVID-19 were admitted to Minnesota hospitals, including 198 who needed intensive care.

That is the lowest number of COVID-19 patients hospitalized since May 12, though Malcolm warned against complacency and encouraged people to continue following guidelines such as wearing masks and staying 6 feet apart in public.

The state on Wednesday will scale back statewide restrictions designed to reduce the spread of the virus - allowing group gatherings of 10 people indoors and 25 outdoors, as well as limited indoor restaurant and bar service and fitness club usage.

New guidance also permits competitions in youth and adult sports in which social distancing can be maintained - such as tennis and running. Practices that maintain social distancing can take place in other sports, but no games that require close contact yet.

"While we're encouraged to see the number of individuals hospitalized and in ICU drop," Ehresmann said, "we also are concerned because we have seen deaths in healthy younger adults, and that is very sobering."

Jeremy Olson · 612-673-7744

TRACKING CORONAVIRUS

Minnesota cases, daily change*

28,224 -- Total cases

388 -- June 8 new cases

*Chart data is a net count of new confirmed cases minus previously announced cases that were removed by MDH on that date.

Minnesota deaths, new daily

1,197 -- Total deaths

11 -- June 8

U.S. cases, new daily

1,953,138 -- Total cases

18,897 -- June 7

U.S. deaths, new daily

COVID-19 tests for protesters hit shortages and startup challenges

110,422 -- Total deaths

390 -- June 7

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete charts.)

Sources: New York Times, Minnesota Dept. of Health

Note: U.S. data lags a day behind Minnesota

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDLXXXI. DOYLE MCMANUS: TRUMP FINDS AN UNEXPECTED CENTER OF RESISTANCE: THE PENTAGON

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1031 wordsByline: Doyle McManusHighlight: WASHINGTON - The leaders of the American military establishment drew a line in the sand last week, staging a polite but unmistakable rebellion against the dangerous impulses of President Donald Trump. And the rebels may be winning. The most widely noted salvo came from former Defense Secretary James N. Mattis, who declared, after more than [...]Body

WASHINGTON - The leaders of the American military establishment drew a line in the sand last week, staging a polite but unmistakable rebellion against the dangerous impulses of President Donald Trump.

And the rebels may be winning.

The most widely noted salvo came from former Defense Secretary James N. Mattis, who declared, after more than a year of silence, that Trump "does not even pretend to try" to unify the American people.

But Mattis wasn't the only dissident - or even the most important one.

Trump's Defense secretary, Mark Esper, rebuffed the president's threat to deploy active-duty soldiers into American cities to quell the protests that have erupted since the killing of George Floyd by police in Minneapolis.

On Friday, Esper ordered regular Army units that were rushed to Washington early in the week to return to their bases in New York and North Carolina, de-escalating the sense of armed siege in the nation's capital.

He also directed National Guard troops to patrol the city without weapons, despite Trump's direction that they be "heavily armed."

Gen. Mark A. Milley, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, also weighed in, warning that the U.S. armed forces will not allow themselves to be used against nonviolent protests.

Every member of the U.S. military swears an oath to support and defend the Constitution, he wrote his commanders, "including the right to freedom of speech and peaceful assembly."

Doyle McManus: Trump finds an unexpected center of resistance: the Pentagon

The chiefs of staff of the Army, Navy and Air Force issued similar messages, reinforcing their fidelity to the Constitution and pledging to battle racism in their ranks.

A full-dress parade of retired officers spoke out as well. Milley's predecessor as chairman of the Joint Chiefs, retired Army Gen. Martin E. Dempsey, warned that Trump's threat to use troops would damage trust in the armed forces.

"Our fellow citizens are not the enemy," he wrote.

It was an extraordinary moment - as if we were in a banana republic ruled by a would-be authoritarian, and the nation's military leaders decided it was their job to preserve the Constitution.

The dissents from Esper and Milley were belated. They both accompanied Trump on his disastrous stroll to St. John's Episcopal Church for a photo op, an embarrassing image they're now trying to erase. They also both approved the initial decision to move 1,600 active-duty troops to bases near the capital.

But their public breaks with a notoriously vengeful president still qualified, at least in Washington, as modest acts of bureaucratic courage.

Unlike Mattis, they aren't retired. They're at the peak of their careers. They still face the daily challenge of managing the president's demands. Their reputations are still at the president's mercy.

At least, they were until last week. And that may be the point.

Esper and Milley have implicitly dared the president to fire them. That's not an especially unusual act in Washington - but it's normally done in private, where everyone can back down without fear of humiliation. It's almost never done in public.

Esper's defiance was especially notable since the former Raytheon lobbyist was widely viewed as a compliant aide-de-camp. He initially seemed to support Trump's call for troops last week and even referred to the streets of Washington as a "battle space," as if it were Fallujah or Kandahar.

But after he ran into massive resistance from the Pentagon officers' corps, he switched sides.

If there's anything uniformed officers hate, it's being ordered to use force to solve a political problem without clear military objectives. The current generation learned that in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In this case, they faced a nightmare scenario: U.S. combat troops clashing with unarmed American civilians exercising their legal right to protest.

The episode laid bare a deeper divide.

When the president came to the White House in 2017, he believed the armed forces, which he frequently called "my military," were part of his political base. He stuffed his administration with retired military officers - "my generals" - including Mattis.

But the generals didn't simply salute and carry out his orders. They insisted on offering their professional advice and, on occasion, pushing back.

And they chafed at Trump's casual portrayal of the armed forces as one of his personal political assets.

Doyle McManus: Trump finds an unexpected center of resistance: the Pentagon

"I have the support of the police, the support of the military, the support of the Bikers for Trump - I have the tough people," the president bragged in 2019.

That's not how professional officers see their role. It's not even an accurate reflection of their private views; a poll of military personnel last year found that they are only a little more supportive of the president than civilian voters, with 50% saying they view him unfavorably.

For the generals, this isn't only about following the Constitution. It's a matter of protecting the services in which they've made their careers.

The military is the most admired institution in American life, and they want to keep it that way. As a practical matter, they want their massive budget requests to win support from Democrats as well as Republicans.

And since roughly 40% of service members are people of color, they know they must make diversity work.

A standoff with Esper and Milley poses an unusual challenge for Trump - especially when he's seeking re-election.

He reportedly doesn't want to fire them. But leaving them in place makes him look less than the strongman he aspires to be.

Nothing says "internal chaos" more clearly than Cabinet officers or top aides refusing to fully carry out the president's desires and publicly staking lines they will not cross.

But if you're worried that Trump might refuse to leave office if he loses the November election, this is a good thing: a signal that he can't count on the military to get his way. We're not a banana republic yet.

Doyle McManus writes a column for the Los Angeles Times.

Noah Smith: Pandemic aid helps make the case for basic income Doyle McManus: To judge monuments, think about their meaning Eli Lake: How Biden can punish Putin Chris Reed: Ascendant progressives face three big obstacles Cole, Scheck: DNA testing isn't enough. We need the right to fingerprint matching

Load-Date: July 9, 2020

ARTICLE CDLXXXII.

EVICTIONS, FORECLOSURES LOOM

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 1252 wordsByline: JIM SPENCER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: State's protections could end Friday, fed order might follow.Body

Kelvin Cannon had a job as a cook when the state of Minnesota ordered restaurants closed to help stop the spread of COVID-19.

That was March.

Since then, Cannon has not been able to find another job and does not qualify for unemployment because he was within the probationary employment period at the restaurant. The 28-year-old Minneapolis man cannot pay his rent and struggles to meet many other living expenses.

One reason he still has a roof over his head is Gov. Tim Walz's executive order declaring a peacetime emergency, which forbids evictions.

But when that ends - which could be as early as Friday - and protections built into a federal COVID-19 response law expire in July, Cannon and thousands of Minnesotans like him could be served, resulting in an explosion of delayed evictions and foreclosures, consumer advocates said.

Added to that, other forms of debt collection delayed by suspended court hearings will start again. As people max out credit cards to pay bills due, more debt could pile up.

Minnesota averages 13,000 to 15,000 eviction filings a year, said Eric Hauge, who helps run Home Line, a nonprofit legal hotline that advises Minnesota renters. "There could be that many filed in the first few weeks after the emergency order lifts," he said.

Hauge said callers normally ask how to get landlords to make repairs. Since the pandemic and accompanying shutdowns drove the state's economy into a downward spiral, renters have shifted their questions.

Now they want to know about "financial assistance, threats of lockouts and lease nonrenewals," he said.

In May, the bill-paying firm Doxo issued a report on the impact of COVID-19. The company - which counts Amazon founder Jeff Bezos as a partner - found that roughly 7 in 10 households do not have enough savings to last four months, and one in three could last only one month without running short of cash.

One in three households were either already paying bills late or would have to in the next month.

Hauge said Home Line has heard of people who pay their rent first but cannot pay other bills. He has also heard of people paying rent with credit cards.

In Minneapolis, Cannon is tapped out and out of options.

He qualified for a stimulus payment under the federal pandemic response law, but child support enforcement officials seized the check because Cannon, who said he paid support when he had a job, owed money.

Cannon said he was within the 90-day probationary period when he lost his job as a cook at an Indian restaurant. He said state officials told him his probationary status disqualified him from receiving unemployment payments.

"I look for jobs online," said Cannon, who is now three months behind on his rent. "I've had a couple of interviews, but no callbacks. I've been applying for warehouse jobs, cooking jobs, customer-service jobs. I don't have a plan for paying my bills because I can't work and I can't get help."

Now, he added, he worries the damage done by riots after the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody will further impede his search.

Jerry Essary, 52, is a felon and self-described "bad boy gone good." He quit a temporary construction job in January in Wisconsin and moved back full time to Sauk Centre because he became a full-time single parent to his 9-year-old son, Colton. Then, the pandemic hit and the job market dried up.

A former construction boss who planned to hire him ran out of money and "got scared of COVID-19," Essary said. "Everybody I talked with was either laying off people or not hiring."

He found work in a meatpacking plant that promptly experienced an outbreak of coronavirus after his hiring. Since then, all he has found is a weeklong job unloading trucks.

Because he quit his construction job for personal reasons, Essary said the state told him he didn't qualify for unemployment. His stimulus check went for back child support for another child.

Since March, Essary said, he has not paid rent on the house where he has lived for five and a half years. The monthly rent is $750. He and his son are trying to live on $625 a month in welfare payments.

"I don't know how different it would be without the pandemic," he said. "I was already behind. But once the pandemic hit, I was screwed."

Minnesota Attorney General Keith Ellison said landlords have been largely compliant with the noneviction order and that there have been relatively few utility cutoffs during the pandemic. But Ellison, like many, fears an explosion of people displaced from housing, ruined credit and court-ordered judgments in the pandemic's wake.

Evictions, foreclosures loom

The state needs provisions to help with COVID-driven rent problems, bankruptcy and credit scores, he said.

The consumer-advocacy community is gearing up for a major battle over unpaid bills. Mid-Minnesota Legal Aid recently conducted a webinar for lawyers about renters' rights.

About 150 lawyers participated in the webinar, said Jennifer Singleton, program manager for legal services. "Usually, those draw 30 to 40 lawyers," she said.

Home buyers who miss mortgage payments because of the pandemic are supposed to be able to request loan extensions to make up for delinquencies if they have federally backed loans, such as Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac.

People with conventional loans do not receive that protection, although in Minnesota, Walz requested that mortgage holders delay foreclosures during the emergency.

Statistics gathered by the advocacy group Minnesota Homeownership Center show that the number of preforeclosure filings actually decreased in the first quarter of 2020 to 4,200 from 4,800 in the last quarter of 2019. Center officials warn that the impact of the pandemic on mortgage payments is unlikely to show up until this summer or fall because foreclosures generally lag missed payments by several months, plus the first quarter had only a fraction of the time under stay-home orders.

The center is "gearing up" for an explosion, said director Julie Gugin.

However, the center's ultimate explanation to those in arrears on mortgages will likely be the same that delinquent renters and others behind on bills will get:

At some point, most people and companies that lend money, lease property or offer credit have a legal right to get paid back.

"Part of our advising process is to figure out what consumers want," Gugin said. "If you want to stay in your home, your income has to support the mortgage payments. If you have to leave, you try to negotiate a soft landing. Lower payments may be viable. Increased income may be viable. But could some people lose homes? Yes."

Debt-collection cases in Minnesota have not yet become a source of contention, said Legal Aid's Singleton. In fact, Walz issued a specific executive order banning creditors from garnishing pandemic response stimulus checks because the money was supposed to go for future support, not past debt.

But the nation's doubling of debt-collection cases, documented recently by the Pew Charitable Trusts, suggests a flood of backed-up filings because of the pandemic. The lack of debt-collection complaints to Legal Aid, said Singleton, is likely a function of the judicial system's decision to delay hearing court cases, not a reduction in those cases.

Ron Elwood, a supervising attorney at Mid-Minnesota Legal Aid, thinks debt cases brought to court by lawyers for creditors against absent or unrepresented borrowers "is a monster that needs to be tamed." Instead, it will likely get worse.

"The pandemic," said Elwood, "is exacerbating what is already happening."

Evictions, foreclosures loom

Jim Spencer · 202-662-7432

Load-Date: June 9, 2020

End of Document

Fever checks at the door, no facials or blow drying: Hair salons 'reinventing' under coronavirus

ARTICLE CDLXXXIII. FEVER CHECKS AT THE DOOR, NO FACIALS OR BLOW DRYING: HAIR SALONS 'REINVENTING' UNDER CORONAVIRUS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 572 words

Byline: Bob Shaw

Highlight: Hair salons have jumped back to life after a two-month coronavirus shutdown. "I am strangely optimistic," Jim Koktavy, owner of Root Salon, said between calls from customers clamoring for appointments. His salons in St. Paul and Wayzata, and every other salon in the state, were ordered to close March 17 because of the coronavirus pandemic. [...]

Body

Hair salons have jumped back to life after a two-month coronavirus shutdown.

"I am strangely optimistic," Jim Koktavy, owner of Root Salon, said between calls from customers clamoring for appointments.

His salons in St. Paul and Wayzata, and every other salon in the state, were ordered to close March 17 because of the coronavirus pandemic. When they were allowed to re-open June 1, customers poured in.

"My phone is ringing off the hook," said Brad Schlaeger, owner of Accolades Salon & Spa in St. Paul, and the Mens and Womens Spa Salons in Minneapolis.

Salons have scrambled to adjust to the new coronavirus reality.

Customers and workers wear masks. Plexiglas shields divide salon stations. And despite heavy demand, shops have been limited to one-quarter of their usual capacity under Gov. Tim Walz's rules for reopening last week; that bumps up to 50 percent on Wednesday.

At Schlaeger's salons, customers wait in the parking lot until they get a phone call. Then, they get a temperature check and fill out a form that screens for coronavirus symptoms.

Schlaeger asks customers to arrive with clean hair, because he wants to minimize on-site shampoos. Blow-drying is off-limits - no one wants to whip the virus into the air.

Facials, too, are forbidden.

"We had to do that. We are reinventing ourselves," said Schlaeger.

Fever checks at the door, no facials or blow drying: Hair salons 'reinventing' under coronavirus

Apparently, customers don't mind. On Thursday, Schlaeger was booked solid for two weeks at salons that are open 12 hours a day, seven days a week.

"We will survive this, but we are absolutely not doing the business we did before," said Schlaeger.

Root Salon's Koktavy was hit with an unexpected challenge - losing half of his staff.

One said she was quitting to help clean up Minneapolis from arson and looting amid protests over the death of George Floyd in police custody. "One said she had all this time to look inward and got less and less interested in coming back," he said.

Was the nine-week closure to control the virus's spread worth the harm to his businesses?

Koktavy said his thinking has evolved. "I was so mad at first. Why do I have to own a salon and not a Walmart?" he said.

Now, he thinks the shutdown was the right call as it should reduce the risk of a resurgence later.

"The last thing I want is to be shut back down," he said. He predicted that even with a two-month hiatus, this year's income might match that of last year. Supreme Court OK's employers limiting free birth control on religious grounds U.S. hiring soared in May as mass layoffs eased \$200K loan helped Minn. Senate president's business hang on Judge orders Dakota Access pipeline shut down pending review Stores focus on cleaning to get shoppers back to spending

Schlaeger, too, is adapting successfully. But he was annoyed by what he called the unfairness of allowing some group gatherings while others were banned.

"I get it if you say you can't congregate in a church or salon," he said. But he watched thousands of protesters marching the streets without social distancing - some without masks.

"A lot of politicians are saying, 'Go out and protest,'" he said. "As a small-business owner, this is confusing."

Supreme Court OK's employers limiting free birth control on religious grounds U.S. hiring soared in May as mass layoffs eased \$200K loan helped Minn. Senate president's business hang on Judge orders Dakota Access pipeline shut down pending review Stores focus on cleaning to get shoppers back to spending

Graphic

Jim Koktavy, owner of Roots Salons on Selby Avenue in St.Paul, cuts the hair of Jan Koktavy, his "bonus mom" (he prefers this term to step-mother) Monday, June 8, 2020. Koktavy has just reopened after being closed since March because of the coronavirus pandemic. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: July 9, 2020

Fever checks at the door, no facials or blow drying: Hair salons 'reinventing' under coronavirus

End of Document

From tragedy, a wellspring of art

ARTICLE CDLXXXIV.

FROM TRAGEDY, A WELLSPRING OF ART

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 7A

Length: 65 words

Body

Gov. Tim Walz took a walking tour of artwork along St. Paul's University Avenue that was commissioned by Springboard for the Arts. The St. Paul nonprofit experienced damage during unrest following the death of George Floyd. Artist Seitu Jones, who created a downloadable stencil of Floyd's face for artists' use, accompanied Walz on the tour.

Photo by GLEN STUBBE · glen.stubbe@startribune.com

Load-Date: June 10, 2020

End of Document

Mpls. charter is obstacle to defunding police

ARTICLE CDLXXXV.

MPLS. CHARTER IS OBSTACLE TO DEFUNDING POLICE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 7A

Length: 666 words

Byline: LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

When a majority of Minneapolis City Council members pledged to "begin the process of ending" the police department, they underplayed the difficulties ahead, including a lack of consensus on how far to go and a city charter that guarantees a minimum police force.

In the two weeks since George Floyd's death drew condemnation of police brutality and racism from around the world, council members have used the terms "dismantle" and "defund" in different ways.

While some have spoken about a future without police, others have talked about reducing the force and supplementing police with additional mental health or social service workers, who could respond to some types of calls.

Council Member Phillipe Cunningham, in a call with reporters Monday, said he would not support merely replacing the existing police department with another one.

"As a council member, I do not have any interest in rehiring the police department, even if it's under different rules. That, fundamentally, still does not change the system of policing and public safety," he said. Asserting that policing was rooted in white supremacy, Cunningham added, "We can completely change out every single person in the police department and we can put in new rules, but the system is the system and the culture is the culture, and it will come back."

Council Member Andrew Johnson e-mailed his constituents outlining a different view of sending workers to take a report and do home security audits after break-ins, while there may still be some calls that "require armed law enforcement to respond."

"To be clear: no one has been advocating that we simply end MPD without an alternative public safety department to replace it. We cannot have a vacuum where there is no law enforcement. ... We cannot allow anarchy or a Wild West situation."

As the council debates its next steps, a decision Monday may have granted it some leeway. A Hennepin County judge approved a state Department of Human Rights court order for the MPD to make immediate changes to protect Minneapolis communities' "longstanding problems in policing."

Mpls. charter is obstacle to defunding police

Council members have promised there will be ample opportunities for public comment before they make major changes, which they expect to happen over the course of months or even a year.

Developments in other cities could provide some models. In Camden, N.J., the local police department was disbanded, and a county police force took over its responsibilities.

If and when the Minneapolis council members decide to drastically reduce or eliminate the police department, they will need to work with others to amend the City Charter.

Minneapolis' charter now states that the council "must fund a police force of at least 0.0017 employees per resident, and provide for those employees' compensation." Based on the latest census data, that amounts to roughly 730 police employees. The department had 892 sworn officers and 175 non-sworn employees as of June 1, according to spokesman John Elder.

There are four ways to amend a city charter.

The council can try to pass an ordinance changing the charter, but that option is generally reserved for "noncontroversial or housekeeping amendments." To go that route, the council would need to vote 13-0, then receive approval from the mayor.

The council now has 12 members while it awaits an Aug. 11 special election to replace Abdi Warsame, who resigned to head the Minneapolis Public Housing Authority.

Mayor Jacob Frey has indicated he does not support the full abolishment of the police department.

The remaining scenarios would all require approval from voters. Residents could petition to get an item on the ballot. They would need at least 10,356 signatures to get that process started. The Charter Commission could propose a charter amendment.

But many in city government expect it would likely unfold another way.

The City Council could introduce an ordinance that would seek to amend the City Charter. Voters would have to approve the charter change.

Liz Navratil · 612-673-4994

Load-Date: June 10, 2020

New flash point: Police reform

ARTICLE CDLXXXVI.

NEW FLASH POINT: POLICE REFORM

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1090 wordsByline: BRIANA BIERSCHBACH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Defunding roils national politicsBody

Hours after a majority of Minneapolis City Council members announced plans to dismantle the city's police department, the idea reverberated in campaigns from Minnesota to Washington.

President Donald Trump went on the attack Monday, his campaign calling on Democrats to denounce the "radical" move, which Republicans say will only create more chaos in cities already damaged by riots. "We're already seeing leading Democrats join this movement, and indeed it is consuming the entire Democrat Party, as the most extreme elements have the loudest voices and demand acquiescence," said Tim Murtaugh, communications director for the Trump campaign.

Democratic candidate Joe Biden responded immediately in a campaign statement saying that while there's "urgent need for reform," he does not support defunding the police. "He hears and shares the deep grief and frustration of those calling out for change, and is driven to ensure that justice is done and that we put a stop to this terrible pain," Biden campaign spokesman Andrew Bates said in a statement.

In a pivotal election year, Democrats in Minnesota also were forced to grapple with how far police reform efforts should go, with some swing-district Democrats weighing the mood of their more moderate constituents against the anger of an activist base mobilizing in response to the police killing of George Floyd.

U.S. Rep. Ilhan Omar,

D-Minn., who represents Minneapolis and some surrounding suburbs, told protesters at a rally to defund the police over the weekend that she supports the move from the council. But outside of Minneapolis, Democrats in Minnesota were hesitant to fully embrace the movement on Monday, instead directing attention to a series of police reform proposals they're supporting in the Legislature and in Congress. Neither package includes a push to defund or dismantle police departments.

"There's no doubt that the criminal justice system is failing black communities and communities of color at disproportionate rates," said Senate Minority Leader Susan Kent, DFL-Woodbury. She described dismantling the Minneapolis police as a local issue that the Legislature shouldn't dictate. Kent is leading Senate Democrats as they attempt to reclaim a narrow majority from Republicans this fall.

While the Legislature's top Republican, Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, has invoked the fears of suburban moms watching the cities in flames, Kent said outrage over Floyd's death extends beyond the cities' limits. "What I am comfortable with is making sure we are fighting for all Minnesotans, and right now what I'm hearing loudly and clearly from suburban moms and others is we need to do a much better job of protecting our black communities and our black neighbors," she said.

But the issue of dismantling the Minneapolis police in some form will be particularly challenging for Democrats in rural districts that lean Republican. Sen. Kent Eken, DFL-Twin Valley, represents a rural district in northwestern Minnesota where he said the police department is respected in the community.

"I've always had concerns about painting things with a broad brush, and I do feel that in greater Minnesota and our rural communities, law enforcement is integrated into our communities and very involved in our communities," Eken said. "I don't want to see a situation where the state takes over implementing statewide approaches that are all based on what's happening in Minneapolis. I've always been an advocate of more local control."

Republicans in the Legislature are calling on Democrats in control of the House to hold hearings on the proposal to dismantle the police during a likely upcoming special session on Friday. And in campaigns, they are using the push in Minneapolis to paint all Democrats, from top to bottom, as "extreme."

"It's rare that a statement by a single City Council can reverberate not just through state politics but through national politics so rapidly," said Steven Schier, a retired Carleton College political science professor. "It's going to be an issue in state politics and you can bet that Republicans are going to be bringing it up time and again."

Facing a crucial election year, with control of the Legislature up for grabs, as well as a U.S. Senate seat and all eight congressional seats, both sides will be navigating a new mood in racial politics and voters' perceptions of policing.

Republican candidate Tyler Kistner, running against DFL U.S. Rep. Angie Craig in a suburban swing district this fall, called on her to denounce the move by the Minneapolis City Council, saying law enforcement "deserves our support, not to become the target of extreme ideas and ridicule."

Craig is serving her first term in Congress and represents a district Republicans have already been targeting. "When it comes to protecting Minnesota's families and neighborhoods - we very much need our firefighters, police officers and first responders," she said. "We need real reform, but eliminating them is not the answer."

In the state's U.S. Senate race, Republican candidate Jason Lewis said Democratic U.S. Sen. Tina Smith's "silence on the issue can only mean that she stands with Ilhan Omar and the City Council in wanting to abolish the police."

Smith said in a statement Monday that she doesn't support abolishing police departments. "But it is clear that we need to reimagine policing in a way that emphasizes de-escalation and community engagement," she said.

New flash point: Police reform

While Republicans clearly see a wedge issue in defending law enforcement, Democrats sense a seismic change in attitude that they say can't be ignored.

Rep. Carlos Mariani, DFL-St. Paul, chairman of a Minnesota House public safety committee, said he's open to discussing the Minneapolis proposal during the upcoming special session as part of a broader conversation about how to reimagine policing, not just in Minneapolis but across the state.

He rejects the idea that this is an "urban-only reality." He notes that the suburbs are growing more racially diverse each year, as are many rural cities where immigrant communities have planted roots and are growing.

"When folks came out to protest in large numbers, they came out from everywhere. You had suburban moms protesting in our cities and they were racially diverse. You saw actions in greater Minnesota towns, you had rallies," he said. "This is Minnesota's issue. This is not just south Minneapolis' issue. This whole divide-and-separate us out is an old tactic that Minnesotans are not going to buy."

Briana Bierschbach · 651-925-5042

Twitter: @bbierschbach

Load-Date: June 10, 2020

Wild star Matt Dumba teams up with fellow hockey players to eradicate racism

ARTICLE CDLXXXVII.

WILD STAR MATT DUMBA TEAMS UP WITH FELLOW HOCKEY PLAYERS TO ERADICATE RACISM

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 9, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 997 words

Byline: Dane Mizutani

Highlight: Matt Dumba remembers the horrors of playing hockey as a little kid. His olive skin was a darker complexion than most and made him an easy target. He remembers his mother occasionally leaving the rink in tears for reasons he couldn't quite understand. "You're sitting in the car talking about what happened and seeing all [...]"

Body

Matt Dumba remembers the horrors of playing hockey as a little kid. His olive skin was a darker complexion than most and made him an easy target. He remembers his mother occasionally leaving the rink in tears for reasons he couldn't quite understand.

"You're sitting in the car talking about what happened and seeing all the pain it caused," said Dumba, whose father, Charles, is Romanian and German and mother, Treena, is Filipino. "Just having the conversation of, 'Hey. You have to have tougher skin.'"

In that moment Dumba paused, taking a deep breath as if to process the fact that his family had to deal with the ignorance of others. It's a problem he knows continues to this day.

"That's a conversation that white parents don't have to have with their kids," Dumba said. "That's what I want to eliminate."

That's why Dumba wanted to be a voice in the newly created Hockey Diversity Alliance, an independent organization started by minorities who play professional hockey. He's joined by San Jose Sharks winger Evander Kane and former NHL player Akim Aliu, who will serve as the co-heads, and an executive committee that includes Detroit Red Wings defenseman Trevor Daley, Buffalo Sabres winger Wayne Simmonds, Philadelphia Flyers winger Chris Stewart and recently retired NHL player Joel Ward.

The creation of the Hockey Diversity Alliance came on Monday, a couple of weeks after the tragic death of George Floyd, who died after being choked out under the knee of a Minneapolis police officer.

As that horrific video circulated around social media, and massive protests followed on an international stage, so many people came to realize what minorities have long understood. That racism is still alive.

Wild star Matt Dumba teams up with fellow hockey players to eradicate racism

"It's just so sad that it came to this point," Dumba said. "This was basically the inevitable boiling point of people actually waking up and realizing that there are problems in the U.S., in Canada, in our countries and there is this divide."

While the Hockey Diversity Alliance likely won't have a large footprint outside of the sport, at least not right away, it can create conversations within it while continuing to grow the game at a grassroots level. The main goal is to create change within the sport itself, something members of the Hockey Diversity Alliance talked about during a conversation with former San Francisco 49ers quarterback Colin Kaepernick.

"It was super cool hearing from Kaep and seeing how much he is really invested in this," Dumba said. "For him to sit down and take the time out of his day to talk to us and kind of preach and give his wisdom from a guy who's been through it was super cool."

"I know when he was talking, everyone was listening and getting a little starstruck seeing a man of this stature," Dumba added. "At the end of the day, he's a real dude, and he was having real conversation with us. That's what I got out of it. I respect the hell out of that dude."

Asked specifically how the Hockey Diversity Alliance plans to accomplish its goals, Dumba noted how it starts at the youth level. That's where he and the rest of the members of the Hockey Diversity Alliance remember experiencing racism for the first time. As much as that means promoting diversity and creating conversations at the youth level, it also means making the sport itself more accessible to kids from all backgrounds.

Aside from working with kids, there also need to be conversations at the NHL level, according to Dumba. He said it feels like people are listening and learning more than ever before, and the Hockey Diversity Alliance needs to keep those conversations going.

"There are a lot of smart guys in our league that understand that and are taking it upon themselves to further themselves in that aspect and really make a change," Dumba said. "Just younger players seeing not only their favorite black or minority players standing up but also their favorite white players also committing to this is going to go such a long way in bridging that gap and bringing everyone together."

As Dumba grows older he is starting to fully harness his voice within the community, and he wants to use it to make a difference. He's committed to that moving forward.

"I want to be a leader," Dumba said. "This is just the start for me. I think putting myself out there, and being a part of this is a huge step. But I'm going to keep doing stuff in my community, keep doing stuff with (the Hockey Diversity Alliance) and just be there for those who might not have anyone there right now."

If everyone continues to take the same approach, according to Dumba, things could look a lot different in the future.

"I think all of us understand that this can be so much bigger than what it is today or in a week or in a month, a year from now," Dumba said. "We have an opportunity to change the game right now, and to really just make a stand for what is right."

Wild star Matt Dumba teams up with fellow hockey players to eradicate racism

John Shipley: So far, nothing enjoyable about rebooting pro sports Wild interim coach Dean Evason living in moment despite coaching for his life Wild hire draft guru Judd Brackett as director of amateur scouting Wild's Zach Parise: Short reboot not ideal but 'it's what we're dealing with right now' Wild to open training camp next week, return to play Aug. 1

What does that look like, say, 10 years down the road?

"If I got a chance to dream, I think in 10 years, I think we'll see at least half of the team is going to be mixed or have some color, or be some minorities, or maybe at that time it's the majority," Dumba said. "Hopefully by that time kids will only hear the stories - the stories of what some of us had to go through to get where we are - and they can look back and see us and all the people who get involved with what we're trying to do. They can see us as kind of pioneers for the sport and people who got rid of something that was so negative in our game. You'd be naive to say there's not racism in our game. Hopefully those kids can come up and grow up in a hockey environment that does not have that."

Load-Date: July 10, 2020

End of Document

'He is going to change the world': Funeral held for George Floyd

ARTICLE CDLXXXVIII.

'HE IS GOING TO CHANGE THE WORLD': FUNERAL HELD FOR GEORGE FLOYD

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 810 words

Byline: Associated Press, Juan Lozano, Nomaan Merchant

Highlight: The funeral capped six days of mourning for Floyd in three cities: Raeford, North Carolina, near where he was born., Houston, where he grew up, and Minneapolis, where he died.

Body

By JUAN A. LOZANO, NOMAAN MERCHANT and ADAM GELLER

The funeral capped six days of mourning for Floyd in three cities: Raeford, North Carolina, near where he was born; Houston, where he grew up; and Minneapolis, where he died. The memorials have drawn the families of other black victims whose names have become familiar in the debate over race and justice - among them, Eric Garner, Michael Brown, Ahmaud Arbery and Trayvon Martin.

After the service, Floyd's golden casket was taken by hearse to the cemetery in the Houston suburb of Pearland to be entombed next to his mother, for whom he cried out as he lay dying. A mile from the graveyard, the casket was transferred to a glass-sided carriage drawn by a pair of white horses. A brass band played as his casket was taken inside the mausoleum.

Hundreds of people, some chanting, "Say his name, George Floyd," gathered along the procession route and outside the cemetery entrance in the mid-90s heat.

"I don't want to see any black man, any man, but most definitely not a black man sitting on the ground in the hands of bad police," said Marcus Brooks, 47, who set up a tent with other graduates of Jack Yates High School, Floyd's alma mater.

In the past two weeks, amid the furor over Floyd's death, sweeping and previously unthinkable things have taken place: Confederate statues have been toppled, and many cities are debating overhauling, dismantling or cutting funding for police departments. Authorities in some places have barred police from using chokeholds or are otherwise rethinking policies on the use of force.

Dozens of Floyd's family members, most dressed in white, took part in the four-hour service. Grammy-winning singer Ne-Yo was among those who sang.

The mourners included actors Jamie Foxx and Channing Tatum, J.J. Watt of the NFL's Houston Texans, rapper Trae tha Truth, Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee, Houston Police Chief Art Acevedo and Houston Mayor

'He is going to change the world': Funeral held for George Floyd

Sylvester Turner, who brought the crowd to its feet when he announced he will sign an executive order banning chokeholds in the city.

"I know you have a lot of questions that no child should have to ask, questions that too many black children have had to ask for generations: Why? Why is Daddy gone?" former Vice President Joe Biden, the Democratic presidential candidate, said, addressing Floyd's 6-year-old daughter in a video eulogy played at the service. "Now is the time for racial justice. That's the answer we must give to our children when they ask why."

Biden made no mention of his opponent in November. But other speakers took swipes at President Donald Trump, who has ignored demands to address racial bias and has called on authorities to crack down hard on lawlessness.

"The president talks about bringing in the military, but he did not say one word about 8 minutes and 46 seconds of police murder of George Floyd," said the Rev. Al Sharpton, the civil rights activist. "He challenged China on human rights. But what about the human right of George Floyd?"

Most of the pews were full, with relatively little space between people.

"So much for social distancing today," the Rev. Remus Wright told mourners, gently but firmly instructing those attending to wear face masks.

Texas has no limit on how many people can gather in places of worship during the pandemic, though Republican Gov. Greg Abbott has encouraged churches to follow federal health guidelines.

Although the church service was private, at least 50 people gathered outside to pay their respects.

"There's a real big change going on, and everybody, especially black, right now should be a part of that," said Kersey Biagase, who traveled more than three hours from Port Barre, Louisiana, with his girlfriend, Brandy Pickney. They wore T-shirts printed with Floyd's name and "I Can't Breathe."

Floyd served nearly five years in prison for robbery with a deadly weapon before becoming a mentor and a church outreach volunteer in Houston. He moved to Minnesota several years ago through a program that tried to change men's lives by helping them find work in new settings.

At the time of his death, Floyd was out of work as a bouncer at a Minneapolis club that had closed because of the coronavirus outbreak. He was seized by police after being accused of passing a counterfeit $20 bill at a convenience store.

Four Minneapolis officers were arrested in his death: Derek Chauvin, 44, was charged with second-degree murder. J. Alexander Kueng, Thomas Lane and Tou Thao were charged with aiding and abetting. All four could get up to 40 years in prison.

Some of the mostly peaceful demonstrations that erupted after Floyd's death were marked by bursts of arson, assaults, vandalism and smash-and-grab raids on businesses, with more than 10,000 people arrested. But protests in recent days have been overwhelmingly peaceful.

The spelling of Brandy Pickney's first name has been corrected.

'He is going to change the world': Funeral held for George Floyd

Graphic

LaTonya Floyd speaks during the funeral for her brother, George Floyd, on Tuesday, June 9, 2020, at The Fountain of Praise church in Houston. (Godofredo A. Vásquez/Houston Chronicle via AP, Pool)

LaTonya Floyd speaks during the funeral service for her brother George Floyd at The Fountain of Praise church Tuesday, June 9, 2020, in Houston. (AP Photo/David J. Phillip, Pool)

Load-Date: July 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDLXXXIX.

FEDS SEEKING HELP IN SEARCH FOR ARSON SUSPECTS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 465 wordsByline: CHAO XIONG; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The ATF released photos of several suspects who allegedly set Mpls. fires.Body

Federal authorities are asking for help in identifying several suspects who allegedly set fires in Minneapolis during protests over the killing of George Floyd while in police custody.

The U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) released several pictures Tuesday of suspects captured on security cameras allegedly setting fire to a school, grocery store and the Minneapolis Third Precinct police station, among other buildings.

"Progress has been steady in the Minneapolis fire investigations, and we are at a point where we need help identifying people," said Jeff Reed, assistant special agent in charge of the ATF St. Paul Field Division, in a statement. "These arsons are adversely impacting our communities, business owners, employees and their families."

Also on Tuesday, two more people were charged with conspiracy to commit arson for allegedly starting fires at a St. Paul health and nutrition store on May 28. Samuel Elliott Frey, 19, and Bailey Marie Baldus, 19, allegedly entered the Great Health and Nutrition store at 1360 University Ave. W., along with three other people and used flammable hand sanitizer to start a shelving unit on fire.

At least 570 buildings were vandalized or looted across the Twin Cities as thousands of demonstrators took to the streets several nights in a row to protest the death of George Floyd, who was killed on May 25.

At least 67 buildings were completely destroyed.

Floyd, a 46-year-old black man from St. Louis Park, died after then-Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin knelt on his neck for eight minutes and 46 seconds while two of his colleagues held down the rest of Floyd's body. His death set off peaceful protests and vandalism across the country and around the world.

All four officers at the scene - Chauvin, J Alexander Kueng, Thomas Lane and Tou Thao - were promptly fired. All four have been charged in the case.

Feds seeking help in search for arson suspects

The ATF released photos of several suspects who allegedly set fire to the Minnesota Transitions Charter School, the Minneapolis police Third Precinct building, an AutoZone store, a Wells Fargo Bank building and an Aldi's grocery store. The agency said it was working with the FBI, Minneapolis police, the Hennepin County Sheriff's Office and other law enforcement agencies to investigate the fires and other crimes related to the protests.

The agency also put out a plea for cooperation from anyone who "incited or promoted violence of any kind."

Anyone with information about the identities of the people involved can call the ATF at 1-888-ATF-TIPS (1-888-283-8477), e-mail ATFTips@atf.gov, or submit information online at ReportIt.com.

Witnesses who have digital evidence to share or tips can call 1-800-CALLFBI (1-800-225-5324), or visit fbi.gov/violence.

Chao Xiong · 612-270-4708

Twitter: @ChaoStrib

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

1 of 4 ex-officers in George Floyd arrest has posted bail, left jail

ARTICLE CDXC. 1 OF 4 EX-OFFICERS IN GEORGE FLOYD ARREST HAS POSTED BAIL, LEFT JAIL

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 283 words

Byline: The Associated Press

Highlight: One of four former Minneapolis police officers charged in the death of George Floyd has posted bail and is out of jail. According to online records, Thomas Lane, 37, posted bail of $750,000 and was released from the Hennepin County Jail, with conditions, shortly after 4 p.m. Wednesday. Records show the other officers remained in [...]

Body

One of four former Minneapolis police officers charged in the death of George Floyd has posted bail and is out of jail.

According to online records, Thomas Lane, 37, posted bail of $750,000 and was released from the Hennepin County Jail, with conditions, shortly after 4 p.m. Wednesday. Records show the other officers remained in custody.

Lane is charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and manslaughter for his role in the arrest of Floyd, a handcuffed black man who died Memorial Day after another officer, Derek Chauvin, pressed his knee to Floyd's neck as Floyd cried out that he couldn't breathe and became motionless.

Lane's attorney Earl Gray did not immediately return a message seeking comment. But last week Gray said that Lane was a rookie, and that the only thing he did was hold Floyd's feet so he couldn't kick. The criminal complaint also says that Lane expressed concern about Floyd and asked Chauvin twice if they should roll Floyd to his side, but Chauvin said no. Gray said Lane also performed CPR in the ambulance.

Gray told the Star Tribune he plans to bring a motion to dismiss the charges.

Chauvin is in custody at the state prison in Oak Park Heights on $1 million bail.

All four officers were fired by the Minneapolis Police Department before they were charged.

Feds deny Minnesota request for aid to rebuild after unrest. Police reforms among the issues legislators expected to take up when they return to the Capitol. NYC mayor helps paint 'Black Lives Matter' outside Trump Tower. Lawyer: Over 150 Minneapolis officers seeking disability following unrest. 'We don't think we did this all right': State leaders weigh in on response to Minneapolis riots

1 of 4 ex-officers in George Floyd arrest has posted bail, left jail

Graphic

Thomas Kiernan Lane. (Courtesy of the Hennepin County Sheriff's Office)

Load-Date: July 11, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDXCI. MINNEAPOLIS POLICE CHIEF TAKES ON UNION, PROMISES CHANGE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 948 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: MINNEAPOLIS (AP) - The Minneapolis Police Department will withdraw from police union contract negotiations, Chief Medaria Arradondo said Wednesday, as he announced initial steps in what he said would be transformational reforms to the agency in the wake of George Floyd's death.Body

By STEVE KARNOWSKI and AMY FORLITI

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) - The Minneapolis Police Department will withdraw from police union contract negotiations, Chief Medaria Arradondo said Wednesday, as he announced initial steps in what he said would be transformational reforms to the agency in the wake of George Floyd's death.

Faced with calls from activists and a majority of City Council members to dismantle or defund the department, Arradondo also said he would use a new system to identify problem officers early and intervene.

"We will have a police department that our communities view as legitimate, trusting and working with their best interests at heart," he said at a news conference more than two weeks after Floyd died after a white officer pressed his knee into the handcuffed black man's neck even after he stopped moving and pleading for air.

Activists have pointed to racial inequities and brutality, as well as a system that rarely disciplines problem officers. The officer who had his knee on Floyd's neck, Derek Chauvin, had 17 complaints against him and had been disciplined only once.

Arradondo said "taking a deliberate pause" to review the union contract is the first step toward change. He said it's debilitating for a chief when an officer does something that calls for termination, but the union works to keep that person on the job.

Advisers will look for ways to restructure the contract to provide more transparency and flexibility, he said. The review will look at critical incident protocols, use of force, and disciplinary protocols, including grievances and arbitration, among other things.

"This work must be transformational, but I must do it right," Arradondo said.

Minneapolis police chief takes on union, promises change

The union's contract expired on Dec. 31 but remains in effect until there is a new one. Talks began in October and eventually included a state mediator; the last discussion was in early March, when the coronavirus led to talks breaking off.

Union President Bob Kroll didn't immediately return messages.

Arradondo sidestepped a question about whether he thought Kroll, often seen as an obstacle to changes, should step down. He also didn't directly answer a question about whether residents should worry about a slowdown in police response time as a pushback against attempts to transform the department. Some City Council members have said in the past that their wards saw such slowdowns when they complained about police action.

In an interview later, Arradondo said it's up to the union's members to decide whether Kroll should resign. But he said he hopes the union leadership takes to heart "the fierce urgency of now." He said he doesn't believe rank-and-file officers are an obstacle to change. He also said citizens "should not be concerned or worried" about any slowdown in service.

"Our men and women continue to show up," he said. "They're showing up on their shifts. They're showing up out there in the community. They're answering the calls."

Arradondo fired the four officers who were at the scene of the encounter with Floyd the day after his death. Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and manslaughter, and the other three officers are charged with aiding and abetting.

One of those officers, Thomas Lane, posted bail of $750,000 and was released Wednesday with conditions. Chauvin, J. Kueng and Tou Thao remained in custody.

Arradondo's predecessor, Janee Harteau, and Mayor Jacob Frey are among those who have complained that the police union is a roadblock to change. Frey, who praised Arradondo's announcement, said this week that the city has difficulty terminating and disciplining officers because of the union. Bob Bennett, an attorney who has sued the department many times over police misconduct allegations, has said that the union has more sway over police conduct than chiefs do.

While a majority of City Council members called for dismantling the department, they provided no clear plan on how that would happen. Frey has said he would not support abolishing the department.

Minnesota Attorney General Keith Ellison, who is prosecuting the four officers, told The Associated Press in an interview earlier Wednesday that he's not calling for dismantling or defunding the department but that the people who are "should be listened to rather than dismissed."

He said it was fair to question whether community groups that fight against gun violence should get more money, for example, and whether schools with officers should also have more nurses and counselors.

"Nobody's saying defund safety," Ellison said. "What they're doing is they're challenging the 19th, 20th century model of how we deliver safety ... how it's not really working very well and coming up with alternatives."

Arradondo, the city's first African American police chief, joined the Minneapolis Police Department in 1989 as a patrol officer, working his way up to precinct inspector and head of the Internal Affairs Unit, which investigates officer misconduct allegations. Along the way, he and four other black officers successfully sued the department for discrimination in promotions, pay and discipline.

Minneapolis police chief takes on union, promises change

He was promoted to assistant chief in early 2017, then became chief later that year, after Harteau was fired for the way she handled the fatal police shooting of Justine Ruszczyk Damond, an Australian native who had called 911 to report a possible sexual assault behind her home.

Many hoped Arradondo could alter the culture of a department that critics said too frequently used excessive force and discriminated against people of color. Arradondo made some quick changes, including toughening the department's policy on use of body cameras. But critics have said more needs to be done.

Load-Date: July 11, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDXCII. 2010 DEATH AN UNLEARNED LESSON?

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 927 wordsByline: JENNIFER BJORHUS; LIZ SAWYER; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

In 2013 the city of Minneapolis paid $3 million to the family of David Cornelius Smith, who died after police pinned him face down, while handcuffed, on the floor of a downtown YMCA.

It remains one of the largest payouts for a police misconduct lawsuit in the city's history, and Smith's death in 2010 focused public attention on the dangerous prone restraint tactic.

Now, following the death of George Floyd in a similar restraint, Smith's family wants to know whether the Minneapolis Police Department ever fulfilled a promise in the city's settlement to require all sworn officers undergo training on the dangers of positional asphyxia.

Smith's sister put the question to the civilian Minneapolis Police Conduct Oversight Commission (PCOC) on Tuesday evening. Billed as a community-listening session, the virtual meeting was the panel's first since Floyd's death May 25 and the violent protests that erupted afterward.

Speaking from Atlanta, David Smith's sister Angela choked back tears as she told the commission how devastated her family is that another black man has died under the knee of a Minneapolis police officer. Smith, 41, said that her family fought for a settlement that included MPD reforms on the use of such extreme restraints, so that "nobody else would have to die like my brother did."

"But now I heard George Floyd cry out for his mom, and people stood by as he died," she said. "We want to know: Why didn't the police train officers to let them know how dangerous this type of restraint is, and these people don't have to die?"

Of the nearly 20 people who spoke, some offered concrete recommendations for altering the current state of policing.

The Rev. Daniel Wolpert, a Presbyterian minister who lives just two blocks from where Floyd was killed, blasted the commission for "milquetoast" statements regarding Floyd's death and its inability to create meaningful reforms.

2010 DEATH AN UNLEARNED LESSON?

"You are certainly not a credible public body. That's not surprising. Most civilian oversight commissions have no power and no teeth," Wolpert said. "You should try to be honest about the fact that you can't really do anything."

Commissioners thanked the public for their comments and said they were necessary, if difficult to hear.

Chairman Afsheen Foroozan told Smith that he would find out whether the MPD did the agreed-upon training. Commission member Abigail Cerra said that she asked the MPD and was told to submit a data practices act request for it, which she did.

The seven-member commission is a civilian group appointed by the mayor and City Council. It directs and guides the Office of Police Conduct Review, which investigates misconduct complaints. Unlike the commission, the review office is made up of paid city staff and law enforcement officers and is part of the city's Department of Civil Rights.

Jeff Storms, a lawyer who represented the Smith family in its lawsuit, said people have known for decades that holding individuals in a prone restraint position, particularly with weight on their back, can kill them.

"It would be deeply disturbing to believe that any officer in the year 2020 would not train on the risks of positional asphyxiation, particularly in Minneapolis," Storms said.

Storms said the MPD announced in 2012 that it distributed a video for officers on the dangers of prone restraint tactics to play during roll call. The video included a medical examiner advising officers "not to restrain subjects in the prone position with weight on the subject's back," court documents show.

That was before the 2013 settlement with the Smith family, however.

Minneapolis Police spokesman John Elder told the Star Tribune on Tuesday that he did not know whether all officers received the training, and advised the newspaper to submit a data practices act request.

Veteran MPD officers privately said they didn't think it was possible that a seasoned officer such as Derek Chauvin didn't know about the dangers of body weight pins, or positional asphyxia. For decades, the department's annual in-service training regularly mentioned the term, one retired senior official said, and repeatedly taught law enforcement not to leave an individual on their stomach - especially while handcuffed.

Al Giraud-Isaacson, a former member on the civilian watchdog panel, lamented that nothing has changed since the commission's founding in 2013. It still struggles for funding, begs for City Council members to engage and lacks real authority.

"There's no oversight of police conduct with this commission - and it's not the commissioners' fault. They do everything they can under their power to influence changes, influence policy," he said, but urged current members to fight for greater authority.

"Demand the City Council rewrite the city ordinance that regulates oversight of the police; take the police completely out of the process," Giraud-Isaacson said. "Lobby the state to change the state statute ... that severely restricts what Minneapolis can do on oversight."

2010 DEATH AN UNLEARNED LESSON?

Giraud-Isaacson was referring to the changes made in 2012 taking away the ability of civilian oversight bodies to make a finding of fact or determination regarding a misconduct complaint or impose discipline on an officer.

In an interview following the meeting, Commissioner Cerra said she had her marching orders.

"I received the clear directive from residents and the Smith family: Step up and get at it," Cerra said. "The PCOC has power, and I will use it to demand systemic change."

Jennifer Bjorhus · 612-673-4683 jennifer.bjorhus@startribune.com

Liz Sawyer · 612-673-4648 liz.sawyer@startribune.com

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

End of Document

Authorities ask for help identifying more arson suspects in George Floyd unrest

ARTICLE CDXCIII. AUTHORITIES ASK FOR HELP IDENTIFYING MORE ARSON SUSPECTS IN GEORGE FLOYD UNREST

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 366 words

Byline: Kristi Belcamino

Highlight: Saying that they are finding "new persons of interest" daily in a slew of arson fires set during the George Floyd unrest, investigators are asking for help in identifying suspects in blazes across Minneapolis-St. Paul, including those at the Minnesota Transitions Charter School, the Minneapolis Police Department's 3rd Precinct and an AutoZone store. A multi-agency [...]

Body

Saying that they are finding "new persons of interest" daily in a slew of arson fires set during the George Floyd unrest, investigators are asking for help in identifying suspects in blazes across Minneapolis-St. Paul, including those at the Minnesota Transitions Charter School, the Minneapolis Police Department's 3rd Precinct and an AutoZone store.

A multi-agency investigation by the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives' National Response Team, Minneapolis Police Department, Minneapolis Fire Department, Hennepin County Sheriff's Office, Minnesota State Fire Marshal Division and the FBI is asking for help identifying five more people suspected of being involved in the arson fires.

The ATF's St. Paul field division will post additional pictures on its Twitter account as they become available at @ATFStPaul.

ATF is seeking new persons of interest related to several Minneapolis fires during recent civil unrest. ATF working with @MinneapolisPD @HennepinSheriff @FBIMinneapolis @MinneapolisFire @MnDPS_SFM @DMNnews If you recognize these people call 1-888-ATF-TIPS. pic.twitter.com/6S2NFz8QRF

- ATF St. Paul (@ATFStPaul)

Officials ask anyone with information on the identification and whereabouts of these individuals to contact the ATF.

Call 1-888-ATF-TIPS (1-888-283-8477), email ATFTips@atf.gov, or submit information anonymously via www.ReportIt.com or the Report It mobile app, available on Google Play or Apple Apps Store. If using Report It, select "ATF - St. Paul Field Division" as the reporting agency.

Authorities ask for help identifying more arson suspects in George Floyd unrest

The FBI is also looking for information on anyone who "may have incited or promoted violence of any kind" during the unrest that followed Floyd's death in Minneapolis police custody. Anyone with information can call 1-800-CALLFBI (800-225-5342) or send still pictures or videos to fbi.gov/violence.

'We don't think we did this all right': State leaders weigh in on response to Minneapolis riots https://t.co/cr5F2DIiB1 June 10, 2020 Medical experts: Floyd's speech didn't mean he could breathe George Floyd transcript: Read it in full here Minneapolis council members pledge thoughtful police revamp Monuments and statues are falling. But what comes next?

Load-Date: July 10, 2020

End of Document

Black Lives poster torn, agent fired

ARTICLE CDXCIV. BLACK LIVES POSTER TORN, AGENT FIRED

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 504 wordsByline: JOHN REINAN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

A longtime agent for Edina Realty was terminated after she posted on social media about tearing down Black Lives Matter posters in the 50th and France area, the heart of the city's business district.

Facebook posts on Babette Gillet Bean's account last week showed a photo of a crumpled Black Lives Matter poster.

"I ripped off many in DT Edina tonight," Bean commented.

Gena Henrich, Edina Realty's director of marketing, confirmed that the company ended its relationship with Bean after being made aware of the Facebook posts. The agency also announced Bean's termination through its own Facebook account.

In an e-mail Tuesday night, Bean said her actions had been misunderstood.

"I removed four posters that had been affixed to light poles on my apartment complex property," she wrote. "I did not do so as some kind of political or racist act, but because any postings - regardless of content - on light poles are prohibited by city ordinance. I regularly remove garage sale, for sale and all kinds of other signs posted [on] the poles and have done so for years.

"I did not remove these signs because I am somehow racist or against the movement to once and for all eradicate systemic racism in our government institutions and society," Bean wrote. "I fully support the public outcry for long overdue change in our police departments that all too often deliver grossly unequal justice to African Americans and other minorities."

In an interview Tuesday, Edina Realty CEO Greg Mason said the company is committed to promoting equity and fighting bias in all its services. The company, which operates throughout Minnesota and much of Wisconsin, has about 2,300 agents.

"You have to be focused and passionate, and we are," Mason said. "And we will double down on our efforts."

Black Lives poster torn, agent fired

As with many communities in the Twin Cities area, Edina's history includes institutional racism. Homes in the city's Country Club neighborhood, built between 1924 and 1944, included racially restrictive covenants. As one of the nation's first planned communities, with more than 550 upscale homes, it helped transform Edina from its farming origins into a prosperous suburb.

Home buyers in Country Club had to agree they would never sell their property to anyone "other than one of the white or Caucasian race."

Nonwhites also were barred from living in Country Club unless they were domestic servants who lived in the household they served.

Other neighborhoods in Edina also used racial covenants, as did thousands of properties in Minneapolis and other Minnesota communities.

More information can be found at Mapping Prejudice, a University of Minnesota project that has cataloged racial covenants on Hennepin County properties.

Mason said Edina Realty has a diversity and inclusion team that meets regularly and includes top executives. Its title company is helping with research on restrictive covenants, and offering information on how homeowners can get them removed from a title - even though the covenants are no longer enforceable.

John Reinan · 612-673-7402

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

ARTICLE CDXCV. UNREST DELAYS BUDGET OVERHAUL

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 458 wordsByline: LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Minneapolis officials were already seeking cuts due to pandemic.Body

Minneapolis' elected officials are delaying their budget overhaul, saying they lost time to work on it while responding to the riots that followed George Floyd's death.

Before Floyd died, after being pinned by his neck by a Minneapolis police officer's knee, the city's elected officials were looking to trim their roughly $1.6 billion budget to account for revenue that plunged amid the coronavirus pandemic.

Mayor Jacob Frey had been expected to provide a proposal for an updated budget to the council on Friday.

Council members are now eyeing the possibility of passing smaller changes to the budget in June but delaying the majority of the work until July.

As they move forward, many will be watching to see what changes the mayor and council propose for the city's police department.

Some council members have promised to "begin the process of ending" the police department, though they have not provided a single, unified vision of what that means.

Possible cuts to force

While a clause in the city charter prohibits them from immediately eliminating the police department - and Frey opposes the idea - some council members could try to reduce the force to its minimum required levels.

The charter requires the council to "fund a police force of at least 0.0017 employees per resident." Based on the latest census data, that would likely equal roughly 730 employees.

Unrest delays budget overhaul

The Minneapolis Police Department currently has a budget of $193.3 million, according to the city's finance department. It employed 892 sworn officers and 175 non-sworn employees as of June 1, according to spokesman John Elder.

The City Council could try to push for changes in this latest budget revision or it could decide to address those in the process of budgeting for 2021.

Hours before Floyd died, city staff held a budget retreat to try to cut $165 million from the budget. The city lost money in tax revenue, utility bills and parking fees when businesses closed to encourage social distancing amid the pandemic.

"By Tuesday morning, our whole world had changed," said Council Member Linea Palmisano, who chairs the budget committee.

In the days that followed, city officials focused on responding to riots, Palmisano said, and budget discussions resumed in detail late last week.

Cost of riot damages

The city is still tallying the cost of riot damages. As of Friday, the number was estimated between $100 million and $150 million and expected to grow. City officials have said they intend to apply for aid, but it's too early to tell whether they will get it.

The city is also waiting to see how the state will allocate the $667 million it received in federal CARES Act funding to help cover the widespread costs of responding to the coronavirus pandemic.

Liz Navratil · 612-673-4994

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

ARTICLE CDXCVI. MINNESOTA GOVERNOR ASKS LAWMAKERS FOR JUSTICE AFTER FLOYD

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 739 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: MINNEAPOLIS (AP) - The death of George Floyd is sparking calls for the Minnesota Legislature to remove racial inequities from the criminal justice system in the state where he died and to aid neighborhoods damaged in unrest that followed.Body

By STEVE KARNOWSKI

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) - The death of George Floyd is sparking calls for the Minnesota Legislature to remove racial inequities from the criminal justice system in the state where he died and to aid neighborhoods damaged in unrest that followed.

But it's not clear yet how far lawmakers will go when they reconvene in a special session Friday, given that Republicans who control the Senate have been cool to major changes. Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka said his top priority instead will be trying to terminate the emergency executive powers that he contends Democratic Gov. Tim Walz abused while responding to both the coronavirus and the sometimes violent protests that spread worldwide from Minneapolis.

That hasn't sat well with Democratic lawmakers who want change now in response to the death of Floyd, who died May 25 after a white Minneapolis police officer pressed his knee into the handcuffed black man's neck for several minutes even after Floyd stopped moving and pleading for air.

"Black folks are sick and tired of literally suffering from people telling them to wait until the moment is right," said Senate Assistant Minority Leader Jeff Hayden, an African American whose district was the site of the encounter.

Democratic lawmakers and governors in several states, including Wisconsin, New Jersey, Arizona and Oregon, are hoping to harness the anger over Floyd's death to remake law enforcement, including new restrictions on the use of force. A proposal in Colorado would require departments to compile civilian demographic data in use-of-force cases and allow citizens to file lawsuits against police officers for misconduct. In Pennsylvania on Monday, black Democratic lawmakers displayed a Black Lives Matter banner while demanding movement on proposals to ban chokeholds, improve tracking of officers who have engaged in misconduct, and expand access to police video.

Minnesota governor asks lawmakers for justice after Floyd

Walz formally called the Minnesota special session Wednesday as he extended the peacetime state of emergency that he declared as the coronavirus started to gain a foothold in his state. Minnesota law requires him to call lawmakers back to the Capitol when he extends those powers when the Legislature is not in session.

"This call to a special session is not just from me," the governor said at a news conference. "It's that primal scream you heard from people on the street demanding justice."

The governor offered few specific proposals of his own but endorsed the work of the bicameral People of Color and Indigenous Caucus. That group has already offered 22-point slate of ideas that would stand a good chance of winning House approval, and they're pressuring Senate Republicans into taking them up.

"Bold, transformative action is what the public is crying for," Walz said. "Let's show them that democracy works."

During a news conference Monday, Hayden said proposals most likely to advance include modifying use-of-force standards, prioritizing the sanctity of life, codifying the duty of police to intervene when they see another officer using excessive force, lifting the state's ban on cities imposing residency requirements for officers, banning "warrior" use-of-force training for officers and banning chokeholds. Minneapolis has already adopted some of those changes in an agreement with the state human rights department.

"Minnesota needs to lead the nation in race reconciliation," Gazelka said at a news conference Friday. "This is an opportunity that comes around once in a generation, and what are we going to do with that?"

But the closest he came to offering concrete proposals was saying that a stalled public construction borrowing bill that's expected to be debated during the special session should include some sort of relief for the inner cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul, including damaged small businesses. He spoke in only general terms about criminal justice and educational equity issues, and suggested that big changes may have to wait.

A bonding bill needs a three-fifths majority in both chambers, and Hayden has threatened to withhold Senate Democratic votes unless lawmakers agree on addressing racial inequities, giving his party some leverage.

"Minnesota, and America, is watching to see what our first step will be," said Democratic Senate Minority Leader Susan Kent, of Woodbury. "We have the opportunity to set the bar high and lead by example, not to tiptoe around this issue of racial injustice."

Load-Date: July 11, 2020

ARTICLE CDXCVII. READERS WRITE CAN'T WE MOBILIZE TO REBUILD, TOO?

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 8ALength: 1265 wordsBody

REPAIRING THE DAMAGE

As I toured the devastation and burned-out open pits of our Longfellow neighborhood, I wondered why the city and state aren't deploying the same resources to help support the needs of our community that were used to restore order. For example, the National Guard has a stated mission to "protect the weak, save lives and restore neighborhoods" and has been deployed in fires, floods and other local disasters.

Shouldn't our mayor and governor deploy them (preferably without uniforms and weapons) and other public agencies to rebuild our local communities with the same urgency that was used just two weeks previously? Isn't that a step in the right direction helping us to heal?

Alan Lifson, Minneapolis

POLICE REFORM

Listen before critiquing, please

A number of letter writers who seem to be from my general demographic - white men who describe themselves as sympathetic to racial justice - wrote to the Star Tribune on Tuesday with strongly worded advice for the leaders working to restructure public safety in Minneapolis. The gist seems to be that they are doing it all wrong and will be responsible for re-electing Donald Trump. My people, my people: Let's not be this way.

To be absolutely clear, it's people who look like us that brought this country Donald Trump. To blame organizers, some of whom are black women, for the rise of his hate-filled politics is simply backward. Those who have marched for justice for years (as one writer puts it) should be especially willing to reflect on the murderous inequities that still exist in our city and country. It's time to ask questions about proposals we don't understand and be open to ideas of the people who are both the most directly affected by racism and moving powerfully to address it.

READERS WRITE Can't we mobilize to rebuild, too?

It's not a situation where we have to be silent: Organizers from Black Visions Collective and Reclaim the Block and city leaders have explicitly invited Minnesotans into a public conversation. Let's try to show up ready to listen and learn, not scold and lecture.

Kevin Whelan, Minneapolis

'SUBURBAN MOMS' COMMENT

Gazelka doesn't speak for me

Dear Sen. Paul Gazelka: I am a suburban mom and I certainly don't need an apology ("New flash point: Police reform," June 9, front page).

Last weekend, I woke up after a full night's sleep and drank coffee while sitting on my front porch. I played with my kids and worked in my garden. I sat at the dinner table with my family and laughed and ate pizza. I tucked my three little kids into bed and sat on my couch to watch Netflix with my spouse.

I did not wake up to ash on my lawn from the fires. I did not spend the previous night patrolling my own neighborhood while watching armored cars drive through the street and helicopters fly overhead. I did not worry about how I was going to feed my children because my grocery store had burned down. I did not march in a peaceful protest to be shot at with rubber bullets and tear gas. I did not live in constant fear that my friends, my family, my children would be killed by the people who are supposed to protect them.

So, no, I'm not "scared to death." I am mad as heck. I'm mad that you are more concerned about white, privileged suburban women being uncomfortable than you are about black people being killed by police officers.

Carah Hart, Edina

GREATER MINNESOTA

Reform is not just a metro problem

Hopefully, criminal justice reform and police brutality will be top priority when the Minnesota Legislature convenes for its special session this week. For those of us in rural Minnesota, however, it is important that the Legislature recognize that the mistreatment of people of color and Native communities by law enforcement authorities and security personnel is not just a metro-area concern. Whether it be in Winona, Montgomery, Windom, or countless other places, this race-based profiling, harassment and targeting needs to stop.

As white, rural Minnesotans, it's easy to overlook our own long history of government-led racism. We can be better than that. We can instead create a state where everyone feels safe and where everyone thrives, regardless of the color of their skin.

Doug Nopar, Winona, Minn.

. . .

Thanks to the Star Tribune for publishing the opinion piece on policing and mental illness ("Separating policing, mental health response isn't easy," June 9). Mindy Greiling depicted the heartfelt emotions of her family's struggles with mental illness and graphically reveals the complexity of when mental illness intersects with policing in any community.

READERS WRITE Can't we mobilize to rebuild, too?

I was fortunate to work on the 2015-16 Roseville-area League of Women Voters police study with Mindy. We examined and probed policing practices in six areas, one of which was intervening in mental health crises. Interviewing law enforcement chiefs and sheriffs and hearing firsthand the incredible challenges police and deputy responders along with family members face when encountering a mental illness crisis provided the impetus for our recommendations. One of these was to have all police responders be well-trained in crisis responses. While we individually acknowledge our implicit biases, the timing is good for all our suburban and Greater Minnesota communities to again examine and re-evaluate policies and methods of training.

Rita Leopold Mills, Little Canada, Minn.

POLICE DEPARTMENT

Supporters of disbanding should examine their own assumptions

In the discussion of disbanding the Minneapolis Police Department, believing that the elimination of police altogether will result in a drop in crime is itself built upon a racist assumption. It's built upon the hidden idea that systemic racism is to blame for most or even all crimes committed, and by extension, that most or all crimes are committed by black people. Obviously, nothing could be further from the truth. There are many bad actors of all races who would treat the elimination of police as license to commit crimes at will without fear of getting caught. This city would be inundated with criminals from every corner of the country eager to join in. Rich white neighborhoods would employ private police forces. Poor neighborhoods would be left to defend themselves. It would have the exact opposite effect desired.

The Minneapolis City Council must replace the MPD with a community-focused department, not eliminate the police altogether.

Chris Smith, Minneapolis

...

H.L. Mencken, an astute if acerbic surveyor of America's political landscape during the first half of the 20th century, once said that "for every complex problem there is an answer that is clear, simple and wrong."

In 1994, President Bill Clinton signed the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act. Propelled by public sentiment that crime was out of control, and weaponized as a wedge issue by the political parties, it would soon become known for its "three strikes" provision. In addition to providing federal dollars to the states to hire an additional 100,000 police officers, it encouraged states to adopt sentencing guidelines that mandated that any person convicted of three felonies must serve a life sentence. It was clear, and it was simple - more cops putting more bad guys in jail and throwing away the key.

Ten years later, a remorseful Clinton would admit, "I signed a bill that made the problem worse."

As cities around the country now wrestle with the complex problem of protecting citizens in this new confused reality, wise leadership must avoid the temptation to jump at clear and simple solutions, even if the voices around them insist on it.

READERS WRITE Can't we mobilize to rebuild, too?

Tom Baumann, Isanti, Minn.

We want to hear from you. Send us your thoughts here.

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE CDXCVIII.

PRAYERS ON PLYWOOD

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 822 wordsByline: ALICIA ELER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Artists waste no time spreading messages of hope, healing and social change on boarded-up buildings in the Twin Cities.Body

Artist Ryan Stopera slapped a stencil outline of George Floyd's face over a plywood board painted deep purple. Sheets of wood covered the street-facing windows of Fallout Urban Arts Center in the Whittier neighborhood, one of countless boarded-up Twin Cities buildings being transformed with paint and passion.

Stopera held the stencil in place while another artist shook a can of gold spray enamel and took aim at the cutup paper.

"Art can be an expression of prayer, a hope for the future, and a way of dealing with systemic racism," said Pastor Peter Wohler, executive director of Source MN, a faith-based organization that sponsors the Fallout and works with at-risk populations.

In the wake of last week's riots, hundreds of artists around the city are transforming boarded-up windows with messages of remembrance, hope, demands for justice, healing community and pride for minority-owned businesses. Some create their own variations of Floyd's familiar portrait. All are infusing powerful, positive energy during a painful time of growth and reconciliation.

"I think a lot of people have found themselves in this space of 'What to do?' and some of us went to art," said Stopera. "Even the act of painting is so meditative - and this is traumatic."

Using the hashtag #creativesaftercurfew, Stopera, Leslie Barlow and 20 to 30 other predominantly BIPOC (black/indigenous/people of color) artists are part of one crew painting murals on boarded-up businesses.

They received $5,000 from the Graves Foundation, discounts on paint supplies and free brushes from Wet Paint in St. Paul. Blick Art Materials chipped in $2,000 toward future murals. There's no time to apply for grants, so donations are essential.

Prayers on plywood

"There's a momentum right now with everything that happened," said artist Mackenzie Owens, who joined on Day 2 of painting. "We've got to get out."

As of Thursday the crew had done five murals. The boards could stay up for three to four weeks, and the crew has 20 businesses on deck. They focus on BIPOC businesses, with BIPOC artists developing the mural messaging.

At Fallout, Wohler gave the artists free rein to do whatever they wanted on its big boarded-up windows. The pastor sees a double injustice in the wake of Floyd's death: the perpetuation of systemic racism and the destruction of immigrant-run businesses. Murals, he believes, are one way to combat visual signs of violence that the charred storefronts on Lake Street represent.

The artists work quickly. The two-panel mural - showing Floyd, silhouettes of people with a pair of brown hands holding nutritious food, and a phoenix rising from the ashes - was painted by 15 community members in about 11 hours.

Last-minute location change

Everything is done on the fly, making plans flexible and often last minute. The artists moved to Fallout after their plan to paint the soon-to-be demolished Kmart on Lake Street fell apart.

Barlow thought of painting large hands holding up phones, symbolizing how people are getting the word out through social media, but on the screens they'd paint images of the future they wanted to see, whether it was "abolish the police" or "housing for all."

Kmart had been working with Wohler on the mural idea - that morning, volunteers from the Fallout had whitewashed over graffiti there - but then a store manager came out to talk with the artists.

"I don't want this to be a mural with a political message one way or the other," said the manager, who would only identify himself as Dan. "We don't want to be on either side. We just want to be out of the middle."

"The problem is that people don't want to take a side," said Barlow. "You are a business in a predominantly black and brown neighborhood."

The artists asked if there were any words or images he preferred. Dan suggested words like "peace" or a mural with flowers. The artists packed up their supplies.

When asked why the artists felt it was important for the mural to be here, Barlow pointed to Kmart's location in a heavily Latino and immigrant community, just one block from the Fifth Precinct police station that was under siege just days before.

"It's right here, in the middle of the community."

Mystery muralists

Hisham Hassan, owner of the pizza shop A Slice of New York in the 2400 block of Nicollet Avenue, got a message from a friend that someone had painted a mural on his boarded-up front window: A portrait of a black man wearing a bright orange shirt pops out against a light orange background. He has no facial features. Two fists holding orange-and-white-patterned cloths appear under blue-outlined yellow-and-orange letters with the text "George Floyd!"

Prayers on plywood

"I want to keep this," said Hassan. "It's too big, but I will find a place. It is a part of history."

Hassan has no idea who the artist is, but he welcomes the mural's presence.

"Maybe the sadness, maybe something good will come of it," he said. "Maybe, people will wake up and understand."

612-673-4437 · @AliciaEler

Load-Date: June 10, 2020

End of Document

Twins owners pledge $25 million to fight for racial justice

ARTICLE CDXCIX. TWINS OWNERS PLEDGE \$25 MILLION TO FIGHT FOR RACIAL JUSTICE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 336 words

Byline: Betsy Helfand

Highlight: The Pohlad family, owners of the Twins, announced a $25 million pledge toward racial justice in the Twin Cities on Wednesday, citing "the murder of George Floyd and the deeply ingrained systemic racism," in the United States. "Black people have experienced oppression and racism for far too long in this country," Bill Pohlad, the president [...]

Body

The Pohlad family, owners of the Twins, announced a $25 million pledge toward racial justice in the Twin Cities on Wednesday, citing "the murder of George Floyd and the deeply ingrained systemic racism," in the United States.

"Black people have experienced oppression and racism for far too long in this country," Bill Pohlad, the president of the Pohlad Family Foundation said in a release. "We condemn racism in all its forms, and we are firmly committed to helping to enact meaningful change. We know this will take time and effort, and we are committed to this work beyond this seminal moment in our country's history."

The money will be used in what the Pohlad family called a "two-phased, community-based approach."

Floyd died last month after a Minneapolis police officer knelt on his neck for nearly nine minutes. The death, captured on video by bystanders and close-circuit television, sparked protests around the country.

The first phase of the Pohlad family's plan will focus on providing relief and helping rebuild organizations in impacted areas of the Twin Cities. The Pohlad Family Foundation will "support grassroots organizations doing this important work" and match donations made by employees of Pohlad Companies.

As part of the second phase, the family plans to focus on effect "structural change" by working with other organizations to "change the systems that create racial inequities and marginalize people of color."

Twins report: Opt-out decision about more than just health for players Twins adjusting to the idea of no fans in attendance Young Twins pitchers compete for a spot on the roster Nelson Cruz delivers important message to Twins teammates Intrasquad game brings semblance of normal to Twins

Twins owners pledge $25 million to fight for racial justice

"While we are determined to help affect change in our community, we also know that any real change must start from within," Bill Pohlada said in the release. "And so, we acknowledge that we have our own work to do and are working to strengthen diversity and inclusion in our organization."

Load-Date: July 11, 2020

End of Document

HBO Max removes 'Gone With the Wind' to address its 'racist depictions'

ARTICLE D. HBO MAX REMOVES 'GONE WITH THE WIND' TO ADDRESS ITS 'RACIST DEPICTIONS'

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 603 words

Byline: Ap McClatchy

Highlight: WarnerMedia has yanked "Gone With the Wind" from its HBO Max streaming service, but the company plans to return the Southern Civil War drama to its catalog once it adds disclaimers about the film's racist depictions.

Body

By Meg James

WarnerMedia has yanked "Gone With the Wind" from its HBO Max streaming service, but the company plans to return the Southern Civil War drama to its catalog once it adds disclaimers about the film's racist depictions.

The move comes less than two days after filmmaker John Ridley argued, in a Los Angeles Times opinion piece, that the 1939 film not only ignored "the horrors of slavery" but also perpetuated "some of the most painful stereotypes of people of color."

WarnerMedia, which is owned by telecommunications giant AT&T, acted swiftly.

"'Gone With the Wind' is a product of its time, and depicts some of the ethnic and racial prejudices that have, unfortunately, been commonplace in American society," WarnerMedia said in a statement Tuesday. "These racist depictions were wrong then, and are wrong today, and we felt that to keep this title up without an explanation and denouncement of those depictions would be irresponsible."

WarnerMedia said it planned to return the Oscar-winning film to its new streaming service, along with "a discussion of its historical context and a denouncement of those very depictions."

However, the company said that the film "will be presented as it was originally created, because otherwise, [it] would be the same as claiming these prejudices never existed."

The move comes in the wake of George Floyd's killing on May 25 by a white Minneapolis police officer, who pinned Floyd at the neck for eight minutes and 46 seconds as other police officers dispassionately looked on.

HBO Max removes 'Gone With the Wind' to address its 'racist depictions'

The killing, captured on cellphone video, galvanized the Black Lives Matter movement and sparked huge protests in American cities against police brutality. Media outlets, which have unevenly covered the protests and civil unrest, have been reckoning with their own history of reinforcing racism.

On Sunday, the New York Times opinion editor James Bennet resigned amid controversy over the paper's publication of an op-ed by Sen. Tom Cotton (R-Ark.) under the headline "Send in the Troops." Cotton's piece focused on the rioting and called for the military to be mobilized to back up police. It came as the vast majority of protests were peaceful.

Separately, on Tuesday, ViacomCBS' Paramount Network canceled the long-running TV show "Cops."

"As a filmmaker, I get that movies are often snapshots of moments in history," Ridley wrote in his opinion piece about "Gone With the Wind." "They reflect not only the attitudes and opinions of those involved in their creation, but also those of the prevailing culture. As such, even the most well-intentioned films can fall short in how they represent marginalized communities."

The MGM film swept the Academy Awards the following year, notching wins for best picture, director (Victor Fleming), actress (Vivien Leigh), and supporting actress Hattie McDaniel became the first black American to win an Oscar for her turn as the servant Mammy.

"'Gone With the Wind,' however, has its own unique problem," Ridley wrote. "It doesn't just 'fall short' with regard to representation. It is a film that glorifies the antebellum south. It is a film that, when it is not ignoring the horrors of slavery, pauses only to perpetuate some of the most painful stereotypes of people of color."

"If we are to create a more just, equitable and inclusive future, we must first acknowledge and understand our history," WarnerMedia wrote in its statement, but did not specify when the film would return to HBO Max.

-

©2020 Los Angeles Times

Visit the Los Angeles Times at www.latimes.com

Distributed by Tribune Content Agency, LLC.

-

PHOTO (for help with images, contact 312-222-4194):

Load-Date: July 10, 2020

Protesters tear down Christopher Columbus statue on Minnesota Capitol grounds

ARTICLE DI.

PROTESTERS TEAR DOWN CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS STATUE ON MINNESOTA CAPITOL GROUNDS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1188 words

Byline: Kristi Belcamino

Highlight: The protesters threw a rope around the 10-foot bronze statue Wednesday afternoon and pulled it off its granite pedestal on the northeastern corner of the Capitol Mall.

Body

Protesters in St. Paul on Wednesday toppled a statue of Christopher Columbus outside the state Capitol amid continuing anger over the death of George Floyd.

The protesters threw a rope around the 10-foot bronze statue Wednesday afternoon and pulled it off its granite pedestal on the northeastern corner of the Capitol Mall.

The protesters, including Dakota and Ojibwe Indians, said they consider Columbus a symbol of genocide against Native Americans. They said they had tried many times to remove it through the political process, but without success.

They also demanded justice for Floyd, who died May 25 after being arrested by Minneapolis police.

State Patrol troopers in helmets, who provide security at the Capitol complex, stood by at a distance but did not try to stop the protesters, who celebrated afterward with Native American singing and drumming.

With bystanders whistling and cheering him on, one man stepped on the toppled statue's head and said he wanted everyone to come up and "kick him in the face."

And many did.

According to video posted to Twitter by Minnesota Public Radio, that man also told a state trooper on the scene that pulling the statue down was part of the recent protesting in the Twin Cities, saying, "This is part of that ... the paradigm shift has started."

The troopers eventually formed a line to protect the toppled statue so it could be taken away.

Minnesota Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington said earlier Wednesday that authorities had "heard through social media" that a group threatened to take down the statue. He said state officials "will be out there to meet with the group and explain to them the legal process" for getting a statue removed.

Protesters tear down Christopher Columbus statue on Minnesota Capitol grounds

"We'll be out there to meet with them to have that conversation. If this is something the community and the Legislature and all the parties that have to be part of that decision agree with, then there is a lawful process to do that."

Democratic Gov. Tim Walz then was asked if the state should consider removing objectionable statues, he said yes. "This question of symbolism is important."

Later Wednesday night, State Patrol officials released a statement saying that their troopers, along with the Department of Public Safety tribal liaison, met with the organizer of the event when he arrived and "explained the administrative process to remove the statue."

But at one point, individuals tied a rope around the statue and toppled it.

No one was arrested at the event; however, the State Patrol identified the instigator, who could face charges related to destruction of public property. Once the State Patrol's investigation is complete, it will be turned over to the Ramsey County attorney's office.

One Republican legislative leader criticized the Walz administration's handling of the matter.

Assistant House Minority Leader Jim Nash, R-Waconia, said in a statement: "After speaking to Commissioner Harrington and learning of the decisions he made on behalf of the administration whether to protect or not to protect property on the Capitol grounds I was frustrated and alarmed the decision was made to not deploy sufficient State Trooper presence in order to protect property. There is a process to petition the removal of artwork at the Capitol, pulling it down with a rope isn't that process."

But Democratic Lt. Gov. Peggy Flanagan, who is a citizen of the White Earth Nation of Ojibwe, had a different reaction, saying on social media: "I can't say I'm sad the statue of Christopher Columbus is gone. I'm not.

"All Minnesotans should feel welcome at the Minnesota State Capitol, and our state is long overdue for a hard look at the symbols, statues, and icons that were created without the input of many of our communities.

"The arrival of Christopher Columbus to what is now the Americas set in motion centuries of violence and genocide against the Indigenous people who already lived here. As the highest-ranking Native woman elected to executive office in the country, I have often reflected on the fact that I could see a statue honoring that legacy from my office window. It was a constant reminder that our systems were not built by or for Native people or people of color, but in many cases, to exclude, erase, and eliminate us. Tonight, I'm thinking of all the Native children who might now feel more welcome on the grounds and in the halls of their state government."

Statues of Columbus were also damaged this week in Boston and Richmond, Va., as protesters angered by the death of Floyd have continued to direct some of their frustration toward monuments, including Confederate statues, that they consider to be symbols of racism.

In Boston, the head of a statue of Columbus in the city's North End neighborhood was removed overnight Tuesday, and pieces of it were found nearby, police said Wednesday.

In Richmond on Tuesday evening, a Columbus statue was torn down and tossed into a lake in a city park where protesters had gathered for a demonstration in support of indigenous peoples.

Protesters tear down Christopher Columbus statue on Minnesota Capitol grounds

The debate over statuary has also spread to Europe, where protesters on Sunday in the English port of Bristol vented their anger at the country's colonial history by toppling a statue of a 17th-century slave trader.

The Columbus statue in St. Paul was a gift to the state from Minnesota's Italian-Americans. Installed in 1931, it was located near the southeast corner of the Capitol building.

Native American activist groups have called for removing the Columbus statue in the past, asserting that Columbus did not "discover" America, as an inscription on the monument stated, but instead enslaved the indigenous people of the continent.

In 2017, a progressive group launched an online petition drive, signed by more than 5,000, calling for then-Gov. Mark Dayton and the Legislature to replace the Columbus statue with one of Prince and another statue selected by the state's Native communities.

At the time, Paul Mandell of the Capitol Area Architectural and Planning Board said there were no plans to get rid of the statue.

"We've never removed a statue," he said in a Pioneer Press article. It would break a promise to the organization, in this case Minnesota's Italian-American community that devoted time and money to erect the monument, he said.

Mandell could not be reached Wednesday evening for comment.

In 2016, Dayton issued a statewide proclamation changing Columbus Day to Indigenous Peoples Day in response to outcries that Columbus spurred centuries of genocide against indigenous populations in the Americas.

St. Paul has celebrated Indigenous Peoples Day as an official city holiday since 2015. Minneapolis made the change a year earlier.

Bill Salisbury contributed to this report, which includes information from the Associated Press.

Feds deny Minnesota request for aid to rebuild after unrest. Police reforms among the issues legislators expected to take up when they return to the Capitol. NYC mayor helps paint 'Black Lives Matter' outside Trump Tower. Lawyer: Over 150 Minneapolis officers seeking disability following unrest. 'We don't think we did this all right': State leaders weigh in on response to Minneapolis riots

Graphic

A statue of Christopher Columbus is loaded onto a tow truck at the State Capitol grounds in St. Paul Wednesday, June 10, 2020 after protesters toppled it from its pedestal. (Mike Burbach / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: July 11, 2020

Protesters tear down Christopher Columbus statue on Minnesota Capitol grounds

End of Document

ARTICLE DII.

BACKLASH OVER GEORGE FLOYD TWEET FORCES OUT CROSSFIT FOUNDER

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 678 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: The founder and CEO of CrossFit is stepping down after his tweet about George Floyd sparked a social media backlash and a wave of affiliated gyms cut ties with the company.Body

By MATT OTT

The founder and CEO of CrossFit is stepping down after his tweet about George Floyd sparked a social media backlash and a wave of affiliated gyms cut ties with the company.

Reebok also dropped its affiliation with CrossFit this week.

Greg Glassman wrote on CrossFit's website late Tuesday that he would retire. Glassman had apologized earlier for tweets that sparked online outrage by connecting Floyd, an African American man who died at the hands of the Minneapolis police, and the coronavirus pandemic. He said he had made a mistake and should have been more sensitive, but denied being racist.

"On Saturday I created a rift in the CrossFit community and unintentionally hurt many of its members," Glassman said. "I cannot let my behavior stand in the way of HQ's or affiliates' missions."

Glassman's exit may have been sealed after BuzzFeed posted a Zoom call he held with CrossFit affiliated gyms in which Glassman reportedly said: "We're not mourning for George Floyd - I don't think me or any of my staff are." BuzzFeed said it received the recording through its anonymous tip line.

The Zoom call took place hours before Glassman made a glib response on Twitter to a post by the Institute for Health Metrics and Evaluation, a health research group, which said, "Racism is a public health issue."

"It's FLOYD-19," he replied Saturday, and in a second tweet criticized the group's "failed" quarantine model and accused it of attempting to "model a solution to racism."

Some 1,250 gyms have now severed links with CrossFit, according to industry blog Morning Chalk Up. An anonymously-curated Google spreadsheet lists hundreds of CrossFit affiliates with links to their social media accounts, with most on the list saying they have cut ties, or are considering doing so.

Backlash over George Floyd tweet forces out CrossFit founder

"In light of recent comments made by CrossFit CEO, we are deaffiliating from CrossFit," read a post on the Instagram account for CrossFit Central of Austin, Texas. "We are resolute in our anti racist beliefs and stance against police police brutality. We stand in solidarity with the black community."

The post by CrossFit Central echoed the sentiments of hundreds of other gyms around the world in what has been an astonishingly swift backlash against CrossFit.

An Edelman Trust Barometer poll of 2,000 Americans, published Tuesday, found that 60% of respondents said how a brand responds to the protests will influence whether a respondent buys or boycotts their products. The poll found that younger Americans felt the strongest, with 78% of millennial respondents saying that a brand must speak out on racial injustice.

"Americans want brands to step up and play a central role in addressing systemic racism," wrote Richard Edelman, CEO of the communications firm. "This is a mandate for brands to act, because consumers will exercise brand democracy with their wallets."

The speed at which companies and affiliates have distanced themselves from CrossFit was accelerated by social media, and to some degree, the coronavirus pandemic, said marketing and branding expert Allen Adamson.

"In the past, most companies only had to talk about: Does their product work?" Adamson said. "Now, younger consumers are pulling companies into this conversation because they not only want to know what their product does, but they want to know what the company stands for before they do business with them. And that pressure is exposing all sorts of challenges for companies."

According to the CrossFit website, the annual fee for affiliation for gyms or other facilities is $3,000, which allows them to use the CrossFit name, logo, and promotional materials, among other perks.

Dave Castro will take over as CEO of CrossFit, which is based in Santa Cruz, California.

Floyd died while handcuffed after a white police officer pressed his knee into his neck for several minutes. His death set off protests around the U.S. and the globe.

AP writer Kelvin Chan in London contributed to this story.

This story has been corrected to show that the Edelman poll was published Tuesday, not Wednesday.

Load-Date: July 11, 2020

More than 80 Minnesota business leaders call for police reforms

ARTICLE DIII. MORE THAN 80 MINNESOTA BUSINESS LEADERS CALL FOR POLICE REFORMS

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 585 words

Byline: Nick Halter

Body

The Minnesota Business Partnership, with support from some of the state's top CEOs, is calling for police reforms during the upcoming special legislative session.

The group, in letter to legislators, recommends a set of policy changes derived from a February report by the State of Minnesota Working Group on Police-Involved Deadly Force Encounters. That group was co-chaired by Attorney General Keith Ellison and Department of Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington.

The recommendations include more training for police interactions with people of color; using body camera footage for training for de-escalation tactics and expanding resources and awareness for mental health and wellness of first responders and dispatchers.

The group is also asking lawmakers to strongly consider three more policies that have more teeth, but have not yet been vetted by the state working group. Those policies are:

More than 80 Minnesota business leaders call for police reforms

- Repeal the state law that mandates binding arbitration for law enforcement officers accused of misconduct.
- Change laws governing collective-bargaining agreements that impede discipline of officers who seriously betray the public trust.
- Enhance screening to prevent unacceptable applicants for positions in law enforcement from being hired and ensure clear and enforced guidelines that define acceptable and unacceptable behavior and policing tactics.

"We're certainly open to those proposals and interested in them," said Charlie Weaver, executive director of the Minnesota Business Partnership. "But we just felt that at this time, because they have not had public hearings and the public hasn't had a chance to weigh in, we wouldn't endorse those yet, but we'd recommend that they be seriously considered by the Legislature."

Weaver, a former prosecutor and public safety commissioner under former Gov. Jesse Ventura, said that the vast majority of police officers are conscientious, brave, compassionate and have integrity.

"The focus of this is that we need to make it easier to get rid of the bad police officers. It shouldn't be as hard as it is," Weaver said.

Nearly every Fortune 500 company CEO based in the Twin Cities signed a letter to legislators asking for the reforms, as well as leaders from private companies and public organizations.

Among them are Best Buy Co. Inc. CEO Corie Barry, Ameriprise Financial CEO James Cracchiolo, 3M Co. CEO Michael Roman, Cargill CEO David MacLennan, CH Robinson CEO Robert Biesterfeld, CHS Inc. CEO Jay Debertin; Ecolab CEO Doug Baker; General Mills CEO Jeff Harmening, Land O'Lakes CEO Beth Ford, Polaris CEO Scott Wine, Target Corp. CEO Brian Cornell, Taylor Corp. CEO and Star Tribune owner Glen Taylor, U.S. Bancorp CEO Andrew Cecere and Xcel Energy CEO Ben Fowke.

Activists have called for the defunding or disbanding of the Minneapolis Police Department, and nine City Council members publicly supported that position without saying what exactly that would entail.

"It's certainly reasonable to say that the Minneapolis Police Department needs reform," Weaver said. "I don't know many people who don't agree with that. But I think ending the police department, as some City Council members want to do, would be a disaster for the city."

"The number one issue and concern for businesses downtown is keeping their employees safe. And the number two issue is keeping customers safe. And if they can't do that, they aren't going to stay in Minneapolis."

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: June 10, 2020

Mpls. officer investigated for posts about 'thug,' encouraging looting

ARTICLE DIV. MPLS. OFFICER INVESTIGATED FOR POSTS ABOUT 'THUG,' ENCOURAGING LOOTING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 5B

Length: 255 words

Body

Minneapolis police have opened an internal affairs investigation after a string of recent Facebook posts purportedly from a police officer mocked protesters and encouraged looting in a neighborhood that is home to much of the city's Somali population.

The Facebook posts, first reported by City Pages, are shared under the name "Dave Rock." The newspaper reported that the account belongs to Officer David Peña.

Asked about Peña's current status or whether he was placed on leave, police spokesman John Elder said the internal affairs investigation has been opened "to find the origins of these posts."

"This behavior does not align with the vision, mission, values and goals of the Minneapolis Police Department," he said.

The posts on the Facebook profile, which show Peña in his police uniform, references an article about a man killed by police and reads "Good riddance!! One less thug!" Another depicts the high-rise apartments in the Cedar-Riverside neighborhood where thousands of Somalis live. "To all the rioters & looters in Minneapolis: Ya missed one," it reads.

That posting triggered a call for Peña's firing by the Council on American Islamic Relations-Minnesota (CAIR-Minnesota).

"Officers promoting white supremacist threats and violence against communities of color should be disciplined swiftly through official action up to and including termination," said Jaylani Hussein, CAIR-Minnesota executive director. "The actions of this officer were dangerous and could have cost the lives of law-abiding citizens."

STAFF REPORT

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

Mpls. officer investigated for posts about 'thug,' encouraging looting

End of Document

From the tee: U.S. course is changing

ARTICLE DV. FROM THE TEE: U.S. COURSE IS CHANGING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 1C

Length: 810 words

Byline: PATRICK REUSSE; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

Harry Davis Jr. was on the phone with Printice Gary in Dallas last week. They were discussing the epic response to the death of George Floyd at the knee of a Minneapolis cop on May 25.

Gary and Davis were part of Minneapolis Central's Class of 1964, which included tremendous athletes who became very successful adults. Davis was known as "Butch" to that group and speaks with love and pride of teammates and classmates of 56 years ago.

For instance: Emerson Carr, one of the first two black football players at the Naval Academy, Marine fighter pilot, industry executive. Eric Eversley, Ph.D., Harvard. And Gary, Carleton grad and MBA from Harvard, one-time member of the University of Texas Board of Regents.

"Printice is a smart guy and said to me, 'What has happened since the death of Mr. Floyd in Minneapolis, the reaction around the globe ... our grandchildren are going to grow up in a different world than we did, Butch.'

"This time is different for sure. What we've known as black Americans now everyone has seen. Forming committees and words are not enough.

"The eyes of younger generations, black and white, were opened by that video. They realize the same opportunities for black Americans are going to have to come."

This conversation was taking place Tuesday morning at Hiawatha Golf Course, 2 miles southeast of the street where Floyd was killed two weeks earlier. A loose organization of black golfers has gathered for league play at Hiawatha for decades.

There were 20-some players, with tee times starting at 10 a.m. I attended one of these outings in June 2019, to write a column on Bob Shelton, the ageless wonder (now 87) of the group.

No celebration this time; just a search for perspective on where we are, where we could be going, in a city and a state these older black men have made home.

From the tee: U.S. course is changing

Brett McNeal was the first Minnesota basketball player to be coached by Clem Haskins when he was recruited from Minneapolis North to Western Kentucky in 1985.

McNeal is now the athletic director at Minneapolis Edison.

"We are all human beings," McNeal said. "We all are capable of love and compassion for one another. Wise counsel should be the first response for adults, not punishment. There are certain individuals that don't believe that. Their immediate reaction is to punish."

McNeal paused, took a sweeping lefthanded swing on the driving range and said: "All change comes from power. The alt-conservative groups have been telling us how they came to power. You can get mad about it, but they are correct.

"And those that are strongly committed to change after George Floyd's death ... the only answer is to take the power."

Change will come, McNeal said, if not now, eventually.

"The younger generations that I work with are a mixed society," he said. "Absolutely, things will be different when they have power."

As Printice Gary said to Butch Davis: Their grandkids will live in a different world.

Which isn't soon enough as the video of Floyd's killing continues to create outrage around the world.

"I saw video of a man in Syria who had drawn an image honoring George Floyd on a wall," Davis said. "Even in Syria this was deemed terrible."

John Henry, an instructor and inventor in technology and electronics, moved to Minneapolis in the '70s, getting bachelor's and master's degrees at the University of Minnesota.

I was talking with Henry before he teed off and suggested the reaction "seemed different" this time because of the clear, gruesome video.

Henry shook his head slightly and said: "The reaction from some is starting to look very familiar to me. We're hearing about George Floyd's fentanyl, this and that about the victim, as though that made him a threat, down on the pavement in handcuffs.

"What concerns me is what I would hope concerns reasonable people: a license to kill with impunity."

John Henderson, the former Vikings receiver, is a regular on Tuesdays. He brought along his grandson Noah Layton, a Benilde-St. Margaret's graduate headed to Columbia University to play football and get an Ivy League education.

"Younger people see race differently," Layton said. "Look at 18-to-25 voting. We believe in equality. Look at the peaceful protests with thousands of blacks and whites marching together. I have confidence in us."

Davis' father, Harry, ran for Minneapolis mayor vs. incumbent Charles Stenvig in 1971 and was decisively defeated. As the first black candidate for the office, there were enough threats that the Davis family home had security from the city leading up to the election.

From the tee: U.S. course is changing

"As baby boomers, what we went through with the assassinations, and in the '70s, I thought we had seen it all," Harry Jr. said Tuesday. "I thought we might be turning the corner. But the George Floyd tragedy tells me we have a long way to go."

Write to Patrick Reusse by e-mailing sports@startribune.com and including his name in the subject line.

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

End of Document

'Stop the pain,' a brother of George Floyd tells Congress

ARTICLE DVI. 'STOP THE PAIN,' A BROTHER OF GEORGE FLOYD TELLS CONGRESS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 780 words

Byline: Lisa Mascaro, Andrew Taylor

Highlight: WASHINGTON (AP) - Philonese Floyd challenged Congress on Wednesday to "stop the pain" so that his brother George wouldn't be just "another name" on a growing list of those killed during interactions with police.

Body

WASHINGTON - Philonese Floyd challenged Congress on Wednesday to "stop the pain" so that his brother George wouldn't be just "another name" on a growing list of those killed during interactions with police.

Floyd's appearance before a House hearing came a day after funeral services for his brother, the 46-year-old Minnesota man whose death has become a worldwide symbol in demonstrations over calls for changes to police practices and an end to racial prejudices.

"I'm here today to ask you to make it stop. Stop the pain," Philonese Floyd told the silenced hearing room.

Choking back tears, he said he wants to make sure that his brother, whom he called "Perry," is "more than another face on a t-shirt. More than another name on a list that won't stop growing."

Floyd directly challenged lawmakers to step up. "The people marching in the streets are telling you enough is enough. Be the leaders that this country, this world, needs. Do the right thing."

Here are Philonise Floyd's remarks in their entirety:

"Thank you for the invitation to be here today to talk about my big brother, George. The world knows him as George, but I called him Perry. Yesterday, we laid him to rest. It was the hardest thing I've ever had to do. I'm the big brother now. So it was my job to comfort our brothers and sisters, Perry's kids, and everyone who loved him. And that's a lot of people. I have to be the strong one now, because it's what George would have done.

"And me being the big brother now is why I'm here today. To do what Perry always did for us -- to take care of the family and others. I couldn't take care of George the day he was killed, but maybe by speaking with you today, I can help make sure that his death isn't in vain. To make sure that he is more than another face on a T-shirt. More than another name on a list that won't stop growing.

'Stop the pain,' a brother of George Floyd tells Congress

"George always made sacrifices for his family. And he made sacrifices for complete strangers. He gave the little that he had to help others. He was our gentle giant. I was reminded of that when I watched the video of his murder. He was mild mannered; he didn't fight back. He listened to the officers. He called them 'sir.' The men who took his life, who suffocated him for eight minutes and 46 seconds. He still called them 'sir' as he begged for his life.

"I can't tell you the kind of pain you feel when you watch something like that. When you watch your big brother, who you've looked up to your whole life, die. Die begging for your mom.

"I'm tired. I'm tired of the pain I'm feeling now and I'm tired of the pain I feel every time another black person is killed for no reason. I'm here today to ask you to make it stop. Stop the pain. Stop us from being tired.

'We don't think we did this all right': State leaders weigh in on response to Minneapolis riots Medical experts: Floyd's speech didn't mean he could breathe George Floyd transcript: Read it in full here Minneapolis council members pledge thoughtful police revamp Monuments and statues are falling. But what comes next?

"George's calls for help were ignored. Please listen to the call I'm making to you now, to the calls of our family, and to the calls ringing out in the streets across the world. People of all backgrounds, genders and race have come together to demand change. Honor them, honor George, and make the necessary changes that make law enforcement the solution -- and not the problem. Hold them accountable when they do something wrong. Teach them what it means to treat people with empathy and respect. Teach them what necessary force is. Teach them that deadly force should be used rarely and only when life is at risk.

"George wasn't hurting anyone that day. He didn't deserve to die over twenty dollars. I am asking you, is that what a black man's life is worth? Twenty dollars? This is 2020. Enough is enough. The people marching in the streets are telling you enough is enough. Be the leaders that this country, this world, needs. Do the right thing.

"The people elected you to speak for them, to make positive change. George's name means something. You have the opportunity here to make your names mean something, too.

"If his death ends up changing the world for the better. And I think it will. I think it has. Then he died as he lived. It is on you to make sure his death isn't in vain.

"I didn't get the chance to say goodbye to Perry while he was here. I was robbed of that. But, I know he's looking down on us now. Perry, look at what you did, big brother. You're changing the world. Thank you for everything. For taking care of us when you were on Earth, and for taking care of all of us now. I hope you found mama and can rest in peace and power."

Graphic

Philonise Floyd, a brother of George Floyd, arrives to testify before a House Judiciary Committee hearing on proposed changes to police practices and accountability on Capitol Hill, Wednesday, June 10, 2020, in Washington. (Michael Reynolds/Pool via AP)

'Stop the pain,' a brother of George Floyd tells Congress

Philonise Floyd speaks at a memorial service for his brother, George Floyd at North Central University Thursday, June 4, 2020, in Minneapolis. (AP Photo/Julio Cortez

Load-Date: July 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DVII. VIKINGS TO DONATE $5 MILLION TO VARIOUS SOCIAL JUSTICE CAUSES

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 596 wordsByline: Dane MizutaniHighlight: In the wake of George Floyd's death while in custody of Minneapolis police, the Vikings are donating $5 million donation to social justice causes throughout the country. Vikings Chief Operating Officer Andrew Miller announced the donation during a video call on Wednesday in which he, general manager Rick Spielman, co-defensive coordinator Andre Patterson, linebacker Eric [...]Body

In the wake of George Floyd's death while in custody of Minneapolis police, the Vikings are donating $5 million donation to social justice causes throughout the country.

Vikings Chief Operating Officer Andrew Miller announced the donation during a video call on Wednesday in which he, general manager Rick Spielman, co-defensive coordinator Andre Patterson, linebacker Eric Kendricks, safety Anthony Harris and running back Ameer Abdullah spoke with members of the media.

"We understand as leaders and an organization that it's going to take more than money and more than statements," Miller said. "Frankly, it's going to take action and we're committed."

Vikings owner/chairman Zygi Wilf and owner/president Mark Wilf told the team's Social Justice Committee this week that the contributions from this fund will be determined in part through collaboration with players and the funds will be directed toward organizations that fight racism and inequality.

"We continue to be inspired by these players as they advocate for transformational change in this very challenging moment," Mark Wilf said in a statement. "We are proud of their efforts to use their platform in an effort to end deep-seated social injustices."

This donation builds on a previous commitment of $500,000 by the Wilf family to the Social Justice Committee over the past couple of years. Those funds have been directed toward scholarships for low-income students, school supplies, legal aid for disadvantaged and underrepresented populations, and law enforcement relations.

Vikings to donate $5 million to various social justice causes

"We all know that economics is a big factor towards change," Abdullah said. "And I'm extremely grateful to play for ownership like the Wilfs who are so generous with their money and their time."

That said, the Wilf family also acknowledged that their efforts can't stop there. They know it's going to take more than simply writing a check.

"It can only be one piece of our overall work toward having a sustainable impact," Zygi Wilf said in a statement. "Our actions within our communities will be the driving force for creating profound change."

Additionally, the Vikings announced an endowment for the George Floyd Legacy Scholarship with an establishing gift of $125,000. According to Patterson, the players on the Social Justice Committee came up with the idea, and it happened very quickly after its initial inception.

"They were very strong with, 'How can we help?'" Patterson said. "What they wanted to do was find a way to help his family and put something together so he would always be remembered. And so one of the things they brought up was trying to put a scholarship together in George Floyd's name. It only took one week and the Vikings came together and got that done."

All the players that addressed members of the media on Wednesday - Kendricks, Harris, and Abdullah - praised the Wilf family for their donation as well as the Vikings as an organization for supporting them as they speak up.

"I'm really, really proud to play for the organization that takes initiative," Abdullah said. "This has been something on the forefront for the Vikings years prior to even this conversation and that makes me proud to call myself a Minnesota Viking."

Money, market, ideal fit? Pat Mahomes got it all in Kansas City NFL to play Black anthem before national anthem, source says Expect to see Vikings rookie Justin Jefferson in slot 'quite a bit' next season How will Vikings' Andre Patterson, Adam Zimmer balance roles as co-defensive coordinators? Vikings' Ifeadi Odenigbo says game day brings out the black swan in him

Load-Date: July 11, 2020

Watch: George Floyd's brother, others testify at House hearing on police violence

ARTICLE DVIII. WATCH: GEORGE FLOYD'S BROTHER, OTHERS TESTIFY AT HOUSE HEARING ON POLICE VIOLENCE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 74 words

Byline: Pioneer Press

Highlight: George Floyd's brother, Philonise Floyd, testifies at a House hearing on racial profiling and police brutality.

Body

George Floyd's brother, Philonise Floyd, and others testify at a House hearing on racial profiling and police brutality.

'We don't think we did this all right': State leaders weigh in on response to Minneapolis riots Medical experts: Floyd's speech didn't mean he could breathe George Floyd transcript: Read it in full here Minneapolis council members pledge thoughtful police revamp Monuments and statues are falling. But what comes next?

Load-Date: July 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DIX.

JOURNALIST BLINDED DURING PROTEST SUES MINNEAPOLIS POLICE, STATE PATROL

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 240 wordsByline: Josh Verges

Highlight: A journalist who was blinded by a rubber bullet while covering George Floyd protests in Minneapolis filed a lawsuit Wednesday in U.S. District Court against city and state law enforcement. Linda Tirado, a freelance journalist from Tennessee, says she was wearing a press credential May 29 when she stepped in front of a crowd of [...]

Body

A journalist who was blinded by a rubber bullet while covering George Floyd protests in Minneapolis filed a lawsuit Wednesday in U.S. District Court against city and state law enforcement.

Linda Tirado, a freelance journalist from Tennessee, says she was wearing a press credential May 29 when she stepped in front of a crowd of protesters and aimed her camera at a line of police officers.

Minneapolis police or state troopers first hit her with a green marker round, then shot her in the face with a foam bullet, breaking her goggles and leaving her permanently blind in her left eye, according to her complaint.

The complaint says city and state officials failed to act after other journalists reported being targeted and injured by law enforcement in the three days prior.

Tirado wants money and a judge's declaration that law enforcement used excessive force and violated her free speech rights.

The ACLU filed a separate lawsuit last week on behalf of freelancer Jared Goyette and other journalists injured by police.

Minneapolis also faces a class-action lawsuit brought by protesters. St. Paul man sentenced to 30 years for fatally shooting young father and injuring four-year-old Maplewood father charged with first-degree assault of 2-month-old son Lawyer: Over 150 Minneapolis officers seeking disability following unrest Ex-Trump lawyer Michael Cohen back in federal prison Man shot dead in North Minneapolis Tuesday identified

Graphic

A projectile fired by law enforcement during a May 30 George Floyd protest in Minneapolis left freelance journalist Linda Tirado permanently blind in her left eye. (Linda Tirado)

Load-Date: July 11, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DX. DOZENS OF HOMELESS PEOPLE EVICTED FROM MINNEAPOLIS HOTEL

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 194 words

Byline: Associated Press

Highlight: MINNEAPOLIS (AP) - More than 200 homeless people have been evicted from a Minneapolis hotel that had become a refuge during protests against the death of George Floyd who died after a police officer kept his knee on his neck while he was handcuffed on the ground.

Body

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) - More than 200 homeless people have been evicted from a Minneapolis hotel that had become a refuge during protests against the death of George Floyd who died after a police officer kept his knee on his neck while he was handcuffed on the ground.

Volunteers at the Sheraton Minneapolis Midtown Hotel say the owner, Jay Patel, ordered the eviction of all guests Tuesday after the hotel's fire alarm was pulled following a report of a drug overdose.

The hotel had been a source of stability and hope amid the civil unrest that followed Floyd's death on May 25, the Star Tribune reported.

Some residents say conditions at the hotel began to unravel in recent days with people injecting heroin and methamphetamine in the hallways and fights breaking out at night.

"It started out well, then descended into chaos," said Jennie Taylor, who had a room on the second floor. "People got the message that this was a place where you could use drugs freely and that attracted the wrong crowd."

Moon Beaumaster, another resident and volunteer at the hotel, agreed. "There were too many parasitic drug dealers who were using this place for the wrong reason," she said.

Load-Date: July 10, 2020

ARTICLE DXI. MEDICAL EXAMINER FACES CHALLENGE BY BOARD

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 469 wordsByline: DAVID CHANEN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Baker, who is up for reappointment, issued autopsy of George Floyd.Body

Hennepin County Medical Examiner Andrew Baker, up for reappointment to his fifth term as the county coroner, faced a challenge Tuesday from a county commissioner unhappy over his recent autopsy of George Floyd.

Commissioner Angela Conley voted against Baker's reappointment because of his findings on Floyd, whose death May 25 at the hands of Minneapolis police has sparked an international outcry for police reform.

Commissioner Irene Fernando also voted against Baker's reappointment because the board was given a short deadline to act. Baker's reappointment would take effect Friday, which Fernando said didn't allow time to evaluate his office's performance and get feedback from residents.

County Administrator David Hough said the vote was delayed for three months due to the pandemic. The board, acting in committee, approved Baker's reappointment on a 5-2 vote and is expected to ratify the committee vote Thursday.

Baker's report ruled Floyd's death a homicide and mentioned police restraint and underlying health conditions as causes. But Conley took exception to the report's mention of "potential intoxicants in his system," which she said criminalized him even in death. Floyd's toxicology report showed that he had fentanyl and methamphetamine in his system when he died.

"Why would this be listed?" said Conley. "The community lost trust in the system. That report was ultimately the catalyst of an insufficient [third-degree] murder charge by the county and later upgraded to [second-degree] murder by the state."

An independent autopsy by Floyd's family also listed his death as a homicide but said he died as a result of mechanical asphyxiation caused by the police officer kneeling on Floyd's neck for more than eight minutes. Conley said that report proved "what millions of people around the world saw with their own eyes."

Medical examiner faces challenge by board

"Baker's report gave the very reason not to trust these processes that haven't brought justice in the past," she said. "With a good conscience, I can't approve this today."

Baker was first named the county's medical examiner in 2004. A former president of the National Association of Medical Examiners, he has been spearheading plans for a new medical examiner facility in Minnetonka.

Several commissioners agreed with Conley's concerns but said Baker has an excellent reputation. Commissioner Debbie Goettel said the county needs to revisit "how we do business" and how to improve its operations.

Board Chairwoman Marion Greene said one of the few things that County Attorney Mike Freeman and Chief Public Defender Mary Moriarity agree on is Baker's expertise.

Commissioner Jan Callison said she's worked with Baker for 12 years and said his list of credentials is impressive.

"In my experience, I find him professional, honest and trustworthy," she said.

David Chanen · 612-673-4465

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

MLS will resume season with league-wide tournament starting July 8

ARTICLE DXII. MLS WILL RESUME SEASON WITH LEAGUE-WIDE TOURNAMENT STARTING JULY 8

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 799 words

Byline: Andy Greder

Highlight: The 54-game tournament will be played outside Disney World in Orlando, Fla., and conclude with a championship game on Aug. 11.

Body

Minnesota United defender Chase Gasper has been thankful for the club's gradual return to training over the past month, but he needed something other than just practice to work toward.

He got it Wednesday when Major League Soccer announced it will be the first U.S. pro sports organization to resume play amid the coronavirus pandemic. The season was halted after just two weeks on March 12.

This framework was agreed to by the league and its players union last week.

"Everyone on our team has been working their tails off the past few weeks," Gasper said on Zoom call with reporters. "Now that we have concrete dates, I think everyone is going to be working even harder to be prepared."

Games will resume with what the league is calling the "MLS is Back Tournament," a 54-game World Cup-style tournament already approved by the players union. It starts July 8 at the ESPN Wide World of Sports Complex near Orlando, Fla., and will conclude with a championship game on Aug. 11.

The league's 26 clubs will be broken up into six groups, determined by a draw at 2:30 p.m. Thursday, and start with 39 group-stage games that will count toward the regular-season standings. Sixteen teams will advance to knockout rounds, with a 2021 CONCACAF Champions League spot and $1.1 million in prize money for players on the line.

Minnesota United will be in one of three Western Conference groups containing four teams; each will play at least three matches, and as many as seven if it reaches the final. The players, coaches and staff will be sequestered in a nearby resort and won't play in front of fans.

"The opportunity to have all 26 clubs in a controlled environment enables us to help protect the health of our players, coaches and staff as we return to play," MLS commissioner Don Garber said in a statement.

MLS will resume season with league-wide tournament starting July 8

MLS said it will use "extensive medical protocols and (a) comprehensive COVID-19 testing plan developed by infectious disease experts."

Wednesday's announcement comes as Orange County, Fla., the site of the Disney complex, reported 385 new COVID-19 cases over the past seven days, up from 202 the previous week.

Loons clear of COVID-19, but Sunday's opponent has a positive case John Shipley: So far, nothing enjoyable about rebooting pro sports Loons goalkeeper Tyler Miller opens up about mental health struggles Loons' defense sees changes with potent Kansas City striker up next Gophers miss on Totino-Grace offensive lineman

The group-stage matches will run for 16 consecutive days up to near the Round of 16 (July 25-28), quarterfinals (July 30-Aug. 1), semifinals (Aug. 5-6) and final (Aug. 11). All games will be at 8 a.m., 7 p.m. and 9:30 p.m. CDT to try to avoid the Florida heat and will be broadcast on MLS partner networks.

Some MLS clubs have returned to full team training sessions, but the Loons are still doing small-group workouts as they seek state approval, a club spokesman said. Teams are expected to arrive in Orlando between June 24 and July 1 and the Loons are determining when they will travel to Florida and which clubs they might be able to scrimmage against.

United head coach Adrian Heath said all players are participating in workouts and the small-group activities have allowed them to work with patterns of play from the back-four defenders maintaining their line to varying attacking movements.

"It's getting a little bit more like it," Heath said. "We are hopeful by Wednesday of next week that we will be 11 (versus) 11."

Regular-season play will resume after the tournament under a format to be determined, but the goal is to end with the MLS Cup playoffs before the end of 2020. Gaber said he was "very optimistic" games could be played in home markets, potentially with fans in the attendance because franchises are reliant on gate revenues.

"When that will happen is still uncertain, and whether or not we will have any markets with fans is also uncertain," Garber said in a call with reporters. "But we are also hearing about different guidelines that have been established state by state where there is even a possibility that some fans might be able to attend games."

DEMONSTRATIONS SUPPORTED

MLS reiterated its stance in support of players who choose to demonstrate during the national anthem in the wake of George Floyd's death under the knee of a Minneapolis police officer on Memorial Day. This policy was first introduced by the league in 2017.

"We also recognize that the death of George Floyd and others has focused our country on issues of racial injustice, inequality and violence against black men and women," Garber said in a statement. "Together with our owners, players and staff, the League and its clubs are deeply committed to creating meaningful and impactful programs to address these issues that have plagued our society for far too long."

MLS will resume season with league-wide tournament starting July 8

Load-Date: July 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DXIII. BAR OFF, BACK ON TOURISM WEBSITE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 656 wordsByline: JOHN REINAN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Confederate flag drew objections in Sauk Rapids.Body

A Benton County bar that displays an extensive collection of Confederate memorabilia was delisted from Explore MN, the state's official tourism website, after area residents objected to "glorifying" the Confederacy.

But the listing for Rollie's Rednecks and Longnecks in Sauk Rapids has been reinstated. And the head of the local tourism organization said nothing in the displays is against the group's policies.

"It's up to the business owner what they want to display," said Julie Lunning, executive director of Visit Greater St. Cloud. "Rollie's has a very eclectic mix of décor that the owner has collected from across the country.

"I wouldn't assume it's intentional to hurt anybody," she said. "Our position is, we remain neutral. It's a successful business, and customers can choose to frequent that business if they want."

Explore MN allows local promotion agencies to maintain listings on the statewide site for businesses in their area, a spokeswoman said. After receiving about 30 complaints from area residents about Rollie's, Visit Greater St. Cloud took down the listing and reviewed it, Lunning said.

"We very quickly found that there was nothing that goes against any of [our] policies," she said. "We did resubmit it to be back-listed on the website." The reinstated listing appeared on Explore MN Tuesday night.

Rollie's touts itself as "Minnesota's No. 1 honkytonk." Photos on the bar's website show a variety of Confederate memorabilia on display, including flags, signs, posters and items related to "The Dukes of Hazzard," a popular 1980s TV show set in the southern United States.

The bar is owned by Roland Hogrefe, who did not return a phone call and a text seeking comment Tuesday. Hogrefe was convicted of a felony in 2011 after he ran down a black man with his car on a St. Cloud street. According to Benton County court records, Hogrefe was sentenced to a year and a day in state prison after pleading guilty to a felony charge of leaving the scene of an injury accident. His prison sentence was stayed, and he was ordered to serve 90 days in the county jail.

Bar off, back on tourism website

Media reports at the time said Hogrefe drove by a group of African-American men and exchanged insults. He turned his vehicle around and drove back at the men, striking and injuring one, then drove away. He was arrested after police identified his distinctive truck.

Christopher Lehman, a professor at St. Cloud State University, was among those who sent letters objecting to the bar being listed on a state tourism website.

"As a taxpaying resident of Minnesota, I do not want my tax dollars to go towards promoting a business that glorifies the Confederacy, whose army fought against and killed thousands of Minnesotans," Lehman wrote. "As a taxpaying resident of Minnesota and a descendant of slaves, I do not want my tax dollars to go towards promoting a business that glorifies people who seceded from the United States to defend slavery.

"If, in this post-George Floyd climate, the former Confederate state of Virginia can remove its statue of Robert E. Lee, then the Union state of Minnesota, where Floyd was killed, can stop promoting a restaurant glorifying an army that killed thousands of Minnesotans in the name of defending slavery," he wrote.

In an interview Tuesday, Lehman said he wasn't trying to get the business shut down.

"All I wanted to do was get the government out of the way," he said. "What goes on in different businesses that are privately owned, they are free to do whatever they want. That's their freedom of speech. I'm not looking for anyone to get shut down or lose their business.

"Since there's some government involvement ... with something that has to do with promoting Confederate imagery during this time we're living in right now, I was greatly opposed to that," he said.

Lunning said her tourism group received about 30 messages opposed to Rollie's and received about the same number in favor.

John Reinan · 612-673-7402

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

'Cops,' on air for 33 seasons, dropped by Paramount Network

ARTICLE DXIV. 'COPS,' ON AIR FOR 33 SEASONS, DROPPED BY PARAMOUNT NETWORK

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 224 words

Byline: Associated Press

Highlight: LOS ANGELES (AP) - After 33 seasons on the air, "Cops" has been dropped by the Paramount Network as protests against police proliferate around the world.

Body

LOS ANGELES - After 33 seasons on the air, "Cops" has been dropped by the Paramount Network as protests against police proliferate around the world.

"Cops is not on the Paramount Network and we don't have any current or future plans for it to return," a spokesperson for the cable channel said in a statement Tuesday.

The show had been pulled temporarily from the air in late May, when protests aimed at police over the death of George Floyd began to gain momentum. That move was made permanent Tuesday.

It's not clear whether the company that makes the show, Langley Productions, would try to find a new home for it. A voicemail at a company phone number was not accepting messages.

The reality show, with its widely known reggae theme song "Bad Boys," allowed viewers to ride along with police officers on patrol in various cities.

It ran on the Fox network for 25 years until 2013, when Viacom-owned Spike TV picked it up. The show remained on the air after Spike was re-branded as the Paramount Network in 2018. Soap opera's kisses outwit virus with tests, spouses, dolls Hugh Downs, genial presence on TV news and game shows, dies You scared, bro? Yeah, me too! Here's some bromance-horror to watch with your buddy. After 25 years, family and friends still wonder, where's Jodi? Q&A: Jon Stewart is still fighting for the middle ground

Load-Date: July 10, 2020

ARTICLE DXV. DUMBA BRINGS FIRST-HAND GRASP OF RACISM

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 1CLength: 781 wordsByline: SARAH MCLELLAN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Wild defenseman hopes to make difference in new hockey alliance.Body

Increased participation in hockey.

Minorities or people of color making up at least half the team, or maybe even a majority.

And children only hearing of stories of racism in the sport rather than experiencing it firsthand.

That's what Wild defenseman Matt Dumba would like to be reality in 10 years.

"They can look back and see us and all the people who get involved with what we're trying to do and see us as kind of pioneers for the sport and people who got rid of something that was so negative in our game," he said.

But Dumba isn't just hoping for change. He's working to instigate it.

After being among the many NHL players to speak out against racial injustice following George Floyd's killing in Minneapolis police custody, Dumba continued to show his support by helping establish the Hockey Diversity Alliance (HDA) to demolish racism and intolerance in hockey.

"This has been an eye-opener for me as well, and an opportunity where I see that I can make a difference," Dumba said Tuesday. "I do have a voice in that community, and I want to be a leader. So I want to show those people that I'm willing to commit to that and commit to making a difference.

"So this is just the start for me. Putting myself out there and being a part of this alliance is a huge step."

Launched Monday by several pros, HDA plans to promote diversity at all levels of the sport while educating the hockey community on racism issues and advocating for acceptance and equality. While independent of the NHL, the group hopes to work with the league to accomplish its goals and already has received insight from Colin Kaepernick - a conversation Dumba said made everyone star-struck.

Dumba brings first-hand grasp of racism

The initial idea came after the players discussed the need for an initiative like this in the NHL and wanting to eradicate the experiences each has had with racism in the game.

"Hearing those stories is all I really needed to be on the board and know that we were doing the right thing," Dumba said.

Growing up in Calgary, Dumba recalled many times as a child that he and his family left the rink in tears. He said his mother is scared now, just as she was scared for Dumba to leave home for junior hockey.

"You're sitting in the car talking about what happened and seeing all the pain it caused," said Dumba, who described himself as probably the only kid or one of two "with any color" on his youth teams. "Just having the conversation of, 'Hey. You have to have to have tougher skin. You have to be able to take the high road on this. They are only saying that because you're playing so well.' When I think back about that, that's a conversation that white parents don't have to have with their kids nor should parents of color. That's what I want to eliminate."

Dumba remembers bottling up his experiences and using that as fuel to work harder and play better.

"Can you imagine that love for the game if you never had to fight with being discriminated against or feeling like you don't belong?" he continued. "That's what I want to promote for the youth because I think there's a generation of hockey players that can exceed all of our expectations and really change the game."

Engagement with youth and making hockey more accessible and affordable are also aims of HDA, an endeavor similar to the one Dumba is already involved in as an ambassador for Athletes Committed to Educating Students.

Some of the children from ACES live in the communities affected in the aftermath of Floyd's death, Dumba said, and it's been difficult for him to watch what's happened to Minneapolis from Calgary. But he's also proud of how the community has rallied together to take care of itself, and he and Iowa Wild forward J.T. Brown are working on a fundraiser.

"Just seeing the outreach I've had the past couple of days from teammates and other guys that have reached out has been so cool," said Dumba, who is skating in Calgary and said his return to the Twin Cities will depend on the NHL progressing to a potential training camp ahead of resuming the season. "We have already started a change."

Making an impact in the NHL first and then working on other leagues will make the most significant difference, Dumba believes. He said, "You'd be naive to say there's not racism in our game," but players are trying to listen and learn and can gain an understanding by having talks with their black or minority teammates.

Change is possible in Dumba's mind, but it's going to take everyone to make it happen.

"Younger players seeing not only their favorite black or minority players standing up but also their favorite white players also committing to this is going to go such a long way in bridging that gap and bringing everyone together," Dumba said.

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

Dumba brings first-hand grasp of racism

End of Document

First hearing for suspect in precinct arson

ARTICLE DXVI. FIRST HEARING FOR SUSPECT IN PRECINCT ARSON

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 135 wordsByline: DAVID CHANEN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

A man charged with arson at the Minneapolis police Third Precinct building made a brief appearance Tuesday in U.S. District Court.

Branden M. Wolfe, 23, admitted to authorities that he was involved in the fire that heavily damaged the Third Precinct building following the May 25 death of George Floyd while in police custody, according to a criminal complaint. It says Wolfe also acknowledged he stole equipment from the building, some of which was recovered from his person and his apartment. Thus far, he is charged only with aiding and abetting arson.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Hildy Bowbeer found that Wolfe qualifies for a free federal defender. Prosecutors asked that he be held in jail pending further hearings. A hearing was scheduled for Thursday to determine if Wolfe will be eligible for release.

DAVID CHANEN

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DXVII. FORMER MIDTOWN SHERATON EVICTS HOMELESS AFTER REPORTS OF DRUG USE

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 402 wordsByline: Mark ReillyBody

The former Midtown Sheraton Hotel's days as an ad-hoc homeless shelter - a role the property was pressed into during the unrest following the death of George Floyd - are apparently over.

The Star Tribune reports that Jay Patel, the owner of the Minneapolis property who last week allowed in homeless people to protect them from the riots along Lake Street, on Tuesday ordered them all out, according to the volunteers who were running the site.

More than 200 people had been staying at the hotel, and Patel told the Business Journal that a community organization was renting the rooms. Volunteers provided staffing and security, and the property became a hub for donations.

But the situation was apparently growing unwieldy. The volunteers operating the shelter allowed residents to bring in drugs and alcohol, leading to reports of widespread drug use and overdoses.

Former Midtown Sheraton evicts homeless after reports of drug use

Minnesota Public Radio also has a report, noting that the eviction decision came after Ryan Cos. US Inc., the property's management company, informed the owner about drug violations, piles of garbage and no effort to prevent the spread of Covid-19.

In a statement, Minneapolis-based Ryan said, "The letter we sent to Mr. Patel was to remind him of his commitments to his neighbors and to highlight specific issues of safety and public health that are putting people - including residents - at risk. In no way did we request, demand or support today's action; in fact, we closed our letter with an offer to work with him to address those concerns as well as other outstanding issues between us. We strongly believe that the people currently residing in the hotel who are experiencing homelessness deserve - and require - action that engages resources at all levels of government, community organizations, philanthropic organizations and the private sector."

It's not clear whether all the homeless residents have vacated. One of the organizers told the Star Tribune and MPR that "I don't know if the owner has the power to evict us."

Patel, who owns several hotels in Minnesota and South Dakota, acquired the 136-room hotel at 2901 Chicago Ave. on Feb. 3. Ryan built the hotel in 2005 as part of the larger Midtown Exchange project that turned the former Sears into a Global Market, corporate offices for Allina Health System, and apartments.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: June 10, 2020

Gov. Tim Walz hopes coronavirus outbreak has 'plateaued' in Minnesota as more businesses reopen. Time will tell.

ARTICLE DXVIII. GOV. TIM WALZ HOPES CORONAVIRUS OUTBREAK HAS 'PLATEAUED' IN MINNESOTA AS MORE BUSINESSES REOPEN. TIME WILL TELL.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 638 words

Byline: Christopher Magan

Highlight: Minnesota health officials will be closely watching the trends of the state's coronavirus outbreak to see if the recent loosening of restrictions will result in a spike of COVID-19 cases. COVID-19 hospitalizations, deaths and positive tests have all been trending down in recent days. If those trends hold in spite of the recent lifting of [...]

Body

Minnesota health officials will be closely watching the trends of the state's coronavirus outbreak to see if the recent loosening of restrictions will result in a spike of COVID-19 cases.

COVID-19 hospitalizations, deaths and positive tests have all been trending down in recent days. If those trends hold in spite of the recent lifting of limits on businesses, Minnesota might soon be able to move even closer to normalcy.

"It feels to me like this thing has plateaued," Gov. Tim Walz said at a Wednesday news conference. Although moments earlier he announced a 30-day extension of the current peacetime emergency because of the coronavirus pandemic.

"Again, it is going to be dependent on where the numbers are," Walz said of future decisions to ease restrictions on businesses and gatherings. If infection trends continue downward, the next steps could be announced by July 4.

Minnesota moved into "Phase III" of its coronavirus response Wednesday. Albeit with limited capacity, restaurants are now allowed to serve indoor diners, athletic facilities can reopen and other personal services are more available.

Minnesota didn't experience a significant spike in cases after Walz lifted his nearly two-month-long stay home order May 18.

Jan Malcolm, Minnesota health commissioner, said state officials will be closely watching COVID-19 infection rates over the next three weeks to see if the recent loosening of restrictions results in a significant changes in the outbreak. She encouraged residents to continue community mitigation practices, like social distancing, to limit the risk of infections.

Gov. Tim Walz hopes coronavirus outbreak has 'plateaued' in Minnesota as more businesses reopen. Time will tell.

"For this reopening to work, we must rely on each other," Malcolm said. "We must continue to wear masks, to wash hands, to stay six feet apart, to work from home when possible. Those practices have been the underpinning of all of the efforts that have helped us to slow the growth of the epidemic."

The state Department of Health reported 346 new laboratory-confirmed coronavirus cases Wednesday bringing the state total to 28,869. Another 19 Minnesotans have died from COVID-19 putting the death toll at 1,236.

The patients whose deaths were reported Wednesday ranged in age from one patient in their 30s with underlying health conditions to several people in their 90s.

More than 85 percent of the state's confirmed cases, 24,675 people, have recovered enough they no longer need to be isolated. There are 427 people hospitalized and 193 of them are in critical condition.

Coronavirus testing continues to be come more available with the state reported the results of 8,804 diagnostic tests Wednesday. Since local testing became available, Minnesota has screened more than 369,000 patient samples.

Health officials are encouraging anyone who participated in demonstrations protesting George Floyd's death at the hands of Minneapolis police to get tested, regardless if they have symptoms.

Gov. Walz and Lt. Gov. Peggy Flanagan both recently tested negative after attending community events.

Health commissioner Malcolm acknowledged there were risks to easing measures now in place to slow the spread of the virus. Her hope is increased interaction won't spur a new wave of infections if people behave appropriately.

"Though we don't know the shape the pandemic will take in the days and weeks to come...We really to find a way to live with this," Malcolm said. "To assume we will face the likelihood of many more months of the disease being very prevalent in our communities."

Working from home, Securian Financial employees donate monthly parking fee to local nonprofits Nursing homes can designate 'essential caregivers' to visit After lobbying, Catholic Church won \$1.4B in virus aid John Shipley: So far, nothing enjoyable about rebooting pro sports Coronavirus infections among MN school-age children grew 80 percent past month

Load-Date: July 11, 2020

Gov. Tim Walz seeks action on police reform as he calls Legislature back in to session

ARTICLE DXIX. GOV. TIM WALZ SEEKS ACTION ON POLICE REFORM AS HE CALLS LEGISLATURE BACK IN TO SESSION

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1008 words

Byline: Bill Salisbury

Highlight: Gov. Tim Walz said he believes the coronavirus has "plateaued" in Minnesota, and if that's the case, he plans to phase out more COVID-19-related restrictions on the public on or before July 4. Walz revealed his intentions Wednesday at a Capitol news conference where he announced that he is extending his peacetime emergency powers for [...]

Body

Gov. Tim Walz said he believes the coronavirus has "plateaued" in Minnesota, and if that's the case, he plans to phase out more COVID-19-related restrictions on the public on or before July 4.

Walz revealed his intentions Wednesday at a Capitol news conference where he announced that he is extending his peacetime emergency powers for another 30 days. That action triggers a special session of the Legislature, starting Friday.

The lawmakers' first task will be to vote on whether to extend or end the governor's emergency powers.

Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka of East Gull Lake has said the Republican majority in that chamber will vote to strip Walz of his unilateral power to dictate state public health policies. That move is likely to be blocked by the governor's fellow Democrats who control the House.

Walz said his top priorities for the special session are "police reform and accountability and economic recovery" after the death two weeks ago of George Floyd while in Minneapolis police custody and the devastation caused by the rioting that followed.

He cautioned lawmakers against stripping him of emergency powers. Those who want to end those powers, he said, should explain how they would continue testing for the virus, what would they do without the $50 million a month in federal aid that the state gets as a result of declaring an emergency and how the state could deliver services quickly without waivers from federal requirements.

"What happens if that system collapses underneath because it was only through emergency powers, and that's the way it was structured?" Walz asked. "There is no one yet that has figured out how to do that."

Walz said he expects to end the emergency when the virus is under control, but he did not say when he expects that to happen.

Gov. Tim Walz seeks action on police reform as he calls Legislature back in to session

In a prepared statement Wednesday night, House Minority Leader Kurt Daudt, R-Crown called Walz's moves to extend his emergency powers "a major setback."

"The time for emergency powers has long passed," Daudt said in the release, then noting the state's virus model, from which Walz made many of his decisions to battle the virus, suggested the number of deaths would be much higher than what's transpired.

AN EYE ON THE VIRUS

Walz said he expects to know within 10 days whether the virus has leveled off or is trending down, which would allow him to shift to Phase IV of the state's "Stay Safe at Home" reopening plan. That would further ease restrictions on restaurants and gyms and allow more sports events, summer camps and other public gatherings to resume.

Minnesota moved to Phase III on Wednesday, which allowed, among other things, restaurants to offer indoor seating and gyms and exercise centers to reopen.

Walz said the crises caused by the pandemic, economic decline and outrage sparked by Floyd's death present him and the Legislature with a unique opportunity to act.

"This moment will not be upon us again," he said. He encouraged legislators to take "bold, aggressive, transformative action" to make changes that the public is demanding.

Special sessions are typically one- or two-day affairs, but Walz said he wants lawmakers to stay at the Capitol as long as it takes to act on his agenda. "We can leave when we get the people's work done," he said.

CHANGES BEING CONSIDERED

The governor did not propose a list of police reforms. Instead he endorsed a package of more than 20 recommendations that the legislative People of Color and Indigenous Caucus (POCI) announced last week, plus changes proposed earlier by a task force headed by state Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington and Attorney General Keith Ellison.

Those proposals include moving investigations and prosecutions of officer-involved deaths to the attorney general's office, increasing police accountability and transparency, raising officer standards of conduct and providing incentives for officers to live in the communities they serve.

Democrats at the Capitol said they were ready to quickly pass them this weekend. But Republicans, who hold a majority in the Senate, have said the state should take more time to assess alterations that could last a generation and had few examples of proposals they would support. The Minnesota Police and Peace Officers Association also asked for a seat at the table and asked that decisions not be rushed.

Dozens of Minnesota Fortune 500 business leaders on Wednesday joined the Minnesota Business Partnership in urging lawmakers to approve the proposals as part of the special session, according to Forum News Service.

"Minnesota's business leaders are united in a commitment to address not only policing reforms but also the broader need to advance social and racial justice in our society," Minnesota Business Partnership

Gov. Tim Walz seeks action on police reform as he calls Legislature back in to session

Executive Director and former Minnesota Public Safety Commissioner Charlie Weaver said in a statement.

REBUILDING FROM THE RIOTS

Regarding help for businesses damaged or destroyed by recent rioting, Walz said he does not have a plan of his own but wants to work with business owners, communities and foundations to find ways to finance repairs and rebuilding, especially for small businesses.

He expects the Legislature to pass a public infrastructure construction bill, known as a bonding bill. He and House DFLers proposed borrowing about $2 billion for those projects, while Republican senators proposed one just under $1 billion. Negotiators for the two chambers say they're working on a compromise.

But Walz noted that general obligation bonding money can only be used for public or government-sponsored projects, not for private businesses. So he expects public and private entities to develop other funding mechanisms.

Forum News Service contributed to this report.

Feds deny Minnesota request for aid to rebuild after unrest MN Gov. Walz allocates \$12M toward food shelves as demands increase amid pandemic Walz moves \$56.6 million in coronavirus relief to MN child care providers MN lawmakers to return Monday to St. Paul to take up unfinished work Gov. Walz asks that Twin Cities riots be declared federal disaster

Load-Date: July 11, 2020

ARTICLE DXX. GYMS, THEATERS NEXT AS STATE SEEKS NEW NORMAL

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1119 wordsByline: JEREMY OLSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Minnesotans on Wednesday will once again be able to drink in bars, go to movies, work out and swim at clubs - as long as they keep their distance from others due to the continued threat of COVID-19.

Health officials believe the COVID-19 pandemic has either plateaued or is on a downward wave in Minnesota, making the resumption of more everyday activities OK with the caveat of maintaining a social distance of 6 feet from others in public.

Infections with the novel coronavirus that causes COVID-19 could increase under the relaxed restrictions announced Friday by Gov. Tim Walz, but health officials will be monitoring case numbers for any spikes that would be concerning, said Kris Ehresmann, state infectious disease director.

"The logic would say that if people are free to interact more, then we will likely see more cases," she said. "So we're watching for that."

Restaurants and bars as of Wednesday will be able to seat up to 50% of their indoor capacities, and fitness clubs, theaters, bowling alleys and other entertainment venues will be able to serve up to 25% of their capacities - with hard caps of 250 people in any of these indoor businesses.

Social gatherings of 10 people will be permitted indoors and 25 outdoors, but in all cases the need for social distancing of 6 feet will apply.

State disease investigators consider people to be at moderate risk of COVID-19 if they spent 15 minutes face-to-face in that proximity with others who have the infection.

"Six feet is the distance in which you would expect the respiratory droplets from someone who has sneezed or coughed to have settled before they get to that next person," Ehresmann said.

The addition of 20 deaths and 307 new lab-confirmed cases on Tuesday brought the toll of the pandemic in Minnesota to 1,217 deaths and 28,523 illnesses so far, but case growth has been steady or declining since an apparent peak around Memorial Day weekend.

Gyms, theaters next as state seeks new normal

The Minnesota Department of Health also reported 455 people with the infectious disease in hospital care, including 199 who needed intensive care due to severe respiratory or other symptoms, as of Tuesday. At peak demand on May 28, there were 606 such patients hospitalized.

Case growth has ebbed even as other restrictions have been eased. Walz ended a statewide stay-at-home order at 51 days on May 18 and allowed outdoor restaurant services and limited indoor religious services on June 1. Churches under the latest order can expand attendance from 25% to 50% of their capacity.

Minnesotans have been moving around more for weeks - as measured by traffic levels and mobile device tracking - than they did in March and April, and the recent protests over the death of George Floyd in police custody brought thousands of people shouting and singing together in proximity.

States with earlier peaks in the COVID-19 pandemic offer some guides for Minnesota. Wisconsin reported zero COVID-19 deaths on Tuesday - a first since May 13 in that state - and declining growth in cases despite a court order throwing out its statewide restrictions last month.

Republican leaders in the Minnesota House seized on this zero-death announcement Tuesday, challenging the Democrat Walz and health authorities to address why Minnesota has seen more COVID-19 deaths than Wisconsin, which has more people and fewer restrictions.

On the other hand, a reopening of activities in Los Angeles County in California has reportedly this week come with an increased COVID-19 infection rate - a cautionary tale against moving too quickly to restart businesses and activities amid the pandemic.

Ehresmann said state officials have concentrated more on in-state statistical indicators of COVID-19 to weigh the need for restrictions and social distancing.

A high per capita testing rate, and a low percentage of those tests being positive, will be a strong indication that the pandemic is well-monitored and under control, she said.

Testing numbers will likely gain a boost from free clinics on Tuesdays and Wednesdays for the next three weeks at four sites in Minneapolis and St. Paul where protests took place. The state has recommended that all people who participated in the mass demonstration events seek COVID-19 testing due to their exposure risk - whether they have respiratory symptoms of COVID-19 or not.

Testing appointments for this week filled up quickly, and the state on Tuesday afternoon announced it would be expanding capacity for these clinics next week.

Not all businesses were set to bounce back just because the state gave them permission. While several bowling alleys are reopening, most movie theaters in the Twin Cities have yet to announce plans. The St. Anthony Main Theatre in Minneapolis announced on Facebook that it plans to open June 19, with reduced ticket sales and staggered seating between rows to keep groups 6 feet apart.

Jester Concepts isn't quite ready to open its restaurants - Monello, P.S. Steak, Borough and Parlour in Minneapolis, and Parlour in St. Paul, said owner Brent Frederick. Reopening in mid- to late June following staff training is more likely, he said.

"Patio at full capacity and indoor dining at 50% is the best we could hope for right now," he said. "Looking forward to pandemic trends flattening more to where we can get full dining capacity once again."

Gyms, theaters next as state seeks new normal

W.A. Frost is serving on its patio only for now due to continued COVID-19 concerns but would at best reach 25% capacity if reopening indoors due to the constraints of 6-foot spacing, said co-owner Stephanie Laitala-Rupp. "The 6-foot rule is the real hitch in the giddyup, for us, based on how our tables lay out ... more so than the 50% rule."

Health officials aren't certain why COVID-19 case growth is ebbing in Minnesota, though weeks of social distancing and a stay-at-home order likely played a role. Recent state modeling had suggested that the order reduced face-to-face contact and disease transmission by 55%.

The decline has coincided with warmer and more humid weather, but Ehresmann said there is no scientific proof, yet, that climate has played a role in slowing the pandemic.

Staff writers Sharyn Jackson and Nicole Norfleet contributed to this story.

Jeremy Olson · 612-673-7744

TRACKING CORONAVIRUS

Minnesota cases, daily change*

28,523 -- Total cases

307 -- June 9 new cases

*Chart data is a net count of new confirmed cases minus previously announced cases that were removed by MDH on that date.

Minnesota deaths, new daily

1,217 -- Total deaths

20 -- June 9

U.S. cases, new daily

1,970,613 -- Total cases

17,475 -- June 8

U.S. deaths, new daily

110,966 -- Total deaths

544 -- June 8

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete charts.)

Sources: New York Times, Minnesota Dept. of Health

Note: U.S. data lags a day behind Minnesota

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

Gyms, theaters next as state seeks new normal

End of Document

Hernandez, Mowry Voss, Swift: If you're serious, St. Paul Council, approve these housing protections

ARTICLE DXXI. HERNANDEZ, MOWRY VOSS, SWIFT: IF YOU'RE SERIOUS, ST. PAUL COUNCIL, APPROVE THESE HOUSING PROTECTIONS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 818 words

Byline: Martin Hernandez, Betsy Mowry Voss and Danielle Swift

Highlight: As community-based organizations with deep relationships in neighborhoods across St. Paul, particularly in low-wealth communities of color most affected by economic inequality, we have always understood the inextricable links between housing equity and racial justice. Now more than ever, as St. Paul city leaders show up to rallies and profess a commitment to justice in [...]

Body

As community-based organizations with deep relationships in neighborhoods across St. Paul, particularly in low-wealth communities of color most affected by economic inequality, we have always understood the inextricable links between housing equity and racial justice. Now more than ever, as St. Paul city leaders show up to rallies and profess a commitment to justice in response to police brutality, their action on the S.A.F.E. Housing ordinance is a direct reflection of whether they are making good on that commitment or co-signing the continuation of a fundamentally unjust housing system that is built on the same structural racism that killed George Floyd.

For years, we have engaged with constituents, city staff and council members around housing issues. The policies before them are not new. They are modest changes that have been proven legal and effective in cities across the nation. Especially in this moment of historic societal change, as countless St. Paul residents call for a future that honors Black life and our communities of color, our city leaders' choice is clear: stay the course of the well-worn grooves of racist policies that have brought us to this moment or take the first, small steps in a new direction by passing the S.A.F.E. Housing ordinance.

Here are its key provisions:

Tenant rights and responsibilities: Information on tenants' rights and responsibilities will be provided to all tenants and landlords.

Security deposit limit: Currently, there is no limit to the amount a landlord can charge for security deposit. The proposed security deposit limit would mean landlords can't charge more than one month's rent.

Tenant screening reforms: Proposed adjustments to what types of information landlords can use to screen applicants seek to address longstanding inequities that were created and are perpetuated by the public and private sectors (disparate policing and incarceration, economic marginalization, to name a few).

Hernandez, Mowry Voss, Swift: If you're serious, St. Paul Council, approve these housing protections

90-day advance notice of sale: Landlords would be required to let their tenants know that their building is being sold 90 days in advance of the sale so that tenants can have time to search for already scarce available housing.

Just-cause notice: Landlords would be required to provide a stated cause, like non-payment of rent or breach of lease terms, to end a lease. This does not impact the formal eviction process.

In the face of a global pandemic that is devastating communities of color and unspeakable police violence that has inflamed the daily trauma of systemic oppression, we are quite frankly shocked at the time and effort we've had to invest in advancing the S.A.F.E. Housing ordinance, especially the just-cause component. We have reached out to every single one of our city leaders. We have conducted research for them and engaged legal experts. We have shared deeply personal stories of the pain and fear renters are enduring because of the city council's inaction on tenant protections. We have stood shoulder to shoulder with them in press conferences where they have preached their commitment to renters and posed with residents they are now poised to abandon - yet again.

From the conversation our member organizations have had, we now know that there are only three St. Paul City Council members willing to support the ordinance in its full form - Mitra Jalali, Nelsie Yang and Dai Thao. Though deeply disappointing, it comes as no surprise to us that, while the council members of color are committed to moving this ordinance forward without amendment, the white members of the council continue to question just-cause and waver in their support of a fully vetted, publicly proven first step toward housing justice even as they espouse their support of affordable housing.

Over the past two weeks, thousands of residents have rallied for justice, making clear that the status quo is an unacceptable continued state of oppression for our communities. If you refuse to see the deep connections between housing discrimination and racial inequity in the city you lead, you do not value Black lives. To act in true solidarity means passing policies that proactively shift generations of discrimination and exclusion that have locked our communities into endless cycles of housing instability.

Housing justice is racial justice. By Friday, June 12, we demand that council members publicly share whether they will vote yes or no on the S.A.F.E. Housing ordinance in its current form, without amendment or implementation delay. Unless they are willing to act on what communities of color have been telling them for years, their hashtags and speeches about how much they care about Black lives are meaningless.

Martin Hernandez chairs the board of the West Side Community Organization. Betsy Mowry Voss is executive director of the Southeast Community Organization. Danielle Swift is a community organizer with the Frogtown Neighborhood Association.

Load-Date: July 10, 2020

ARTICLE DXXII. JOBS COMMISSIONER PLANS TO 'GET THIS RIGHT'

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1256 wordsByline: REID FORGRAVE; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

It had been more than two months since the coronavirus pandemic threw Minnesota's economy into chaos, and only days before George Floyd's death would introduce a new sort of tumult to the Twin Cities. Weekdays and weekends were blending into each other, all consumed by work. Steve Grove needed a break.

On a beautiful Saturday afternoon in late May, Grove, the commissioner of the Minnesota Department of Employment and Economic Development, hopped on his bicycle in Linden Hills and, with his 3-year-old twins towed in a bike trailer, went for a ride. Near the Lake Harriet Band Shell, they paused for ice cream and cheese curds. His wife, Mary, watched the twins throw flower petals into the lake while Grove made a few phone calls in advance of the governor's announcement of a phased reopening of churches that afternoon.

However briefly, it felt like they were human again.

Then they loaded the kids back up. Mint chocolate chip ice cream fell to the ground. Their bike fell over, twice. And on the ride back home, the skies opened up, a colossal downpour drenched Grove and his wife from head to toe as the kids screamed in delight from the shelter of their trailer.

This was not the plan.

For the former Google executive, who took over as the state's economic czar in 2019 after returning to his home state the year before, not much has been going according to plan these days. It certainly was not the plan to, in a few chaotic months, shift from near record-low unemployment and a focus on the "innovation economy" to a time where the state's and nation's economies resemble the Great Depression more than any time since World War II.

"The idea that anybody who's here to help grow the economy would have to focus on pausing the economy for the sake of public health is really unfathomable," Grove said. "But it's what this time required, and ultimately it's what we needed to do to keep our economy safe. It's not just public health or the economy on an either-or spectrum. It's all interrelated. And that's what makes this so challenging."

Jobs commissioner plans to 'get this right'

It also was never the plan to, in the midst of this pandemic, be visiting with Lake Street businesses destroyed by fires and looting that caused an estimated $100 million to $150 million in damage to buildings in Minneapolis alone, according to preliminary city numbers. In person and on Zoom calls, Grove has spoken with business owners affected by the destruction when protests after Floyd's death turned violent, as well as legislative and city leaders.

He asks what the businesses need. At first, the most pressing need was security. Eventually, they say, they'll need funds to rebuild, and assurances that the rebuilding process will not gentrify these economically diverse neighborhoods. The message: "You better get this right this time."

There's been the same feeling with the economic fallout of the pandemic: The Walz administration better get it right, though there are no obvious solutions.

Since the virus paralyzed America in March, the ongoing discussions in the Walz administration and in state governments throughout the country have been a push-pull between the desire to restart an economy that locked down for much of spring and the pressing public health concerns over the spread of a mysterious new virus.

In Walz's cabinet meetings on Zoom, Grove tends to be more aggressive on the economy than Jan Malcolm, public health commissioner. But there have been plenty of times when Grove makes public health arguments while Malcolm makes economic arguments.

Grove started having weekly calls in March with a dozen or so economic leaders - heads of large corporations, owners of smaller businesses, labor leaders - to get their unvarnished (and confidential) thoughts on the state government's latest moves. In these calls, he tries to take a weekly temperature from business leaders and present those thoughts to the governor.

"You need to hear the good, the bad and the ugly, otherwise you're the emperor with no clothes on," said Mark Urdahl, president and CEO of Red Wing Shoe Co. "And nobody wants to be that."

According to those on Grove's weekly calls, the commissioner mostly just listens. Before the June 1 reopening of restaurants and hair salons, he asked for input on the state's plan. It was too cumbersome and detailed, business leaders told him, and needed to be pared down for overwhelmed business owners. So the state revised it to be more straightforward.

"I don't hear political rhetoric, but I do hear an increasing urgency from people and a concern for the communities they live in," said Traci Tapani, co-president of Wyoming Machine, a contract manufacturing company in Stacy.

"People realize we can't stay locked down forever," said Rod Young, CEO and president of Delta Dental of Minnesota, a dental insurance company. "They also realize that coming back too soon could be a challenge."

What Grove and others in state government know is there are no perfect decisions with COVID-19. That's why Walz refers to it as a dial; it's a delicate balance of slowly reopening the economy while minding public health concerns. And when nationwide protests over Floyd's death have their epicenter in the Twin Cities, and bring thousands of people in close physical contact, that delicate balance can burst in a matter of days.

Jobs commissioner plans to 'get this right'

The most difficult decisions have had to do with small businesses; when Grove was growing up in Northfield, his dad owned a landscaping company with a half-dozen employees. Decisions about shutting down small businesses have been excruciating.

"For a business that's not open, these are their lives for them, food on their table," Grove said. "To say you're a noncritical business - noncritical? Noncritical to who?"

"There are lots of fairness questions there are not good answers to," he continued. "This whole issue for several weeks, small retailers saying to us, 'I don't understand why Walmart is cranking in the revenue and I can't be open.' They're 100 percent right. In the bigger picture, there's a reason. ... But there's no perfect decision."

Grove kept hearing complaints about Minnesota's Largest Candy Store in Jordan. It stayed open because it sells food - but as the huge sign says next to the highway, it's a candy store.

As the pandemic has worn on, the definition of what is "critical" has crumbled, Grove said, as many businesses permanently shuttered and the national unemployment rate skyrocketed. Last week, nearly 2 million Americans filed new claims for unemployment. But some hopeful notes came Friday, when the Labor Department announced improving unemployment numbers - from 14.7% in April to 13.3% in May - and that employers had added 2.5 million jobs in May.

The June 1 phase of the economy's reopening was disrupted by the violence. But state government remains on edge to see if Minnesota has struck the right balance. Another marker comes on Wednesday, when the dial increases again: limited indoor dining, indoor entertainment at movie theaters and other venues, fitness club usage, and outdoor entertainment of up to 250 people.

"When I say getting it right, if we open retail and the whole state decides there's no reason to take precautions, that's our biggest concern," Grove said. "It's summer. We're trying to loosen this. [The June 1 reopening] is really tough because it's no longer a stay-at-home order."

"Did we nail the decision right, so that people can get back to it but do it in a safe way, where we don't get overwhelmed?"

This time, Grove hopes things go according to plan.

Reid Forgrave · 612-673-4647

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

ARTICLE DXXIII. LEGISLATURE GETS $13M BILL FOR GUARD DEPLOYMENT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 5BLength: 174 wordsByline: PATRICK CONDON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The Minnesota National Guard's mission to respond to civil unrest in Minneapolis and St. Paul cost $12.75 million, state officials said Tuesday.

Minnesota Management and Budget Commissioner Myron Frans spelled out the Guard's reimbursement request in a letter to the chairs of the House and Senate budget committees.

"The funds will be used for payroll, vehicles, and sustainment activities for this mission," Frans wrote in the letter to Sen. Julie Rosen and Rep. Lyndon Carlson. Under state law, the Legislature is required to reimburse the Guard for the mission.

Public outrage following the killing of George Floyd in police custody on May 25 prompted large demonstrations in the following days that in some parts of Minneapolis and St. Paul turned into looting, arson and vandalism. Gov. Tim Walz activated the Guard by executive order on May 28; by May 30, it had become the Guard's largest deployment ever for civil unrest.

It was also the Guard's first deployment for a civil disturbance in Minnesota in 34 years.

Patrick Condon · 612-673-4413

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

ARTICLE DXXIV. MN GOV. TIM WALZ AND LT. GOV. PEGGY FLANAGAN TESTED FOR CORONAVIRUS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 247 words

Byline: Christopher Magan

Highlight: Urging other Minnesotans to do the same, Gov. Tim Walz announced Wednesday that after attending community events he recently got a coronavirus test. The Democratic governor's test results were negative, according to a Twitter post by Walz. Lt. Gov. Peggy Flanagan also tweeted that she tested negative. After spending significant time out in our communities [...]

Body

Urging other Minnesotans to do the same, Gov. Tim Walz announced Wednesday that after attending community events he recently got a coronavirus test.

The Democratic governor's test results were negative, according to a Twitter post by Walz. Lt. Gov. Peggy Flanagan also tweeted that she tested negative.

After spending significant time out in our communities the past two weeks, @LtGovFlanagan and I each got a test yesterday (they turned up negative). It was quick and painless and we urge any Minnesotan who has spent time in a crowd or has symptoms to do the same. <https://t.co/Rz5xzyHt0l>

- Governor Tim Walz (@GovTimWalz)

Gov. Walz already isolated himself once during the pandemic after a member of his security detail tested positive for the coronavirus.

State leaders and health officials are urging anyone who attended demonstrations protesting the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police to get a coronavirus tests.

There are free testing sites in St. Paul and Minneapolis, but all the appointments are booked this week. Residents can learn more about how and when to get tested visit: www.mn.gov/COVID19/ #COVID19 June 10, 2020.

Working from home, Securian Financial employees donate monthly parking fee to local nonprofits Storm clouds hang over Trump's attempted campaign reboot Foreign students weigh studying in person vs. losing visas Nursing homes can designate 'essential caregivers' to visit After lobbying, Catholic Church won \$1.4B in virus aid

MN Gov. Tim Walz and Lt. Gov. Peggy Flanagan tested for coronavirus

Load-Date: July 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DXXV. NEW COALITION TO HELP SMALL BUSINESSES SURVIVE VIRUS

Finance and Commerce

June 10, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 BridgeTower Media All Rights Reserved

FINANCE & COMMERCESection: NEWSLength: 764 wordsByline: Brian JohnsonBody

From Watertown to Stillwater, chambers of commerce and community groups are coming together to help Twin Cities small businesses get through the COVID-19-induced economic downturn.

More than two dozen organizations, including the Minneapolis and St. Paul chambers of commerce, make up the new Business4Business Minneapolis-St. Paul coalition, which was unveiled this week.

Anoka, Carver, Hennepin, Ramsey and Washington counties are part of the coalition.

Among other things, the coalition aims to connect small businesses to financial and technical resources during the pandemic and beyond, with special emphasis on help for poor communities and minority-owned businesses.

Coalition backers say small businesses are the foundation of the local economy. Businesses account for 64.5% of jobs in the state, and 83% of businesses in the region have fewer than 20 employees, according to the coalition.

One challenge: Many small businesses don't have experience navigating the system to gain access to resources such as the federal Paycheck Protection Program, so they often miss out on those benefits, coalition backers say.

"Certain groups do tend to have less access to capital," Patricia Fitzgerald, Hennepin County's director of economic development, said in an interview. "In addition, as some relief funds have been delivered on a first come, first served basis, the most established businesses with the most resources tend to see those resources and then the funds have run out. And so we are really looking at Business4Business as yet another way to further the reach of some of these relief funds. "

Fitzgerald said the pandemic's financial impact on small businesses is difficult to quantify. But she said national surveys have shown many small businesses have less than two weeks of reserves to weather an economic downturn.

Ramsey County Commissioner Toni Carter said it's "imperative" for the region to support small businesses affected by the COVID-19 pandemic and the civil unrest stemming from the death of George Floyd.

Small businesses, especially those owned by people of color, "have told us and have shown us that they have not received the relief and assistance" available through existing programs, Carter said in an interview.

A centerpiece of the coalition is technical support. Through initiatives like the Pay IT Forward program, a joint effort of the city of St. Paul, Ramsey County and other partners, small businesses that need help applying for financial aid can be matched with a range of volunteers.

"We are doing our best -- and doing so in a coordinated fashion -- to bring resources and assistance to businesses," B Kyle, president of the St. Paul Area Chamber of Commerce, said in an interview.

"The least expensive service to a business is a check. The most expensive service to a business is the mentoring, the technical support, because it's a one-on-one relationship and that's always more time-consuming and frankly in many ways it's more valuable," Kyle said.

Insurance experts, attorneys, accountants and others have stepped up to offer their support, she said.

"Large companies and small companies have called me saying, 'We have capacity, we have team members looking for a place to be plugged in. They are saying, 'Put me in, coach,'" Kyle said.

One of the challenges, she said, is gaining the trust of the small businesses that may be wary of receiving help from an outsider. Kyle said that's where it helps to have support of smaller community-based organizations and chambers of commerce, which are valuable liaisons.

The Minnesota Hmong Chamber of Commerce, LatinoLEAD, Midway Chamber of Commerce, the Minnesota Black Chamber of Commerce, the East Side Area Business Association and the Center for Economic Inclusion, are among the coalition members.

Other members include the Metropolitan Consortium of Community Developers, Greater MSP Partnership, Anoka Area Chamber of Commerce, SPEDCO, Twin Cities North Chamber of Commerce, Metro North Chamber of Commerce, Southwest Metro Chamber of Commerce, Watertown Chamber of Commerce, Waconia Chamber of Commerce, White Bear Area Chamber of Commerce, Oakdale Area Chamber of Commerce, Greater Stillwater Chamber of Commerce, Woodbury Area Chamber of Commerce, Norwood Young America Chamber of Commerce, Payne-Arcade Area Business Association, Ham Lake Area Chamber of Commerce, and the Quad Area Chamber of Commerce.

[divider]

Like this article? Gain access to all of our great content with a month-to-month subscription. Start your subscription here.

Copyright © 2020 BridgeTower Media. All Rights Reserved.

Load-Date: June 16, 2020

ARTICLE DXXVI. REFLECTIONS AMONG THE RAINDROPS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 94 wordsBody

Above, 8-year-old Sabrina Smith of New Hope visited the George Floyd memorial site in Minneapolis on a rainy Tuesday afternoon. Haley Alexis King of Kenosha, Wis., knelt in prayer at right at the intersection of Chicago Avenue and 38th Street, where a memorial has expanded in all directions with installations, flowers, and an outpouring of grief and of support for the movement ignited by Floyd's death. Part of the site is now dedicated to naming other people of color who have been killed because of racism.

Photos by LEILA NAVIDI · leila.navidi@startribune.comLoad-Date: June 11, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DXXVII. SUDDEN EVICTION FROM HOTEL

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 981 wordsByline: CHRIS SERRES; MIGUEL OTAROLA; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Drug overdose leads owner to empty rooms that sheltered homelessBody

A report of a drug overdose led to the eviction Tuesday of more than 200 homeless people from a hotel in south Minneapolis that had become a refuge during protests that erupted in the wake of George Floyd's killing in police custody.

Residents of the former Sheraton Minneapolis Midtown Hotel, tucked just north of Lake Street on Chicago Avenue, awoke to reports that the hotel's fire alarm was pulled after 6 a.m. following an overdose. The hotel owner, Jay Patel, has ordered the eviction of all the guests, according to volunteers at the site.

The sudden eviction marks the second time in two weeks that large numbers of homeless people have been forced to vacate a temporary site, and could hamper efforts by a team of volunteers to find them more permanent housing.

The coronavirus pandemic has brought a heightened level of urgency to these efforts. Homeless outreach workers fear that people who are cleared repeatedly from shelters and other sites will scatter and become more difficult to reach with aid.

"It's not that people don't want to help, it's just that right now there are no physical beds," said Sheila Delaney, who acted as a liaison between volunteers, the building owner and other partners. "There is no 'Plan B,' except for back out."

Since May 29, the hastily arranged shelter had been a source of stability, even hope, amid the chaos and destruction that followed Floyd's death on May 25.

Unlike traditional homeless shelters, people who stayed at the hotel were allowed to bring drugs and alcohol on-site. Volunteer medics were focused on preventing overdoses and helping people access health services, rather than enforcing rules that would result in people being forced back onto the streets.

Sudden eviction from hotel

But some residents at the hotel said conditions had begun to spin out of control in recent days, with people injecting heroin and methamphetamine in the hallways, and fights breaking out at night. Volunteers became overwhelmed.

"It started out well, then descended into chaos," said Jennie Taylor, who had a room on the second floor. "People got the message that this was a place where you could use drugs freely and that attracted the wrong crowd."

Moon Beaumaster, another resident and volunteer at the hotel, agreed. "There were too many parasitic drug dealers who were using this place for the wrong reason," she said.

The scene Tuesday outside the hotel was chaotic. Homeless people, some with children in tow, could be seen pouring out of the hotel lobby with their belongings piled in shopping carts. One angry resident was darting around the parking lot, screaming at people. Many sat on curbs and said they had nowhere to go.

In an emotional news conference outside the hotel, residents and volunteers decried the eviction and demanded permanent housing. A few people insisted they were not going to leave. Volunteers said many people likely would remain at the hotel overnight, as they continued to negotiate with the building owner.

"I don't know if the owner has the power to evict us," said Rosemary Fister, an organizer at the hotel, drawing cheers from residents.

The hotel is on a stretch near Lake Street that was badly damaged during last week's protests, and it quickly became a sanctuary for people trying to avoid the riots. In less than 48 hours, the building had come to resemble a large homeless cooperative, with the residents handling many of its core functions, from serving meals to security. Organizers had raised over $100,000 on GoFundMe and carloads of donations poured in. Even people who were not staying at the hotel would drop in to get food, medical care and other services.

"It was beautiful in its way," said Alexis Kramer, a volunteer at the hotel and organizer with Freedom from the Streets, an advocacy group for the homeless. "I mean, we have children here. Where are they going to go?"

Some of those who arrived at the hotel had migrated from a large homeless encampment near the light-rail line along Hiawatha Avenue, which was cleared by the Metropolitan Council two weeks ago. Most of those at the encampment were offered and accepted rooms at other hotels with support staff.

By last weekend, all the rooms in the four-story hotel were filled, yet people kept arriving. Other areas of the hotel, including the lobby, were converted to sleeping spaces to accommodate the new arrivals. As of Tuesday, the hotel-turned-shelter had a waiting list of about 450 people.

But in recent days, Patel and a team of volunteers had grown increasingly stressed and exhausted accommodating guests, many of whom were dealing with mental illness and substance use problems, Delaney said.

Kat Eng, a volunteer and community liaison at the site, said volunteers have reached out to government agencies and nonprofits for help in finding people housing, but those displaced currently have nowhere to go. She put out a call for more tents early Tuesday.

Sudden eviction from hotel

"We have reached out through every single possible channel and there is no alternative," she said. "Residents are traumatized, scared and we need solutions."

As people poured out of the hotel, Taylor sat on a nearby bus bench and contemplated her options. The night she moved into the hotel last week marked the first time in nearly four years that Taylor had a private room, a bathtub and a place to sleep without fear of having her belongings stolen, she said. "It was wonderful, like a dream," she said of the week she spent there.

Most likely, she would pitch a tent along the Midtown Greenway near the hotel, Taylor said. Because of the coronavirus, she was afraid to stay in a crowded shelter, where people sleep close enough to hold hands.

"It's unfortunate that a few people appear to have ruined it for everyone," she said, gazing out over the damaged buildings on Lake Street. "There are some of us who do have hope for sobriety and housing."

Miguel Otárola · 612-673-4753

Chris Serres · 612-673-4308

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

ARTICLE DXXVIII. TOM JOHNSON 1945 - 2020

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 894 wordsByline: ROCHELLE OLSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Former county attorney a tireless advocate for equality // While enduring stage IV cancer for six years, he kept on working.Body

Former Hennepin County Attorney Tom Johnson, a pioneering criminal justice advocate and most recently ombudsman for victims of Catholic clergy abuse, lost his six-year battle Monday with advanced prostate cancer.

Johnson, 75, died at his Minneapolis home surrounded by his wife, Victoria, and his four adult children. Though he hadn't held public office since stepping down as county attorney after 12 years in 1991, he had remained a public force for justice reforms through both public advocacy and personal relationships, serving as a mentor to many state leaders.

"His influence went way beyond any office that he held," said David Lebedoff, who met Johnson in 1972 when both were young lawyers working on the presidential campaign of U.S. Sen. George McGovern.

It's significant that Johnson died amid the recent upheaval in Minneapolis, Lebedoff said, referring to the unrest in the wake of the killing of George Floyd by a police officer. Johnson "was with us at a time when no one else was pointing out disparities in our justice system," he said.

Last Christmas, Johnson wrote his own obituary. His tone was lighthearted, but he also wrote that none of his jobs gave him more satisfaction than "calling attention to the unacceptable racial disparities in the justice system and their cost to society."

In an interview with a Star Tribune editorial writer in 2015, Johnson lamented his shortcomings in meeting the challenges faced by black Americans. "On a number of occasions I thought about plunging in and figuring out what could be done to change a particular situation," he said. "Too often, I didn't, at least not with the vigor I typically try to bring to resolving an issue."

But his accomplishments were substantial. In 1989 he founded CornerHouse, a nationally recognized advocacy center for children who are victims of sex abuse. He founded and sat on the board of the Minnesota Justice Research Center, which seeks fair and humane treatment for those in the criminal justice system. Last week he participated in his last board meeting online.

Johnson led the now-shuttered nonprofit Council on Crime and Justice (CCJ) from 1998 to 2007 and directed groundbreaking research on racial disparities in the criminal justice system. He also practiced environmental law at Gray Plant Mooty in Minneapolis, where he fought the Southwest light-rail line.

Johnson grew up on a farm in Brookston, Minn., and graduated from Duluth Central High School. He earned degrees in physics and law from the University of Minnesota and a master of laws degree from the London School of Economics.

At age 28, he was elected to the Minneapolis City Council. In his self-written obituary, he said he walked around City Hall thinking, "If the public only knew how little I know."

But Johnson learned quickly. He fought for truth-in-housing inspections and campaign finance disclosures, and prohibition of discrimination based on sexual orientation. He also got passed a ban on plastic milk cartons, though the ban lasted only a few months.

Within hours of his death, Gov. Tim Walz, U.S. Sen. Amy Klobuchar and Archbishop Bernard Hebda posted tributes to Johnson on social media. Walz called Johnson "a voice for the voiceless, a passionate pursuer of justice, a loving husband, and a wise and good-humored father," and Klobuchar, herself a former Hennepin County attorney, said Johnson "always did good."

Hebda wrote that Johnson's "compassionate work on behalf of victims of clergy sexual abuse was inspiring. We are a better church and a better community because of Tom."

Hennepin County Attorney Mike Freeman said he met Johnson in 1978 and remained a lifelong friend. Freeman said Johnson recruited him to run for county attorney in 1990 and that the two met regularly. The last time was six weeks ago, when Johnson gave Freeman a written agenda for reform.

"Tom never stopped thinking and being an activist," Freeman said.

Mark Haase, ombudsman for the state Department of Corrections, also considered Johnson a mentor. Haase, who ran unsuccessfully against Freeman in 2018, first met Johnson when he was a law student and intern at CCJ in 2005. "He treated me like I knew exactly what I was doing, like an equal," Haase said.

The Rev. Daniel Griffith, pastor at Our Lady of Lourdes Catholic Church in Minneapolis, met Johnson through Victoria, a parish administrator. "In 18 years in the priesthood, I'm not sure I met someone who was a better human being," Griffith said. "His sense of justice was off the charts."

Two days after Johnson's final birthday in April, his son Hunter took him for a Ferris Bueller-style tour of the Twin Cities in a borrowed green 1974 Triumph Spitfire convertible.

"Everywhere we drove in the Twin Cities, my dad had a significant memory or story to share with me about his life; his first campaign headquarters, his old running route, a favorite cafe," said Hunter, of Minneapolis.

Besides his wife and son Hunter, Johnson is survived by his daughters, Jill Steigauf of St. Paul, and Kayla Johnson Castañeda of St. Paul, communications director for Walz; son Ben, of New Haven, Conn.; brothers, Jerry and Warren; and sister, Susan Henderson.

TOM JOHNSON 1945 - 2020

Hebda will lead a livestreamed service for Johnson at 10 a.m. Saturday at Our Lady of Lourdes. Due to COVID-19, only family and some close friends will attend.

Rochelle Olson · 612-673-1747

Twitter: @rochelleolson

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DXXIX. WHO'S FUMBLLED COVID-19 MESSAGE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 10, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 8ALength: 616 wordsHighlight: Despite doctor's comments, those who don't have symptoms can still spread the virus.Body

Don't shrug off your risk of COVID-19, especially if you've been in large crowds or other high-risk settings recently, simply because no symptoms were apparent in those nearby. This is an important public health message, one that needs amplifying in Minnesota and elsewhere, after a World Health Organization (WHO) communications fumble early this week.

On Monday, WHO epidemiologist Dr. Maria Van Kerkhove generated controversy when she responded to a question at one of WHO's routine news conferences. Her answer lacked clarity and context. Reports afterward misleadingly summarized that transmission by asymptomatic people is "very rare." Coverage also wrongly suggested that this was a new WHO position.

Medical experts in Minnesota and elsewhere responded with alarm and disbelief because the agency appeared to ignore accumulating research about COVID-19's transmission by people before they develop symptoms. The statement also seemed to blow up one of the key rationales for social distancing. Indeed, some social media users quickly jumped to this simplistic conclusion: Since only those with COVID-19 symptoms are contagious, sick people can just stay home and no one else needs to worry about contracting it.

If only it were that easy. "WHO says asymptomatic transmission of COVID is very rare. Just ignore this. It is not true," Mayo Clinic Dr. Vincent Rajkumar posted on Twitter.

In an interview with an editorial writer, renowned infectious disease expert Michael Osterholm also expressed concerns about the WHO statement and underscored the continued importance of social distancing. In addition, he said that the WHO effectively "walked back" its statement Tuesday morning.

The organization livestreamed a follow-up question-and-answer session with Van Kerkhove and another scientist, Dr. Michael Ryan, an Irish surgeon who heads the WHO's emergency programs. Van Kerkhove swiftly clarified that people without symptoms can transmit the virus and that models show it plays a significant role in fueling COVID-19 transmission, though further study is needed.

Ryan pointed out that the Monday "statement" by Van Kerkhove was only a response to a reporter's question. It did not represent an institutional shift in policy on asymptomatic spread or reverse any WHO position on population-wide mitigation measures needed to control COVID-19.

Much of the confusion appears rooted in what Van Kerkhove originally meant by "asymptomatic." Some people infected do not go on to develop any symptoms. It's not clear how unusual this is. Others may be "pre-symptomatic," meaning they're infected and later go on to develop symptoms. Van Kerkhove did not adequately distinguish between those groups in her original remarks.

It's difficult to track infections spread by those who are asymptomatic. That may explain why these individuals rarely appear to be a source of infection (our guess is that Van Kerkhove may have been trying to say something like this initially).

At the same time, a small yet growing body of research has documented spread by pre-symptomatic individuals. An April 15 study in the prestigious journal Nature estimated that "44% ... of secondary cases were infected during the index cases' presymptomatic stage." The researchers call for mitigation measures reflecting this.

Testing and social distancing remain vital. The Twin Cities were the epicenter of the George Floyd protests. Thousands marched. Those who did have no way of knowing if people around them were contagious. State health officials recommend participants get tested for COVID-19, preferably five to seven days after exposure even if they don't feel sick.

Said Osterholm: "This is not a time to let down our guard."

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

ARTICLE DXXX. ONE OF FOUR CHARGED IN FLOYD'S DEATH POSTS BAIL

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 11, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 324 wordsByline: PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

One of four fired Minneapolis police officers charged in the death of George Floyd posted cash bail and was released from jail Wednesday afternoon.

Thomas Lane, 37, who had been held in lieu of $750,000 bail, was freed shortly before 4:10 p.m. from the Hennepin County jail, a Sheriff's Office spokesman said.

A fundraising website on his behalf has since been taken down. The site solicited money through PayPal donations, while decrying the bail amount as unfairly high and also declaring that Lane "did everything he could" to save Floyd's life.

Lane's attorney, Earl Gray, confirmed that the website was legitimate, but he did not know how much money it had raised on his client's behalf or who was behind the effort. The site did say that "Lane and his family appreciate your support and prayers during this time."

Lane is one of three charged with aiding and abetting second-degree murder and aiding and abetting second-degree manslaughter in connection with the pavement restraint of Floyd on May 25 before he died. Gray said Lane accepted bail with conditions.

He is currently with his wife, although Gray would not disclose where out of concern for his safety. In the meantime, Lane's next hearing is scheduled for June 29, and Gray said he is planning to file a motion to dismiss the charges.

"Now we can watch what happens next from outside," he said. "We will bring a motion to dismiss and hopefully it will be granted."

The other co-defendants remained jailed as of 4:35 p.m. Wednesday: Derek Chauvin, who is charged with second-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter; and Tou Thao and J Alexander Kueng, who face the same charges as Lane.

According to charges, Lane, who initially took Floyd into custody, held down the 46-year-old man's legs while Kueng held his back and Chauvin knelt on Floyd's neck as he pleaded to breathe before he died.

One of four charged in Floyd's death posts bail

Chauvin's bail is $1.25 million, $750,000 each for Thao and Kueng.

Paul Walsh · 612-673-4482

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DXXXI. VIKINGS UNVEIL SOCIAL JUSTICE PLAN

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 11, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 1CLength: 865 wordsByline: BEN GOESSLING; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Team to make $5 million commitment to fight racismBody

The Vikings unveiled plans to increase social justice work in the Twin Cities on Wednesday, with a scholarship in George Floyd's name and a $5 million commitment from ownership to fight racism and inequality.

The Vikings' three-year-old social justice committee, led by co-defensive coordinator Andre Patterson and a half-dozen players, established the George Floyd Legacy Scholarship with a $125,000 gift in the days after police killed Floyd in south Minneapolis. The endowment is expected to generate $5,000 annually for a black Twin Cities high school graduate pursuing post-secondary education.

The committee distributed $250,000 to organizations around the metro area in both 2018 and 2019 after gifts from the Wilf family. This year, it will help Vikings ownership make decisions about how to use the $5 million donation across the U.S.

"When the tragedy happened a couple of weeks ago it was real easy for [General Manager] Rick [Spielman] and I to get the committee together, and they were very strong with, 'How can we help?' " Patterson said Wednesday. "And what they wanted to do was find a way to help his family or put something together so he would always be remembered. And so one of the things they brought up was trying to put a scholarship together in George Floyd's name. It only took one week and the Vikings came together and got that done."

In an 83-minute conference call Wednesday, Vikings players and executives told emotional stories about their own experiences with systemic racism and shared candid thoughts on how the NFL can drive change on issues ranging from food insecurity to education and criminal justice reform.

Linebacker Eric Kendricks, who challenged the NFL to take action with a series of June 2 tweets and appeared with teammate Anthony Barr and 17 other players in a June 4 video asking the league to condemn racism, discussed how his initial trepidation about speaking up gave way to a realization he couldn't stay silent. Running back Ameer Abdullah, who'd knelt during the national anthem while with the Lions in 2017, talked about his father's participation in the 1965 Selma-to-Montgomery march and the Vietnam War and his own experiences in Alabama as a "double minority" growing up black and Muslim.

Vikings unveil social justice plan

And Spielman teared up as he shared how one of his adopted sons was once pulled over for driving an expensive car, having to call home so Spielman's wife, Michele, could tell a police officer the driver was her son and the car was hers.

"When I'm able to go out in the community with my wife and we have our kids with us, they see a whole different world," Spielman said. "But when they go out on their own, one of my sons gets pulled over because he's driving my wife's car that's a really nice car. And he gets pulled over because of the color of his skin. To think that black man can't be driving that car, he must've stolen that car. ... I struggle to try to explain to our kids why they have to live in two different worlds."

Kendricks said Roger Goodell's June 5 video response - during which the commissioner said, "Black lives matter," and admitted the league had wrongfully discouraged players from peaceful protest - was "what we wanted," adding he expects to talk with the commissioner in the next few days.

"We want to try to keep it to football as much as possible, but these are issues that are facing the majority of the players' communities," Kendricks said. "For us to feel like we can't speak up about it, it just didn't feel right."

The linebacker said the NFL's gesture could give more players the freedom to protest during the 2020 season, though he added the Vikings - who haven't publicly protested since linking arms during the national anthem for much of the 2017 season - have recently spent more time discussing community efforts than protest plans. Spielman said the 2017 decision reflected the team's belief in doing things together, adding, "I just think it's so important [to realize] the message gets lost sometimes, what the actual problem is."

The general manager demurred when asked about former 49ers quarterback Colin Kaepernick's continued unemployment, saying, "Down the road, if there's an appropriate time, we can address things, but I want to keep the football-related stuff out of this, because I don't want the message to get diluted from what we're trying to accomplish today."

Vikings Chief Operating Officer Andrew Miller called Floyd's killing "a tragic and senseless act" that "highlighted a number of facets of our society that are broken, including law enforcement. And that's led to a culture of systemic racism that needs to be fixed."

Players, Miller said, have led efforts to have conversations with Minneapolis police chief Medaria Arradondo; 10 of them, including Kendricks and Barr, met with Arradondo last weekend.

The Vikings, Miller said, are "still talking through" whether to end their relationship with the Minneapolis Police Department.

"We're trying to understand the different perspectives that people have, and trying to make the best decision possible," he said. "There's complexities to any relationship, and ultimately we want to do what's best for our organization and for our fans."

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

End of Document

Anytime Fitness apologizes for Wisconsin franchisee's 'I can't breathe' workout

ARTICLE DXXXII. ANYTIME FITNESS APOLOGIZES FOR WISCONSIN FRANCHISEE'S 'I CAN'T BREATHE' WORKOUT

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 292 words

Byline: The Associated Press

Highlight: WAUWATOSA, Wis. - A Twin Cities-based health club company is apologizing on behalf of a franchisee who posted an "I can't breathe" workout at a gym in suburban Milwaukee. Photos of the workout instructions drawn on a dry erase board at Anytime Fitness in Wauwatosa were shared widely on social media and generated critical comments. [...]

Body

WAUWATOSA, Wis. - A Twin Cities-based health club company is apologizing on behalf of a franchisee who posted an "I can't breathe" workout at a gym in suburban Milwaukee.

Photos of the workout instructions drawn on a dry erase board at Anytime Fitness in Wauwatosa were shared widely on social media and generated critical comments.

The "I can't breathe" workout included burpees, or squat thrusts, and the instructions "don't you dare lay down." It also showed a person in a kneeling position, the Journal Sentinel reported.

The words "I can't breathe" have been chanted at hundreds of protests and rallies, echoing some of the final words of George Floyd, a black man who died May 25 after a white Minneapolis police officer held his knee against his neck as he was handcuffed face-down in the street.

The Woodbury-based company said it was "profoundly sorry" that the workout was posted.

"No matter what the intent, we absolutely do not condone the words, illustrations or actions this represents. One of our publicly-state commitments to antiracism work is to bolster training efforts for our franchise owners to lead with empathy, love and respect. This incident makes it clear we have more work to do in this space," a statement from the company read.

The workout instructions at the Wauwatosa gym have since been removed.

Feds deny Minnesota request for aid after George Floyd unrest. Walz has 30 days to appeal. Police reforms among the issues legislators expected to take up when they return to the Capitol. NYC mayor helps paint 'Black Lives Matter' outside Trump Tower. Lawyer: Over 150 Minneapolis officers seeking disability following unrest. 'We don't think we did this all right': State leaders weigh in on response to Minneapolis riots

Anytime Fitness apologizes for Wisconsin franchisee's 'I can't breathe' workout

Load-Date: July 12, 2020

End of Document

Letters: 'This is not a time to sit around in well-stocked kitchens and shake our fingers at the police ...'

ARTICLE DXXXIII. LETTERS: 'THIS IS NOT A TIME TO SIT AROUND IN WELL-STOCKED KITCHENS AND SHAKE OUR FINGERS AT THE POLICE ...'

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1261 words

Byline: Letter Writers

Highlight: Don't let fear beget more fear Over the past several days, some residents in the Twin Cities have been receiving threatening letters demanding them to remove their Black Lives Matters signs or their homes will be "torched." In response, some of my own white neighbors have taken down their BLM signs for fear of becoming [...]

Body

Over the past several days, some residents in the Twin Cities have been receiving threatening letters demanding them to remove their Black Lives Matters signs or their homes will be "torched." In response, some of my own white neighbors have taken down their BLM signs for fear of becoming a target.

I'm not taking my Black Lives Matter sign down. It's been up ever since Philando Castile lost his life at the hands of the police, and it's staying up now. Taking down the sign is a privilege. Just as black and brown people will always be black and brown, allies should always show their support, not just when it is safe or convenient.

I know parents are worried. We don't want our kids to be harmed for the sake of "politics." But, let's be clear: every black mother and every black father fear for the lives of their children, every day, always. The fear that white allies might be feeling now is a droplet of the fear that black parents have felt for decades, if not centuries.

Imagine if everyone in our neighborhoods proudly displayed their Black Lives Matter signs. The perpetrators would have to try and take us all down. Thinking back to when the KKK was even more active, it was the "N-- lovers" alongside the black people who were targets. We didn't have enough white allies willing to speak out. This time, be on the right side of history. Don't let fear beget more fear.

This is not a time to quietly support black lives. This is not a time to sit around in well-stocked kitchens and shake our fingers at the police and stop at that. This is a time to visibly support our black communities. This is a time to use whatever privilege any of us might have to make a difference.

Protest, give what money and food you can, be there for your neighbors, work to change structural racism. Also and at the very least: Lift your Black Lives Matter signs high.

Letters: 'This is not a time to sit around in well-stocked kitchens and shake our fingers at the police ...'

Mimi Iimuro Van Ausdall, Minneapolis

As I watched the state I love burning, and the neighborhoods I used to run around in as a teenager erupt in protest over the death of George Floyd, I understood the outrage of our communities of color. I understood that they have been subjected to the scenario of a police officer killing a black man time and again. I understood that these slayings never seem to result in any real change and that our criminal justice system favors the lives of police officers over the lives of the men they have killed.

As a white man, however, I do not understand what it is like to be a black man in America. I have never experienced the fear for my life when getting pulled over by a police officer. I have never experienced the despair of losing a family member to race-based violence. I have never experienced the hopelessness of systemic poverty promulgated by those in power.

Many of those protesters want a revolution, which happens when one group of people oppresses or exploits another. Our American Revolution started with a Declaration of Independence stating that all men are created with inalienable rights, including Life, Liberty and the Pursuit of Happiness. The sad irony is that it did not include the black population, most of whom were slaves at that time. What we witnessed with Mr. Floyd's death was partially the result of 400 years of oppression of the black race by the white race.

We need a new revolution - a revolution of heart. Each of us should ask ourselves, "What can I do to help change this situation?" My own responses are as follows: I can empathize with those of color. I can recognize racism and call it out. I can support political platforms that work to remedy this situation. I can vote my conscience.

If we all do what we can, change will happen. This revolution of heart will recognize that we are all equal in the eyes of our Creator. Only then will Minnesota and our country be able to recover and truly become one nation under God.

David A. Johnson, Highland Park, Illinois

After 33 years of teaching in St. Paul Public Schools, I can say without qualification that the SPPD school resource officers are an asset to our community.

Several of the SROs have been former students of mine and understand St. Paul kids well. Several times a year students would come to me to talk about a crime committed against them or someone close to them and we would go talk to our SRO together.

Most St. Paul students feel safe in our schools, often safer than they are at home. The SROs I have worked with are compassionate and reasonable. The school board needs to be very careful not to throw the baby out with the bath water.

Do what's best for our kids and keep the people who want to help them.

Susan Armstrong, St. Paul

Letters: 'This is not a time to sit around in well-stocked kitchens and shake our fingers at the police ...'

I didn't know about the Tulsa massacre of 1921 until a few days ago. And if you also have never heard of it, that's part of the problem. We need to educate ourselves to understand how we got to today and how to move forward to a better tomorrow.

Gail Mullaney, Woodbury

I'm sorry but I did not get the memo about using white privilege in America. Being white, the privilege I saw was money is power. My privilege growing up on the east side of St. Paul was work, family, church and education. I worked at a young age to help my family, worked to pay for my post education along with other family members, not unlike my mother who worked three jobs to keep our family together.

I suspect most people were out there were going through the same thing. Yes, during these times it wasn't always easy to stop and help everyone who needed it, but like my mother who worked hard to keep food on the table also delivered meals on wheels and taught us to do what we could. My greatest privilege of all has been watching my children and grandchildren grow and carry on with those same life and work ethics.

Julie Weier, Woodbury

This is what happens when voters/ community members are too busy to pay attention to what is happening in their own back yard.

Voting statistics for school board elections are abysmal in terms of turnout. As a result, it is very easy for single-issue, tunnel-visioned, "impassioned" individuals to get elected. They know little or care not for the big picture.

We, the residents of the Stillwater school district, are now reaping the benefits of our negligence, that is, a Board of Directors incapable of "directing" for the benefit of the entire community. Shame on us! Shame on them!

Wake up people. It's your civic responsibility.

Richard Edstrom, Stillwater

Apparently, some people in the North End neighborhood of Saint Paul are concerned about an infestation of ghosts and evil spirits if a vacant warehouse in their area were to be used to store bodies in the event that funeral homes and hospitals run out of space during the Covid pandemic. Allow me to assure them that their fear is unwarranted. Psychics are available for hire who can patrol the neighborhood on unicorns (available on-line at Amazon) while reciting incantations to ward off those spirits and ghosts.

And now, if you'll let me, I need to catch the next astral plane back to the 21st century and check my horoscope.

Letters: 'This is not a time to sit around in well-stocked kitchens and shake our fingers at the police ...'

Sandy Beitsch, St. Paul

President Trump says he is the "law and order" president. I wonder when the "law" part is going to take effect for him.

Don Albright, Shoreview

Letters: A heavy burden, but Minnesotans should pay the price for riot repair Sainted: A thousand miles away, Dad needed my help. You're a saint, Dori Letters: I hope Trump tells them to get lost Letters: It's a freeway, not a platform for grievance Letters: Hoping the St. Paul school board will reconsider its erroneous decision on school resource officers

Load-Date: July 12, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DXXXIV. [MINNEAPOLIS POLICE OFFICERS SIGN OPEN LETTER
CONDEMNING CHAUVIN](#)

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 287 words

Byline: The Associated Press

Highlight: A group of Minneapolis police officers on Thursday condemned the former officer charged with murder in George Floyd's death, and said they're ready to back the police chief's promised overhaul of the department. Fourteen officers signed an open letter Thursday addressed to "Dear Everyone - but especially Minneapolis citizens." The letter says officer Derek Chauvin [...]

Body

A group of Minneapolis police officers on Thursday condemned the former officer charged with murder in George Floyd's death, and said they're ready to back the police chief's promised overhaul of the department.

Fourteen officers signed an open letter Thursday addressed to "Dear Everyone - but especially Minneapolis citizens."

The letter says officer Derek Chauvin "failed as a human" and "stripped George Floyd of his dignity and life."

Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder in Floyd's May 25 death. Bystander video shows Chauvin, who is white, pressing his knee into the neck of Floyd, a handcuffed black man, and ignoring his cries for help, even after he eventually grew still.

The letter makes no mention of three other officers charged with aiding and abetting. All four were fired the day after Floyd's death on a South Minneapolis street.

The officers who signed the letter say they represent "hundreds" of other officers and that they are ready to embrace Chief Medaria Arradondo's plans to change the department. Arradondo on Wednesday announced the department was pulling out of contract talks with the union and promised other major changes are to come.

The fourteen officers signing the letter were mostly sergeants and lieutenants. The department currently has about 850 officers.

Feds deny Minnesota request for aid after George Floyd unrest. Walz has 30 days to appeal. Police reforms among the issues legislators expected to take up when they return to the Capitol. NYC mayor

Minneapolis police officers sign open letter condemning Chauvin

helps paint 'Black Lives Matter' outside Trump Tower Lawyer: Over 150 Minneapolis officers seeking disability following unrest 'We don't think we did this all right': State leaders weigh in on response to Minneapolis riots

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DXXXV. READERS WRITE NEUTRALITY HAS NO PLACE HERE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 11, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 12ALength: 1268 wordsBody

ANTI-RACISM

I've been listening and so far, this is one thing I've learned. There is no such thing as neutral when it comes to racism. I was raised a privileged white woman in an overwhelmingly white suburb of Minneapolis. I prided myself on "not seeing color," yet I did not understand justice. I later learned about cultural competence. This was harder, and the humility taught me how to be an advocate. But I didn't really do anything except feel a little smug. Last week, I learned about being anti-racist, which is to take action against racism. This comment from the executive director of Visit Greater St. Cloud about a Sauk Rapids, Minn., bar owner's display of the Confederate flag: "I wouldn't assume it's intentional to hurt anybody. Our position is, we remain neutral," is a perfect example of racism cloaked in ignorance ("Bar off, back on tourism website," June 10). It is time to listen and learn how to be allies against systemic racism.

Barb Mager, West St. Paul

POLICING

Crisis intervention training brings safety, empathy to the scene

Mindy Greiling's June 8 commentary is heartbreaking ("Separating policing, mental health response isn't easy"). Her disturbing description of a dangerous interaction with the police involving her and her mentally ill son is all too familiar. It raises a question - why wasn't a crisis intervention team (CIT) officer at the scene?

The CIT concept has been around for more than 30 years, but like many progressive police initiatives, it's taken root more in some jurisdictions than others. This is a pity, because the purpose of CIT is to provide a safer (including for the police), more effective way to deal with the mentally ill in crisis. What's often missed in speaking about CIT is that the training also results in officers who are more able and willing to show empathy in all types of public interactions.

It's the antithesis of what so tragically happened to George Floyd. He encountered officers either totally lacking in empathy (former officer Derek Chauvin) or with an insufficient level.

Andrew Rosenzweig, White Plains, N.Y.

The writer has served in several high-ranking law enforcement positions in major East Coast cities.

. . .

Abolish the police? Why bother? ("New flash point: Police reform," front page, June 9.) The profession has been so grotesquely and gleefully maligned that it's a wonder anyone stays on the force, let alone joins it.

Through two whiplash weeks we have seen the police damned as much when they don't as when they do. When the angels of anger torched Lake Street, but the police stood back - even sacrificed their station - to avoid creating any more George Floyds, where did the media fix its glare? Not on the rioters. It blamed the police, for showing exactly the restraint that everyone had accused them of not showing.

But when the cities did decide to stop the havoc, the police were then promptly denounced for enforcing curfew against marchers who used the word "peaceful" as a license to flaunt the curfew, protest trolls who know how to suffer for news cameras and shrill reporters describing tear gas as gravely as napalm in Vietnam.

And of course the wind farms of academia had to pitch in with the same old rap that racism centuries ago proves racism today. Culture isn't fate except when it's a handy brickbat.

So, did some tempers snap, as in Buffalo, N.Y.? How angry would you get if you were told that you must do your job - but can't?

Angry enough to quit?

Charles Jolliffe, Edina

VOTING RIGHTS

Georgia's election issues are a glimpse into our future

During the Georgia primary election, there were problems with voting machines, thus creating long lines and wait times for voters (" 'Chaos in Georgia': Is messy primary a November harbinger?," StarTribune.com, June 10). I believe it will happen again. Why, after all the years that this nation has held elections, have we not figured out how to build and ensure the proper operation of these machines? I can order food from my phone, get a confirmation of the order and receive a pickup time within seconds. I get a "thank you" on my phone after I've picked up my order. It can be done! And why is voting such a politically divisive issue? It's apparent that not everyone wants to: 1) Ensure that every eligible citizen has a good opportunity to vote; 2) squelch the attempts by some to deny the right to vote to certain others; 3) quiet the voices of those who spread false information about voting methods and fraud, and 4) prevent legislators and other public officials from tinkering with district boundaries in an attempt to get desired voting outcomes. The Constitution guarantees the right to vote to all eligible citizens. I'd like to hear our politicians talk more about protecting that right.

Loren W. Brabec, Braham, Minn.

COVID-19

Protesters should get tested, but their privacy is at risk

The Minnesota Department of Health (MDH) has very wisely advised all Minnesotans who participated in recent large-group activities to be tested for COVID-19 regardless of symptoms ("Protesters should get a COVID-19 test," editorial, June 8). Many people in our community have been exposed to higher risk of COVID-19 infection by engaging in protests, cleanups, vigils and distribution of food and basic supplies. However, in order for people get tested, they first need to feel safe doing so. Right now, many do not.

With executive order 20-34, Gov. Tim Walz directed MDH to share the addresses of all people considered contagious with COVID-19 with the Department of Public Safety (tinyurl.com/yavqdnaf). The goal of this order was to protect first responders and conserve personal protective equipment. However, this policy should now be revoked.

Though the right to protest is guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution, there is a long history in our country of retaliation by law enforcement against protesters. Minnesotans, especially those who have been protesting the killing of George Floyd by Minneapolis police officers, are not wrong to mistrust the system. While the governor's intentions may have been good, this order now poses a significant barrier to adequate and recommended medical care for Minnesotans and should be revoked.

Hannah Lichtsinn, M.D, Mendota Heights, Minn.

TIRE-SLASHING

Who are the real criminals here?

This is absurd and reckless on multiple levels. Here we have law enforcement officers, sworn to uphold the law, destroying private property in the name of the state with no due process and on the wild speculation that the property may be use to commit a crime ("Tires slashed by officers in Mpls. unrest," June 9).

When did we start destroying property and/or locking up folks over what may happen? Where does that end?

Looks like the destruction just created a massive case of eminent domain, maybe a class-action lawsuit to recover the value of all of this property.

Or is this just an illegal act of punishment by property damage perpetrated by the Minnesota law enforcement crowd on people who dared to show up to exercise their right to protest?

Here in northwestern Montana, we had armed citizens show up at peaceful protests to protect businesses and property. Maybe we should offer the armed members of the Montana militia to the good citizens of the Twin Cities to take on these thugs destroying private property?

Jim Cossitt, Kalispell, Mont.

...

Tomorrow's headline in the paper should read "Cops run amok in Kmart parking lot vandalizing automobiles." It's like they don't care what they do, or even if they are being filmed in the act. Seriously, the police scare me more than the worst of the rioters.

READERS WRITE Neutrality has no place here

Thom Jesberg, East Bethel, Minn.

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

End of Document

Illinois man indicted in Minneapolis riots; third suspect charged in St. Paul arson

ARTICLE DXXXVI. ILLINOIS MAN INDICTED IN MINNEAPOLIS RIOTS; THIRD SUSPECT CHARGED IN ST. PAUL ARSON

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 464 words

Byline: Kristi Belcamino

Highlight: A federal grand jury has charged a 28-year-old Galesburg, Ill., man with civil disorder, rioting, and arson in connection with the violent protests stemming from the death of George Floyd. Matthew Lee Rupert was previously charged by federal prosecutors. U.S. Attorney Erica MacDonald's office provided details of Rupert's indictment Wednesday along with announcing that a [...]

Body

A federal grand jury has charged a 28-year-old Galesburg, Ill., man with civil disorder, rioting, and arson in connection with the violent protests stemming from the death of George Floyd.

Matthew Lee Rupert was previously charged by federal prosecutors.

U.S. Attorney Erica MacDonald's office provided details of Rupert's indictment Wednesday along with announcing that a third person from the Twin Cities had been charged in connection with a May 28 arson fire at the Great Health and Nutrition store on University Avenue in St. Paul.

According to the criminal complaint, McKenzy Ann Degidio Dunn, 19, of Rosemount was charged with conspiracy to commit arson. Her co-conspirators, Brooklyn Park resident Samuel Elliott Frey and Ramsey resident Bailey Marie Baldus, both also 19, had previously been charged with one count of conspiracy to commit arson.

In the indictment against Rupert, authorities said he posted videos and details about his actions on his Facebook account. In one post he said, "I'm going to Minneapolis tomorrow who coming only goons I'm renting hotel rooms."

On May 29, he posted a "self-recorded cell phone video" on Facebook saying he was in Minneapolis. In the video, he "can be seen passing out explosive devices" and "encouraging others to throw his explosives at law enforcement officers, actively damaging property, appearing to light a fire in a building and looting businesses in Minneapolis," according to the indictment.

In other Facebook videos he posted, he talked about heading to Chicago to loot. On May 31, he posted several move videos from the Chicago area talking about starting a riot, looting and "doing some damage."

Illinois man indicted in Minneapolis riots; third suspect charged in St. Paul arson

Chicago police arrested him for violating curfew and found "several explosive devices, a hammer, a heavy-duty flashlight, and cash" while searching his vehicle.

The FBI and ATF urge the public to report suspected arson, use of explosive devices, or violent, destructive acts associated with the recent unrest.

Anyone with information related to business fires in the Twin Cities can call 1-888-ATF-TIPS (1-888-283-8477), email ATFTips@atf.gov or submit information anonymously via ReportIt.com.

In addition to fires, the FBI is looking for people who incited or promoted violence. Anyone with digital material or tips can call 1-800-CALLFBI (800-225-5342) or submit images or videos at FBI.gov/violence.

Feds deny Minnesota request for aid after George Floyd unrest. Walz has 30 days to appeal. Police reforms among the issues legislators expected to take up when they return to the Capitol. NYC mayor helps paint 'Black Lives Matter' outside Trump Tower. Lawyer: Over 150 Minneapolis officers seeking disability following unrest. 'We don't think we did this all right': State leaders weigh in on response to Minneapolis riots

Load-Date: July 12, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DXXXVII. POLITICIANS STRUGGLE TO EXPLAIN PANDEMIC PROTEST CONTRADICTIONS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 739 wordsByline: Michael Graham

Highlight: In New Hampshire, Republican Gov. Chris Sununu says his executive order banning gatherings of 10 people or more is still in place. He also simultaneously - and very publicly - encourages the Black Lives Matter protests in his state, with thousands crowded together on public streets. In Pennsylvania, with one of the harshest lockdowns in [...]

Body

In New Hampshire, Republican Gov. Chris Sununu says his executive order banning gatherings of 10 people or more is still in place. He also simultaneously - and very publicly - encourages the Black Lives Matter protests in his state, with thousands crowded together on public streets.

In Pennsylvania, with one of the harshest lockdowns in the country, Democratic Gov. Tom Wolf has demanded strict adherence to his stay-at-home edicts, which still ban restaurant dining or groups of 25 or more. But last Wednesday, he joined arm-in-arm with hundreds of protesters on the streets of Harrisburg, in apparent defiance of his own order.

Pressed about his apparent hypocrisy, Wolf acknowledged: "It was inconsistent, I acknowledge that. But I was trying to show support for a cause - the eradication of racism - that I think is very, very important, and I was trying to show my support for that effort."

These two governors are hardly alone. Gov. Andrew Cuomo of New York, whose state has been hit harder by the horrors of the coronavirus than any other, also went out of his way to praise Black Lives Matter protests - despite both the massive crowds of people in close quarters and the destructive violence that followed some of the protests in New York City.

The risk is so great, Cuomo says, people who attend the rallies should get tested. "I would act as if you were exposed, and I would tell people you interacted with, 'Assume I'm exposed to the virus,'" Cuomo said of the protesters. "If you were at a protest ... act responsibly, get a test."

The tidal wave of political two-stepping - decrying a family trip to the beach as potentially fatal, then urging families to flood into the streets for political protests - is feeding public cynicism about the true danger of the coronavirus. It's also raising questions about whether the severe stay-at-home strategy, which put millions out of work and cost the nation an estimated $500 billion in GDP per month, was necessary.

Even more problematic, some social observers say, is the damage this is doing to public trust in government health experts.

Former Centers for Disease Control and Prevention director Tom Frieden, for example, spent months opposing desperate business owners and their attempts to reopen the economy and save their jobs. Now, he's publicly supporting mass protests involving large crowds of shouting and chanting strangers.

Meanwhile, other health experts weigh in, such as former Food and Drug Administration Commissioner Dr. Scott Gottlieb, who says, "We're certainly going to see transmission" of coronavirus due to protests, noting a German study found 250% increase in transmission after "large outdoor gatherings."

As Jeffrey Flier, the former dean of Harvard Medical School, told Politico: "At least for me, the sudden change in views of the danger of mass gatherings has been disorienting, and I suspect it has been for many Americans."

And what will those Americans do if there's another surge in COVID-19 cases this fall or winter and the same health professionals who told them it was OK to protest suddenly announce they have to go back into lockdown?

Many observers believe Americans will simply refuse to comply.

As author and social commentator J.D. Vance puts it: "In a country of 330 million people, many will have their own causes for violating guidelines. And you can't just tell them, 'Well, you have to follow the rules because your "worthy" causes are stupid and bad.'"

Data show that the COVID-19 virus, and the lockdowns in response to it, have disproportionately hurt people of color. Black Americans have been more likely than their white counterparts to die of the virus, and they've also been more likely to lose their jobs during the shutdown.

If that trend continues - but public trust in public health policy is so eroded that it undermines future efforts to turn back another severe outbreak of the coronavirus - the tragic and unintended consequence of the protest hypocrisy could be that communities of color will suffer yet again.

Michael Graham is political editor at InsideSources.com

Adam Schuster: Public pensions are at risk of insolvency, but COVID-19 is not to blame John Kass: When Black children are killed, where's the outrage from the white and the woke? Andrea Gabor: U.S. schools must reopen - safely Noah Smith: Pandemic aid helps make the case for basic income Doyle McManus: To judge monuments, think about their meaning

Load-Date: July 12, 2020

ARTICLE DXXXVIII.

DANE MIZUTANI: WHY IS THE NFL STILL SO AFRAID TO TALK ABOUT COLIN KAEPERNICK?

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 825 wordsByline: Dane MizutaniHighlight: The NFL, including the MN Vikings, are making an effort to join the wave of Americans speaking out about racial discrimination. So why is the league hesitant to talk about Colin Kaepernick, who shone a light on the same issues in 2016?

Body

From the comfort of his basement last week, NFL commissioner Roger Goodell admitted he was wrong. He offered condolences to the families of George Floyd, Breonna Taylor and Ahmaud Arbery, and actually used the words "police brutality" in talking about their deaths.

It was a stark contrast to the stance the NFL has long taken on the social issues of racism and inequality that continue to consume parts of the country.

"It has been a difficult time for our country, in particular black people in our country," . "We, the National Football League, condemn racism and the systematic oppression of black people. We, the National Football League, admit we were wrong for not listening to NFL players earlier and encourage all to speak out and peacefully protest. We, the National Football League, believe black lives matter."

At no point did Goodell mention former San Francisco 49ers quarterback Colin Kaepernick, the man who tried to shine a light on the same social issues in 2016 by kneeling during the national anthem. He was released after the season and hasn't played in an NFL game since.

Most supporters argue that Kaepernick was absolutely good enough, and might still be good enough, to merit a spot on an NFL roster. He emerged as a star when he led the 49ers to the Super Bowl in 2012, and while his play declined in the following seasons, he still threw for 2,241 yards and 16 touchdowns in 2016, his last season in the league.

That's something the NFL is still doesn't want to talk about.

While the Vikings have emerged as a progressive team focused on pushing the conversation forward, general manager Rick Spielman had no interest in talking about Kaepernick this week.

He tried his best to sidestep the question during a Zoom call that also featured co-defensive coordinator Andre Patterson, linebacker Eric Kendricks, safety Anthony Harris and running back Ameer Abdullah.

Dane Mizutani: Why is the NFL still so afraid to talk about Colin Kaepernick?

According to Spielman, he wanted to keep the focus on the things the Vikings were doing to combat racism and inequality above anything else.

"I want to keep the football-related stuff out of this," Spielman said. "Because I don't want the message to get diluted from what we're trying to accomplish."

That answer was instantly met with a follow-up question: Isn't Kaepernick related to this, though?

"It's related, but again, our point of this conversation with everybody, and us having this press conference, is to really acknowledge what is going on in this world and why it is going on," Spielman said. "You hear the message over and over again about having difficult communications, about educating, about sitting there and listening to everybody."

That was about as far as Spielman was to go on the topic as he hurriedly finished his answer before trying to shift the conversation in a different direction. Kendricks, meanwhile, commended Kaepernick for the bravery it took to make a public stand when not many were unwilling.

"He had a much deeper understanding than even I had at that time," Kendricks said. "He put himself out there, and now it's time for everyone else to do their part. That's how I feel and that's how I am moving forward. This is something that is on my mind constantly."

Vikings coach Mike Zimmer in the past has set an expectation of standing for the national anthem. As a team, rather than kneel as a way to show solidarity following a tweet from President Donald Trump Goodell said in a video statement the Vikings decided to lock arms in which he criticized protests during the national anthem.

It raises the question: What if a Vikings player decides to kneel this season?

"Internally, we haven't even discussed anything like that," Spielman said. "I know that our ownership, coach Zimmer, myself, and our entire staff have this type of relationship where we can work side by side with each other because the common goal is the same."

While the Vikings haven't talked about anything as a team yet, Kendricks said he anticipates more NFL players protesting in some capacity this season.

Money, market, ideal fit? Pat Mahomes got it all in Kansas City NFL to play Black anthem before national anthem, source says Expect to see Vikings rookie Justin Jefferson in slot 'quite a bit' next season How will Vikings' Andre Patterson, Adam Zimmer balance roles as co-defensive coordinators? Vikings' Ifeadi Odenigbo says game day brings out the black swan in him

As for Abdullah, he knelt during the national anthem when he was a member of the Detroit Lions, describing it as a way to raise awareness. The key, he said, is following raising awareness with taking action.

"There's a difference between knowledge and wisdom," said Abdullah, likening knowledge to knowing a tomato is a fruit, and wisdom is knowing not to put one in a fruit salad. "It's time to turn our knowledge into wisdom, which is application toward really changing systems, toward changing the minds, and toward educating people."

That's what Kaepernick was trying to do all along.

Dane Mizutani: Why is the NFL still so afraid to talk about Colin Kaepernick?

Load-Date: July 12, 2020

End of Document

Rosario: To make things better, we need to see ourselves or our loved ones in George Floyd

ARTICLE DXXXIX. ROSARIO: TO MAKE THINGS BETTER, WE NEED TO SEE OURSELVES OR OUR LOVED ONES IN GEORGE FLOYD

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1219 words

Byline: Rubén Rosario

Highlight: The ping from the phone, which came in at 9:36 a.m. on the morning of Tuesday, May 26, 2020, woke me up.

Body

The ping from the phone, which came in at 9:36 a.m. on the morning of Tuesday, May 26, 2020, woke me up.

"Good morning," began the text from Tony Spencer, a retired St. Paul police officer. "You tracking this video out of Minneapolis from yesterday. Ugly and tragic results."

I had no clue.

"What video?" I texted back.

He texted moments later a video clip. I then saw what we all have seen - George Floyd dying as a Minneapolis police officer kept his left knee on the handcuffed, face-down, prone 46-year-old man's neck for 8 minutes and 46 seconds at the corner of 38th Street and Chicago Avenue while bystanders pleaded for Floyd's life.

No words.

"The video is disgusting," texted Spencer, a veteran cop who left the force he loved after calling out and then testifying against fellow cops involved in injuries sustained by Frank Baker of St. Paul. Baker, then 52-years old, suffered two collapsed lungs, seven broken ribs and police-dog bites in 2016 after he was mistaken for an armed black suspect.

"That suspect (Floyd) is in his custody and CARE," Spencer added in his text the morning of May 26. "When cops lose the ability to see the humanity in the work they do, they need to get out of that line of work ... "

Floyd died and those moved and angered by what they saw took to the streets to demand change. His death sparked weeks of angry protests as well as riots and looting in the Twin Cities, the nation and other parts of the world. We saw the Twin Cities first in righteous anger and mourning. We then saw the Twin

Rosario: To make things better, we need to see ourselves or our loved ones in George Floyd

Cities burning in the aftermath, the work of arsonists and rioters mostly tied to political extremists and agitators.

There were 41 shots in the Bronx in 1999, 16 shots in Chicago in 2014. Now, in 2020, another tragic number - 8 minutes, 46 seconds - was added to mark the death of another black man at the hands of police. Murals and paintings bearing George Floyd's face sprang up, from the Minneapolis street corner where he was killed to his likeness drawn on the wall of a destroyed home in Idlib, Syria. It bears the words: "I cannot breathe."

Derek Chauvin, the 19-year veteran who ignored pleas by bystanders to get off Floyd's neck, is now facing second-degree murder charges that carry up to 40 years in prison if he's convicted. Three other officers on the scene who did nothing to prevent Floyd's death have been charged with aiding and abetting felony murder.

Sources said there was preliminary discussion on a proposal that would have had Chauvin plead to a murder-related charge. In return, the feds would drop any prosecution. But federal authorities ultimately balked at such a deal the Thursday following Floyd's death.

"I can neither confirm nor deny," said Minnesota Attorney General Keith Ellison, whose office is prosecuting the officers.

Minneapolis civil rights attorney Robert Bennett believes there is a decades-long entrenched police culture - enabled by its police union - in Minneapolis that has resisted true reform in how it polices communities of color. It is a cancer he feels needs to be excised before another George Floyd happens.

"They haven't learned a goddamn thing," said Bennett, who has successfully represented in civil court a long string of lawsuits about police excessive force and wrongful deaths filed on behalf of surviving family members who felt they were denied justice in the criminal justice system.

"It's been a problem department since before I started practice in 1976," the former college wrestler told me recently. "It goes back through all the chiefs from Bouza, Laux, Olson, McManus, Dolan, Harteau and they weren't able to control or stop it. And (St. Antonio police chief William) McManus, the only one that came from outside, they ran him out of town on a rail ... "

Bennett won a $3 million settlement in 2013 for the family of David Smith, a mentally ill man who died of asphyxia in police custody after he was restrained face down with a knee to his mid-back at a downtown Minneapolis YMCA facility.

Watching the Floyd video was "like deja vu all over again," Bennett said.

In April 2017, he won a record $2 million settlement against the city of St. Paul in the Frank Baker case, though he praises its current police chief, Todd Axtell, for his leadership in disciplining cops who have broken the law or violated policy. The Sainly City's force has enjoyed a kinder and gentler reputation than its contemporaries across the river.

Two months later, Bennett secured a $2.995-million settlement with the city of St. Anthony, a St. Paul suburb, in connection with the 2016 fatal shooting of Philando Castile during a traffic stop, an incident that was live-streamed on Facebook by Castile's girlfriend.

Rosario: To make things better, we need to see ourselves or our loved ones in George Floyd

The settlement was reached less than two weeks after a St. Paul jury acquitted Jeronimo Yanez, the St. Anthony police officer who killed Castile, of manslaughter and other charges.

Bennett, however, is better known as the attorney who won a record $20 million settlement against the city of Minneapolis on behalf of the family of Justine Ruszczyk. The unarmed, pajama-clad white Australian woman was fatally shot by Minneapolis police officer Mohamed Noor after she approached a police squad car to report a possible sexual assault in the alleyway behind her fiance's home.

Noor, who is of Somali descent, became the first police officer in Minnesota history to be convicted of murder and sentenced to prison. The first was an officer of color, a reality not lost on black community advocates who have seen a string of white officers either not charged or acquitted in controversial cases over the years.

It is likely that unrest could also follow if the Floyd family receives significantly less than the amount negotiated in the Ruszczyk case.

"They should get no less than that ($20 million)," Bennett said. "That should be the floor. That police department needs to be dismantled. But I don't know how it can be done. The culture there is screwed up. It's like their DNA is missing a few genes."

It is ironic that the city's current police chief, Medaria "Rondo" Arradondo, may be its most progressive and reform-minded yet, a Minneapolis native and police veteran who has received praise from black community leaders and others for rebuilding trust.

Back to Spencer.

I texted after watching the Floyd video that morning that I strongly believe that if Floyd looked like someone in Chauvin's family or someone he could relate to, the arrest for the alleged crime of passing a $20 counterfeit bill at a grocery store would not have resulted in a death sentence.

"Sadly, you are correct," the 20-year police veteran replied. "When I first started as a reserve officer at SPPD that was drilled into your head by the Vietnam vets - treat people here as you would want your family members treated in similar situations."

Significant change will not take place until all of us - particularly those we put in power to tackle racial disparities in policing, education, housing, employment - really see themselves or their loved ones in Floyd.

We need to feel in our hearts and minds what it is like to be handcuffed, lying face down, helpless, a knee to our neck for nearly nine minutes, pleading that we cannot breath, crying out for our mothers as our life agonizingly leaves us on a street corner that is now considered revered ground.

Load-Date: July 12, 2020

ARTICLE DXL. MINNEAPOLIS POLICE EARLY WARNING SYSTEM STUMBLES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 11, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 573 wordsByline: LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The program has been revived, however, as part of a series of MPD reforms.Body

When former Minneapolis police chief Janeé Harteau invited the U.S. Justice Department to review her department in 2014, the resulting report proposed developing an early warning system to flag problem officers and get them help before they misbehave.

Harteau characterized its findings as "progressive steps we can take to enhance our community relationships and increase public trust and accountability." But the effort, called the Early Intervention System, or EIS, had fallen off course and appeared to be an afterthought.

But some version of it appears to be revived in the wake of George Floyd's killing, raising questions about whether the former officer charged with Floyd's death should have been on the department's radar.

On Wednesday, as part of two new reform initiatives, Police Chief Medaria Arradondo said the department will evaluate officer performance data "so that department leaders can identify early warning signs of misconduct and provide proven strategies to intervene." He said similar efforts haven't worked because studies found that supervisory action regarding problematic officers "is very rare and significantly absent" in large departments."

To create its early warning system, the city will likely work with Chicago-based Benchmark Analytics. CEO Ron Huberman said he began speaking with Arradondo close to a year ago, but their discussions about becoming partners accelerated after Floyd's death.

Details of the agreement are still being finalized, Huberman said.

The program's relaunch is the latest in a series of internal reforms since the launch of a state civil rights investigation of the MPD's policies and practices.

Since Floyd's death, Officer Derek Chauvin's 19-year MPD career has been dissected and his actions leading to the May 25 death examined in part to determine whether authorities had missed warning signs. Personnel records and past news accounts show he was involved with several police shootings and had accumulated both commendations and more than 15 conduct complaints in his time with the department. Almost all the complaints were closed without discipline, records show. Whether Chauvin or the three other officers present during Floyd's death might have come to the attention of supervisors is not known.

Minneapolis police early warning system stumbles

Retired assistant police chief Kris Arneson doubts it, saying that even if the EIS were up and running, it wasn't intended to be retroactive and thus might not have flagged an officer like Chauvin, whose last complaint was lodged in 2015.

"If an officer was flagged for having so many punches in a year, or slaps or whatever it is, or if it was a critical incident, then we would set up tools to help that employee," said Arneson, the former assistant chief. "It could be training, a performance improvement plan, mentoring, any kind of mental or psychological testing, counseling, peer support."

The MPD continues to deal with the fallout from Floyd's death, which resulted in widespread protests, looting and arson.

In an e-mail to officers over the weekend, Arradondo commended his officers, saying they had "experienced more in the past two weeks than probably at any other time in the history of the MPD or arguably policing in our nation." He also sought to soothe concerns about growing calls for "defunding" the police department, while adding that more changes were on the way.

Staff writer Liz Navratil contributed to this report.

Libor Jany · 612-673-4064 Twitter: @StribJany

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

ARTICLE DXLI. MPD CHIEF TARGETS NEEDED REFORMS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 11, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 12ALength: 602 wordsHighlight: Arradondo's call for community policing is welcome, but union chief stands in the way of progress.Body

Declaring that "race is inextricably a part of the American policing system," Minneapolis police chief Medaria Arradondo on Wednesday announced the first in a series of smart, major changes in the way his department operates.

"We will never evolve in this profession if we don't address it head-on. Communities of color have paid the price for this, especially with their lives," Arradondo said during a news conference that drew national attention.

Arradondo wisely targeted provisions in the city's contract with its police union and expressed well-placed frustration with an arbitration system that makes it so difficult to weed out problem cops. "... There is nothing more debilitating to an employment matter from a chief's perspective, that when you have grounds to terminate an officer for misconduct and you're dealing with a third-party mechanism that allows for that employee to not only be back at the department, but to be patrolling in your communities," he said.

Arradondo's call for much-needed change comes following the Memorial Day death of George Floyd while in police custody. Officially ruled a homicide, the killing has resulted in widespread peaceful protests following rioting in Minneapolis and St. Paul and other U.S. cities. Officer Derek Chauvin, who was captured on video with his knee on Floyd's neck, has since been charged with manslaughter and murder, and three other officers are charged with aiding and abetting.

Arradondo said he is determined to get back to community policing and rebuild citizen trust to be on the "right side of history." Rightly recognizing that some contractual arbitration provisions are barriers, the chief said he is withdrawing from current contract negotiations with the Minneapolis Police Federation, the union that represents about 800 officers.

Instead of continuing talks, he will bring in advisers to help restructure the contracts for greater transparency and major changes - such as including an early warning system to flag officer misconduct using real-time data and research. The city's most recent three-year contract with officers expired on Dec. 31, 2019, but until there is a new pact terms remain in place.

MPD chief targets needed reforms

Salary and benefits are not at issue. Rather, Arradondo said, major change is needed in supervisory roles, use of force and the disciplinary processes, including grievances and arbitration. He added that he will continuously roll out more plans for reform and hold additional news conferences to discuss them.

Mayor Jacob Frey told reporters Wednesday that he supports the chief's new approach. He said outside advisers will review the existing contract and suggest amendments. And, "if there are road blockages that are extra contractual, like state law," they can help identify those as well, Frey said. The MPD is being investigated by the state Human Rights Department. As part of that probe, the state has given the city until July to provide a list of laws or other factors that are impeding its ability to discipline officers.

Meanwhile, one of the major obstacles to needed reform and contract changes has said little publicly in recent days after sending a letter to union members. Union president Lt. Bob Kroll told officers that they were being made "scapegoats" for rioting and that he was working with the union's attorney to help the four fired officers get their jobs back.

That response is in keeping with Kroll's record. He has consistently exercised poor leadership and been more harmful than helpful to police-community relations for years. Kroll's members should finally recognize his shortcomings and find a new leader.

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

Mpls. pulls back from talks with its police union

ARTICLE DXLII. MPLS. PULLS BACK FROM TALKS WITH ITS POLICE UNION

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 11, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1A

Length: 1199 words

Byline: LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

The city of Minneapolis is withdrawing from labor negotiations with the powerful police union, the latest step by officials to restore faith in the beleaguered department as demands for law enforcement accountability and reform sweep the country in the wake of George Floyd's death.

Police Chief Medaria Arradondo revealed the move before talks were scheduled to resume after a hiatus due to the COVID-19 pandemic. It's among the first steps he pledged to take to restore community trust, along with renewing an initiative to identify potentially problem officers in time to intervene.

"I need to, as chief, step away from the table with the Minneapolis Police Federation and really take a deep dive in terms of how we can do something that has historically been something that is in the way of progress, that I've been hearing from many in our city," Arradondo said. "It's time that we have to evolve."

In a news conference Wednesday morning, Arradondo also made his most forceful comments yet about the role of race and the criminal justice system, saying leaders can no longer afford to shy away from difficult conversations.

"Race is inextricably a part of the American policing system," he said, reminding reporters that he and several other black officers once sued the department for what they saw as unfair treatment. "We will never evolve in this profession if we don't address it head on. Communities of color have paid the heaviest of costs, and that's with their lives. And our children must be safeguarded from ever having to be treated to the horrific and shameful chapter in this country's history.

Lt. Bob Kroll, the normally outspoken president of the union that represents more than 800 Minneapolis and park police officers, has kept quiet publicly since Floyd's May 25 death, which sparked widespread unrest and new calls for racial justice and police reform. Officer Derek Chauvin has since been charged with manslaughter and murder, and three other officers present charged with aiding and abetting.

Mpls. pulls back from talks with its police union

But Kröll criticized the city's handling of the rioting that engulfed parts of the city for several days in a letter to his membership last week, telling officers they were being made "scapegoats" for the continued violence. He did not respond to messages seeking comment.

While Arradondo announced his intention to step away from the negotiating table, the exact mechanics of what that entails weren't immediately clear on Wednesday.

Gov. Tim Walz said last week that he sees the federation as "where a major problem in this issue lies." The governor announced that he supports a large slate of criminal justice reform ideas that the Legislature's People of Color and Indigenous Caucus has developed. They include changes to everything from law enforcement oversight to training to investigation of officer-involved deaths. Walz said addressing police use of force will be his top priority when legislators meet for a special session starting Friday.

"I think we have to tackle what scares people the most," Walz said. He also said the state needs to look at ending binding arbitration, which allows an officer who is disciplined to appeal that decision to an arbitrator. Some legislators have said it protects "bad apples" and prevents them from being fired.

Expired contract

For months, rank-and-file officers for the city and park police departments have been working under a contract that expired Jan 1. Negotiations were postponed when the COVID-19 pandemic hit, with the idea of resuming talks sometime in late spring or early summer.

Local reform groups such as Communities United Against Police Brutality have long maintained that hurdles to reform are baked into the union contract and argued that community members should have a seat at the negotiating table. Arradondo's comments signaled the city would consider that route, but he didn't offer further details on how such an arrangement would work.

Arradondo said he is not concerned about salaries and benefits but "significant" aspects of the contract like use of force, the role supervisors play, and the discipline process, including grievances and arbitration.

One of the more contentious clauses in the current contract is the provision that allows officers who are accused of on-the-job misconduct to go on paid administrative leave. The amount of time an officer is on leave varies, but some spend several weeks, and even months, at home, still collecting their paychecks, which critics say sends the message that officers accused of crossing the line won't face serious consequences. In one notable case, an officer who was initially suspended for improper behavior spent nearly 10 months on leave and was paid $54,450.53, before being fired, city records show.

Arradondo on Wednesday declined to say whether Kröll's removal from union representation would affect his efforts toward reform, but he reiterated his frustration with the difficulty in firing problem officers.

He also promised a new internal "real time" data-based accountability system "so that department leaders can identify early warning signs of misconduct and provide proven strategies to intervene." He said similar efforts haven't worked in the past because studies found that supervisory action regarding problematic officers "is very rare and significantly absent" in large departments. His predecessor, Janeé Harteau, tried to implement a similar Early Intervention System in 2015, at the urging of federal authorities, but the effort appeared to never take off.

Mpls. pulls back from talks with its police union

Sweeping changes

Arradondo's announcement, which was followed by support and a similar pledge by Mayor Jacob Frey, inspired a fresh round of finger-pointing over who is to blame for the department's problems.

Council Member Steve Fletcher quickly criticized the two leaders' proposal, calling it an overstep of the city's authority and an effort by Frey to "grab some positive press."

"Announcing they're withdrawing from negotiations is what everyone wants to hear - but it's actually not within our legal right to do," said Fletcher, a longtime department critic. "As a public employer, we have a duty to negotiate. This subjects us to an unfair labor practices lawsuit."

In a statement, Frey responded, "There are valid reasons for a party to step away from bargaining." He added, "I'm not going to engage in mudslinging and finger-pointing while I'm focused on helping our city move forward and deliver meaningful, structural reforms." Over the past week, nine council members have called for the dismantling of the beleaguered police force, starting with scaling back its $194 million budget.

Wednesday's announcement was the latest in a series of proposed internal changes since the launch of a state civil rights investigation of the Police Department's policies and practices. Last week, Minneapolis banned chokeholds and neck restraints and strengthened requirements for officers to intervene if they see a colleague use improper force, under a deal negotiated between the city and the state. The agreement has since been signed off on by a judge.

Staff writers Liz Navratil, Andy Mannix and Jessie Van Berkel contributed to this report.

Libor Jany · 612-673-4064 Twitter: @StribJany

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

ARTICLE DXLIII. REDEFINING PUBLIC SAFETY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 11, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 13ALength: 720 wordsByline: PETER BUTTE, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Three practical questions we must ask ourselves // Police officers aren't best-suited for every situation, but they're who people call.Body

During my career as a police officer, I responded to numerous calls for service that made me question why a police officer was the appropriate resource assigned to respond and intervene. I was expected to be a medic, a counselor, a mediator and a street lawyer, among many other things.

The unfortunate truth is that people call the police when they don't know who else to call. As noble as it may be for our front-line officers to try and fulfill all of society's needs, it isn't practical or appropriate. Before we become divided about the controversial efforts to defund the Minneapolis Police Department, let's delve into what the effort could actually look like in practice.

Defunding the police should be referred to as refunding the community. It is not intended to be an overnight process. Reallocating resources, rethinking criminal-justice structures, and more accurately defining the role of a police officer, while differentiating it from the numerous other critical support roles in the community, is an opportunity to develop a sustainable model for both public safety and social support.

As our community continues the discussion about defunding the police, here are three important questions we must ask ourselves in order to both redefine the role of a police officer and identify resources better suited to address community concerns that fall outside the purview of the police.

First, what role do we want police officers to play in our day-to-day lives? This is a question of balancing resources. What services are indispensable? What police functions could be done more efficiently? Could we capitalize on technology to assist in gathering crime data, freeing up officers to focus on community engagement, abandoning an outdated "broken windows" theory of policing?

Second, and more broadly, we must consider what responsibility police officers have to provide public safety. There are certainly times when we need police officers to ensure safety and security. What does that look like for each community? Do the police officers who respond to a neighbor dispute need to be the same police officers who respond to an active-shooter situation? Could we specialize small groups of officers with very limited and well-defined authority to use force? How can we visually and psychologically differentiate between officers serving in a safety and security function, and those serving in a community-support function?

REDEFINING PUBLIC SAFETY

Third, for each function we remove from police authority, we must identify a suitable replacement. In a world of limited resources, smart and strategic investment is crucial. Some agencies have taken important first steps. In St. Paul, the Police Department engaged in a pilot program teaming up social workers and patrol officers to respond to calls in teams. The St. Cloud Police Department has started positioning community outposts in high-crime areas. These types of community police reform strategies could be taken a step further to build community-support structures that provided needed access to independent resources.

It's worth noting these three questions are not independent of one another. For instance, traffic enforcement is a major focus of many police agencies. It serves a public-safety purpose, but also is the most frequent type of police-citizen contact. There is overlap, but recognizing and identifying what role we want police officers to fulfill, and what role is necessary, is an important first step in developing novel police practices.

Finally, aside from reconstructing the policing machine, we cannot discount the good police officers in our community. These officers are uniquely aware of the intricacies of the communities they serve. There must be partnership with police departments because, at least initially, police officers will continue to be the default eyes and ears of our communities. Long-term changes will be incremental and take a generation or more to fully take hold. A strong partnership with good cops, coupled with access to additional and diverse resources, will help facilitate the transition.

Peter Butte, of Forest Lake, is a criminal prosecutor and former Minnesota police officer.

BETTER TO OUTSOURCE MINNEAPOLIS POLICING?

A commentary published as an online extra on Wednesday explores the idea. To read it, see startribune.com/opinion.

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

Legislators announce police reform priorities, including changes to use of deadly force law

ARTICLE DXLIV. LEGISLATORS ANNOUNCE POLICE REFORM PRIORITIES, INCLUDING CHANGES TO USE OF DEADLY FORCE LAW

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1057 words

Byline: Mara H. Gottfried

Highlight: Minnesota legislators on Thursday announced a set of police reform and accountability measures as the world's attention has been focused on the state since the death last month of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody. The proposals include changes to the state's law for when officers can use deadly force and more oversight of police. [...]

Body

Minnesota legislators on Thursday announced a set of police reform and accountability measures as the world's attention has been focused on the state since the death last month of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody.

The proposals include changes to the state's law for when officers can use deadly force and more oversight of police.

"Minnesotans have raised their voice - the last three weeks have been some of the most tumultuous and painful in Minnesota's history," said Gov. Tim Walz on Thursday. "They have come to the Capitol with the expectation of change."

A special session of the Legislature starts on Friday. Democratic proposals are based on (POCI), and a state working group on police-involved deadly force encounters.

For years, POCI legislators have been calling for "the systemic changes where the angst and the pain that came out of George Floyd's murder could have been prevented," Walz said.

"They're not new, but they carry the weight of this historic moment," added Lt. Gov. Peggy Flanagan. "I hope that this time is different and that our legislators not only hear these proposals, but finally act on them."

The House of Representatives is Democrat controlled; leaders in the Republican-majority Senate plan on Friday to preview bills that are being introduced.

There were nearly 20 proposals, as of Thursday, scheduled to be heard in the on Saturday.

Legislators announce police reform priorities, including changes to use of deadly force law

"We can't just ban chokeholds and make the duty-to-intervene (for officers) that's already policy in 81 of 87 counties the law of the entire state and then pat ourselves on the back as though we've done something," said House Speaker Melissa Hortman, DFL-Brooklyn Park. "Minnesotans are asking us to be big and bold and make systemic change."

Among the matters that legislators are slated to discuss during Saturday's House committee hearing:

A proposal would change state law to say police can use deadly force to protect an officer or others from death or great bodily harm when it's "imminent" versus the current wording of "apparent."

New language would be added to say it's the Legislature's intent "that peace officers use deadly force only when necessary in defense of human life," among other modifications.

There would be an independent investigation unit created in the Bureau of Criminal Apprehension for police-involved cases.

The Minnesota attorney general would have independent jurisdiction to make decisions about charging officers and prosecuting them, rather than county attorney's offices recommendations from the Minnesota People of Color and Indigenous Caucus House public safety committee.

The Department of Public Safety would create an Office of Community-Led Public Safety Coordination to administer grants "to community-based violence-intervenor and problem solvers to intercept violence and reduce interactions with law enforcement," according to a summary.

The office would also provide funding for policing that pairs officers with social workers to respond to crisis calls.

"What we're trying to envision is what does public safety look like?," Walz said. "What we want to see is that people are safe in their community, what we want to see is that crimes are reduced. ... A lot of this happens on the front end, it happens with economics, it happens with education."

There would be more civilians and diverse people added to the membership of the Minnesota Board of Peace Officers Standards and Training (POST).

A Police-Community Relations Council would be formed that would review civilian-initiated police misconduct complaints filed to the board, and make disciplinary and policy recommendations.

Law enforcement agencies would submit information about complaints and discipline of officers, which would be monitored for patterns of misconduct.

"We have this incredible power of a licensing board," said Rep. Carlos Mariani, DFL-St. Paul, who chairs the public safety committee. "... If you're a teacher in this state and you do something bad to a young person, your license is gone, like fast. ... We have almost the opposite here. ... Our goal is to be able to create that within the existing structures and strengthen them."

Officers would be mandated to get more training in the areas of de-escalation and mental health crisis intervention. Training would be added that would focus "on ensuring safer interactions between peace officers and persons with autism," according to a proposal.

"Warrior-style" training would be prohibited.

Legislators announce police reform priorities, including changes to use of deadly force law

"Many of us find it an incredibly insidious approach to the professional policing that basically encourages and condones deadly force," Mariani said, pointing out that former St. Anthony police officer Jeronimo Yanez, who fatally shot Philando Castile, had taken a "warrior-style" training class.

St. Paul and Minneapolis would be allowed to add residency requirements for officers.

"I think we want to have law enforcement officers that know our community, I think that we want them to be active in our community," said Assistant Minority Leader Sen. Jeff Hayden, DFL-Minneapolis.

A person convicted of a felony would have their right to vote restored when they complete incarceration or after sentencing, if they're not locked up.

Rep. Jamie Becker-Finn, DFL-Roseville, said she's heard people ask how that fits in with police reform. She said it's key because the work that's underway is dependent on government, boards and commissions.

"The way that we hold government accountable is through our votes," Becker-Finn said. "Voter disenfranchisement is a way of allowing some folks to have power at the expense of others."

House Minority Leader Kurt Daudt, R-Crown, said in a Thursday statement: "Democrats added felon voting to the agenda for Saturday's eight hour hearing, but have so far ignored Rep. Pat Garofalo's bill that would help Police Departments get rid of bad cops. If Democrats are serious about working on real reforms, they need to put every option on the table - even ones that might make their union campaign contributors uncomfortable."

Day services will open again Monday for people with disabilities Trump rips private Texas border wall built by North Dakota company Robert Mueller defends Russia probe, says Roger Stone remains a felon Trump wears mask in public for first time during pandemic Feds deny Minnesota request for aid after George Floyd unrest. Walz has 30 days to appeal.

Load-Date: July 12, 2020

For Somali-owned businesses damaged in riots, relief effort takes off

ARTICLE DXLV. FOR SOMALI-OWNED BUSINESSES DAMAGED IN RIOTS, RELIEF EFFORT TAKES OFF

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 582 words

Byline: Iain Carlos

Body

Mowlid Jigre heard gunshots as he left Jigjiga Business Center two days after the killing of George Floyd. He worried the chaos that had swallowed a stretch of East Lake Street less than a mile away would reach Jigjiga soon, and he was right: When he returned the next morning the building had been ransacked.

Jigjiga houses a number of Somali-owned businesses that saw substantial looting in the riots, including Z Dress Fashion, Kollege Koffee, the Somali Museum of Minnesota and Ace Insurance Agency. Jigre, whose father owns Jigjiga, created a GoFundMe page in the days that followed aimed at supporting them, saying he believes the Somali community is integral to the city of Minneapolis and ought to be protected. So far the effort has raised more than $100,000.

When Jigjiga was hit early in the morning May 28, Z Dress Fashion and Kollege Koffee, both owned by Ziyad Abdi, had their windows and doors broken and goods stolen, costing Abdi an estimated $150,000. As his businesses are uninsured and his savings were depleted during the Covid-19 crisis, it'll take him five to seven years to get his businesses operating at pre-pandemic capacity, he said. While the GoFundMe page won't make him whole, he appreciates it.

For Somali-owned businesses damaged in riots, relief effort takes off

The Somali Museum of Minnesota had all of its windows smashed and many items stolen from its gift shop. These items weren't run-of-the-mill souvenirs - they were handmade by Somali weaving artists and were uninsured. The damage is particularly stinging because the museum is the only one in the United States exclusively dedicated to Somali history and culture, said Director of Communications and Media Amal Mohamed.

The losses could have been worse. The museum's staff removed some of its most valuable artifacts before Jigjiga was hit, and those that remained were left unmolested.

Though a major setback for the museum, Mohamed said the damage is relatively insignificant considering Minneapolis's current climate. "I believe that lives aren't replaceable, things are," Mohamed said.

Ace Insurance Agency also had its windows smashed, Jigre said. Its owner could not be reached for comment.

Jigre's GoFundMe page has received donations from Minneapolis's Somali community, but also from non-Somali Minneapolitans. It's even received donations from abroad, which has helped lift Jigre's spirits, he said.

"At first I was kinda ticked off," Jigre said. "But the more days that went on, I realized there's a lot of good people still left. Of course there's always bad people out there, but I feel like the good people outweigh them by a lot."

Originally, Jigre was planning to equally distribute donations to businesses, but is now trying to determine how to distribute funds according to the extent of damage each business sustained, he said. He is in the process of looking for more Somali-owned businesses in Minneapolis that need help.

While the riots damaged Jigjiga and the businesses it housed, Jigre, who participated in the protests himself, believes the majority of protestors weren't trying to damage property, but simply advocate for a better Minneapolis, a cause worth fighting for, he said.

"Don't look at us like we're all in the same boat and don't look at us like we're supporting the riots - we were supporting George Floyd," Jigre said. "I feel like Minneapolis came together as a community after George Floyd, and I'm hoping to see change now."

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

A low-key opening day for MOA

ARTICLE DXLVI. A LOW-KEY OPENING DAY FOR MOA

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 11, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 609 wordsByline: JOHN EWOLDT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Only about 150 of the mall's 500 stores were available to shoppers on Wednesday.Body

Raekwon Martin of Bloomington drove to Mall of America on Wednesday morning to be part of its reopening after 11 weeks of being closed because of COVID-19 and then the unrest after George Floyd's death in Minneapolis police custody.

"I wanted to catch my shopping before everyone else," he said. "I'm used to coming here every week, but during the last few months, I have grown used to disappointment. It feels good to be here again and beat the wave."

With only about 150 of the mall's 500 stores open on Wednesday, many customers were likely to find favorite stores still closed. Macy's opened last week and Nordstrom opens Thursday, but Nickelodeon Universe, many food-court restaurants, Sea Life and CMX movie theaters remain closed. An increasing number of retailers are expected to open each day.

On a normal day, the mall would expect about 150,000 visitors, but Jill Renslow, senior vice president of business development, expects far fewer than that initially.

"Parking spaces have been reduced by 50%, and that should keep the number of mall visitors at about 35% capacity," she said.

Ramp spaces on levels five through seven have been closed in some wings. The east surface lot on 82nd Street and 24th Avenue is closed. The south-side surface lot and a part of the north-side lot near Ikea is closed.

Face masks are not required to enter the mall, but some retailers in the mall are requiring them before entry.

The most popular destinations were easily discovered. Many shoppers thought the mall opened at 10, but stores did not open until 11. Mall doors open at 8 a.m., and stores close at 7 p.m. daily.

A low-key opening day for MOA

The line at JD Sports stretched to about 50 people as it opened at 11. Andrew Tran of Eagan got in line at 8 a.m. to nab a pair of just-released athletic shoes, the Air Jordan 1 Royal Toe.

"With so many stores closed, I have a good chance of finally getting them," he said. "It helps to be first in line."

JD store employees were distributing slips of paper for customers to write down their shoe size. Only two customers were allowed in the store at a time for safe distancing.

Martin Hallkvist, owner of Scandinavian North, couldn't open his store Wednesday because he couldn't round up enough employees to work. The mall gave store owners only a few days' notice regarding the reopening.

"All of my five employees are eager to come back, but they needed more than five days' notice," he said. "Our customer demographic is a bit older so I think our traffic will be down 80% initially. I feel blessed for the government assistance to be able to reopen."

MOA neighbor Ikea reopened earlier in the week.

Several shoppers in line to check out said they had tried to "click and collect" their order at Ikea's website, but the time slots were always full. The company has become a target of social media complaints about its slow adoption of e-commerce.

Orders have been canceled, phone lines are busy and home-delivery waits are three to five weeks. With slots opening up for click and collect at midnight, only night owls were able to nab time slots for pickup.

To check to see if a Mall of America retailer is open, go to MallofAmerica.com. The site also lists retailers offering curbside pickup, which has moved to level one east and west parking ramps. About 25 retailers participate.

Malls were able to open in mid-May, but because of its size, MOA was planning to take some extra time to figure out the logistics. The week before the planned opening George Floyd died in Minneapolis police custody, and the ensuing protests and unrest had MOA postponing opening plans again.

The Twin Cities metro's other malls are open as well.

John Ewoldt · 612-673-7633

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

Feds offer $10K reward for couple who fled after being ID'd in St. Paul arsons

ARTICLE DXLVII. FEDS OFFER $10K REWARD FOR COUPLE WHO FLED AFTER BEING ID'D IN ST. PAUL ARSONS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 277 words

Byline: Emma Harville

Highlight: The U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives is offering two rewards of up to $5,000 each for information leading to the arrest of a couple suspected in St. Paul arson fires that ensued in the civil unrest following the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody. A man, Jose Felan Jr., was [...]

Body

The U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives is offering two rewards of up to $5,000 each for information leading to the arrest of a couple suspected in St. Paul arson fires that ensued in the civil unrest following the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody.

A man, Jose Felan Jr., was identified by the public when the ATF first offered a reward last week in fires that included one at Gordon Parks High School on University Avenue. A video identifying Felan caused him and his girlfriend, Mena Dyaha Yousif, to evade law enforcement. They are believed to be traveling south.

Felan has previously been convicted of drug offenses, burglary and assault.

"We're asking the public to be on the lookout for the couple along the Interstate 35 corridor," Special Agent William Henderson said in a statement. "If you see them, contact ATF with their whereabouts."

Anyone with information regarding the location of Felan or Yousif is asked to contact the ATF by emailing ATFTips@atf.gov or through www.ReportIt.com. Information can also be submitted by calling 1-888-283-8477.

ATF has partnered with the St. Paul Police Department, Minnesota State Fire Marshal Division, FBI and District of Minnesota U.S. Attorney's Office to resolve this case.

Woman in car killed, child cut by glass in North Minneapolis shooting Police shoot, wound man in Robbinsdale; BCA investigating White Bear Lake man connected to Minneapolis shooting charged with illegally possessing firearm Plymouth man charged with bludgeoning his grandmother to death with a wrench St. Paul man sentenced to 30 years for fatally shooting young father and injuring 4-year-old

Feds offer $10K reward for couple who fled after being ID'd in St. Paul arsons

Graphic

Jose Felan, Jr., left, and Mena Dyaha Yousif. (Courtesy photos)

Load-Date: July 12, 2020

End of Document

From points far and near, donations surge to state

ARTICLE DXLVIII. FROM POINTS FAR AND NEAR, DONATIONS SURGE TO STATE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 11, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1A

Length: 1111 words

Byline: KELLY SMITH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

Donations from outside of Minnesota are flooding Twin Cities nonprofits in a surge of giving after the death of George Floyd and the riots that destroyed parts of Minneapolis and St. Paul.

Organizations that were looted or burned, or that work with racial justice issues, have seen an unusual uptick in out-of-state donations as the Twin Cities remain the epicenter of a global outcry over Floyd's death at the hands of Minneapolis police.

Local foundations and nonprofits also have launched rebuilding funds. On Wednesday, the Pohlada family, the owner of the Twins, announced it was dedicating $25 million to racial justice, partnering with organizations to address inequities.

More than $8 million has streamed in on the fundraising website GiveMN, mostly from out-of-state donors - more money in the past two weeks than all the money given during March, April and most of May to help nonprofits during the COVID-19 pandemic.

"It's incredible that the support is coming in and it's going to need to continue," said Jake Blumberg, who heads GiveMN. "It's really heartening ... the response has been so significant."

But about 85% of donations on GiveMN's site the past two weeks are from outside of Minnesota - the opposite of what the site typically sees. The average donation is smaller, about $45, three times less than the average amount on GiveMN's Give to the Max Day, the largest giving day in the state each year.

Like the influx of giving for COVID-19 relief, Blumberg said, the increase in giving to organizations such as the Little Earth Residents Association, which is providing food and resources to the American Indian community, and media organization Unicorn Riot is a "disaster reaction, too."

The Minnesota Freedom Fund, which pays bail bonds, didn't do any organizing campaign, and yet the small Minneapolis nonprofit has drawn $30 million from more than 900,000 donors, mostly outside of Minnesota thanks in part to celebrities such as Justin Timberlake and Steve Carell promoting it. The average donation: just $41.

From points far and near, donations surge to state

One of those distant donors is Lea Klein of Los Angeles. Though far from the Minnesota protests, she was moved to help, contributing to the Minnesota Freedom Fund.

"It's the heart of the George Floyd protests," Klein said of Minnesota. "If there's any injustice in the U.S. it affects everyone."

Steve Boland, treasurer for the nonprofit, said "It's stunning to see that kind of thing. Donors ... came to us."

At one point, the nonprofit was so overwhelmed by donations that it asked people to send money to other groups. Boland said people across the country have felt compelled to do something to create change in Minneapolis after Floyd's death. Since arrests have subsided, he said the Minnesota Freedom Fund will use donations for a campaign to end cash bail in Minnesota.

In St. Paul, the Hamline Midway Coalition and Union Park District Council also received a burst of donations, with about $500,000 given over two weeks to help damaged businesses.

"There's some hope; people want to build something better," said Brandon Long, executive director of the Union Park District Council. "We're showing the community can lead itself."

Communities of color have been hit especially hard.

Arson destroyed the building housing the American Indian nonprofit Migizi, and it will take several million dollars to rebuild. Hundreds of thousands of dollars in donations have come in, mostly from outside Minnesota. Kelly Drummer, who leads the nonprofit, credits Indian news coverage and help from the state's 11 Indian communities in spreading the word.

"I didn't expect this at all," Drummer said. "It really puts Migizi and the urban Indian community on the map. Out of this, there is a lot of light."

At the Northside Funders Group, executive director Sarah Clyne hoped to bring in $1 million after West Broadway Avenue businesses were destroyed. Within days, donations poured into the site from all over, pushing their goal to $5 million.

"I don't think anybody expected the incredible amount of support we've received," Clyne said. "I think all eyes are on our city right now."

However, Clyne said, it will take much more than $5 million to rebuild the North Side. North Minneapolis was already dealing with disparities such as higher business vacancy rates. Some businesses were still recovering from the 2011 tornado. Then the pandemic shuttered businesses, and arsonists hit.

North Siders quickly mobilized to create a temporary food shelf and start the rebuilding process.

"This is actually what north Minneapolis does; we're constantly in triage," said Felicia Perry, executive director of the West Broadway Business and Area Coalition, which will disburse the donations. "It's really a show of what grassroots compassion can do."

Dozens of GoFundMe sites have also drawn thousands of dollars for businesses and local efforts, and more than $14 million for Floyd's family.

From points far and near, donations surge to state

At the 38th Street and Chicago Avenue intersection that's turned into a massive memorial to Floyd, Valerie Quintana, 51, and Mary Claire Francois, 18, saw some needs that weren't being addressed. So they organized street cleanups, put up port-a-potties and provided hand sanitizer, garbage bags and canopy tents for those handing out water and food thanks to a fundraiser that's topped $12,000.

The St. Paul & Minnesota Foundation has given $100,000 to nonprofits to heal racial trauma. More than 40 foundations - from Target to the Vikings - are giving $2 million to organizations helping black and Indigenous communities.

The Greater Twin Cities United Way, Minneapolis Foundation and St. Paul & Minnesota Foundation teamed up with a fund to aid small minority-owned businesses and also started an initiative to reform the criminal justice system.

The Headwaters Foundation for Justice is looking at both short- and long-term needs with a new fund to support both rebuilding businesses and pushing for racial justice.

"People are feeling really inspired," said Maria De La Cruz, the executive director, adding that donations have come from as far away as the United Kingdom. "What's really interesting is how much money is flowing into Minnesota during a pandemic."

Kelly Smith · 612-673-4141

HOW TO HELP

Lake Street Council: welovelakestreet.com or givemn.org/organization/Lake-Street-Council

North Side Funders/West Broadway Business and Area Coalition: northsidefunders.org

Migizi: migizi.org

Midway United Fund: Support the Hamline Midway neighborhoods at midwayunited.org or at givemn.org/story/Nufc

Longfellow Community Council: gofundme.com/f/rebuilding-longfellow-amp-lake

Little Earth Residents Association: givemn.org/organization/Littleearth or paypal.me/LittleEarthResidents

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

Minnesota adds 20 deaths to the tally of those suspected to be caused by COVID-19

ARTICLE DXLIX. MINNESOTA ADDS 20 DEATHS TO THE TALLY OF THOSE SUSPECTED TO BE CAUSED BY COVID-19

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 703 words

Byline: Christopher Magan

Highlight: Minnesota added 20 more deaths this week to the tally of fatalities health officials suspect were caused by COVID-19. The state Department of Health has now identified 31 fatalities likely caused by COVID-19, but these are patients who did not have a positive coronavirus test. These are separate from the state's death toll from confirmed [...]

Body

Minnesota added 20 more deaths this week to the tally of fatalities health officials suspect were caused by COVID-19.

The state Department of Health has now identified 31 fatalities likely caused by COVID-19, but these are patients who did not have a positive coronavirus test. These are separate from the state's death toll from confirmed cases, which stood at 1,249 as of Wednesday afternoon.

State health officials say the sudden increase in suspected COVID-19 deaths was the result of a regular review of death records by the Office of Vital Records. In order to officially be counted among the state's coronavirus deaths a patient needs to have tested positive for the virus.

Death records reviewed by the Pioneer Press show that doctors and pathologists can record as many as four conditions that directly contributed to a person's death. They can also list multiple underlying health conditions that also may have played a role.

About 97 percent of those who've died from COVID-19 had underlying health conditions that made them more susceptible to serious infections. Heart and lung disease and neurological conditions like Alzheimer's disease were among the most common.

Deaths are listed as suspected to be caused by COVID-19 often because the patient was unable to get tested or health officials fear the results of a test were inaccurate.

The state Department of Health reported 13 more deaths Thursday known to be caused by COVID-19. Those who died ranged in age from their 50s to their 90s.

Minnesota adds 20 deaths to the tally of those suspected to be caused by COVID-19

Minnesota now has 29,316 laboratory confirmed coronavirus infections, but health officials say the virus is likely more widespread. The 447 new infections reported Thursday was a five-day high, but the daily number of new cases has been on the decline overall since the beginning of June.

Health officials are closely monitoring trends in coronavirus infections, hospitalizations and deaths to see if the recent loosening of restrictions to slow the spread of infections, as well as mass protests over the death of George Floyd, will have an impact on the state's outbreak.

Key indicators about the pandemic have largely been on the decline in recent days. Minnesota recently entered Phase 3 of its coronavirus response - most businesses are now allowed to reopen, albeit at a limited capacity.

Officials' understanding of Minnesota's coronavirus outbreak has become more clear largely thanks to ongoing increases in testing capacity. State officials reported the results of more than 12,000 tests Thursday, the second largest daily testing volume since local screening began in March.

Health officials are urging anyone with coronavirus symptoms to contact their health provider to get tested. Protesters who demonstrated after George Floyd's death at the hands of Minneapolis police have been recommended to get tested regardless of symptoms.

All of the tests results the state has been reporting daily are diagnostic tests that search for active coronavirus infections. Health officials haven't yet begun to analyze the results of serologic tests that search for virus-fighting antibodies.

Kris Ehresmann, state infectious disease director, said that's because many of the serologic tests have questionable accuracy. Researchers also don't know what level of antibodies a person would need to have immunity from the coronavirus and how long that immunity would last.

State Health Commissioner Jan Malcolm said state officials are confident in serologic tests being used by the University of Minnesota and Mayo Clinic. Those institutions have partnered with the state and other health care providers to widely expand screening with both diagnostic and serological tests.

Malcolm said in the coming weeks she hopes state health officials will be able to analyze the results of reliable serological tests to get a better idea of the extent of the coronavirus pandemic in Minnesota.

Coronavirus spread, not politics, should guide schools, doctors say Day services will open again Monday for people with disabilities Florida reports largest single-day increase in COVID cases; death toll also rising Sunday coronavirus update: 3 new MN deaths, 715 new cases Is it safe to reopen MN schools this fall? That may depend on us.

Load-Date: July 12, 2020

Minnesota's startup boosters and venture capitalists pledge to 'wire and hire' black founders

ARTICLE DL.

MINNESOTA'S STARTUP BOOSTERS AND VENTURE CAPITALISTS PLEDGE TO 'WIRE AND HIRE' BLACK FOUNDERS

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 779 words

Byline: Carrigan Miller

Body

Minnesota's startup organizations and venture capitalists are going beyond the often vague statements issued by businesses in response to the killing of George Floyd while in Minneapolis police custody. They're committing to specific goals and expectations, and they say they plan to put their money where their mouth is.

Venture capital funds like Matchstick Ventures are pledging to "wire and hire" black founders. The "wire" refers to "wiring money," or making investments in black entrepreneurs and their companies.

Meanwhile, startup nonprofit and accelerator Beta has pledged to add a black board member and include at least one black founder in all of its future accelerator cohorts while encouraging cohort companies to diversify their hires. If those conditions aren't met by the end of the year, the three white men on Beta's board will resign.

Minnesota's startup boosters and venture capitalists pledge to 'wire and hire' black founders

Both organizations want to address a stark venture capital funding gap. An oft-quoted study by RateMyInvestor and DiversityVC concluded that only about 1% of founders who received venture capital in the past five years were black; white founders, meanwhile, made up over 77% of venture capital recipients.

"There are systemic issues within venture capital, clearly," said Ryan Broshar, a founder and partner at St. Paul-based Matchstick Ventures and a Beta board member.

Matchstick committed to the "wire and hire" framework because those are the things over which investors have direct control, he said. The firm has committed to developing five new relationships with networks or groups that can put them in touch with black founders within the next year. It also plans to add a black member to its advisory board and help at least 30% of its portfolio companies do the same.

"This is something that's been core to our beliefs since day one," Broshar said. "It was one of those things where we couldn't just stand by and let [this moment] pass."

Forge North, a startup nonprofit that prioritizes diversity and inclusion, issued an open letter that has already been signed by over 100 CEOs and business leaders from the startup community and technology industries.

Forge North's open letter is less specific, but that's by design, said Damola Ogundipe, CEO of St. Paul-based legal tech startup Civic Eagle and a member of the Forge North leadership council, which wrote the letter.

The organization will reach out to each signee to develop individual plans to meet the letter's goals, which include hiring more diverse boards and supporting groups that are helping to rebuild areas damaged by civil unrest after George Floyd's killing.

"We're going to hold people's feet to the fire," Ogundipe said.

Simple statements of support for the black community aren't helpful without action, he said. The easiest action that he recommended for Twin Cities companies is to assess and diversify their leadership teams.

He pointed to Broshar and Brett Brohl, founder of St. Paul-based venture capital firm The Syndicate Fund, as examples of white investors who demonstrated what a good ally looks like.

"It's not that they're perfect, it's that they're good listeners. What makes white folks good allies is their ability to listen, reflect, and then decide that they're going to take action to make things better," Ogundipe said.

Broshar is also a founder and board member at Minneapolis-based Beta, which hosts startup events and two startup accelerators each year. The organization was challenged by black founders who were part of its network to create something that was meaningful with goals that were specific and measurable.

Fellow Beta board member Reed Robinson said Beta's pledge came from phone conversations with Upsie founder and CEO Clarence Bethea. They identified the area where Beta could most improve was in its decision making, and that the best way to fix that was to find new decision makers.

Minnesota's startup boosters and venture capitalists pledge to 'wire and hire' black founders

"I am encouraged by those organizations that are willing to step up and participate in diversity and inclusion in a real way. Now is a pivotal moment, and we have an opportunity to drive sustainable change," Bethea said in an email to the Business Journal.

The point of setting a deadline was to make sure that failure to act would have consequences, Robinson said. Working in venture capital and living in one of the least racially integrated states in the nation mean that organizations have to work harder to be welcoming to entrepreneurs of color.

"You just have to be that much more intentional," Robinson said. "Just because you open your door doesn't mean everyone's going to feel comfortable walking through it."

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DLI. PGA TOUR IS BACK, AND SO IS MINNESOTA'S TOM LEHMAN

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 831 wordsByline: Jace FrederickHighlight: An Arizona resident, Tom Lehman has been able to continue playing golf regularly throughout the COVID-19 pandemic. So, the University of Minnesota graduate has been playing and practicing "a lot." It showed Thursday. The 61-year-old fired a 5-under-par, 65 in the first round of the Charles Schwab Challenge at Colonial Country Club in Fort Worth, [...]Body

An Arizona resident, Tom Lehman has been able to continue playing golf regularly throughout the COVID-19 pandemic. So, the University of Minnesota graduate has been playing and practicing "a lot."

It showed Thursday.

The 61-year-old fired a 5-under-par, 65 in the first round of the Charles Schwab Challenge at Colonial Country Club in Fort Worth, Texas - the first PGA Tour event since the Tour was suspended in March.

"My game feels pretty good," Lehman, who grew up in Alexandria, told reporters in a virtual post-round press conference Thursday.

Lehman is just two shots off the lead held by Justin Rose and Harold Varner Jr. Lehman qualifies for the event each year by virtue of his victory at this same course at the Colonial National Invitation in 1995. He loves the "great, old course" and no more than it benefits those who keep the ball in the fairway.

Lehman said he hit it straight Thursday and made a few putts.

Still, a 65 on the PGA Tour from a 61-year-old is unexpected - in doing so, Lehman became the oldest player to shoot a 65 on the PGA Tour since 1980 - especially considering Lehman has just one top-30 finish in five starts this year on the Champions Tour. While he did make the cut at last year's inaugural 3M Open, Lehman rarely plays on the PGA Tour - usually just competing in The Open - and hasn't finished inside the top 50 on the top tour since 2012.

"Do I feel like I'm capable of shooting a 65 out here at Colonial? Well, for certain I do," he said. "Did I expect to do it today? Well, I would be probably lying if I said I fully expected to play and shoot such a low score. But I did expect to play well."

PGA Tour is back, and so is Minnesota's Tom Lehman

"To me, I kind of felt like if I could just finish out 2-under, 3-under, I would have been really happy with that. To get a couple more is definitely frosting on the cake."

Lehman also plans to play the Memorial in Ohio in July - a tournament he won in 1994 by going a tournament-record 20-under par - and noted he's up to play PGA events for which he is qualified, provided he's not taking the spot of a young, deserving player. Such is the case this week, as the tournament's field was expanded from 120 to 144. Plus, it's an invitational with no qualifying spots up for grabs.

This week marks the first PGA Tour event of four set to be played without fans, which Lehman said creates a "lower-pressure atmosphere." There's always internal pressure, he said, but certainly not the nerves that come with a traditional PGA Tour atmosphere.

"Believe it or not, there's been a few Champions Tour events that kind of felt like this, where you kind of played maybe later in the day and there are not a lot of folks around. Maybe not quite this few," Lehman said. "But I played with two guys today who just came off the Korn Ferry Tour and we were reminiscing about my days on the Hogan Tour and their days on the Korn Ferry, and this kind of looked pretty familiar."

The action at the course Thursday went from quiet to silent at 8:46 a.m., when the tournament paused and all on the course participated in a moment of silence to honor the memory of George Floyd, who died at the hands of police in Minneapolis last month.

In that moment, Lehman said he prayed - for Floyd's soul, for his family and for the country.

"I just prayed that the chaos that we live in can be wisely moved forward so that decisions are made that actually are meaningful and helpful," Lehman said.

As a Minnesota native, Lehman was asked what his reaction has been to Floyd's killing.

"There's so much to say about that. But what I would say is this: I think everybody needs to feel deeply what happened and to hurt deeply because of what happened to George Floyd," he said. "I think everybody needs to understand that when you have an absolute disregard for the suffering or pain of somebody else, or the death that you cause on somebody else, if you have no regard for that, you are a part of the problem and you need to get your (expletive) together."

"I would say that's probably the thing I took away from it, is let's just understand that we're all human beings and need to care about each other. If you can't do that, then I feel sorry for you."

Varner Jr. is one of just a handful of black golfers on the tour, and has been one of the tour's key figures in recent weeks, speaking out against social injustices and calling for unity in the wake of Floyd's death. He reportedly had a long conversation recently with PGA Tour commissioner Jay Monahan, where they discussed the tour's "potential role in the national conversation and solution."

But, when he got on the course Thursday, Varner insisted he was just trying to play well.

"The reason I have a platform is because I'm really good at golf," he said. "I just need to focus on that, and to be honest with you, being on the golf course, it helped me. It's my getaway, I guess. But I didn't think it would be like that until I got on the first hole and I hooked one super far left and I was [ticked], like it was good. Those juices are awesome."

PGA Tour is back, and so is Minnesota's Tom Lehman

Load-Date: July 12, 2020

End of Document

Trudy Rubin: Are there lessons for this moment from Tahrir Square and Hong Kong?

ARTICLE DLII. TRUDY RUBIN: ARE THERE LESSONS FOR THIS MOMENT FROM TAHRIR SQUARE AND HONG KONG?

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 918 words

Byline: Trudy Rubin

Highlight: PHILADELPHIA - As I watched youthful demonstrators pour into the streets to protest police violence and the murder of George Floyd, I couldn't help recalling the past protests for justice I'd witnessed overseas. From "people power" in the Philippines in 1986, to the Eastern European revolts against Soviet rule in the late-1980s; from mass protests [...]

Body

PHILADELPHIA - As I watched youthful demonstrators pour into the streets to protest police violence and the murder of George Floyd, I couldn't help recalling the past protests for justice I'd witnessed overseas.

From "people power" in the Philippines in 1986, to the Eastern European revolts against Soviet rule in the late-1980s; from mass protests against Kremlin repression in Moscow over the past three decades to the popular ouster of a Kremlin clone in Kyiv in 2014; from the Arab Spring rebellions, to the French Yellow Vest upheavals, to the pro-democracy protests in Hong Kong: I watched individuals express outrage over arrogant rulers, police repression, official corruption and indifference to the will of their people.

Of course, comparisons with the current U.S. protests have severe limits. In most of these revolts, the aim was to topple oppressive rulers or systems at a historic moment when these regimes had weakened.

But despite the many cultural, historical and political differences, two of these revolts haunted my thinking over the past week. Both of them were organized by young activists via social media: first, the Tahrir Square rebellion in Egypt that began in 2011, and second, the ongoing protests in Hong Kong.

The Egyptian revolt, in one obvious comparison, was sparked in 2011, when police beat to death a 28-year-old blogger named Khaled Said, who had been protesting police corruption in Alexandria.

Brilliant organizing tactics by a group of young Egyptian techies via Facebook - including a memorial page called "We are all Khaled Said" - led to the peaceful toppling of President Hosni Mubarak.

It was fascinating to watch how these young leaders mapped out a strategy to disperse police forces and coax Cairenes from working- and upper-class districts to join marches. They used this moment to unite

Trudy Rubin: Are there lessons for this moment from Tahrir Square and Hong Kong?

Egyptians fed up with regime corruption and nepotism, rising food prices and heavy-handed behavior by police for which citizens had no recourse.

And it was astonishing to watch Egyptians of different classes, educations, religions and skin colors march beside each other by the tens of thousands into Tahrir Square in the name of dignity and justice. I will never forget a taxi driver telling me he had felt like "a donkey" before the upheaval, but standing with fellow Egyptians, he finally felt proud to be an Egyptian.

Yet, the Tahrir Square revolution failed, and Egyptians are now ruled by a military dictator, President Abdel Fattah el-Sisi, who is worse than Mubarak. And the young leaders of Tahrir Square are either in jail, exile or trying to keep out of sight.

Several of the revolt's leaders told me their biggest weakness was their inability to translate their organizing skills into political impact. They were unwilling or unable to organize the poor and less educated in rural and urban Egypt into a movement.

Instead of uniting behind one presidential candidate, they split their support between several, which enabled the Muslim Brotherhood candidate, Mohamed Morsi, to narrowly win the presidency in 2012. One 25-year-old leader later told me, over coffee in the legendary intellectuals' Cafe Riche in Cairo, "The Muslim Brotherhood succeeded in reaching power because of liberals' mistakes."

When Morsi became repressive, young activists again tried to unseat his government with a massive demonstration, gathering hundreds of thousands of signatures demanding his ouster. Again, they failed to organize those signatories into a political movement. Military officials took advantage of public weariness with continued upheavals and staged a coup.

In Hong Kong, the protests also revolved around police violence and legal injustice. The spark was Beijing's attempt to curb the independence of the territory's courts, which operate under a "one country, two systems" framework. This system allows Hong Kong to maintain freedoms (until 2047) that are denied to Chinese on the mainland, including the right to assemble and limited suffrage.

Under pressure from Beijing, the Hong Kong police cracked down hard on the protests, with thousands of arrests along with beatings. Protesters then demanded an investigation into police brutality, along with long-promised universal suffrage. But a minority of angry young people also began using violence, smashing stores whose owners were sympathetic to Beijing and throwing Molotov cocktails at police cars.

Falsely tarring all demonstrators as violent, and aided by the shutdown during COVID-19, Beijing has now endorsed draconian security legislation that will expose Hong Kong demonstrators to serious punishment. "One country, two systems" is almost dead.

Again, the context and politics in Cairo and Hong Kong are very different from the protests here. Yet, when I think of what young people achieved and lost in Cairo and Hong Kong, here's what comes to my mind: The Egyptian tragedy reminds us of the need for focused, coherent political demands, with as much unity as possible, at a historical moment when a nation is open to change.

And the Hong Kong struggle should remind us that our flawed and stressed system - which supposedly includes universal suffrage (if we can keep it) - still holds out the possibility of change, including an overhaul of policing.

Trudy Rubin: Are there lessons for this moment from Tahrir Square and Hong Kong?

We are not Egypt or Hong Kong, and this is the moment to prove we are still the United States.

Trudy Rubin is a columnist and editorial-board member for the Philadelphia Inquirer, P.O. Box 8263, Philadelphia, Pa. 19101. Her email address is trubin@phillynews.com.

Load-Date: July 12, 2020

End of Document

3rd person charged in health store fire

ARTICLE DLIII. 3RD PERSON CHARGED IN HEALTH STORE FIRE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 11, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 5BLength: 228 wordsByline: STEPHEN MONTEMAYOR; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Federal authorities charged a third person Wednesday with arson in connection with fires set at a St. Paul health store during protests over the Minneapolis police killing of George Floyd.

McKenzy Ann Degidio Dunn, 19, of Rosemount, is accused of conspiracy to commit arson at the Great Health and Nutrition store at 1360 W. University Ave. on May 28. Dunn made her first court appearance Wednesday in St. Paul.

According to the criminal complaint, Dunn was recorded by security cameras while holding a bottle of flammable hand sanitizer, and Samuel Elliott Frey, 19, can be seen dousing a shelving unit with sanitizer and setting it ablaze. Dunn, Frey and Bailey Marie Baldus, also 19, have all been charged with conspiracy to set fire to the store.

Also Wednesday, Matthew Lee Rupert, 28, of Galesburg, Ill., was indicted by a federal grand jury on charges of civil disorder, rioting, and arson in Minnesota during the aftermath of Floyd's killing.

Rupert was charged in a complaint June 1 after he was picked up by Chicago police for violating the city's curfew order. The complaint alleges that he set fire to a Sprint phone store in Minneapolis and looted an Office Depot.

According to charges, he allegedly posted a self-recorded cellphone video on Facebook depicting him handing out explosive devices and encouraging people to throw them at officers.

STEPHEN MONTEMAYOR

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

ARTICLE DLIV. ABOLISH POLICE? IN ST. PAUL, IT'S UNLIKELY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 11, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 535 wordsByline: EMMA NELSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Council members say they want to continue to invest in the community.Body

Despite pressure from constituents and activists, a majority of the St. Paul City Council say they don't favor dismantling the capital city's police department.

Hundreds of e-mails have urged St. Paul leaders to do so in the wake of George Floyd's killing by a Minneapolis police officer last month. The majority of the Minneapolis City Council pledged this week to "begin the process of ending" their police department.

In interviews, most St. Paul council members said they recognize the need for swift action on public safety reform, but want to continue to make investments in community-based alternatives to traditional policing, rather than get rid of the police force altogether.

"If we had a department that had not been willing to engage on improvements and innovations and new strategies to work more closely with community as Minneapolis has had, then I might need us to go further right now," said Council Member Jane Prince. "But our department, at the leadership level, has been extremely open and welcoming of ideas, of any opportunities to work with community to make our community safer."

Council Member Nelsie Yang, is the only one of the seven calling for outright abolition of the St. Paul Police Department. Council Member Mitra Jalali said she also supports abolition, but emphasized that such a change won't happen overnight.

When asked whether he would support defunding or abolishing the police department, Mayor Melvin Carter pointed to what the city has already done - including embedding social workers with police, limiting the use of police dogs and rewriting the police department's use-of-force policy.

"My response when people ask, 'What is St. Paul going to do?' is, 'We're already doing it,' " he said.

Last year, the council approved a 2020 budget that eliminated five police officer positions and allocated $1.7 million for "community-based public safety" measures such as youth employment and outreach,

Abolish police? In St. Paul, it's unlikely streetscape improvements and incentives for landlords to rent to people with criminal histories. Carter proposed the supplemental budget in response to a rise in gun violence.

Council Member Rebecca Noecker said she has "a lot of concerns" about the supplemental public safety budget, and wonders why the initiatives it's supposed to pay for didn't launch in the first few months of 2020, before the COVID-19 pandemic derailed much of the city's work.

Carter said creating and funding new programs takes time.

"If we pass a budget on Dec. 11 or whatever it is, we're not expecting a whole staff and program to be implemented and operational Jan. 3," he said.

The community-first public safety plan is underway, he said - mental health workers are currently undergoing training, for example - and will continue to roll out through the summer.

Though St. Paul leaders have already invested in many of the alternatives to policing that activists are now calling for, Noecker said, they haven't done so with specific results in mind. Moving forward, that will need to change, she said.

"I think we need to show people that we're serious," Noecker said. "If we don't start with a shared vision it'll be really hard to know what we're doing is the right thing to do."

Emma Nelson · 612-673-4509

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

ARTICLE DLV. ALARMING RISE IN VIRUS CASES AS STATES ROLL BACK LOCKDOWNS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1516 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: NEW YORK (AP) - States are rolling back lockdowns, but the coronavirus isn't done with the U.S.Body

By MIKE STOBBE

NEW YORK (AP) - States are rolling back lockdowns, but the coronavirus isn't done with the U.S.

Cases are rising in nearly half the states, according to an Associated Press analysis, a worrying trend that could intensify as people return to work and venture out during the summer.

In Arizona, hospitals have been told to prepare for the worst. Texas has more hospitalized COVID-19 patients than at any time before. And the governor of North Carolina said recent jumps caused him to rethink plans to reopen schools or businesses.

There is no single reason for the surges. In some cases, more testing has revealed more cases. In others, local outbreaks are big enough to push statewide tallies higher. But experts think at least some are due to lifting stay-at-home orders, school and business closures, and other restrictions put in place during the spring to stem the virus's spread.

The increase in infections pulled stocks down sharply Thursday on Wall Street, dragging the Dow Jones Industrial Average more than 1,800 points lower and giving the S&P 500 its worst day in nearly three months. The infections deflated recent optimism that the economy could recover quickly from its worst crisis in decades.

The virus is also gradually fanning out.

"It is a disaster that spreads," said Dr. Jay Butler, who oversees coronavirus response work at the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. "It's not like there's an entire continental seismic shift and everyone feels the shaking all at once."

That is also happening globally. Places that suffered early on such as China, Italy and Spain have calmed down but Brazil, India and other countries that were spared initially are seeing large increases. The world is seeing more than 100,000 newly-confirmed cases every day, according to data from Johns Hopkins University.

Alarming rise in virus cases as states roll back lockdowns

The virus first landed on the U.S. coasts, carried by international travelers infected abroad. For months, the epicenter was in northeastern states. More recently, the biggest increases have been in the South and the West.

The AP analyzed data compiled by The COVID Tracking Project, a volunteer organization that collects coronavirus testing data in the United States. The analysis found that in 21 states as of Monday, the rolling seven-day average of new cases per capita was higher than the average seven days earlier.

Some worry the situation may get worse as social distancing restrictions lift and more people gather. One concern is that large recent racial justice protests across the country might spark at least some spread of the virus.

Another: President Donald Trump this week said he's planning to hold rallies that may draw thousands of people. He will hold them in four states - Arizona, Florida, Oklahoma, and Texas. All of them are among the states with rising cases identified in the AP analysis.

Here's what's driving increases in some of the states with notable upticks:

ARIZONA

Republican Gov. Doug Ducey ended Arizona's stay-at-home order on May 15 and eased restrictions on businesses. Arizona residents who were cooped up for six weeks flooded Phoenix-area bar districts, ignoring social distancing guidelines.

The state began seeing a surge of new cases and hospitalizations about 10 days later.

"It seems pretty clear to me that what we're seeing is directly related to the end of the stay-at-home order," said Will Humble, executive director of the Arizona Public Health Association.

It wasn't just that the order ended: There were no requirements to wear face masks, no major increases in contact tracing to spot and stop evolving outbreaks, and no scale-up of infection control at nursing homes, he said.

"Those are missed opportunities that, if implemented today, could still make a big difference," said Humble, a former director of the state Department of Health Services.

Democratic Rep. Ruben Gallego has criticized the governor for failing to highlight the "seriousness of the growing public health emergency."

Testing has been increasing in Arizona, which raises the chance of finding new cases. But the proportion of tests coming back positive has also been on the rise.

The AP analysis found Arizona had a rolling average of fewer than 400 new cases a day at the time the shutdown was lifted, but it shot up two weeks later and surpassed 1,000 new cases a day by early this week. Hospitalizations have also risen dramatically, hitting the 1,200 mark last week.

The state also passed another grim milestone last week, recording its 1,000th death.

Alarming rise in virus cases as states roll back lockdowns

Meanwhile Arizona hospitals reported they were at 83% of capacity Tuesday, which could force the cancellation of elective surgeries. An executive order Ducey issued in April said hospitals wanting to resume elective surgeries had to have at least 20% of their beds available.

NORTH CAROLINA

In North Carolina, more testing plus more people out and about during reopening seem to be the main drivers of recent case upticks, said Kimberly Powers, an associate professor of epidemiology at the University of North Carolina.

On Saturday, the state recorded its highest single-day increase, with 1,370. While testing has grown in the last two weeks, so has the rate of tests coming back positive.

"These trends moving in the wrong direction is a signal we need to take very seriously," said North Carolina's top health official, Mandy Cohen, who along with Democratic Gov. Roy Cooper has urged the public to take precautions to protect themselves.

But some state residents are not on board.

"I think they should start opening stuff a little bit more," said Jason Denton, an electrician from Greenville who said one of his main concerns was getting to the gym.

"That's like my therapy," he said.

TEXAS

Few states are rebooting faster than Texas, where hospitalizations surged past 2,100 on Wednesday for the first time during the pandemic. That's a 42% increase in patients since Memorial Day weekend, when beachgoers swarmed Texas' coastline and a water park near Houston opened to big crowds in defiance of Republican Gov. Greg Abbott's orders.

Texas' percentage of tests coming back positive has also jumped to levels that are among the nation's highest. State officials point to hot spots at meatpacking plants and prisons in rural counties, where thousands of new cases have cropped up, but have not offered explanations for a rise in numbers elsewhere.

Abbott, who has recently begun wearing a mask in public, has shown no intention of pumping the brake on reopening a state where protesters in May pressured him to speed up the timeline on getting hair salons back in business.

On Friday, Texas is set to lift even more restrictions and let restaurant dining rooms reopen at nearly full capacity.

ALABAMA

In Alabama, outbreaks in nursing homes and poultry plants helped drive state numbers upward. On Wednesday, the state recorded its largest number of new cases in a day, 849. The previous high was 640 on June 5.

The capital, Montgomery, has become an emerging hot spot, said State Health Officer Scott Harris.

Alarming rise in virus cases as states roll back lockdowns

"I think reopening the economy gave a lot of people the wrong impression ... that, 'Hey everything is fine. Let's go back to normal,'" Harris said. "Clearly, it is not that way. Really, now more than ever we need people to stay 6 feet apart, wear face coverings and wash their hands."

Montgomery hospital intensive care units are as busy as during flu season.

"I can assure you that Montgomery's cases are not going down, and if our community does not take this seriously, the virus will continue to spread, and at some point, our medical capacity will reach its limit," Dr. David Thrasher, director of respiratory therapy at Jackson Hospital, said in a statement.

ARKANSAS

Arkansas has also seen increases - in cases, hospitalizations and the percentage of tests that come back positive. But the state's situation is a complicated story of different outbreaks at different times, said Dr. Nate Smith, director of the Arkansas Department of Health.

After a peak in April, levels were low until spikes began about three weeks ago - mainly in the cities of Rogers and Springdale in the northwest and in De Queen further south. The cases have been concentrated among Hispanics and those who work in chicken production facilities, which never were closed.

Republican Gov. Asa Hutchinson on Wednesday said the state will move into a new phase of reopening, starting Monday.

LOOKING AHEAD

Experts are wondering what will happen in the next week or so, in the wake of nationwide protests following the death of George Floyd at the hands of police.

The protests were outdoors, which reduces the likelihood of virus spread, and many participants have worn masks and taken other precautions. But it's a lot of people close together, chanting, singing and yelling.

"Hopefully we won't see a big spike. But those data aren't in yet," Humble said.

Associated Press reporters Bob Christie in Phoenix; Paul Weber in Austin, Texas; Andrew DeMillo in Little Rock, Arkansas; Kim Chandler in Montgomery, Alabama; Jay Reeves in Birmingham, Alabama; and Bryan Anderson and Allen G. Breed in Raleigh, North Carolina contributed.

Load-Date: July 12, 2020

ARTICLE DLVI. DRIVERS WITH SLASHED TIRES CAN SEEK REDRESS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 11, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 327 wordsByline: PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Officers acknowledged puncturing tires during unrest. Victims can fill out a form for reimbursement.Body

Motorists whose vehicles had their tires punctured by State Patrol troopers during recent street unrest in Minneapolis can claim they were mistakenly targeted and pursue reimbursement for the damages.

The state Department of Public Safety and an assisting agency acknowledged this week that parked and unattended vehicles in at least two locations had their tires deflated. They defended the tactic as necessary to protect officers and others from being run over during the sometimes-violent upheaval on May 30-31 in connection with the death of George Floyd.

Video and photos of damaged vehicles in the Kmart parking lot on Lake Street and at an intersection west of the University of Minnesota circulated widely on social media. Many vehicles had all four tires punctured. Replacing all the tires would cost several hundred dollars.

One of the motorists estimated that 30 to 40 vehicles in the Kmart lot had their tires deflated, while DPS spokesman Bruce Gordon put the total across the city at no more than 20, "some of which were stolen [and] were being used as weapons against law enforcement during violent protests."

The state said claimants should request a form by sending an e-mail to risk.management@state.mn.us, then fill out the three-page document, which includes details about the person making the claim and the circumstances leading to the damage.

Gordon said he did not know how long claimants should expect to wait before receiving a determination.

Deputies from the Anoka County Sheriff's Office cut holes in the tires of two vehicles that were abandoned in the street on S. Washington Avenue over Interstate 35W.

Sheriff's Lt. Andy Knotz said that "our Office will not be compensating for damages as a result of the vehicles being left on the Washington bridge."

Drivers with slashed tires can seek redress

Knotz went on to explain, "These particular two vehicles were illegally abandoned on the roadway and a potential hazard that could have been used as mobile weapons."

Paul Walsh · 612-673-4482

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

End of Document

Facing criticism, Walz vows 'consequences' for those who toppled Columbus statue

ARTICLE DLVII. FACING CRITICISM, WALZ VOWS 'CONSEQUENCES' FOR THOSE WHO TOPPLED COLUMBUS STATUE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 609 words

Byline: Christopher Magan

Highlight: "We have to have a society that functions in a peaceful manner," Walz said at a Thursday news conference.

Body

Gov. Tim Walz vowed "there will be consequences" for those who tore down a statue of Christopher Columbus that stood on the grounds of the state Capitol in St. Paul for nearly 90 years.

"We have to have a society that functions in a peaceful manner," Walz said at a Thursday news conference.

Those responsible for tearing down the 10-foot bronze statue Wednesday afternoon could face destruction of public property and other charges.

But Walz rejected the notion that tearing down the statue was equivalent to the arson and looting that happened during demonstrations protesting the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police.

Walz noted that Native American groups have repeatedly tried unsuccessfully to have the statue removed.

Resorting to tearing it down? "That's a very different thing," the Democratic governor said.

Republican Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka said allowing the statue to be torn down was the latest in a series of "failures of leadership" by Walz. He's criticized the governor for his response to the coronavirus pandemic as well as this reaction to unrest following Floyd's death.

"They knew there was a threat to the Christopher Columbus statue, and he failed to adequately protect it," Gazelka said in a statement. "The mob mentality to do whatever people want without repercussion has got to stop."

"The Governor didn't protect the Third Precinct, he didn't protect businesses on Lake Street, and the Lieutenant Governor condoned the destruction on public property," Gazelka concluded.

Facing criticism, Walz vows 'consequences' for those who toppled Columbus statue

Lt. Gov. Peggy Flanagan made it clear she "would not shed a tear" over the statue of Columbus being removed. The monument wrongfully elevated a man who "by of his own admission sold 9- and 10-year-old girls into sex slavery," she said.

Flanagan, who is a member of the White Earth Band of Ojibwe, said it was "long overdue" that the artwork and symbolism that adorns parts of the state Capitol be reconsidered. She acknowledged that there was a process for doing so, but criticized it as not being well defined, accessible or expedient.

"In terms of the statue of Christopher Columbus, I wish we had a better process that had been followed," Flanagan said. "I am not sad it is gone. Columbus' legacy was setting in motion generations of violence, rape and genocide against indigenous people who were already here when he arrived."

John Harrington, commissioner of the state Department of Public Safety, disputed claims that law enforcement did too little to protect the statue. A large police presence was on the scene to take the sculpture away after it was toppled from its granite base.

Harrington said they knew about the planned protest ahead of time and took the proper precautions to gauge whether it would be peaceful or more volatile. A leader of the State Patrol and a member of Harrington's staff were talking with the leaders of the protest when others who had gathered pulled the statue down.

"They were not able to get out there in time," Harrington said of the 25 state troopers and other law enforcement officers who later arrived on the scene.

The Columbus statue was a gift to the state from Minnesota's Italian-Americans. Installed in 1931, it was located near the southeast corner of the Capitol building.

Special session renews hopes for those seeking state money Police reforms among the issues legislators expected to take up when they return to the Capitol Minn. lawmakers consider bill extending unemployment benefits for ironworkers 'We don't think we did this all right': State leaders weigh in on response to Minneapolis riots Republicans assail law enforcement after activists fell MN's Columbus statue

Load-Date: July 12, 2020

ARTICLE DLVIII. FAQ

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 11, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 9ALength: 341 wordsHighlight: What is the plan for police reform?Body

The May 25 death of George Floyd has resulted in criminal charges against four Minneapolis police officers and triggered calls for reform and abolishment of the department. On Wednesday, Police Chief Medaria Arradondo revealed the first steps he plans to take.

Q: What are they?

A: Arradondo said he is stepping away from contract negotiations with the Police Officers' Federation of Minneapolis, the union representing about 800 rank-and-file officers, to bring in advisers and determine how negotiations can take place with greater community transparency. He also plans to implement a system using real-time data and research on police behavior to detect early warning signs of officer misconduct.

Q: What changes does he want to make to the contract?

A: Arradondo said he is not concerned about salaries and benefits but "significant" aspects of the contract such as use of force, the role supervisors play, and the discipline process, including grievances and arbitration.

Q: How will this work?

A: Mayor Jacob Frey said outside advisers will review the contract and suggest amendments. And, "if there are road blockages that are extra contractual, like state law," they can help identify those. The city's agreement with the state Department of Human Rights gives the city until July to provide a list of state laws that are impeding the city's ability to discipline officers.

Q: What's the status of the contract?

A: The Minneapolis Police Federation labor agreement lasts three years, with the most recent running from Jan. 1, 2017, through Dec. 31, 2019. The terms of that contract remain in place.

Q: What about intervention?

FAQ

A: Arradondo provided few details, but it may be similar to a 2014 effort by Chief Janeé Harteau, who tried to create an "early intervention system" under federal recommendations. It appears to have never been implemented. Arradondo said such reform hasn't worked in the past because academic experts found that supervisory action alone to problematic officers "is very rare and significantly absent" in large departments.

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DLIX. GOV. TIM WALZ'S AUTHORITY, CORONAVIRUS AID, POLICING LAWS ALL ON THE TABLE FOR MN SPECIAL SESSION

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 853 wordsByline: Dana FergusonHighlight: Minnesota lawmakers on Friday are set to return to the Capitol to take up reforms to the state's policing laws and weigh next steps in addressing the COVID-19 pandemic. Their actions could end Gov. Tim Walz's peacetime emergency declaration spurred by the pandemic and limit the governor's vast executive authority. Legislators could pass more than [...]Body

Minnesota lawmakers on Friday are set to return to the Capitol to take up reforms to the state's policing laws and weigh next steps in addressing the COVID-19 pandemic.

Their actions could end Gov. Tim Walz's peacetime emergency declaration spurred by the pandemic and limit the governor's vast executive authority. Legislators could pass more than $1 billion in local construction projects and green-light millions of dollars in COVID-19 aid for businesses, families and local governments.

And they could take up a slate of changes to the state's policing laws in the wake of George Floyd's death last month in Minneapolis police custody.

Leaders in the divided Legislature appeared to have different priorities for the overtime session. And partisan disagreements threaten to again block the passage of several bills.

As lawmakers return to the Capitol, here's what you need to know:

WHY ARE THEY COMING BACK?

Walz on Wednesday announced he would again extend his peacetime emergency another 30 days because of the COVID-19 pandemic and that triggered legislative action. The House and Senate will vote on whether to block the extension of the emergency and by extension additional executive authority for the Walz administration.

Both chambers need to vote down the extension to block it. GOP lawmakers, who hold a majority in the Senate, have signaled they'll vote to end the peacetime emergency while Democrats who control the House have said they'll vote to allow the extension.

Gov. Tim Walz's authority, coronavirus aid, policing laws all on the table for MN special session

Republicans said they oppose the governor's continued peacetime authority because they feel he hasn't adequately consulted with the Legislature and they think his executive actions have gone too far. Some have said the extension signals an unwillingness to work with lawmakers and have said they won't work on other priorities until Walz drops it.

"The time for emergency powers has long passed," House Minority Leader Kurt Daudt, R-Crown, said.

The peacetime emergency lets the administration activate the National Guard to help respond to the pandemic and pull down federal disaster funds. Walz and Democrats in the Legislature said those abilities, as well as the option to more quickly issue executive actions, remain important in dealing with the pandemic.

"I would caution against that," Walz said of ending the peacetime emergency. "We are still in this."

WILL THEY TAKE UP OTHER ISSUES?

There were a variety of issues that went unfinished in the regular legislative session. Lawmakers are set to consider a borrowing bill to fund public construction projects around the state, the next round of aid for businesses, homeowners and others affected by the pandemic and a tax bill.

Following the death of Floyd, Walz has also called on lawmakers to take up a slate of police accountability and criminal justice bills. The governor and Democratic leaders said the policing reforms will be their top priority.

WHAT ARE THE POLICING PROPOSALS THEY'RE CONSIDERING?

Walz and members of the People of Color and Indigenous Caucus on Thursday put forth a set of proposals aimed at re-writing policing laws to adjust officer training and accountability. Among the proposals were plans to ban chokehold and warrior training, boost mental health and de-escalation training, fund community responders to work alongside officers and fund community healing initiatives and create an independent office to review instances of deadly force.

"It's up to us in the Legislature to make transformative change," Sen. Jeff Hayden, DFL-Minneapolis, said.

The lawmakers also said they would push forward a bill that would restore the right to vote to felons who've completed their jail sentences.

That proposal and the slate of ideas put forth by DFL lawmakers of color drew a rebuke from Daudt, who said GOP ideas should also be included in conversations about criminal justice reform.

WHEN WILL THE SPECIAL SESSION END?

There's no clear end date and lawmakers can remain in session as long as they see fit. Walz on Wednesday said they should stay as long as it is needed to advance police accountability bills, a bonding bill, COVID-19 aid funding and other legislation that didn't get done during the regular session.

Special session renews hopes for those seeking state money Police reforms among the issues legislators expected to take up when they return to the Capitol Minn. lawmakers consider bill extending unemployment benefits for ironworkers 'We don't think we did this all right': State leaders weigh in on

Gov. Tim Walz's authority, coronavirus aid, policing laws all on the table for MN special session

response to Minneapolis riots Republicans assail law enforcement after activists fell MN's Columbus statue He also asked lawmakers to work with him to set out protections against eviction for homeowners and renters who can't pay rent due to the pandemic and the state response and outline ways to transition away from his broad executive authority under the peacetime emergency.

House Speaker Melissa Hortman, DFL-Brooklyn Park, said the Legislature would work until it passed proposals that could address Floyd's death and prevent future instances of police deadly force.

"We will take as long as it takes to address that injustice," Hortman said.

Load-Date: July 12, 2020

End of Document

Gov. Walz announces special legislative session for relief funding, police reform

ARTICLE DLX. GOV. WALZ ANNOUNCES SPECIAL LEGISLATIVE SESSION FOR RELIEF FUNDING, POLICE REFORM

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 314 words

Byline: Carrigan Miller

Body

Gov. Tim Walz announced Wednesday that he'll convene a special legislative session starting on Friday. The session will focus on helping Minnesota's economy recover from Covid-19 and damages caused during protests stemming from the killing of George Floyd by Minneapolis police.

Walz also hopes to pass a version of his $2.6 billion bonding bill, the Local Jobs and Projects Plan, in addition to relief for businesses effected by Covid-19 closings and those that were damaged during the protests. Money for repairing commercial hubs like Lake Street and University Avenue could come from the bonding bill or from other sources, he said.

The Minnesota Legislature also has to figure out how to distribute $667 million in federal relief that was not assigned before the end of the regular legislative session in May.

"We're in an emergency and the money needs to be out there now," Walz said.

Gov. Walz announces special legislative session for relief funding, police reform

The Legislature will vote on a several police reform bills that will be introduced by the Minnesota People of Color and Indigenous Caucus and the Attorney General's Police-Involved Deadly Force Encounters Working Group. Those bills will include reforms to the allowable use of force; Walz praised the New York state legislature for passing a statewide ban on chokeholds, a move that Minneapolis made earlier this month.

"Minnesota is at a turning point. This is our chance to take strong action to combat persistent structural inequities, pass substantive police reform, and build a stronger economy," Walz said in a statement.

"This moment will not be upon us again," he said in a press conference.

Walz will also extend the peacetime state of emergency related to Covid-19 for another 30 days. Without the order, the state would lose out on $50 million of federal assistance each month.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DLXI. OMAR ANSARI ON SURLY BREWING CO.'S 'LOST YEAR'

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 650 wordsByline: Dylan ThomasBody

Minneapolis-based Surly Brewing Co. had a hit on its hands with Grapefruit Supreme, a crowd-pleasing tart ale introduced last spring, and founder Omar Ansari thought his summer 2020 would be about getting that beer into as many hands as possible.

The coronavirus pandemic had other plans.

Bars and restaurants closed to dine-in customers March 17, forcing breweries like Surly to take back kegs and dump hundreds of barrels of their beer. Yes, package sales in liquor stores have been strong during the shutdown, but they don't make up for the revenue lost when Surly had to close the beer hall inside its massive destination brewery for nearly three months.

"I never thought we had a lot of debt until we didn't have any income," Ansari said.

Income isn't all the owner of the state's third-largest craft brewer is thinking about right now. The recent police killing of George Floyd prompted a reevaluation of the fundraising priorities of Surly Gives a

Damn, the brewery's nonprofit arm, and the company has pledged to continue a conversation about diversity, equality and inclusion.

Ansari recently spoke with the Business Journal about navigating his business through these uncertain times. The conversation has been edited and condensed.

As we speak, you're preparing to reopen the beer garden for the first time since the pandemic shutdown. How does that feel?

Oh, man. Like everything in our new Covid era, it comes with a lot of different emotions.

We got the news on Friday that the governor was opening up the full thing on Wednesday. I had to tell our team, "Guys, I can't ask you to open it up to that many people." To staff up a restaurant that big, it's hard.

So, it's great that we're open, but this week we're just going to stick with our 50 people outside.

You said you could have 5,000 people a day coming through the taproom last summer. Under the restrictions you're looking at, how do you think that affects revenue for the rest of the year?

I think the way I explained it to my banker is that it sucks.

The model isn't built to serve this few people, which is why this year, I think, for a lot of businesses, it's kind of a lost year. You get through it, and maybe 2021 will be a little bit more like we hoped 2020 would be.

Obviously, it's a huge hit. [The beer hall] is a third of our business, so not having that is pretty huge. In the summer, it's an even bigger percentage. It's a big loss.

In terms of Minnesota's craft brewers, Surly has as fairly large distribution footprint. Do those package sales become even more important as bars and restaurants struggle during the pandemic?

For sure. You focus on what you can, and if there's fewer bars, obviously, you're not going to sell more beer as a whole. One of the things you can affect is trying to get more beer into liquor stores or trying to get your product in front of more people or front-of-mind.

But, also, for us, expansion won't solve those issues. Selling beer to another state doesn't make it up anymore. That's kind of the nature of craft beer now. No one goes into a market and sells a crazy amount of beer.

It's also just readjusting to what the new world is. If we're down 15% in 2021, that's what we manage to and not pretend we're where the brewery was three years ago.

Those are tough choices, because a lot of those are people, which stinks. But like a lot of businesses that have been affected, none of the options are great.

The brewing industry has a diversity issue. Does Surly have a role in helping to bring more diversity to the industry?

That's one of those questions that has to be answered. I don't know.

Omar Ansari on Surly Brewing Co.'s 'lost year'

A lot of our brewing positions, we don't hire entry-level jobs. Everyone has had experience. We don't get many minority candidates applying.

What do we do? How do we make that change? I don't know.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DLXII. PARDON MAY FIX 100-YEAR-OLD INJUSTICE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 11, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 729 wordsByline: BROOKS JOHNSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Black man convicted of rape in case that led to 1920 Duluth lynchings may be exonerated.Body

DULUTH - Max Mason was the only person sent to prison for the reported rape of Irene Tusken, an unproven allegation that resulted in a white mob lynching three black men in downtown Duluth 100 years ago next week.

On Friday, as the state continues to confront the aftermath of George Floyd's death and calls for racial justice, Mason could become the first person granted a posthumous pardon in Minnesota's history.

"It is not surprising that Mason, a poor black laborer from the South, was convicted of a fictitious charge of raping a white woman by an all-white jury in the 1920s in Duluth," reads his pardon application. "There is also no question that now, one century after the horrors of Duluth in 1920, the time has come for Max Mason to receive that pardon."

If the members of the Board of Pardons - Gov. Tim Walz, Attorney General Keith Ellison and Lorie Skjerven Gildea, chief justice of the Minnesota Supreme Court - find they have the legal authority to grant a posthumous pardon, they could vote to grant one Friday morning.

The application has the backing of numerous former state leaders and current Duluth officials, who have submitted letters in support of the pardon.

"A pardon reminds all of us that the lynchings and circumstances giving rise to them were a stain on the history of Minnesota and do not reflect who we are as a state," wrote nearly a dozen former pardon board members, including former Govs. Arne Carlson, Tim Pawlenty and Mark Dayton and former attorneys general Walter Mondale, Skip Humphrey and Lori Swanson.

"The historical record clearly reflects that Mr. Mason was investigated, charged and convicted because of his race and not because of the strength and sufficiency of the evidence," St. Louis County Attorney Mark Rubin wrote.

Pardon may fix 100-year-old injustice

Jerry Blackwell, a Minneapolis lawyer who drafted Mason's pardon application, said he's hopeful the application will get the unanimous vote needed to grant the pardon.

"I'm simply hopeful they will see this is the right thing to do," Blackwell said. "Any time is the right time to do justice. This is a wrong that can be righted."

Mason's case

After word traveled around town 100 years ago that Tusken had been raped by black circus workers, the six suspects who were being held at the Duluth jail were ripped from their cells by a mob of thousands on June 15, 1920. The mob held a mock trial, then quickly moved to lynch three of the men - Elias Clayton, Elmer Jackson and Isaac McGhie.

Mason, meanwhile, had traveled with the circus north to Virginia but was later arrested and tried as "a scapegoat to exculpate the actions of the mob," Blackwell wrote in the pardon application.

"Few if any residents ... questioned whether Irene Tusken had been raped," he wrote. "To do so, of course, would have meant that the lynch mob had not murdered rapists, but innocent men."

Tusken's doctor found no evidence of an assault.

In the prosecutor's closing argument in November 1920 he told the jury: "We have mobs because people think the Negroes won't be convicted. That's why they take the law into their own hands. People of Duluth and St. Louis County want to know through your verdict that when a white girl is ravished by a black or white man, and the man is proven guilty, the man is going to be found guilty."

Mason was sentenced to 30 years in prison. His appeals and initial pleas for a pardon or commutation of his sentence were all denied.

In 1925 the parole board released Mason from prison on the condition he stay out of Minnesota, noting that "there has always been considerable mystery and doubt in the minds of the Duluth people about this case."

Mason died in Memphis, Tenn., in 1942 at the age of 43.

Commemoration canceled

Mason's case first returned to the pardon board, which meets twice a year, in December 2019. The board voted then to clear the way for this week's vote on a pardon.

Blackwell took on the case on behalf of Duluth activist Jordon Moses and the Clayton Jackson McGhie Memorial committee, which has been planning a variety of events to mark the centennial of the lynching.

Though COVID-19 caused the cancellation of the mass gathering planned, Blackwell said that the pardon could be "a commemoration for all the lessons that history has to teach.

"This is an opportunity for the state to look at this ugly history unvarnished and say, 'We are better than this.' "

Brooks Johnson · 218-491-6496

Pardon may fix 100-year-old injustice

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DLXIII. STILL HIGH ON THE 'HOG'

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 11, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: TASTE; Pg. 2TLength: 510 wordsByline: SHARYN JACKSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

A planned Lowertown building renovation has left two St. Paul restaurants without a home, but one will find new life in Cathedral Hill.

The Park Square Court building on E. 6th Street across from Mears Park is being converted to an apartment building, and construction would have shuttered two of chef Justin Sutherland's restaurants, Handsome Hog and Public Kitchen + Bar, for up to 16 months, Sutherland said.

Instead, Sutherland is closing Public permanently, and moving the neighboring Handsome Hog to the home of another of his projects, deep-dish pizzeria the Fitz (173 N. Western Av., St. Paul).

The takeover of the Fitz was practical, Sutherland said. "It was just beginning when the COVID stuff happened, so it wasn't a good time to go shopping for a new restaurant space."

Handsome Hog's original space, which hugged the corner of the building, wasn't large enough to adapt to social distancing once the state allowed dining rooms to reopen. The new space is far larger, giving Handsome Hog a chance to survive at reduced capacity.

In addition, a newly constructed patio will begin seating customers as early as June 16, though the date is not yet firm.

The Southern-style restaurant's decor will carry over, as will the menu, although Sutherland says he is going to "lighten it up a little bit," to better match tastes in the new neighborhood.

A new smoker will allow him to smoke seven times the amount of brisket he could do in Lowertown. There will also be a few of those Fitz pizzas - the pizza oven is still there, after all - incorporating some of Handsome Hog's signature items, such as a low country boil and that brisket.

Sutherland says the Fitz could return in another time and place, but "I had to make the decision of preserving a brand, and Handsome Hog is a no-brainer."

Still high on the 'Hog'

Another of Sutherland's brands is also saying goodbye for now. The oyster-and-whiskey spot Pearl and the Thief, which first opened in Stillwater in 2018, closed months later to relocate to a new building in Minneapolis. The building faced delays in 2019, and now the plan has been put on hold indefinitely, Sutherland said.

"It is such an interactive concept, especially with the oyster bar - so much touching of things, and human contact," he explained. "Focusing on an oyster bar didn't seem like the best move right now."

In brighter news, another restaurant in the group Sutherland manages is reopening for outdoor dining this weekend, Ox Cart Rooftop (255 E. 6th St., St. Paul, 651-528-6171).

Sutherland stayed active during his restaurants' COVID-related closings by co-founding the North Stands, an organization supporting hospitality workers. Since George Floyd's death in police custody, the North Stands' mission has been refocused to support businesses rebuilding from damage.

Sutherland has been providing free meals to cleanup crews, and has spoken at the State Capitol.

"It's important to be out there doing it," he said. "It wouldn't be right if I wasn't there putting my money where my mouth is."

Read full reviews and other restaurant news at startribune.com/dining.

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

St. Paul group calls on mayor, city council to cut $20M from police budget

ARTICLE DLXIV. ST. PAUL GROUP CALLS ON MAYOR, CITY COUNCIL TO CUT \$20M FROM POLICE BUDGET

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 11, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1416 words

Byline: Mara H. Gottfried

Highlight: As a community group calls on the city of St. Paul to cut about 20 percent of its police department budget to invest elsewhere, many elected officials say they're already committed to that work and want to do more. But they're facing a multi-million dollar budget shortfall due to the coronavirus pandemic. A majority of [...]

Body

As a community group calls on the city of St. Paul to cut about 20 percent of its police department budget to invest elsewhere, many elected officials say they're already committed to that work and want to do more.

But they're facing a multi-million dollar budget shortfall due to the coronavirus pandemic.

A majority of Minneapolis city council members announced on Sunday they support disbanding their police department in the wake of the death of George Floyd in police custody, which is not the sentiment among most of St. Paul's seven city council members concerning their police department. Two St. Paul council members say they support abolishing the police.

Root & Restore St. Paul recently began calling for Mayor Melvin Carter and council members to cut $20 million from the police department. The community group has been working since 2018 to highlight that about one-third of the city's general fund goes to the police department's $105 million budget.

"Now, in Minneapolis and around the nation, we are seeing a broad uprising of people and politicians who are acknowledging our system of policing is not reformable," members of Root & Restore said in a Wednesday statement. "We are seeing an unmistakable demand to begin the work of a different safety paradigm immediately. So we're asking that our leaders in St. Paul move beyond the lip service and funding scraps we've seen in recent years and commit to defund SPPD to refund significant resources to community based programs and leaders."

More than 1,300 people had signed the petition in support of defunding as of mid-day Wednesday, according to Root & Restore.

BUDGET SHORTFALL IN MILLIONS PROJECTED

St. Paul group calls on mayor, city council to cut $20M from police budget

St. Paul is shortfall of $19 million to $34 million due to COVID-19. They're exploring how to manage the impacts in the current budget and the 2021 budget, which will be presented to the city council in August, according to Peter Leggett, Carter's communications director. St. Paul is seeking state and federal funding to ease the situation.

"While it's premature to determine what those impacts for each department will be, the police department is ... the single largest city department by budget, meaning the proportional impact to that department may be the greatest by virtue of its size," Leggett said.

All city departments have been asked to prepare budget reduction scenarios. The police department, in developing a preliminary 2021 budget, was told to determine how it would cut $7 million, if it comes to that.

City Council President Amy Brendmoen said Wednesday the city council remains committed to a "community-first" public safety model.

In the midst of a spike in gun violence last year, Carter proposed a public safety initiative an online petition anticipating a budget that did not add officers, but instead added a public health project for violence prevention and intervention. The focus was also on adding community ambassadors to connect with young people and expanding a youth employment program.

The city council approved \$1.7 million in city funds for the supplemental "community-first" budget and though the COVID-19 pandemic has slowed implementation, they're getting to work on a variety of projects, Leggett said.

"In the face of almost certain cuts across the board in the city next year, I know the council is going to continue to invest in those programs and those priorities because we all know ... that we can't police our way out of the problems that are facing our society," Brendmoen said.

Root & Restore said making up for the budget shortfall cannot come at the expense of reducing library hours, recreation center programs or across-the-board cuts.

Council Member Dai Thao said Wednesday it's the right time to look at the work of all the city's departments, including police.

ALTERNATIVES TO POLICING

According to Root & Restore, based on information from the Mapping Police Violence website, the St. Paul department's fatal use of force is almost double the national average and nearly three times the national average for black people.

St. Paul officers have not been criminally charged in shootings. In 2016, a St. Anthony police officer was the first officer in modern Minnesota history to be charged in a fatal on-duty shooting.

"Ultimately, we want to see a city where there are no police officers and we have public or community-based systems that respond to crisis and emergency in culturally appropriate and life-giving ways," Root & Restore said in its statement.

City Council Member Nelsie Yang supports defunding and abolishing the police.

St. Paul group calls on mayor, city council to cut $20M from police budget

Yang said she sees alternatives to policing, such as having "community leaders who are trained in protecting people, who actually know the community and live in the community, be the ones out there on the ground and responding to emergencies, as well." She also wants to see people who are deeply trained in mental health and able to respond to emergencies.

Council Member Mitra Jalali said it's been an uphill climb since she took office in 2018 to convince other council member to reduce the size of the police department. Just keeping the police department's funding level for this year "was a pretty big battle" in discussions last year, Jalali added.

"I think you have to defund the police to make money available to fund the things that keep us safe," said Jalali, who supports defunding the department over time to reach abolition. "I hear very overwhelmingly from my ward and other parts of the city that folks want to be safe. They don't equate that with wanting more police."

MAYOR: WORK OF BUILDING TRUST CONTINUES

Carter said Wednesday that he and Police Chief Todd Axtell agree the "work of building trust is never done."

The mayor said he ran on a campaign of needing "a much broader set of investments" and "a public safety framework that centers not on just racing to the scene as fast as possible after a crime has occurred, but that centers around investing to promote security and stability in individuals and in neighborhoods."

Carter said that's the work he's done since he took office in 2018, including immediately working with Axtell and the community to rewrite the police department's use-of-force policies.

Meanwhile, Council Member Jane Prince said many of the reforms being sought in Minneapolis and nationally have already happened in St. Paul. She pointed to all St. Paul officers receiving crisis intervention team training, Axtell's success in diversifying the department, and social workers who have been embedded with police to respond to some crisis calls.

Still, Prince said there's more work to be done in the police department and there should be a community conversation "about where we go and what it's going to look like."

Prince also said she continues to be concerned about gun violence in St. Paul. There were 53 people shot as of the end of May; the number was 70 through June last year. The city has seen 15 homicides this year.

PUBLIC INVITED TO VIRTUAL TOWNHALL

Council Member Rebecca Noecker said she's been hearing from her constituents that "incremental acts of change are not going to be enough."

"Rather than talking about sums of money that we should or should not invest in the police department or elsewhere, I would like to talk about: What is the purpose of taking that money and where is that money going instead?," Noecker said. "How many officers do we want to have? What kind of calls should they be answering?"

People can take part in a virtual townhall with Noecker, Sen. Sandy Pappas and Rep. Carlos Mariani on Thursday, June 11, from 5:30 p.m. to 7 p.m. at facebook.com/SenatorPappas.

St. Paul group calls on mayor, city council to cut $20M from police budget

Council Member Chris Tolbert said Wednesday he's seen the police department make structural changes over the years and believes that work should continue.

He said St. Paul has been able to invest in community-first public safety, while "continuing to invest in the things that really get at the core of systematic racism or inequality that we've had for centuries - we've had historic investments in housing, investments in jobs and investments on the front end with people and community." Ethiopia announces arrests in singer's killing that prompted Twin Cities protests Feds deny Minnesota request for aid to rebuild after unrest Working from home, Securian Financial employees donate monthly parking fee to local nonprofits City of St. Paul offers moderate-income homebuyers up to \$40,000 in downpayment assistance After complaints about 'chaos, disorder' at St. Paul's Mears Park, police arrest/cite 10

Load-Date: July 11, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DLXV. THE ONES WE DIDN'T PROTECT OR SERVE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 11, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 595 wordsByline: JENNIFER BROOKS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Once upon a time on Lake Street, there was a sanctuary.

While the city burned and police rounded up people without homes for violating curfew, a group of volunteers stepped in to protect and serve.

They cut a deal with the owner of the former Sheraton Minneapolis Midtown Hotel to get nearly 200 vulnerable people off the streets and into a safe space with soft beds and hot showers.

In the heartbreak and havoc of the past two weeks, the story of the Sanctuary Hotel was a bright spot; an uplifting story of a community taking care of its own.

And then it was gone.

Crowds milled outside the hotel Tuesday, after the safety and vandalism complaints, after the overdose, after the eviction order. Some people were moving on. Some stayed nearby, unsure where to go next. Many were elderly or visibly unwell. Some were children.

"We literally have nowhere else to go," said Jamie, a small woman with graying hair and a bruised face.

Her voice was hoarse, she said, from sleeping on the streets and out in the elements. She said her bruises came from an assault while she was sleeping at a bus stop. Someone tried to rob her and when she didn't have anything worth stealing, they hit her in the face with a gun.

"Just three days ago," she added, "I was asleep in Peavey Park."

Minneapolis police knelt on George Floyd's neck until he died, crying out for his mother.

Police attacked unarmed protesters, slashed car tires, and denied any wrongdoing unless confronted with video evidence of what they'd done wrong.

If this is policing, people started to say, stop policing.

The ones we didn't protect or serve

There must be a better way to protect and serve.

City officials are talking now about pulling apart the police department and reassembling it into a force that lives up to the motto painted on the squad car doors. While they talk, the scene outside the Sanctuary Hotel is a reminder of how far this city falls short of that promise every day.

"Don't look at the people in the situation," said Desmond Carthron. "Look at the situation the people is in.

Police arrested him during the unrest, he said, released him at 1 in the morning, in the middle of curfew, with nowhere to go and no way to get there. In the middle of the night, in defiance of curfew, volunteers were waiting outside the police station with food, drinks and the offer of a ride back to the Sanctuary Hotel.

"It was supposed to be a sanctuary," said Vaughn Yaints, who found three or four nights of rest there, reveling in a quiet room, a private bathroom, cable TV and air conditioning when the temperatures outside soared into the 90s. He repaid the kindness by volunteering and helping out around the hotel.

There should have been more security, he said, but the volunteers did their best. More than most of us do for the people sleeping in parks, on public transit and in tent encampments all over the metro area.

If Minneapolis is going to build a public safety system, it would be nice to start here, with people who need safety and security the most.

A handful of volunteers stood in a cloud of smoke and tear gas and figured out how to save 200 people for two weeks.

Minneapolis can figure out how to save Brooke Flying Hawk, who sat outside the Sanctuary Hotel in her mobility scooter, clutching the camping gear she'd just been given, fighting tears.

"I've been homeless for the last two years. Sleeping on the streets. Sleeping in bus stops," she said. "I'm so grateful they gave us this place. A whole five-star hotel. ... I love you all. God bless Minneapolis."

jennifer.brooks@startribune.com · 612-673-4008

Follow Jennifer on Twitter: @stribrooks

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

'We're going to be OK'

ARTICLE DLXVI. 'WE'RE GOING TO BE OK'

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 11, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: TASTE; Pg. 1T

Length: 1190 words

Byline: HANNAH SAYLE; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: Shuttered by COVID-19. Damaged by riots. But this Minneapolis man pledges to rebuild.

Body

Chris Montana thought the biggest hurdle he would face in 2020 was a cross-country move with his family.

His wife, Shanelle, had accepted a job in renewable energy and moved to California with their three boys, ages 2, 4 and 6. The plan was for Montana to keep his distillery, Du Nord Craft Spirits in Minneapolis, and split time between an apartment on Lake Street and their new home on the West Coast.

Five months later, Montana can add one global pandemic and one devastating warehouse fire to the list of hurdles he's had to overcome. To his résumé, he also can add Hand Sanitizer Producer and Food Bank Operator.

"There's been so much change going on, there is no normal," Montana said. "But I think it's OK for now. It always could be worse."

Du Nord, which opened in 2013, had grown to be a part of the neighborhood in south Minneapolis with a small but popular cocktail room tucked away in a largely industrial area off S. Snelling Avenue.

It had the distinction of being one of the first distilleries in the Twin Cities and the first black-owned craft distillery in the country. From its modest warehouse, it produced award-winning L'Etoile Vodka and Fitzgerald Gin and offered tours to the public. Its unfussy cocktail room was a place to sample the spirits, straight or mixed into a signature drink.

With the help of Shanelle, Montana had built the business from scratch in the neighborhood he was raised in. He knew there were easier places to open a cocktail room, neighborhoods with more foot traffic and younger residents.

"But I know the people of south Minneapolis," he said, "and all of my suspicions have been confirmed: They come out to support you."

'We're going to be OK'

The business wasn't just doing well, it was growing via a restaurant in partnership with local nonprofit Eat for Equity. From the commercial kitchen in an adjacent building, Eat for Equity planned to hire community chefs to provide food for the cocktail room. They would recruit chefs who were underrepresented in the Twin Cities dining scene. The menus would change, reflecting a diverse cast of cooking talent.

By mid-March, those plans evaporated.

In response to the COVID-19 pandemic, a state order shut down all nonessential businesses, including Du Nord's cocktail room. The Eat for Equity restaurant was put on hold indefinitely.

Losing the cocktail room wiped out the bulk of Du Nord's revenue, but Montana was able to quickly shift the company's focus to making hand sanitizer, which was suddenly in short supply nationwide. Within weeks, the business settled into a new role as "hand sanitizer factory," and Montana prepared to rejoin his family in California.

"I thought that having switched to hand sanitizer we knew a little bit more about what we were doing and I wouldn't have to be here as much," said Chris. "But then this hit."

In the early morning hours of May 29, the Du Nord warehouse building was damaged in a rash of fires and looting that followed the killing of George Floyd.

The sprinkler system came on in time to stop the flames from ripping through pallets full of apple liqueur and vodka. But the warehouse building was flooded. The cocktail room, with "Black Owned" signs in its windows, was untouched.

By a stroke of luck, much of the ethanol, a highly flammable alcohol used as the base of many hand sanitizers, had already been removed from the warehouse. Just weeks earlier, sensing they needed more space to mix and bottle the hand sanitizer, Montana had decided to move the entire operation to a rented space in St. Paul.

Montana pivoted once more. Several local grocery stores and essential businesses had been damaged in the riots. By Sunday, he and volunteers had converted his warehouse to a fully operational food bank.

Today, people stream in and out of the building at 32nd Street and Snelling Avenue, carrying bundles of necessities: milk, diapers, soap, water. Donors pull up and drop off carloads of bread, canned goods and feminine hygiene products.

Montana often would be at the center of it all, next to a truck loaded with donated goods, its driver's side window still smashed from the night of the attack.

Paying the price

The fires damaged more than his business. Just 24 hours after the distillery was set on fire, Montana woke up in his rented Lake Street apartment to the sound of a fire alarm. As he evacuated, he saw that someone had set the bottom floor of the building on fire.

"There were fires across the street from us, but I thought we'd be OK," Montana said. He spent the next four nights in a hotel in Bloomington.

'We're going to be OK'

Still, he understands why the riots happened, how the peaceful protests turned destructive.

"Yes, it hurts, when you come in and say, 'We've tried to do good here' and you see that someone set your stuff on fire," Montana said. "That hurts, it's going to hurt. Anyone who says it doesn't is lying.

"But the story here is the protest. The story is all the people who got together. The story is the latent anger that runs into the propellant of fatigue caused by watching this happen over and over again.

"I remember being a kid marching in a protest for Rodney King. And then here I am at another protest and the chant is exactly the same: 'No justice, no peace.' "

The same day they started the food pantry, he and Shanelle launched a fundraiser to support rebuilding brown- and black-owned businesses damaged in the riots. The Du Nord Riot Recovery Fund has so far raised nearly half a million dollars.

As for Du Nord's recovery, Montana hopes that the insurance coverage as well as the support they've received from the national distillery community will help them come back "better than ever."

"We're going to be OK. Du Nord is the first black-owned distillery in America," Montana said. "We need to keep this thing. We need to build it. And it needs to be something that sticks around that I can hand off to my kids."

For now, Du Nord will continue running its food bank and producing hand sanitizer from its St. Paul facility. As soon as possible, they want to get back into distilling, making the craft spirits that their business is built on. But it will take time.

The space they would normally use for distilling is occupied by the food bank. Their bottling machine, destroyed in the fire and flooding, is now, as Montana described it, an "expensive paperweight."

"What would make it all worth it is if this were a turning point" in race relations, Montana said. "If that's what it took so that my kids would grow up and not have to have 'the conversation' with their kids, telling them about how things would be different for them because of the color of their skin? Then it would absolutely be worth it. I'd pay that price any day. I would pay it over and over again."

Two weeks after he was supposed to reunite with his family, Montana finally boarded a plane heading west. Talking to him from the runway, his voice sounded softer, more tired. What had he told his boys about Minneapolis, about the business, about why he'd been away so long?

"Nothing," he said. "They're too young. They don't know that the color of their skin matters yet. I'd like to keep it that way as long as I can."

Hannah Sayle · @saylehan

Load-Date: June 11, 2020

ARTICLE DLXVII. OFFICERS CONDEMN CHAUVIN, SALUTE CHIEF - CORRECTION APPENDED

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 12, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Correction Appended

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1006 wordsByline: ROCHELLE OLSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Several Minneapolis police officers issued a public letter Thursday condemning the killing of George Floyd, embracing Chief Medaria Arradondo and vowing to work toward regaining public trust.

The letter, obtained by the Star Tribune, begins, "Dear Everyone - but especially Minneapolis citizens," and says it represents how the "vast majority" of Minneapolis police officers feel.

"We want to work with you and for you to regain your trust," it read, while also making clear that the letter is not representative of the Police Officers' Federation of Minneapolis, with which Arradondo said Wednesday that he was halting contract negotiations.

The writers "wholeheartedly condemn" fired officer Derek Chauvin, who is in jail awaiting trial on a second-degree murder charge in Floyd's death. Chauvin was captured on video pressing his knee into Floyd's neck on a south Minneapolis street on May 25 as Floyd pleaded for breath before losing consciousness. Two other officers, J Alexander Kueng and Thomas Lane, held Floyd down, and a third, Tou Thao, kept onlookers at bay. They were also fired and are charged with aiding and abetting murder and manslaughter.

"Like us, Derek Chauvin took an oath to hold the sanctity of life most precious," the officers wrote. "Derek Chauvin failed as a human and stripped George Floyd of his dignity and life. This is not who we are."

The four officers involved in Floyd's death were fired by Arradondo the next day. The crime ignited days of protests and led to the current movement to defund or disband the Minneapolis Police Department. Mayor Jacob Frey has said he supports reforms in the department, not a wholesale deconstruction, while nine members of the City Council have said they want to "begin the process of ending" the department.

The letter writers declined further comment, saying the letter speaks for itself. But their action marked a rare example of officers taking a stand outside their ranks.

The signees include some of the department's most prominent and respected officers, including Cmdr. Charlie Adams, who now runs its community engagement efforts.

Lt. Mark Klukow, who now works in the First Precinct in downtown Minneapolis, provided security for former Mayor R.T. Rybak, as did officer Mike Kirchen. The two also worked as "Bike Cops for Kids" for years in north Minneapolis, delivering donated bicycles to children and taking them to Twins games.

Other names on the letter are Lt. Rick Zimmerman, who runs the homicide unit, and Sgt. Darcy Klund, who commands the First Precinct community response team, two of the most experienced homicide investigators in the past three decades. John Delmonico, the former head of the union that represents the police, also was a signee.

"We are leaders, formal and informal, and from all ranks within the Minneapolis Police Department," the letter said. "We're not the union or the administration. We are officers who represent the voices of hundreds of other Minneapolis Police Officers. Hundreds. We acknowledge that Chief Arradondo needs each of us to dutifully follow him while he shows us the way."

The others who signed the letter include officers Christie Nelson, Nick Torborg, Pete Stanton, Gary Nelson, Rich Jackson, Mohamed Abdullahi, Molly Fischer and Steve McCarty.

Also Thursday, a group of community civil rights activists expressed support for Arradondo and slammed Frey and the City Council for what the activists called political grandstanding on national media.

The group of more than two dozen, led by Nekima Levy Armstrong and the Rev. Brian Herron, also called for the police union to prove it's on the side of public safety by ousting elected union chief Bob Kroll.

Levy Armstrong said council members who called for disbanding or defunding the police are trying to make political points without offering specific proposals. None of the activists was informed or consulted about the ideas before nine council members endorsed them last weekend, she said.

"They're usurping the will of the people by jumping so far ahead without actually" consulting activists, Levy Armstrong said.

Arradondo, however, immediately fired the four officers involved in Floyd's death and moved to sever discussions with the union, she said.

After the news conference, some members of the group were upstairs in a large conference room talking candidly to Frey about wanting to be involved in community building, bringing in jobs and keeping out crime.

"No one's attacking you, but we're at you because you're the man," said Alfonzo Willis, a contractor who lives in the city. "The world is watching; we need to send the right message."

V.J. Smith, president of the Minneapolis Chapter of MAD DADS, a nonprofit that fights drug abuse and social destruction, said the right people are present and willing to do the work, but they also need access to good jobs with benefits and help from the city. "We have the greatest opportunity, mayor, to change the community," he said.

Frey listened intently and thanked everyone for their leadership and commitment. "As we move forward, it will be black voices, it will be your voices, at the center of this change," he said.

Later Thursday, several hundred people gathered at a rally outside the Hennepin County Government Center. Wearing masks and holding signs, the crowd listened as speakers took the stage for more than an hour.

Michelle Gross, president of Communities United Against Police Brutality, said a year is too long to wait to reform the Police Department - an allusion to City Council President Lisa Bender saying a pledge to begin the process was the start of a "yearlong conversation."

"We're not waiting a year for justice," Gross said. "There are things they could have been doing all along the way."

"Now is not the time to be quiet," said Minneapolis NAACP President Leslie Redmond. "Now it's time to get loud. It's time to represent. Now is the time to activate like we've never activated before."

Staff writer Eric Roper contributed to this report.

Rochelle Olson · 612-673-1747

Twitter: @rochelleolson

Correction

This story incorrectly attributed criticism of Mayor Jacob Frey at a news conference to an entire group of activists and community faith leaders. Not everyone held the same position and the faith leaders said they support Frey.

Correction-Date: June 13, 2020

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

Floyd's death spurs question: What is a black life worth?

ARTICLE DLXVIII. FLOYD'S DEATH SPURS QUESTION: WHAT IS A BLACK LIFE WORTH?

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 12, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1377 words

Byline: Aaron Morrison

Highlight: In death, Floyd has created an invaluable and, some say, unprecedented moment for the national struggle against institutional racism and inequality.

Body

MINNEAPOLIS - For 12-year-old Tamir Rice, it was simply carrying a toy handgun. For Eric Garner, it was allegedly selling untaxed cigarettes. For Michael Brown, Sandra Bland and Ahmaud Arbery, it was the minor offenses of jaywalking, failing to signal a lane change and trespassing on a residential construction site.

And for George Floyd, it was an accusation he used a fake $20 bill at a grocery store. While in police custody on May 25, Floyd repeatedly pleaded "I can't breathe," as a white officer in Minneapolis pressed his knee into the black man's neck for nearly nine minutes.

"George wasn't hurting anyone that day," his brother, Philonise Floyd, said Wednesday in testimony to a House Judiciary Committee hearing on policing practices and law enforcement accountability.

"He didn't deserve to die over $20. I am asking you, is that what a black man's life is worth?"

Twenty dollars: To some, that's chump change. But George Floyd was not a chump, family and friends in Houston, where he grew up, asserted when they laid him to rest this week in a golden coffin. Those who mourned him at memorials held across three states said the value of the 46-year-old's life far surpassed that.

In death, Floyd has created an invaluable and, some say, unprecedented moment for the national struggle against institutional racism and inequality.

In Minnesota, across the nation and around the world, outrage turned into action as protests grew, propelled by the reality that African Americans become martyrs of the Black Lives Matter movement over such trivial activities - in circumstances where their rights are discarded, their liberty deprived, their lives devalued. And where they're far more likely than whites to die at the hands of police.

"What's exposed in this moment is something black folks have always known: How quickly we can be killed by law enforcement over the most trivial things," said Chelsea Fuller, spokesperson for the Floyd's death spurs question: What is a black life worth?

Movement for Black Lives, a national coalition of more than 150 black-led grassroots organizations seeking the liberation of black people.

"This is now clear as day to everyone, including white people, and we all need to face that the solution to this endemic problem won't be quick or easy, but it is urgent and necessary," she said in a statement.

For some who now seek change, the fix starts with reforming police departments and the U.S. criminal justice system. Others favor a deeper reckoning to address centuries-old assumptions that black lives hold only a fraction of the value placed on the rights, liberty, lives and property of the white majority in America.

"Human life (does not equal) 20 bucks," read a protest sign during a rally last week at the Minnesota Capitol in St. Paul.

A week after Floyd's death, Miski Noor, an activist with the Twin Cities-based Black Visions Collective, visited the area around Cup Foods, the grocery store at Chicago Avenue and 38th Street where an employee called police to report a man who allegedly bought cigarettes with a counterfeit $20 bill.

The intersection has become a makeshift memorial, where flowers, teddy bears, candles, artwork and protest signs surround the spot where Floyd breathed his last breath. Floyd's younger brother, Terrence, stood there on June 1 to urge calm after protests turned to looting and vandalism in cities that included Los Angeles, New York City and San Francisco.

The circumstances of Floyd's death are "the reason why we have to get at the conversation around anti-blackness," said Noor, who lives just blocks from the grocery. Noor said the Floyd arrest started over a "store owner in a majority black and (nonwhite) neighborhood who decides a counterfeit 20 is enough to call the police."

But Jamar Nelson, a spokesman for the owners of Cup Foods, said it was important to recognize who is responsible for Floyd's death.

"We do our community a huge disservice if we continue to focus on the call and not how police officers have a reckless disregard for the lives of black and brown men," he said.

Echoing that sentiment, Mahmoud "Mike" Abumayyaleh, co-owner of the grocery, attended the Minneapolis memorial for Floyd wearing a T-shirt that read, "We can't breathe," a reference to the man's last words under the knee of Officer Derek Chauvin. The officer, who has since been fired, is charged with second-degree murder.

Various studies of criminal justice data show that African Americans are far more likely than whites to be pulled over by police, and are as much as three times more likely to be searched. Black people are roughly 13% of the population, whereas the white population is about 60%.

Black men were about 2.5 times more likely than white men to be killed by police between 2013 and 2018, according to an August 2019 study published by the National Academy of Sciences. Black women were 1.4 more times likely than white women to be killed by police, according to the same study.

The Movement for Black Lives is behind a push for local communities to defund police departments nationwide, and reinvest in struggling black communities to address economic inequality and disparities in education and health care.

Floyd's death spurs question: What is a black life worth?

Though the Minneapolis City Council recently announced intentions to disband and re-purpose the police department in the wake of Floyd's death, such efforts have drawn strong rebuke from President Donald Trump.

"There won't be defunding, there won't be dismantling of our police," Trump said this week, adding that police were doing a "fantastic" job.

The response to the outrage over Floyd's death doesn't have to be defunding police, said Arthur Rizer, who directs the criminal justice program at R Street, a Washington D.C.-based nonprofit that favors limited, effective government. The response could instead be to reform laws and policies that disproportionately criminalize black people, he said.

"There's so many nickel-and-dime laws around that we really have to review what we have, what we need and then get rid of some of these things," said Rizer, who is white and previously worked as a patrol officer in Washington state and as a federal prosecutor in California.

Under Minnesota law, the counterfeiting charge that cost Floyd his life carries a jail sentence of up to a year, or a maximum of five years of imprisonment for a repeat offender. Even if there was probable cause to investigate Floyd, the law doesn't require "a very intense arrest on the spot," Rizer said.

"If I would have been (Floyd), they would not have assumed that I was trying to do something bad," he said. "They would have probably assumed that it was some type of accident. That is a big piece that I think we need to focus on."

Deals remain elusive as Minnesota special session approaches Feds deny Minnesota request for aid after George Floyd unrest. Walz has 30 days to appeal. Police reforms among the issues legislators expected to take up when they return to the Capitol NYC mayor helps paint 'Black Lives Matter' outside Trump Tower Lawyer: Over 150 Minneapolis officers seeking disability following unrest

Last week, Floyd's family forwarded their pleas for racial justice to the United Nations. It's at least the third time in the last six years that black American families made appeals for the U.N. to intervene to hold police accountable.

During Floyd's funeral in Houston on Tuesday, Rep. Al Green of Texas called for the creation of a federal "Department of Reconciliation" to address systemic racial inequity that dates back to the abolition of slavery.

"This country has not reconciled its differences with us," said Green, who is black. "We survived slavery, but we didn't reconcile. We survived segregation, but we didn't reconcile. In the highest land, the highest office, it's time to have someone who's going to make it his or her business to seek reconciliation for black people in the United States of America."

Nekima Levy Armstrong, a civil rights lawyer and former president of the Minneapolis NAACP, said the demand that black lives are valued like white lives must begin at the community level.

"I know that if George Floyd were alive today, he would want us to continue this fight, continue holding the powers that be accountable, and remembering all of those who are not here to speak for themselves," she said.

Floyd's death spurs question: What is a black life worth?

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DLXIX. EXPERIENCED JUDGE ASSIGNED TO OFFICERS' CASES IN FLOYD DEATH

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 12, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 554 wordsByline: The Associated PressHighlight: The cases of the four Minneapolis police officers who face charges in the death of George Floyd have been assigned to a Hennepin County judge who has experience as both a defense attorney and a prosecutor. Judge Peter Cahill has been assigned to oversee the cases of Derek Chauvin, J. Kueng, Thomas Lane and Tou [...]Body

The cases of the four Minneapolis police officers who face charges in the death of George Floyd have been assigned to a Hennepin County judge who has experience as both a defense attorney and a prosecutor.

Judge Peter Cahill has been assigned to oversee the cases of Derek Chauvin, J. Kueng, Thomas Lane and Tou Thao. All four are scheduled to appear before him at 12:15 p.m. on June 29, according to a court filing Friday.

Defense attorneys have 10 days to file a request to remove Cahill as the judge. They would have no say in who replaces him and they could not remove his replacement, the Star Tribune reported.

Earl Gray, Lane's attorney, told The Associated Press he wouldn't think of removing Cahill. When asked if all four officers will face trial together or ask to be tried separately, Gray said that issue hasn't been discussed yet, but it will be now that a judge has been assigned.

Attorneys for Chauvin and Kueng had no comment. Messages left with Thao's attorney were not immediately returned Friday.

Floyd, a black man who was handcuffed, died May 25 after Chauvin, a white officer, used his knee to pin Floyd to the ground. Chauvin, who kept his knee on Floyd's neck even after Floyd stopped moving, has been charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and manslaughter.

Lane, Kueng and Thao have been charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and manslaughter. All four officers have been fired.

Experienced judge assigned to officers' cases in Floyd death

Cahill began his career in the county public defender's office in 1984, the Star Tribune reported. He also worked for 10 years in the county attorney's office, serving as the top advisor to Sen. Amy Klobuchar when she was the county's head prosecutor.

He has been a judge since 2007 and has experience in high-profile cases. He has also served as the county's chief judge.

Meanwhile, the Minneapolis City Council members took a first step Friday toward changing the City Charter to allow for abolishing the police department and replacing it with something else.

Five of the 12 council members said Friday that they'll formally introduce a proposal later this month to remove the charter's requirement that the city maintain a police department and fund a minimum number of officers. Voters would have to approve the change if the proposal makes it onto the November ballot.

The Star Tribune reported the announcement came as council members face increased pressure to further define what they meant when a majority of them pledged to eliminate the Minneapolis Police Department following Floyd's death.

Council Member Jeremiah Ellison said he still expects to spend a year seeking feedback from the community about how to change the department, but he fears that if they don't remove that charter provision, it will hamper those efforts. He said removing the language alone won't eliminate the department.

Some business groups and Mayor Jacob Frey have said they prefer changing the department over eliminating it completely.

Protest in Pennsylvania after cop uses knee to restrain man Four pro bono attorneys join Keith Ellison's prosecution team in George Floyd case Fired Minneapolis cops in George Floyd case want gag order lifted Deals remain elusive as Minnesota special session approaches Feds deny Minnesota request for aid after George Floyd unrest. Walz has 30 days to appeal.

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

ARTICLE DLXX. DOYLE MCMANUS: DEFUND POLICE? LET'S START WITH REFORM

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 12, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 845 wordsByline: Doyle McManus

Highlight: Anybody remember "Abolish ICE?" That was progressives' impassioned cry last year after Immigrations and Customs Enforcement agents imprisoned undocumented immigrant children in cages. It was a litmus test of compassion for Democrats running for president. Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand of New York said yes, "abolish ICE." Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts said she'd "replace" the agency. [...]

Body

Anybody remember "Abolish ICE?"

That was progressives' impassioned cry last year after Immigrations and Customs Enforcement agents imprisoned undocumented immigrant children in cages. It was a litmus test of compassion for Democrats running for president.

Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand of New York said yes, "abolish ICE." Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts said she'd "replace" the agency. Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont said he'd "restructure" it.

But Joe Biden, the leading moderate in the race, refused to get near the idea. Eventually, "Abolish ICE" disappeared - and Biden won the nomination.

Now, after George Floyd's death under the knee of a Minneapolis police officer, progressive groups have raised a new banner: "Defund the police."

It may be the worst political slogan ever coined.

For one thing, its proponents say it doesn't mean what it sounds like - the abolition of police departments, a proposal that would be an election year gift to President Donald Trump.

The defunders say they want to trim police budgets and redirect the money to social services, and let cops go back to solving crimes and other core functions. Even then, the idea is massively unpopular.

A Yahoo News/YouGov poll last week found only 16% of Democrats favor cuts in police funding. Republicans are even less enthusiastic.

"Abolish ICE" was more popular than that.

Biden's response was crisp. "I don't support defunding the police," he said Monday. "I support conditioning federal aid to police based on whether or not they meet certain basic standards of decency."

That's no surprise. Biden is a man of the center - the center of the Democratic Party, that is. He built his Senate career as a "law-and-order" candidate during the high-crime era, with strong support from police unions.

He's moved left since then, but "Defund the police?" His 77-year-old political antennae are too well-tuned for that.

More striking were the similar reactions of most other Democrats, including leading progressives. Sanders said he wants to pay well-trained police officers more, not less. Rep. Karen Bass (D-Calif.), chair of the Congressional Black Caucus, said the slogan was "a distraction."

Instead of defunding police, House Democrats plan to pass a sweeping police reform bill with a long list of sensible proposals: a ban on federal aid for police departments that use chokeholds, mandated use of body cameras for police, a change in qualified immunity laws to let people seek civil damages against abusive police, and a national misconduct registry to track bad cops.

Biden has endorsed the bill, which is similar to criminal justice proposals he has outlined.

"Let us vow to make this, at last, an era of action to reverse systemic racism," he said in a speech in Philadelphia last week. "Bad cops should be dealt with severely and swiftly. We all need to take a hard look at the culture that allows for these senseless tragedies to keep happening."

And here's what may be the most important development: Most of the public agrees.

A series of public opinion polls found that the wave of overwhelmingly peaceful protests that followed Floyd's death crystallized a remarkable shift in public opinion - in favor of reform.

The Yahoo/YouGov poll, for example, found that fully two-thirds of Americans want to ban police from using chokeholds, including 48% of Republicans.

A Monmouth poll found that 57% of Americans believe police officers are more likely to use excessive force in a confrontation if the target is black; four years ago, only 34% gave that answer.

What provoked the huge change in public sentiment? I'll nominate an obvious cause: ubiquitous cellphone cameras, which enable protesters and bystanders to record police misconduct and upload it to social media.

In an earlier era, the Minneapolis police could claim - as they tried to do this time - that Floyd died in a violent struggle with officers. But we know otherwise, because we watched him die after nearly nine agonizing minutes with an armed officer pressing his weight on his neck and others holding his legs.

As the protests swelled, Trump resorted to the age-old playbook of "law and order," charging that the problem was violent agitators running amok. But anyone with a smartphone could see that wasn't true.

He tweeted that a 75-year-old protester who suffered serious head injuries after being shoved by police in Buffalo, N.Y., had faked his fall and might have been "an Antifa provocateur." That one didn't fly, either.

Doyle McManus: Defund police? Let's start with reform

Trump normally displays a canny sense of the public mood. But he has put himself squarely on the wrong side of this issue - not only morally, but as a matter of practical politics.

He doesn't seem to have noticed that most voters think he's dead wrong.

Suddenly, thanks to the tragedy of Minneapolis, Democrats have an opportunity to build a majority - perhaps even a bipartisan majority - in favor of criminal justice reform.

It's too late for George Floyd, but just in time for the November election.

Doyle McManus is a columnist for the Los Angeles Times. Readers may send him email at doyle.mcmanus@latimes.com

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DLXXI. MINNESOTA UNITED'S JACORI HAYES ADDS VOICE FOR JUSTICE: 'ENOUGH IS ENOUGH'

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 12, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1258 wordsByline: Andy GrederHighlight: New MN United midfielder Jacori Hayes is using his platform as a professional athlete to help educate teammates and others about the systematic racism he and other African-Americans have grown up negotiating.Body

Jacori Hayes' personal experiences with racism as a black man in America have not received headlines. One encounter with police in Chicago overshadowed a pizza dinner with friends as he had to prove he wasn't someone cops were allegedly pursuing.

Hayes has taken precautions to avoid other incidents. While casually perusing items in a store, he has felt the need to buy a pack of gum so as not to give employees the impression he's stealing. While on the street at night, he's cognizant of the distance he keeps between other walkers. He leaves his hooded sweatshirt at home, so he doesn't appear "menacing."

"There are so many micro ones that you shouldn't really have to think about," Hayes told the Pioneer Press this week.

A new midfielder on Minnesota United, Hayes started journaling this year. It could be jotting down whatever happened that day or organizing his thoughts on a subject.

In the wake of George Floyd's death while under the knee of a white Minneapolis police officer on May 25, Hayes had an old friend from their youth soccer club in Maryland suggest he write about race. Then a United official checked in on Hayes and said the club would amplify a message if he wanted to share.

At the end of May, Hayes penned a nearly 1,000-word essay on mnufc.com, touching on his personal anecdotes, the numbness he felt watching the video of Floyd's death and the path he sees toward substantial cultural changes. He quoted W.E.B DuBois' "double-consciousness, this sense of always looking at one's self through the eyes of others, of measuring one's soul by the tape of a world that looks on in amused contempt and pity."

Hayes' essay noted the root cause of protests have not been addressed in the past, and cited how President Trump called protesters in Minneapolis "thugs."

Minnesota United's Jacori Hayes adds voice for justice: 'Enough is enough'

"When I finished writing, I said, 'Maybe this is helpful for someone else reading it,' " Hayes said. "They might be thinking the same thing and they might not be as lonely or not as confused."

Hayes, 24, grew up in the affluent, primarily African-American community of Prince George County, Md. His parents are engineers, and he earned a physics degree while playing soccer at Wake Forest.

Hayes was the 18th overall pick by FC Dallas in the 2017 MLS draft and played 38 games over three seasons before being traded to Minnesota in January. He had never spoken out about race before last month.

"You don't really want to speak out on it," Hayes explained. "We all know what happened with (former 49ers quarterback) Colin Kaepernick, and you feel like maybe it's not the time or place. You don't want to jeopardize your own personal career doing it. That has always been in the back of my mind. At some point, it's got to be enough is enough. It's bigger than soccer or a personal career; it's about helping out other people."

"I think the world is changing, and the fact that you are allowed to speak on it a lot more and hopefully not get blackballed like Colin Kaepernick was. It is unfortunate that he was the martyr that he is, but he started something. I'm sure he's very proud of what he started. Hopefully, he and many other athletes are able to speak up and not have their personal lives or personal careers affected."

Hayes - who said hasn't, to his knowledge, experienced racism in MLS - has thought about demonstrating during the national anthem before future matches. MLS said this week games at their tournament in Orlando, Fla., in July won't include the "Star-Spangled Banner" because with no fans in attendance, pregame events will be stripped down. Proposed games in home stadiums like Allianz Field later in 2020 could provide another opportunity.

Loons teammate Ike Opara, the MLS defender of the year in 2019, has tweeted snippets of his views. "You can choose to be blind about the injustices, broken systems and privileges ... or choose to educate yourself and overcome your biases," he said.

Hayes and Opara, a North Carolina native who joined the Loons before last season, each visited the corner of Chicago Avenue and 38th Street in South Minneapolis. "Going to George Floyd's murder site yesterday still has me (expletive) up on deeper levels," Opara tweeted June 3.

Last weekend, Hayes went to the Cup Foods where Floyd had been arrested for allegedly passing a counterfeit $20 bill. His visit was short.

"I ended up staying one or two minutes and walked away," he said. "I have mixed feelings about going down there just because I saw him die. Part of me didn't want to make it feel like a tourist event, like I'm going down there to take photos and say, 'Yeah, I went there.' Personally, I didn't want to be insensitive."

"It was a lot of things going through my mind and just didn't want to keep revisiting the video that I saw," he added. "Now, I'm seeing the Speedway across the street; I saw that in the video. So, it was bringing up a lot of trauma from the event."

Loons defender Chase Gasper also visited the growing memorial to Floyd, and the white Maryland native said he is proud of his black teammates for their "bravery" making their voices heard.

Minnesota United's Jacori Hayes adds voice for justice: 'Enough is enough'

"It was truly moving to go to the site," Gasper said this week. "It's sad that it's taken this long for such an important subject as race relations and race equality in this country to be on the forefront of everyone's minds. ... But there is a lot of positivity coming from it and momentum for the movement, which is good to see.

"That is because of the likes of Jacori Hayes, Ike Opara and many others throughout the league. They all know that every one of their teammates and coaching staff and the entire club has their back 100 percent. We are going to help them and help for positive change in whatever way we can."

Hayes and white teammates have talked about them educating themselves through reading and understanding white privilege and other topics. "It's been enlightening," Hayes said. "It's things they wouldn't know about because it's not in the popular mainframe."

While the current conversation has been on police brutality and reforming police departments, Hayes noted "there are a lot of layers and different avenues that systemic racism has touched," mentioning demographic gaps in health care and wealth, mass incarceration, and voter suppression.

Minnesota United steals 2-1 win over Kansas City in MLS is Back Tournament Minnesota United pursuing French center back Bakaye Dibassy Loons clear of COVID-19, but Sunday's opponent has a positive case John Shipley: So far, nothing enjoyable about rebooting pro sports Loons goalkeeper Tyler Miller opens up about mental health struggles

Hayes is a big proponent of education and brainstorming ways to use his platform.

"It's not like everything is going to be fixed in weeks after hundreds of years of it being a certain way," he said. "It's going to take a lot of in-depth planning and serious thought. I don't want, and nor should the solutions be a band-aid. It can't be, 'Let's just throw money at it and it will just fix itself.' It's got to be a well thought out and it will be lasting that way."

Hayes' younger brother, Braxton, turned 13 this month and recently went their parents to the new Black Lives Matter Plaza in Washington, D.C.

"What he is experiencing and witnessing now is more than I ever did at his age," Hayes said. "I am hoping he is taking it all in and learning. For the most part, these more in-depth conversations I hope to have with him in the future when he's ready for it; I don't want to spring it on him too soon. But I feel like as a black kid, you kind of learn these things quickly."

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

ARTICLE DLXXII. WALZ: REFORM OF POLICE NOW SESSION PRIORITY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 12, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1324 wordsByline: JESSIE VAN BERKEL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Minnesota Gov. Tim Walz laid out a wide-ranging overhaul of law enforcement Thursday as lawmakers return to the State Capitol for a special session shadowed by the memory of George Floyd, a black man who died in the hands of Minneapolis police.

Walz, accompanied by DFL leaders, challenged the Legislature to meet calls for action sparked by his death and the protests in Minnesota and across the nation. The DFL plan would reform use-of-force standards, increase oversight of police discipline and encourage community-based alternatives to traditional law enforcement.

But addressing racial inequities in policing will be only a part of the complex and fast-paced work of the Legislature that convenes Friday, as lawmakers forge ahead on a list of unfinished business left behind when they wrapped up the regular session in May.

Topping the list is a massive public works borrowing bill that fell apart amid partisan sniping over Walz's emergency powers during the COVID-19 pandemic. Walz's declaration of another 30-day extension of those powers - the act which triggered the special session - remains a potential roadblock as lawmakers in both parties seek to attach conditions to a public works bonding package expected to top $1 billion.

Lawmakers also need to agree on distributing hundreds of millions of dollars in federal assistance to local units of government from the CARES Act, one of the last major initiatives of Congress before Floyd's death turned the nation's attention from the pandemic to issues of race and police behavior.

Legislators expect to pass a tax relief measure and grants to help businesses recover from the shutdowns prompted by the pandemic. And there are discussions about helping Minneapolis and St. Paul recover from the damage wrought by several days of violent protests following Floyd's death.

While the pandemic dominated the closing days of the regular session, the mood of the state and the nation has changed palpably since Floyd's death on Memorial Day, with swelling demand for state leaders to reform police practices with regard to people of color.

"This call to a special session is not a call just from me. It's that primal scream you heard from people on the streets demanding justice, demanding it now and demanding us step into this moment," Walz said Wednesday as he announced the new session.

Lawmakers on both sides of the aisle have proposed changes, though it is unclear how much common ground may emerge. Amid a fast-changing political landscape, legislative leaders say they could pass some changes in the next week or two, and they plan to dive into more in-depth measures after that.

GOP Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, R-East Gull Lake, said last week that he thought criminal justice changes need to be vetted and should not be made too quickly. But this week he said he has had many conversations on the topic and changed his mind.

He said he now believes Republicans could agree to ban chokeholds, eliminate binding arbitration for public employees, put the Bureau of Criminal Apprehension in charge of investigating use-of-force cases and make it the duty of officers to intervene and report unauthorized use of force.

There seems to be bipartisan support for some of those proposals, though a couple of public employee unions that largely support Democrats have said they oppose ending binding arbitration.

Walz and a group of DFL leaders laid out more details on their police accountability and reform plans Thursday, saying the world is watching and legislators need to capitalize on the moment to change state laws. Some of their key measures would change the standards for use of deadly force, mandate more training, enhance the power of the Peace Officer Standards and Training (POST) Board and make the board more diverse. The plan would specifically ban "warrior style" police training backed by the Minneapolis police union.

House Republicans criticized aspects of the plan Thursday for not eliminating binding arbitration and for adding felon voting rights into the mix.

Rep. Jamie Becker-Finn, DFL-Roseville, called felon voting rights a key part of the DFL plan. "Giving folks the ability to vote is the most core thing we could possibly do right now to give folks a voice in what their government is doing and how we move forward," she said.

House Speaker Melissa Hortman, DFL-Brooklyn Park, said legislators are gathering community input to identify short-, medium- and long-term priorities. In all, the Democratic-controlled House plans to introduce about 20 bills related to criminal justice reform.

DFL Rep. Carlos Mariani, chairman of the House public safety and criminal justice reform committee, believes increasing POST Board diversity is one of the changes that could happen quickly. He said the office of Attorney General Keith Ellison could quickly be made the default organization to prosecute police-involved deaths, instead of county attorney offices.

Gazelka said county attorneys have raised concerns with that, and he opposes the idea. Gazelka also said he opposes any effort to defund police, an idea raised by Black Lives Matter activists and a majority of Minneapolis City Council members.

It remains unclear whether the push for police reform will be tied politically to other bills. The infrastructure bonding bill requires a supermajority to pass, making it one of the few points of leverage for the minority party in each legislative chamber. House GOP leaders sought to tie the bonding bill to an end to Walz's emergency powers during the regular session in May.

Republican House Minority Leader Kurt Daudt, R-Crown, said while he still opposes the extension of the powers, he is "very willing to be flexible" on a bonding bill during the special session. His caucus wants to see a borrowing package that includes important projects that would spur economic growth during the coronavirus outbreak, Daudt said. But he also said Republicans have "grave concerns about increasing our spending during a time of deficit."

Since Floyd's death, Sen. Jeff Hayden, the assistant DFL minority leader in the Senate, has talked about linking the bonding bill to police reform instead. "If it's up to me, you're not going to get our votes for a bonding bill until we pass significant law enforcement reforms," he said.

But DFL leaders such as Hortman and Senate Minority Leader Susan Kent, DFL-Woodbury, have not taken that hard of a line. The House's People of Color and Indigenous Caucus, which is leading the DFL work on police reforms, is not talking about holding up bonding right now, Mariani said. He described blocking the bonding bill as pulling "a nuclear switch."

The debate over the bonding bill also is playing out against the backdrop of a projected $2.4 billion budget deficit. Daudt said if the Legislature agrees to new spending during the special session, such as additional debt payments for a bonding bill, the costs should be offset by state budget cuts.

The special session, anticipated since May 18, has taken on new urgency since the protests after Floyd's death. State general obligation bonding could include money for a library and career development center damaged during protests, Hortman said. But state leaders are discussing a separate appropriations bonding bill to help private businesses. The time frame to get all this work done remained unclear. Gazelka said they could finish the bills they agree on in less than a week, then other items could take all summer. But he said, "I don't see being in session unless we agree."

Hortman said she doesn't think they should leave until their work is done.

Every time Walz opts to extend his emergency powers for another 30 days, he needs to call the Legislature back into session. So even if lawmakers do end the session quickly, they could be back in a month.

"I anticipate that this is going to be a summer where we're pretty much in session," Walz said this week.

Jessie Van Berkel · 651-925-5044

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

ARTICLE DLXXIII. BREMER CEO JEANNE CRAIN TAKES STOCK OF A WORLD IN TURMOIL

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

June 12, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 597 words

Byline: Patrick Rehkamp

Body

Bremer Bank was in a legal battle for its future over the winter. Then the coronavirus hit and the death of George Floyd while in police custody rocked the Twin Cities.

This week, Bremer Financial Corp. CEO Jeanne Crain spoke to the Business Journal about navigating remote work while also pushing for systemic changes in how police and minority communities interact. Here's an edited version of that conversation.

This interview was scheduled before George Floyd's death, but we need to start there. In general on that topic, what do you want to say?

Well, we don't have any contracts with the Minneapolis Police Department, and I'm thankful for that. It's painful to see what systemic racism looks like. As a white person, I cannot truly understand what people of color go through everyday. It's just no longer an option just to talk about this. Inaction is not an option.

It starts with listening and learning. We're going to work over the next few weeks to define Bremer's role in the movement.

Regarding the coronavirus, how has the bank changed?

Overall, the change has gone extremely well. We committed to paying all of our employees, no layoffs. We're paying our frontline branch personnel a weekly bonus. Around 90% of our workforce is working remotely.

What do you think has changed forever with the bank?

We already had workplace flexibility and had people working from different states; granted that was a small percentage. Going forward, we're going to be thoughtful about how we explore offering working remotely for new hires. I will say there's so many of our employees who are ready to come back to work. There's something to be said for team culture.

What's opening for the bank in terms of office functions?

We haven't opened any of our lobbies yet, and meetings are by appointment only. Right now, we're talking about how to reopen our locations. We have plexiglass ordered and coming and personal protective equipment. We were going down a digital transformation and Covid-19 has fast-tracked that.

How did the Small Business Administration's Payroll Protection Program work for the bank?

We're really proud of our work. We have done $1.5 billion in loans for about 7,000 applications. Roughly 170,000 people were kept on the payroll for these customers as a result.

Which clients have been hit the hardest by the coronavirus?

Hotels are certainly one. We have hotels that reported 5% of the revenue they're used to having. We've seen some climb to 20%, but that figure is still really challenging. Hospitality sectors in general have been hit hard. Our investor real estate portfolio and multifamily housing have done really well.

Regarding the lawsuits the bank is dealing with over its future, how has the coronavirus impacted that?

I would just say the litigation is ongoing. We're confident in our legal position.

You used to spend a lot of time on the road driving and visiting branches, employees and customers. What are you doing now?

I'm working from home and on video and calls all day long now. The challenge is I'm on a call from 8 to 9, then 9 to 10 and then 10 to 11. In the past I had a half hour to drive and regroup. All that being said, I'm extremely grateful. I'd much rather be sitting across from someone. It's harder looking at a video screen.

What are you doing right now to relieve stress?

My dog has gotten more walks recently than ever before. I try to exercise, either on a treadmill or some light weight lifting. I like to get out on the bike.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

End of Document

Lynx will keep issue at forefront

ARTICLE DLXXIV. LYNX WILL KEEP ISSUE AT FOREFRONT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 12, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 1C

Length: 730 words

Byline: KENT YOUNGBLOOD; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: Cheryl Reeve said she and team will work for social justice and change.

Body

For Lynx coach Cheryl Reeve, it was a watershed moment.

Watching the video of George Floyd with a policeman's knee on his neck. Seeing how the city of Minneapolis, the state, the nation, the world, reacted to his death. Feeling the energy of the protests that ensued.

"When this happened," Reeve said, "if it didn't affect you in a negative way, you don't have a pulse, you don't have a heart."

On a Zoom conference call with her players and coaches, everyone agreed: On the court the Lynx will play to win. Off the court they'll work for change, together. The system needs changing.

Reeve and her players are still talking about how best to keep this issue at the fore front and to change the status quo. The Lynx and Wolves partnering with the Minneapolis Foundation was a first step; Reeve and Wolves coach Ryan Saunders will serve on one of two advisory committees with the foundation.

"We won't let the conversation die," Reeve said. "We will do our part to see that systemic racism, particularly with the police, remains a topic of conversation until it leads to meaningful change."

Just how far the Lynx will take that mission remains to be seen, but they will be talking about social justice and backing it up with action. It's clear Reeve and her players don't think basketball is more important than the issues - with the culture of policing at the top of that list.

"Thankfully it's being recorded now," Reeve said of videos capturing police using excessive force. "Those who didn't believe it before, now you have no choice but to believe. So this will be our approach."

History repeating

Reeve said the footage of Floyd's death "took me right back to that morning in Connecticut."

Lynx will keep issue at forefront

That was 2016, and the news Philando Castile had been shot during a traffic stop in Falcon Heights. The day before, outside a store in Baton Rouge, La., that was close to where former Lynx star Seimone Augustus grew up, Alton Sterling had been shot by police.

Back in 2016, after the morning shootaround, Reeve asked captains Augustus, Maya Moore, Rebekkah Brunson and Lindsay Whalen what they wanted to do.

Two days later, at a home game against Dallas at Target Center, the Lynx captains donned T-shirts for a pregame news conference.

"Change starts with us," the T-shirts said. "Justice and Accountability." On the back were Sterling and Castile's names along with the emblem of the Dallas Police Department, whose members had been ambushed that week. And: "Black Lives Matter." Lynx players wore the T-shirts during warmups.

There was pushback then, when four off-duty police officers walked out of the arena. At the time Reeve felt it was the right thing to do, and the players appreciated a coach who cared about their feelings.

"It came from our hearts being broken," Moore said in 2017, recalling the event. "And she let us focus on it. She let us be human."

As Reeve noted this week, it was a commitment to this cause that caused Moore to leave the game. She is about to enter her second year of sabbatical, having spent much of that time working for the release of Jonathan Irons, a Missouri man she and others feel was wrongfully convicted and jailed for burglary and assault more than two decades ago.

Whalen has retired and become the coach of the Gophers women's basketball team. Augustus signed with Los Angeles during the offseason. Brunson is now one of Reeve's assistant coaches.

Lasting change needed

What strikes Reeve now is how little things have changed when it comes, as she said, to police reform and a two-tiered justice system.

How the team had taken a stand, then stopped talking about Castile. Everyone moved on, Reeve said, but nothing changed.

Not this time. This time around the Lynx don't want this issue to fade away with time. There likely will be some pushback this time around, too.

Reeve is OK with that.

The WNBA appears to be closing in on a shortened season that could start in late July, with playoffs carrying into October, with a potential base at the IMG Academy in Bradenton, Fla.

One of the benefits of the WNBA and NBA potentially coming together in one place for the season would be the opportunity for players from around the league to talk and strategize on how best to deliver their message.

"This is a tipping point in our society," Reeve said. "We feel making sure it tips in the right direction, finally, after hundreds of years in our country, is important."

Lynx will keep issue at forefront

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

End of Document

sentiment runs against disbanding police

ARTICLE DLXXV. SENTIMENT RUNS AGAINST DISBANDING POLICE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 12, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 980 wordsByline: JEFFREY MEITRODT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Small-business owners are wary of the radical notion favored by Minneapolis City Council members.Body

Small-business owners in Minneapolis who lost everything in the riots don't want to lose their police department, too. But nobody thinks it should be business as usual, either.

That view is shared by large and small companies, according to an informal survey conducted by the Star Tribune, which asked dozens of business owners if they support the recent pledge by a City Council majority to dismantle the Minneapolis Police Department in response to public furor over the death of George Floyd.

"What I feel in my heart, and what millions of people feel, is that there is a young girl without a dad who should still be on the planet," said restaurant owner Charles Stotts, whose Town Talk Diner & Gastropub was destroyed in the riots. "There needs to be a fix to this, whatever that fix is."

Jonathan Weinhagen, president & CEO of the Minneapolis Regional Chamber, said the group's members believe the city must reach out to "communities of color" and deliver "significant reform" to the department. After years of complaints, the Minnesota Department of Human Rights recently launched an investigation of the police department to determine if its officers have engaged in discriminatory practices toward people of color.

"We stand with Chief [Medaria] Arradondo and his efforts to hold officers accountable and dramatically overhaul policing in Minneapolis," Weinhagen said in a statement. "Businesses are concerned about calls for abolishing or eliminating the police department. We believe it is important to maintain and improve public safety. And the necessary changes for the MPD will take consensus from the community and continual work from leaders across Minneapolis."

The business community was rattled when nine of 12 seated council members told protesters in Powerderhorn Park on Sunday that they will soon "begin the process of ending the Minneapolis Police

sentiment runs against disbanding police

Department. The announcement came one day after Mayor Jacob Frey told a crowd of protesters he does not support abolishing the MPD.

"We recognize that we don't have all the answers about what a police-free future looks like, but our community does," the council members said in a joint statement. "We're committed to engaging with every willing community member in the City of Minneapolis over the next year to identify what safety looks like for you."

The nine members offered no details on the proposal, but some business owners seized on the phrase "police-free."

"I was already kind of fed up with a lot of the lunatic ideas that have come out of the City Council, even before this," said Don Blyly, who is facing $2 million in losses from the destruction of Uncle Hugo's and Uncle Edgar's bookstores on Chicago Avenue. "The police department needs to be fixed. But if they do the kind of things they are talking about now, then I will not rebuild in the city of Minneapolis."

The council's lack of specifics is infuriating to many business owners, some of whom accused the council of pandering to the mob.

"They are just looking to please some people," said Khaled Aloul, owner of two GM Tobacco stores that were heavily damaged during the riots. "We don't even know what it means: dismantle the police department."

Like other business owners, Aloul was frustrated when he turned to the police for help during the riots. After looters broke into his store on Lake Street, he said he spotted several officers and asked for help.

"They said we have instructions from the mayor not to interfere," said Aloul, who lost an estimated $800,000 in tobacco products to looters. "I understand they were overwhelmed, but I think if they had fired off a couple of shots they could have scared people off."

Despite the experience, Aloul doesn't like the idea of disbanding the department.

"How do you know the new thing is going to be better?" he asked. "Can you imagine a town without police? Look at what happened when the police didn't come. The whole area is a disaster. It looks like we had a civil war here."

Some business owners said they would like to see the department relinquish some duties to others, such as dealing with mentally ill individuals or the homeless. The Minneapolis Downtown Council has recommended that mental health professionals "co-respond" to police calls involving emotionally distraught residents.

Some business owners believe that violent outcomes could be avoided if police were better trained. In Floyd's case, things spiraled out of control when officers responded to a complaint that Floyd passed a counterfeit $20 bill, a minor crime. The Minnesota Business Partnership, which represents some of the largest companies in the Twin Cities, has called for increased training on "interactions with African Americans and people of color."

"Getting rid of crime fighters won't eliminate crime," said Charlie Weaver, executive director of the Partnership, whose members include U.S. Bank, Wells Fargo and the Star Tribune. "So we support that crime fighters get good training and that they be held accountable if they exceed the rules."

sentiment runs against disbanding police

The partnership is asking state lawmakers to make it easier to get rid of problem cops, including the repeal of laws requiring binding arbitration for law enforcement officers accused of misconduct. The group also is calling for a change in collective bargaining rules that impede discipline of officers who "seriously betray the public trust."

That doesn't go far enough for some business owners.

"I definitely want the city to defund them and start over," said Ray James, whose Fade Factory Barber Shop on West Broadway was destroyed during the rioting. "I think we need to start letting people from our community police our own community, because we all love each other and we kind of know the problem people. And sometimes, problem people ain't really problem people."

Staff writers Jim Buchta and Dee DePass contributed to this report.

Jeffrey Meitrodt · 612-673-4132

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

MINDWORKS

ARTICLE DLXXVI. MINDWORKS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 12, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 7ALength: 2080 wordsByline: MISTI SNOW, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Thirty years ago, we asked children about race ... // The answers were revealing then and unsettling now.Body

"[If I were white] the cops wouldn't always be pulling me over ready to whip out their guns even if I just blink. I've been pulled over just for the color of my skin many times, too many times."

Jim, teenager, Minneapolis, American Indian, June 13, 1990

...

"If a black person cussed out a teacher, they would get sent to the office so fast it wouldn't even be funny. If a white person cussed out the teacher, the teacher would say, 'I'll excuse that one.' "

Shana, 13, Minneapolis, black, June 13, 1990

...

"I wish I had been a different race than white, for mostly whites are racist."

Anne, 11, Minneapolis, white, June 13, 1990

...

"Changing races would be like changing lives and worlds."

Bridget, 15, West St. Paul, white, June 13, 1990

Those words were printed in the Star Tribune 30 years ago this week in a special Mindworks package that was part of the newspaper's "race project." Mindworks no longer exists, but from 1983 until 2001, when I moved to Virginia, I was the editor. Every month during the school year, I would present a topic and young people from first grade through senior high would respond. On average 5,000 to 10,000 mostly handwritten responses were received each month.

MINDWORKS

For a special Mindworks for the race project, I asked: Imagine that you MUST choose to become another race. Which race would you choose and why? What do you think would be the advantages and disadvantages of becoming a member of that race?

Thirty years later, the responses remain provocative.

The basic question, which was suggested by a writer who understood the power of imagination, was inspired. I had learned through years of posing questions about sensitive issues that often the truth comes out sideways. Answers to direct questions (Are you racist?) are often self-serving lies; indirect, multilayered questions can elicit more subtle, revealing responses.

This was not, however, the view of a couple of well-meaning administrators from the Minneapolis Public Schools who told me they would ban Minneapolis schools from participating. I don't have a tape of the phone conversation, but I remember feeling as if I were Alice down the rabbit hole. One administrator told me that he was white but loved all things Asian, so why should he have to define himself as white? Another said I should consider expanding the options to include students who might want to be French.

That the questions were irrelevant because "there is no race but the human race" was also offered.

This might be scientifically true, but if this had been the prevalent attitude in 1990, I would not have needed to ask the questions. If this were true in 2020, George Floyd would be alive and Minneapolis would not have burned.

That I was requiring the writers to identify their race was an especially sensitive issue. I doubt very much this topic or the identification would be allowed today, and I do not see that as progress, especially in light of recent events.

I understood the naysayers' impetus. This was a time when Minneapolis was striving to be "colorblind," a policy rife with good intentions and riddled with ignorance. For a while, if I remember correctly, crime suspects were identified in the media without regard to their skin color, as if a victim wouldn't notice if her assailant was white or black or Asian or Native American.

I thought at the time, and still do, that humans are observant creatures who notice the colors of birds, flowers, cars. Of course humans notice another's skin color. The observation isn't wrong; it's the racist attitudes formed and racist actions taken on the basis of that observation that are wrong.

The context at the time

Fortunately, Minneapolis students did respond. Unfortunately, the numbers were lower than expected. Only about 3,600 responses were received from the entire state, and the preponderance were from white students.

Social context matters. The students were writing before the now-ubiquitous social media, smartphones, Google and 24-hour news, and before the first black president, so the primary influences on these young people were relatives, neighborhoods, schools, TV and movies.

Cultural context is critical as well. According to movie listings, on June 13, 1990, Minneapolis moviegoers could see "Another 48 Hrs." featuring Eddie Murphy as an ex-con teaming up with a white cop; "Driving Miss Daisy," about a white Southern woman and her black chauffeur, and "Glory," an account of an all-black regiment in the Civil War, which was led by a white officer.

MINDWORKS

That night after watching "Brewster Place," about a black inner-city neighborhood in 1967, TV viewers could tune in to the black-hosted "Arsenio Hall Show." A showcase of African music was featured that night at First Avenue.

Clearly, blacks and black culture were highly visible in that era, and yet the racism was palpable. Thirty years later, despite an exponential increase in black visibility - even a black president - that racism remains.

Racial attitudes had appeared in previous Mindworks. Students said they were hurt by being called "niggers" or "chinks" on the playground when the topic was about feelings. To improve education, a Native American teen from Minneapolis suggested eradicating the racism between teachers and students, and a 10-year-old from Minneapolis wanted the whites and blacks to play together at school.

In this particular Mindworks, a common perception was that changing races would come at a social and economic cost for those choosing a minority race, especially black, but also Asian and Native American. They would lose opportunities, power, friends and security.

Ann, 11, of Blaine, wrote, "If I was black ... I would be sad because all my friends that were white would hate me and wouldn't want to play with me."

For those choosing to become white, a bittersweet option for some, the change would offer an easier life filled with better jobs, more money, political power, social acceptance, and homes in which children had their own bedrooms and puppies.

Jane, 14, of Burnsville, who described herself as mulatto, wrote, "I would be white because I have been made into nothing. ... It seems like you are never good enough unless you are white."

However, disadvantages of such a transformation were noted as well.

"I would choose white," wrote Vang Yee, 10, Asian, of Minneapolis. "The advantage is that you can do more things and the disadvantage is that you are not nice."

The power of privilege

What most struck me then and strikes me now is how much what is now called "white privilege," the unconscious sense of white power, ran through the submissions.

Large numbers of whites assumed that if they became black, they would be the leaders - the next Martin Luther King Jr., or maybe the first black president. They believed they were the ones who would finally bring respect and equality to the black race. The same was true of some white students choosing to be American Indian. They would be powerful chiefs or, in one case, an Indian princess. A white teen said he would become an Indian activist and start a movement that addressed native issues.

A white teen from Grand Rapids said she "wouldn't mind going back in time a little ways" and being a slave because after that experience, she would write a book about the experience and change everyone's attitude.

Because his school and community had no African-Americans, Patrick, 14, of Arlington, wrote that he would choose to become black. "People are often afraid that what they don't know can hurt them and this fear can lead to ... prejudice. I could teach everyone that blacks really are the same as whites. ... Maybe I wouldn't be able to stop prejudice entirely, but I'm sure that I could help."

MINDWORKS

This attitude that if white people were a different race, the only change would be cosmetic was not limited to those young people. I've had conversations about this topic with white adults who say, almost glibly, they would choose to be black. They seem to think that nothing would change, the 400 years of racist history would leave them personally unscathed. They would still have their college degrees, their occupations, their lovely homes in nearly-all white neighborhoods, their power.

It is a failure of imagination.

Another revelation was that for many of the Mindworks writers, regardless of race, the word "American" was synonymous with "white." It still is.

I recently retired after 15 years of teaching higher-level ESL reading and writing at a college in northern Virginia, where I taught students from more than 110 countries. My classes met for two hours a day five days a week, so I knew my students well.

About midsemester, I would ask, "Would you marry an American?" All or almost all hands would shoot up without hesitation. Then I would ask, "Would you marry an African-American?" and the hands would go down.

Perceptions then and now

This Mindworks was filled with perceptions beyond those I've mentioned. For instance, stereotypes abounded - to be Asian would bring an increase in intelligence and academic success or the ability to be a ninja. To be black would mean being more athletic, being able to dance, having soul.

Also, some white writers clearly understood the inequalities between the races, including Arika, 13, of Plymouth. She wrote, "In our Constitution it says, 'All men (people) are created equal.' Well, maybe they are created equal, but that's where it stops. After they're created, it all changes."

Many said they were proud of their race. Black 12-year-old Wali of Minneapolis wrote, "Once I really wanted to be a different color, but my mom talked me out of that nonsense. Since then, I never wanted to be a different color."

It isn't just rereading this Mindworks that is unsettling. The other article published in the Variety section that day was about how to talk to children about race, in which Frederick Jefferson, an education professor in New York, said, "One of the first things that needs to be learned is that to ignore racism is to allow it to continue."

Thirty years later, whether it be a "Sesame Street" CNN special or innumerable articles in virtually every medium, including this newspaper, the exact same question is being addressed. When does it end?

I was anxious the day the Mindworks on race was published, cognizant of the rawness of some of the responses and of the enormity of the responsibility. What sustained me was the reaction of an African-American editor before it was published. He wrote that this Mindworks would make some people gasp and other people cry.

What happened on a Minneapolis street on May 25 made people all over the world gasp and cry.

MINDWORKS

I now live in Virginia, the birthplace of the Confederacy. When the white supremacists marched in Charlottesville, less than a three-hour drive from my home, the world took notice but did not erupt.

What set the world on fire was a video of a black man being murdered in slow motion in a city not in the South but in the Midwest, in a city with a reputation of being progressive and "nice," a city that a white Minneapolis school counselor with a history of civil-rights activism always told me was far more racist than I or most white Minneapolitans could - or wanted to - imagine.

The writers in the long-ago Mindworks are now in their 30s and 40s, some the same ages as Derek Chauvin, 44, and George Floyd, 46.

I wonder how they would answer the question today.

Misti Snow is the author of "Take Time to Play Checkers," a compilation of Mindworks essays and her commentary, and a former Bush Leadership Fellow. She lives in Falls Church, Va., with her husband, Jim Dawson. E-mail: mistirsnow@aol.com

THEN AND NOW?

If you recognize yourself as one of the children whose essay response to the original Mindworks query was quoted in today's article, we'd like to hear from you. How you would answer the same questions today?

For reference, the original prompt was: "Imagine that you MUST choose to become another race. Which race would you choose and why? What do you think would be the advantages and disadvantages of becoming a member of that race?"

Send your answer to opinion@startribune.com Include "Mindworks update" in the subject line. If participation is sufficient, we'll compile the answers and publish them in a future Opinion Exchange article.

Please answer in 200 words or less. Include your full name and city of residence for publication, and let us know which original quote was yours. Also include a phone number and e-mail address (neither for publication) where we can contact you.

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

ARTICLE DLXXVII. CHARTING MINNESOTA'S WIDE RACIAL GAPS: A LOOK AT DISPARITIES IN FIVE AREAS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 12, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 330 wordsByline: Josh Verges, Emma EidsvoogHighlight: The May 25 death of George Floyd, a black man, in Minneapolis police custody has again generated international scrutiny of Minnesota's racial disparities. The state generally ranks highly in numerous quality of life indicators, but a closer look reveals glaring differences in the experiences of its white and black residents. Here's how those disparities look [...]Body

The May 25 death of George Floyd, a black man, in Minneapolis police custody has again generated international scrutiny of Minnesota's racial disparities.

The state generally ranks highly in numerous quality of life indicators, but a closer look reveals glaring differences in the experiences of its white and black residents. Here's how those disparities look in five areas:

When comparing Minnesota and United States median incomes, Minnesota whites tend to be paid more than white Americans as a whole, who have a median income of $65,902. Meanwhile, black Minnesotans tend to be paid less than black Americans as a whole, who are paid $41,511, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

When comparing Minnesota and United States average poverty levels, more Minnesota whites fare better than white Americans as a whole, of which, 10.9 percent are below poverty level. Meanwhile, black Minnesotans fare worse than black Americans as a whole, of which 22.5 percent are below the poverty level, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

Both Minnesota whites and blacks fare better than their national counterparts when it comes to health insurance coverage. The national average for whites who are uninsured is 8.0 percent, while it's 10.1 percent for U.S. blacks, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

Black Minnesotans were about twice as likely as white residents to be unemployed, both before and after the coronavirus pandemic struck in March 2020.

Black Minnesotans are more likely to have died from COVID-19 than their white peers and far more likely to have tested positive on a per-capita basis.

Charting Minnesota's wide racial gaps: A look at disparities in five areas

Deals remain elusive as Minnesota special session approaches Feds deny Minnesota request for aid after George Floyd unrest. Walz has 30 days to appeal. Police reforms among the issues legislators expected to take up when they return to the Capitol NYC mayor helps paint 'Black Lives Matter' outside Trump Tower Lawyer: Over 150 Minneapolis officers seeking disability following unrest

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DLXXVIII. READERS WRITE SOME REFLECTION IS IN ORDER

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 12, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 6ALength: 1258 wordsBody

POLICE OFFICERS

I'd like to thank Minneapolis Police Chief Medaria Arradondo for withdrawing from negotiations with police union boss Bob Kroll and to write this letter, actually, to him ("Mpls. pulls back from talks with its police union," front page, June 11). Thank you for talking as a black man about the need for reform in the department - transformational reform. I am listening. With urgency.

I am not particularly comforted by the idea that officers are telling you former officer Derek Chauvin "isn't who we are." That's nice to say. But it seems it would be more comforting to hear a commitment on the part of any good officers to look at how they are like Chauvin.

Indeed, that is the work a lot of us are doing right now within ourselves. We have collectively allowed this to happen over and over - and no one is more complicit than white people (myself included) who have said, "I am not a racist," and people within MPD who have done nothing even though they understand intimately the ins and outs of how policing works, its weak points and the biggest roadblocks to change.

Questions for us white folks and for every good officer: Where have we been? Where have you been? I appreciate the chief's showing up, speaking out and promising justice and accountability. It's beyond overdue. Arradondo, you must lead this work and insist that your officers do the hard work of introspection.

It's not enough to say, "I'm not like him." They are. We are. Start there.

Tonya Tennessen, Minneapolis

. . .

President Donald Trump says that 99% of police are great people. Assume, for a moment, that this is true. Amazon's Alexa tells me that there are about 900,000 police officers in the United States. This leaves at least 9,000 bad cops across the country waiting to have their own moment of infamy.

Joseph Maddison, Minneapolis

RACIAL JUSTICE

To make change, we must be heard

Can we all take a tiny step back from yelling at each other? Racial injustice is outrageous. It's unacceptable. Killing of black people at the hands of police cannot continue. The fury is justified right now, and in fact would be justified for another four centuries to make up for what this country has done to people of color. But then what? Eventually, we have to soften, listen and talk. Because the point of all of this isn't just to get consensus from people who already agree with each other. The goal of achieving racial, social and economic equality has to be a shared goal. There's a reason we aren't there yet, and the verbal equivalent of smacking someone till they agree with you isn't a workable strategy.

It's not fair that the work has to be this hard. It is absurdly unfair, because it runs counter to the foundational promises of this country. But the civil rights movement of the 1960s showed us that you change more hearts and minds when conduct and behavior are unimpeachably respectful. That extends to dialogue as well. The dialogue around completely reshaping the police force is essential. But we need to engage respectfully with those who don't share our viewpoints, or all we do is further entrench extreme perceptions on both sides. Is that completely unfair and infuriating? Yeah, because equality should be a no-brainer. But at the moment, it's not. I don't challenge anyone's anger or its legitimacy, but I'll respectfully ask: Is it better to be scream and be right, or to talk and actually be heard?

Travis Anderson, Minneapolis

COLUMBUS STATUE

That statue gave no history lesson

Some are concerned that removing statues of Christopher Columbus (or Confederate generals) will destroy our history ("Capitol's Columbus statue toppled," June 11). I disagree, believing the statues themselves have destroyed history. Let me be specific.

Columbus was not Italian. Italy did not exist - he was born in the Republic of Genoa.

Columbus was a pioneer slave-trader, writing that he captured six peaceful "Indians" as slaves on his very first day in the "New World." He brought thousands of peaceful Tainos from their home to Spain as slaves, many of whom died en route. Only a few hundred Tainos were alive on Hispaniola 60 years later, out of what may have been a population of 250,000, due to the brutality of slave work on plantations, demand for gold and disease. The colonists also killed with impunity, slicing up random bodies and parading mutilated corpses through the streets.

Columbus also began the exchange of plants, animals and goods between East and West, which historians have traditionally called the "Columbian exchange." Not all of this was bad, but the importation of European disease to indigenous peoples is often described as genocide, as opposed to the cultural genocide of forced conversion to Christianity.

So there you have it: Columbus as advocate of slavery. Columbus as importer of genocidal diseases. I think we have all the connections we need to Black Lives Matter and COVID-19. Did you learn any of that from the statue? Do you know anyone who learned that from the statue?

READERS WRITE Some reflection is in order

Perhaps we should read a few history books instead of erecting statues honoring genocidal, slave-promoting conquerors. Those statues tend to tell lies.

Charles Underwood, Minneapolis

...

I am proud that Minnesota made history by electing the highest-ranking Native woman to executive office in the country. We need more diversity at all levels of government.

But Lt. Gov. Peggy Flanagan's statement in support of the illegal destruction of property on the Capitol grounds is one of the most irresponsible statements I have seen in my many years observing politics ("GOP says Gov. Tim Walz shouldn't have let Columbus statue topple," StarTribune.com, June 11).

Whether or not the Columbus statue should remain is a fair question for the people of our state to decide, and there is a legal process to follow for its removal should they determine that the answer is no.

But a top member of the executive branch charged with enforcing state statutes applauding vigilantism and vandalism is reprehensible, particularly during this time of unprecedented and dangerous lawlessness in Minnesota.

Andy Brehm, Minneapolis

...

The St. Paul statue of Columbus is a piece of art produced by an artist and should not be damaged or disfigured just because he may be disliked as a person.

State officials were warned about the protesters' intentions and the patrol officers on the scene did nothing to stop them. And why did 40 officers gather only after the statue was torn down?

We should not turn our back on history but keep it in public view and learn by it so we do not perpetuate the sins of the past.

Norman Holen, Richfield

The writer is a professor of art.

...

I have felt for years that the Columbus statue on the Capitol grounds should be moved elsewhere and replaced with a statue of Dred Scott holding his pleadings. I respect those who donated the statue, as well as the immigrant families who, a century ago, campaigned to create Columbus Day. But the reality is that Christopher Columbus doesn't really have much to do with Minnesota.

Scott, on the other hand, has everything to do with Minnesota. His legal argument formed the unrealized aspiration that should inspire our state. And because the pedestal is located by the Supreme Court building, it is a proper place for our most famous litigant.

I do not like seeing destruction of public property. But the unlawful destruction of the Columbus statue should not impede us from lawfully replacing it with something more fitting.

READERS WRITE Some reflection is in order

Michael Walters, Rochester, Minn.

We want to hear from you. Send us your thoughts here.

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

End of Document

Baker is reappointed as Hennepin County's chief medical examiner

ARTICLE DLXXIX. [BAKER IS REAPPOINTED AS HENNEPIN COUNTY'S CHIEF
MEDICAL EXAMINER](#)

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 12, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 2B

Length: 436 words

Byline: DAVID CHANEN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: One commissioner raised concerns about his autopsy of George Floyd.

Body

The Hennepin County Board reappointed Dr. Andrew Baker as the county's chief medical examiner, despite some controversy over his recent autopsy report on George Floyd.

Commissioners on Thursday voted 5-2 to reappoint Baker, replaying a committee vote taken by the same margin Tuesday. One of the dissenters, Commissioner Angela Conley, had raised concerns that the autopsy report - which ruled Floyd's death a homicide - mentioned fentanyl and methamphetamine in his system, which she suggested downgraded the severity of the crime. The other vote against Baker came from Commissioner Irene Fernando.

"Everybody is watching this case like a hawk," said Conley. "Institutional racism is embedded in all levels of government. Once again, we have to understand why people don't trust this system and the process."

Floyd, a black man, died May 25 at the hands of Minneapolis police. Officer Derek Chauvin, who is white, restrained Floyd for more than eight minutes and has been charged with second-degree murder.

Other commissioners, including Mike Opat, said it was misleading to say that listing Floyd's toxicology results in the autopsy report damaged the public trust.

"Toxicology is often listed in autopsy reports," he said. "It's obvious Floyd died by the hands of Officer Chauvin. I believe in Baker as a leader."

Baker has been the county's chief medical examiner since he was first appointed in 2004. The National Association of Medical Examiners, of which Baker has served as president, released a statement Thursday calling him "one of the most highly regarded and esteemed forensic pathologists in the United States ... known for his expertise and integrity." Listing drug intoxication in the autopsy report "provides a more comprehensive statement of the cause of death," the statement said.

In other action, the board approved funding for several projects related to COVID-19, including:

Baker is reappointed as Hennepin County's chief medical examiner

- $3.5 million to encourage absentee voting amid the pandemic;
- $1.7 million for COVID-19 testing and contact tracing at long-term care facilities and in neighborhoods disproportionately hurt by the virus;
- $1.5 million for distance learning for children involved with the county;
- $1 million for summer youth programs and organized sports.

Funding came from more than $93 million in federal money designated for COVID-19 projects.

The board also passed a resolution supporting state, regional and local efforts to secure state and federal aid for emergency protective measures relating to civil unrest and for disaster relief for properties that were damaged during the unrest following Floyd's death.

David Chanen · 612-673-4465

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

ARTICLE DLXXX. EARLY TEST RESULTS SHOW FEW PROTESTERS CAUGHT COVID-19

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 12, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 614 wordsByline: Christopher MaganHighlight: Early data from coronavirus tests of Minnesotans who participated in demonstrations after the death of George Floyd suggests the mass gatherings may not result in a spike in COVID-19 infections.Body

Early data from coronavirus tests of Minnesotans who participated in demonstrations after the death of George Floyd suggest the mass gatherings may not result in a spike in COVID-19 infections.

More than 3,300 people who participated in protests and community events after Floyd's death were tested for the coronavirus this week at four community testing sites. Floyd died on Memorial Day after Derek Chauvin, at the time a Minneapolis police officer, knelt on his neck for nearly nine minutes.

Results from about 40 percent of the coronavirus tests done in St. Paul and Minneapolis this week show 1.4 percent of participants who were tested had contracted COVID-19. Health officials are awaiting the rest of the test results and are encouraging anyone who participated in mass gatherings to get tested - regardless of symptoms.

The 1.4 percent positivity rate is lower than the 3.7 positivity rate of the more than 13,000 test results reported Friday. It is lower than the current seven-day average rate of positive tests, which is also 3.7 percent.

Kris Ehresmann, state Department of Health director of infectious disease, said there were not enough results to draw firm conclusions about the impact of the mass gatherings on Minnesota's coronavirus outbreak. She said the rate is expected to be somewhat lower than other large-scale testing because there wasn't initial evidence that a lot of the people who attended the protests were already sick and would spread the coronavirus.

"Our testing is a bit pre-emptive, if you will," Ehresmann said. "It is a different situation."

State health officials hope to test more attendees of mass gatherings in the coming weeks to see how the events impact the outbreak. There is limited availability on Tuesdays and Wednesdays at the sites in the Twin Cities.

Other information about testing can be found at www.mn.gov/COVID/.

Early test results show few protesters caught COVID-19

The Minnesota Department of Health reported another 25 fatalities Friday caused by COVID-19 and 479 more laboratory-confirmed infections. That brings the state total to 1,274 deaths and 29,795 cases statewide.

There are 25,028 patients who've recovered enough that they no longer need to be isolated. There are 403 people sick enough to need hospital care, with 191 in critical condition.

Twenty-two of those whose deaths were reported Friday were residents of long-term care. They ranged in age from their 60s to their 90s.

About 80 percent of the Minnesotans who've died of COVID-19 have been residents of congregate care settings like nursing homes, assisted living and rehabilitation centers.

Ehresmann and Jan Malcolm, state health commissioner, said that while the toll on long-term care facilities continues to be deeply concerning, the state is making progress on its efforts to lessen the impact.

California shuts bars, indoor dining and most gyms, churches Virus spread, not politics should guide schools, doctors say MN Republicans cry foul as Walz extends executive powers to deal with COVID-19 MN State Fair Fine Arts show will open for limited viewing at the Fairgrounds; artists can still register This one California county has zero coronavirus cases. What's its secret? About 9 percent of the facilities have serious outbreaks, Ehresmann said. More than half of the facilities with cases only have one or two residents or staff who are infected.

About 30 percent of facilities that have reported an infection since the outbreak began have not had a case in four weeks.

With the help of the Minnesota National Guard, health officials have tested all the residents and staff at more than 200 facilities. The state Department of Health's goal is to eventually test every long-term care center in the state.

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

ARTICLE DLXXXI. TEEN IS LAUDED FOR GEORGE FLOYD VIDEO

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 12, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 2BLength: 592 wordsByline: PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Chief Medaria Arradondo praised her quick thinking.Body

The Minneapolis teenager whose video opened the world's eyes to the death of George Floyd wasn't looking to be a hero when she coolly documented 10 minutes of history unfolding before her eyes, her lawyer said Thursday.

"She had no idea she would witness and document one of the most important and high-profile police murders in American history," Darnella Frazier's attorney, Seth Cobin, said. "If it wasn't for her bravery, presence of mind, and steady hand, and her willingness to post the video on Facebook and share her trauma with the world, all four of those police officers would still be on the streets, possibly terrorizing other members of the community."

Cobin said Frazier wasn't looking to be a hero but is "just a 17-year-old high school student, with a boyfriend and a job at the mall, who did the right thing. She's the Rosa Parks of her generation."

The imagery of the white officer's arrest of an unarmed and handcuffed black man played a crucial role in Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin being charged with murder and manslaughter, as well as three officers who were with him being charged with aiding and abetting murder and manslaughter. All were quickly fired.

Frazier is not ready to speak publicly about her role in telling the story of Floyd's death beyond what she told the Star Tribune the next day. "The world needed to see what I was seeing," she said. "Stuff like this happens in silence too many times."

The benefits of Frazier's quick thinking drew praise and gratitude from Police Chief Medaria Arradondo during a nationally telecast news conference Thursday.

While "we should never have to rely upon" witness video to keep police accountable, the chief said, "I am thankful, absolutely, that this was captured in the manner that it was."

He went on to encourage others to do the same when confronted with such a scene involving officers' actions.

"Record. Record, absolutely," Arradondo said. "Record, call. Call a friend. Yell out. Call 911. We need a supervisor to the scene. Absolutely. I need to know that. We need to know that. So the community plays a vital role and did two weeks ago."

In the moments before Frazier found herself feet from where Floyd was being pinned to the pavement, her 9-year-old cousin asked to go from the family's apartment to nearby Cup Foods at the intersection that now serves as a shrine to the 46-year-old native of Houston.

"When she was a few storefronts from the shop," Cobin said, "she saw four officers roughly removing a black motorist from his vehicle. Because police brutality is so common in that neighborhood, and the officers rarely face consequences, she pulled out her iPhone and started recording."

Frazier is "doing well in terms of her outlook and attitude," said Cobin, who is based in Minneapolis. "She's staying positive and avoiding the drama on social media."

Cobin said Frazier "hasn't received threats or anything like that" but acknowledged she's been the target of "trash talking and 'shade' " on social media since her cellphone video May 25 showed Chauvin using his knee to pin Floyd to the pavement at the intersection of E. 38th Street and S. Chicago Avenue.

Many people have been inquiring about how to help Frazier and say thank you for her role in the saga.

Cobin verified the legitimacy of a GoFundMe page that has been established by two women who previously had no connection to Frazier. They wrote that the teenager "deserves peace and healing [as] she has had to deal with trolls, bullies and ignorant people harassing her online."

Paul Walsh · 612-673-4482

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

ARTICLE DLXXXII. SPECIAL SESSION SHOULDN'T BE WASTED

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 12, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 6ALength: 533 wordsHighlight: Legislature has a chance to make progress on police reforms and economic recovery.Body

Minnesota lawmakers are getting a rare opportunity for a do-over, starting Friday. They should make the most of it.

After a disappointing session that was partly derailed by the pandemic, Gov. Tim Walz is calling legislators back to St. Paul. In a break from recent past practice, there is no pre-negotiated agenda nor a set end date. Instead, Walz is laying out an ambitious agenda that features police reform, bonding, rebuilding areas damaged by violent protests, and addressing economic and educational inequities.

It's unlikely all of those will get done, but legislators would be remiss if they did not tackle most of those issues and seriously commit to the rest. The top of that list must be police reform, and they should not leave until that work is done.

Meaningful, statewide reform of policing need not require endless analysis. Most of the solutions have been long-studied, as the Star Tribune Editorial Board pointed out Thursday. Deliberation is worthwhile, but too often it can become weaponized as a means to obstruction. New York state, for one, has shown it is possible to move with alacrity. Two weeks after the civil unrest that was sparked by George Floyd's public murder and quickly spread across the country, New York legislators met with their governor over the weekend and by Wednesday passed a comprehensive set of reforms.

They know it is only a beginning. New York Senate Majority Leader Andrea Stewart-Cousins acknowledged as much during the final vote: "Make no mistake, we know that what we did is not a cure." But, she said, "It begins to root out injustice and to bring justice to our justice system. It is a step and it is a path to equality."

Legislators here will differ on what that path should look like, but they must find a way to bridge those differences. This is a statewide issue of urgent importance. Cities, counties and officers alike need help if they are to combat entrenched interests led by the likes of Minneapolis police union leader Bob Kroll.

There are good officers out there watching their profession besmirched by those who refuse accountability. We applaud the courage of those Minneapolis police officers who broke ranks on Wednesday with a signed letter condemning former officer Derek Chauvin, now accused of Floyd's murder. Chauvin, they said, stripped Floyd of his dignity and life. "This is not who we are," they wrote. "We stand ready to listen and embrace the calls for change, reform and rebuilding."

Special session shouldn't be wasted

There is much more to be done in a special session. The state remains in the grip of a pandemic. Walz is seeking an extension of emergency powers that assures continued emergency aid from the federal government, speedy procurement and protections against eviction for those affected. Republicans attempting to characterize this as a power grab should instead offer their plans for dealing with such issues.

The bonding bill, a victim of regular session gridlock, is needed now more than ever as the state grapples with a recession and double-digit unemployment. Legislators have a second chance to show themselves equal to the moment, capable of bold action that tackles this state's biggest problems.

They shouldn't waste the opportunity.

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

ARTICLE DLXXXIII. ARTCETERA

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 12, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 2ELength: 887 wordsByline: NEAL JUSTIN; ALICIA ELER; CHRIS HEWITT; STAFF WRITERS; TERRY BLAIN, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Sterling's drive-in date at BurnsvilleBody

It doesn't exactly sound like a picturesque setting, but in quarantine it will have to do. The Diamondhead Education Center parking lot in Burnsville will become another place for Twin Cities music lovers to catch outdoor gigs this summer, thanks to a new drive-in concert series being launched by veteran rocker Mick Sterling. Starting June 26 with the Johnnie Brown Experience, Sterling and the city of Burnsville will co-host the Relief Sessions every Friday night through July, featuring two shows per night. Other performers include GB Leighton, Joyann Parker, Sterling's own Stud Brothers and the popular tribute bands Stealing Dan, Hornucopia and Shabby Road Orchestra. The shows are modeled after the drive-in concert series started by Crooners in Fridley last week, but with a few variations: Alcohol will not be sold. Food will be served from food trucks and can be ordered ahead of time to deliver to your parking space. A large LED video screen will be hoisted next to the stage. Also, attendees will be allowed to sit in lawn chairs alongside their cars. Tickets are being sold via Ticketworks.com at $20 apiece, with the option of adding additional adults per ticket order. Kids under 15 get in free.

CHRIS RIEMENSCHNEIDER

The pride of Lake City

Veteran actor Mary Pat Gleason, a native of Lake City, Minn., passed away earlier this month from cancer at 70. Gleason, who got her start doing theater in the Twin Cities, had more than 150 film and TV credits, most of them small - but often scene-stealing roles, like the AA member in "Mom" who always got bullied by Allison Janney's character or the nurse who taunted an injured Ross on "Friends." She appeared in a number of hit films, including "Basic Instinct," "Traffic" and "Bruce Almighty." Gleason also contributed behind the scenes, sharing a Daytime Emmy in 1986 as part of the writing team for "The Guiding Light," and wrote and performed a one-woman show in New York about her struggles with bipolar disorder. "I can honestly say that I have never met a person that was ALL goodness and kindness like she was," said "Mom" cast member Beth Hall on Twitter. "RIP my dear friend. You will be sorely missed but never forgotten."

ARTCETERA

NEAL JUSTIN

New boss in Rochester

Rochester Art Center just hired its sixth executive director since 2008. "It's a crazy time to start a new job," said Pamela Hugdahl, whose family - including a 3-year-old son and 8-year-old daughter - is making the move from Port Washington, Wis., in multiple trips. A Duluth native who worked her way up from guard to assistant registrar during 13 years at Walker Art Center, she takes over from Brian Austin, the marketing executive who led the RAC back from the brink of insolvency. After leaving the Walker in 2013, Hugdahl honed her upper-level management skills at Wisconsin art centers, spending three years as director of the Cedarburg Art Museum followed by a three-year stint as administrative director at the Port Washington Saukville Arts Council. The RAC is on target to reopen July 1, and is moving forward with summer camps, using social distancing precautions, while artistic director Sheila Dickinson is planning exhibitions relating to health care workers and how kids are responding to COVID-19 through art.

ALICIA ELER

A 'Breath' for the community

New Dawn Theatre is raising funds and honoring the memory of George Floyd with "A Breath for George," a collection of songs, interviews and poems that will be screened outdoors June 14-21 at a variety of locations. Aimee Bryant, Thomasina Petrus, T. Mychael Rambo and Regina Marie Williams are among the performers lending their talents to the free program, which is designed to give hope, as well as address systemic racism and police violence. Contributions at the screenings, taking place at Pillsbury House, Mixed Blood, Gremlin and other theaters, will be donated to charity. "There is value in people knowing that they are not alone in the way that they are feeling right now," said Austene Van, New Dawn's artistic director. "There is also value in speaking truth to people who have never heard our stories or ever been in position to hear our stories." For venues and a link to stream "A Breath for George," visit newdawntheatre.org.

CHRIS HEWITT

Accordo reloads

After a pandemic-shortened season, Twin Cities chamber music collective Accordo aims to relaunch beginning Oct. 12 with a recital pairing familiar pieces by Ravel (Sonata for Violin and Cello) and Mozart (Eine Kleine Nachtmusik) with works by Lourié, Devienne and Françaix. Mozart is a constant presence in a season which Accordo violinist Steven Copes said he envisions as bringing "renewal, healing and hopefully celebration." Mozart's String Quartet in D, Piano Quartet in E flat and "Kegelstatt" Trio all feature in Accordo's 2020-21 season, but there is a strong focus on contemporary music too, with works by Stephen Hartke, George Tsontakis and Paul Wiancko. A total of four concerts will take place at Westminster Presbyterian Church in Minneapolis, with further dates at Icehouse bar to be announced later. In addition, the popular "Accordo with Silent Film" returns next April at the Ordway. Subscription packages are on sale now at schubert.org.

TERRY BLAIN

Find more coverage of the arts at startribune.com/artcetera and follow us on Twitter @entertain_mn.

ARTCETERA

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DLXXXIV. NORTH CENTRAL UNIVERSITY ESTABLISHES SCHOLARSHIP IN GEORGE FLOYD'S NAME

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 12, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 236 wordsByline: Betsy Helfand

Highlight: North Central University in Minneapolis has established a scholarship in George Floyd's name and is urging other colleges to do the same. The scholarship, which was announced at Floyd's memorial service on June 4 by University President Scott Hagan, will contribute toward "the educational promise of aspiring young black American leaders," per the university. Floyd [...]

Body

North Central University in Minneapolis has established a scholarship in George Floyd's name and is urging other colleges to do the same. The scholarship, which was announced at Floyd's memorial service on June 4 by University President Scott Hagan, will contribute toward "the educational promise of aspiring young black American leaders," per the university.

Floyd died last month after a Minneapolis police officer, who has since been fired and arrested, knelt on Floyd's neck for almost nine minutes as he pleaded for his life.

Hagan has challenged other universities across the country to establish their own George Floyd Memorial Scholarship Funds. Since then, more than 15 other schools have followed suit, including the University of Arizona, Missouri State and Alabama State.

"It is time to invest like never before in a new generation of young black Americans who are poised and ready to take leadership in our nation. So, university presidents, let's step up together," Hagan said in a prepared statement.

Four pro bono attorneys join Keith Ellison's prosecution team in George Floyd case Fired Minneapolis cops in George Floyd case want gag order lifted Deals remain elusive as Minnesota special session approaches Feds deny Minnesota request for aid after George Floyd unrest Walz has 30 days to appeal Police reforms among the issues legislators expected to take up when they return to the Capitol

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

Dahleen Glanton: Don't let Candace Owens dictate how we feel about George Floyd

ARTICLE DLXXXV. DAHLEEN GLANTON: DON'T LET CANDACE OWENS DICTATE
HOW WE FEEL ABOUT GEORGE FLOYD

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 12, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 938 words

Byline: Dahleen Glanton

Highlight: Minutes before he encountered police on a Minneapolis street, George Floyd was just another flawed human being. To some, he was even less than that because he was black. Nothing about him - not the way he looked or the way he carried himself - offered a clue that he could become one of the [...]

Body

Minutes before he encountered police on a Minneapolis street, George Floyd was just another flawed human being. To some, he was even less than that because he was black.

Nothing about him - not the way he looked or the way he carried himself - offered a clue that he could become one of the biggest social justice symbols of our time. Few would have noticed this large black man, wearing a black sleeveless T-shirt and sweatpants, walking toward them and decided that he was worthy of knowing.

In fact, some would have crossed the street to get away from him.

But his death transcended his faulty life. This flawed man became a martyr.

Memorial services were held in three cities, drawing celebrities, politicians and civil rights leaders. People of all races lined the streets of Houston on Tuesday to get a glimpse of his final journey to the cemetery in a horse-drawn carriage.

Some say he did not deserve it.

Far-right conservatives, in their desperate quest to thwart the social justice movement sweeping our country, want to remind us of who we were before we heard of Floyd.

They want us to remember how we used to feel about flawed black men like him and that, in life, Floyd was far from the image we have created of him in death.

They want us to return to our old ways, when not too long ago we allowed our perceptions about people to become our reality. They are hoping that we will remember how angry and frightened we were of the looters, and recognize that Floyd, with his disturbing criminal history, was more like them than like us.

Dahleen Glanton: Don't let Candace Owens dictate how we feel about George Floyd

The messenger is Candace Owens, the black woman they anointed as their right-wing darling because of her willingness to demean her own race the way most white people never would have the guts to do.

In an interview last week with conservative commentator Glenn Beck, Owens said that Floyd was not a good person. She pointed to his criminal record and the autopsy report showing that he had drugs in his system.

"The fact that he has been held up as a martyr sickens me," Owens said. "Was he really going to change things around? It's just not true," she concluded.

In other words, Floyd was unworthy of being the catalyst for such a massive social justice movement because he was imperfect.

President Donald Trump retweeted the video. Vice President Mike Pence invited Owens and other black conservatives to the White House to help the Trump administration get a handle on this unusual national display of unity.

Owens doesn't have a clue about what African Americans want. She should not be speaking on our behalf. But the Trump administration loves her because she reaffirms their preconceived notions about black people by saying exactly what they want to hear.

Owens likes to quote great writers and orators, but clearly she has no real sense of history. If she did, perhaps she would quote the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.'s most famous words, "Injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere."

King did not say injustice to any "perfect" person anywhere, because he knew that the most flawed among us often are the most vulnerable to social injustices.

He understood that perfection is illusive. He knew that those who opposed equality would use it as a standard for determining who is worthy of equal rights and who is not. King was certain that black people would always be held to a higher standard than whites, and that in the end, they always would be deemed undeserving.

Owens misses the point of the marches that have caused millions across the country to pour into the streets and demand change. She doesn't seem to understand that movements are never about a single person. This one certainly is not.

Yes, Floyd is the face of the movement. But the movement itself is about the collective understanding that any black man or woman's face could be painted on a mural on any street any America where police killed an unarmed black person.

This movement is about changing an imbalanced system that too often allows police to kill imperfect people like Floyd on a whim. And it is about ensuring that it does not continue to happen.

Owens is trying to sidetrack us with minutia. She pointed out every bad thing Floyd ever did in his life as a reason for us to marginalize his death.

She seems to think that black people are idiots and white people have been duped. We are not fooled by Floyd's reality, and Owens does not fool us either.

Dahleen Glanton: Don't let Candace Owens dictate how we feel about George Floyd

We know exactly who Floyd was, and we chose to accept him as a human being who did not deserve to die for an infraction so minor as passing a fake $20 bill.

If we are to condemn Floyd for having fentanyl and other drugs in his system, we must also condemn every white kid who overdoses after shooting up and has to be brought back to consciousness with Narcan. If Floyd didn't deserve a second chance, then they don't either.

If we are to continue looking down on Floyd long after he paid his debt to society for committing a crime, we must do the same for Malcolm X, Martha Stewart and legendary NASCAR driver Junior Johnson.

If anything, Floyd reminds African Americans of our fragility in this nation. He had tested positive for COVID-19. He was laid off as a restaurant bouncer because of the pandemic. With his criminal record, his prospects of finding a new job were slim.

Yes, we embraced Floyd in spite of his flaws and maybe even because of them. We lifted this ordinary man to a status he never could have achieved on his own because he forced us to open our eyes.

We made him a martyr because social justice reform is all about giving flawed people an opportunity to turn their lives around.

Dahleen Glanton is a columnist for the Chicago Tribune.

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

End of Document

U.S. seems ready for change, and Vikings hope to help make it happen

ARTICLE DLXXXVI. U.S. SEEMS READY FOR CHANGE, AND VIKINGS HOPE TO HELP MAKE IT HAPPEN

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 12, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1915 words

Byline: Dane Mizutani

Highlight: The death of George Floyd while in police custody showed the world what many in the black community had been trying to say, and the MN Vikings plan to seize the moment to create change.

Body

Andre Patterson watched the horrific video of George Floyd gasping for air before dying under the knee of a former Minneapolis police officer. All 8 minutes, 46 seconds of it.

He couldn't help but think of the countless other African-Americans who had died at the hands of police, a list too long to memorize that in the Twin Cities notably includes Jamar Clark and Philando Castile.

Whether it was Michael Brown in Ferguson, Mo., Tamir Rice in Cleveland, or Eric Garner in New York, each senseless death is a blunt reminder of a broken system.

"I'm a child of the '60s, OK?" said Patterson, recently promoted to co-defensive coordinator for the Vikings. "This has been going on my whole life."

You could hear the fatigue in Patterson's voice as he uttered those words, even as he offered some hope that maybe this time is going to be different.

Why?

"Because the whole world got to see life leave that man's body," Patterson said. "That changed everything. Not only did they get to see him lose his life, they got to see it from start to finish."

Floyd's death was a brutal illustration of something Patterson said the black community has long been trying to tell the world, and while it has fallen on deaf ears time and time again, it finally seems to be sinking in with protests that started in the Twin Cities and quickly sprouted throughout not just the nation, but other parts of the world.

The general population has started to take a stand against racism and inequality in a way never seen before, and that Vikings are trying to be a vessel for change. They put their money where their mouth is this week and donated $5 million to various social justice causes, and the team on Wednesday held a nearly 90-minute video call during which members of the organization spoke with reporters to push the conversation forward.

U.S. seems ready for change, and Vikings hope to help make it happen

That call featured Patterson, chief operating officer Andrew Miller, general manager Rick Spielman, linebacker Eric Kendricks, safety Anthony Harris and running back Ameer Abdullah, all of whom talked about their experiences with racism and inequality, and how they want to go about evoking change.

For Spielman, the issue is extremely personal. He recalled a scenario in which his son, who is black, was pulled over because he was suspected of stealing the car he was driving.

"My son actually had to call home and get my wife on the phone to explain that this is our car," said Spielman, who talked about the various other hard conversation he's had to have with his six adopted children, none of whom are white. "It just tears me apart that we have a society that is still like that."

Those incidents of racism are far too familiar for the black community, including the many Vikings players who live it every day. It's something the team acknowledges and will fight moving forward.

"I'm thankful for 2020 because everyone's had a chance to sit down at home and watch from the outside what's going on, and these types of incidents are under the biggest of microscopes," Abdullah said. "Now it's like, 'Whoa, it's a big division. The people who stand for it are standing for it. The people who stand against it are standing against it.' "

Floyd's death, Abdullah said, has forced people to confront things they might have ignored in the past. That could go a long way in evoking change.

"This is a time for us to reconnect, and I think 2020, it's no coincidence with 20-20 vision," Abdullah said. "I think a lot of people are seeing a lot clearer right now."

SPEAKING UP

Usually quiet by nature, Kendricks felt the need to speak up a couple of weeks ago. He was disgusted by the emptiness of the NFL's statement following Floyd's death, 150 words that at no point mentioned racism.

In response, Kendricks called the NFL out on Twitter, imploring them to take action. As much as it made Kendricks uncomfortable, he leaned into it, knowing that sometimes it takes being vulnerable to make things happen.

"I felt like I had to speak up, whereas times before I might have been more timid," Kendricks said. "This was an issue that we continue to face. It wasn't going to change. I decided to use my platform."

Since then, NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell has issued a new statement in which he admitted he was wrong, condemned racism and systematic oppression, and vowed to stand with the black community moving forward.

"Finally, having him say those things and having our back, I feel like we can all move forward now," Kendricks said. "We all can take a deep breath and really go after these issues that are plaguing our country."

U.S. seems ready for change, and Vikings hope to help make it happen

After seeing the impact he can have, Kendricks said he is committed to using his platform even more. He understands he can evoke change by speaking up.

There might not be a player on the Vikings that understands that more than Abdullah. His father, Kareem, marched alongside Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. in Selma, Ala., to help secure voting rights for African-Americans.

"I come from a family that lived through the Civil Rights Era," Abdullah said. "All the stories that I've kind of gotten as a young man stick with me because they embody my entire character, to fight through things, to always listen, and to try to make the best of situations."

Sometimes speaking up is easier said than done. Just ask Harris, who wanted to have a conversation with a police officer driving through his neighborhood earlier this week and couldn't help but feel a little tense in the moments leading up to the exchange.

"Just being an African-American man, sitting on the side of the road with my flashers on waiting for them to come out of the one-way street where I live, flag them down and have a conversation with them, it crossed my mind that I could be potentially shot or viewed as a threat just for what I was trying to do," Harris said.

"I made sure I proceeded with extra caution so I didn't surprise them. With everything going on in the world, I tried to make them feel comfortable. It kind of just kept things in perspective of, no matter where I go or no matter what I'm really doing as an African-American man, that's something that I can't shake."

LISTENING MORE

With the rest of the NFL speaking up, Vikings coach Mike Zimmer knew he needed to say something to his team. He wanted his players to know he was there for them. He just didn't want to say the wrong thing.

He spoke at length with Patterson before talking to the team. More than anything else, Patterson wanted Zimmer to speak from his heart.

"My conversation with him was, 'Tell them how you feel,' " Patterson said. "They are going to listen. There is no right or wrong. The worst thing you can do is stay silent."

It wasn't a prepared statement, and while Zimmer might have stumbled on his words here and there, his players appreciated his authenticity.

"It was a big thing because he communicated to us that he does not understand," Kendricks said. "He is not from the same background. He does not share the same skin. He can't begin to relate with us, but he hears us and he is there for us.

"He expressed that if we want him to get involved with anything that we have going on as a committee, that he's right there with us. That's the thing that we all need to start is having that dialogue."

That message had a profound impact on Abdullah, an African-American Muslim who referred to himself as "a double minority" while growing up in the south. He's rarely had people that look like Zimmer stand up for him.

U.S. seems ready for change, and Vikings hope to help make it happen

"He humbled himself greatly and said, 'Man, I don't understand, and even though maybe I haven't given this as much attention, I know I love every single last one of you guys in this room, and I'll fight for you guys just like you were my sons,' " Abdullah said. "To have him come out and humble himself and say, 'I don't understand and I stand with you' was powerful for me."

Spielman held a meeting with the entire personnel department earlier this week and got choked up when relaying what happened.

"We have a great group of guys that truly care for each other as a family," Spielman said. "To sit there and listen to one of our minority scouts tell us that when they travel around this country and they get pulled over, they don't know if they're going to get to go home and see their families. 'Is this the last time I had a chance to talk to my family?' That's something our white scouts who were on there can't understand that because they've never been in that situation."

Those instances are a microcosm of some of the hard conversations happening right now on a much larger scale. They also serve as a perfect example of the Vikings' understanding that they have a responsibility to push the conversation forward.

"We talked about internally maybe hosting (through) our space with the Vikings, maybe our auditorium, something to bring in officials, people from all walks of the community, to talk about these issues," Abdullah said. "To unclasp a lot of the internal things. Because who we are externally as people is predicated on who we are inside. And no matter how much we try to put paint over rusted metal, that rust is always going to burn through that paint, eventually. We have to heal from the internal before we can really talk about reform."

TAKING ACTION

While the Vikings are at the forefront of some of the hard conversations, they are also doing tangible things in the Twin Cities as a way to evoke change.

The team already had formed a Social Justice Committee dedicated combating racism and inequality and making a difference in the community. Recently, members came up with the idea to establish the George Floyd Legacy Scholarship so that his memory lives on.

Additionally, the Vikings have done work with Project Success, an organization that inspires young people to dream about the future, and , an organization designed to help those that have been convicted of a crime get the opportunities they need.

Money, market, ideal fit? Pat Mahomes got it all in Kansas City All Square Washington's NFL team drops 'Redskins' name after 87 years NFL to play Black anthem before national anthem, source says Expect to see Vikings rookie Justin Jefferson in slot 'quite a bit' next season How will Vikings' Andre Patterson, Adam Zimmer balance roles as co-defensive coordinators?

The latter is something Kendricks, who has done work at the juvenile detention center in Minneapolis, feels particularly passionate about. He feels like the justice system is fundamentally flawed about the way those with convictions, especially juveniles, are treated after serving their time.

"How are they supposed to get off probation if they can't get a job and can't get housing? They can't. It's a trap," Kendricks said. "These are some of the things where I personally see the impact. I see these kids, and they're good kids, and they get stuck in the system, and they're there forever. It infuriates me because I feel like there's no one else that's looking out for them. I feel like they're abandoned."

U.S. seems ready for change, and Vikings hope to help make it happen

This is an example of something Kendricks wants to bring more attention to, and he's thankful the Vikings are giving him a platform.

Now the hope, according to Abdullah, is that the NFL as a whole follows suit. If it does, through raising awareness and taking action, change can come.

"Just with our voice and obviously with a lot of the campaigns that we can start and a lot of things with the player coalition putting together in terms of funds, shifting economics, everything down the whole line," Abdullah said. "I think the NFL can be a huge catalyst for change in the future."

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

End of Document

Minneapolis Walgreens use temporary trailers to provide prescriptions

ARTICLE DLXXXVII.

MINNEAPOLIS WALGREENS USE TEMPORARY TRAILERS TO PROVIDE PRESCRIPTIONS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 12, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 201 words

Byline: Isabel Saavedra-Weis

Highlight: With six Walgreens still closed in Minneapolis after the unrest following the death of George Floyd, the company has set up temporary operations in affected neighborhoods to provide customers with their prescriptions. Although most of the more than 100 Twin Cities Walgreens are open, the company's website lists six as still closed. All are in [...]

Body

With six Walgreens still closed in Minneapolis after the unrest following the death of George Floyd, the company has set up temporary operations in affected neighborhoods to provide customers with their prescriptions.

Although most of the more than 100 Twin Cities Walgreens are open, the company's website lists six as still closed. All are in Minneapolis.

In all, about 25 were damaged during the looting and vandalism that followed protests of Floyd's death.

In Minneapolis, the Walgreens at 2650 Hennepin Avenue has set up a temporary pharmacy trailer in the parking lot. A similar operation will open today at the 4547 Hiawatha Avenue location.

Customers can still waive delivery fees on eligible prescriptions, and contact a Walgreens pharmacist through online chat features. As stores begin to reopen, Walgreens offers customers an in-store discount on regularly priced items.

Ryan Cos. to hold virtual Ford site groundbreaking to mark development at Highland Park site in St. Paul Masks, mandates and COVID-19: What we know \(and what we don't\) Business People: Sunday, July 12 Amazon says email to employees banning TikTok was a mistake 'A slap in the face:' Goya faces boycott over Trump praise

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

ARTICLE DLXXXVIII.

MUSICIANS PLUGGED INTO THE TUMULT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 12, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 1549 wordsByline: CHRIS RIEMENSCHNEIDER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

One was arrested while manning a first aid station for protesters. Another went on CNN and CNBC to talk about his troubled city and his legendary bar.

One sang at the memorial service for the man whose death sparked international cries for justice. And another did what musicians do best: use their talent to try to make a difference in the world.

These are just some of the many Twin Cities musicians heavily involved in the crises that overtook their hometowns over the past 2 ½ weeks, starting with the May 25 death of George Floyd while in police custody through the protests and riots that followed.

We spoke to these vital scene makers about their experiences at this historic time, as well as their thoughts on what the Minnesota music community can do to bring about positive change.

Matt 'Nur-D' Allen

The arrested first-aid provider

The Rosemount-reared, comic-book-loving rapper, 29, spent four long days and nights after Floyd's death providing first-aid care, supplies and water to protesters around south Minneapolis. He had no prior medical training; he just happened upon a station abandoned by trained medics the first night and "just did what we could from there."

They formed the Justice Frontline Aid Crew and enlisted support from Modist Brewing and other donors to provide aid and supplies over the next few days. On the fifth night, June 1, Allen and other members of his team were arrested near the State Capitol just after 10 p.m. for breaking curfew. He is awaiting a court date and expecting a $1,000 fine.

Looking back: "Me and my team saw things I don't think any of us will ever forget. The chemical eye damage from tear gas was horrible, people coming in with red, ripped-up eyes. We saw a girl who got hit in the face with a rubber bullet; her teeth were broken and she was spitting out bits of teeth.

Musicians plugged into the tumult

"On Saturday, the scariest day, the police came through and fired on our medic station deliberately. One girl got hit with a rubber bullet at point-blank range, and our nurses had to try to save her eye and face in the basement of a home by cellphone light. We couldn't go anywhere because we would've been arrested. Anytime we called for an ambulance they wouldn't send one.

"As the curfew neared [that Monday], my team and I made the decision to stay with the protesters because we had seen in prior events that the police were using extreme force to silence every kind of protest. Just after 10 p.m., there were maybe 50 kids seated on the Capitol grounds singing 'Stand by Me.' This militarylike police force surrounds them in full riot gear, lights blazing, jumping out of the bushes and all that. We were blessed that violence didn't occur, but we felt like we had to be there if it did."

Going forward: "Justice Frontline Aid is transitioning into more food-shelf service, taking donations and distributing them. But we know there are going to be more protests, and we want to be ready. If not for George Floyd, there will probably be something else that triggers more protests.

"COVID had already given the music community a sucker punch in the gut, and this has kind of been another thing. We all want to help, but there are other things standing in our way. This would normally be the time musicians are throwing benefit concerts and special events. In the meantime, I'd like to see more musicians who are more established than I am take a more vocal and financial stance toward these communities as they rebuild."

Dua Saleh

The musical activist

Not surprisingly, the Sudan-born, St. Paul-raised rapper/singer/poet already had a song in the can related to police brutality. Just five days after Floyd's death, Saleh released the haunting track "body cast" as a stand-alone single to benefit the Minneapolis-based Black Visions Collective.

"There were already eyes on me prior to this, and on Minneapolis as a hub for transformative work and transformative artists," said Saleh, a nonbinary performer, citing write-ups for the song already from Rolling Stone, Pitchfork and even the Grammys website. "We didn't solicit any of it. I think that tells you how all eyes really are on Minneapolis right now."

Looking back: "I wrote 'body cast' in 2019. Like many of us in Minneapolis and St. Paul, I was still processing the murders of both Jamar Clark and Philando Castile, so I wrote it with them in mind. After [the Floyd tragedy], I just felt like I wanted to do something with the platform I've been given, and music is where I have the most visibility.

"So my idea was to release that song and put all the money toward Black Visions Collective, which is mobilizing around defunding MPD because of the violence they have enacted in the community and the murders they have committed. Alec Ness and Psymun [engineer and producer] worked together to master the song quickly. We are all community members, and we care about the black community in Minneapolis, so we wanted to get this out there fast."

Going forward: "I'm not going to lie, I feel kind of vulnerable about the media attention. There are many other people and artists that are working on the front lines that deserve attention. But I understand because of my higher visibility the media pays attention to me, and I want to use that to benefit the community.

Musicians plugged into the tumult

"I'm also going to train to be a medic to help at protests. That'll be how I can contribute immediately. I'll learn things like CPR, bandaging, removing tear gas from people's eyes. I understand in doing that, I'll be at risk of being arrested or shot at with tear gas or rubber bullets, but I'm preparing my body and soul for that."

Tiwana Porter

The memorial singer

Porter arrived in Minneapolis just two years ago from Sacramento, Calif. Her husband, the Rev. Ellington Porter, is a professor at North Central University, where Floyd's memorial was helmed by the Rev. Al Sharpton on June 4. She had also previously worked with Sharpton's National Action Network.

Between those two connections, she earned what she called "an incredible honor" to sing "Amazing Grace" at the service alongside Darnell Davis & the Remnant (with whom she regularly performs around town). Surprisingly, she had endured neck surgery just two days earlier at the Mayo Clinic.

Looking back: "[The surgery] just added to it being a bittersweet moment full a lot of emotions. I still had a big bandage on the back of my neck. So I was careful, somber and nervous all at the same time. That song is like a national hymn to me, so I wasn't so nervous about singing it. My focus was more wanting people to be uplifted.

"My prayer was that it would bring hope and a sense of peace to everyone - not just his family, but everyone who'd felt pain and heartbroken over the past week. So much has happened since he was murdered, I wanted to let God's light shine through me to heal that pain."

Going forward: "The music community really has a powerful tool we can use to bring people together across racial lines, whatever kind of music it is. I truly believe there is healing power in music. I've seen it firsthand singing to Alzheimer's patients and others with medical needs. We're all hurting in one way or another. Music is one of God's gifts to heal us."

Tony Zaccardi

The bar owner

Already well known around town after years of playing bass in Romantica, Eleganza!, Kruddler and other bands, Zaccardi became even more of a local institution after buying the West Bank watering hole Palmer's Bar in 2018. He's still happy he made the leap, even after having to board up the place and worry about its destruction during the riots. He gained national media attention after he spray-painted "Black Owned Business" on the plywood over his windows.

Looking back: "I just threw that message up quick and didn't think much about it. It just seemed like maybe one little thing that might help protect the place. I painted it before I knew neo-Nazis were part of the mix. Once I learned that, I thought, 'Oh, great, I painted a bull's-eye on the place!'"

"And then it kind of went viral, starting with Newsweek, then CNN, then CNBC. I'm not much of a spokesman for anything, but I figured if I was going to be handed this platform, then I should definitely try to make something positive out of it and help my community.

Musicians plugged into the tumult

"Hell, yeah, I'm in support of the protesters, but not at the cost of somebody's dream. Seeing a building like Minnehaha Liquor destroyed - which had been in that family for decades - that place was somebody's dream. I certainly didn't want to see Palmer's destroyed. This place is my dream come true now."

Going forward: "I know so many people in bands who want to help. They'd be throwing up benefit concerts left and right, but nobody can do that because of the coronavirus. In the meantime, my biggest hope is some of the best songs of our generation come out of this."

"It really feels like we're in the middle of the biggest civil rights movement since the '60s, and our city is at the center of it. For me to be on CNN and CNBC just shows that's the case. These issues are back at the forefront, and we're seeing the best and worst of people at the moment."

"With the amount of people I'm seeing who are trying to make things right, trying to help each other and the community, I think we're mostly seeing the good in people here."

Chris Riemenschneider · 612-673-4658 · @ChrisRstrib

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

ARTICLE DLXXXIX. POST OFFICES BURNED IN FLOYD RIOTS LEAVE VOID

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 12, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 750 wordsByline: JANET MOORE; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Neighbors miss branches on Lake Street, Minnehaha.Body

As fire consumed dozens of businesses along E. Lake Street in the unrest following the death of George Floyd, the Minnehaha and Lake Street post offices were reduced to gaping, charred hulks.

Now the United States Postal Service (USPS) is "exploring many options" to re-establish itself in the south Minneapolis neighborhoods affected by the recent fires and looting.

"We are already moving forward to provide customers a local facility to call their own," said Nicole Hill, a USPS spokeswoman, in an e-mail. "It is too early in the process to provide a timeline."

But the simple scrawl on the remains of the Minnehaha post office seemed to reflect the neighbors' views: "Rebuild!!!"

"Tears came to my eyes when I watched [the Lake Street] post office go down in flames," said Tiwana Jackson, president of Tweak The Glam Studio, a small beauty business at Lake and Lyndale Avenue. "The whole community is crushed."

Jackson said she stopped by the Lake Street station every week to retrieve mail for her business, which was damaged by looting. "They need to bring it back," she said.

The 43-year-old Lake Street facility, which is owned by the USPS, spanned 80,000 square feet on nearly two acres of land at 110 E. 31st St. near Lake and Nicollet Avenue, according to Hennepin County property records. Because it is a federal property, no market value is listed.

The Minnehaha post office at 3033 S. 27th Av., built off

Minnehaha Avenue on nearly an acre in 1970, is owned by a Bloomington-based limited liability corporation and leased by the postal service. Its market value is just over $1 million, county records state.

Local residents and business owners say the post offices not only provided a critical lifeline, they served as an impromptu meeting place for neighbors.

Post offices burned in Floyd riots leave void

"The post office is part of the fabric of the community," said Jane Aldrich, a Longfellow neighborhood resident who used the Minnehaha facility frequently, especially to send care packages to family.

Aldrich said she knows many of the postal clerks by name. "The post office is a great leveler. Everyone uses it and it's so representative of our community," she said.

That being said, she added: "Buildings can be replaced. George Floyd cannot."

As the community continues to recover from the unrest, mail delivery that lapsed on May 28 was restored by June 1, Hill said.

"We are happy to report that all of our customers are receiving mail to their homes and businesses," Minneapolis Postmaster William Jones said in a statement.

For the time being, mail service for the Minnehaha facility has been redirected to the downtown Minneapolis post office. Lake Street post office patrons should go to the Loring Park station on the western edge of downtown.

The Postal Inspection Service is investigating looting and fires at both facilities, a federal crime that could result in severe penalties should the perpetrators be charged.

About 70 employees worked out of both post offices, but no one was present or injured as the fires raged, said Brad Sandberg, president of Local 125 of the American Postal Workers Union in Minneapolis. Employees are now working in other facilities, he said.

Both post offices were very busy, he said. Several hundred P.O. boxes in the buildings were destroyed, too.

"Especially with COVID, a lot of people running small businesses went online to sell their products to survive," he said. "People would be in line with armfuls of boxes. They were so thankful we remained open."

Hill said the bulk of the deliveries had been made from both locations before the fires, though some mail and packages were damaged. "Due to the ongoing investigation, we are unable to address specific volume," she said. But if customers believe they are missing mail or packages, she said, they should contact the sender.

A third post office in the Lake Street vicinity, the Powderhorn station at 3045 Bloomington Av., sustained some damage but reopened Tuesday.

"We were very lucky," said Eduardo Barrera, manager of nearby Mercado Central on Lake Street. "The post office provides a critical service."

While other post offices nationwide were damaged in the riots and looting that followed Floyd's death, none were burned as extensively as those in Minneapolis, Hill said.

As the community rebuilds, the memory of the post offices lingers. Someone spray-painted on a partial brick wall left standing at the Lake Street post office: "We [heart] our postal patrons! We will be back to serve you!"

Post offices burned in Floyd riots leave void

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DXC. UNREST UNLEASHED, TRAUMA RELIVED

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 12, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 858 wordsByline: ERIN ADLER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Agencies serving refugees say recent violent images have revived old fearsBody

As Twin Cities refugees watched the riots following George Floyd's killing, the violence triggered memories of chaotic scenes in the countries they fled for Minnesota.

"For the refugee population, witnessing police brutality and torture at the hands of an authority figure in broad daylight is going to be extraordinarily triggering," said Jill Davidson, a social worker with the Center for Victims of Torture. "This was something they thought they left behind."

Davidson said Minnesota, with its large refugee population, is home to an estimated 50,000 victims of torture - which typically occurred at the hands of a police officer or other authority figures. For her clients, "this [George Floyd] situation has caused a significant setback for, I would say, the majority of them."

They have been hurt physically or psychologically, sexually assaulted or had food and medical care withheld. Watching Floyd struggle to breathe churned up memories of similar experiences, she said.

Even if not torture victims, many refugees carry trauma from seeing conflict firsthand.

Siyad Farah, 90, was born in northern Somalia and grew up in Mogadishu. He came to the U.S. in 1999, fleeing war, and now lives near Minneapolis' Third Precinct police station.

When the rioting started, "The first thing I thought that was going to happen was a civil war," he said through an interpreter. Previously, he thought American police had the best training in the world, but watching the video of Floyd's last moments changed Farah's mind. Floyd's death looked like terrorism, he said, and reminded him of how feared police were in Somalia.

To cope, Farah has been reading the Qur'an and working to stay busy. "I hope things change," he said.

The blaring sirens, the smell of burning buildings and the sight of the National Guard patrolling the streets has been traumatic for first-generation Somalis, who experienced similar scenes during that country's civil war.

"They were like, 'We can't believe it. This is America,' " said Fartun Weli, executive director of Isuroon, a nonprofit that helps Somali-American women and families.

While Weli was "freaking out" during the protests and the riots, many Somali elders were "incredibly calm," she said. Then she realized why.

"I was like, 'Oh, they are in that survival mode where everything is shut down,' " she said. For a refugee, it's an everyday instinct, she added.

Suud Olat, 29, grew up in a Kenyan refugee camp and has been in the U.S. for eight years. He's running for a seat on the Minneapolis City Council and has heard some Somali-American community members wonder if they will now have to flee their new home.

"They are asking, 'What is going to happen now?' " he said. "The emotional part is that this is in our neighborhood. That's shocked us and taken a big emotional toll."

When a person is reminded of past trauma, "even if a person is not in immediate danger, their body responds as if they are," Davidson explained. Cognitive functioning turns off and a "flight, fight or freeze" response sets in.

They are afraid to go to work or leave the house and are suddenly fearful of police, she said. Some are having intrusive thoughts, trouble sleeping or waking from nightmares. Others can't stop crying.

Compounding the problem, some lost access to basics like grocery stores and pharmacies when stores burned down or were looted, Davidson said.

When mayhem erupted on St. Paul's University Avenue after Floyd's death, many Hmong-American farmers were driving home from farm fields in rural areas. Most are in their 60s or 70s and have vivid memories of the Vietnam War. Others in the Hmong community tried to alert them to what was happening so they wouldn't have to see it.

"They escaped a war-torn country to come to America," said Bao Vang, executive director and CEO of the Hmong American Partnership. "They didn't expect that the looting, the rioting would happen in broad daylight with no police presence."

What they saw in St. Paul reminded them of being "hunted and persecuted" in Laos and Thailand, she said. Some took refuge at the suburban home of a family member. Others got back to their house, locked the door and lay awake all night. Still others froze up, focusing only on survival.

The Center for Victims of Torture teaches its clients strategies to calm themselves if they see or hear something that retraumatizes them. They may try to focus intently on one thing, such as a tree or bird outside their window, to ground themselves in the present. Medicine can help, especially if sleep is an issue, Davidson said.

"I am just amazed every day at the resilience of the people we're working with ... and how they still manage to find a way," she said. "Our community has a lot to learn from them."

Out of tragedy, Weli said, she sees hopeful signs in the Somali community. Many young people now want to register to vote or learn how to organize their communities. Others hope to become citizens. "Even though it's really a hard time, I also see opportunities for the community to become more politically active, with intention," she said.

Unrest unleashed, trauma relived

Staff writer Mara Klecker contributed to this report.

Erin Adler · 612-673-1781

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

End of Document

ATF looking for 2 in St. Paul fires

ARTICLE DXCI. ATF LOOKING FOR 2 IN ST. PAUL FIRES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 12, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 5BLength: 290 wordsByline: RANDY FURST; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) announced Thursday that it is offering $10,000 in reward money for information that can lead to the arrest and conviction of a man and a woman being investigated for fires that were set in St. Paul.

The ATF said it is trying to locate Jose Felan Jr. and Mena Dyaha Yousif, who are suspected of arson in connection with the protests that followed the May 25 killing of George Floyd while in Minneapolis police custody.

Felan and Yousif are believed to be traveling south, the ATF said, adding that the public should be on the lookout for them along the Interstate 35 corridor.

In a Sunday news release, the ATF said that the man, who had not yet been identified as Felan, had set fires in locations that included Gordon Parks High School, which serves disadvantaged youth. After its initial reward notice, the ATF said it received additional information from the public identifying Felan.

"We are grateful for the tremendous response," said William Henderson, special agent in charge of the ATF's St. Paul field division.

The ATF initially offered a $5,000 reward to identify the man. It is now offering two more rewards of $5,000 each for apprehending and convicting the man and the woman.

Those wishing to contact the ATF may do so by e-mailing ATFTips@atf.gov; by submitting information at ReportIt.com; or by using the Report It mobile app

When using Report It, select "ATF-St. Paul Field Division" as the reporting agency. The ATF asked individuals to report as much information as possible. Tipsters can also call 1-888-ATF-TIPS (1-888-283-8477).

The ATF said information can be submitted anonymously, but if a reward is sought, the agency will need contact information.

ATF looking for 2 in St. Paul fires

RANDY FURST

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DXCII. CLIMATE LESSONS IN COVID RESPONSE?

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 12, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: OUTDOORS WEEKEND; Pg. 1CLength: 1010 wordsByline: DENNIS ANDERSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Relying on human behavior to change won't meet the crisis at hand.Body

Tucked away on an inside page of the Star Tribune last week was a short story noting that global surface temperatures in May were 1.13 degrees above average, topping the previous record for that month set in 2016. Also noted was that for the 12 months just concluded, global temperatures were 1.3 degrees above average, matching the warmest 12-month period ever, set between October 2015 and 2016.

It's possible if the coronavirus pandemic had never happened and if George Floyd hadn't been killed on the streets of Minneapolis, this latest Earth-is-heating-up story would have gained more prominent media display.

That it didn't doesn't alter the fact that our climate is changing relatively quickly and that the ramifications will be far-reaching.

Certainly, the nation's food-growing and livestock-rearing capabilities will be altered, as will wildlife and their habitats and, in fact, entire landscapes. It's possible, climatologists say, the northern coniferous forest and wetland ecosystem that have long dominated the Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness will be replaced by oak savanna.

Yet the discussion today is less about the inevitability of an altered climate than about the sociology and psychology of human attitude change relative to behavior change, and especially the weak correlation between the two - a topic that, given the coronavirus pandemic and the recent tragic death of Floyd and all that has followed, might be the central issue of our time.

Try as they might, sociologists over many decades generally have failed to tie determinatively people's attitudes to their behavior. Some scientists, in fact, say people's attitudes don't consistently determine their behavior at all.

I've been intrigued about this topic since 1988, when I spent a year investigating the illegal killing of ducks.

Climate lessons in COVID response?

One morning near Culiacán, in the state of Sinaloa, Mexico, I watched an American kill about 80 redhead ducks while they were driven over his blind by a young Mexican man in an airboat. When I later asked the American why he shot so many ducks when doing so in the U.S. could land him in jail, he essentially couldn't explain it, except to say that shooting large numbers of birds was normal and expected in Mexico.

On another morning, also in 1988, the late U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service special agent Dave Hall, along with his colleague, Bill Mellor, and I paddled into a Louisiana coastal marsh about 2 a.m. to hide near a hunting blind the agents knew had been illegally baited with corn.

Just before sunup, the hunters arrived and when the birds started flying, their wariness was lost in their zeal to get the corn. When Hall and Mellor finally revealed themselves to the hunters, showing their badges, the hunters had killed more than 60 ducks, well over their limits.

To his credit, Hall had developed a "Poachers to Preachers" program in conjunction with federal judges in which convicted wildlife killers were required to appear in videos in which they confessed the sins of their ways.

Hall had a video camera with him that morning, and while he interviewed the leader of the violators, he asked me to do the filming.

"This is the third time I've busted you for baiting," Hall said to the violator. "Now you're out here teaching your kids to poach. What's it going to take to get you to come into the marsh and shoot a legal limit of ducks, and stop shooting when you do?"

To my surprise, the guy took the question seriously, furrowing his brow and stroking his chin. Then he said, "Raise the limit?"

Infuriating as the man's answer was, and, yes, in a way, funny, the response was nevertheless fascinating, suggestive as it was of the many ways we all resist behavior change.

Certainly, behaviors in the U.S. tied to cigarette smoking, seat belt wearing and drinking and driving have changed for the better due to persistent messaging.

But in each case, self-interest largely compelled the changes, e.g., if a person stopped smoking, wore a seat belt and didn't drink and drive, he or she was more likely, on average, to live longer (and in the latter case, stay out of jail) than if the change wasn't undertaken.

Yet absent such self-interest in the near or intermediate term, people oftentimes don't change their behavior, regardless of their perceived attitude.

Thus the difficulty, complexity and challenge of fighting global climate change: What, after all, can individuals do to effect positive global climate outcomes in their lifetimes?

The answer too often is "little" or "nothing."

The same matrix of human choices and their relationships to individual and societal benefits has been front and center during the past four months in the world's attempt to mitigate the coronavirus pandemic.

Climate lessons in COVID response?

Stay home, our leaders say. Keep your distance from others. Wear a mask when appropriate. Adhere to these behaviors, the message goes, and the individual and society at large will benefit in the near and long term.

Generally, but not universally, people have done pretty well. But their motivation (to stay alive) has been extreme, and the perceived benefit, immediate.

Unfortunately, because individual behavior change is far more loosely correlated, if at all, to solving climate change, in this and similar cases only behavior change compelled by legislation, regulation and the perceived negative personal consequences of each has the greatest chance of long-term, positive societal outcomes.

Hall's "Poachers to Preachers" program changed some poachers' behaviors through persuasion.

But it wasn't until Minnesota waterfowlers, among others, bought Fish and Wildlife Service agents a $650,000 float-equipped helicopter to quickly and effectively locate and, when necessary, land on duck poachers, that the miscreants' behavior changed on a large scale.

Sometimes, it turns out, actions do speak louder than words

Or, as Martin Luther King Jr. said, "Morals cannot be legislated, but behavior can be regulated."

Absent such regulations, look for this month to be the hottest June on record, and perhaps July will be, too.

dennis.anderson@startribune.com

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

ARTICLE DXCIII. DOWNPLAYING VIRUS RISK, TRUMP GETS BACK TO BUSINESS AS USUAL

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 12, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1105 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: WASHINGTON (AP) - At the White House, aides now routinely flout internal rules requiring face masks. The president's campaign is again scheduling mass arena rallies. And he is back to spending summer weekends at his New Jersey golf club.Body

By JILL COLVIN and ZEKE MILLER

WASHINGTON (AP) - At the White House, aides now routinely flout internal rules requiring face masks. The president's campaign is again scheduling mass arena rallies. And he is back to spending summer weekends at his New Jersey golf club.

Three months after President Donald Trump bowed to the realities of a pandemic that put big chunks of life on pause and killed more Americans than several major wars, Trump is back to business as usual - even as coronavirus cases are on the upswing in many parts of the country.

While the nation has now had months to prepare stockpiles of protective gear and ventilators, a vaccine still is many months away at best and a model cited by the White House projects tens of thousands of more deaths by the end of September.

Amid renewed fears of a virus resurgence, financial markets - frequently highlighted by Trump as a sign of economic recovery - suffered their worst drop since March on Thursday. The market opened on the upside Friday morning.

At the White House, though, officials played down the severity of the virus surge and sought to blame it on factors beyond Trump's forceful push to reopen the economy, which he's counting on to help him win reelection.

"I spoke to our health experts at some length last evening. They're saying there is no second spike. Let me repeat that: There is no second spike," Larry Kudlow, director of the National Economic Council, said Friday on "Fox & Friends."

Downplaying virus risk, Trump gets back to business as usual

He said COVID-19 cases are increasing only in certain spots of the country, but that nationally, the rates of new cases and fatalities have flattened out. "There is no emergency," Kudlow said. "There is no second wave. I don't know where that got started on Wall Street."

Surgeon General Jerome Adams, who stressed the country has a positive testing rate under 6%, said the data on the virus show the nation is moving in the right direction. Still, Adams cautioned at a roundtable with Trump Thursday in Texas that while the country has flattened the curve on virus cases, "that doesn't mean that COVID has gone away, that it's any less contagious, that it's any less deadly to vulnerable communities."

The White House was a late adopter of many of the safety proposals it recommended, eager to project a sense of normalcy even as it relied on strong testing capacity not available to the rest of the nation. Now Trump, who watched the human and economic toll of the virus take the wind out of his campaign sails, sees even greater urgency in returning to how things were - no matter the state of the virus.

At the White House, the coronavirus task force has dramatically scaled back both its visibility and its operations. It now meets once or twice a week on an as-needed basis instead of every day.

White House officials say that, because response systems have already been put in place and a strategy developed, there's no longer a need for a whole-of-government response. Still, the president receives regular briefings, and the vice president gets briefed multiple times a day.

Yet Trump has taken to talking about the pandemic in the past tense - an "invisible enemy" conquered - rather than one still ravaging a nation that has, in recent weeks, also been consumed by mass protests following George Floyd's killing by police.

Within the White House complex, many staffers have been flouting directions issued last month to limit their entry to the West Wing and advising "everyone who enters the West Wing to wear a mask or facial covering" unless they are sitting at their desks and at least 6 feet (1.8 meters) away from colleagues. The directive came after two White House officials - the vice president's press secretary and a presidential valet - tested positive for the virus, sending panic waves through the building.

Weeks later, staff members are frequently seen walking around the West Wing without masks. That includes at meetings with the president, such as a Wednesday roundtable with African American supporters. White House staff have also declined to wear masks on Air Force One, even in close proximity to the president.

Vice President Mike Pence, for his part, tweeted - and then deleted - a photo of himself posing with staff huddled together at the reelection campaign's headquarters. No one appeared to be wearing a mask. The White House and campaign did not respond to requests for comment.

The visual return to normalcy comes as the country surpassed 2 million COVID-19 cases this week, with new hot spots emerging in battleground states like Arizona and cases rising in nearly half of states, according to an Associated Press analysis. Though some states that have moved quickly to reopen have not seen a surge, others have seen escalations.

Yet Trump has continued to travel - even to states that still have restrictions - and announced this week that he'll resume his signature campaign rallies beginning next Friday in Tulsa, Oklahoma. The state, which was among the earliest to begin loosening coronavirus restrictions, has a relatively low rate of infection but has seen cases rising.

Downplaying virus risk, Trump gets back to business as usual

"They've done a great job with COVID, as you know, the state of Oklahoma," Trump said Wednesday.

Campaign officials chose the location knowing Republican Gov. Kevin Stitt would raise no objections. Stitt's most recent reopening phase places no limits on the size of group gatherings. The campaign hopes the location will all but guarantee a large crowd, since Oklahoma is one of the most Republican states in the nation and Trump has never held a rally there as president.

Still, the reality could not be completely ignored.

"By clicking register below, you are acknowledging that an inherent risk of exposure to COVID-19 exists in any public place where people are present," Trump's campaign advised those signing up for the rally. "By attending the Rally, you and any guests voluntarily assume all risks related to exposure to COVID-19 and agree not to hold Donald J. Trump for President, Inc." liable for illness or injury.

Trump is also planning events in Arizona and Florida - states where cases are on the upswing. In Arizona, hospitals have been told to prepare for the worst as hospitalizations have surged.

Trump this month decided that he would no longer hold the marquee event of the Republican National Convention -- his acceptance speech - in North Carolina after the state refused to guarantee that he could fill an arena to capacity with maskless supporters. It's being moved to Jacksonville, Florida.

For the White House, the priority is regaining economic momentum.

Associated Press writer Jonathan Lemire in New York contributed to this report.

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

ARTICLE DXCIV. GOP CRITICIZES WALZ AFTER COLUMBUS STATUE TOPPLED

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 12, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 675 wordsByline: PATRICK CONDON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Governor says he doesn't condone the behavior.Body

Gov. Tim Walz said Thursday that he doesn't condone protesters who tore down a statue of Christopher Columbus at the Minnesota Capitol, but that he understands why they did it.

"I won't condone the behavior. There will be consequences for it," Walz said at a news conference Thursday. But he also said the frustration of the American Indian Movement protesters who pulled down the statue were acting on legitimate frustration with Columbus' legacy.

Walz's remarks came after criticism from Republican legislative leaders of his administration's muted response to the statue's toppling.

"They knew there was a threat to the Christopher Columbus statue, and he failed to adequately protect it," Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka said in a news release from his office on Thursday. "The mentality to do whatever people want without repercussion has got to stop."

Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington said a State Patrol captain and a state tribal liaison approached protesters on Wednesday to urge them to follow the official process of petitioning the state to remove a statue. Harrington said protesters felled the statue while that conversation was ongoing, and before a larger group of Patrol officers stationed nearby could reach the scene.

The State Patrol said Wednesday night that it had "identified the instigator who will face charges related to destruction of public property." Department of Public Safety spokesman Bruce Gordon said Thursday that the Bureau of Criminal Apprehension had taken over the investigation, and that once complete it will be turned over to the Ramsey County attorney for consideration of charges.

Columbus, the 15th-century Genoese explorer who was an early European colonizer of the Americas, is a longtime source of ire to American Indians and others for his role in the killing and exploiting of Indigenous people. Protesters in Boston and Richmond, Va., also damaged Columbus statues this week.

GOP criticizes Walz after Columbus statue toppled

The episodes follow nationwide protests over the death of George Floyd, a black man who died in Minneapolis police custody on May 25. Some Republicans also were critical of the late police and National Guard response to the looting and arson in Minneapolis, which resulted in the destruction of a police station and dozens of businesses.

Walz said he believes it's wrong to draw an equivalency between pulling down the statue with recent looting and burning of local businesses.

Lt. Gov. Peggy Flanagan, the first Native American woman elected statewide in Minnesota, said Thursday that she's glad the statue is gone.

"I'm not going to perform for folks. I'm not going to feign sadness," Flanagan said, adding that "there is no honor in the legacy of Christopher Columbus."

Flanagan chairs the state government panel that makes decisions about the placement of statues and artwork in state buildings and property. She said that "the state is long overdue for a hard look at the symbols, statues and icons that were created without the input of any of our communities."

State Rep. Jim Nash, R-Waconia, said on Thursday that Harrington had a different version of the events leading up to the statue's toppling when they spoke on the phone Wednesday. Nash said Harrington told him he decided to not put Patrol officers between protesters and the statue.

"He said that they didn't want to incite people further," Nash said.

Gordon, the Department of Public Safety spokesman, did not respond to a request for comment on Nash's version of the exchange.

Nash said he understands why protesters don't like Columbus, and that he would have been open to considering the statue's removal through the established process.

"If you support what this group did, I guess I'd ask what you would think if Minnesota had a Republican governor who failed to intervene if a group of angry Republicans was trying to pull down the Hubert Humphrey statue," Nash said.

Asked the whereabouts of Minnesota's toppled Columbus, Gordon said that "in the interests of public safety, the statue is in an undisclosed location."

Patrick Condon · 612-673-4413

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

ARTICLE DXCV. LAWMAKERS WANT TO ENHANCE MPLS. TRANSIT CORRIDORS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 12, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 412 wordsByline: JANET MOORE; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: They're seeking $55 million in state bonding to rebuild, with a focus on rapid bus lines crisscrossing cities.Body

State and local lawmakers who support transit vowed Thursday to improve bus service in Minneapolis, where much of the destruction occurred along Lake Street following George Floyd's death.

Standing in the parking lot of the damaged Lake Street Target and Cub stores, and near other buildings that were burned, the elected leaders said they've requested $55 million in the state bonding bill to help build out the D and B rapid bus lines.

"To rebuild and better serve this area, bus-rapid transit is going to be key to the reconstruction," said Rep. Jim Davnie, DFL-Minneapolis.

The $75 million D line would link Brooklyn Center and the Mall of America by way of north and south Minneapolis, some of the most transit-dependent corridors in the state, and substantially replace the busy Route 5 bus line.

The request for D line state funding has lingered for years. To date, $55 million from the Metropolitan Council and federal sources have been identified to help build the line.

The B line would substantially replace bus Route 21 between Uptown in Minneapolis to St. Paul's Union Depot, mostly along Lake Street and Marshall Avenue. The cost to build the line is estimated between $55 million and $65 million, with $26 million coming from the Met Council and the federal government.

It's unclear whether Senate Republicans will support the bonding request, which includes another $20 million for the E line rapid bus connecting the University of Minnesota and Southdale Center in Edina.

So far, two rapid bus lines have been launched in the Twin Cities, the A line in St. Paul and the C line in Minneapolis. Rapid buses operate much like light rail but for a fraction of the cost to build. Passengers pay before they board and, with fewer stops and signal priority at intersections, trips are speedier.

Lawmakers want to enhance Mpls. transit corridors

Most of those in the D Line's service area, or 57%, are people of color. For the B line, it's 40%. Both the Route 5 and 21 bus routes serve communities heavily dependent on transit service, said Rep. Aisha Gomez, DFL-Minneapolis.

"People ask me, why do folks in the suburbs get big fancy buses while we get the local bus?" she said.

Rep. Paul Torkelson, R-Hanska, a member of the House Transportation Finance and Policy Committee, toured the B and D line routes with his DFL colleagues Thursday.

"I'm here to get educated," he said. Rapid bus service "makes a lot more sense" than light rail in terms of flexibility and cost, he said.

Janet Moore · 612-673-7752

Twitter: @ByJanetMoore

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

ARTICLE DXCVI. SENATE REPUBLICANS PLAN TO HOLD SPECIAL SESSION TO ONE WEEK AND LIMIT AGENDA

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 12, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 887 words

Byline: Bill Salisbury, Mara H. Gottfried

Highlight: Gov. Tim Walz called the Minnesota Legislature into a special session on Friday and wants them to tackle an ambitious package of police reform and economic recovery measures.

Body

Gov. Tim Walz called the Minnesota Legislature into a special session on Friday and wants them to tackle an ambitious package of police reform and economic recovery measures.

But the governor can't keep lawmakers in St. Paul indefinitely, and just before the session started, Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, R-East Gull Lake, announced senators would adjourn and go home next Friday, June 19, after addressing a limited agenda over the next week.

"We're going to do the things we can do now," Gazelka said. More complicated issues that require lengthier deliberations can wait until the next regular legislative session in January.

That means lawmakers likely won't pass a long list of police reform and accountability measures that Walz and DFL legislative leaders proposed Thursday. But in response to the death last month of George Floyd while in Minneapolis police custody, Senate Republicans said they would take up a handful of law enforcement accountability proposals.

GOP Sen. Warren Limmer of Maple Grove, the chair of the Judiciary and Public Safety Committee, said those measures include:

A statewide ban on the use of chokeholds and neck restraints. A requirement that any use of deadly force by law enforcement be reported to the Minnesota Bureau of Criminal Apprehension. More training for police officers. Background checks for law enforcement employees who are not licensed officers. Providing mental health services for officers after potentially traumatic events.

Limmer said other issues advocated by Walz and the legislative People of Color and Indigenous Caucus would require more extensive study and hearings.

House and Senate DFL leaders said the Legislature should be putting in the time needed to work on criminal justice reform. They expressed disappointment in measures the Republicans previewed.

Senate Republicans plan to hold special session to one week and limit agenda

"A lot of these are pretty basic things that have been implemented throughout our communities and do not sound like they are going to be meaningful change," said Senate Minority Leader Susan Kent, DFL-Woodbury.

Assistant Senate Minority Leader Jeff Hayden, a Democrat, lives eight blocks from where a Minneapolis police officer pinned Floyd under his knee for nearly nine minutes. He said three-quarters of the devastation on Lake Street is in his district, which legislators have visited.

"They've seen it, they've wept, they've expressed that they want to do something better but, as usual when the time comes, they come with flimsy ... not very serious proposals on criminal justice reform," Hayden said.

House Speaker Melissa Hortman, DFL-Brooklyn Park, said legislators "should not be in any hurry to leave the state Capitol before our work is done. The people of Minnesota have demanded that we take action."

The House Public Safety and Criminal Justice Reform Division has scheduled an eight-hour remote hearing for Saturday to consider what they're calling "the Minnesota Police Accountability Act of 2020, aimed at reimagining and reforming public safety in the state."

CAPITOL SCENE REFLECTS GRIM TIMES

Lawmakers got a graphic reminder of the Floyd killing and the rioting that followed when they returned to the Capitol. The building was surrounded by a six-foot fence erected in response to what state officials said were threats to damage or destroy the iconic building to protest Floyd's death. The fence kept the public out of the building, which was unusually quiet.

Members also were reminded that the pandemic continues. Only a handful of legislators obeying social distancing requirements were allowed on the House and Senate floors at the same time. Many of them, mostly Democrats, wore face masks, while most Republicans were unmasked.

WHAT ELSE SENATE REPUBLICANS WANT

In addition to police accountability measures, Senate Republican leaders outlined four other items on their special session agenda. They are:

A bill allocating $841 million in federal funds to cities, counties and townships for COVID-19-related expenses. A bonding bill to fund infrastructure construction projects. Gazelka said Senate Republicans have agreed to borrow up to $1.35 billion for those projects. The Senate approved just under $1 billion in bonding in May, while Walz requested and the DFL-controlled House voted for more than $2 billion. Some tax breaks, mainly for small businesses. State grants of up to $10,000 to help small businesses "survive and reopen," said the bill's sponsor, Sen. Eric Pratt, R-Prior Lake. WHAT HOUSE DEMS WANT

Meanwhile, House Democrats have four important areas to address, Hortman said in advance of the start of the special session. They are:

Helping local governments and small businesses recover from the COVID-19 pandemic. Taking up unfinished business from the regular session since the pandemic struck during the middle of it, most notably the bonding bill. Working on police accountability issues and criminal justice reform. "Repair the communities that were impacted by the civil unrest following" Floyd's death. Walz's executive powers extended as Legislature comes up short of a veto MN Senate GOP leader says deal close on bonding, tax bills Deals remain elusive as Minnesota special session approaches Special session renews hopes for those seeking state money Police reforms among the issues legislators expected to take up when they return to the Capitol

Senate Republicans plan to hold special session to one week and limit agenda

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DXCVII. SMALL-BUSINESS OWNERS SEEK ROAD FROM RUIN AFTER RIOTS

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

June 12, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 228 words

Byline: Dirk DeYoung

Body

The damage is still being assessed from riots and fires that spread throughout parts of Minneapolis and St. Paul following the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody. However, there's no doubt that areas along Lake Street in Minneapolis were devastated, as well as parts of North Minneapolis and the Midway area of St. Paul.

Early estimates for Minneapolis indicate nearly 1,000 commercial properties were damaged, 52 businesses completely destroyed and another 30 sustained severe damage, according to a Star Tribune report.

This week, we tell the stories of three minority entrepreneurs as they strive to recover from the damage, some of it extensive, and refuse to give up hope.

The stories were written by Iain Carlos, a freelance writer in the American City Business Journals/Dow Jones News Fund Business Reporting program who's assigned to write for the Minneapolis/St. Paul

Small-business owners seek road from ruin after riots

Business Journal for the summer with a focus on covering minority businesspeople. He is a recent graduate of St. Olaf College in Northfield.

Read more here:

Fighting to resurrect: Black-owned salon burned to the ground

Sabor Chuchi restaurant owner after fires: 'Your whole life is there, and it's gone'

For Somali-owned businesses damaged in riots, relief effort takes off

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

End of Document

STARTING OVER AT 90

ARTICLE DXCVIII. STARTING OVER AT 90

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 12, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 867 wordsByline: ALICIA ELER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Minneapolis artist Aribert Munzner lost a lifetime of work in the aftermath of rioting, but kept his sense of humor.Body

Wearing circular spectacles and suspenders that held his loose trousers onto his bony frame, 90-year-old artist Aribert Munzner stood outside his studio at the Ivy Arts Building in Minneapolis, watching friends, colleagues, former students and strangers carry out paint supplies and soggy cardboard boxes.

The boxes contained more than 60 years of work, damaged in a single night.

In the early hours of May 29, the roof of the Ivy - a 120-year-old building on S. 27th Avenue that once fabricated ornamental iron and now is home to more than 70 artist studios and small businesses - was ignited by sparks from the nearby Hexagon Bar, set ablaze in riots after the death of George Floyd.

Munzner, who goes by "Ari," explained the incident as if it were a scene from a comic book:

"One: Fire torch. Two: Big fire, spark, 150-year-old roof, wooden. Big fire. Fire people come, put out the fire. Big hole in roof. 1,000 gallons of beautiful Mississippi water came thundering down and I was at ground zero," he said, with an accent that sounded like a mix of New York, German and Irish.

Actually, the fire started around 4 a.m. Ten neighbors and Ivy janitor Damian Garner, who's had a studio in the building for more than 15 years, tried to put it out with buckets of water and fire extinguishers.

Overwhelmed with calls from around the city, firefighters didn't arrive until around 6 a.m.

Fire, water or smoke damaged about 40 studios in the Ivy, including the cozy ground-floor space housing about 500 works from Munzner's 60-year career.

"Once it hit those beams with the dried-out paint, it looked like you were looking into the chasm of hell," said Garner, whose own studio was spared. "I would've lost everything - there would've been no trace of my existence other than me."

While Munzner is grappling with the loss of his many artworks, his outlook on change is more fluid.

STARTING OVER AT 90

"I'm starting again because that's what I've been doing all my life," he said.

He was only 7 when his Jewish family fled Hitler's Germany in 1937 for Baghdad, where a family friend lived. In their new home, he learned Arabic from a Lebanese Jesuit priest. But when British forces invaded Iraq in 1941 to depose its Nazi-leaning regime, the family took off again, this time to New York City.

Munzner has eidetic memory, also known as photographic memory - "I don't have the ability to play with words - they jump like squirrels," he joked - so when he came to America he taught himself English by reading comic books.

"I learned how to say 'WOW' and 'BANG!' " he said, making explosive motions with his hands. "Superman and Captain Marvel told me how to be an American."

He came to the Minneapolis College of Art and Design in 1955 for a short-term gig. Now he is an MCAD professor emeritus.

"We didn't have GPS back in '55, so I never found my way back to New York," he joked. "I ended up - gladly, actually - in the Upper Midwest."

Starting over

In the days after the fire, a rotating crew sifted through the mess of his studio, still full of puddles, deciding what could be salvaged and taken to temporary storage at Everest Arts and Science in St. Paul.

They found a box of unharmed panels from 1965, but most of the art had some kind of water damage. Still, he's optimistic about what's to come. He hopes to create a new body of work, and have an exhibition a year from now.

"The whole idea of starting over is a continuity, it is a going from one state of matter to another," he said.

He's looking for a new studio space closer to his apartment at Sholom in St. Louis Park, an assisted-living facility where he and his wife, Joan, moved after she broke her hip. She died in 2016. He has two daughters, Naomi, a grants administrator for the state of Minnesota, and Tamara, a computer scientist at the University of British Columbia who has set up a GoFundMe page for her dad.

For 50-some years, Munzner has referred to all of his paintings - large-scale works on rice paper, using computer-generated programs - as "Genesis," a study of the universe and the unknown. He paints galaxy-like explosions of color using tiny marks on canvas, as well as sparsely populated black-and-white drawings that look like close-ups of cells.

Not all those works survived the great flood.

Outside the studio, Michal Sagar donned a mask and sifted through moist cardboard boxes. "I just cried when I heard," said Sagar, an artist who also taught at MCAD. "Property is property, of course, but these are the stories that nobody is going to hear."

A former student, Nathanael Flink, inspected furniture and canvas stretchers. "It really breaks your heart to see whole portfolios of delicate rice-paper drawings lost," he said.

STARTING OVER AT 90

As the circle of friends regrouped, Munzner stood outside, chatting with a Minneapolis city inspector, Joe Strohmeyer.

"I am going to count this as pretty much a total loss," said Strohmeyer, clipboard in hand.

He handed an official-looking paper to Munzner, who glanced at it, then gleefully thanked him in both German and English.

"I can't give you any answers because I am just one of thousands of tenants. Each one of us has a different view of the universe, and mine is not reality," said Munzner. "It's a fantasy."

612-673-4437 · @AliciaEler

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DXCIX. THE DEFENDERS OF FRANKLIN AVENUE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 12, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1059 wordsByline: JEAN HOPFENSBERGER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Community groups offer thanks to American Indian patrols that saved more than 20 businesses and nonprofits from protest violence.Body

Pow Wow Grounds is well known for its wild rice soup and Indian tacos.

But now it's also known as the hub of an impressive community effort that saved Franklin Avenue businesses and nonprofits during the violence that erupted after the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police.

It started with three Indian leaders who saw the destruction unfolding on Lake Street and rushed to protect businesses at the heart of the Indian cultural corridor along Franklin Avenue.

Michael Goze, CEO of the American Indian Community Development Corporation, and Frank Paro, president of the American Indian Movement (AIM), sent out a call for volunteers as violence erupted in the streets.

Bob Rice, owner of Pow Wow Grounds coffee shop, opened his property as the staging area for AIM street patrols and offered other logistical support. Each night, 50 to several hundred community volunteers gathered in the Pow Wow Grounds parking lot for a meal, prayer and assignments from AIM to protect the area.

As the street patrols wound down last weekend, neighbors showed their appreciation. Librarians at the Franklin Library had a mural of the AIM flag painted on its boarded doors. The Native American Community Clinic had scrawled "Thank you AIM" on its window boards that were coming down.

"This could have been Lake Street," Goze said. "Now we can build up rather than rebuild."

"I'm in awe of what they did," added Will Delaney, co-chairman of the Franklin Area Business Association. "All of us were dealing with a lot of challenges at that time. To pull the patrol together and keep watch on Franklin Avenue ... I'm really appreciative."

THE DEFENDERS OF FRANKLIN AVENUE

This week the organizers walked down Franklin, pointing out unharmed buildings and properties with glass windows intact. Buildings included the Minneapolis American Indian Center, All Nations Indian Church, the Mashkiki Waakaaigan Pharmacy, the Woodlands National Bank, the Dollar Store and Maria's Cafe.

The AIM patrols also were in the Lake Street area, they said, guarding the Division of Indian Work and Migizi Communications, the one building they were not able to save.

The men said they were relieved that the heart of the Twin Cities Indian community was spared and grateful that so many people offered to protect the area.

Rice gestured to a building of connected storefronts, noting that "if one of these buildings had gone up in fire, we'd have lost the whole place."

Paro said he was named president of AIM, the national American Indian civil rights group, succeeding Clyde Bellecourt just two days before the violence erupted. After hearing about looting and fires, he said he knew that law enforcement would not make Franklin Avenue a priority.

So he resurrected the citizen patrols launched by AIM when it was created in 1968 in this very neighborhood, to document and protect residents from police brutality. The recent patrols included children and grandchildren of that first group.

"My wife showed me a map of places in Minneapolis that were looted and burned," Paro said. "Around here, there were just two or three dots."

"We had a lot of people involved," he added. "Men. Women. People from age 16 to the 70s."

Last Friday, about 50 people gathered outside Pow Wow Grounds for ribs, donated by Famous Dave's restaurant, and grilled walleye. With curfew ending, it would be the last night on the streets.

Lisa Bellanger, executive director of national AIM, sat at a table with a paper grid showing the properties that needed protection. Volunteers signed up with their names and contact information. They guarded specific buildings but also kept an eye open for trouble anywhere.

"There were people on the rooftop here," said Goze, gesturing to the Minneapolis American Indian Center. "We had walkie-talkies. We used an app on phones. We texted."

Goze said some patrollers who had permits carried guns.

Their methods weren't always conventional. When they discovered four teenage boys trying to break into a neighborhood liquor store, patrol members apprehended them - and called their parents. A provision for release was that a parent in their hometown of Eau Claire, Wis., drive to Minneapolis and retrieve the boys.

The nightly send-off for the patrols included a traditional Indian ceremony and traditional medicine for protection on the streets.

While the group received city permission to patrol early on, there was some confusion after the Minnesota National Guard entered the scene. Just as neighborhood block clubs stood watch past curfews, so did the

THE DEFENDERS OF FRANKLIN AVENUE

AIM patrols. This led to a clash with law enforcement at the Little Earth housing complex, when projectiles were fired, said Bellanger.

But night after night, the volunteers arrived, staying at their posts until 6 a.m.

Aldi store manager Amanda Jerde recalled pulling up to her store to find several vehicles blocking the driveway entrance, protecting her business.

"It is truly amazing what they did," Jerde said. "I'd come to work at 5:30 or 6 in the morning, and they'd be camped out in the parking lot. And I don't have connections to the community. I just work here."

Across the street at the Franklin Library, the orange, yellow and black AIM flag is painted on the plywood covering the door, which has been closed since March because of the COVID-19 pandemic.

"We know how much AIM has protected our buildings and our communities," said librarian Becky Wolf, at a community gathering there last weekend. "The library staff wanted to do something to thank them."

Alex Buehler, branch manager of Woodlands National Bank, was handling customer requests that day, grateful for a patrol that earlier had stopped two young men who had threatened to torch the bank.

But when the AIM patrols packed up about 6 a.m., others bent on destruction had been watching for a chance to move in.

"They broke in about 6:30," Buehler said. "They trashed the lobby."

This week, life was getting back to normal. The Pow Wow Grounds parking lot now holds a tent where people can register for free groceries and supplies available next to the coffee shop. Goze had turned his attention back to developing affordable housing in the area.

But given the success of the AIM patrol, Paro said he'd like to help it continue, albeit as a smaller patrol. He is organizing a meeting this week to explore that.

Said Paro: "I think we did a heck of a job."

Jean Hopfensperger · 612-673-4511

Load-Date: June 12, 2020

'Vast majority' of charges related to curfew violations will be dismissed in St. Paul

ARTICLE DC. 'VAST MAJORITY' OF CHARGES RELATED TO CURFEW VIOLATIONS WILL BE DISMISSED IN ST. PAUL

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 12, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 348 words

Byline: Emma Harville

Highlight: St. Paul City Attorney Lyndsey Olson announced Friday that all charges against those protesters who did not participate in any acts of violence or destruction of property will be dismissed "in the interest of justice."

Body

St. Paul City Attorney Lyndsey Olson announced Friday that all charges against those protesters who did not participate in any acts of violence or destruction of property will be dismissed "in the interest of justice."

Nearly 100 cases were filed in St. Paul related to the civil unrest that broke out in the days following the death of George Floyd while in Minneapolis police custody on May 25. Olson says of those 100 cases, "the vast majority" likely will be dismissed.

According to Olson, 87 cases are curfew violations, while others are related to additional crimes.

The City Attorney's Office will offer alternatives to traditional prosecution for cases involving conduct that went beyond peaceful protesting, including the ETHOS program, which provides "compassionate accountability" through restorative justice principles for first-time or nonviolent offenders.

The ETHOS program, Olson said, would facilitate dialogue between participants and community members in order to "develop a unique plan to repair the harm to the victim and the community."

After the participant completes the program, their case will be dismissed and an expungement will be sent to the court for approval.

Charging decisions will be individualized case by case, however, and the City Attorney's Office will proceed with traditional prosecution if deemed appropriate.

"We support and encourage the exercise of free speech," Olson said. "We also recognize that we have a responsibility to our community to hold those who used violence to harm others accountable. These steps achieve this critical balance."

'Vast majority' of charges related to curfew violations will be dismissed in St. Paul

Olson says the City Attorney's Office is also reviewing evidence through police body camera footage, squad car footage, witness accounts and social media to determine the outcome of each case.

"Those voices of peaceful protests have challenged and renewed our country's spirit in every single generation," St. Paul Mayor Melvin Carter said. "I fully support City Attorney Olson's approach, and appreciate that distinction between those that sought to build a better future and those who tried to tear us down."

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCI. CAHILL TO OVERSEE 4 EX-COPS' CASES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 459 wordsByline: ROCHELLE OLSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Hennepin County district judge has experience in high-profile trials.Body

The cases of four fired Minneapolis police officers have been assigned to Hennepin County District Judge Peter Cahill, who began his career as a defense attorney before serving as the top adviser to U.S. Sen. Amy Klobuchar when she was county attorney.

Defense lawyers have 10 days to file to remove Cahill as the judge, but they would have no say in who replaced him and they could not then remove that judge. Lawyers for the four did not return calls Friday. All are expected in court at 9 a.m. June 29.

The judge, who began his career in the county public defender's office straight out of the University of Minnesota School of Law in 1984, has extensive experience in high-profile cases. He has been a judge since 2007 when he was appointed by then-Gov. Tim Pawlenty, a Republican.

Cahill, who also served as the county's chief judge, is known for being decisive and direct. Last year, he sentenced Kenneth Lilly, of St. Paul, to seven years in prison for shooting a school bus driver on a snowy winter day in 2019.

Cahill told Lilly he didn't believe Lilly feared for his life when he was struck by a slow-moving bus and chastised him for not knowing a child was on board the bus.

"What else would a school bus be carrying?" Cahill asked.

Lilly was represented by Thomas Plunkett, who now represents J. Alexander Kueng, one of the former officers charged with pinning Floyd to the street along with Thomas Lane, and Derek Chauvin, who knelt on Floyd's neck. Also charged is former officer Tou Thao, who kept concerned bystanders away from Floyd and the officers.

Last year, Cahill also sentenced Thomas Incantalupo, a former St. Louis Park ice skating coach convicted of repeated sexual assaults on a student between 14 and 16 years of age. After telling Incantalupo his

Cahill to oversee 4 ex-cops' cases apologies "ring hollow," Cahill sentenced him to 24 years. Incantalupo was represented by Earl Gray, who represents Lane.

Before becoming a judge, Cahill spent 10 years in the county attorney's office, seven of them as chief deputy, the top staff job to the county's elected prosecutor.

The cases against the four officers could be tried together or separately. The choice of a judge to manage them is significant because the judge sets the tone inside and the parameters for access to the courtroom. Incoming Chief Judge Toddrick Barnette assigned the cases to Cahill.

Interest in the cases could dwarf the global attention on the county courthouse for the trial of Mohammed Noor, the former Minneapolis police officer convicted in April 2019 of third-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter in the fatal shooting of Justine Ruszczyk Damond, an Australian, in southwest Minneapolis.

Staff writer Chao Xiong contributed to this report.

Rochelle Olson · 612-673-1747

Twitter: @rochelleolson

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

ARTICLE DCII. FACT CHECK: TRUMP'S LAW AND ORDER AND MISINFORMATION

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 13, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1402 wordsByline: Hope Yen, Calvin Woodward, Amanda SeitzHighlight: WASHINGTON (AP) - "Ugh," said a Republican senator. "How crude," said a Democratic governor.Body

WASHINGTON - "Ugh," said a Republican senator. "How crude," said a Democratic governor.

President Donald Trump set off plenty of reactions like that when he peddled a baseless conspiracy theory about an activist who landed hard on the ground, and then in intensive care, in what prosecutors call an assault by police.

Trump's week of law and order rhetoric came with heavy doses of misinformation as he stretched to blame unrest on radical leftists and to put three loaded words - "defund the police" - in the mouth of a Democratic rival who doesn't support them.

Meantime, the coronavirus pandemic is still growing in nearly half the states. Trump and his aides said little about it except to keep up the push to reopen the country. The United States surpassed 2 million COVID-19 cases in the past week; more than 114,000 have died from it in this country.

A look at some claims and reality:

TRUMP: "Buffalo protester shoved by Police could be an ANTIFA provocateur. 75 year old Martin Gugino was pushed away after appearing to scan police communications in order to black out the equipment. @OANN I watched, he fell harder than was pushed. Was aiming scanner. Could be a set up?" - tweet Tuesday.

THE FACTS: There's no evidence that Gugino was an "ANTIFA provocateur" or that he was trying to "black out" police equipment. And Trump doesn't explain the physics behind his theory that Gugino fell harder than he was pushed.

Trump referred to a report from the One America News Network, which cited an uninformed blog arguing that Gugino was using antifa-like tactics, such as "a method of police tracking used by Antifa to monitor the location of police."

Top tech experts called that claim confounding.

It is possible to disrupt police radio - an illegal action often called "jamming" - but hackers do that by attacking receiving stations, not with handheld devices that target an individual police officer's radio, Matt Blaze, a professor of computer science and law at Georgetown University, told The Associated Press.

"Any radio system is subject to interference, but it doesn't work by pointing some sort of ray gun and interfering," Blaze said. "That just doesn't make any sense."

Gugino was hospitalized in the intensive care unit last weekend after being pushed by police. He was seen bleeding from his head as officers walked away. Friends say he's a retiree and a veteran peace activist - not an "antifa provocateur."

Two Buffalo, New York, police officers have been charged with second-degree assault. The officers, who could face prison sentences of up to seven years if convicted, pleaded not guilty.

Many Republican lawmakers averted their eyes, as is typical with Trump's rawest provocations. But for the wavering Republican Sen. Lisa Murkowski of Alaska, it was another thing to consider as she mulls over whether she will support him in the election. "Oh lord," she said when shown the tweet. "Ugh." She added: "Again, why would you fan the flames? That's all I'm going to say."

New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo had more to say: "How reckless, how irresponsible, how mean, how crude." He implored Trump to "show some decency. Show some humanity. Show some fairness." Like Murkowski, he spoke of flames being fueled.

TRUMP: "Domestic Terrorists have taken over Seattle." - tweet Wednesday.

THE FACTS: No they haven't.

After days of violent confrontations with protesters, Seattle police largely and temporarily withdrew from several city blocks and boarded up a precinct station, leaving protesters to set up a festive scene with speeches, activism, art and music. This was far from taking over a city, and authorities do not consider the protesters to be terrorists.

Gov. Jay Inslee, D-Wash., said Thursday that the zone was largely peaceful and "peaceful protests are fundamentally American."

As Trump has branded protesters "radical-left, bad people" engaging in domestic terrorism, he has frequently invoked "antifa," an umbrella term for leftist militants bound more by belief than organizational structure. Federal officials have presented scant evidence that such radicals were involved.

Some Democrats initially tried to blame out-of-state far-right infiltrators for unrest before backing down on that claim.

The AP found that the great majority of people arrested in Minneapolis and the District of Columbia in one weekend of protests were local residents and few were affiliated with organized groups.

TRUMP: "Sleepy Joe Biden and the Radical Left Democrats want to 'DEFUND THE POLICE'." - tweet June 7.

THE FACTS: No, Biden does not join the call of protesters who demanded "defund the police" after Floyd's killing.

"I don't support defunding the police," Biden said Monday in a CBS interview. But he said he would support conditioning federal aid to police based on whether "they meet certain basic standards of decency, honorableness and, in fact, are able to demonstrate they can protect the community, everybody in the community."

Biden's criminal justice agenda, released long before he became the Democrats' presumptive presidential nominee, proposes more federal money for "training that is needed to avert tragic, unjustifiable deaths" and hiring more officers to ensure that departments are racially and ethnically reflective of the populations they serve.

Specifically, he calls for a $300 million infusion into existing federal community policing grant programs.

That adds up to more money for police, not defunding law enforcement.

Biden also wants the federal government to spend more on education, social services and struggling areas of cities and rural America, to address root causes of crime.

ATTORNEY GENERAL WILLIAM BARR, citing escalating protests outside the White House following George Floyd's May 25 death in Minneapolis: "The things were so bad the Secret Service recommended the president go down to the bunker." - Fox News on Monday.

THE FACTS: Here Barr is fact checking the president, who claimed a week earlier that he only visited the White House bunker to inspect it, not out of concern for his safety.

"I went down during the day, and I was there for a tiny little short period of time, and it was much more for an inspection," Trump told Fox News on June 3. "They said it would be a good time to go down - take a look because maybe sometime you're going to need it."

News organizations, including the AP, had reported that Secret Service agents rushed Trump on May 29 to a White House bunker, where he spent nearly an hour - not just a "tiny little short period of time" - as demonstrations outside the executive mansion intensified. The bunker is designed for use in emergencies such as terrorist attacks.

Trump had been unhappy with news coverage revealing that he had been spirited to the bunker, believing that it made him appear weak.

TRUMP, on veterans health care: "Before I came here, the vets would wait on line. ... And for years and years, they've been trying to get Veterans Choice. ... Now, most importantly, we take care of our vets." - Meeting with pastors, law enforcement officers and others in Dallas on Thursday.

THE FACTS: That is the latest iteration of his frequently told false claim to have achieved Veterans Choice when other presidents couldn't. President Barack Obama achieved it. Trump expanded it. The program lets veterans, under certain conditions, get private health care at public expense. It has not eliminated waits for care.

TRUMP: "This year has seen the lowest crime numbers in our Country's recorded history." - tweet Monday.

THE FACTS: Not so. First, this year's numbers are not compiled. Also, FBI statistics show the violent crime rate was lower in 2014 than in 2018, the most recent year recorded. Also, crime overall was substantially lower in the 1950s and 1960s, grew after that and has been on a downward trend since the 1990s, with variations along the way.

Police departments reported 368.9 violent crimes per 100,000 people in 2018, compared with 361.6 four years earlier.

The murder rate was 5 people per 100,000 in 2018. That rate was lower every year from 2010 to 2015.

Judge seeks more details on Trump's clemency for Roger Stone Trump rips private Texas border wall built by North Dakota company Robert Mueller defends Russia probe, says Roger Stone remains a felon Trump wears mask in public for first time during pandemic Feds deny Minnesota request for aid after George Floyd unrest. Walz has 30 days to appeal.

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

ARTICLE DCIII. WORLD JOINS US PROTESTS BUT LEADERS RESTRAINED ABOUT TRUMP

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 13, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1063 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: BERLIN (AP) - People have taken to the streets of Berlin, London, Paris and other cities around the world to demonstrate in support of Black Lives Matter protesters in the United States and to vent anger over President Donald Trump's response to the police killing of George Floyd in Minnesota.Body

By DAVID RISING

BERLIN (AP) - People have taken to the streets of Berlin, London, Paris and other cities around the world to demonstrate in support of Black Lives Matter protesters in the United States and to vent anger over President Donald Trump's response to the police killing of George Floyd in Minnesota.

But at the top, the leaders of traditional allies of the United States have taken pains to avoid criticizing Trump directly, walking a fine line to reconcile international diplomacy with domestic outrage.

Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau let silence speak for itself when asked to comment on the decision to forcibly clear peaceful protesters outside the White House to make way for a Trump photo-op at a nearby church, standing pensively at his lectern apparently mulling his answer for more than 20 seconds before answering that Canada also suffered from "systemic discrimination" - never mentioning the American president.

"We need to be allies in the fight against discrimination, we need to listen, we need to learn, and we need to work hard to fix, to figure out how we can be part of the solution on fixing things," he said.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel sidestepped questions from ZDF public television about Trump last week, saying the killing of Floyd was "really, really terrible. Racism is something terrible, and society in the United States is very polarized."

When pressed, she conceded that Trump's "political style is a very controversial one" but would go no further when asked if she had confidence in him.

A combination of factors are at work, including diplomatic courtesy but also pragmatism based on the possibility that Trump will be reelected to another four years in November, said Sudha David-Wilp, deputy director of the Berlin office of the German Marshall Fund think tank.

World joins US protests but leaders restrained about Trump

"It wouldn't be proper for his peers to criticize, especially when it's very obvious that they are concerned that the United States is going through an incredibly difficult time - you have the triple whammy of an economic depression, health crisis and now, of course, social unrest due to questions of racism," she said.

But she said it's difficult for leaders like Trudeau and Merkel, who "are seen as defenders of liberal democracy, and President Trump has trampled on many of the values that undergird liberal democracy, such as the protection of minorities, such as the freedom of assembly, such as the freedom of the press."

Merkel's verbal gymnastics could have been anticipated - in more than 14 years as chancellor, she has steered clear of ever critiquing allied world leaders - but even leaders who typically support Trump, like Hungary's Viktor Orban or Israel's Benjamin Netanyahu have stayed silent on this issue.

British Prime Minister Boris Johnson, who has sought to cultivate close ties with Trump, called Floyd's death "appalling" and said people have a "right to protest to make their feelings known about injustices such as what happened to George Floyd" but urged peaceful demonstrations.

Britain has seen several protests turn violent, and last weekend demonstrators in Bristol toppled the statue of a 17th-century slave trader. They also spray-painted an iconic statue of former Prime Minister Winston Churchill in London, calling him "a racist."

Asked Wednesday in Parliament to name Trump's good qualities, Johnson stuck to generalities.

"Mr. Trump, he has, amongst many other things, he is president of the United States, which is our most important ally in the world today," Johnson said. "Whatever people may say about it, whatever those on the left may say about it, the United States is a bastion of peace and freedom and has been for most of my lifetime."

France's Emmanuel Macron, who has in the past steered clear of criticizing Trump specifically but has been vocal in speaking out against policies like the wine tariffs introduced by the administration, has not made a public appearance since Floyd was killed on May 25.

Floyd died after a white Minneapolis police officer pressed a knee into his neck for several minutes even after he stopped responding. Three days later, another black man writhed on the street in Paris as a white police officer pressed a knee to his neck during an arrest.

France had several protests over the past week, with growing pressure on the government to address accusations of brutality and racism within the police force.

Macron's office said the president is closely monitoring the events in France and the United States but "he did not wish to speak for the moment." He's expected to address the nation Sunday but his office did not give further details.

A few leaders have spoken out more strongly, like Spanish Prime Minister Pedro Sanchez, who criticized the response to the protests in the U.S. as "authoritarian" when pressed in parliament last week for an explicit response on Floyd's killing.

"I share and stand in solidarity with the demonstrations that are taking place in the United States," he said.

And Norwegian Prime Minister Erna Solberg told the country's NTB news agency last week that she was "deeply concerned about what is happening in the United States."

World joins US protests but leaders restrained about Trump

"The fundamental challenge of making minorities feel part of a society is essential. We must all work with that," she said. "One has to try to bridge the gap. It is not good for any society to be as deeply divided as the United States is now."

Ghana's President Nana Akufo-Addo said last week that it "cannot be right that, in the 21st century, the United States, this great bastion of democracy, continues to grapple with the problem of systemic racism." And South African President Cyril Ramaphosa noted the "naked racism in the United States," calling the protests a turning point. Neither mentioned Trump by name.

Russian President Vladimir Putin has not weighed in, but Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Maria Zakharova called the situation in the U.S. "ridiculous."

"I would like to believe that before showing their zeal in protecting the rights of the 'suppressed' and 'dissenters' in other countries, U.S. authorities will start to scrupulously observe democratic standards and ensure the freedoms of their citizens at home," she said.

Sylvie Corbet in Paris, Jill Lawless and Sylvia Hui in London, Aritz Parra in Madrid, Jan M. Olsen in Copenhagen, Cara Anna in Johannesburg and Geir Moulson in Berlin contributed to this report.

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

ARTICLE DCIV. JUDGE ORDERS SEATTLE TO STOP USING TEAR GAS DURING PROTESTS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 13, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 821 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: SEATTLE (AP) - A U.S. judge on Friday ordered Seattle police to temporarily stop using tear gas, pepper spray and flash-bang devices to break up largely peaceful protests, a victory for groups who say authorities have overreacted to recent demonstrations over police brutality and racial injustice.Body

By LISA BAUMANN

SEATTLE (AP) - A U.S. judge on Friday ordered Seattle police to temporarily stop using tear gas, pepper spray and flash-bang devices to break up largely peaceful protests, a victory for groups who say authorities have overreacted to recent demonstrations over police brutality and racial injustice.

The liberal city with a lengthy history of massive, frequent protests has taken hits from all sides - from demonstrators, some city officials, the president and now a judge - over the way it's responded to crowds taking to the streets following George Floyd's death at the hands of Minneapolis police. Those on the right say the mayor and police chief aren't being tough enough on protesters who have taken over part of a neighborhood near downtown Seattle, while those on the left say police tactics have been far too harsh.

U.S. District Judge Richard Jones sided with a Black Lives Matter group that sued the Seattle Police Department this week to halt the violent tactics it has used to break up protests.

Last weekend, officers used tear gas, pepper spray and other force against crowds of protesters. Jones' order halts those tactics for two weeks, though demonstrations this week have been calm.

Mayor Jenny Durkan and Police Chief Carmen Best have apologized to peaceful protesters who were subjected to chemical weapons. But Best has said some demonstrators violently targeted police, throwing objects and ignoring orders to disperse. Both have faced calls to resign, which they have rejected.

The judge said those objecting to the police tactics make a strong case that the indiscriminate use of force is unconstitutional. Jones said weapons like tear gas and pepper spray fail to target "any single agitator or criminal" and they are especially problematic during the coronavirus pandemic.

"Because they are indiscriminate, they may even spill into bystanders' homes or offices as they have done before," Jones wrote.

Judge orders Seattle to stop using tear gas during protests

Durkan, a former U.S. attorney, "believes the court struck the right balance to protect the fundamental constitutional right to exercise protest, with the need to also ensure public safety," spokeswoman Kamaria Hightower said in an email.

Durkan also has requested reviews of police actions from the Office of Police Accountability and the city's inspector general. Washington State Patrol Chief John Batiste also said Friday the agency will stop using gas until further notice, particularly amid the pandemic.

This week, demonstrators have turned part of Seattle's Capitol Hill neighborhood into a protest center with speakers, drum circles and Black Lives Matter painted on a street near a police station. Police largely left the station after the chaos last weekend, when officers tear-gassed protesters and some demonstrators threw objects at them. Police sprayed tear gas just two days after the mayor and police chief said they were temporarily halting its use.

Durkan tweeted that on Friday she visited the so-called autonomous zone - which has been criticized by President Donald Trump and where people, including officers, come and go freely. She said she spoke with organizers about moving forward and noted that she's always known Capitol Hill as a place for people to express themselves.

Trump has slammed her and Gov. Jay Inslee for not breaking up the occupation by "anarchists" and threatening to take action if they don't. Both have assailed his comments and say they're focusing on a peaceful resolution. The demonstrations have been calm since police left the area.

Michele Storms, executive director of the ACLU of Washington, said the group was pleased with the judge's ruling.

"The city must allow for freedom of speech and freedom of assembly, and it must address police accountability and excessive use of force," Storms said in a statement.

The ruling came as massive crowds marched in the rain and some businesses temporarily closed in response to a call from Black Lives Matter Seattle-King County to launch a statewide general strike.

"As tens of thousands of people were gathering today to march silently and in solidarity against police brutality and misconduct, the U.S. District Court affirmed their right to protest, free from state violence. That is a victory for today," the group said in a statement.

Black Lives Matter encouraged supporters not go to work or to work from home Friday and to learn about local elected officials and issues. Organizers have demands for the city, county and state that include cutting at least $100 million from the Seattle police budget, ending cash bail and declaring racism a public health crisis.

Durkan tweeted that she and the police chief participated in the march, saying Best and her Police Department leaders have been working "incredibly hard to adjust and improve every day."

Washington State Patrol Chief John Batiste also said Friday his personnel will stop using gas until further notice, particularly amid the pandemic.

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

Judge orders Seattle to stop using tear gas during protests

End of Document

ARTICLE DCV. PROTESTS IN TRUMP COUNTRY TEST HIS HOLD IN RURAL WHITE AREAS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 13, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1108 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: In the lake country 200 miles (320 kilometers) northwest of Detroit, hundreds danced, prayed and demanded racial justice in Cadillac, a Michigan town that was long home to a neo-Nazi group.Body

By THOMAS BEAUMONT

In the lake country 200 miles (320 kilometers) northwest of Detroit, hundreds danced, prayed and demanded racial justice in Cadillac, a Michigan town that was long home to a neo-Nazi group.

It was not an isolated scene. In eastern Ohio, even more demonstrated in rural Mount Vernon, a town with its own current of racial intolerance, just as others did in Manheim, Pennsylvania, a tiny farming town in Lancaster County, with its small but active Ku Klux Klan presence.

The protest movement over black injustice has quickly spread deep into predominantly white, small-town America, notably throughout parts of the country that delivered the presidency for Donald Trump. Across Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin, more than 200 such demonstrations have taken place, many in cities with fewer than 20,000 residents, according to local media, organizers, participants and the online tracking tool CrowdCount.

"That's what's so striking, that these protests are taking place in rural places with a white nationalist presence," said Lynn Tramonte, who grew up near Mount Vernon and is monitoring the Black Lives Matter demonstrations around Ohio.

The protests in these Republican-leaning areas offer a test of the president's ability to reassemble his older, white voting bloc. If he cannot replicate that coalition, it would leave Trump with few options, especially since he continues to lose support in suburbs.

"If President Trump cannot hold onto white, working-class voters in rural, small-town Michigan, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin and Ohio, I don't know how he wins the election," said Terry Madonna, director of the Center for Public Affairs at Franklin & Marshall College, in Lancaster, Pennsylvania. "Can you rule out he won't have that same level of enthusiasm? No, you can't."

Protests in Trump country test his hold in rural white areas

Trump carried Pennsylvania by about 44,000 votes in 2016, in part with overwhelming support from a patchwork of rural, white counties.

The pattern also played out in Michigan and Wisconsin, where he won by even fewer votes. In Ohio, that coalition propelled him to an easy victory.

Trump's reelection campaign is working chiefly through online outreach to hold onto his largely white base and to identify new voters in rural areas as a defense against inroads by presumptive Democratic nominee Joe Biden.

Some polls suggest that, while white voters without college degrees are still a strong group for Trump, they could be more open to supporting Biden than they were to supporting Democrat Hillary Clinton four years ago.

Trump campaign spokesman Tim Murtaugh did not directly address the protests taking place in counties won by the president, but said more generally in a statement to The Associated Press, "President Trump expressed disgust and shock over what happened to George Floyd and praised the peaceful demonstrations, but also knows that Americans cannot live with riots and lawlessness in cities nationwide."

But the pace of change over racial justice after Floyd's death last month by police in Minneapolis has quickened and has sparked protests in hundreds of communities in every state, on a scale rarely, if ever, seen before. It is not that Biden will necessarily win rural counties that Trump carried easily, but he may be able to cut into Trump's margins enough to bring those states back to the Democratic column.

In Cadillac, branch home of the National Socialist Movement - among the nation's prominent neo-Nazi groups as recently as 2007 - black organizers were undeterred in staging their event at a lakeside pavilion even as armed opponents associated with the white nationalist group Michigan Militia parked nearby as a show of force.

Trump won Wexford County, home to Cadillac, with 65% of the vote, similar to neighboring counties in the lightly populated region, where unemployment has run higher than average in Michigan.

In neighboring Grand Traverse County, which Trump won by a smaller margin, more than 2,000 packed Traverse City's Lake Michigan shoreline park to hear protest organizer Courtney Wiggins. The 38-year-old black woman listed demands, including that police in the 95% white town of 14,000 end racial profiling, as armed protesters affiliated with the far-right Proud Boys dotted the perimeter.

Though similar events popped up in exurban Cedarburg and Grafton, keys to Ozaukee County in the GOP-leaning suburbs of Milwaukee, far more have materialized many miles from the major metropolitan areas in these four pivotal states, according to organizers and advocates who have tracked the protests.

In Mount Vernon, Ohio, the seat of Knox County where Trump received 66% of the vote, 700 people turned out on June 6 despite threats from opponents, who staged an impromptu rally later that day. It's the same small town where two years ago the local Christian college was vandalized when leaders put on a racial justice program, and where the Ku Klux Klan had been active in the area over the past century.

Dozens of protests have taken place in counties in these four battleground states that Trump flipped from Democrat to Republican. Among them were Macomb County outside Detroit, Portage and Mahoning counties in northeast Ohio, and - perhaps most notably - Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, where voters swung dramatically from President Barack Obama in 2012 to Trump four years later.

Protests in Trump country test his hold in rural white areas

Still, the vast majority have taken place in more than 200 small cities and towns across these four states, like Oconto, Wisconsin, Marietta, Ohio, and Meadville, Pennsylvania, all with populations under 20,000 and in counties Trump carried with at least 60% of the vote.

And while the battle for the White House will likely be waged most intensely in these states' diversifying suburbs, where Democrats made gains in 2018, even a slight uptick among Democrats or a softening of Trump support in the vast spaces between could be enough to alter the election.

If Biden carries every state Clinton did in 2016 and reclaims Michigan, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin, he would win a majority of the Electoral College votes.

Of those states, none was as close as Michigan, which Trump won by 10,704 votes out of more than 4.7 million ballots cast.

A little more than 11,000 voters backed Obama in 2008 and either didn't vote or supported Trump in 2016 in Grand Traverse County and the five counties surrounding it, including Cadillac's home in Wexford County, according to state voting records.

"These marginal numbers, a few extra votes here and there, we're talking, like, a handful of votes per county, and they exist in my six-county region," said Betsy Coffia, a Democratic Grand Traverse County commissioner. "This can make a difference."

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

THE NARRATIVE

ARTICLE DCVI. THE NARRATIVE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 7ALength: 1049 wordsByline: JOHN A. MATTSSEN, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Unasked questions about George Floyd's death and the aftermath // And what will you make of my bringing them up?Body

1. How is a small-business person supposed to feel about being looted by members of their own community, not being protected by the police, not being allowed to protect their own property, then being financially victimized, when they have to take out a loan to pay for something that wasn't their fault? Will frequenting their businesses if they survive the financial consequences of the pandemic even scratch the surface of what needs to be done to restore their faith in humanity?
2. When looters were destroying the businesses large and small in south Minneapolis - destroying the hopes, dreams and life savings of businesses that are the economic lifeblood of the community, what should the police have done about it that would have met with the approval of the protesters?
3. If most cops are good cops, would dismantling or defunding the Minneapolis Police Department be an assault primarily on the bad cops, or on the good cops?
4. To what extent would dismantling or defunding the Minneapolis Police Department be a de facto but intentional victimization of the families of good police officers? What constructive value would there be in doing that?
5. In the sphere of public opinion of the voters across the state, will what happened in the Twin Cities during the protests increase or decrease the city-rural divide?
6. Did the protesters here and across the nation make a good impression on the National Guard and on the law enforcement officers who were called in to keep the peace? Does this matter? Yes, it does! The voting friends, neighbors and co-workers of the National Guard members and law-enforcement officers are going to want to know from the people they know - from the people who were actually there - what their impression was of the protesters and the way that they conducted themselves.
7. Did the echoing of protesters' inflammatory language by government officials to describe the officers involved in the George Floyd incident increase or decrease the odds that those officers will be convicted during a fair trial, anywhere in Minnesota? If they are convicted by a tainted jury, will that conviction be justice or retribution? If they are acquitted on appeal because it can be shown that the jury was tainted by inflammatory language, who will take responsibility for tainting the jury pool?

THE NARRATIVE

8. Could it be that what we are seeing in the nationwide protests the long-awaited awkward emergence of the younger generation, stepping up to take control and responsibility for the future of our nation? Can that possibly happen without a grand-scale revolution in the way we now view our world?

9. There is a world of difference between "we the people" empowering politicians with our vote so that they can do great things for us, and politicians empowering "we the people" so that we can do great things for ourselves. Will the obviously well-intended effort of Gov. Tim Walz and other politicians to bring about community and police reforms through legislation and programs result in a different outcome than past initiatives that followed that same path? Or, should we be trying new solutions that were created by "we the people" - solutions the likes of which no one has ever seen or tried before? Which is most likely to succeed?

10. In a crisis, some people turn their negativity inward and suffer a lot rather than risk hurting others with their anger. Some people, in need of an emotional punching bag and someone to blame for the way that they feel, release the wrath of their negative energy anger on to other people and other entities. Some people, like Gov. Walz and the volunteers who showed up to clean up afterward, convert their negative energy into positive energy in an effort to solve problems. Which use of negative energy is most likely to create constructive solutions that will fix the problems in the Minneapolis Police Department and in the communities they serve? What can be done to pre-emptively convert future negative destructive energy into constructive energy, so as to prevent dysfunctional consequences like the looting of neighborhood businesses?

11. Which is greater prejudice?

a) Painting all blacks with the same paintbrush, and claiming that "the blacks" all do this, or that "the blacks" all think that?

b) Lumping all the protesters who defied the curfew together with the looters, and calling them the "black community"?

c) Lumping all individual police officers together and saying that the police think this or that the police do that?

...

I am a 70-year-old retired federal law enforcement officer who worked in a federal prison for 28 years. I was on the riot squad for 20 years. I was a Bureau of Prisons certified self-defense instructor who never taught a chokehold. I was a union official in various capacities for 25 years. I was in the Minnesota Air National Guard for six years.

Ah! That explains a lot, doesn't it? I'm a right-winger, and an unconditional supporter of the Minneapolis Police Department, right?

I have the better part of a master's degree in secondary education with a minor in psychology, and almost a minor in industrial arts. Married for 49 years to a schoolteacher. We have three grown adopted Korean children. I bought as a kit, built, then flew one of the first motorized hang gliders in the state of Minnesota back in 1980, back when these things were in their infancy. We have bicycled almost 125,000 miles.

THE NARRATIVE

Politically, on a left/right scale, I am a left-of-center moderate. On a vertical scale between progressive and regressive, I am an off-the-charts progressive. I am all about doing things that are experimental, in an effort to do things better than they have ever been done before.

Lumping people together and painting them with the same brush is prejudice personified. Prejudice is the gross failure of individuals to have the empathy and foresight to see, to value, and to tolerate the souls of others. People are prejudiced because being prejudiced is simple, convenient and easy, and because an emotionally satisfying "buzz" of passion binds them together with other like-minded people, in the belief that if they are all saying the same thing, that they all must then be "right."

Footnote: My wife and I have participated in five protests in the past four years.

John A. Mattsen lives in New Brighton.

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

ARTICLE DCVII. MPD FATE UP TO VOTERS?

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 827 wordsByline: LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Five council members float ideaBody

Minneapolis voters would decide in November whether to eliminate the City Charter's requirement for police staffing and replace it with a new department "to provide for community safety and violence prevention," under a proposal floated Friday by five City Council members.

The announcement comes at a time when council members are facing pressure to explain their plan to "begin the process of ending" the Minneapolis Police Department following George Floyd's death.

The council and a separate body, the Minneapolis Charter Commission, would need to work under an expedited schedule as they face a tight deadline to add items to the November ballot. The city's charter, in essence its constitution, requires the City Council to fund a minimum number of police officers.

Council Member Jeremiah Ellison said he still expects to spend a year seeking feedback from residents about how they want to change the Minneapolis Police Department, but he fears that if that charter provision isn't removed, it will hamper their efforts.

"Without it, we can't actually have an earnest yearlong conversation with community that will mean anything," Ellison said. "And by making this change, it doesn't eliminate the police. ... Until we have an emergency response system that is ready to deploy, we're going to have police in its place."

Minneapolis' charter requires the City Council to "fund a police force of at least 0.0017 employees per resident, and provide for those employees' compensation." Based on the latest census data, that amounts to roughly 730 police employees. The department had 892 sworn officers and 175 non-sworn employees at the beginning of the month.

During Friday's council meeting, Ellison and four other members - Alondra Cano, Cam Gordon, Steve Fletcher and Council President Lisa Bender - announced plans to introduce on June 26 a plan to amend the City Charter. Their proposal would remove the police department requirement and create a new department "to provide for community safety and violence prevention."

MPD fate up to voters?

Gordon said they have discussed possibilities but haven't yet settled on the wording of the measure. "I don't know that there is necessarily a consensus among the authors," he said.

After the proposal is introduced, they will need seven council members to vote to refer the matter to the Charter Commission. If it chooses, the commission can take several months to review the proposal.

After they receive the Charter Commission's recommendations, which are not binding, council members must then vote on whether to send the measure to the ballot. Mayor Jacob Frey would also need to approve or veto the proposal. The deadline for completing all of that this year is Aug. 21.

"The Charter Commission, to be frank, probably could sort of use their process to obstruct this action," Ellison said. "My hope is that they won't."

Barry Clegg, chair of the Charter Commission, said it was too early to tell where commission members fall on the issue, but he would be willing to convene a special meeting.

If they do not meet the deadline for getting the item on the Nov. 3 ballot, council members could try again next year to get the measure on the 2021 ballot, an idea Gordon said he is open to.

In the days following George Floyd's death, many activists called for Minneapolis to "defund" or abolish its police department, but some business groups and Frey have said they prefer changing the department over eliminating it completely. In recent days, some business owners have said they need more clarity from the City Council on its future plans before they decide whether to rebuild from the riots.

Separate from a new charter proposal, the City Council on Friday unanimously approved a resolution that declares its "intent to create a transformative new model for cultivating safety in our city." That resolution creates a work group of city staffers who are tasked with recommending policy changes for transitioning to a new approach and for seeking community input during that process.

Also Friday, the council voted to remove the requirement for off-duty officers to work at some special events, allowing organizers to use private security. And it ended the state of emergency that was declared following George Floyd's death. An earlier emergency, put in place to respond to the coronavirus pandemic, remains in effect.

Later Friday, Frey announced that he is also convening three task forces to recommend new policies. One group will involve "national partners," including the National Network for Safe Communities at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice at City University of New York; Cities United; Prevention Institute; the NAACP, and the American Civil Liberties Union.

Another group will consist of local government agencies, including Hennepin County, the Hennepin County Public Defender's Office and Metro Transit Police.

A third group will consist of "community partners." More details are expected next week.

Liz Navratil · 612-673-4994

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

AVENUE TO A LASTING MEMORIAL

ARTICLE DCVIII. AVENUE TO A LASTING MEMORIAL

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 959 wordsByline: JAMES WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The searing images of a makeshift memorial to George Floyd, the black man who died beneath the knee of a white Minneapolis police officer, have become iconic.

Soon, that shrine at 38th Street and Chicago Avenue may also become permanent.

City, state and community leaders are exploring ways to create a lasting tribute to Floyd at the intersection where he was killed - and where thousands of visitors have since paused, protested and prayed - that would remain long after the flowers and plywood paintings are cleared away.

Andrea Jenkins, Minneapolis City Council vice president, along with state Sen. Jeff Hayden and neighbors, say they want to commemorate the Memorial Day event that cost Floyd his life and fueled worldwide demands to fundamentally change policing.

"This is a conversation that is happening. There will be something memorializing George Floyd's life," said Jenkins, who represents the area.

Possibilities include a traffic roundabout, a peace garden, or perhaps a sculpture, said Jenkins, who added that she has spoken with Gov. Tim Walz and several members of Congress about the idea.

"I don't know if I can make promises right now, but I will be working to make a memorial at that site," she said. "And it will be something that is substantial. It will be more than a plaque, I'll tell you that."

Victoria Lauing, executive director of the nearby Chicago Avenue Fire Arts Center, said her organization has heard of informal discussions regarding a permanent memorial.

"As an arts organization based here, we are committed to sharing our resources to support community-driven responses, whether that is a permanent memorial, or other events and activities," she said in an e-mail.

The center is willing to listen to and support whatever the community decides to do, she said.

AVENUE TO A LASTING MEMORIAL

Hayden, assistant Senate minority leader who also represents the neighborhood, said he could see a traffic circle or roundabout - with a memorial to Floyd at the center.

While the community should help determine a memorial's exact form, he said, it's critical that Floyd's "murder at the hands of a Minneapolis police officer" be permanently commemorated for healing to occur.

"It's an atrocity. ... You don't want to forget it," Hayden said. "And we're destined to do it again if we don't remember it - if we don't tell the story."

Earlier this week, as dozens of visitors quietly walked through the intersection taking pictures and capturing video, Rico Morales used duct tape to affix signs and posters both praising and mourning Floyd to the windows of Cup Foods.

Just a few feet away from the spot in front of the store where Floyd made his last gasps for air, Morales talked about a memorial that could include a community garden, a traffic circle and maybe an interactive display where visitors can learn about Floyd's life as well as his death.

Morales, who said his main job at Cup Foods is food safety manager, said he's in charge of helping make a permanent memorial a reality. It's important work, he said.

"It's important to have the longevity and the permanence of a memorial to a life that was taken by brutality and violence," he said. "Also to have a space for the community to have a place to come with your feelings, your emotions, your memories."

Until a permanent memorial is decided, Morales said, he doesn't expect the temporary tributes - the paintings, the flowers, the brown wooden raised fist at the center of the intersection - to be taken away anytime soon.

Nor does he expect Chicago Avenue to reopen to traffic.

"That's up to the community. That's up to the people, basically working with the city," Morales said, adding he would prefer it stay closed for as long as needed. "I mean, that would be the worst thing for the city workers or staff to do is to come in and just say, 'OK, this is over now. Your grieving and your mourning process is over now.' That's not for anybody to decide. Hopefully, that will happen naturally and organically."

Sitting nearby and holding a Black Lives Matter sign was Patricia Rogers, who has been visiting the site since Floyd was killed.

The growing makeshift memorial "brings a lot of light, a lot of life and it brings everyone together with a real feeling of peace," she said.

She would like to see a permanent memorial, maybe a "huge" statue of Floyd, perhaps something that would list the names of other black men and women killed by police.

"I would love it," Rogers said. "A lot of people do come here for peace, you know, and to pray. You get redemption. As minorities, we don't really have places that we can go and pray and reflect. They need to make Chicago 'George Floyd Avenue.' "

AVENUE TO A LASTING MEMORIAL

Less than 400 feet away from where Floyd was pinned on his stomach, his hands cuffed behind his back, Jamie LaBlanche watched his little ones.

A stay-at-home dad, LaBlanche has also taken on an unofficial role as neighborhood guide to the countless visitors to the site over the past two-plus weeks.

"Being that I'm a person of color as well, I have been out in the community letting people see my face, making sure they feel welcome," he said. "I've talked to rural white people from 45 minutes past Brainerd who came down here to see what it was like."

Although the constant traffic and noise from crowds of visitors and protesters has meant only a few hours of uninterrupted sleep at night, LaBlanche said the peace the memorial has brought to the neighborhood has made it worth it. He hopes, too, that the site becomes home to a lasting monument - it's been that important to helping spread understanding, he said.

"Honestly, before this happened, we were looking at moving," he said. "But now? I think I need to be here. And I think [a permanent memorial] would be really good for the community."

James Walsh · 612-673-7428

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

Hmong businesses hurt by coronavirus now also dealing with riot damage, racism

ARTICLE DCIX. HMONG BUSINESSES HURT BY CORONAVIRUS NOW ALSO DEALING WITH RIOT DAMAGE, RACISM

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 13, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 776 words

Byline: Isabel Saavedra-Weis

Highlight: "I feel like crying everyday. I lose sleep. My heart aches," one business owner says.

Body

For Gloria Wong, St. Paul's Century Plaza is a symbol of her hard work. After escaping war in Laos, Wong came to Minnesota in 1980 as a refugee. Now she's the owner of the University Avenue hub of Asian-owned shops and services.

The past few months, though, have taken their toll on her and everything she's worked for.

The coronavirus pandemic has decimated business for her tenants, so Wong has been paying the plaza's bills the past three months from her own savings instead of their rents. After the vandals and looters who took to the streets during protests to the death of George Floyd caused a draining amount of damage, she now must also find the money for repairs.

The impacts of the past few months, though, have been more than financial. Her family has been harassed and falsely accused for the spread of the coronavirus. And seeing the civil unrest in the Twin Cities brings back painful memories of the war she escaped.

"I feel like crying every day. I lose sleep. My heart aches," she said.

Yao Yang, the executive director of the Minnesota Hmong Chamber of Commerce, has spoken with many Asian business owners like Wong. A good number of them say they were left struggling after the state restricted businesses during the pandemic. Now many are devastated by the rioting. But the insult added to the injuries was the anti-Asian discrimination, she says.

"People's property was being vandalized with derogatory words just because they are Asian," Yang said. "A lot of business owners didn't feel safe."

Wong, of Stillwater, wants to repair Century Plaza quickly so its restaurants, bakery and offices can reopen for business. But money is tight, and she has a family to support, too. Her niece made a GoFundMe page to raise $10,000 for the insurance deductible that Wong would otherwise pay out of pocket.

Hmong businesses hurt by coronavirus now also dealing with riot damage, racism

PLANS TO REBUILD

When Hmong-owned businesses along University Avenue and Lake Street were damaged during the unrest, community members worried the high-profile HmongTown Marketplace and Hmong Village - large indoor markets filled with Hmong-owned stores and services - would be next.

Some community members speculated there would be attacks on Hmong-owned businesses because one of the former officers involved in Floyd's death, Tou Thao, was Hmong. Businesses boarded up in anticipation, but the attacks on the huge markets never came.

"Did Hmong businesses get hit? Yes. Was it targeted? We don't know." said Yang. "Whoever was destroying these businesses had no mercy, whether it was black-owned, Asian-owned, immigrant-owned."

Yang, who is Hmong, has spent the past few weeks meeting with state legislators and philanthropic organizations. As the only staff member of the Minnesota Hmong Chamber of Commerce, she advocates for the needs of Asian business owners.

"Right now there's a lot of effort on short-term relief, but those are just bandages," Yang said. "We need to think about long-term, sustainable solutions. Money can't fix all our problems."

A PATH FORWARD

The death of George Floyd has emphasized the plight that many black people have faced in this country. It has also brought up the challenges and oppression that Hmong people have felt.

There is a long history of racial tension in America, including bias among racial groups in St. Paul. We don't need Asian Americans and African Americans targeting each other, Yang said. It is best to work together.

"There's a lot of healing to do," said Va-Megn Thoj, executive director of the Asian Economic Development Association. "I've always been committed to bringing our Hmong American and African American communities together and addressing some of these longstanding issues."

Thoj is trying to raise \$300,000 for damaged Asian-owned businesses. In St. Paul's Little Mekong, over two dozen businesses were damaged and looted, he says.

Although her tenants have been anxious to go back to work, Wong wants to be cautious of everyone's safety. She hopes to take the boards off her business windows this weekend and reopen for business by June 15.

Wong is uncertain of the future of her business, but she takes comfort in praying to her late grandparents and mother.

"They are watching over me, making sure I don't go hungry, or suffer like I did in Laos," she said. "I talk to them and ask them to continue to bless me."

Protest in Pennsylvania after cop uses knee to restrain man Four pro bono attorneys join Keith Ellison's prosecution team in George Floyd case Fired Minneapolis cops in George Floyd case want gag order lifted Deals remain elusive as Minnesota special session approaches Feds deny Minnesota request for aid after George Floyd unrest Walz has 30 days to appeal.

Graphic

"I feel like crying everyday. I lose sleep. My heart aches," said Gloria Wong, who owns the Century Plaza on University Avenue in St. Paul on June 10, 2020. Businesses of her tenants have been closed during the coronavirus pandemic and her property was vandalized during the protests following the death of George Floyd. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

Gloria Wong, who owns the Century Plaza on University Avenue in St. Paul points out a bullet hole in a boarded-up window of her adult daycare center, June 10, 2020. Businesses of her tenants have been closed during the coronavirus pandemic and the property was vandalized during the protests following the death of George Floyd. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCX. BLOCKS OF STRENGTH

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: INSPIRED; Pg. 1INLength: 924 wordsByline: KELLY SMITH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Minneapolis neighborhoods rushed to organize to protect their homes and stores from arsonists and looters. Now they're looking bigger.Body

The riots that gripped Minneapolis and the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police has spurred something unexpected: neighborhoods across the city have grown stronger.

From Little Earth and Longfellow, neighbors banded together at street corners, alleyways and intersections to protect their homes, businesses, grocery stores and churches from arsonists and looters.

Now neighborhoods, more mobilized and organized than ever, hope to leverage that fresh energy and unity to do good in the long-term - whether it's helping out neighbors more, fundraising or pushing for broader political and racial justice changes.

"We need to actually find ways to make sure this never happens again," said Pamela Twiss, 58, who lives in East Nokomis. "We want to continue to talk to each other."

In her south Minneapolis neighborhood, residents convened on the text and voice messaging app WhatsApp to report suspicious cars. They met at a church lawn daily for five days to discuss plans to protect their streets.

Now, they're sharing petitions and protest information, collecting food for a growing number of people in need after grocery stores burned to the ground and starting a discussion group on white fragility.

In Longfellow, after the violence subsided, neighbors stopped block patrols and barricading streets and vowed to push for longer term change such as making the community safer for people of color. In Powderhorn, as a helicopter buzzed overhead last week, residents said at a block meeting that the constant chats on their WhatsApp group was already doing some good - from sharing veterinarian tips to starting deeper conversations on issues such as decolonization.

And in north Minneapolis, where rival gang members and other residents teamed up to protect grocery stores and other busi nesses, residents hope to keep them engaged.

Blocks of strength

"It was the young guys who people spurn [who protected the North Side]; they deserve credit," said K.B. Brown, who spent many late nights until sunrise watching over his street in northeast Minneapolis as well as on the North Side. "They think the streets are all there is. We have the opportunity to show them there's much more. In the end, they got a taste of what it feels like ... to not be the pariah of the community and be the defender of the community."

Now, he said, they need to keep those young men engaged, litigate their "street beefs" and make sure they have concrete things to do. He said residents are also more mobilized about creating longer-term change on the North Side, increasing ownership of buildings and keeping more money in the community.

"Now we're focused on making sure we're in control of the transformation in our community," he said.

Meeting new neighbors

The unrest in Minneapolis comes at the same time the community has been hit hard by the COVID-19 pandemic.

But in south Minneapolis, the outbreak has actually allowed Melissa Hysing, 41, to meet more of her neighbors, who are staying home more. Then when authorities warned residents to look for suspicious water bottles or containers of accelerants, she scoured her alleyway's shrubs, running into other Standish neighbors doing the same.

"I've met more neighbors in the last 11 days than 11 years," Hysing said.

She quickly realized the block needed to be more organized and went door-to-door to gather information and connect over e-mails and texts. Now, she hopes neighbor conversations continue - whether it's socializing over a meat raffle in the alley or discussing city politics and countering racism.

"We're still in three compounding crises," she said of the pandemic, economic crisis and outcry for police reform following Floyd's death. "I think it will be up to all of us [to respond.]"

Nearby, David Yehl, 49, wanted to capitalize on his neighborhood's unity after standing watch at night over his street during the riots. So he and his neighbors grabbed leaf blowers and garden hoses, holding a car wash fundraiser.

Three hours and more than 100 cars later, they had raised more than $10,000 thanks to a corporate match, all going toward the Lake Street Council and the West Broadway Business and Area Coalition to rebuild damaged businesses in south and north Minneapolis.

"A lot of us felt really dejected," Yehl said. "We wanted to give some hope to the community."

His wife, Jennifer Kennard, is organizing a book club to read books on anti-racism and white privilege to continue the dialogue among neighbors.

"The entire neighborhood really came together because I think everyone understands the importance of what happened," he said.

A new energy

Blocks of strength

Neighborhood associations have been doing this kind of work for decades, said Candace Miller Lopez, executive director of the Standish Ericsson Neighborhood Association. But she said the new energy among residents and blocks is heartening.

Usually, when she holds board or information sessions, it's "crickets" but a recent gathering drew about 30 people.

"The work we've been doing all along is actually being elevated," she said, adding that the association is developing a block organizer tool kit to better help block leaders. "There's a greater sense of urgency."

She said the increased connections among neighbors will do good long-term - whether it's just connecting neighbors more to help someone mow their lawn after a surgery to mobilizing around bigger issues.

"People are realizing they have to be more engaged than normal," Miller Lopez said. "Now people are seeing we have the power to change things if we know our neighbors."

Kelly Smith · 612-673-4141

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

ARTICLE DCXI. GOP REJECTS MUCH OF REFORM PLAN

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1026 wordsByline: BRIANA BIRSCHBACH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Minnesota legislators clashed sharply on Friday as top Republicans rejected much of a sweeping DFL package of police reforms brought in response to the death of George Floyd, a black man who died in Minneapolis police custody on May 25.

The opening hours of a special session put their contrasting agendas on full display, with Senate Republicans pushing instead to end the state of emergency that allowed Gov. Tim Walz to close bars, restaurants and schools to respond to the coronavirus pandemic.

As expected, Walz formally extended those emergency powers Friday for another 30 days, triggering the special session that brought lawmakers back to the State Capitol.

The GOP-led Senate immediately voted to end Walz's peacetime emergency, calling for more legislative oversight over the pandemic. But the DFL-controlled House blocked the move, assuring that the governor's emergency powers can run into July. The House and Senate also disagree on how long the special session should last: Senate Republicans vowed to gavel out again and return to their districts in one week, while House Democrats accused them of trying to "cut and run on Minnesotans" by rushing important debates on police accountability.

"To say we're going to come in, we're going to charge ahead, we're going to get these things done without having listened to the community because we're in some big hurry because we're in a special session, that isn't the approach to take," said House Speaker Melissa Hortman, DFL-Brooklyn Park. "The approach to take is to truly listen and to take the time it needs. Minnesotans pay us all year round. It may not be convenient to come to work in June, but the work is in front of us."

Democrats also argued that it is inconsistent for Republicans to adjourn while also pressing for more legislative oversight over the governor's actions.

"If we are going to end the emergency order, then we've got to do the work," said Sen. Matt Little, DFL-Lakeville.

GOP rejects much of reform plan

But Republicans made clear that their top priority is restoring a state economy devastated by the extended closures mandated under Walz's peacetime emergency powers to battle COVID-19.

"That's the problem with emergency powers; he gets to decide who wins and who loses," said Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, R-East Gull Lake. "There's a whole lot of people in Minnesota who are on the losing side who are very frustrated."

Gazelka suggested that lawmakers could continue to work on race and police issues even after the special session ends. Another move by Walz to extend the state of emergency would trigger yet another special session in July.

"Minnesota has the opportunity to lead the way for the whole nation for reconciliation of the races and some of the problems we're addressing," Gazelka said. "Let's begin here."

Even as Minnesota and other states seek to respond to the outcry over Floyd's death, Congress is working on its own set of police reforms, including a package by Senate Republicans aimed at winning the approval of President Donald Trump, a political ally of Minneapolis Police Federation President Lt. Bob Kroll.

There were some signs of agreement in St. Paul on Friday. The House and Senate struck a deal on a $62 million package of grants for small businesses impacted by the pandemic. The funding would be equally divided between businesses in the metro area and greater Minnesota. Both sides also say they want to pass a more than $1 billion public works bonding bill that failed during the regular session that ended in May. Some state borrowing could help businesses in St. Paul and Minneapolis damaged by days of riots and looting in response to Floyd's death.

The pandemic became the focus of lawmakers' work during the regular legislative session, but Floyd's death hung heaviest over the Capitol on Friday. Members, spaced out for social distancing on the House floor, opened the session by pausing for 8 minutes and 46 seconds - the length of time former Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin held his knee to Floyd's neck before Floyd took his last breath.

Outside on the Capitol steps, civil rights activists pushing for police reform demanded action from legislators before they adjourn.

"We need legislators on both sides of the aisle to step up to the plate. The world is watching what is happening here in Minnesota," said civil rights attorney Nekima Levy Armstrong. "The sad reality is if legislators had taken the voices of communities of color seriously with regard to the crisis in policing, we wouldn't be in this place that we're in right now."

House Democrats have scheduled a hearing Saturday to review a police reform package largely developed by members of the People of Color and Indigenous Caucus and a task force led by state Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington and Attorney General Keith Ellison, who is prosecuting Chauvin and three other officers implicated in Floyd's death.

The DFL package, laid out by Walz on Thursday, would reform use-of-force standards, increase oversight of police discipline and encourage community-based alternatives to traditional law enforcement. They also include proposals to ban police chokeholds and "warrior style" police training, while giving the state's attorney general authority over all deadly force cases involving police officers.

GOP rejects much of reform plan

On Friday, Senate Republicans signaled support for some of those measures, including less controversial moves like banning chokeholds, which are already limited by most Minnesota police departments. But they voiced opposition to many other DFL proposals, including putting the attorney general in charge of prosecuting officer-involved killings.

One GOP-backed initiative would abolish or limit mediation rights for police officers fired for wrongdoing. But that measure faces opposition from some DFL-leaning public employee unions.

"I really want the many police officers throughout the state to know that we appreciate the effort that you do day in and day out," Gazelka said. "There always must be a few bad apples that must be plucked out, and that's what we're trying to do here."

Staff writer Torey Van Oot contributed to this report.

Briana Bierschbach · 651-925-5042

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

Guard sent home after outburst during Floyd remembrance

ARTICLE DCXII. GUARD SENT HOME AFTER OUTBURST DURING FLOYD REMEMBRANCE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 411 wordsByline: LIZ SAWYER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Corrections officer made comment during moment of silence Tuesday.Body

A Minnesota corrections officer is under internal investigation following an outburst during Tuesday's statewide moment of silence for George Floyd.

Gov. Tim Walz issued a proclamation that morning to coincide with the 46-year-old's funeral service in Houston and honor other lives cut short by "systems of racism and discrimination" in the state.

But when prison administrators cleared the air for the remembrance, a voice crackled through on their radios:

"Is this for the injustice of having Derek Chauvin locked up?" the Stillwater prison guard reportedly said, referring to the veteran Minneapolis police officer who knelt on Floyd's neck before he died on Memorial Day.

The comment was met with stunned silence. The officer who made the remark was escorted out of the prison and remains on paid leave. Corrections Commissioner Paul Schnell confirmed the nature of the incident and status of the pending investigation.

Several minority officers filed complaints about the incident, describing the conduct as inappropriate.

It's unclear whether prisoners nearby overheard the exchange.

"In the interest of everyone, we made a decision to send him home," Schnell said. "Comments like that have the potential to affect the safety of the facility."

Union officials did not immediately respond to requests for comment.

Despite the differences in their roles, many corrections officers view themselves as another critical rung of law enforcement and identify with the daily challenges police face on the job.

Guard sent home after outburst during Floyd remembrance

Chauvin is awaiting trial at Oak Park Heights prison on a second-degree murder charge in Floyd's death. It's the state's only maximum-security facility. As is common with other high-profile inmates, he is being held in administrative segregation - meaning that he is isolated from the general population for his protection but maintains certain privileges.

In the aftermath of Floyd's death, Schnell sent an e-mail to all 4,300 corrections staff members to address the tragedy and announce his intent to hold two employee listening sessions, one specifically for minority employees.

"I would particularly like to provide space for our DOC colleagues of color to discuss and process our collective work in a system that reflects a profound disparate impact on people of color," he wrote. "These realities cannot be overlooked and their impact cannot be underestimated. Starting these conversations will not be easy, but they are profoundly necessary."

Liz Sawyer · 612-673-4648

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

End of Document

After sharp criticism, Trump moves Tulsa rally date that coincided with Juneteenth

ARTICLE DCXIII. AFTER SHARP CRITICISM, TRUMP MOVES TULSA RALLY DATE THAT COINCIDED WITH JUNETEENTH

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 13, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 806 words

Byline: New York Times

Highlight: President Donald Trump bowed to pressure Friday night and announced that he would delay his upcoming campaign rally in Tulsa, Oklahoma, rather than hold it on the day that honors the end of slavery in the United States and is considered a major holiday by many African Americans. The rally was originally set for next [...]

Body

President Donald Trump bowed to pressure Friday night and announced that he would delay his upcoming campaign rally in Tulsa, Oklahoma, rather than hold it on the day that honors the end of slavery in the United States and is considered a major holiday by many African Americans.

The rally was originally set for next Friday, or June 19, the date known as Juneteenth, which marks the day in 1865 when Union soldiers arrived in Texas and read the Emancipation Proclamation announcing that slaves had been freed, the last of the Confederate states to officially receive the news.

The Trump campaign's decision to hold a rally on Juneteenth in Tulsa, the site of one of the country's bloodiest outbreaks of racist violence, generated vociferous criticism amid the national reckoning over race and justice in the United States following the killing of George Floyd, a black man who died when a white police officer in Minneapolis pressed a knee on his neck for nearly nine minutes. In a Twitter message shortly before midnight, Trump said he would move the rally to June 20 instead.

"We had previously scheduled our #MAGA Rally in Tulsa, Oklahoma, for June 19th - a big deal," he wrote. "Unfortunately, however, this would fall on the Juneteenth Holiday. Many of my African-American friends and supporters have reached out to suggest that we consider changing the date out of respect for this Holiday, and in observance of this important occasion and all that it represents. I have therefore decided to move our rally to Saturday, June 20th, in order to honor their requests."

Democrats pounced on the original timing to denounce Trump for disrespecting the concerns of those calling for major changes in American society to address racism and police violence. The selection of Tulsa had also drawn complaints given its history as the site of a 1921 massacre by white mobs attacking black citizens and businesses with guns and explosives dropped from airplanes.

After sharp criticism, Trump moves Tulsa rally date that coincided with Juneteenth

"This isn't just a wink to white supremacists - he's throwing them a welcome home party," Sen. Kamala Harris of California said after the original announcement.

According to Republicans close to the president, the campaign was aware of the significance of the date once they announced the site but not before it was selected. Once it was done, the campaign decided to move ahead, announcing the date before their contract with the event venue in Tulsa was even finalized, people briefed on the events said.

But the blowback was fierce. The White House press secretary, Kayleigh McEnany, told reporters Thursday that the date was significant to Trump, explaining why there was no issue with him holding the rally then. And in an interview taped the same day with Fox News, Trump said that he had not realized the meaning of the date but that people should think of the rally as a "celebration."

It was the rare instance of the president bending to criticism and capped a tumultuous week for the nation and for his reelection effort.

Trump has condemned the killing of Floyd and called his family to offer his support but he has focused most of his public comments in the past two weeks on a tough "law-and-order" message assailing the largely peaceful protests that turned violent. He has rejected the notion that there is systemic racism in law enforcement, declaring that 99.9% of police officers are "great, great people."

He chose Oklahoma to begin holding rallies again even though he won it by 36 percentage points in 2016 in part because it was one of the earliest to lift restrictions imposed because of the coronavirus. Trump said he also planned to hold rallies in Florida, Arizona and North Carolina, all of them key states in his campaign against former Vice President Joe Biden.

Campaign officials did not respond to an email seeking comment about the change, and it was not immediately clear how far in advance Trump had told his advisers he wanted the rally moved before he tweeted his statement. One person briefed on the events said campaign officials learned earlier Friday evening, but it was not clear when.

Even after the president's tweet, a campaign official sent out one of her own promoting the rally with a link to a webpage still listing it on June 19. Earlier in the evening, the campaign manager, Brad Parscale, tweeted that he had received 300,000 requests for tickets to the event.

The tweet came not long after Trump hosted a dinner with Gov. Phil Murphy, D-N.J., with whom the president has been in frequent touch about the coronavirus.

Judge seeks more details on Trump's clemency for Roger Stone US budget deficit hits all-time high of \$864 billion in June Trump rips private Texas border wall built by North Dakota company Robert Mueller defends Russia probe, says Roger Stone remains a felon Trump wears mask in public for first time during pandemic

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

Hundreds rally against Kroll

ARTICLE DCXIV. HUNDREDS RALLY AGAINST KROLL

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 9BLength: 99 wordsBody

Hundreds gathered outside the Minneapolis Police Union headquarters in northeast Minneapolis to call for the ouster of its president, Lt. Bob Kroll. Protesters painted signs with red handprints and handwritten messages calling for him to step down. The rally was hosted by Black Lives Matter Minnesota, the Minnesota chapter of the Council on American-Islamic Relations and several other social justice organizations. The city recently announced that it was withdrawing from labor negotiations with the powerful police union that Kroll leads.

Photos by AARON LAVINSKY · aaron.lavinsky@startribune.comLoad-Date: June 15, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCXV. MINNESOTA DEMOCRATS PUSH FOR POLICE REFORM WHILE REPUBLICANS PRIORITIZE CORONAVIRUS RESPONSE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 13, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 638 wordsByline: Sarah Mearhoff

Highlight: Minnesota House Democrats are looking to overhaul police practices in the wake of the death of George Floyd, but their measures could be stopped short by lawmakers whose priorities lie elsewhere for the Legislature's short special session this month. The Minnesota House's Public Safety Committee on Saturday held an hours-long hearing on a laundry list [...]

Body

Minnesota House Democrats are looking to overhaul police practices in the wake of the death of George Floyd, but their measures could be stopped short by lawmakers whose priorities lie elsewhere for the Legislature's short special session this month.

The Minnesota House's Public Safety Committee on Saturday held an hours-long hearing on a laundry list of bills to reform policing and criminal justice in the state.

Proponents of the bills say the state should harness the energy of protesters and activists in the wake of Floyd's death to make legislative change now, but Senate Republicans on Friday said they are focusing their time to respond to the COVID-19 pandemic and the resulting economic fallout, as well as ceasing Gov. Tim Walz's executive emergency powers and passing a bonding bill.

In the days following Floyd's death, the House's People of Color and Indigenous Caucus laid out their 19-bill plan for reform. The bills are grouped into three packages: the Reclaiming Community Oversight Act, the Reforming Accountability Act and the Reimagining Public Safety Act.

The proposals range in policy from prohibiting police chokeholds and "warrior training," to reforming the state's officer complaint arbitration process, to requiring some police departments to hire officers who live in the communities they serve, to training officers to better de-escalate mental health crises and more.

Rep. Carlos Mariani, DFL-St. Paul, who chairs the committee, said Saturday that this "is not the first time we've arrived at this moment," citing the dozens of other black Americans who have died during interactions with the police. But after each of those deaths, he said, "we failed to respond to the need to transform what underlies all of this."

Minnesota Democrats push for police reform while Republicans prioritize coronavirus response

"Let's not make the same mistake this time and only do the little things," Mariani said. "Individual policy change is good, but we owe it to this moment in history to also work for larger systems change."

One of those previous deaths was Philando Castile, a 32-year-old black man fatally shot during a traffic stop in Falcon Heights in July 2016. His mother, Valerie Castile, told the committee Saturday that she has been working toward police reform for nearly four years since her son died, but she feels like "we're just circling the wheels." She said Floyd's death was "the straw that broke the camel's back."

"That was just a flood of emotions that had been harbored and suppressed by so many," she said. "So many were just holding those feelings back because no one has been accountable for all these murders that happened here in the state of Minnesota. So yes, I support these bills with every fiber of my soul because it's not right."

At a Friday news conference, Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, R-East Gull Lake, said his caucus was prioritizing coronavirus-related bills because "everybody said they were an emergency." He pointed to Walz and legislative Democrats for putting those bills on the back burner.

"Enough of this. Enough of the games," he said. "Let's get this done."

He also said his caucus had planned to put off a vote to suspend Walz's executive emergency powers, but after Walz's administration didn't intervene with protesters who toppled a statue of Christopher Columbus at the Capitol, he said his caucus decided to move quickly with that vote Friday.

After Gazelka's news conference Friday, Walz tweeted, "Minnesotans, call your GOP State Senators. Make your voices heard." George Floyd family filing civil suit against Minneapolis, police Gov. Walz to appeal federal decision rejecting disaster aid for Twin Cities following riots Attorneys ask George Floyd judge to hold AG Keith Ellison in contempt Protest in Pennsylvania after cop uses knee to restrain man Four pro bono attorneys join Keith Ellison's prosecution team in George Floyd case

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

ARTICLE DCXVI. FLOYD'S DEATH HASTENS SHIFT IN POLICE POP CULTURE
PORTRAYALS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 13, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1050 wordsByline: Hillel ItalicHighlight: NEW YORK (AP) - Gary Phillips, a prize-winning crime novelist from Los Angeles, grew up on TV shows that showed a world nothing like the one he lived in.Body

NEW YORK - Gary Phillips, a prize-winning crime novelist from Los Angeles, grew up on TV shows that showed a world nothing like the one he lived in.

"I watched them all, 'Dragnet,' 'Adam 12,' 'The Wild, Wild West,' 'Mannix,' 'Cannon,' 'Peter Gunn' reruns and on and on. Now these were white guys and they were tough but fair and even-handed," he told The Associated Press in a recent email, referring to popular programs mostly from the 1960s and 1970s.

"I remember a 'Dragnet' episode where tight-ass Joe Friday solved racism among black and white officers in a weekend retreat. But I was a kid growing up in South Central and even then some part of me knew a lot of this was jive. We knew the cops out of Newton and 77th Division policed the 'hood a lot different than shown on TV."

The May 25 killing of George Floyd, a black man who died after a white Minneapolis police officer pressed a knee to his neck, has set off protests worldwide and transmitted images of law enforcement that long remained far outside the narratives of crime stories - beatings and lethal chokeholds of handcuffed suspects, firing mace and rubber bullets at peaceful protesters, harassing and cursing at journalists.

Police stories have evolved far from the prime of Sgt. Friday. But the idealized crime fighter remains a cultural touchstone even when countered by such recent narratives as Ava DuVernay's Netflix series "When They See Us," about the wrongfully convicted Central Park Five, and Angie Thomas' "The Hate U Give," a best-selling novel about a black teen murdered by police that was adapted into a feature film of the same name.

"Hopefully what we're seeing on TV now, and on social media, is that bubble being popped," Thomas told the AP.

Protests have already changed television. "Cops," which for 33 seasons helped shape an authorized narrative that allowed viewers to sympathize and identify with real police on patrol, was dropped this week by the Paramount Network. A&E did the same with a similar show, "Live PD," one of its mostly highly rated programs. Earlier this year, five police procedurals were consistently in the Nielsen company's top 20 ratings, including NBC's "Chicago PD" and CBS's "FBI." Now, even those portraying law enforcement officials are pulling back: Griffin Newman, who appeared as a detective on the CBS series "Blue Bloods," announced he was donating his earnings from the show to help raise bail for arrested protesters.

Floyd's death hastens shift in police pop culture portrayals

The divide between crime fiction and real life dates back to the genre's origins, more than 200 years ago. Law enforcement violence and corruption were extreme in the mid-19th century and some police forces were rooted in the patrols that used to chase down runaway slaves. Meanwhile, "The police in early crime fiction were depicted as good, courageous, and brilliant," says Otto Penzler, the crime fiction publisher and bookseller.

In the 20th century, shows such as "Dragnet" and "Highway Patrol" were collaborations between law enforcement and the entertainment business, to the point where J. Edgar Hoover was permitted to vet the politics of the actors appearing in "The FBI," the long-running series starring Efrem Zimbalist Jr. Otherwise, police and other officials were portrayed as jaded and self-contained in the fiction of Raymond Chandler and Dashiell Hammett, comical and bumbling like the Keystone Kops or the misfits of "Police Academy," ruffled and savvy like Peter Falk's Columbo, or witty and indomitable like Bruce Willis' New York City detective John McClane in the "Die Hard" movies.

Walter Mosley, known for his "Easy Rawlins" novels about a black detective in Los Angeles, noted that even if the plot included a bad cop "it wouldn't be institutionalized. It would be that cop is bad because he or she is a bad person."

For Gary Phillips and many others, it took years to find stories in which they could see themselves. Naomi Hirahara, the Edgar Award winning author of the Mas Arai detective novels, remembered the "fantasy" or watching the white male protagonists in "Columbo," "The Rockford Files" and other shows. As an adult, she was drawn to African American crime writers such as Mosley and Chester Himes, and now admires Rachel Howzel Hall's novels about the African American LAPD homicide detective Elouise "Lou" Norton, books "revealing the complexity of a black woman in a system that has traditionally disempowered minorities."

Protest in Pennsylvania after cop uses knee to restrain man Four pro bono attorneys join Keith Ellison's prosecution team in George Floyd case Fired Minneapolis cops in George Floyd case want gag order lifted Deals remain elusive as Minnesota special session approaches Feds deny Minnesota request for aid after George Floyd unrest Walz has 30 days to appeal.

Penzler and others cite Joseph Wambaugh's 1971 novel "The New Centurions" as a turning point in showing a more realistic portrait of police, although no single trend has prevailed. Over the past 50 years, the image of law enforcement has sometimes mirrored debates between liberals and conservatives. Sidney Lumet's 1973 film "Serpico" dramatized the corruption of New York City police and the heroism of the real-life title character's willingness to speak out. Around the same time, Clint Eastwood's "Dirty Harry" movies positioned Eastwood's San Francisco lawman as a needed rule-breaker in a system too permissive of crime. Spike Lee's landmark 1989 release "Do the Right Thing," in which a black man is choked to death by police, was released two weeks after the premiere of "Lethal Weapon 2" and the crowd pleasing defiance of Mel Gibson's Sgt. Martin Riggs.

Floyd's death hastens shift in police pop culture portrayals

"Cops," which allowed the departments it covered significant control over its content, has been contrasted by the tougher perspective of Lena Waithe's Showtime series "The Chi." But even shows like "The Wire," and "The Shield" that take frank looks at police abuses can end up making the audience identify with officers.

"At first it's 'police are dirty bums' and it's 'look at the awful thing they did,'" says Miki Turner, a professor at the University of Southern California who specializes in diversity and controversial topics in the entertainment industry and television. "And then there's something in the script that makes you flip your mentality, and sympathize."

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

End of Document

RASH REPORT

ARTICLE DCXVII. RASH REPORT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 7ALength: 1138 wordsByline: JOHN RASH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Peril, and promise, in 'Minneapolis moment' // "What Minneapolis will be remembered for is its response," said Brookings expert Amy Liu, reflecting thoughts of other civic leaders.Body

GEORGE FLOYD KILLING

Minneapolis has mostly projected a solid, if not stolid, image.

"City of Lakes" isn't as monumental as "The Big Apple," and even the city's few prominent monuments present an idealized image of nature (Father of Waters in City Hall), a force of nature (Hubert Humphrey in front of City Hall), or even a sitcom character (Mary Tyler Moore on Nicollet Mall).

But now among the images imprinted internationally as symbols of the city are the video of George Floyd's murder and the mural honoring him, which has been replicated as far away as Idlib, Syria, a place that profoundly understands injustice.

Floyd's killing, and the explosive protests, peaceful demonstrations, and reformation promises it sparked have recast the placid, or absent, image many had of Minneapolis. "Only weeks ago the biggest lament I heard is Minneapolis-St. Paul was not on the radar. And now we are," said Peter Frosch, CEO of Greater MSP, the Minneapolis-St. Paul regional economic development partnership. "The world is watching what we do. And it will listen when we speak."

Frosch has been listening, too, and in conversations with counterparts across the country he's heard a version of "this is not what I understood about Minneapolis-St. Paul."

But Frosch, and certainly other civic leaders, did understand the unaddressed challenges churning just below the surface. "We unfortunately have not become something entirely different in the last two weeks," Frosch said. "Much of the country and the world has been made aware of parts of our story that we are not proud of but were true before the past couple of weeks."

"Before the last two weeks, our region was not on a sustainable path," Frosch said. "We were becoming more diverse every year without succeeding in bringing all members of our community into full participation in our economy and our educational system, and what was happening was a quiet erosion of our exceptionalism. And now that is in the open. And now there is more awareness. So aspects of what we are facing now makes it feel more acute. But the underlying challenge is the same, and I am hopeful in this moment that we can transform this new awareness and urgency into sustained action and not incremental change."

RASH REPORT

Indeed, as much as Minneapolis may be seen through the current chaotic kaleidoscope, the events fit a national pattern that may make them not seem so singular. "There are events that not only define the city, but define the nation, and where the nation is," said Amy Liu, vice president and director of the Brookings Institution's Metropolitan Policy Program.

Citing Sandy Hook, Ferguson and New Orleans, Liu said that the events so closely associated with those cities matter not only to "the lives of the people in that community, but put the entire country on its knees in thinking about what to do next.

"So, I do think that this is the Minneapolis moment."

And over time, this moment may become a movement that takes the city's image beyond the searing video. "In some ways I don't think Minneapolis is going to be solely defined by this one act of brutality because the long list of cities that it has shared the moment with," Liu said. "Yet I do think it matters what you do with the moment and, if anything, I think what Minneapolis will be remembered for is its response."

And Minneapolis is ready to respond, said Melvin Tennant, the president and CEO of Meet Minneapolis, the convention and visitors association tasked with attracting events to the city. "This has been a tipping point for our community and for our country," Tennant said. "It's been galvanizing."

And, added Tennant, it fits into "our whole DNA of being a community of innovation in social causes and social change." Already, Tennant said, "we've seen a lot of public and private entities come together quickly; people just want to get to work." And that work has been noticed nationally, and even internationally, just as Frosch suggested.

Initial initiatives by city leaders "burnished Minneapolis as a truly progressive, action-oriented place; it's a place that moves, a place that does, a place that experiments," said Liu, who cited the establishment of the Metropolitan Council, charter schools and new zoning rules as evidence. "What will more define the community is what it does with this moment."

There's national support - and some caution - about the changes, Tennant said. In the wake of the tragedy, Tennant sent a letter to key clients and constituents. "Overwhelmingly, the comment we got back is, 'we stand in solidarity with you,' " Tennant said. But, he added, "people wanted to make sure that we were part of the change." Many also wanted to express concern over news about the future of the city's police department, he said. "People were really concerned about the headlines," Tennant said, a fact that cannot be ignored by the city's leaders.

For Frosch, "this is a call to action for our entire region to marshal our proven problem-solving ability to address one of the biggest barriers to our present and future success.

"In this we cannot fail," Frosch said. But, he cautioned, "Time is not on our side. Attention can wane."

RASH REPORT

Liu, a nationally noted expert on cities, said that each "cares about its brand; in a traditional economic-development sense, we actually pay people to market our cities."

People like Tennant and Frosch, who agree with Liu's assessment that "the brand of working toward shared prosperity is a very positive brand." Or, as Frosch believes, "A brand is an extension of who we are. And we're right to be concerned with our brand and our perception. But we should be focused on who we are, and who we want to be, and the action that requires."

The future of the nation, and the Twin Cities, Frosch said, is diversity. "Our question has always been, 'Will we turn that into a source of strength, or will we fail to adapt, fully incorporate and utilize everyone's capabilities, and be less than we've been?' And that question has been on the table two weeks ago, two months ago and is more urgent today."

It was also urgent generations ago, when one of those immortalized with a Minneapolis statue urged his political party, and nation, toward racial reconciliation.

"My friends, to those who say that we are rushing this issue of civil rights, I say to them we are 172 years late," Hubert Humphrey said in a seminal speech at the 1948 Democratic National Convention, in which he urged his party to "walk forthrightly into the bright sunshine of human rights."

It's finally, firmly time for that forthright walk, and there's no better way for Minneapolis to honor George Floyd than to have his adopted city lead the procession.

John Rash is a Star Tribune editorial writer and columnist. The Rash Report can be heard at 8:10 a.m. Fridays on WCCO Radio, 830-AM. On Twitter: @rashreport.

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

As US seethes over race, Trump calls out 'evil of slavery'

ARTICLE DCXVIII. AS US SEETHES OVER RACE, TRUMP CALLS OUT 'EVIL OF SLAVERY'

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 13, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1156 words

Byline: Darlene Superville

Highlight: As the nation continues to grapple with its racial past, President Donald Trump urged West Point's graduating class Saturday to "never forget" the legacy of soldiers before them who fought a bloody war to "extinguish the evil of slavery."

Body

WEST POINT. N.Y. - As the nation continues to grapple with its racial past, President Donald Trump urged West Point's graduating class Saturday to "never forget" the legacy of soldiers before them who fought a bloody war to "extinguish the evil of slavery."

Trump's appeal to remember history came as his own relationship with the military is under strain from the unrelenting criticism he and Pentagon leaders have faced over their response to protests that erupted after George Floyd's death in Minneapolis.

It also came hours after Trump made what amounted to a rare concession for him: He rescheduled a campaign rally planned for Tulsa, Oklahoma, on June 19. The day marks the end of slavery in the U.S., and Tulsa was the scene of a fiery white-on-black attack in 1921.

"What has historically made America unique is the durability of its institutions against the passions and prejudices of the moment," Trump told more than 1,100 graduates at an unusual outdoor ceremony held during a pandemic. "When times are turbulent, when the road is rough, what matters most is that which is permanent, timeless, enduring and eternal."

In the past two weeks, Trump has yelled at Defense Secretary Mark Esper for publicly opposing his call to deploy active-duty troops to quell the protests stemming from the killing of Floyd, who was black, by a white Minneapolis police officer.

Trump also shut down Esper's attempt to begin a public debate on removing the names of Confederate Army officers - some of whom trained at West Point - from military bases, an idea gaining momentum across the country.

As US seethes over race, Trump calls out 'evil of slavery'

Gen. Mark Milley, the Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman, risked Trump's ire Thursday by declaring he had made "a mistake" by accompanying Trump on a June 1 walk through Lafayette Square. It ended with the president posing with a Bible outside a boarded-up St. John's Church.

Milley's comments amounted to an extraordinary expression of regret by Trump's chief military adviser, who said his appearance led to the perception of the military becoming embroiled in politics, which in his view - one shared by Esper - is a threat to democracy.

The events have stirred debate within the military and among retired officers. More than 500 West Point graduates from classes spanning six decades signed an open letter reminding the Class of 2020 of its commitment to avoid partisan politics.

The letter, published this week on Medium, also alluded to the problems Esper and Milley encountered at the White House after Floyd's death.

"Sadly, the government has threatened to use the Army in which you serve as a weapon against fellow Americans engaging in these legitimate protests," they wrote. "Worse, military leaders, who took the same oath you take today, have participated in politically charged events. The principle of civilian control is central to the military profession. But that principle does not imply blind obedience."

During the commencement ceremony, protesters denounced the president from boats and kayaks along the nearby Hudson River.

Trump also used his first West Point address to remind the newly commissioned officers of the academy's history and storied generals like Douglas MacArthur and Dwight D. Eisenhower.

"It was on this soil that American patriots held the most vital fortress in our war for independence," Trump said. He said the U.S. Military Academy "gave us the men and women who fought and won a bloody war to extinguish the evil of slavery within one lifetime of our founding."

"This is your history. This is the legacy that each of you inherits," Trump continued, adding that it was bought with American blood spilled in battle. "You must never forget it."

Trump, however, was incorrect to say women had been trained at West Point for the anti-slavery fight; they were not allowed to become cadets until 1976.

His remarks also overlooked numerous West Point graduates who served in the Confederacy, including President Jefferson Davis, Gen. Robert E. Lee and Gen. Braxton Bragg. Some are now seeking the removal of Bragg's name from North Carolina's Fort Bragg.

In the speech, Trump leaned into his "America first" brand of foreign policy without uttering the phrase, telling the Army's newest officers their job is "not to rebuild foreign nations, but to defend and defend strongly our nation from our foreign enemies."

"It is not the duty of U.S. troops to solve ancient conflicts in faraway lands that many people have never heard of." He said America is not the "policeman of the world," but warned adversaries that it will "never, ever hesitate" to act when its people are threatened.

He thanked those in the military who helped the country respond to the coronavirus, once again calling it an "invisible enemy" from China.

As US seethes over race, Trump calls out 'evil of slavery'

The president stressed the unity of a graduating class that came "from every race, religion, color and creed." The class also includes citizens of 11 other countries, including Bosnia-Herzegovina, South Korea and Tanzania.

Trump highlighted bigger defense budgets under his watch but falsely said he had destroyed 100% of the Islamic State caliphate in the Middle East; the group still poses a threat to the U.S. He noted he had directed the killing of two terrorist leaders and had created the Space Force.

Trump also remembered a cadet who died in an accident last year and whose father is a Secret Service agent, and noted that both he and the Army share a birthday Sunday. Trump will turn 74, while the Army marks its 254th year of existence.

Esper did not attend, but emphasized the principles of duty, honor and country in a video message, saying they will help guide the new officers "in challenging times and in the face of new and emerging threats."

Judge seeks more details on Trump's clemency for Roger Stone Trump rips private Texas border wall built by North Dakota company Robert Mueller defends Russia probe, says Roger Stone remains a felon Trump wears mask in public for first time during pandemic Feds deny Minnesota request for aid after George Floyd unrest. Walz has 30 days to appeal.

Trump's appearance at West Point had been criticized as a political move that would put the graduates at risk since the academy is located up the Hudson River from New York City, the epicenter of the U.S. coronavirus outbreak.

The Army defended the move, saying the cadets had to return to campus anyway for final medical checks, equipment and training. They had been home since spring break in early March..

For the ceremony, the newly commissioned second lieutenants wore face masks as they marched onto the parade field, but removed them after sitting for the socially distant ceremony required by the pandemic.

Instead of shaking hands with the president, they exchanged salutes. Family and friends were not allowed to attend and had to watch online.

At the end of the ceremony, five hulking helicopters flew low and slow over the field as the graduates tossed their white dress caps into the air.

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

ARTICLE DCXIX. HISTORIC PARDON IN DULUTH LYNCHING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 849 wordsByline: BROOKS JOHNSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

DULUTH - With a gun to his head, Max Mason told a police officer he had done no wrong.

Yet the black circus worker was convicted by an all-white jury of raping a white woman in Duluth in 1920 despite no evidence a crime had occurred.

And for 100 years, the official record reflected that lie.

No more.

Mason, a "scapegoat" for a mob that lynched three innocent black men in Duluth 100 years ago Monday, has been cleared of his century-old rape conviction.

On Friday morning the Minnesota Board of Pardons granted Mason the state's first posthumous pardon.

"This is 100 years overdue," said Gov. Tim Walz, who sits on the board along with Attorney General Keith Ellison and Lorie Skjerven Gildea, chief justice of the Minnesota Supreme Court.

It took a unanimous vote to grant the pardon, which followed emotional testimony from those supporting it.

"His case is like the case of hundreds of other people of color," said Jerry Blackwell, the Minneapolis lawyer who drafted the pardon application. "Mr. Mason deserves our mercy, our clemency, because we served him a tainted justice when it should have been pure."

Mason was arrested and tried following the June 15, 1920, lynching of three fellow black circus workers - Elias Clayton, Elmer Jackson and Isaac McGhie - who were accused of raping a white woman, Irene Tusken. Tusken's doctor found no evidence of an assault.

In Mason's pardon application, Blackwell wrote that without "a scapegoat to exculpate the actions of the mob ... [it] would have meant that the lynch mob had not murdered rapists, but innocent men."

Historic pardon in Duluth lynching

Mason was sentenced to 30 years in prison but was released in 1925 and told not to return to Minnesota. He died in Memphis, Tenn., in 1942 at the age of 43.

After initially making national headlines, the lynching and Mason's case quickly faded from view and was long kept quiet by Duluth leaders and residents.

Duluth Police Chief Mike Tusken, whose great-aunt was the accuser, told the pardon board he only learned about his family's connection to the lynching after Irene Tusken died in 1996.

"I believe this is mostly attributed to the great shame experienced by our family and the desire to repress and forget this injustice," Tusken said. "In much the same way, Duluth followed suit."

The police chief noted, "Not only is the conviction unjust but the facts do not support an arrest in the first place." He urged the board to grant the pardon and correct "a total disregard for justice."

Rogier Gregoire, a board member with the Clayton Jackson McGhie Memorial in Duluth, said the pardon counters the "Minnesota Nice" approach of ignoring the injustice and dispels any lingering suggestion that the lynchings were somehow justified.

"We need to remove that from the minds of all those people in Minnesota and across the world who believe there's some thread of support for the notion that there might have been a crime," Gregoire said. "We need desperately to help those who want to abandon the racism of that fiction so his memory can be held in all of our hearts in a clear and innocent way."

The board quickly determined it had the legal authority to grant a posthumous pardon under state law and approved the pardon without objection.

During the vote, which took place remotely over a video call, the weight of the decision was evident on the faces of Tusken, Gregoire and Blackwell.

It was not just about the pardon of one man, Ellison said, but "our community."

"Racial terror is not limited to one section of our country," Ellison said. "This is part of a process of letting our country really be a place of liberty and justice for all."

A number of current and former elected officials and legal groups supported the pardon, including, in a rare move, the U.S. District Court for Minnesota.

"I have read the entire transcript of the trial of Mr. Mason, and to say that he was convicted on the flimsiest of evidence is a vast understatement," Chief Judge John R. Tunheim wrote in a letter of support for the pardon. "We can only do what we can now, and that is to try to address the injustices that can be remedied, and never, ever, forget this sad and awful history."

To commemorate the lynching, the federal courthouse in Duluth will be closed on Monday and three minutes of silence will be observed at other courthouses starting at noon.

On Friday afternoon Duluth Mayor Emily Larson apologized to Mason's family and said the decision put "a little bit of hope in the air today." The city's human rights officer, Carl Crawford, said it is a "historic time" for Duluth.

Historic pardon in Duluth lynching

"We said for a long time that he was innocent. But now it's true. And it's entrenched. And we know it to be true," he said.

Despite a sudden timeliness with the death of George Floyd still reverberating around the world, the pardon application first came before the board in December, and Walz said it had been "decades in the making."

Still, the governor said: "There is a direct line between what happened with Max Mason and Clayton, Jackson and McGhie. There is a direct line to what happened to George Floyd on the streets of Minneapolis."

Brooks Johnson · 218-491-6496

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

End of Document

'It was like a punch to the gut': Homeless asked to vacate park

ARTICLE DCXX. 'IT WAS LIKE A PUNCH TO THE GUT': HOMELESS ASKED TO VACATE PARK

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1B

Length: 917 words

Byline: CHRIS SERRES; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: Notice came on heels of hotel eviction, but the Park Board rescinds its order, averting standoff.

Body

Dozens of homeless men and women who sought refuge in a south Minneapolis hotel during the street protests following the death of George Floyd are still struggling to find a safe place to stay amid multiple eviction notices.

More than 200 homeless occupants of the former Sheraton Minneapolis Midtown Hotel, near Lake Street and Chicago Avenue, awoke to an unwelcome surprise Tuesday morning, when they were ordered to vacate their rooms at the hotel, which had been converted into a shelter for the homeless during the recent riots.

Lacking other options, many migrated with tents and bags to a shady hilltop overlooking the lake at Powderhorn Park in south Minneapolis. Seeking safety in numbers, about 30 people pitched tents at the northwest corner of the park, near 10th Avenue and E. 32nd Street.

On Friday morning, however, these tent dwellers got another surprise wake-up call. About 7 a.m., several officers with the Minneapolis Park and Recreation Board walked through the makeshift camp and gave everyone written notices saying the camp would be dismantled within 72 hours. "It was like a punch to the gut," said Dennis Barrow, who moved to the camp on Thursday after being evicted from the hotel. "We have nowhere left to go."

The back-to-back notices outraged humanitarian aid volunteers and nearby residents of the Powderhorn Park neighborhood, who poured into the park on Friday morning to show support for the tent dwellers. Many handed out water, food and medical supplies and denounced the Park Board's action during a hastily arranged media event near the tents. Some vowed to return to the site to prevent the homeless from being removed.

'It was like a punch to the gut': Homeless asked to vacate park

A standoff was ultimately avoided when the Park Board late Friday rescinded its 72-hour vacate notice and said tent dwellers would be allowed to remain while local officials worked on a solution.

"An eviction notice is not a solution," declared Grace Berke, community coordinator for the Powderhorn Park Neighborhood Association, which issued a statement denouncing the action. "These are our neighbors and we will not allow them to continue to be pushed further and further out where they can't be seen."

Many who arrived at the park this week looked exasperated after enduring weeks of stress and trauma. The former hotel where they had been staying was near the center of the riots, and many had moved into the building with the hope they would be offered stable housing. Instead, the hotel came to mirror the chaos in the streets nearby, with rampant drug use and fights in the hallways, residents said.

There was extensive destruction to the hotel in its final days, which occupants blamed on a handful of troublemakers. Doors were bashed in. Vending machines were dismantled. Flat-screen televisions were ripped from walls. Graffiti was sprayed in the stairwells. By Friday, the front lobby was in disarray, with garbage and broken furniture strewn about the entrance.

"A lot of angry people terrorized this property on purpose because they didn't like what happened to George Floyd and they stopped caring," said Michelle Smith, an organizer with Freedom from the Streets, who provided outreach to those at the hotel.

The hotel's owner, Jay Patel, declined to be interviewed Friday, as he gazed over his damaged property from the parking lot.

A few of the hotel's last residents looked worn and dispirited as they emerged from the damaged building with their few possessions. "This was a squandered opportunity," said Andre Stigger, a restaurant worker who has been homeless since losing his job in March. "This place could have raised people's consciousness. We could have shown the world that we're capable of lifting ourselves out of this situation."

Yet the mood was upbeat at Powderhorn Park, where dozens of volunteers and neighborhood residents worked through the day Friday to help the recent arrivals. Cheers swept through the group after they learned of the Park Board's decision to revoke the 72-hour vacate notice. The group had put out a call for provisions, including hot food, beverages and bug spray. A man with an injured knee was already getting treated in a makeshift medic tent.

On Friday, Park Board Superintendent Al Bangoura issued a statement saying he now recognized that 72 hours "is not enough time" to help people at the park find housing and other services. "Encampments represent a serious health and safety risk - particularly for those staying within the encampment - and do not represent a dignified form of shelter," he said. "I am committed to working with the community, local leaders and the [Minnesota] Interagency Council on Homelessness on a solution."

Still, it remains to be seen how quickly state and county officials can respond. Their resources and staffing have been stretched thin by a massive and unprecedented effort to move homeless people who are at particularly high risk for the coronavirus to area hotel rooms. To date, more than 600 homeless people have been moved to five area hotels.

'It was like a punch to the gut': Homeless asked to vacate park

Barrow was among those who pitched a tent under the trees at Powderhorn Park after a tumultuous week at the former Sheraton.

His eviction from the hotel marked the fourth time in two months he had been forced to vacate a site, and he was looking forward to a chance to connect with social workers. "I'm sick of that rock-bottom feeling, where you don't know where your next move is going to be," he said. "People here have really stepped up and made us feel welcome."

Chris Serres · 612-673-4308

Twitter: @chrisserrres

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCXXI. READERS WRITE MAY WE ALL BE LIKE ARI

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 6ALength: 1186 wordsBody

REBUILDING

Rather than point the finger, raise his fist and scream blame, Aribert Munzner, the 90-year-old artist who lost much of his work as a result of the recent riots and fires, is moving forward with his life with dignity, grace and humor ("Starting over at 90," June 12).

These are the quiet heroes who lead and inspire by example.

Ursula Krawczyk, St. Paul

POLICE REFORM

The City Council forgot something: To talk to those they claim to help

"Nothing about us without us." With those five simple but powerful words, a group of African-American community leaders told the nine members of the Minneapolis City Council who are calling for defunding and even eliminating the Minneapolis police force to stop their "political grandstanding" and start talking with the people who will be most affected by this ridiculous suggestion ("Officers condemn Chauvin, salute chief," front, June 12).

It is not a novel concept that the best way to solve a problem is to talk to those most in need of finding a solution to the problem. Apparently the City Council, led by President Lisa Bender, hasn't learned that simple principle. And that's a shame, because the African-American community leaders who spoke those words so forcefully on Thursday, while expressing their views on how to make something good out of the terrible killing of George Floyd by a Minneapolis police officer, certainly know more about what it will take to improve relations with the police than do the politicians, celebrities and other publicity seekers who unfortunately garner most of the media's attention.

Ronald Haskvitz, Golden Valley

POLICE BEHAVIOR

Property damage is not public safety

READERS WRITE May we all be like Ari

That's it? No police apology for indiscriminately slashing tires? ("Tires slashed by officers in Mpls. unrest," June 9, and "Drivers with slashed tires can seek redress," June 11.)

Which category did my friend, neighbor and former colleague, reporter Chris Serres of the Star Tribune, fall into? Was he driving recklessly? Were there dangerous items in his car? Or was he merely parked in a parking lot seven blocks from his home?

Were there no checks of licenses to separate people living in the area and news media from others? Was there no consideration of less damaging methods of deflating tires, such as the valve stem? Was there no consideration of whether not having transportation would be more likely to keep these car owners in the area?

Was there no necessity to consider probable cause before law enforcement indiscriminately engaged in damage to property?

Was there no consideration that some cars in the area might be those of newsgatherers engaged in constitutionally protected activity that was explicitly exempted from the curfew?

I expected better from the administration of Gov. Tim Walz, whom I admire and to whose campaign I have contributed.

Out-of-control policing precipitated the death of George Floyd. Out-of-control policing will continue to undermine public confidence in law enforcement.

Steve Brandt, Minneapolis

COLUMBUS STATUE

That's not all to remove from Capitol

Gov. Tim Walz and state Rep. Jim Nash, R-Waconia, agree: Protesters should have used established legal processes to remove the statue of Christopher Columbus rather than topple it over ("GOP criticizes Walz after Columbus statue toppled," June 12). But, given the significant amount of racist art that remains at the State Capitol, protesters and other interested Minnesotans still have the opportunity to use the legal method.

Some of the problematic images inside of Minnesota's Capitol are in the chambers where state lawmakers enact legislation. The mural "Discoverers and Civilizers Led to the Source of the Mississippi" is in the Senate chamber. People can read about its symbolism online, but its title alone is revealing. Today, murals can be safely removed from walls and taken to other locations.

Let's lawfully remove that one and the four "Civilization of the Northwest" murals that people see when they step into the rotunda. These murals feature a white young man who is identified as "the American Genius." He leaves home accompanied by Hope and Wisdom (Minerva) to eliminate "savagery," "cowardice," "sin," and "stupidity." Of course "sin" is represented by the figure of a woman. After conquering these entities, "the American Genius" heroically advances agriculture by pulling a rock out of the ground, then he gains control of the Four Winds using them to spread wheat, minerals and art all over Minnesota.

These images were intended to portray European colonization as a divine and heroic enterprise. They do not belong in the State Capitol where lawmakers see them regularly and the public encounters them when they visit. Let's safely remove them and take them off-site to the Minnesota History Museum.

Julie Risser, Edina

...

According to various media accounts, Walz had prior knowledge that the statue of Columbus was to be illegally removed by "protesters." He and Lt. Gov. Peggy Flanagan both took an oath of office to uphold the U.S. and Minnesota Constitutions. Whether they agree with the symbolism of the statue is irrelevant - the precedent they have now set is that any law they disagree with (in this case, the destruction of public property) they no longer have to enforce.

Flanagan stated she wanted all citizens to "feel welcome" at the State Capitol. How welcome does she think the average citizen will feel when they know that laws are no longer enforced there?

Craig Wurzinger, White Bear Township

...

The statue of Columbus pulled down in St. Paul this week was art. And the people who pulled it down chose a piece of art they didn't like and forcibly removed it. Art is a type of speech, and the way to engage with speech we don't like is with more speech. Anyone can petition for a piece of public art to be removed. Better yet, create your own sculpture or film or music. But it is illiberal and a dangerous precedent to deface, damage or destroy art that we don't agree with.

Catherine Walker, Minneapolis

...

Art isn't the reason the statue was put there, so it's not a reason to have kept it there.

John Kaplan, St. Paul

...

The argument for keeping statues of Confederate figures on display throughout the U.S. is that their presence relates history. The same argument is given for maintaining the names of military bases that honor disgraceful men. Given that understanding, why don't we see statues of Adolf Hitler, Benito Mussolini, Pol Pot, Idi Amin and other despots on display, so citizens can be fully informed historically?

Surely anyone with basic comprehension can appreciate that when Gen. Robert E. Lee took part in the Civil War, eager to divide our country in half so as to maintain the institution of slavery, he became a traitor to the Union. Our Union. And surely anyone of minimal sensitivity can understand why black people feel as appalled by Lee as decent humanity is outraged by Hitler.

Statues and place names are not provided to teach history; they are provided to honor the person they name. No amount of rationalizing changes truth.

Shawn O'Rourke Gilbert, Edina

READERS WRITE May we all be like Ari

We want to hear from you. Send us your thoughts here.

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

End of Document

St. Paul to dismiss some cases following Floyd's death

ARTICLE DCXXII. ST. PAUL TO DISMISS SOME CASES FOLLOWING FLOYD'S DEATH

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 330 wordsByline: EMMA NELSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Those cited for property damage and other offenses may be offered alternatives.Body

The St. Paul City Attorney's Office will dismiss cases against people who protested peacefully following George Floyd's killing by a Minneapolis police officer and will offer alternatives to traditional prosecution to others.

The office is reviewing nearly 100 cases, including 87 curfew violations, City Attorney Lyndsey Olson said Friday. While some cases involve other crimes, such as property damage, none are arsons, she said.

"The City Attorney's Office will make charging decisions on a case-by-case basis and proceed with traditional prosecution when deemed necessary," Olson said. "The approach to review and charging on these cases is not unique - rather, it's an example of our whole commitment to stewarding just outcomes in prosecution."

The office makes charging decisions for all cases on an individualized basis and has a restorative justice program for first-time, nonviolent offenders already in place.

The office may give those facing charges the opportunity to participate in the ETHOS program, which would involve talking to people in their neighborhood and developing a plan to remedy the harm caused, Olson said.

"One of the saddest parts of all of this is just how historically unsurprising George Floyd's murder is," Mayor Melvin Carter said as he stood alongside Olson at a City Hall news conference Friday afternoon.

"As my children have shared with me, it shouldn't be surprising to anyone that people have been as angry as they have been."

As he has throughout the aftermath of the protests that spread across the Twin Cities in recent weeks, Carter drew a distinction between "those voices of peaceful protest [that] have challenged and renewed our country's spirit in every single generation" and violence against people and property.

St. Paul to dismiss some cases following Floyd's death

"I fully support City Attorney Olson's planned approach and appreciate that critical distinction ... between those who sought to build a better future and those who tried to tear us down," he said.

Emma Nelson · 612-673-4509

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

End of Document

Biden's VP list narrows: Warren, Harris, Susan Rice, others

ARTICLE DCXXIII. BIDEN'S VP LIST NARROWS: WARREN, HARRIS, SUSAN RICE, OTHERS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 13, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 858 words

Byline: Associated Press

Highlight: WASHINGTON (AP) - Joe Biden's search for a running mate is entering a second round of vetting for a dwindling list of potential vice presidential nominees, with several black women in strong contention.

Body

By BILL BARROW and JULIE PACE

WASHINGTON (AP) - Joe Biden's search for a running mate is entering a second round of vetting for a dwindling list of potential vice presidential nominees, with several black women in strong contention.

Democrats with knowledge of the process said Biden's search committee has narrowed the choices to as few as six serious contenders after initial interviews. Among the group still in contention: Sens. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts and Kamala Harris of California, as well as Susan Rice, who served as President Barack Obama's national security adviser.

Those with knowledge declined to name other contenders and said the process remains somewhat fluid. Additional candidates may still be asked to submit to the extensive document review process now underway for some top contenders. Those familiar with Biden's search spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to publicly discuss the process.

The campaign dismissed the idea of a shortened list as early speculation. "Those who talk don't know and those who know don't talk," said Andrew Bates, a Biden spokesperson.

Biden, who has already said he will pick a woman as his running mate, is facing increased calls from Democrats to put a woman of color on the ticket - both because of the outsize role that black voters played in Biden's road to the nomination and because of the reckoning over racism and inequality roiling the nation following the death of George Floyd. The black Minneapolis man died after a white police officer pressed his knee on his neck for several minutes, an episode that was captured on video.

Terry McAuliffe, the former Virginia governor and former Democratic National Committee chairman, said that while Biden's choice was likely to be "all about personal chemistry," it would be "exciting for the party" to have a black woman on a major party presidential ticket for the first time.

Biden's VP list narrows: Warren, Harris, Susan Rice, others

The campaign's list includes several black women, including Harris and Rice. Advisers have also looked closely at Florida Rep. Val Demings and Atlanta Mayor Keisha Lance Bottoms, both of whom are black, and New Mexico Gov. Michelle Lujan Grisham, a Latina.

Biden's vetting committee had conversations with a larger group of women earlier this spring; those continuing on in the process have been asked to turn over financial records, past writings and other documentation. Biden has had various public and private interactions with many of the women his vetting committee has considered thus far, but has not yet had any formal one-on-one interviews expressly to discuss the No. 2 spot on the ticket. Those aren't expected for several weeks.

Rice, who worked closely with Biden during his time as vice president, has emerged as a favorite among some former Obama administration officials and is personally close to the former president. She has never held elected office but has extensive foreign policy experience, including as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. She's also been an outspoken critic of the Trump administration since leaving the White House and considered running for U.S. Senate in Maine.

Rice has long been a target of Republicans, including for statements she made after the deadly 2012 attacks on Americans in Benghazi, Libya. Republicans have also accused her of spying on Michael Flynn, Trump's first national security adviser, though records declassified by the Trump administration show no evidence of Rice improperly accessing any information.

Harris and Warren have been seen as top contenders for the No. 2 spot since ending their own presidential campaigns.

Warren and Biden have forged a surprising bond in recent months and talk regularly about the progressive policy ideas the Massachusetts senator put at the forefront of her campaign. Biden already has adopted her proposed bankruptcy law overhaul. And now, with the coronavirus pandemic and resulting economic slowdown elevating the nuts-and-bolts of governing, some Democrats see Warren's policy credentials as an asset to the ticket.

A Biden-Warren pairing would mean both Democrats on the ticket are white and in their 70s. Biden is 77, and Warren is 70.

Harris is the lone black contender who has won statewide office, notable experience given Biden's emphasis on wanting a partner "ready to be president." She and Biden have also demonstrated a comfortable manner with each other in online fundraisers. Harris is an expert voice in discussions of criminal justice, but some black progressives view her background as a prosecutor skeptically.

One contender whose standing does appear to have fallen is Minnesota Sen. Amy Klobuchar, who was a prosecutor years ago in the county that includes Minneapolis. During that period, more than two dozen people - mostly minorities - died during encounters with police.

While the people with knowledge of Biden's vetting process did not rule Klobuchar out, she is widely viewed among Democrats with close ties to the Biden campaign as less likely to be tapped given recent events.

Biden's VP list narrows: Warren, Harris, Susan Rice, others

Barrow reported from Atlanta. Associated Press writers Alexandra Jaffe and Will Weissert in Washington contributed to this report.

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

End of Document

CHIEF ATTENDS FLOYD MEMORIAL

ARTICLE DCXXIV. CHIEF ATTENDS FLOYD MEMORIAL

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 99 wordsBody

Leslie Redmond, president of the Minneapolis NAACP, praised Minneapolis Police Chief Medaria Arradondo as she spoke during a community memorial on Friday for George Floyd. After her address at the event, organized by the NAACP at Shiloh Temple International Ministries in north Minneapolis, Redmond embraced Arradondo, right. On Wednesday, the chief said at a news conference that "race is inextricably a part of the American policing system" and that "communities of color have paid the heaviest of costs, and that's with their lives."

Photos by ANTHONY SOUFFLÉ · anthony.souffle@startribune.comLoad-Date: June 15, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCXXV. CORONAVIRUS SATURDAY UPDATE: NINE MORE MINNESOTA DEATHS, 377 MORE INFECTIONS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 13, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 369 words

Byline: Christopher Magan

Highlight: Minnesota recorded nine more COVID-19 deaths Saturday, the lowest daily number of fatalities since May 18. The state Department of Health also reported 377 new coronavirus infections. The statewide total of laboratory confirmed cases is now at 30,172 and the death toll has reached 1,283. Those whose deaths were reported Saturday ranged in age from [...]

Body

Minnesota recorded nine more COVID-19 deaths Saturday, the lowest daily number of fatalities since May 18.

The state Department of Health also reported 377 new coronavirus infections. The statewide total of laboratory confirmed cases is now at 30,172 and the death toll has reached 1,283.

Those whose deaths were reported Saturday ranged in age from their 50s to their 90s. Four of the deaths were residents of long-term care.

The coronavirus has now been found in all but one of Minnesota's 87 counties. Cook County reported its first case Saturday, leaving Lake of the Woods as the only county not to have a laboratory-confirmed infection.

Minnesota's serious coronavirus cases and deaths from COVID-19 have been on the decline in recent days. So has the positivity rate of coronavirus tests reported each day.

Health officials are closely monitoring those statistics and other data as Minnesota continues to reopen businesses and allow for larger gatherings that were strictly limited early in the pandemic to slow the spread of infections.

Early data released Friday from about 1,300 tests of those who demonstrated after the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police showed just 1.4 percent of attendees caught COVID-19.

Anyone who attended the protests and other large community events is encouraged to get tested, regardless of symptoms. There are community testing sites in Minneapolis and St. Paul, but appointments have filled quickly and there are limited spots for walk-ins.

Coronavirus Saturday update: Nine more Minnesota deaths, 377 more infections

Minnesota has tested, on average, about 10,000 samples per day for almost a week. Saturday the results of 12,790 tests were reported and 407,992 patient samples have been screened since local testing began in March.

There are 390 patients hospitalized, as of Friday afternoon, and 191 of them in critical condition. There's also 25,620 people who have recovered enough they no longer need to be isolated. 3M, MIT working to create COVID-19 rapid diagnostic test Tuesday coronavirus update: 6 new MN deaths, 403 additional cases Minnesota among 4 states added to NY's coronavirus quarantine list California shuts bars, indoor dining and most gyms, churches Virus spread, not politics should guide schools, doctors say

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCXXVI. HOW WE TALK TO EACH OTHER NOW

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: INSPIRED; Pg. 3INLength: 903 wordsByline: GAIL ROSENBLUM; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Dave Ellis didn't have to step out of his house to learn his first searing lesson in racial injustice. When he was 7, his father died in his arms from complications of a stroke. The ambulance wouldn't cross to their side of town to save him. Ellis, 68, moved to the Twin Cities in 1974, where he worked for the Minnesota Department of Corrections and United Way before founding Dave Ellis Consulting, which promotes training and meaningful conversations around race, equity and childhood trauma. He heads to New Jersey later this month to become executive director for New Jersey's Office of Resilience. In this wrenching moment for our city, he encourages us to continue to have productive conversations.

Q: This now feels like a wholly inadequate opener, but how are you?

A: It's a fascinating question and one of the most powerful. I've been getting text messages and phone calls from around the world. It's kind of like Sept. 11. That was in the news for so long, brought up so many times. But this is the first time in my life when "angry black man" applies to me. I think I've been angry for a long time but this is the first time it's started to bubble out. Anger is not a bad thing as long as you use the anger constructively by trying to help people and by asking, "What are the next steps?" But overall, any day I wake up is a good day. I get to participate and try to do good in the world.

Q: An imperfect world, to be sure. You learned that at any early age.

A: My father's death had a dramatic impact on me. I grew up in southern Illinois, which is as much a part of the south as Mississippi or Alabama. I remember going home for my college's athletics Hall of Fame and I went into places where they still referred to me as "boy," with a smile on their face. I had my kids with me and some of my grandkids. I've never really raised my voice. I'd rather walk away. Some people see that as a weakness, but I see that as a strength. I didn't let someone force me into something, I'm still in control.

Q: Did your mother influence your decision to walk away?

A: Growing up, we didn't have "the talk." We had a conversation that went on my entire time being raised. My mother told me how I would or would not communicate with authority. My mom taught me in her very strict way that it was, "Yes, sir, yes, ma'am." To this day, I say that to people even younger than me. I don't want my decision to put me in a position of not knowing if I'll get to come home tonight.

Q: You moved here with wife Loretta, a Minnesota native, first living in the suburbs before moving to north Minneapolis to raise your five kids. Culture shock?

A: I remember the first time I did a diversity training here and I asked, "How many of you have taught your kids not to run?" No one raised a hand. They looked at me like, "What?" Privilege is about never having to think about something. Part of what I do for a living is try to help people see what trauma looks like in a life; being able to tell my story helps to make it not so secret.

Q: You're a big proponent of sharing stories to break down barriers.

A: The shortest distance between two people is a story. I have been in rooms with out-and-out racists and we've been able to hold a conversation because we found our commonalities. One man told me, "We actually agree on some things. We both want good schools and our neighborhoods not to be crime ridden. We differ on how we get there."

Q: What is a respectful question I might ask of someone, knowing full well my privilege?

A: It's a touchy subject but it doesn't have to be that deep. Something as simple as, "How are you?" It requires an open heart and an open mind and the ability to recognize that other people are not imitations of you. A quote attributed to Anais Nin says, "We don't see things as they are. We see them as we are." That's stuck with me for a long time.

Q: What has gone through your mind over the past few weeks?

A: When it actually comes, there's not a sigh of relief that you're right. People kept talking and talking over the years; the community has been promised multiple things and they never happened. This time, folks are saying - not just in Minneapolis or Minnesota or the U.S. - hear our human cry. When you watch what happened with Philando [Castile] and George Floyd ... with the advent of video and Facebook and cellphones, the world is a different place.

Q: Some elected officials propose disbanding the police force. How would that look to you?

A: I don't know what it would look like but I'd first ask, "What do you want for an outcome?" Protect and serve would be a good place to start. I want people, regardless of who you are and where you live, to feel like you're not being over-policed. When we train police officers and give them a gun, do we screen for trauma first? Once we get triggered, the rest of our brain goes offline. We go to base instinct. How do we make sure that law enforcement is absolutely prepared, which includes a lot of stuff around mental health and diversity training. You can't help anyone deal with their stuff until you've dealt with your own.

Q: What does real change look like?

A: I can go outside and meet people I can talk to. We've pulled back into our bunkers and COVID hasn't helped. We're not designed to be alone. We're designed to be in relationship. My hope is that we become a kinder society, a forgiving society. If I can forgive, I can begin to move forward.

End of Document

Huge demand for food giveaway at St. Paul's Allianz Field shows community's need

ARTICLE DCXXVII. HUGE DEMAND FOR FOOD GIVEAWAY AT ST. PAUL'S ALLIANZ FIELD SHOWS COMMUNITY'S NEED

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 13, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 755 words

Byline: Andy Greder

Highlight: Gridlock surrounded Allianz Field in St. Paul late Friday morning. Traffic backed up from Snelling Avenue onto Interstate 94 exit ramps and all the side streets surrounding Minnesota United's soccer stadium. With COVID-19, there was no Major League Soccer game to be played and rush-hour traffic has become a thing of the past. Some drivers [...]

Body

Gridlock surrounded Allianz Field in St. Paul late Friday morning. Traffic backed up from Snelling Avenue onto Interstate 94 exit ramps and all the side streets surrounding Minnesota United's soccer stadium.

With COVID-19, there was no Major League Soccer game to be played and rush-hour traffic has become a thing of the past. Some drivers caught up in the scene honked; others waited patiently.

The only explanation was the "Farmers' Market in a Box" drive being held on the north side of the stadium. No other issues were causing congestion on those roads at that time, a Minnesota Department of Transportation spokesman said.

The food-distribution efforts headed by Keystone Community Services and Second Harvest Heartland had an estimated 900 packages ready for families in need during the coronavirus pandemic. Each family received about 50 pounds of food.

The drive-up and walk-up event was set to start at 10 a.m. and end around noon. With cars lined up starting at 7 a.m., organizers opened a little early, but were forced to close down the queue by roughly 10:45 a.m. and everything was distributed soon after 11 a.m. Those left empty-handed were directed to Keystone's food shelf on University Avenue.

"I think it's clear that our community needs the food," said Mary McKeown, Keystone's president and CEO.

Minnesota's unemployment rate jumped to 8.1 percent in April, the highest seasonally adjusted rate in the state since 1983.

Huge demand for food giveaway at St. Paul's Allianz Field shows community's need

"People just don't have the income," McKeown said. "The disparity between what people are getting paid and what they need to live in an affordable home or in renting is just larger."

Minnesota United and Allianz Life hosted a produce giveaway during the team's inaugural season in its new stadium last year and were set to do it again this year.

Then the USDA started the Coronavirus Food Assistance Program (CFAP) to provide direct relief for farmers who had fewer restaurants open for their food deliveries. So, Keystone and Second Harvest rolled that program into this year's offering.

Families in need received produce, dairy and meat from farms in Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois and Colorado, McKeown said. Most the recipients at Friday's drive were from St. Paul.

Abdi Hassan of St. Paul waited in the walk-up line near 11 a.m.; he sought food for his wife and five children, ages 1 to 16. He said he remains employed as an HVAC mechanic, but his second jobs of landscaping, painting and remodeling have dried up with social distancing and he's struggling to pay the mortgage on his home.

"It's not enough," Hassan said. "The mortgage is $2,000 and utilities, and I only get $3,000 a month."

Hassan said he was thankful for the food he received and not having to make a choice between shelter and providing meals for his family.

Keystone saw a nearly 10 percent increase in demand for food from 2018 to 2019 and were anticipating another 10 percent increase into 2020, McKeown said. Now with the coronavirus, that jump is expected to be 30 to 40 percent. Most food-shelf recipients visit three times a year, she said.

"The important thing to remember, and what we talk about is with COVID-19, is it hit everybody," McKeown said. "It doesn't matter how prepared you are. All kinds of people didn't expect to lose their jobs."

The food-donation drive had been planned before the protests and riots over George Floyd's death hit the Midway neighborhood, further impacting a reeling community. Organizers waited until the unrest quieted before announcing the event earlier this week on social media.

While Allianz Field wasn't touched in the riots, the partially boarded-up McDonald's nearby had an "RIP, George" message written on the plywood. Foot Locker and Great Clips were torched and boarded up. The Jimmy John's had a few spray-painted messages covered up in more black paint, but one remained: "Love wins."

Loons head coach Adrian Heath recently visited the neighborhood to see the damage.

"It is an eye-opener, and a little bit of a shock when I got down there," Heath said. "... But I'm sure that we will rebuild because that is what we have to do. Everybody has to come together and rebuild that environment and make it a better place for everybody." Minnesota United steals 2-1 win over Kansas City in MLS is Back Tournament Minnesota United pursuing French center back Bakaye Dibassy Loons clear of COVID-19, but Sunday's opponent has a positive case John Shipley: So far, nothing enjoyable about rebooting pro sports Loons goalkeeper Tyler Miller opens up about mental health struggles

Huge demand for food giveaway at St. Paul's Allianz Field shows community's need

Graphic

Volunteers distribute boxes of food during a "Farmers Market In A Box" program at Allianz Field in St. Paul on Friday, June 12, 2020. (John Autey / Pioneer Press)

Cars line up as boxes of food are distributed during a "Farmers Market In A Box" program at Allianz Field in St. Paul on Friday, June 12, 2020. (John Autey / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCXXVIII.

LIVE MUSIC TO RETURN IN NEW FORMATS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 1043 wordsByline: JON BREAM; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Promoters get innovative with concert settings.Body

Live music is back. Kind of. Sort of. In new formats and configurations.

Even though Gov. Tim Walz's COVID-19 directives allow live music events to resume this week with reduced audiences, only three Twin Cities indoor music rooms have plans to reopen soon. However, some promoters are staging outdoor shows.

The most ambitious indoor setup will be at the Chanhassen Dinner Theatres with a twist - concerts that have traditionally played in the 236-seat Fireside Theater will be presented in the 575-seat main stage, with capacity limited to about 140 to comply with state guidelines and ensure social distancing.

"Working out the floor plan is the puzzle we're talking about now," CDT vice president Tamara Kangas Erickson said. "It's a really good room for live music."

With the musical "Music Man" on furlough because of the pandemic, Chanhassen concerts will run Tuesdays through Sundays, from July 10 through the end of August for now, Erickson said. The lineup will feature tributes to Frank Sinatra, Abba and classic soul music, among others.

Dinner will be optional. Masks will be required in the lobby. Tickets will go on sale later in June.

Because Aster Café in Minneapolis' St. Anthony Main is a restaurant with live music, it is able to have an audience of 50% capacity or 54 people, said owner Jeff Arundel. He plans to announce a schedule of Friday and Saturday evening performances next week.

Bunkers Music Bar and Grill plans to start serving food next week and live music after July 4. The North Loop mainstay is hoping the governor will loosen restrictions by then, booker James Klein said.

Live music to return in new formats

With live-music venues restricted to 25% capacity and a maximum of 250 people under current guidelines, promoters say those limited numbers are not economically feasible for reopening most indoor rooms.

"It would be difficult to do anything and not lose money," said general manager Nate Kranz, whose portfolio includes First Avenue, the Fine Line, Turf Club and the Palace and Fitzgerald theaters. "I don't see how it's financially viable for us to do this and maintain social distancing."

Ever-innovative Crooners Supper Club in Fridley has figured two ways of staging concerts during the pandemic. The club is reprising last year's Lakeside Cafe series, with room for 50 people under current guidelines in its fenced-in, tented patio. Connie Evingson will perform there Saturday.

On June 22, Crooners will transition from drive-in movie-style concerts in its parking lot to large tent shows for 200 people.

"We will start looking like a circus over here," music booker Andrew Walesch said, referring to his two tented stages. "Our drive-in series [started on June 1] has been wildly popular. Every show sells out. But it's going to fizzle out with the [warmer] weather. We have to be continually changing."

Crooners invested in a 100- by 40-foot tent that can accommodate 500 people when pandemic restrictions are removed. The staff will set up 80 to 90 tables for two, with a handful of single seats at a bar area. Dinner and cocktails will be available.

The lineup will feature nationally known singers Marilyn Maye and Ann Hampton Callaway as well as local performers including Martin Zellar's Neil Diamond tribute.

Masks will be required because the entrance to the tent is through Crooners Supper Club.

"It would be easier to close," Walesch said. "But closing is just not an option for Mary [Tjosvold, the owner]."

Other venues feel they don't have a viable option to present indoor concerts.

"We have no immediate plans to open inside," Dakota proprietor Lowell Pickett said. "It's not an easy answer. You want to make everyone safe - the performers, the staff and the patrons."

Among the other indoor live-music venues not reopening are Cedar Cultural Center, Amsterdam Bar, Mortimer's and the Orpheum, State and Pantages theaters.

First Avenue staff is using the down time, Kranz said, to do some deferred maintenance like painting dressing rooms and repairing the Turf Club, which suffered extensive water damage from sprinklers because of fires during the recent unrest following the death of George Floyd while in police custody.

Xcel Energy Center and Treasure Island Casino have no concerts slated until September. Target Center lists a Dan + Shay show rescheduled for Aug. 29 while Mystic Lake Casino has Dwight Yoakam for July 30, the only gig on his itinerary until September.

Walker Art Center has scrapped all live performances - indoors and out - for the summer. Minneapolis Park and Recreation Board has canceled all concerts in June and not booked anything yet for the popular Lake Harriet Band Shell.

"Nothing is scheduled for July as it would be next to impossible to cap the crowds at 250 people," said spokesperson Robin Smothers. "If things change and more people are allowed to gather, we will revisit."

Resourceful promoter/performer Mick Sterling, who produces more than two dozen tribute shows, is presenting The Relief Sessions, a Friday-night series of drive-in-style concerts in a Burnsville parking lot, starting June 26 with two shows, the Johnnie Brown Experience and the Jorgensens. There is room for 105 vehicles. Food trucks will be available but no alcohol. Concertgoers will be able to sit in lawn chairs.

"I'm grateful Burnsville is allowing this to happen," Sterling said. "We're finding a middle ground. It's not ideal. I performed at Crooners drive-in on Wednesday and it was great to do what we do again - for the audience and for the band members. It's a good comeback story. People like comeback stories."

Following a two-decade tradition, Tally's Dockside on White Bear Lake will host live music three nights a week, including Dee Miller on Saturday on an outdoor patio. Advance reservations and a minimum purchase are required.

While the Cabooze is exploring the possibilities of livestreaming shows with a small in-person audience in July, the Aster and Bunkers stand as the only clubs planning indoor concerts.

"Social distancing will be a self-discipline for the customers, Klein of Bunkers said. "We're not going to demand that people wear masks. It's going to be a work in progress. I don't think there's one simple answer."

Staff writer Chris Riemenschneider contributed to this report.

Twitter@Jon Bream · 612-673-1719

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

ARTICLE DCXXIX. MINNESOTA IS PREPARED FOR COVID-19'S SECOND ACT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1280 wordsByline: JEREMY OLSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Minnesota leaders said they are prepared for a resurgence of COVID-19 if the state follows the pattern of others where cases of the infectious disease increased after relaxation of social distancing and stay-at-home restrictions.

Compared with the start of the first wave, Minnesota now has more capacity to test for and track the novel coronavirus that causes COVID-19, along with more hospital beds and at least stable supplies of masks and gowns to protect doctors, nurses and other caregivers.

"There's no question in my mind but that we're better prepared," said Jan Malcolm, state health commissioner. "We also know a lot more about the virus than we did four months ago."

And it's not that the state is finished with the first wave. While the pandemic ebbed in June, the state on Friday reported 25 COVID-19 deaths - the highest daily total in the last week - along with 490 new cases.

Daily reports of COVID-19 deaths have tended to be higher on Fridays, but the latest tally increased the overall death toll to 1,274 and pushed the number of deaths involving long-term care residents above 1,000. The total of known cases is now 29,795 - though that includes 25,028 people who have recovered.

It's possible that a second wave could be worse, as was the case in the Spanish flu epidemic of 1918-1919, or could come as a double whammy in the fall with the start of influenza season.

About a dozen states including Arizona, Florida, Texas and Utah have seen recent case growth, with some growth in severe COVID-19 cases requiring hospitalization.

Risk of death or hospitalization is highest among the elderly - with 82% of Minnesota's deaths in people 70 or older - and among people with chronic health conditions such as asthma, diabetes and diseases of the lungs, heart, kidneys and immune system.

Minnesota is prepared for COVID-19's second act

Leaders with the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention on Friday said that they have investigators in states with upticks to determine the underlying reasons and to inform others in their long-term preparations.

"It's important that we remember this situation is unprecedented and that the pandemic has not ended," said Dr. Robert Redfield, the CDC director.

CDC officials cautioned that some states are only seeing an increase in cases - not hospitalizations - that could reflect more testing and identification of mild infections that were missed in the past.

Minnesota on Thursday reported 13,391 diagnostic tests - its second-highest daily tally so far.

Free testing took place this week at four sites in Minneapolis and St. Paul following protests over the May 25 death of George Floyd in police custody.

The state recommended testing for anyone involved in these mass demonstrations, regardless of whether they have respiratory symptoms that suggest COVID-19.

More than 3,200 tests were conducted at these sites this week. Results from the first 1,300 showed a positivity rate of 1.4%.

Testing has continued at long-term care facilities throughout Minnesota as well as part of a state strategy to reduce deaths in those facilities by quickly identifying and responding to outbreaks.

The state has orchestrated testing of nearly 36,000 residents or workers in 217 long-term care facilities that have had outbreaks.

Health officials believe that has slowed the growth of infections in long-term care facilities, which in Minnesota includes nursing homes, assisted-living and other group-living facilities.

The number of these facilities reporting outbreaks declined from 23 per day five weeks ago to five per day last week.

Hospitalizations of COVID-19 patients in Minnesota dropped slightly on Friday to 403 - including 191 needing intensive care.

Malcolm said it is encouraging that the ICU usage number has declined by 70 since late May, when some Twin Cities hospitals briefly ran out of these critical care beds and had to divert patients.

Leaders of Twin Cities hospitals reported stable levels of personal protective equipment such as masks to protect doctors, nurses and others treating COVID-19 patients - though the state lists large orders, including 2.4 million highly protective N95 masks, as overdue for delivery to the state stockpile.

Allina Health's preparations for COVID-19 were unexpectedly tested by the protests and riots following Floyd's death, which occurred near Abbott Northwestern Hospital in Minneapolis.

Patients in Abbott's mental health unit were transferred because of concerns about their anxiety levels with loud or even violent protests outside.

Births tripled to 41 within 48 hours at United Hospital in St. Paul, as expectant mothers switched there from Abbott.

Medical helicopters diverted to the Crystal airport because some protesters were reportedly using laser pointers that could potentially blind pilots landing atop Abbott.

Emergency staffing plans were enacted as many caregivers couldn't make scheduled shifts because of unrest near their homes or around the hospitals.

Preparations for COVID-19 aided in the response to that crisis, but the real-life experience also provided lessons that could help with the next surge of cases, said Lisa Shannon, Allina's chief operating officer.

"It really put our COVID readiness to the test," she said.

Health officials stressed that the best way to prevent hospitals from becoming overwhelmed is by having individuals maintain social distancing that reduces virus transmission.

A May CDC survey suggested that most people are still supportive of mask wearing and keeping 6 feet from others to reduce virus transmission, but it's likely that many are tiring, said Dr. Jay Butler, the CDC's COVID-19 response incident manager.

"We recognize that we're all getting tired of staying at home," he said. "People long for the lives that they had back in December."

Malcolm said she worries that Minnesotans will suffer from "mitigation fatigue" and stop complying with social distancing. Gov. Tim Walz mentioned fatigue along with economic concerns in his gradual scaling back of a statewide stay-at-home order, which ended May 18 after 51 days, and his allowance this week for limited reopenings of indoor restaurants, fitness clubs, movie theaters and other entertainment venues.

Minneapolis-based Medica surveyed more than 18,000 of its health plan members and found that nearly one-third ranked mental health as their top concern in the pandemic - with anxiety and depression being particular problems.

Prolonged isolation has been a growing problem for long-term care residents as well, and the state Health Department is exploring ways to protect them from infection but allow friends and relatives to visit - perhaps through windows or outdoors.

That separation "has been one of the most heartbreaking parts" of the pandemic, said Kris Ehresmann, state infectious disease director.

Sticking to social distancing will help everyone and allow more activities to resume, she said. "We all want to keep things moving in the direction of reopening. For that to happen, we need all Minnesotans to do their part ... The less people follow this guidance, the greater chance we will see more spread and have a harder time toward greater reopening."

Jeremy Olson · 612-673-7744

TRACKING CORONAVIRUS

Minnesota cases, daily change*

29,795 -- Total cases

490 -- June 12 new cases

Minnesota is prepared for COVID-19's second act

*Chart data is a net count of new confirmed cases minus previously announced cases that were removed by MDH on that date.

Minnesota deaths, new daily

1,274 -- Total deaths

25 -- June 12

U.S. cases, new daily

2,034,118 -- Total cases

23,157 -- June 11

U.S. deaths, new daily

113,974 -- Total deaths

877 -- June 11

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete charts.)

Sources: New York Times, Minnesota Dept. of Health

Note: U.S. data lags a day behind Minnesota

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

PICK SIX

ARTICLE DCXXX. PICK SIX

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 6ELength: 333 wordsByline: JON BREAM; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Pick Six is a half-dozen cool things in music, from two points of view.

Josh Jacobson of Minneapolis:

1 Bruce Springsteen, "From My House to Yours." His most recent SiriusXM DJ set was timely, political and powerful.

2 Dropkick Murphys, "Streaming Outta Fenway." The Boston band streamed live from the Fenway Park infield, joined briefly by Bruce Springsteen on the Jumbotron, raising money for Boston charities.

3 Ari Melber's "Fallback Friday." Bill Kristol and Fat Joe? Waka Flocka Flame and Russ Feingold? You never know what unlikely pairings you will see each Friday on MSNBC.

Jon Bream of the Star Tribune:

1 Dear Class of 2020, Beyoncé. In her inspiring speech to graduates, Queen Bey talked about not going to college herself, the influence of her parents, her own struggles to make it in the music industry as a black woman and the importance of hard work. Then she advised: "To the young women, our future leaders, know that you're about to make the world turn. I see you. You are everything the world needs. Make those power moves. Be excellent. And to the young kings, lean into your vulnerability and redefine masculinity. Lead with heart. There's so many different ways to be brilliant." Be authentically you, she urged.

2 Black country artists speak out about racism. In the aftermath of the George Floyd killing, Darius Rucker and Kane Brown took to social media to decry the racism they've experienced. Mickey Guyton wrote an essay in Billboard about racism in country music and dropped a new song, "Black Like Me." Sonically, it could fit seamlessly in country radio. You can feel the pain in her voice. But the song isn't about heartbreak from lost love. It's about being perceived as different. "If you think we live in the land of the free," she sings, "you should try to be black like me."

3 Archie Shepp and Raw Poetic, "Ocean Bridges." The veteran avant-garde jazz saxophonist and his rapper nephew bring two worlds together for some thoughtful, chill music, peaking on "Sugar Coat It."

PICK SIX

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCXXXI. STILLWATER SCHOOL BOARD OUSTS SUPERINTENDENT DENISE PONTRELLI

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1B

Length: 772 words

Byline: TIM HARLOW; ERIN ADLER; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: Pontrelli had led the east metro district since 2015.

Body

More than four years after Superintendent Denise Pontrelli made a controversial decision to close three elementary schools, the Stillwater School Board on Thursday approved a $300,000 separation agreement that ends her tenure at the end of the month.

"I acknowledge that this is a difficult transition, but I trust that our school district will rally together, support one another and continue to work on the important issues we face in our community," said Board Chairwoman Sarah Stivland, who voted for the agreement, in a statement.

The 5-2 vote to sever ties with Pontrelli, who was named superintendent in 2015, comes a year after the board unsuccessfully tried to remove her from the district's top job.

The agreement means that she will receive her $195,800 salary for 2020-21, $64,312 for the release of legal claims against the district, $29,165 of accrued unused vacation time, district health care and contributions to her annuity plan and health savings account.

Tension has been brewing in the east metro district since Pontrelli's decision to shutter the schools, which immediately put her at odds with some school board members and residents.

The closures were part of a district plan called BOLD (Building Opportunities to Learn and Discover) that aimed to accommodate enrollment growth in the southern part of the district.

"She's been punished for [that decision] ever since," said Board Member Jennifer Pelletier. "I think it's a single-issue board focused on trying to find some kind of retribution."

Another pressure point was a garage for school buses the district purchased in Lake Elmo. When the district failed to connect it to city utilities, the city took away the permit needed for its operation.

Stivland said the garage ultimately wasn't usable and cost the district $7 million. It's become "kind of a mess," she said, adding that the School Board has hired a lawyer to investigate the debacle.

Stillwater School Board ousts Superintendent Denise Pontrelli

Pelletier, who voted against the separation agreement, said the garage had become an excuse used by some board members to rationalize ousting Pontrelli.

Following the vote, taken during a meeting held online because of COVID-19 concerns, Stivland read a joint statement from the School Board and Pontrelli.

"After serving the Stillwater Area Schools for five years, Denise Pontrelli has agreed to a separation agreement with the Stillwater Area school board," the statement said. "Superintendent Pontrelli wishes to extend her gratitude to the students, staff and community for their partnership to create and improve learning systems for all. The district expresses its gratitude to her and to her leadership for the past five years."

Pontrelli declined to comment for this story.

The vote, Stivland said, indicated that separation was in the district's best interest. Board Member Shelley Pearson agreed but resigned at the end of the meeting.

A number of residents and teachers in the district of about 8,600 students recently had expressed support for Pontrelli, but the campaign wasn't enough to keep the School Board from agreeing to the separation.

Josiah Hill, an English teacher at Stillwater High School and head of the teachers union, told the board that Pontrelli had the backing of 81% of educators, something he said was unheard of.

"I'm deeply troubled that the board is looking to separate with our superintendent during turbulent times," Hill said, referring to the pandemic and the recent unrest following the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police.

He said that Pontrelli's leave-taking "will harm our students, district and community for years to come."

Pelletier said the closing of the three schools wasn't just about balancing enrollment numbers, but righting "incredible inequities" in the district. She praised Pontrelli's work on equity issues. "I believe our families of color trust her," she said.

But Kristie Mack, a district resident, said it was time for Pontrelli to go, citing the divide in the district created in the past few years.

Assistant Superintendent Robert McDowell recently left Stillwater to lead Hastings Public Schools, and Board Member Mark Burns said that letting Pontrelli go with McDowell gone and Finance Director Kristen Hoheisel on leave is "operationally irresponsible." The decision to cut ties with Pontrelli, he said, was "fiscally irresponsible."

The district will look for an interim superintendent right away and hire a search firm to find an "excellent leader" who will be a good fit, long term, for the district, Stivland said.

"I wish it could start tomorrow," she said.

tim.harlow@startribune.com 612-673-7768

erin.adler@startribune.com 612-673-1781

Stillwater School Board ousts Superintendent Denise Pontrelli

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

End of Document

STREETSCAPES

ARTICLE DCXXXII. STREETSCAPES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 13, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 795 wordsByline: THOMAS FISHER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Taking to the streets // How can we facilitate a wider range of uses for our roadways?Body

Special to the Star Tribune

The COVID-19 pandemic and the death of George Floyd have brought people out onto the street as never before, showing how much our roadways are no longer just corridors devoted to moving vehicles, bikes and pedestrians as fast and efficiently as possible.

Streets have become the places where we increasingly pursue our personal, public and even our political lives, and we could use some new ways of talking about them. We also could use new names for them that more accurately describe how we have come to use them.

Here are a few suggestions from an urban design perspective:

As an honoring space

The intersection of S. Chicago Avenue and 38th Street in Minneapolis has become a safe space for diverse communities to come together to honor the place where the Floyd tragedy unfolded at the hands of police. It will likely become a place of pilgrimage for those who want to see where the interna tional movement for police reform all began, where the death heard 'round the world occurred.

We need to see that intersection as a sacred space and a people-friendly place that either prohibits vehicles or at least has design features - like pavers, planters and speed bumps - that slow traffic to a respectful crawl. It also should retain its community character and continue to accommodate the street art, impromptu memorials and difficult conversations.

As First Amendment space

A different but equally important use of a street happens in front of the Minnesota governor's residence on Summit Avenue in St. Paul. During the pandemic and now, in the wake of Floyd's death, we have seen thousands of people gather in and along that street, sometimes blocking traffic or using vehicles to send a political message.

STREETSCAPES

That section of street will likely continue to be a place where people engage in their First Amendment right to free speech and to peaceably assemble. We should recognize the special nature of that place. We should also put in place traffic-calming measures and more provisions for those expressing their political opinions, like wider sidewalks, accessible seating and more shade.

As a 'commoning' space

While few streets have such distinctive roles to play in our public life, every street has the possibility of becoming more than just a pass-through.

As Minnesota's Jay Walljasper has written, we are gradually moving toward a "commons-based society," where "the competition that characterizes life today would be balanced with new attitudes and social structures that foster cooperation."

We've already seen streets of all kinds begin to play that commons role. Some parkways already have been closed to vehicles to give pedestrians more space to social distance, curbs along protest routes have become places to hand out water and snacks, and sidewalks along Lake Street in Minneapolis and University Avenue in St. Paul have become spaces where volunteers have worked with the cities and business owners to clean up after the riots.

We might find ways to honor such "commoning" places, perhaps with plaques that tell the story of what happened here and recognize volunteer participants.

As a shared space

As we have been outdoors more - whether for political or pandemic reasons - we face the challenge of sharing public space, while social distancing. Many people have risen to the challenge, increasingly using streets that have few cars these days as places to walk and jog, particularly in more congested parts of the cities and suburbs where remaining 6 feet apart has become a problem.

This has turned some side streets into shared streets, where people, and often their pets, perambulate along pavement where cars once had sole prerogative. And we might use streets for more than just walking. The Dutch have woonerfs, or "living streets," that are curb-less streets that pedestrians and cars share that can also accommodate play spaces for children and dining spaces for friends and neighbors.

We all share in funding the maintenance and repair of our streets through our tax dollars. But the pandemic and the protests have shown how streets might play many more roles than what they have in the past. Imagining what those uses might be is something we also can share in.

We map what we care about, and maybe the time has come to design new kinds of maps of our streets. Such maps would show not only the names and locations of roadways, but also what meaning different streets have for different people, what communities these streets accommodate, what events they embody, and what stories they tell.

Such maps might be helpful especially in times like these, when we are all trying to find our way.

STREETSCAPES

Thomas Fisher is the director of the Minnesota Design Center at the University of Minnesota and a professor in its School of Architecture.

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

End of Document

Tear gas used to disperse rowdy crowd that refused to leave Anoka County park beach

ARTICLE DCXXXIII. TEAR GAS USED TO DISPERSE ROWDY CROWD THAT REFUSED TO LEAVE ANOKA COUNTY PARK BEACH

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 13, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 250 words

Byline: Deanna Weniger

Highlight: Anoka County sheriff's deputies used tear gas to disperse a rowdy crowd of 200 that gathered Friday at a park in Oak Grove. Deputies arrived at Lake George Regional Park at about 4 p.m. after receiving calls about a group of up to 300 people in the beach area who were becoming unruly. The beach [...]

Body

Anoka County sheriff's deputies used tear gas to disperse a rowdy crowd of 200 that gathered Friday at a park in Oak Grove.

Deputies arrived at Lake George Regional Park at about 4 p.m. after receiving calls about a group of up to 300 people in the beach area who were becoming unruly.

The beach had been closed earlier in the week due to similar issues.

Police noted there was a DJ on site and that multiple fights were breaking out in the crowd.

The deputies requested backup and, using a PA system, told the crowd to leave and that the park was closed.

Several told the deputies they would not leave and some began climbing to the roof of a bathroom building in the park. Police had reports of a man with a gun in the crowd.

To disperse the crowd, police deployed a smoke canister. Some left but others remained, so police used tear gas and the crowd left the park.

Medical personnel were on hand to tend to anyone with injuries, but only one sought help and was treated at the scene.

As of late Friday night, no one was in custody.

Lake George Park will be closed through the weekend.

Man accused of fatally shooting pregnant woman in Minneapolis arrested Carver County Sheriff's deputy shoots, kills suspect in Mendota Bridge standoff Four pro bono attorneys join Keith Ellison's

Tear gas used to disperse rowdy crowd that refused to leave Anoka County park beach

prosecution team in George Floyd case Police release video from mistaken identity arrest; Black driver says he feared for life National legal experts review 16-year-old's life sentence in Minneapolis murder of girl, 11

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCXXXIV.

THE LATEST: CLEMSON FOOTBALL PLAYERS LEAD MARCH ON CAMPUS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 14, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1993 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: TOP OF THE HOUR:

Body

By The Associated Press

TOP OF THE HOUR:

- Members of Clemson football team lead demonstration on campus.
- Bust of slave owner torn down, thrown in river in New Orleans.
- Protesters gather at Lee monument in Virginia's capital.
- Authorities investigating death of black man found hanging from tree in California.
-

CLEMSON, S.C. - Members of the Clemson University football team led hundreds of demonstrators on the school's campus Saturday as they marched for equality and against police brutality.

The demonstration included a moment of silence for 8 minutes and 46 seconds, the length of time prosecutors say George Floyd, a 46-year-old black man, was pinned to the ground with his neck under a white Minneapolis police officer's knee before he died last month.

"This is a historic time, and a challenging time," head football coach Dabo Swinney told the crowd. "But as I tell my team all the time, challenge is what creates change. ... Black lives more than matter - black lives significantly matter and equally matter. For far too long that has not been the case for the black community."

The protest was organized by quarterback Trevor Lawrence, linebacker Mike Jones Jr., wide receiver Cornell Powell and running back Darien Rencher, according to news outlets.

The march came a day after Clemson trustees voted to rename its honors college, stripping from the program the name of former vice president and slavery proponent John C. Calhoun.

The Latest: Clemson football players lead march on campus

Calhoun, who was born in South Carolina, declared slavery a "positive good" on the U.S. Senate floor in 1837.

Before the administrators' vote, an online petition by students calling for the name to be changed drew more than 20,000 signatures. Clemson football alumni and one-time Houston Texans teammates DeAndre Hopkins and Deshaun Watson voiced support for the petition on social media.

-

NEW ORLEANS - Protesters tore down a bust of a slave owner who left part of his fortune to New Orleans' schools, and then they took the remains to the Mississippi River and rolled it down the banks into the water.

The destruction Saturday is part of a nationwide effort to remove monuments to the Confederacy or with links to slavery as the country grapples with widespread protests against police brutality toward African Americans.

Police said in a statement Saturday that demonstrators at Duncan Plaza, which is directly across the street from City Hall, dragged the bust into the streets, loaded it onto trucks and took it to the Mississippi River where they threw it in. Two people who were driving the trucks transporting the bust were apprehended by police and taken to police headquarters, authorities said. Their names were not given in the statement.

The police did not identify the bust, but local media identified it as one depicting John McDonogh. When he died, McDonogh left a large portion of his money to New Orleans and Baltimore for schools, and many schools in New Orleans are named after him.

Video on social media showed dozens surrounding the bust, which sat on a pedestal while some people pulled on a rope tied to the bust and another hit it. As the bust tilts and then crashes to the ground the crowd cheers. Another video posted on social media shows a crowd watching as the bust is rolled down the rocky banks of the Mississippi River and into the water.

Mayor LaToya Cantrell said in a tweet that the city "rejects vandalism and destruction of City property. It is unlawful."

-

RICHMOND, Va. - Thousands gathered in Virginia's capital on Saturday for a demonstration against racism known as the "5,000 Man March."

The protest in Richmond included a speech by a cousin of George Floyd, the black man whose death at the hands of police has prompted weeks of protests around the world.

The demonstrators gathered at the city's famed monument of Confederate Gen. Robert E. Lee before making a loop around the downtown. They returned to the monument about two hours later to hear speakers, including a relative of Floyd, the man who died last month after a Minneapolis police officer knelt on his neck for several minutes as he pleaded for air.

Tavares Floyd, George Floyd's cousin, stepped onto the Lee monument and was welcomed by applause from the surrounding crowd of demonstrators in the former capital of the Confederacy.

The Latest: Clemson football players lead march on campus

WRIC-TV reports that Floyd spoke about many different racial inequalities that the black community faces in Virginia and throughout the nation.

The Lee statue, erected in 1890, has become a focal point of protests in Richmond since Floyd's death. After years of calls by activists to remove Confederate statues in Virginia, Democratic Gov. Ralph Northam has pledged to take down the Lee statue, while Richmond Mayor Levar Stoney, also a Democrat, has vowed to remove other Confederate statues on the same street.

PALMDALE, Calif. - Authorities in the Southern California city of Palmdale are investigating the death of a 24-year-old black man found hanging from a tree, which they originally described as an apparent suicide, prompting outrage in the community.

More than 100,000 people signed an online petition demanding a full investigation and community members confronted city officials on Friday. Los Angeles County coroner's officials said a decision on the cause of Robert Fuller's death is deferred pending an investigation.

Fuller's death has brought to light the death of another black man found hanging from a tree on May 31 in Victorville, a desert city 45 miles (72 kilometers) east of Palmdale. A sheriff's spokeswoman, Jodi Miller, told Victor Valley News foul play was not suspected in Malcolm Harsch's death, but the man's family said they were concerned it will be ruled a suicide to avoid further attention.

PARIS - France's highest administrative court ruled Saturday night that virus concerns no longer justify banning public protests.

In a country that sees thousands of protests annually, the decision by the Council of State allows for the resumption of demonstrations and marches as long as health protections are respected, and events are declared in advance to local authorities and not deemed a risk to public order.

The Council ruled that "the ban on protesting is not justified by the current health situation." It said the right to protest is a "fundamental freedom."

The ruling came just as an unauthorized protest against police violence and racial injustice wound down in Paris. Police had stopped the at least 15,000 protesters from a planned march through the city Saturday, citing the virus-related restrictions on any gathering of more than 10 people. France has seen several unauthorized protests in the wake of George Floyd's death in the U.S.

PARIS - Police fired tear gas and blocked demonstrators from marching through Paris to protest police brutality and racial injustice.

The tear gas began just as a group of extreme-right counter demonstrators were dislodged from the roof of a building overlooking the protest.

The Latest: Clemson football players lead march on campus

Protesters set off firecrackers and shouted at police but were otherwise peaceful. Families and others trying to leave the protest struggled to get out because police had blocked off most exit routes. The remaining crowd took a knee.

Police decided to bar the crowd from marching from the Place de la Republique in eastern Paris toward the city's main opera house. A police official told The Associated Press the decision was made because of a nationwide ban on gatherings of more than 10 people to prevent the spread of the coronavirus.

The counter demonstrators had earlier unfurled a banner about "anti-white racism" and lit flares in the blue-white-red colors of the French flag.

Residents reached out their windows to tear down the banner. Activists later confronted the far-right activists on the roof, throwing their bags and ropes to the pavement below.

PRAGUE - Hundreds rallied in Prague for the second straight Saturday in support of the protests in the United States against police violence and racism.

In a noisy but peaceful rally amid occasional showers, the protesters were marching through the Little Quarter district of the Czech capital, chanting "Black Lives Matter," "No Justice No Peace" and "No Trump, No KKK, No fascist U.S.A."

Many protesters condemned all forms of racism in the U.S., the Czech Republic and elsewhere.

They displayed banners that read "Together Against Racism," "Stop Police Violence" and "All Lives Don't Matter Until Black Lives Matter."

The rally was organized by an informal group of Americans living in Prague, along with several Czech groups. At the end, they observed a minute of silence in front of the U.S. Embassy.

PARIS - Thousands gathered in Paris to denounce police brutality and discrimination.

Shouts rose from the largely black crowd as a group of white extreme-right activists climbed a building and unfurled a huge banner denouncing "anti-white racism." Others tried to tear it down.

Police surrounded the area, bracing for potential violence. There's been scattered clashes at largely peaceful demonstrations around France, inspired by Black Lives Matter and global protests in the wake of George Floyd's death.

The march in Paris was led by supporters of Adama Traore, a 24-year-old French black man who died in 2016. Traore didn't have his identity card on him and reportedly ran as the police approached.

A huge portrait showed a face of half Traore, half Floyd. Traore's sister Assa told the crowd, "We are all demanding the same thing - fair justice for everyone." She says her brother was also handcuffed and held down by police before he died.

A final report released last month cleared three officers of wrongdoing, triggering renewed protests. This week, the government banned chokeholds in France.

PARIS - Police have ordered the closure of newly reopened restaurants and shops along the route of a march in Paris against police brutality and racism, fearing possible violence.

The march between the Place de la Republique in eastern Paris and the city's main opera house is expected to be the biggest of several demonstrations Saturday inspired by the Black Lives Matter movement in the U.S.

The Paris police chief ordered merchants and city officials to clear sidewalks along the route of anything that could be set on fire or used by troublemakers against police. Any gatherings of more than 10 people remain banned in France because of virus containment measures.

The Paris march was organized by supporters of Adama Traore, a French black man who died in police custody in 2016 in circumstances that remain unclear despite four years of back-and-forth autopsies. They're demanding "justice for Adama and all victims of police."

France has seen several similar demonstrations in the wake of George Floyd's death in the U.S. They've been overwhelmingly peaceful, though some have seen scattered clashes between police and protesters.

Protests are also expected Saturday in Marseille, Lyon and other French cities.

LONDON - British police have imposed strict restrictions on groups planning to protest in London Saturday in a bid to avoid violent clashes.

Protesters from the Black Lives Matter movement, as well as far-right groups, have said they plan to gather for demonstrations in central London.

Mayor Sadiq Khan warned that statues in the capital - in particular a statue of Winston Churchill in Parliament Square - could become flash points for violence. He said officials have intelligence that extreme far-right activists want to gather in London "ostensibly, they say, to protect the statues."

Commander Bas Javid urged people not to gather in large groups at all because of the coronavirus. But if they must, he said activists have to stick to the planned route and be off the streets by 5 p.m.

He said that while protesters last weekend were largely peaceful, a minority was "intent on disorder" that resulted in assaults on police and violent behavior.

Dozens were arrested last weekend and a police horse was pictured bolting past the crowds amid the chaos.

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

ARTICLE DCXXXV. READERS WRITE LET'S BE CLEAR ABOUT THE INTENT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 14ALength: 1210 wordsBody

CHANGES IN PUBLIC SAFETY

In an effort to clear a couple of playing fields so our city and state can move forward in peace, trust and mutual desire to walk together in achieving the common good we all seek:

The Minneapolis Police Department, such as it is, is going to change, we know this, and it is something most citizens agree upon.

Seems semantics are making it difficult to understand how each of us wants those changes to develop. Might the words "dismantle, defund, abolish, reconstruct and reform," mean the same to all? Are they meant to mean the same? Close? If not, then perhaps these words used loosely and together are the reason for all the emotion evoked around them. Some clarity might serve to stop the madness and allow all to come together to make this model change of the Minneapolis Police Department's role in our city.

Next playing field for clearing:

I have seen articles, publications and comments from all sources of news media, all over our state and country, making reference to the organization that a week ago asked Mayor Jacob Frey for a "yes or no answer" on his plans for changing the Minneapolis Police Department as being the Black Lives Matter movement.

It was not Black Lives Matter, it was the Black Visions Collective.

In fairness to each, I think it is important to make this distinction and get it right.

Patricia Hoy, Minneapolis

...

There's a lot of naive idealism swirling around police reform, including responding to 911 domestic violence calls with unarmed social workers. Such calls are considered high-risk by responding police officers, as weapons often are in possession by offenders in acute high anger/intoxicated states of mind. Such calls have higher rate of police being wounded/killed than other calls.

Disarming police in a society that won't ban guns for the general public is absurd. Sending unarmed responders to calls where anything can happen is absurd and irresponsible. How many social workers are going to be on call all night, on weekends, willing to get out of bed at 3 a.m. during a snowstorm in January to go bust up a domestic call, be it in Edina or north Minneapolis? How many social workers are willing to get police training, just as police training should now include social work?

Folk wisdom, evolved over time from hard-learned experience, brings to mind the old saying, "Don't throw the baby out with the bathwater." The water may be murky, but there's a baby there somewhere in need of saving. We have a police force that needs help. All police in Minneapolis force should be interviewed for valuable input that could improve peacekeeping in this city for all citizens. Changes should be implemented with the help of our police men and women.

Denise Saupe, Minneapolis

. . .

Are the good people of Minneapolis going to stand by and let the loonies take over? I have voted liberal my entire life, and am deeply concerned about a small, very vocal group of extremists trying to hijack the Democratic Party. They seem to have the ability to infect the DFL just as the Tea Party movement ruined the Republican Party.

We need calm, measured voices in a crisis. It's obvious we need change; however, it makes no sense to dismantle the Police Department without having a logical plan in place. Minneapolis city property taxes are very high, and we, the people who pay for the privilege of living in a great city, have reasonable expectations of safety and security.

The City Council should be replaced. Council members' priorities are pathetic - people were getting killed, the police were out of control and the cost of housing was skyrocketing, and they were fixated on more bike lanes, plastic bags and condos for millionaires.

We need mature leadership. Just because your parents and teachers told you that you were brilliant and empowered and you all got a trophy doesn't mean that you are in any way qualified to speak for the majority of city dwellers. It's time for rational liberals to speak up and vote them out.

Linda Benzinger, Minneapolis

. . .

To the citizens:

You need a police force, but you can't abide this police force. The city doesn't need more police, they need better police. Here's how to get them.

First, you have to cull your department of all the known bad actors. You can do that by firing them, but that's difficult to accomplish and leads to years of litigation. You could close the department and then hire back only those you want. Businesses do this; that's what happened in the mid-1980s between Hormel and the P-9 union. But the easiest route is to offer buyouts to those officers you don't want. Encourage them to take it. This will be less costly over time than the couple of million bucks you've paid out in the last few years to settle claims against your department.

Second, you have to stop hiring ex-military police and people with two-year degrees in criminal justice. That's what you've got now, and look what it's gotten you. You need to start recruiting and hiring people with four-year degrees in humanities. English, history, psychology and sociology would be good choices. You want officers who see the human in humanity. Expect to offer better salaries in order to get these folks.

Third, you really need better training, and then more training, and then more training after that. Officers need training in de-escalation, empathy, and recognizing mental or emotional stress. An agitated woman with a knife in her apartment does not need to die in a hail of police bullets. A man sitting in his car does not need to die with an officer's knee on his neck. Ask any competent human resource development manager, and they'll tell you pre-test, training, post-test. Repeat. Repeat again.

The MPD is the problem. The solution is better candidates, better pay, better training.

Michael Alwin, Woodbury

The writer is a former Minneapolis resident.

THE DEREK CHAUVIN CASE

Concern for fair trials should have been present all along

I have watched the discussion around now-former Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin's arrest and forthcoming trial in connection with the death of George Floyd with both interest and bafflement. Many have written into this paper about their concern that he receive a fair trial. I don't disagree. But I do have questions about what a fair trial means, and why we as white Minnesotans are so concerned that Chauvin receives one. Where has this concern been for all of the people of color who have entered the criminal justice system?

Communities of color are wildly overrepresented in our state's incarcerated population. Our entire judicial system works against minority communities, especially black people. White people are conditioned from day one to see black people - especially black men and boys - as "thugs," or as predisposed to criminal behavior. How can any black person ever receive a fair trial if that is the water we drink as a state and as a nation?

So, yes, Chauvin deserves a fair trial. But so do all Minnesotans who are awaiting trial. And so did all the Minnesotans currently incarcerated. Concern about Chauvin without concern about all the other Minnesotans who haven't or will not receive fair trials isn't about fairness at all. It's about upholding white supremacy. Black lives matter.

Madeline Hart-Andersen, Minneapolis

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

ARTICLE DCXXXVI.

EMOTIONS RUN HIGH AT DOWNTOWN PROTESTS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 8ALength: 690 wordsByline: KATY READ; JAMES WALSH; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

An early afternoon gathering filled with tears and anger morphed into a second Saturday protest featuring optimism and a call to action.

Diverse crowds of several hundred people each gathered in downtown Minneapolis for two back-to-back protests calling for an end to police brutality and racism.

The first, the International Solidarity Day of Protest Against Police Terror, was organized by Black Lives Matter and other groups. It began at 1 p.m. outside the Hennepin County Government Center, with participants later marching to the barricaded First Precinct police headquarters at 19 N. 4th St. to denounce police in speeches and chants.

The second, on the plaza between U.S. Bank Stadium and the nearby light-rail station, sought to inspire the crowd to take action every day to stamp out inequity. Organizers promised fireworks and food trucks at the end of a march expected to wind down sometime after 9 p.m.

Protests have become daily occurrences in the Twin Cities, as well as nationwide and even globally, since George Floyd's May 25 death under the knee of Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin, captured on video by a bystander.

At the first event, a peaceful, racially diverse crowd of 400 to 500 people, most of them young and most wearing masks, listened to speakers and chanted. Homemade signs carried now-familiar pleas - "No justice, no peace" and "I can't breathe," along with messages such as "Free-ish since 1865" and "Think about how many weren't filmed."

"I'm a young black girl born into a system in this world that is ... " said speaker Hayat Kabeto of St. Paul, her voice breaking with emotion.

"We got your back!" the crowd chanted.

"... that is nothing but built against me," Kabeto said after a pause to gain her composure.

Emotions run high at downtown protests

In school, she said, she was taught "I could be whatever I wanted - as long as the white man agreed."

Speaker D.J. Hooker of Minneapolis, who was wearing a Spiderman suit, said he believes that systemic change must come from the local citizenry.

"All change starts at the local level," he said.

The community most affected by police violence should control the plan to change the way public safety is handled, Hooker said.

Replacing some police with social workers, which some have suggested, wouldn't necessarily end systemic racism, he said.

"Social workers also discriminate," he said. "They're another tool the system uses against people of color. ... Cops without guns, right?"

Touissant Morrison of Minneapolis told the crowd that his city "is one of the most racist in the country." Racists in the South may wave Confederate flags, he said, but Minnesotans "have to look in their pockets, because there might be a Confederate flag in there."

As a professional working in schools mediating disputes between students and teachers, Morrison said, he has seen students of color disciplined or labeled with behavioral disorders "because they talked back to their teacher."

"Your rage is not a disorder," he told the crowd. "It's justified."

Outside the First Precinct, emotions intensified, but the crowd stayed peaceful.

In front of the concrete barriers outside the headquarters, they shouted their opposition to police tactics and called for the immediate firing of Minneapolis Police Federation president Bob Kroll.

At 4 p.m. near U.S. Bank Stadium, an event sponsored by the 10K Foundation also drew several hundred people.

Organizer Tyo Daniel was encouraged by the enthusiastic and multiracial crowd.

"I'm getting hope from this crowd. People are coming together and they understand that, you know, the hype is over, but they still want to make sure that we're being heard and that their voices are heard," he said.

He also urged the crowd to do more than protest.

"What they can do is to educate themselves, and use their voice, use their network, use their talents and their abilities and do something," Daniel said. "Doing nothing is the problem. So many people are doing nothing."

Like the earlier protesters, the second marched through downtown streets on the mild spring night, many singing songs with themes of freedom.

katy.read@startribune.com

612-673-4583

Emotions run high at downtown protests

james.walsh@startribune.com

612-673-7428

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

End of Document

'I am a black woman before I am anything else.' A Ramsey County sheriff's commander on George Floyd, law enforcement's future.

ARTICLE DCXXXVII. 'I AM A BLACK WOMAN BEFORE I AM ANYTHING ELSE.' A RAMSEY COUNTY SHERIFF'S COMMANDER ON GEORGE FLOYD, LAW ENFORCEMENT'S FUTURE.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 14, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 2005 words

Byline: Sarah Horner

Highlight: When Ramsey County Sheriff's Office Commander Suwana Kirkland showed up for a doctors' appointment last week, the black law enforcement officer and mother of five sat down next to a black family in the lobby. Noticing her uniform and amid the emotional aftermath of George Floyd's death while in custody of Minneapolis police, the family [...]

Body

When Ramsey County Sheriff's Office Commander Suwana Kirkland showed up for a doctors' appointment last week, the black law enforcement officer and mother of five sat down next to a black family in the lobby.

Noticing her uniform and amid the emotional aftermath of George Floyd's death while in custody of Minneapolis police, the family got up and moved away from her, she said, choking back tears as she recounted the experience.

Kirkland, who is also the president of the National Black Police Association of Minnesota, finds herself in an increasingly challenging position these days, pulled between her experiences and identity as a woman of color and her role as an officer in law enforcement.

"I get it. I am a black woman before I am anything else," she said.

At a time when conversations about police brutality against people of color, racial inequality and a history of failed law enforcement reforms are taking place across the country, Kirkland took part in an interview with the Pioneer Press about Floyd's death, the national movement it's incited, and what she thinks it will finally take for law enforcement to change.

The following interview has been edited for length and clarity.

What was it like for you to watch the video of what happened to George Floyd?

It was gut-wrenching. I was totally disgusted. I was ashamed of what I was viewing and what I was looking at and I just kept shaking my head thinking, "How could this be happening, again."

'I am a black woman before I am anything else.' A Ramsey County sheriff's commander on George Floyd, law enforcement's future.

How is this happening again?

You know, I'm at a loss for words because I know there is a core group of law enforcement officers, especially in the state of Minnesota, who work tirelessly day in and day out and on our days off to do the best we can to continue to help the community and law enforcement heal. To help the community and law enforcement have peace. I am proud of what I do. I am proud to be a law enforcement officer, but you know, at some point there is a group of us that are asking ourselves why continue to work so hard whenever all it takes is one critical incident, one incident of police brutality, or one incident of police mistrust or violating of civil rights and we are back where we started.

You say, "all it takes is one incident," but I would imagine you agree that a large part of the frustration is that it's been more than just one incident.

It has been more than one incident, and it has been more than one life lost, and it has been more than one court trial or one conviction, or no conviction. This is happening over and over and over again and primarily in the black and brown community, and there has to be an institutional and systemic change in law enforcement. It is not good enough for us to just say that we are against these actions. This is not what we train and teach officers. There has to be more done to make sure that this does not keep happening. And it's not just a problem in Minnesota. This is institutional, the behavior, the police culture, the not wanting to tell on your officer or stand up for what you believe is right. We have been plagued with it.

You've said police culture needs to change. How would you define police culture?

I am saddened that I cannot proudly say that this is a noble profession. That this is a profession that does good for the community, that helps a lot of police officers care for their families. We keep working to change the narrative, but incident after incident, death after death, murder after murder leave a lot of us asking, "Where do we go from here? What do we change first? Where do we begin to pick up the pieces?" And all of us are being blanketed and painted with that same brush, and it hurts.

I was just at an appointment this morning and went to go sit down next to a black family because there was nowhere else to sit and they got up and they moved away. So it has been gut-wrenching because I have given the last 14 years of my life to this profession that I love, because I have always done what I felt was right, as do thousands of other law enforcement officers.

We are in difficult times right now, and it's really difficult for black and brown officers because we not only have it in our agencies but when we go home at the end of the day to our families, when we are trying to explain, "You know what I'm about, you know who I am. I am not that officer. I am not that person. I would never do things like that to community members whom I love."

I can tell you that there are a lot of officers here in this state who feel exactly the same way. We are searching for answers and trying to figure out what more can we do to make sure other officers like Derek Chauvin never work in this profession again.

How do you do that?

I have been in communication with some other law enforcement leaders and we are talking about making a national tracking system. If we have the ability to track sexual offenders, violent offenders, sex traffickers, why can't we track officers in this country who have been let go of an agency for one reason or another and to make sure that they never work in any other state?

'I am a black woman before I am anything else.' A Ramsey County sheriff's commander on George Floyd, law enforcement's future.

I am sure you are aware that some of the conversation, particularly in Minneapolis, is heavily focused on defunding or abolishing the police department as we know it. What do you think about that option?

I don't agree with that. We as law enforcement officers on the front end are given extensive training to become better skilled officers in firearms or defensive tactics or things like that, so why can't we devote the same time to community relations, community outreach, to cultural competency? So I don't believe that defunding or dismantling a law enforcement agency is the answer. The answer is reallocating some of our resources to where they should be.

What do you say to the community members who say we've tried reforms and they aren't working?

There are thousands of police officers in this state that want those officers that have no business wearing a gun, a badge, a uniform to be held accountable. But to blanket us, or to paint us all with that same brush, to me, it's not what is going to make this better. I would ask and beg you to give us law enforcement officers a chance. Just give us a chance to fix things.

What would you say to people of color who live in some of our neighborhoods who say, "I don't want to call police when something goes wrong because I don't believe they are going to show up to help or protect me"?

I would say to those community members to remember all the good that we do around Christmas time for families, around Thanksgiving time for families, around events where there are natural disasters where law enforcement is called upon. I would ask community members to still see the good in law enforcement and know that we do have some bad seeds, we do have individuals that have no business wearing a uniform, and that we are working collectively in particular assignments, like background investigations and recruitment, to go into different areas and down new avenues where law enforcement has never been an option before to try and find the best officers that we possibly can.

So I mean, I understand. I get it. I am a black woman before I am anything else. I am a black mother before I am anything else. I am equally as sad, as angry and as frustrated at the events, at the murder of George Floyd by yet another law enforcement officer.

Can we circle back to the notion of dismantling the Minneapolis Police Department so you can talk a little more specifically about the concerns you have with that approach?

One of the things is the rippling effect this could have on the way we recruit. If this is what is to happen to Minneapolis, who is it say that it won't happen to any other agency? I am fearful that it may have a rippling effect. And there are community members who want to see the police out there, there are community members that still rely on law enforcement, that still trust law enforcement, and so I ask that their voices and their thoughts on totally getting rid of a police agency, that their voices be heard as well.

As a black female law enforcement officer, how did it feel to watch the peaceful protests, and then the rioting and looting that followed Floyd's death?

I feel that the narrative got lost because of the looting and the rioting and things like that. I am all for peaceful protest. I had children on the bridge the day that tanker came through in Minneapolis. My children and family have been over to the memorial site almost every day, so I am for the community having the opportunity and the right to peacefully protest. But what I did not like was the destruction and just the despair and the chaos of burning down buildings and businesses that people have given their all to.

'I am a black woman before I am anything else.' A Ramsey County sheriff's commander on George Floyd, law enforcement's future.

Has it ever made you think to yourself, "I don't want to do this anymore"?

Absolutely, it has. But I try and do what I tell the officers I mentor to do. I ask them to remember that first day you put that uniform on, to remember the things you told your family or your administration about why you wanted this job. So when I have those days when I just don't understand how I can continue to go on, I rely on those memories and that allows me to continue to move forward.

I would imagine you have worked with a lot of white colleagues in your career. Do you feel like they understand the problem with police culture as well?

I do believe that they get it, but I am also a firm believer that the more black and brown people who wear the uniform the more we can educate, and the more we can introduce the culture and cultural competency.

Have you or your children encountered instances of racism, or had experiences with law enforcement officers where you were treated differently?

I have had conversations here with officers the last couple of weeks about what it means to be driving and have a squad pull up behind you even though you have done everything right. Your license is right, your insurance is right, you have no violations. And as a black woman, I have felt that fear before. Have my children been stopped and pulled over? Absolutely. Has my husband been stopped and pulled over? Absolutely. And what I tell my family is, "I am not asking you to forget your history or your encounters with law enforcement. I am not asking you to throw your fear out the window. But what I am asking you to do, what I ask myself to do, is to give that officer the opportunity to demonstrate and show who they are for the first time when you are meeting them. To not judge before you give them a chance." Again, I cannot erase my history, my family's history, the black community's history with law enforcement. All I can do is try and move forward and help the community and law enforcement's relationship move forward.

What does "Justice For George" mean for you?

Justice for George means transformational policing. It means change. It means the effect that he is having on this entire world. I have been taking calls and interviews from the United Kingdom, from Canada, from California, from New York, from Miami, you name it. Justice for George means doing better. Working together so we don't have to view another video of a senseless murder. That is what justice means. Justice for George means that we hold those people, those officers, accountable and we make sure that they are locked away and that they never have the opportunity to wear another gun and a badge and a uniform. That is what justice for Mr. George Floyd looks like. It looks like black and brown children who have the opportunity to grow with their families and their fathers and not have to lay them to rest. That no other parent has to bury their son or their daughter at the hands of law enforcement. Statue of Black protester replaces toppled UK slave trader George Floyd family filing civil suit against Minneapolis, police Minneapolis cops required to report de-escalation efforts Gov. Walz to appeal federal decision rejecting disaster aid for Twin Cities following riots Attorneys ask George Floyd judge to hold AG Keith Ellison in contempt

'I am a black woman before I am anything else.' A Ramsey County sheriff's commander on George Floyd, law enforcement's future.

Graphic

Commander Suwana Kirkland. (Courtesy of Ramsey County Sheriff's Office)

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

End of Document

'ENOUGH TALK, WE NEED ACTION'

ARTICLE DCXXXVIII.

'ENOUGH TALK, WE NEED ACTION'

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1426 wordsByline: JOHN REINAN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Many in Minneapolis want drastic police reformBody

Patricia Young is fed up with the "macho attitude" of Minneapolis police.

Shalisa Jones-Lee is growing weary of hearing about all the "bad cops."

And Jilda Mastrey, frustrated by what she calls the "sword-carrying style" of so many officers, says she's eager to see the police department dismantled, with the city redirecting more of its money to mental health, affordable housing and education.

"There's been enough talk," Mastrey said. "We need action."

Interviews with dozens of Minneapolis residents last week suggest that the May 25 police killing of George Floyd, and the demonstrations that followed, represent a breaking point between citizens and police.

While recognizing the need to maintain public safety and protect the city from danger, many who were interviewed strongly favor reforming the police department and say drastic change is desperately needed.

But they also remain uncertain about what it would mean to dismantle or defund the force, ideas supported by a majority of the City Council in the wake of Floyd's death at the hands of four Minneapolis police officers.

Mayor Jacob Frey and several business groups have said they favor changes but are opposed to eliminating the department altogether. Meanwhile, residents are offering thoughts of their own, from reducing the power of the police union and demilitarizing the force, to directing resources away from enforcement and toward other means of promoting community safety, such as training officers to be protectors and peacemakers.

As a starting point, many said, police treatment of citizens simply must change.

'ENOUGH TALK, WE NEED ACTION'

"The macho attitude needs to end," said the 76-year-old Young, a retired bus driver who lives in the Victory neighborhood of north Minneapolis. "All they're trained to do is restrain. They don't need all that gear - they're not in the army."

When Joyous Glenn saw the video of officer Derek Chauvin kneeling on Floyd's neck for nearly 9 minutes on Memorial Day evening, she recognized Chauvin immediately, as well as officer Tou Thao, who stood by without intervening. The two officers, who have since been fired and charged along with two other officers in Floyd's death, were often on patrol in the Webber-Camden neighborhood of north Minneapolis, where Glenn lives.

"They never came with nothing good toward blacks," said Glenn, 43. "They've been harassing people for a long time. They take their power and abuse it. And they wonder why we don't respect them."

Said Tania Benitez, 31, a cleaning worker from south Minneapolis, "They need to connect with people. They shouldn't be so quick to be threatened. I am scared of being pulled over or having an encounter with them, because you never know how they'll react."

What city leaders will do next is unclear.

On Friday, five City Council members proposed asking voters in November to decide whether to eliminate the police department requirement from the City Charter and replace it with a new department "to provide for community safety and violence prevention."

That would suit Mastrey, 64, a kitchen designer from northeast Minneapolis.

"Put the money toward mental health, affordable housing, education," she said.

Others, while supporting reform, worry that the fervor over the issue will make people impatient for immediate results.

"I absolutely believe that a large amount of the budget should be redirected toward other areas," said Richard Torpin, 35, a stay-at-home dad in northeast Minneapolis. But, he added, "it's going to be a long conversation. We can't snap our fingers and expect all the problems to be fixed. A lot of good has already come of that conversation."

Before any change occurs, however, city officials need to more clearly communicate well-defined reform proposals, said Kim Cochran, 47, a physician from the Lynnhurst neighborhood in the southwest part of the city.

"People mean a wide range of things," she said, "from shifting resources to complete abolition" of the department. But Cochran understands why council members have come out with bold - if undefined - statements.

"It should be glaringly obvious that there needs to be change," she said. "You set forth the proposal you want, not what you're willing to settle for."

'Strip them of comfort'

On the North Side, where many of the city's black residents live, relations with the police are a constant source of tension.

'ENOUGH TALK, WE NEED ACTION'

"I have three sons. As a black woman, it's scary when you hear sirens," said Jones-Lee, 41, who lives in the Jordan neighborhood. "People say there are good cops and bad cops. How about, you don't get to be a bad cop?"

"I would strip them of all the comfort they have behind the badge and the baton and the stun gun and the real gun. Have them walk a day like the black people who are unfairly targeted."

Many residents interviewed said one way to help foster better communication is to require officers to live where they work. In 2017, a Star Tribune analysis of police records found that 92% of Minneapolis officers lived outside the city.

"They don't know the neighborhoods they're policing. That's a problem," said Brandon Steinhilber, 23, an online educator who lives in Loring Park.

Many also questioned the power of the police union, which they see as a barrier to holding officers accountable for their actions.

"The union needs to think about protecting the people, not protecting the officers," said Victor Koenig, 44, a retail worker who resides in the Powderhorn neighborhood. "There is no serving and protecting."

Nearby in Longfellow, hard-hit by the violent demonstrations that followed Floyd's death, residents want to see a plan for reform, and soon.

"There's a lot of things that need to be done," said Abdirauf Badri, a 19-year-old student. Chief among them, said his friend, 19-year-old Milton Ouma: "They need to stop killing black people for no reason."

'Department is broken'

Mark Wald, a 52-year-old resident of the Camden neighborhood in north Minneapolis, advised caution in making drastic changes to the department.

"I respect the police. I support the police," he said. "They're the people who keep us safe when we sleep." Wald stressed that he supports racial justice and stands with Black Lives Matter, but he said those calling for immediately defunding or abolishing the police department "aren't thinking it through."

Doris Strand, 78, a retired secretary who lives in the Marshall Terraces neighborhood across the Mississippi River, echoed those thoughts.

"Absolutely not," she said of calls to defund or abolish the police. "I don't think it's necessary. I think they do a good job."

What comes next needs to consider the well-being of the entire community, said Nikayla Gibson, 49, who works in a disabilities program and lives in the Hawthorne neighborhood north of downtown.

"I think there needs to be a deep change," she said, "but you want the community to be whole, and the police department is a part of that."

"I think it's going to take a lot of smart people talking about it," said Nicole Christiansen, 43, a coffee shop manager from the Lyndale neighborhood. "The title [defund or abolish] is a negative way of saying 'reform.' "

'ENOUGH TALK, WE NEED ACTION'

Regardless of how it's labeled, it's clear that change is being demanded by many across the city, from people of all races and ages.

"They need to do a better job," said 19-year-old Karena Yang, a student from north Minneapolis.

"It was horrible how three officers were on that guy," she added, speaking of how police held down Floyd and put a knee to his neck. "He was handcuffed. He wasn't going to walk away."

"Frankly, I think the whole police department is broken," said Bruce Yoder, 73, a retired accountant from the Lake Nokomis area. "It needs drastic reform. Determine what jobs they're not well-suited for and assign those jobs to other, more well-qualified people.

"I'm an old white guy," Yoder added. "I shouldn't be afraid of the police in Minneapolis. But I am."

john.reinan@startribune.com 612-673-7402

"They need to do a better job."

Karena Yang, 19

"The union needs to think about protect the people, not protecting the officers."

Victor Koenig, 44

"I shouldn't be afraid of the police in Minneapolis. But I am."

Bruce Yoder, 73

"The police gonna be the police. Time will tell."

Gregory Bolden, 59

"You want the community to be whole, and the police department is a part of that."

Nikayla Gibson, 49

"I am scared of being pulled over ... you never know how they'll react."

Tania Benitez, 31

"The people policing our neighborhoods don't live here. That's a problem."

Brandon Steinhilber, 23

"I think [defunding] means different things to different people."

Damon Murphy, 40

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

ARTICLE DCXXXIX.

TURNING POINT FOR POWER OF POLICE UNION

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1824 wordsByline: ANDY MANNIX; LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

A little over a year into his first term, Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey announced a new milestone in his promise to remake the Minneapolis Police Department: The city would become the nation's first to ban the controversial "warrior-style" police training for officers.

Standing in front of a crowd at his second State of the City address, Frey proclaimed the training, which teaches officers to see everyone as a threat until found otherwise, contradicts the "values at the very heart of community policing" and would no longer be tolerated, even off duty.

The following week, Lt. Bob Kroll, the brash president of the Minneapolis Police Federation, responded with his own news: The union would start offering warrior training to members for free. "While it seems that the lives of our officers are not important to politicians," Kroll said in a news release, this training would ensure officers survive the dangers of the job.

Kroll's brand of open rebellion against city leaders has become a hallmark tactic for the union during his tenure, and one of many ways the federation exerts power over the city. The union has fewer than 900 members, but it has wielded enormous clout and influence, both at City Hall and the State Capitol.

Critics say the union has for decades served as a shadow command of the Minneapolis Police Department. Now that power is in jeopardy. Last week, in the aftermath of the killing of George Floyd, Police Chief Medaria Arradondo announced that the city would step away from bargaining negotiations with the federation, saying the union has historically stood "in the way of progress." A majority of City Council members have openly committed to dismantling the police force, declaring reform efforts an utter failure. And on Thursday, two dozen officers, including former union president John Delmonico, signed on to a letter condemning the actions of the officer who pinned Floyd to the ground by his neck.

"I think the union has to take a critical, authentic look at the role that they play," Arradondo said in an interview last week. "If we do not change, there are no good outcomes."

Federation Attorney Jim Michels said he was surprised by the chief's announcement, and the union is committed to working with the city to make the department better. "Notwithstanding the public perception, and not withstanding some mistakes that have been made, the federation has been an agent of change. We know we need to continue to work to change the police department."

Turning point for power of police union

Kroll and Delmonico did not respond to messages seeking comment.

Political clout

In the early 2000s, the union flexed its clout through political donations and endorsements.

When R.T. Rybak first ran for mayor, the federation endorsed him, which Rybak says gave his campaign a boost among voters who worried he didn't have the political résumé for the office. But the union turned on Rybak when he cut the police budget and refused to appoint the federation's choice for chief. In the 2005 election, the union spent $44,000 on anti-Rybak ads, and another $27,000 to support his challenger, according to campaign finance records.

The union found another enemy in the Minneapolis Civilian Review Authority, an appointed board that investigated allegations of police misconduct. It served as an alternative to the police department's internal affairs unit, in which cops investigate other cops, and its members clashed frequently with police.

In 2007, an attorney for the federation, Anne Walther, sent a letter to Assistant Minneapolis Attorney Lisa Needham asking the city to reinterpret data practices laws and make the review authority's findings more private. Needham obliged, and sent a memo to the citizen board instructing its members they could no longer tell the public when they'd "sustained" a complaint against an officer. They also had to stop informing the victims of police misconduct which parts of their allegations were found to have merit.

The decision took away the last piece of the review authority's power. A few years later, at the behest of the police union and in defiance of pleas from Rybak and community activists, legislators sounded the death knell with a law that prohibits civilian review boards from making "a finding of fact or determination regarding a complaint against an officer." The law marked the end of an all-civilian oversight board for the Minneapolis Police Department.

In 2014, Delmonico appeared in a KSTP report accusing Mayor Betsy Hodges of "flashing gang signs" with a felon in a photograph. "For as critical as she can be with the cops - is she going to support gangs in this city or cops?" said Delmonico.

The stunt backfired. The report, dubbed "Pointergate," became an international embarrassment when footage emerged showing Hodges and the man were only pointing at each other during a voter drive.

A union like no other

In past generations, the Police Federation operated more like a standard labor union, joining with the teachers union to lobby at the Capitol. The federation also negotiated a stronger contract that gave officers with seniority the power to pick where and when they work.

"The contract is where their power comes from," said former Police Chief Tim Dolan. "And the fact that they have plenty of money. And with the money they have some of the finest attorneys in labor law."

The federation today is unlike any union in Minnesota, far removed from the workers' rights movements central to organized labor, said Javier Morillo, a former labor leader. As American police departments have become more militarized, Morillo said police federations have come to resemble something more akin to a union within the U.S. Army - an unthinkable premise that would confuse the command structure.

Turning point for power of police union

"So long as police departments operate in that same kind of structure, to me it begs the question: Is this really a labor-management situation?" said Morillo.

In a 2018 paper in the University of Pennsylvania Law Review, researchers argue that police unions have been given too much power in grievance appeals for officer discipline. The "significant authority" granted in selecting arbitrators in appeals has left elected officials powerless to discipline officers, according to the report.

Unions have traditionally played a key role in ensuring safe and healthy working environments for police, said former Canadian police chief Matt Torigian. But they have also resisted change.

"The difficulty is that very often the unions will be the last line of defense to reforms and changes," he said.

Unions are also predominantly run by white men, he said, and the lack of diverse voices may contribute to the "us against them" mentality within the federation.

The Kroll era

As more candidates in Minneapolis ran on platforms of police reform, the federation's endorsement has lost value. The city reappointed Dolan to a second term as chief, and Dolan said he believes Delmonico and the union did him a favor by recommending against it.

Kroll found power in a different manner: using the union's protections to publicly defy the city, and to defend officer misconduct by casting the reform-minded elected officials as "lunatic left" radicals who bully police for political points.

"Kroll instigates behind the scenes all the time, and if anybody thinks he doesn't, they don't know what they're talking about," said former Assistant Minneapolis Police Chief Kris Arneson. "I've seen him agree to reform efforts and then hack away at them behind the scenes."

In a statement posted to Facebook last week, the union denied hindering efforts at reform. "Despite the Federation's efforts to assist in bringing about meaningful changes, it recognizes that rarely have these efforts been successful. However, this is not because of the Federation or the terms of the labor agreement, but rather because management has failed to implement the changes the parties agreed to make."

Kroll has gathered many critics over his nearly five years as union president. Many have questioned his racial attitudes - "KKKroll" has become a mainstay protest slogan.

"He's their bulldog when they have to go in to anything in the disciplinary process," said Sean Broom, a former City Council aide. "Bob Kroll has shown himself to be an extraordinary advocate on their behalf. That's why he was elected, that's why he was re-elected."

'No middle ground'

Turning point for power of police union

In 2018, in a move to make Minneapolis a safer city for immigrants, Frey announced all police squad vehicles would be fitted with placards in Spanish listing people's rights when encountering ICE agents.

Kroll responded with a statement calling the mayor's decision "simply insane," accusing Frey of prioritizing "people who are here ILLEGALLY" over victims of shootings.

Michels denied that Kroll is purposely undermining reforms when he publicly defies Frey.

"I think it's more of a personal thing between the mayor and Bob. And it's almost like action and then a reaction and then a reaction to the reaction and on it goes."

Kroll and other union members appeared in a mailer endorsing Tim Pawlenty, a Republican who ran for governor on a tough-on-immigration platform, alongside the message: "Our state is wasting millions on benefits for those here illegally." After Jeff Johnson beat Pawlenty in the Republican primary, the union endorsed Johnson in the general election.

When protesters called for police reforms after an officer fatally shot Thurman Blevins, a black man, in 2018, Kroll said that Blevins was "fair game" because he was carrying a gun. Kroll called on anyone with "ice flowing through your veins" to join the department.

"He is reminding the rank and file of the police department who they should listen to," said City Council Member Jeremiah Ellison.

As Frey battled with President Donald Trump on Twitter over the costs to the city of a campaign event in Minneapolis, Kroll appeared on "Fox and Friends" to bash the mayor for not allowing police to wear uniforms at the rally. The interview found Kroll a powerful new ally: Trump. At the rally last October, Trump brought Kroll on stage, boosting Kroll as a folk hero "pouring out his guts" to stand up to the city's liberal establishment.

After the killing of George Floyd, Kroll wrote a letter to the force defending the police officers involved and accusing the city of making its police scapegoats." Friday, hundreds of protesters gathered outside the boarded-up union offices in Minneapolis demanding Kroll's resignation.

Rybak, now CEO of the Minneapolis Foundation, is working with the city to review police contracts across the country and find precedents for reform. For true change to take root, said Rybak, more officers must defy the union and come out publicly to condemn the bad actors that make possible the brutality displayed in the Floyd video.

"There's no middle ground anymore," Rybak said.

andy.mannix@startribune.com 612-673-4036 · Twitter: @AndrewMannix

libor.jany@startribune.com 612-849-5440 · Twitter: @StribJany

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

What does 'defund the police' actually mean? Here are some answers

ARTICLE DCXL. WHAT DOES 'DEFUND THE POLICE' ACTUALLY MEAN? HERE ARE SOME ANSWERS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 14, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1228 words

Byline: Dane Mizutani

Highlight: On a steamy afternoon in Minneapolis, a non-veto majority of the Minneapolis City Council took the stage at Powderhorn Park last Sunday and committed to dismantling the Minneapolis Police Department as it currently exists. It was met with cheers from the droves of supporters in attendance, many of which have been pushing to "defund the [...]"

Body

On a steamy afternoon in Minneapolis, a non-veto majority of the Minneapolis City Council took the stage at Powderhorn Park last Sunday and committed to dismantling the Minneapolis Police Department as it currently exists.

It was met with cheers from the droves of supporters in attendance, many of which have been pushing to "defund the police" in the aftermath of George Floyd's death under the knee of a former Minneapolis police officer on Memorial Day.

That phrase has become a rallying cry of sorts as protesters have pushed for radical change.

In the Twin Cities, organizations like Reclaim the Block, and MPD150 have been leading the movement to "defund the police" for years. It's a sentiment that is now being echoed across the the country.

It raises the question: What does "defund the police" actually mean?

There are various interpretations of the phrase itself, ranging from reallocating funds to defunding completely, and thus, abolishing the police department altogether. A common ground is rooted in reimagining what public safety looks like as a whole.

That said, some people hear "abolish the police" and immediately dissent with visions of a lawless society. That's not at all what is being suggested.

"I think there is this mistake that a lot of folks are making in thinking that we are talking about abolishing safety," Minneapolis City Council member Jeremiah Ellison said. "We are talking about abolishing failure of a police structure that doesn't keep us safe."

HOW DID WE GET TO THIS POINT?

What does 'defund the police' actually mean? Here are some answers

While the horrific video of Floyd dying on the streets of Minneapolis sparked protests across the globe, activists have been pushing to "defund the police" for much longer than the past couple of weeks.

There is widespread evidence that police disproportionately use force against black people. According to from the New York Times, since 2015 police in Minneapolis used force against black people at a rate at least seven times that of white people.

Aside from Floyd, the killings of black men in the Twin Cities at the hands of police notably include Jamar Clark in 2015 and Philando Castile in 2016.

There is an understanding, according to Minneapolis City Council President Lisa Bender, that the current system does not keep every member of the community safe. Bender said she is committed to changing that.

WHERE WOULD THE MONEY GO?

While there aren't a lot of specific details about this yet, activists have pushed for reallocating resources, funding and responsibility away from police departments and toward community-based models of safety, support and prevention.

Looking specifically at the MPD, it has a budget of more than $190 million for this year, funds that activists and some elected officials agree would be better suited elsewhere.

"We know based on the evidence that overpolicing, criminalization, mass incarceration have not kept our community safe," Minneapolis City Council member Phillipe Cunningham said. "In fact, they have made them more unsafe. What we do know that works is the public health approach to public safety. It treats violence as a disease that spreads."

In theory, the more a city actively invests in certain communities, the less law enforcement will be needed.

"We don't need more cops," MPD150 writes on its website Black Visions Collective a report. "We need more jobs, more educational opportunities, more arts programs, more community centers, more mental health resources, and more of a say in how our own communities function."

WHAT WOULD REPLACE THE POLICE?

After analyzing various 911 calls to get a scope of why people call for help, the Minneapolis City Council concluded that the response system should be more nuanced than it is right now.

"We know a lot of those calls shouldn't be answered by an armed police officer," Bender said. "In fact, sometimes that makes the situation worse."

Thus, if Minneapolis were to abolish the police, first responders would take on different forms with people best-equipped to deal with different crises. Instead of an armed police officer showing up in every scenario, some alternatives could include mental health providers, social workers and victim advocates arriving on the scene.

What does 'defund the police' actually mean? Here are some answers

"If we look at what's in place right now, calling the police is not safe for everyone," MPD150 member Molly Glasgow said. "We need to establish community-based systems that give everyone someone safe and trustworthy to call."

It's worth noting that the Minneapolis City Council has offered very few details on what this looks like down the road. They have committed to at least a year of engagement with members of the community to develop a plan.

"We know it won't happen overnight and we know it has to center all of the voices of our community," Bender said. "The answers do not lie in the (city council). They lie in our community."

Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey is on record saying he does not support a full abolishment of the police department and instead wants to focus on reform.

WHO RESPONDS TO VIOLENT CRIMES?

This is undoubtedly the biggest question that arises when talking about abolishing the police. There are countless people who wonder: What happens if someone is robbing my house?

To that point, the Minneapolis City Council has acknowledged there will still be people who respond to violent crimes, even if they aren't called police. Even organizations like MPD150 acknowledge that "this long transition process" could call for "a small specialized class of public servants" whose job it is to respond to violent crimes.

There have been studies that show less policing can lead to less crime, though some would argue this evidence is anecdotal.

HAVE OTHER CITIES TRIED THIS?

Perhaps the most notable example of a city dissolving its police force comes from Camden, N.J. It disbanded its police department in 2012, shifting to more community policing with training that emphasizes de-escalation.

It might be the only place in the country that comes close to providing an example for what the Minneapolis City Council is vowing to do.

There has been widespread praise for Camden as a poster child for abolishing the police, with crime dropping by close to half. That said, some residents say many of the problems it was designed to fix remain unsolved.

Elsewhere, the pilot program RIGHT Care put a police officer, a paramedic and a social worker in every car responding to mental health calls in an area of Dallas in an attempt to get people the help they needed without an arrest or violent confrontation. It led to a drop in arrests in the area.

As for right now, some cities have committed to divesting over the past couple of weeks. New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio has pledged to shift money from the NYPD to youth programs and social-services programs, though he hasn't clarified how much. Los Angeles Mayor Eric Garcetti has agreed to slash up to $150 million from the LAPD.

WHERE DOES ST. PAUL STAND?

What does 'defund the police' actually mean? Here are some answers

Most of the St. Paul City Council does not favor abolishing the police department. That said, St. Paul City Council members Nelsie Yang and Mitra Jalali say they do.

"You have to defund the police to make money available to fund the things that keep us safe," said Jalali, who supports defunding the department over time to reach abolition. "I hear very overwhelmingly from my ward and other parts of the city that folks want to be safe. They don't equate that with wanting more police."

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCXLI. A CENTURY OF SHAME - CORRECTION APPENDED

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Correction Appended

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 1832 wordsByline: KATIE GALIOTO; BROOKS JOHNSON; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Protests are echo of Duluth's notorious lynchings in 1920.Body

DULUTH - For years, Jordon Moses has been telling their story, evoking their names: Elias Clayton, Elmer Jackson and Isaac McGhie.

Most recently he did so with a megaphone to address a crowd of hundreds who knelt outside Duluth's City Hall to protest the death of George Floyd.

"It's never been more clear," the 29-year-old African-American man said afterward, "to see how the lynchings 100 years ago relate to our contemporary realities."

Monday will mark three weeks since Floyd died in Minneapolis police custody and a century since Duluth's long-hidden shame. On a June evening in 1920, three black circus workers - Clayton, Jackson and McGhie - were lynched by a mob after a white woman said she was raped.

Moses has spent almost two years working full time to plan a slate of events to honor the lives of those men, who are memorialized in bronze at the downtown street corner where they were killed.

"Those lynchings were based in fear and control and racism and white supremacy," Moses said. They represent the cultures and systems he's been fighting against for 11 years, since he started college at the University of Minnesota Duluth.

But so little has changed. Moses is tired.

Tired of his skin color drawing second looks from shop owners or security officers. Tired of fielding near-constant requests to provide a person of color's perspective on boards and committees. Tired of talking about these things and feeling like no one is listening.

Just 3% of Duluth's 86,000 residents identify as black. The northeastern Minnesota city, known for its hilly trails and sparkling Great Lake, for years tried to bury its past like the ships that succumbed to stormy Superior's wrath.

Some say the decadeslong unwillingness to discuss the lynchings fostered a culture that allows people to avoid tough conversations about race and privilege and justice today.

"To truly, truly honor those three men," Moses said, "we need to put in place policy, practices, a culture shift that would ultimately create a community in which we all value black lives."

A mob ruled

Word traveled fast around Duluth that the postman's daughter, 18-year-old Irene Tusken, had been raped by a group of black men who worked for a traveling circus after her boyfriend said as much to police.

Officers caught up to the circus train and had the couple identify six suspects. As daylight faded over Superior Street in downtown Duluth on June 15, 1920, a mob of thousands overcame a handful of police to rip the black men from their jail cells.

They held a sham trial and quickly convicted three of them, dragging Clayton, Jackson and McGhie to the corner of First Street and Second Avenue E., where they were lynched.

"Troops rush to aid of helpless police," the Minneapolis Tribune reported the next day. "5,000 in crowd which overpowers guards, breaks down cell doors and seizes doomed men."

Yet there was no evidence the attack on Tusken took place. Her physician said he could not find any signs of a rape or assault.

A photo of white men grinning next to the corpses was later turned into a postcard.

That image was on the cover of "The Lynchings in Duluth," in which author Michael Fedo describes a population hostile to a growing black community, with many residents outraged at the black workers recently brought in by U.S. Steel to end a strike threat and other residents recently back from war and itching for glory.

The event captured national attention and led the Legislature to pass an anti-lynching law the next year.

But Duluthians hid the shameful act in the community's subconscious, and for decades state history books failed to mention the lynchings. When researching his book in the 1970s, Fedo ran into resistance from local officials.

"You had this wall of silence," he said. "It was something folks thought should not be discussed or talked about."

An entire generation mostly tried to suppress memories of the incidents. Duluth Police Chief Mike Tusken, the great-nephew of Irene Tusken, didn't know about his familial connection to the lynchings until his mom divulged the secret after his great-aunt had died in 1996.

It took until the 21st century for the story to again rise to prominence locally, helped largely by the memorial erected near the site of the lynching in 2003 after a group of activists raised money and awareness about the killings.

Etched in stone above the metal reliefs of Clayton, Jackson and McGhie are the words: "An event has happened, upon which it is difficult to speak and impossible to remain silent."

'It could have been you'

On a break home from college in the early 2000s, De'Lon Grant stopped to read that powerful phrase for the first time. Looking beneath it was like looking in a mirror.

Grant modeled for the memorial during his junior year at Duluth's Central High School. He was Isaac McGhie.

"It's jarring because it also reminds you that it could have been you or it could be you," he said. "That's the reality that we face, that we've always faced in this country."

Grant moved away for college and never looked back. Now starring in a Broadway musical, he remembers Duluth with a mix of nostalgia and reflection on a past when he hadn't yet fully embraced his identity as a gay black man.

"There is a beautiful community there," Grant said. "But not having somebody that looks like you in the community, it can get hard."

Jeanine Weekes Schroer, a professor at UMD, said that after living here for nine years she still wears a shield she crafted growing up under the glare of the dominant culture: "I act like a person who is visiting and who might be asked to leave at any moment."

Carl Crawford, the city's human rights officer, said he's seen numerous talented black people move away over the years after experiencing at-times flagrant racism.

"I don't hold that against them at all. I get it," he said. "When I hear or have conversations with friends and colleagues, they talk about creating safe spaces. Who wants to live in a space to just be in one box?"

Disparities between black Duluth residents and their white counterparts are drastic, in some cases significantly more severe than other cities.

Duluth has the second-highest black poverty rate among all metro areas its size in the country - behind Rochester, Minn. - with more than half of black residents living below the poverty line. In a given year barely half of black high school seniors graduate from Duluth schools, fewer than the state average. Homeownership is largely a privilege of white residents, with 4 out of 5 black Duluthians renting.

As in other cities, the jail population is disproportionately black, and residents of color have been subject to racial profiling by police.

Augsburg University Prof. William Green, a specialist on race in Minnesota, said those disparities can't be picked off one at a time.

"There's a tendency in society to see problems singularly and come up with a solution that only deals with that problem and not systematically - namely racial tension," he said. "All these things are connected and we need leadership that will coordinate all of that."

'Deterred but not defeated'

Their graves were quiet on Thursday afternoon, though there had been visitors recently. Flowers were starting to fade and Black Lives Matter signs starting to curl.

The unmarked burial sites of Clayton, Jackson and McGhie were found at Duluth's Park Hill Cemetery in 1991, and gravestones were placed in a ceremony that year. Today a stone bench sits beneath a young oak tree and draws visitors to the stark words on the markers that sit just below the grass surrounding them: "Deterred but not defeated."

For the first time, Duluth will have a place to coordinate its response to the inequities facing the city's black population. The City Council created the African Heritage Commission last month at the behest of Janet Kennedy, who became the first African-American council member in the city's 150-year history when she was elected last year.

With stronger representation, coupled with the ongoing discussions on police violence and racial injustice in the wake of George Floyd's death, there is some optimism that healing can finally start to begin.

"The hard ask is that white folks have to really just listen to what black people are saying about their experience and assume whatever counterposition occurs to them while they listen is just wrong," Schroer said. "The burden isn't to be morally clean. The goal is to be morally productive."

The Clayton Jackson McGhie memorial has become a gathering place in the weeks since Floyd's death. Young people have organized daytime cookouts, nightly marches and a community mural project as the site of a horrific crime becomes a place to process trauma.

A crowd of 10,000 was originally supposed to gather at the site of the lynchings on Monday to commemorate the centennial, but COVID-19 concerns pushed that back to 2021.

Moses, a key organizer, will have to make a much longer drive when that happens. He and his wife, Teresa, are moving to Minneapolis, a city where they know a much larger black community exists.

"Many of the people that we're interacting with today, those 10,000 folks in the mob were their grandparents, their parents, their aunts, their uncles. They shaped the values of those families," Moses said. "That's an important thing for us to understand."

Duluth's population has remained flat for decades, but its share of nonwhite residents has steadily grown, a trend expected to continue. The 1% projected population increase in St. Louis County between now and 2035 will be solely due to new nonwhite residents, say state estimates.

Crawford, the human rights officer, said "there's certain things that need to happen" to make Duluth a more comfortable place for citizens of color.

"I push back always against the Minnesota Nice way of doing things," he said. "Let's be open and honest and have dialogue to recognize there's a problem. Because if we never recognize it as a problem, we'll never really have meaningful work toward changing it."

katie.galioto@startribune.com 612-673-4478

brooks.johnson@startribune.com

218-491-6496

RACIAL DISPARITIES IN DULUTH: POVERTY LEVELS

The poverty rate for blacks in Duluth is about 34 percentage points higher than the rate for whites, making it one of the biggest gaps among metro areas of similar size.

Highest gaps in poverty rates between blacks and whites

Rochester, Minn. (35 percentage points)

Duluth (34)

Ocala, Fla. (18)

Olympia-Tumwater, Wash. (3)

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete chart.)

Note: Metro areas with 200,000 to less than 400,000 population. Excludes about 8 metro areas where margin of error for poverty rate was too high.

RACIAL DISPARITIES IN DULUTH: HOME OWNERSHIP

As of 2018, home ownership in Duluth was a privilege largely denied to black residents, with four out of five people renting.

Percentage of Duluth residents owning housing units

White: 63%

Hispanic and Latino: 50%

American Indian and Alaska Native: 46%

Asian: 34%

Black: 17%

Source: American Community Survey

Correction

This story had an incorrect statistic. Duluth has the second-highest gap in poverty rates between black and white residents among U.S. metro areas its size, behind Rochester.

Correction-Date: June 21, 2020

Load-Date: June 23, 2020

ARTICLE DCXLII. DON'T ABOLISH MPD - REINVENT POLICING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 14ALength: 638 wordsHighlight: Minnesota's largest city needs a police force. But it must be overhauled to truly protect and serve.Body

Sparked by the horrific death of George Floyd in Minneapolis, the phrase "Defund, dismantle the police" has become an oft-chanted protest rallying cry. In fact, a majority of City Council members recently said they support either slashing the police budget or doing away with the department altogether for a "police-free" future.

Although related calls for changes in policing strategies are welcome, talk of eliminating law enforcement in Minneapolis is irresponsible. Defunding or abolishing the Police Department won't improve public safety. It's also politically unrealistic and would violate the city's charter, an obstacle some council members propose to remedy through a ballot initiative this November.

Substantial reform through the kinds of changes in hiring, training, discipline and union contracts that the Star Tribune Editorial Board has endorsed for years is the way forward. The overhaul also could involve reallocating some police funding to improve community policing, better handle the demands of mental health calls and rebuild trust in the department.

The council members who have pledged to "begin the process of ending" the Minneapolis Police Department should instead work with, not against, Chief Medaria Arradondo and Mayor Jacob Frey on seeking meaningful community involvement in reinventing MPD.

As the state's largest city, with more than 425,000 residents, Minneapolis needs a highly functioning Police Department with adequate resources. It's a growing city with complicated public safety issues. The city needs officers who are dedicated to public service, smart enforcement techniques and peacekeeping through de-escalation. It must protect and serve - not be an occupying force that is feared in some communities.

Law enforcement must meet a range of needs: Keeping downtown safe for residents, workers and visitors. Helping to prevent and solve neighborhood crime involving drugs, guns and assault. And reducing gun violence.

Don't abolish MPD - reinvent policing

Cops are currently asked to be the first responders for nearly every social ill, including homelessness, poverty, mental illness and addiction. Some demonstrators say we'd be better off to spend directly on those problems, instead of law enforcement and prisons. Certainly, those areas merit investment. But Minneapolis will always need community-based, culturally competent policing. That means adequate staffing so that cops get to know the areas they patrol and view residents as something other than threats. It also means holding officers accountable when they mistreat or abuse citizens.

The Editorial Board has long made the case for police reform not just in Minneapolis and St. Paul, but across the state. On multiple occasions, we have endorsed many of the recommendations from the Obama administration's Task Force on 21st Century Policing, and the findings of this year's use of deadly force report by Attorney General Keith Ellison and Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington offer good fodder for legislative action.

St. Paul's mayor and City Council are taking the right approach. Rather than dismantling the SPPD, they're working on needed reforms.

Sharing that view are many area small businesses and the Minnesota Business Partnership, which represents some of the largest companies in the Twin Cities. We share their interest in seeking legislative changes to make it easier to discipline and dismiss problem officers, including changes in collective bargaining provisions. Partnership executive director Charlie Weaver summed up another argument against defunding or dismantling policing: "Getting rid of crime fighters won't eliminate crime."

This national moment of reckoning about police practices is rightly giving new momentum to overdue reform efforts. George Floyd's death moved Americans to say "enough" and demand change. It should come soon.

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

ARTICLE DCXLIII. FOOTBALL HUDDLES FOR HOPE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 1CLength: 1417 wordsByline: BEN GOESSLING; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: VIKINGS // Social justice committee inspires members of Vikings franchise to actBody

Eric Kendricks spent the last days of May stewing over his thoughts, sorting through the pain he felt over George Floyd's death and searching for the right way to respond to a statement from NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell he felt hadn't gone far enough.

The Vikings linebacker is ordinarily reticent in public, wary of attracting widespread attention. His comments to reporters are typically polite, but brief, and he'd tweeted just once in May, about an NFL Network story on how Kendricks was selling his own paintings to raise money for COVID-19 relief.

But as he played back everything he'd seen and felt - over the video of Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin kneeling on Floyd's neck and the 150-word statement Goodell released on May 30 offering condolences to the families of Floyd, Ahmaud Arbery and Breonna Taylor without mentioning racism or police brutality - Kendricks kept thinking of teammates on the Vikings' social justice committee with whom he'd shared ideas and processed deep hurt.

"For about a whole day, I just really sat on it," Kendricks said Thursday. "The thing is, this committee that I've been able to be a part of, and the people in the committee that I've learned from - Stephen Weatherly's not on our team anymore, but he's [been] on the committee. Hearing him and [running back] Ameer [Abdullah], they're so educated. They're such smart guys. I felt like, now, with my knowledge, if I say I'm standing for these issues, if I say this is the kind of change I want to make, I had to do something."

On June 2, he posted a Twitter thread asking the NFL to take concrete steps toward creating racial justice. He released a video through the Vikings on June 3, saying, "It breaks my heart to see the people of Minneapolis not only treated like this but how hurt they are by this," as he wiped away tears. He and teammate Anthony Barr appeared with 16 other players in a June 4 video telling the league to condemn systemic racism, in words that Goodell repeated in his own response a day later. And Kendricks joined nine teammates in a June 6 meeting with Minneapolis police Chief Medaria Arradondo and three officers to discuss how the department can improve relationships with black people.

FOOTBALL HUDDLES FOR HOPE

The week of public action, in many ways, stood unique in Kendricks' five-year career. It was prompted by Floyd's killing in south Minneapolis, which produced worldwide outcry and, eventually, notable contrition from the largest sports enterprise in the United States. It also was the product of three years in a group that has educated many Vikings players and emboldened them to take action.

The social justice committee the Vikings founded in 2017, after discussions among defensive line coach Andre Patterson, General Manager Rick Spielman and team ownership, had two aims: Help players partner with organizations working on systemic issues in the Twin Cities, and create a haven for those players to discuss racial matters together.

It distributed $250,000 in grants from the Wilf family in both 2018 and 2019 to criminal justice reform, education, legal aid, nutrition, youth services and post-prison reintegration programs. It also stoked an activist spirit on the roster: Kendricks' work with kids in the Hennepin County Juvenile Detention Center has taught him more about the link between food insecurity and juvenile crime, and last week safety Anthony Harris struck up a 25-minute conversation about police department structures with a white officer in his native Richmond, Va.

The Wilfs this week committed another $5 million to social justice work across the country, and the social justice committee announced a $125,000 endowment for a scholarship in Floyd's name. In the reaction to Floyd's death, committee members also see hope for change.

"All people were able to see, for the first time, that it does exist and that this is real," Patterson said. "It was videoed from the beginning to the end. All the other ones that have happened before, it becomes word of mouth: 'Was the person resisting arrest? Did the person do something to have the police be this aggressive?' It becomes, 'What do you believe?' Do you believe the person's family, or what the police is saying happened?"

"This one's different; everybody was able to see what occurred, and how far it went."

Processing shock together

Patterson, who turned 60 on Friday, grew up in Richmond, Calif., near where the Black Panthers were founded. Now the Vikings' co-defensive coordinator, he functions as a source of wisdom for the team's social justice committee, often reminding younger players that change takes time.

Still, he said, "it probably took a week" before he was ready to watch the entire video of Floyd's May 25 arrest.

"I knew what I was going to see," he said. "It's like I told the players - you have to be able to talk, to be able to get it out, because if you don't, anger will eat you up inside. I had to make sure mentally I was prepared to view it, because I knew the anger and rage would come back."

Harris first questioned whether the video was real when friends texted it to him. He realized he'd talked before with Donald Williams, an eyewitness whose account of the Floyd killing attracted national attention on CNN, when Williams was working as a security guard in downtown Minneapolis.

"I thought I recognized his voice," Harris said. "It brought it into perspective, how close incidents like that are to you. I can just imagine him, not only seeing another African-American man, but knowing he's someone who works in the area with law enforcement, that he wanted to help, and how helpless he could have felt."

FOOTBALL HUDDLES FOR HOPE

The Monday after Floyd's death, the Wilfs, Patterson and two players from the social justice committee led a team meeting. Spielman spoke the next day, as did Mike Zimmer. The coach consulted Patterson, his close friend and longtime colleague, about what to say; Patterson told him to simply speak from his heart.

"He humbled himself greatly and said, 'Man, I don't understand and maybe I haven't given this as much attention, but I know I love every single last one of you guys in this room and I'll fight for you guys just like you were my sons,' " Abdullah said. "That meant a lot for me because coming from Alabama, I grew up Muslim and black, so I was a double minority. I didn't have a lot of people of the other color or other religion speaking for me, even when they didn't understand my religion, even if they didn't understand my background. So to have Zim come out and say, 'I don't understand, but I stand with you' was powerful for me."

'Group is built to do things'

On Thursday, Patterson and Harris could easily recount their own experiences with law enforcement: Harris recalled older family members telling him to stay still and keep his hands visible during traffic stops as a kid, while Patterson remembered police following him several times as he drove an older Mercedes home while he was Washington State's defensive line coach in the early 1990s.

At the same time, Patterson said, he heard from black players who were routinely pulled over on the five-minute drive back from Idaho (where the legal drinking age was only 18 at the time), while white students made the short return trip to campus unchecked.

"I went to the head coach [Mike Price], and said, 'I want you to make me the liaison to the police department,' and he did," Patterson said. "I wanted them to see my face. I wanted to find a way to bridge the gap between police and our players."

He set up ride-alongs and police station visits and held barbecues between players and police; over time, the relationship warmed and the traffic stops lessened. The Vikings' social justice committee put together similar programs, and players reached out to police on their own this month; Kendricks had a 45-minute conversation with a childhood friend who's now an officer, and Harris' talk with the Richmond officer gave him new perspective on the idea of defunding or dismantling police departments.

The group will help allocate the Wilfs' newest $5 million gift and is still making decisions about next steps for community efforts. Three years of work, and three weeks of processing what's happened in Minneapolis, seem to have Vikings players ready to step in as boldly as ever.

"That's the thing - we are all just learning so much [from each other]," Kendricks said. "This group is built to do things, to take action to create change. ... The more minds we have collectively, the more effective we're going to be."

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

ARTICLE DCXLIV. A LITTLE HOPE AND A LONG ROAD TO JUSTICE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 718 wordsByline: JENNIFER BROOKS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Josie Johnson had always felt a bit of hope.

She stayed hopeful as a teenager in Texas, gathering signatures on a petition to end the poll tax. Hope drew her from Minneapolis to Mississippi during the fight for voting rights. For decades, she marched and organized in the hope her children's children would grow up in a different world.

Her children have grandchildren now. And after more than six decades of tireless civil rights work, Josie Johnson watched a policeman in her city casually crush the life out of George Floyd on camera.

"My hope was drained that day," said Johnson, who chose "Hope in the Struggle" as the title of her biography.

Minneapolis was burning, as it had burned in race riots before. Crowds took to the streets, protesting like so many had done so many times before.

Johnson found herself "trying to remember what we've been fighting for and what might need to be different in this struggle."

But something in this moment did feel different. Hope broke through the hurt. For Johnson, it came from the energy she felt from the young people in the streets, taking up the fight to build a better world for her great-grandchildren.

"This excitement I have felt of our young black boys and girls, men and women," she said. "That spirit and strength of our people keeps some of us fighting and being hopeful."

For historian Mahmoud El-Kati, the breakthrough moment came when he heard about the Black Lives Matter march in Pocatello, Idaho.

"If you don't understand the story behind the story, you don't understand the story," said El-Kati, a professor emeritus of history at Macalester College in St. Paul.

There was something about the sight of the policeman, smirking at the camera, ignoring the cries for help and for air from the unarmed man under his knee, that gave some white Americans their glimpse of the story behind the story. So this is what it's like, some realized, watching the video, then watching police attack peaceful demonstrators night after night. So this is how it feels.

"The fact that I'm talking to you now and not some statistic is only by the grace of God. That's a possibility for every black man," said El-Kati, author of "The Myth of Race, the Reality of Racism."

Watching that hard truth play out on camera "shook certain quarters in the white community," he said.

The question now is what the community does with that new insight into the white supremacy woven into its history and institutions.

"Whatever happened to the civil rights movement?" August Nimitz Jr., professor of political science and African-American and African studies at the University of Minnesota, used to pose that question to his students. The tongue-in-cheek answer: "Out of the streets and into the suites."

Now his students are out in the streets, getting a better education than any classroom could offer.

The long view of history offers a depressing view of history repeating. The lynchings of a century ago, the assassinations of half a century ago, the black men killed by police last week, last month, last year.

But the long view of history also shows of just how fast things can change. Nimitz joined the first George Floyd protest - a calculated risk for a 77-year-old African-American man in the middle of a pandemic.

"It was almost like a moment of liberation," he said. "We had come up for air."

Nimitz has seen other movements fizzle out over the years, often at the urging of community leaders - the people in the suites - who urge activists to exercise their power at the voting booth instead.

"I tell my students, if you think the most important thing you can do is vote, how did someone like me, who at one time could not vote, get the right to vote?" Nimitz said.

The first time he tried to vote, in 1964 New Orleans, he was turned away because of the color of his skin.

"Four years later, I was able to vote. You have to ask yourself, what happened in between?" he said. "It's because people like me and our allies had been in the streets. That's the way."

Josie Johnson's father wanted to be a lawyer, only to have his dreams crushed in the segregated South.

You have to keep on keeping on, he taught his daughter.

"At my age, those who have been in the struggle, we've seen it, we've known it," she said. "And we too have to keep on keeping on."

jennifer.brooks@startribune.com · 612-673-4008

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

Letters: Let's give Minnesota the gifts it needs

ARTICLE DCXLV. LETTERS: LET'S GIVE MINNESOTA THE GIFTS IT NEEDS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 14, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1326 wordsByline: Letter WritersHighlight: Rebuilding with art I just read the piece on the downing of the Columbus statue in St. Paul. I understand it was erected in 1931 as a gift to the State of Minnesota from Minnesota Italian American associations. I'm sure those who paid for the statue were taught the same history I learned many years [...]Body

I just read the piece on the downing of the Columbus statue in St. Paul. I understand it was erected in 1931 as a gift to the State of Minnesota from Minnesota Italian American associations. I'm sure those who paid for the statue were taught the same history I learned many years ago. That history excluded the violence and genocide against Indigenous people. Those who gifted the statue had no ill intent. They merely wanted to be accepted into the mass of people who occupied Minnesota. Although the subject matter may be condemned, it was nevertheless a well-intended gift of art.

Well Columbus is gone and with a smile we can rebuild together and rebuild with new statues. I agree with the lieutenant governor that we should take a hard look at the statues that adorn our communities. But on a lighter side, I'm not sympathetic to anyone with an office window. Before we fill our Capital grounds with even more government buildings let us create statues that celebrate the goodness of all people. In honor of the Italian immigrants, let's put a statue of Mother Frances Cabrini on the pedestal where Columbus once stood. She dedicated her life to caring for the poor, sick and homeless. Let us create statues honoring the Indigenous people, persons of color, and even all those Scandinavian groups who gave us lefse, lutefisk and meatballs without red sauce. And of course, we can't forget Prince.

Let us give Minnesota the gifts it needs. Gifts of unity in a paradigm shift.

Mark Cosimini, St. Paul

As a child living on the west side of St Paul during World WarII there were two things that were common knowledge, one was that there are bullies but bullies were usually cowards who would pick on people's kids and animals only when they were at a very strong advantage. A common comment of the time was "why don't you pick on someone your own size?"

The other thing that was common knowledge was that if you got in an accident or someone broke into your garage or vandalized your property, you could call the police. Back then that was quite commonly done waiting for the operator to get on the line and say, "number please." Then you would say, "please connect me with the police." All the years since then that's the way it's been done but it got sufficiently better when the 911 system was developed.

Letters: Let's give Minnesota the gifts it needs

For some time now many people have been buying guns in case they need to protect themselves or their property. If these people start getting a busy signal when they call 911 for any reason and lose faith, they will take those newly purchased guns and take matters into their own hands.

Then what?

Bernie Beermann, South St. Paul

In a recent letter to the editor, the writer apologizes for not "getting the memo" on white privilege ("She taught us to do what we could," June 11). I want to assure her that she has nothing to apologize for. White people do not get this memo; it is not addressed to us. The memo is addressed to people of color.

Not getting the memo allows white people to go about their daily lives believing that the rights and privileges guaranteed under state and federal constitutions and laws apply to them. And because we never see the memo, it never occurs to us that other people, people of color, can have a vastly different experience.

Not getting the memo allows us to have confidence that a landlord's decision to rent us a home is based only on our ability to pay the rent, not the color of our skin. If we wish to purchase a home, our whiteness is likewise no barrier to qualifying for a mortgage. If we wish to meander through a store, even perhaps picking up and examining merchandise as we shop, we are not followed or harassed by store security. If we get pulled over for exceeding the speed limit or having a burned out taillight, the officer will not haul us out of the car and ask to search it. We may even get off with just a warning.

Not getting the memo allows us to interpret "privilege" in largely economic terms. While the wealthy are privileged, those of us of modest means are not, but as long as we work hard we can succeed.

Because we don't get the memo, we can, therefore, go through life never understanding that white privilege is not so much about being given extra benefits; it is about not being given extra burdens.

Patricia James, St. Paul

I have only one thing to say about Gov. Walz's handling of the rioting, looting, and destruction of both public and private property in Minnesota: The definition of "dereliction of duty." The state of becoming abandoned and become dilapidated. The shameful failure to fulfill one's obligations.

Gary O'Neill, May Township

A tainting to the protesters who toppled the Columbus statue on the Capitol grounds and to the politicians who did not stop it. I believe in free speech but that does not include destroying public or private property. Anyone with their hands on the ropes should be prosecuted.

Allen Eldridge, Maplewood

Gen. Mark Milley, chairman of the joint chiefs of staff, has now said that when he joined President Trump in Lafayette Park the other day, he had been told they were going to inspect National Guard troops. Instead, demonstrators were cleared from the park for the president's infamous Bible photo.

Let us think about that for a moment: The Commander in Chief (or his people) lied to the nation's highest military officer so he, Gen. Milley, could be used as a campaign prop. Can the presidency sink any lower? Of course it can, and probably will, so long as Trump remains in office.

Paul Nelson, St. Paul

In 1963 Gov. George Wallace stood at the door of Foster Auditorium on the campus of the University of Alabama and repeated his inaugural promise of "segregation now, segregation tomorrow, segregation forever" while attempting to block the enrollments of two African American students. The hatred underlying his words in what is now famously known as the "Stand in the Schoolhouse Door" is as evident in Stillwater School District ISD 834 today as it was in Montgomery, Alabama, over half a century ago.

On June 11, 2020, the 57th anniversary of Wallace's famous speech, the ISD 834 Board of Education voted in favor of a separation agreement with Superintendent Denise Pontrelli, an advocate for equity in the public schools. Pontrelli's BOLD initiative squarely confronted a decades-old tension between all-white schools in the northern sections of the district, and diverse, overcrowded schools in the southern part of the district. She did what three superintendents before her wouldn't.

Pontrelli's closing of under-utilized schools has made her the target of unrelenting retaliation by Sarah Stivland, Mike Ptacek, Liz Weisberg and Tina Riehle. This Board majority has been empowered by an elitist community of wealth and pedigree to de-stabilize the district in the hopes of re-opening tax-supported designer schools, while denying adequate space for music and art in the schools with more diverse students. The campaign to oust Pontrelli is an affront to all students of color in the St. Croix Valley.

With the rest of the world in shock over the death of George Floyd, the community of Stillwater barely flinched when his murderer was greeted at the neighborhood prison. The same community that elected this current board majority.

Elections matter. Voting is the most powerful means we have of eradicating racism in our district. We have a civic responsibility to elect boards that uphold principles of equity for all students. Complacency is not acceptable. We must change.

We must not allow ISD 834 Board of Education to stand in the schoolhouse door.

Kate Niemann, Stillwater Township

Letters: If a third of parents don't want to send kids back to school, great. Problem solved! Letters: A suggestion for replacing toppled monuments Letters: A heavy burden, but Minnesotans should pay the

Letters: Let's give Minnesota the gifts it needs

price for riot repair Sainted: A thousand miles away, Dad needed my help. You're a saint, Dori Letters: I hope Trump tells them to get lost

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCXLVI. RACHEL GRESZLER: SHIFT POWER AWAY FROM POLICE UNIONS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 14, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 906 wordsByline: Rachel GreszlerHighlight: Police officers - by and large - are heroes who put their lives on the line to protect the communities in which they live and serve. How then should we react to cases of police misconduct and brutality when they come to light? Confronting this requires what Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey referred to as "this [...]"Body

Police officers - by and large - are heroes who put their lives on the line to protect the communities in which they live and serve. How then should we react to cases of police misconduct and brutality when they come to light? Confronting this requires what Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey referred to as "this one, nearly impenetrable barrier, which is the union contract and the way it is set up."

Derek Chauvin, the officer arrested and charged with Floyd's death, had multiple complaints against him. Only one resulted in a reprimand. The officer seen standing guard in the video as Chauvin pressed his knee on Floyd's neck, Tou Thao, also had multiple complaints against him. The city settled a lawsuit of alleged brutality by Thao and another officer for $25,000 in 2017.

Why then were these officers still allowed to stand in the line of duty?

It's important to remember that not all complaints filed against police officers have merit. Some are filed by individuals who are upset at an officer who arrested them for legitimate reasons, and some criminals file complaints against good cops as a way to get them sidelined.

Nonetheless, such complaints must be taken seriously and investigated thoroughly, and when it is determined that a complaint has merit, appropriate consequences must follow - including not erasing misconduct and disciplinary records.

Yet, according to an interview with Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey, "The elephant in the room with regard to police reform is the police union. It sets up a system where we have difficulty both disciplining and terminating officers who have done wrong."

Time and again, union contracts come into play in keeping police officers accused and even convicted of misconduct and abuse in positions of power, potentially subjecting community members to lawlessness and injustice.

The problems are not just in Minneapolis. A Reuters review of 82 police union contracts in large cities nationwide found that they often include provisions that obstruct discipline, erase discipline records, and insert elevated standards of review that shield rogue officers from justice.

While there can be a tendency to link all police together, or to assume that all the problems come from within police departments themselves, that's often not the case. Oftentimes officers report misconduct and abuse by their peers, or police chiefs even dismiss officers for just cause, only to have those decisions overturned following challenges from labor unions, often over technicalities unrelated to the underlying misconduct.

A 2017 Washington Post article titled "Fired, Rehired" obtained the records of 37 large municipal police departments that had collectively fired 1,881 police officers since 2006. Yet, nearly 1 in 4 - a total of 451 officers - successfully appealed those terminations, and the departments were forced to rehire them. Moreover, a majority received back-pay covering their termination period.

San Antonio Police Chief William McManus was forced to reinstate an officer he fired, not just once, but twice. As Chief McManus explained, overturning disciplinary and dismissal decisions for reasons other than factual errors "undermine a chief's authority and ignores the chief's understanding of what serves the best interest of the community and the department."

Yet most reform efforts have failed to confront the unions. The report from President Barack Obama's Task Force on 21st Century Policing mentioned unions only in the context of ensuring they have a seat at the table in the reform process. But history shows that giving police unions power over accountability and discipline typically results in less of each, and can pose a risk to community protection.

Camden, N.J., provides one instance in which doing away with the police union allowed the city to transform its police force from a triage unit into a proactive community police force as the homicide rate fell by two-thirds and complaints against officers plummeted 95%.

If we want to ensure the safety of a certain product, we wouldn't allow a group that represents the individuals who produce those products to set the safety standards, and control the consequences of violating those standards.

Similarly, if we want to protect community members from police misconduct and abuse, we cannot allow police unions to control the circumstances and treatment of police misconduct allegations, nor to undermine the decisions of police chiefs to remove problematic officers from their forces.

At a minimum, local and city officials should renegotiate collective bargaining provisions in police contracts to remove provisions that hamstring departments' ability to enforce accountability and discipline.

This will require fervent politicians and public officials who won't cower to unions - even if they withdraw donations or launch attack campaigns against them - but will instead take away unwarranted powers.

It's time for the "nearly impenetrable barrier" of the union contract to fall.

Rachel Greszler is a research fellow specializing in economics and entitlements at The Heritage Foundation.

Rachel Greszler: Shift power away from police unions

Mariel Garza: Oh no. It's California Lockdown 2.0 Adam Schuster: Public pensions are at risk of insolvency, but COVID-19 is not to blame John Kass: When Black children are killed, where's the outrage from the white and the woke? Andrea Gabor: U.S. schools must reopen - safely Noah Smith: Pandemic aid helps make the case for basic income

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCXLVII. FAMILIES OF THE DEAD PLEAD FOR NEW LAWS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 10ALength: 457 wordsByline: JESSIE VAN BERKEL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Between sobs, Amity Dimock asked Minnesota lawmakers to improve autism training for police, and to have mental health workers respond to calls.

Valerie Castile held up past proposals to change the criminal justice system, saying a bill named for her son Philando is one of those "picking up dust."

Both of the women's sons were fatally shot by police. They urged legislators during a hearing Saturday to change Minnesota laws to prevent further deaths like their sons' and George Floyd's May 25 under the knee of Minneapolis officer Derek Chauvin.

The House Public Safety and Criminal Justice Reform Division spent seven hours considering 19 proposed changes. Democrats aim to pass those during this special legislative session.

Floyd's nephew asked the committee to ban chokeholds. The sister of a man Chauvin shot in 2008 called for stronger discipline and transparency around officer complaints. Many who testified focused on specific bills, but the overarching message was that calls for change are not new.

The package of bills the DFL-controlled House is considering differs from the Senate Republican majority's plans. The two political sides share several priorities, including banning chokeholds and improving training. But the House proposals are more wide-ranging, and touch on issues like restoring felon voting. The People of Color and Indigenous Caucus developed the bills, which draw on recommendations from a state working group. Hearings on the bills will continue Monday.

One of the controversial House measures would put prosecution of deadly officer-involved cases in the hands of Attorney General Keith Ellison's office, instead of having county attorneys handle them. Dakota County Attorney James Backstrom said the association that represents Minnesota county attorneys voted to support the change, which he said would improve public trust and bring consistency to how the cases are handled.

But Rep. Marion O'Neill, R-Maple Lake, said she has heard from many county attorneys who oppose giving a partisan office that responsibility.

"They find that inappropriate when you talk about justice, because it should be blind," O'Neill said.

Another key House provision would alter the state's use-of-force standard. It would change when force can be used, from a situation where death or great bodily harm to an officer or another person is "apparent" to when that threat is "imminent." Rep. Rena Moran, DFL-St. Paul, said many in law enforcement believe the current standards are strong enough or more training is all that's needed.

"The pain, the frustration, the trauma, the righteous anger our communities have experienced over and over highlights how the status quo simply isn't working," she said.

Jessie Van Berkel · 651-925-5044

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCXLVIII. TIMBERWOLVES SUPPORT PLAYERS LEADING THE WAY IN FIGHT FOR SOCIAL JUSTICE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 14, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 819 wordsByline: Jace Frederick

Highlight: Josh Okogie, D'Angelo Russell and Karl-Anthony Towns have attended rallies and protests. Okogie helped organize and promote a giveback event that provided essential goods for those in the South Minneapolis community. Malik Beasley was among those at the event, distributing goods to those in need. Jake Layman was packing meals at a Timberwolves and Lynx [...]

Body

Josh Okogie, D'Angelo Russell and Karl-Anthony Towns have attended rallies and protests.

Okogie helped organize and promote a giveback event that provided essential goods for those in the South Minneapolis community. Malik Beasley was among those at the event, distributing goods to those in need. Jake Layman was packing meals at a Timberwolves and Lynx event this week.

Timberwolves players have been on the front lines in the battle for social justice and racial equity and effort to rebuild communities damaged in the past few weeks following George Floyd's death at the hands of Minneapolis Police officers.

"The biggest thing we want to do is we want to help our community," Okogie said last week. "The events that happened in the past week, it's very unfortunate, and it's unacceptable, but we have to start making a change one neighborhood at a time."

The Timberwolves and Lynx recently joined up with the Sacramento Kings for a PSA speaking out against social injustice, racial inequity and systemic racism, packed meal and snack packs to give back to those in need and partnered with the Minneapolis Foundation and developed a Fund for Safe Communities to "address systemic inequities and translate community anger into actions."

"We really feel like, as an organization and as a group, we've come together to deal with this in a way that will make us who we are," Timberwolves president of basketball operations Gersson Rosas said. "These opportunities, you have to embrace them. It's hard, it's painful, it's tragic ... but we want to be a spark or an organization that pushes positive change, and we're proud of the fact that our guys are standing up for what they believe, and as an organization, we're implementing productive and positive steps to move in that direction."

Timberwolves support players leading the way in fight for social justice

Immediately following the death of Floyd, the Timberwolves held a team video call. Included was Tru Pettigrew, a public speaker who helps organizations approach racial and cultural issues. The organization made a point to have conversations that Rosas said "need to be had." And the players took the lead.

"They're being open, they're being honest, they're being transparent with how they feel, how they've felt," head coach Ryan Saunders said. "We give our players all the credit for being that open and honest, all the way to the staff."

Saunders said the NBA has "always been an association that wants players and supports players to stand up for social justice and stand up for what's right."

In line with that, the Timberwolves organization has made a point to support its players in any way possible, especially now. They want to serve as a support system for their players in this fight.

That may be in the form of providing opportunities and resources for players to be active in the community, to continuing the conversation about social injustice or keeping players as safe as possible while they're out in public fighting for what they believe in.

Minnesota is aware the risks of the coronavirus are still very much prevalent. Rosas said Dr. Robby Sikka, the team's vice president of basketball performance and technology, has kept track of the players and kept them informed of the risks. Minnesota has protocols in place to keep players, and others in the organization, as safe and healthy as possible.

Asked what those protocols are, Rosas said the team is following league and state guidance, noting that Minnesota has pushed to make sure anyone who's been a part of mass gatherings be tested.

"So that's given us the resources to be able to support our guys in market, and other guys outside of our market. Every situation is different, but we're supporting them in every way possible to make sure that they have any resource that they need," Rosas said. "It's a situation where we've got to be smart, we've got to be educated, and we've got to make sure that we're supporting our players as best we can, not only through this period, but also physically and health-wise. So it's something that's definitely top of mind for us."

Saunders noted that an issue with young teams is often guys aren't as willing to speak up when needed. That has not been the case for this team in this moment.

"We have a very young roster of players who are growing up before our eyes. It says a lot about them, it says a lot about their maturity, their emotional IQ to understand where we're at, to understand what's happening and to understand their responsibility to play their part in a time where we need them," Rosas said. "We need them to step up and lead us and show us the way."

They've done so to date. Rosas said there's a lot of pain present within the Wolves' players - not only because these issues have been so constant for so long, but because it's recently hit so close to home.

"There's a sense of responsibility to do something," Rosas said. "We want to be a representative of the world we want to live in, and that starts with us."

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

Timberwolves support players leading the way in fight for social justice

End of Document

Would proposed changes to MN law bring more charges against officers? Probably not, attorneys say.

ARTICLE DCXLIX. WOULD PROPOSED CHANGES TO MN LAW BRING MORE CHARGES AGAINST OFFICERS? PROBABLY NOT, ATTORNEYS SAY.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 14, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1387 words

Byline: Mara H. Gottfried

Highlight: Rep. Rena Moran, DFL, is sponsoring a bill that would make changes to Minnesota law about when officers are allowed to use deadly force.

Body

Under current law, a St. Paul legislator says finding justice after an officer kills someone is an uphill battle: There's too much reliance on an officer's subjective judgment of what might be a threat.

That's why Rep. Rena Moran, DFL, is sponsoring a bill that would make changes to Minnesota law about when officers are allowed to use deadly force.

"We've heard ... before from law enforcement officers that said, 'Well, I feared for my life or I was scared,'" Moran said during a House of Representatives hearing Saturday, referring to the defense that critics say officers can use to explain their actions. "This makes prosecuting and gaining a conviction extremely difficult."

While some civil rights groups on Saturday praised the proposed changes to the law, they also urged legislators to go farther. Meanwhile, some legal experts doubt whether the shifts that are on the table would lead to more offices being charged.

The Minnesota House Public Safety and Criminal Justice Reform Division held a day-long virtual hearing Saturday, during which legislators heard from a range of community members and leaders about a package of Democratic bills - including reforms to prosecutions and investigations, banning chokeholds, and training related to mental health and autism - during the special session of the legislature that began Friday.

Though legislators have been spurred to action by the May 25 death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody, the People of Color and Indigenous (POCI) Caucus says they've long been trying to bring about changes. A state working group recommended in February a review of existing use-of-force standards and statutes and recommended any necessary revisions to focus on the sanctity of life and standards that require force to be reasonable, necessary and proportionate.

Would proposed changes to MN law bring more charges against officers? Probably not, attorneys say.

The changes to the law proposed by Moran, who co-chairs the POCI caucus, adds language that says it's their legislative intent to ensure officers who use deadly force only do so "judiciously and with respect for human rights and dignity and for the sanctity of every human life."

Seth Stoughton, a University of South Carolina associate professor of law and author of "Evaluating Police Uses of Force," said the words are useful, but it's "aspirational language" and not something attorneys would hang their hats on.

The meat of the proposal would add language to the law that says deadly force is justified only when "the officer reasonably believes, based on the totality of the circumstances, that such force is necessary."

The current law says an officer can use deadly force to protect an officer or another person from apparent death or great bodily harm. The bill deletes "apparent" and changes it to "imminent." That move would tighten up appropriate use of deadly force, according to Ted Sampsell-Jones, a Mitchell Hamline School of Law professor.

The change seems to be consistent with Minnesota's self-defense laws, which St. Paul-based criminal defense attorney John Arechigo said is better than the current language, but he doesn't know if that means it's good policy.

"More should be expected of our police officers," he said. "Minnesota's self-defense laws are designed to apply to 'regular people' who haven't had the kind of thorough training officers are supposed to undergo. I recognize officers need to protect themselves and others in certain situations, but the proposed language seems to still give officers the right to use deadly force simply because the officer thought there was an imminent threat to life."

Some states refer to U.S. Supreme Court decisions when interpreting their own state use-of-force laws.

"What I read this proposed statute to do is basically bring Minnesota up to the constitutional floor and perhaps deal with the most problematic aspects of permissiveness in its current law, but it doesn't do much more than get the state to where it should have been before," Stoughton said.

Susan Gaertner, who was Ramsey County Attorney from 1995 to 2010, also views the proposals as lining up with Supreme Court rulings.

That doesn't mean officers shouldn't be trained to a higher standard, said Gaertner, who is now in private practice focusing on business litigation and white-collar criminal defense.

"Criminal charges, I think, are a blunt instrument and what training should be is, 'Let's do everything we can to preserve human life, both yours and the civilian, and if you end up using deadly force, there's a high standard for whether you can be criminally charged for that choice that you made,'" Gaertner said.

Overall, Stoughton, Gaertner and attorney Robert Bennett said they think the changes would be unlikely to result in officers being charged more often in Minnesota. But community sentiment and increased sensitivity to holding officers accountable might make a difference, Gaertner said.

Jim Hilbert, ad hoc counsel to the MN/Dakotas Area Conference NAACP, said he thinks changes to the deadly force law could not only provide more justice in prosecuting police, but could "have major impacts on police behavior."

Would proposed changes to MN law bring more charges against officers? Probably not, attorneys say.

He said a Supreme Court decision from the 1980s that changed the legal standard for lethal force resulted in a substantial reduction in the number of police shootings.

Hilbert urged legislators on Saturday to consider adding factors that consider whether an officer tried de-escalation and whether an officer's conduct increased the risk of a deadly confrontation.

Under the proposed changes to the law, officers could still use deadly force to take someone into custody if they committed a felony, but it adds language saying that the officer has to "reasonably" believe "the person will cause death or great bodily harm to another person unless immediately apprehended."

George Floyd family filing civil suit against Minneapolis, police Gov. Walz to appeal federal decision rejecting disaster aid for Twin Cities following riots Attorneys ask George Floyd judge to hold AG Keith Ellison in contempt Protest in Pennsylvania after cop uses knee to restrain man Four pro bono attorneys join Keith Ellison's prosecution team in George Floyd case

The change would mean officers would have to consider "only future/ongoing threats rather than past crimes," Sampsell-Jones said.

Archigo pointed out the proposed changes may still give too much leeway for officers as there are many non-violent felony offenses, such as credit card fraud and theft, and officers would still be allowed to use deadly force against people in some circumstances.

The proposal also specifies an officer cannot not use deadly force against someone who is a danger to him or herself, but doesn't "pose an imminent threat of death or great bodily harm to the peace officer or to another person."

Bennett said he doesn't think that change "would stop a bunch of the cases that I've seen that have been suicides by cop. It would stop a few, which is better than nothing."

Jim Michels, a labor attorney who represents public employee unions, including the Minneapolis police union, supports some of the legislative proposals, but also has questions about aspects of changing the deadly force law.

"Right now, the question in the law is whether the option they chose was reasonable," Michels said. "I'm a little bit concerned about the type of nuances that could come up. ...It's hard to take a blanket approach because the reality in every case is different."

The Senate, which is Republican controlled, has a smaller number of police accountability bills that Sen. Warren Limmer, who chairs the judiciary and public safety committee, said they plan to pass.

Limmer, R-Maple Grove, expressed openness to reviewing the current police use of force statute and consider a "sanctity of life" standard before deadly force is deployed.

Stoughton, a former police officer who provided advice to California when the state was drafting its new deadly force law that went into effect last year, said he understands such legislation can be politically controversial. He said California reached compromises, but what he thinks worked overall was developing a law that protected officers and citizens.

"Safety is not a zero-sum game," he said. "We do not make community members safer by endangering officers, but changes to these laws can improve the safety of officers and community members alike."

Would proposed changes to MN law bring more charges against officers? Probably not, attorneys say.

Graphic

St. Paul House Rep. Rena Moran, DFL-St. Paul. (Jean Pieri / Pioneer Press)

Then-Ramsey County Attorney Susan Gaertner in 2010. (Pioneer Press: Scott Takushi)

Sen. Warren Limmer, R-Maple Grove. (Courtesy of the Minnesota Senate)

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCL. OTHER VOICES: WHAT AUTOCRATS CAN'T UNDERSTAND ABOUT AMERICAN PROTESTS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 14, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 473 words

Byline: Dallas Morning News

Highlight: If there is one thing we can count on from Russia and China, it's to kick us while we're down. The U.S. is reeling now, as we should be, from national protests over the unjust killing of George Floyd and a long overdue reckoning with racism and police brutality. But in another disorienting signal of [...]

Body

If there is one thing we can count on from Russia and China, it's to kick us while we're down.

The U.S. is reeling now, as we should be, from national protests over the unjust killing of George Floyd and a long overdue reckoning with racism and police brutality.

But in another disorienting signal of the surrealism overtaking everyday life in our nation, we must deal now with lectures from autocrats and authoritarians whose sense of freedom runs exactly as far as it serves their own interests. Beyond that, well, disappearing and death are on the menu.

Predictably, China has mocked the U.S. for hypocrisy, citing broadly expressed concerns about the crackdown on protests in Hong Kong. The overly aggressive response of police to protesters here opened the door for the charge.

But it's worth noting that the protesters in the streets of Hong Kong are risking everything for the rights we have here - rights that must be respected for our own protesters.

Russia's foreign ministry - arm of strongman Vladimir Putin - had a similar criticism. Putin has been in power since 1999 as Russia has descended ever deeper into an aggressive, totalitarian state with an aim of accruing power by diminishing democracies throughout the world, and nowhere more than America.

Even as they lecture us publicly, Russia and China are using social media in the way it works best - to stoke social division. As Politico reported this week, both nations are flooding Twitter with material hashtagged to George Floyd's death.

The idea is to make the U.S. appear to be a hypocritical nation on the brink of unraveling.

What these abusive regimes fail to recognize is America's freedom is its strength. What they see as an unraveling (because they fear all unrest) we understand as evolving.

Other voices: What autocrats can't understand about American protests

America can struggle through pain and discord toward reform and harmony because we have the freedom to engage in that struggle. Even now, on the streets and in city halls and in statehouses and in our nation's capital, we are considering how we can become a better America. We will argue and we will disagree and we will vote and we will change.

The struggle on the streets is a part of our becoming what the Russian and Chinese regimes cannot accept because to accept it would require subjecting themselves to the will of their people. And instead, they opt to silence their people.

What should be evident from what's happening in America today is that our people are not silenced. Our people are demanding their rights. And they will be heard. Other voices: Drawing a line in Atlanta after the murder of a child Other voices: Will Voice of America now lose credibility? Other voices: The feds build a case against Ghislane Maxwell; it must not stop there Other voices: Baseball's back, but it will be different Other voices: Extend unemployment benefits, Congress

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCLI. FAMILIAR GRIEF AND TRAUMA FUEL NEW RESOLVE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1095 wordsByline: MARISSA EVANS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

For Vanessa Anyanso, to be black in America is to constantly mourn lost sons and daughters.

It's a sentiment that Anyanso, a 26-year-old graduate student studying for a doctorate in counseling psychology at the University of Minnesota, has felt since the release of the video of George Floyd, a black man, dying while being restrained under the knee of a white Minneapolis police officer for nearly nine minutes.

Amid the resulting widespread unrest across the Twin Cities, Anyanso was tired of scrolling up and down Twitter but did not want to go out to protest. Her parents pointed out the dangers of her going out during the coronavirus pandemic.

"Because I'm a black person in America, every time I walk out of my house there is a possibility I won't come back, and because I'm a black woman unfortunately my death may not be as mourned or remembered as others," Anyanso said. "If I'm going to be in danger no matter what I do, at least I want to directly help some people that are suffering right now."

That's why Anyanso decided to start "running supplies for the revolution" by collecting money and buying and donating items to help protesters and other organizations in north Minneapolis. For Anyanso, it was considering what's more dangerous: The pandemic or being black in America?

The digital graveyard of viral videos depicting the killings of black people by police and others has become a recurring source of trauma for black people in America. There are the hashtags, the decision about whether to watch the video, the televised pain of mourning families, the swarming media, the protests - if the death gets enough traction on social media - and calls for justice.

And each time, black communities have to find ways to cope with the grief, anxieties and fears stemming from violently losing black men, women and children. Nationally, the number of black people experiencing anxiety or depressive disorders rose from 36% to 41% in the week after the video of Floyd's death circulated the internet and unrest began, according to a joint Census Bureau and National Center for Health Statistics survey. A 2017 survey from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention found black people were more likely than white people to experience feelings of sadness, hopelessness, worthlessness, or that everything is an effort, all or most of the time.

Marlee Dorsey, a licensed therapist in Minneapolis who sees clients through her Reviving Roots Therapy and Wellness practice, said for her clients "almost every session" has been about George Floyd, police brutality, racism, their anger toward the police, participation in protests or feeling validated by seeing others share their rage.

Dorsey said part of the problem is that people misconstrue trauma as "something that breaks you" and that can make people feel ashamed or hold in their feelings about it.

"The way that the mainstream culture talks about it is that 'we experience something bad and here are your symptoms and these are the things that happen for you, because we have to put things in a nice little box,'" Dorsey said. "But trauma is being pulled over by the police and all of the thoughts that go through your brain. You have that wave of fear, you think about the story your cousin told about how they got pulled over, your parents, grandparents, their stories. ... It's not just your experience that you're holding, it's your entire network's experience too, and that's what makes it more powerful."

The first time watching Floyd die on screen was "the equivalent to seeing a black man hanging from a tree," said Corey "XROSS" Dean Sr., founder and executive director of the Man Up Club, a Roseville-based organization focused on mentoring black males, teaching them how to process their feelings and how to interact with the police. "To see the foam that was around his mouth, my heart kind of jumped out of my chest at that point," he said.

The key thing Dean said he tells young men is that they're valued and that their voice matters, and he gives them space to talk about mental health, abuse and embarrassment. Any sense of hopelessness could lead them to destructive behaviors, he said. He said the group was out in the community helping with cleanups in recent weeks, but they've also talked about ongoing fear of the police. Dean said he watched the video of Floyd's death multiple times because he "had to watch the evilness of it."

"The only reason I stopped watching it was because my eyes kind of opened up to the reality of if I continue to watch it, I'm really going to be traumatized," Dean said.

Anyanso hasn't watched it. The last time she watched a video of a black person dying was Philando Castile, whose death was broadcast on Facebook Live in 2016 after he was shot by a St. Anthony police officer.

Her thinking is, "The people that need to see videos in order to understand that it's a problem won't even care, so what are we doing besides traumatizing our people all of the time?"

She knows the names of so many more black people whose deaths sparked outrage: Trayvon Martin, Sandra Bland and most recently Ahmaud Arbery, a jogger who was chased down and killed in Georgia, and Breonna Taylor, killed by police while she had been sleeping at home in Kentucky.

Anyanso knows the wave of fear when she sees a cop car or remembers trying to prevent police encounters on her jogs back home in Gaithersburg, Md., by wearing a shirt from her high school or her Columbia University undergraduate shirt. She's been in the car when her own father has been pulled over and remembers that fear.

She has found solace in action. She has organized donations of more than $17,000 worth of food, diapers and other supplies to organizations and got to help the protesters in her own way. She's also been trying to check on her friends to see how they're coping amid the pandemic and the aftermath of Floyd's death.

"I know if I allowed myself to feel the depths of the situation, I would probably not be able to get out of bed," Anyanso said. I would say my coping is through doing these supply runs, but I fully realize I have not been able to give myself space to grieve properly."

For now, Anyanso plans to keep raising money and making donations to organizations in need. But as she looks ahead, "it's not about the deaths that have happened, it's about the deaths that I fear will happen."

"Every time one of these murders happen, when people are protesting they're not just protesting that murder," Anyanso said. "It was influenced by all of the names known and unknown."

Marissa Evans · 612-673-4280

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

ARTICLE DCLII. FOOTBALL HUDDLES FOR HOPE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 1CLength: 1145 wordsByline: JIM PAULSEN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: MINNEAPOLIS HIGH SCHOOLS // Coaches and players from the city meet for frank and open discussionBody

Minneapolis City Conference football coaches and players met via Zoom on Wednesday evening in what was probably the most important meeting they'll have all year.

The topic of football never came up.

Concerned for the well-being of their athletes against a backdrop of protests and civic unrest, Minneapolis South coach Rodney Lossow and Minneapolis Washburn coach Ryan Galindo, both of whom live and teach in the city, conceived the meeting. They saw it as a chance to give players and coaches a platform to make their voices heard.

Lossow, who coordinated the meeting, said it sprang from a feeling that they needed to reach out to their players after the death of George Floyd at the hands of the Minneapolis police. Their neighborhoods turned tumultuous and fearful with rioting and looting in the days that followed. South's field, just south of Lake Street, is a couple of blocks from stores and buildings damaged or destroyed by fires.

"I wanted to know what I could do," Lossow said. "Guys like Galindo got my brain stirring and I thought, 'OK, what can we do virtually?' "

Eleven players, representing five of the city's seven schools, and 10 coaches from those five took part, along with Antony Fisher, Minneapolis athletics and activities director. The Star Tribune was invited to be present as well. Lossow asked for and received participants' approval to share the recording on YouTube.

The players, invited as team leaders by the coaches, were asked to address three questions: How do you feel about what happened? What would you like to see changed? What are you afraid of?

Zoom would not have been the platform for this conversation if not for the pandemic. Yet watching teenagers of all colors speak truth from their kitchens or living rooms or cars about what changes they want to see, both in their own behaviors and from the adults in their communities, created a powerful experience. The coaches responded into their phone or laptop cameras with passion and emotional pleas for understanding and unity.

FOOTBALL HUDDLES FOR HOPE

"This isn't the greatest way to meet, but it was probably the best way because all got heard," Lossow said.

Emotions ran from anger to frustration, from fear to worry. And to a sense of hope.

'Am I next?'

Washburn senior John Lyman led off the responses from players and set a tone by calling out the behavior of police.

"We need to find the root of the problem, and that is police and how they become police [officers]," said Lyman, who is white. He called for more rigorous evaluation before they are hired to root out those with racist backgrounds.

Mistrust of law enforcement was a thread that carried throughout the meeting. Many players said they frequently feel scrutinized and suspected simply because of the color of their skin.

"It's how black males are looked at," Washburn's Jamar Nelson said. "It's not fair how we should go out every day and be scared of police officers. They're supposed to be here to protect and serve us, but we feel like we're not being protected and served. Were dying."

"The thing I'm afraid of," said Minneapolis North senior quarterback Zach Yeager, "is that that next person to be killed by a police officer is me or one of my loved ones."

Said Minneapolis Southwest senior Darnell Harper: "I'm black, I'm 16 and I'm scared that the next one could be me."

Southwest coach Josh Zoucha told of receiving a photo from the mother of recently graduated senior T.K. Marshall, a star running back on last fall's team. The picture showed Marshall walking among protesters in Minneapolis, holding a sign that read "Am I next?"

"That crushed me," Zoucha said. "To hear the things these kids have to think about every day before leaving the house that I don't have to think about, it's powerful. These kids are speaking their truths."

Mixed (blue) feelings

Yeager's coach, Charles Adams III, is also a Minneapolis police officer and a longtime student resource officer at the school. The Minneapolis School District's recent decision to end its relationship with Minneapolis police meant the end of Adams' role within the school.

"I'm torn right now," said an emotional Adams, the only black head coach in the meeting. His teams have reached six consecutive football state tournaments, making the Prep Bowl three times and winning the Class 2A championship in 2016.

"You see the color of my skin. You know what I do. I am in the worst possible position you could be in. I'm from the north side, but I wear blue. My daddy's a cop. My uncle's a cop.

FOOTBALL HUDDLES FOR HOPE

"But under no circumstance did I feel that anything that was going on [with George Floyd] was justified. I'm not stupid. I'm not blind. Sometimes people don't understand that the uniform comes off. I do take the uniform off."

Adams talked about his role during the nights of violence.

"I had no clue if I was going to come back home. I'm talking going from fires to fires," Adams said, passion rising in his voice. "Getting shot at. Stuff thrown at me. And all I'm thinking about is that Polar Pride, boys. Can I get back to them?"

Optimism, plus skepticism

That fear was not limited to those in authority. Roosevelt senior lineman Jesus Moreno said he felt compelled to participate in the peaceful marches but couldn't leave home, fearing for his family's welfare.

"The day after [Floyd] died, we went down to Chicago Avenue to see where it happened and there were a lot of people there, saying his name. It was really powerful," said Moreno, who is Hispanic. "I wanted to march in the protests, but my family was hearing threats that there were people going into houses and hurting people of color. If I was gone, I wouldn't be able to do anything for my family."

Amid the overall serious overtone of the meeting, many echoed a theme of hope. That, finally, there might be an end to the inescapable racial oppression felt so strongly by the black community.

"I'm saddened, but I'm also glad," Yeager said. "I'm glad to see people of all races come together to fight for the same cause."

Minneapolis South senior Kader Diop echoed Yeager's thoughts. "I'm hopeful because I think the spark from this case is bringing people together," he said. "Not just people of color but people of all races. I'd like to see that continue."

Not all saw hope as a shining light, however. Many said they fear the current groundswell of change will fade away, as has happened before.

"There's hope in the air, and that scares me," said Robert French, a Minneapolis Southwest assistant coach who is black and wore a custom-made hat that read "Make Racists Afraid Again." "We cling on to hope. I'm tired of hope. The feeling is all too familiar. Hope tends to let our guard down, until another black man, woman or child is murdered. It will stop when we the people have had enough that we no longer react, that we take action."

Video of the prep football roundtable can be found at <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=C5nSlq-oSA0>

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

RACE IN AMERICA

ARTICLE DCLIII. RACE IN AMERICA

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 15ALength: 1506 wordsByline: MICHAEL FEDO, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: A life informed by a lynching // I wrote the book about the Duluth lynchings that took place 100 years ago this week. Some people thought the event didn't need to be revisited. Some people probably do still.Body

Forty-five years ago, on the road leading to a popular beach on Lake Champlain in upstate New York, the posted speed limit was 40 miles per hour, but a line of steady traffic was maintaining 50. Flashing lights appeared in my rearview mirror, so I pulled over. The officer, however, passed me and three other vehicles, stopping a car with a black male driver whose passenger was a white woman. This was the first time I witnessed a racial episode.

More recently, following my presentation at Stillwater High School regarding the June 15, 1920, lynchings of three black men in Duluth, the counselor for minority students shared an experience from one of her pupils. This 15-year-old black boy was stopped 37 times by police, during September and October - while walking to or from school. He was viewed as suspicious by local citizens not accustomed to seeing blacks in the neighborhood. Would a white boy, unfamiliar to those residents, have prompted even one phone call to police?

James Baldwin said it well: "Not everything that is faced can be changed; but nothing can be changed until it is faced." White citizens in America mostly ignore the ongoing pressures of "living while black."

And they do so because a great flaw in the modern American character is the absence of empathy - the capacity to feel another's joy, or frustration and pain. The inability to empathize sometimes produces headlines - as with the recent killings of George Floyd in Minneapolis and Ahmaud Arbery in Georgia.

In fact, some Caucasians still insist that the most-discriminated-against minority are white males. But the probability of them having been arrested for driving while white, or loitering - relatively common among persons of color - is negligible. Nor is it likely they've been surveilled in stores as a suspected shoplifter.

My book, "The Lynchings in Duluth," documents the June 15, 1920, murders of three black circus workers, hanged from a downtown street lamp. These racially motivated killings were perpetrated and witnessed by up to 10,000 people in my hometown.

RACE IN AMERICA

This crime reverberates 100 years later and continues to inform my life.

In 1920, Duluth's population was 100,000, with only 484 blacks. Local blacks reported that racial incidents were rare. But on the evening of June 14, 100 years ago, 19-year-old Irene Tusken attended the John Robinson circus with her date, James Sullivan. Later that night James told his father that six black circus roustabouts had robbed the couple and assaulted Irene in a nearby field.

Mr. Sullivan notified police, and 13 African-American circus workers were arrested for rape and placed in the city jail. The following day a mob, encouraged to "join the necktie party," broke into the jail, ripped Elias Clayton, Elmer Jackson, and Isaac McGhie from their cells, beat them and dragged them one block to the lamppost and hanged them, before posing for a postcard photo.

Irene had not been raped, compounding the nightmare of the lynchings. A doctor's examination revealed that no assault occurred, although that report never appeared in local newspapers.

While this mob was possibly the largest to ever gather for a lynching in America, most Minnesotans have never heard of this event. The state became amnesiac. Talk about the tragedy ceased; files and clippings were excised in some libraries. The St. Louis County Clerk of Court stonewalled seekers of trial transcripts, and teachers discouraged student reports on this "unseemly" topic. In his otherwise definitive tome, "A History of Minnesota," past president of the state Historical Society and prominent historian William Folwell doesn't mention this crime.

My mother, however, told me about it when I was 10 years old. Her words resurfaced in the early 1970s when I attempted to write a novel in which the setting was to be post-World War I northern Minnesota. In one chapter, my protagonist would witness the lynchings.

After searching for the book on the lynching I surmised had appeared 50 years earlier, I discovered there wasn't one. Nor was there any documentation accessible in Duluth. Eventually, I discovered newspaper microfilm and other records in the archives of the Historical Society in St. Paul. I filled a spiral notebook with information and abandoned the novel in favor of chronicling our state's darkest hour.

After 18 months, the manuscript was completed and submitted to more than 30 publishers. It received mostly form rejections, but some came with surprising comments. One editor wrote that sales would be minuscule because "Black people don't read books." Another noted, "Publishing this book could cause riots." A New York publisher said, "Civil rights books are passe now," just months before "Roots" became a runaway bestseller.

In 1979, a small Southern California firm released the book, appallingly titled "They Was Just Niggers," extracted from a quote by a Duluthian after martial law was declared. He wondered aloud "Why this fuss? After all, they was just niggers."

Following publication, a Minneapolis Tribune book reviewer chided me: "Now, nearly 60 years later, Michael Fedo, a Duluth native and New York Times correspondent, has chosen to rub our noses once again in the awful events. ..." Six months later, the publisher filed for bankruptcy.

In 1993, renowned international publisher, Harlin Quist reissued an edition titled "Trial by Mob," but he also went broke and disappeared, without paying the printer.

RACE IN AMERICA

In 2000, the Minnesota Historical Society Press, which had originally discouraged my inquiries into the tragedy, released the book as "The Lynchings in Duluth." This edition has become an important resource in many colleges and public schools.

Until I'd published the Duluth story, and participated in forums and discussions throughout Minnesota, I was only peripherally aware of persistent racial disparities. But wherever I speak, audience members share injustices and experiences of their living while black that I would otherwise never have been aware of.

Back in 1920, the immediate aftermath of the lynchings brought radical changes in the treatment of blacks in Duluth. They were no longer hired by the Post Office, and black students at Duluth State Teachers College (now UMD) weren't permitted to practice teach in the city until the 1950s. Sounds of "nigger" and "coon," seldom previously heard, led to fights on playgrounds.

Decades later, my book's republication brought predictable responses - mostly favorable, but some Duluthians were peeved that the episode was again raised. Many were still unaware of the killings, as I learned through a surprising happening at my stepmother's home.

A copy of the book was on a coffee table when a lifelong friend stopped by. She noticed the book, picked it up and gasped. "My goodness, that's Tom," she said, pointing to a figure in the shocking image on the book's cover. Tom was her deceased husband of 52 years, and he had never mentioned his presence at the lynchings to his wife or children.

Still, I'm hopeful. In 2001, the Clayton, Jackson, McGhie Memorial Committee was organized to commemorate the victims and educate the public. The committee commissioned an elegant memorial positioned across the street from the lynching street lamp. The Memorial for Peace and Justice in Montgomery, Ala., also honors Clayton, Jackson and McGhie along with 4,000 other lynched Americans.

The 100-year anniversary of the Duluth tragedy has been postponed until 2021 due to the pandemic. In his book "Just Mercy," Bryan Stevenson, keynote speaker for the centennial, quotes Walter McMillian, an innocent black who had been sentenced to death in Alabama. "People are supposed to die on God's schedule," he said, before being released.

The Duluth victims were denied that - and so, recently, were George Floyd in Minneapolis and Ahmaud Arbery in Georgia. And there have been many others. No ceremonies can rectify the abominations perpetrated upon victims of racial atrocities.

Yet there remain among us those who contend there need be no contemporary guilt about slavery, nor about the 100-year-old atrocity in Minnesota. And forget about reparations for slave ancestors. Let's move on.

In his 2002 essay, "Is There A Right to Forget?" George W. Streich, argues that remembrance of historical injustices is a component of achieving justice in the present. Acknowledging past lynchings may aid healing in surviving families of victims, and instill desire for a future with fewer racial inequities. It is with this in mind that event organizers in Duluth hope up to 10,000 people - the number believed to have been witnesses and participants in 1920 - will attend next year's commemoration, recognizing this ugly occurrence and facing a future in which, paraphrasing the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., people are judged by their character, not their color.

RACE IN AMERICA

Michael Fedo is the author of "The Lynchings in Duluth" and 10 other books. His next book, a collection of humorous/satirical short fiction titled, "Art's Place: Stories and Diversions," will be published in September.

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

End of Document

Resting in power

ARTICLE DCLIV. RESTING IN POWER

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 3ELength: 629 wordsByline: ALICIA ELER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Lifted by social media, two art-school grads create "Say Their Names Cemetery" to memorialize victims of police violence.Body

Taren Vang and Ong Yang of St. Paul donned blue surgical masks and knelt to place flowers at a corrugated-plastic headstone bearing the name of Vang's former boyfriend, Travis Jordan, a suicidal man who was fatally shot by Minneapolis police in 2018 when he refused to drop the knife he was carrying.

"He was killed by two rookie cops," said Vang of the incident, which didn't result in criminal charges. "It was during a wellness check, and they came and killed him instead."

Jordan's headstone was one of 100 in "Say Their Names Cemetery," an art installation on a grassy field at 37th Street and Park Avenue in south Minneapolis, just blocks from where George Floyd was killed while in police custody.

Each headstone - printed with a name, date and location of their death, and the words "Rest in power" - represents an African-American who has died at the hands of police.

The project was hatched in a matter of days by artists Anna Barber and Connor Wright, both 22 and recent graduates of the University of Pennsylvania.

They were quarantined at home in Chicago and Philadelphia, respectively, and kept seeing people share the same list of people killed by law enforcement.

They wanted to do more than reshare it. A cemetery, they thought, "would be a really impactful way to allow people to visualize and humanize these lists," said Barber, and also serve as a community gathering space.

One problem: They'd never been to Minneapolis.

On Apple Maps they found the open park space on city-owned land. They posted to Instagram, asking for contacts in the Twin Cities, and quickly amassed 15 future friends. They finalized their project plan June 1, booked flights and an Airbnb and arrived June 3.

Resting in power

In one day, they raised $1,000 in donations and decided to pay the remaining expenses out of pocket (they declined to say how much).

The tombstones were printed with the help of the UPS Store at 2751 Hennepin Av. S., which insisted on staying open late for the artists. Community members covered the monuments with plastic bags to protect them from rain. A construction worker and his wife donated 300 metal stakes.

One night, Barber and Wright got an e-mail saying people were checking to make sure the cemetery was OK.

"I almost cried reading that e-mail," said Wright. "To see how the community made it their own, and has done with it what they see fit, is absolutely so powerful."

They plan to print 500 aerial photos of the cemetery and sell them for $1,000 each to raise money for the Anti-Racism Fund (antiracismfund.org). They are working on a website for the project; the e-mail account is saytheirnamescemetery@gmail.com

Community vigil

Wright and Barber helped organize a vigil there last Sunday. As night fell, about 300 people streamed into the park. A Trader Joe's employee handed out donated flowers. People sitting on the grass shouted George Floyd's name.

Two friends, Analyah Schlaeger Dos Santos and Sophie Seibure, sat on a hill gripping a flag with a demented smiley face and red handprints on one side, and white text that read "This is our America" on the other.

"What you see around us, the shocking things, this is what America is, so we made a new flag," said Schlaeger Dos Santos.

Minneapolis resident Arwo Warsame and her children, Aliya Habib, 4, and Amin Habib, 5, spread flowers at several of the gravestones. For her, the most moving part was "all the people uniting, joining from all races, and honoring [Floyd's] life, and respecting and understanding the pain and our reality," she said.

Wright and Barber were heading home this weekend, but the project will stay.

"We are not intent on deciding the fate of this," said Wright, his black face mask slipping off his mouth. "We're going to make sure we follow what the community wants."

612-673-4437 · @AliciaEler

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

Soucheray: Never having to fear the police is a big advantage in life

ARTICLE DCLV. SOUCHERAY: NEVER HAVING TO FEAR THE POLICE IS A BIG ADVANTAGE IN LIFE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 14, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 606 words

Byline: Joe Soucheray

Highlight: We had one cop, Swede. My father, who ceremoniously had a Mahtomedi police badge, which I now have, most certainly knew his real name. These were the days when people in small town America who had roles often went by just their first name, Gus the barber, Ralph the groceryman, Al at the gas station, [...]

Body

We had one cop, Swede. My father, who ceremoniously had a Mahtomedi police badge, which I now have, most certainly knew his real name. These were the days when people in small town America who had roles often went by just their first name, Gus the barber, Ralph the groceryman, Al at the gas station, John the boatman, Fritz the painter, Swede the cop.

It was a different world in a different century in a different country. One cop. We didn't know our abundances were so astonishing. We took them for granted. Chicago Avenue and 38th Street in Minneapolis? Where was that?

We are entitled to our memories but they only serve to remember a charm and simplicity that doesn't even seem real. A black man named George Floyd died under a police officer's knee on Memorial Day. National Guard trucks have now been in the streets. Businesses have been burned and looted. A man named George Floyd died under a police officer's knee.

We had one cop.

Swede was a burly guy with bushy black hair. His black boots were always polished and I would bet a million dollars he never used them in vain or profanity. I suppose Swede's review panel, if such a formality existed, consisted of my father and other members of the Mahtomedi City Council during their tenures. I doubt if there was anything untoward to discover. Everybody knew where Swede lived, shopped and went to church.

We had our run-ins. One was a traffic stop. The other was a noise complaint based on our band playing in the garage one summer night and attracting a growing crowd. Swede must have been called or was driving by.

Soucheray: Never having to fear the police is a big advantage in life

"How long is this going to last, Henry?" Swede asked my father.

"Damned if I know."

"How about by 10:30?"

And off he went.

Didn't everybody live like this, never afraid of the boot or the anvil that could drop at any minute for any reason, even reasons that didn't exist? We were white, of course. Swede was white. The butcher, the baker and the candlestick maker were white. Can't apologize for that; I didn't have a say in the matter.

We could have become poets or scientists or rock stars or NHL players. We didn't have anything standing in our way. We had put-together families and good schools and food on the table. No threat of the boot or the knee or the anvil dropped from above ever occurred to us on our charmed paths.

Never having to be afraid of the police is big advantage in life. Being afraid of Swede would have been like being afraid of a blue sky. I am sure all across America there were Swede the cops, just not enough of them. Too many bad things happened and too many dangers roiled in the shadows of a black life. We would have needed millions of Swedes to have changed the course of history.

And now the course of history will be changed by 8 minutes of a cop's knee on a black man's neck. The course must be changed and the Minneapolis police chief, Medaria Arradondo, appears to get it; get inside that police federation and bring it to its knee, force it into accountability and transparency and meaningful repercussions for inhumane behavior. What happened can't happen. Ever again.

Everybody back in the village is long gone, Henry, the painter, the barber, the groceryman, Al at the gas station. And Swede, who died in about the mid-'70s.

I got it from one of my brothers.

Swede's name was Deforest Williams.

Joe Soucheray can be reached at jsoucheray@pioneerpress.com. Soucheray's "Garage Logic" podcast can be heard at garagelogic.com. Soucheray: This progressive transfer of wealth from renters to developers and big corporations Soucheray: What is going on? Does anybody know? Joe Soucheray: When did masks start revealing everything?

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

ARTICLE DCLVI. ATLANTA POLICE CHIEF RESIGNS AFTER FATAL POLICE SHOOTING

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 14, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 953 wordsByline: Russ BynumHighlight: ATLANTA (AP) - Atlanta's police chief resigned Saturday hours after a black man was fatally shot by an officer in a struggle following a field sobriety test. Authorities said the slain man had grabbed an officer's Taser, but was running away when he was shot.Body

ATLANTA - Atlanta's police chief resigned Saturday hours after a black man was fatally shot by an officer in a struggle following a field sobriety test. Authorities said the slain man had grabbed an officer's Taser, but was running away when he was shot.

Police Chief Erika Shields stepped down as the killing of 27-year-old Rayshard Brooks sparked a new wave of protests in Atlanta after turbulent demonstrations that followed the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis had simmered down.

Protesters on Saturday night set fire to the Wendy's restaurant where Brooks was fatally shot the night before and blocked traffic on a nearby highway.

Atlanta Mayor Keisha Lance Bottoms announced the police chief's resignation at a Saturday afternoon news conference. The mayor also called for the immediate firing of the unidentified officer who opened fire at Brooks.

"I do not believe that this was a justified use of deadly force and have called for the immediate termination of the officer," Bottoms said.

She said it was Shields' own decision to step aside as police chief and that she would remain with the city in an undetermined role. Interim Corrections Chief Rodney Bryant would serve as interim police chief until a permanent replacement is found.

The Georgia Bureau of Investigation, which is investigating the shooting, said the deadly confrontation started with officers responding to a complaint that a man was sleeping in a car blocking the restaurant's drive-thru lane. The GBI said Brooks failed a field sobriety test and then resisted officers' attempts to arrest him.

The GBI released security camera video of the shooting Saturday. The footage shows a man running from two white police officers as he raises a hand, which is holding some type of object, toward an officer a few steps behind him. The officer draws his gun and fires as the man keeps running, then falls to the ground in the parking lot.

Atlanta police chief resigns after fatal police shooting

GBI Director Vic Reynolds said Brooks had grabbed a Taser from one of the officers and appeared to point it at the officer as he fled, prompting the officer to reach for his gun and fire an estimated three shots.

The security camera video recorded Brooks "running or fleeing from Atlanta police officers," Reynolds said. "It appears that he has in his hand a Taser."

The footage does not show Brooks' initial struggle with police.

L. Chris Stewart, an attorney for Brooks' family, said the officer who shot him should be charged for "an unjustified use of deadly force, which equals murder."

"You can't have it both ways in law enforcement," Stewart said. "You can't say a Taser is a nonlethal weapon ... but when an African American grabs it and runs with it, now it's some kind of deadly, lethal weapon that calls for you to unload on somebody."

He said Brooks was a father of four and had celebrated a daughter's eighth birthday Friday before he was killed.

The shooting came at a time of heightened tension over police brutality and calls for reforms across the U.S. following the May 25 death of Floyd in Minneapolis. Atlanta was among U.S. cities where large crowds of protesters took to the streets.

Demonstrators, including members of Brooks' family, gathered Saturday outside the restaurant where he was shot.

Among those protesting was Crystal Brooks, who said she is Rayshard Brooks' sister-in-law.

"He wasn't causing anyone any harm," she said. "The police went up to the car and even though the car was parked they pulled him out of the car and started tussling with him."

She added: "He did grab the Taser, but he just grabbed the Taser and ran."

Shields, Atlanta's police chief for less than four years, was initially praised in the days following Floyd's death last month. She said the Minnesota officers involved should go to prison and walked into crowds of protesters in downtown Atlanta, telling demonstrators she understood their frustrations and fears. She appeared at Bottoms' side as the mayor made an impassioned plea for protesters to go home when things turned violent with smashed storefronts and police cruisers set ablaze.

Days later, Shields fired two officers and benched three others caught on video May 30 in a hostile confrontation with two college students whose car was stuck in traffic caused by the protests. The officers fired Tasers at the pair and dragged them from the vehicle. When prosecutors later charged six of the officers involved, however, Shields openly questioned the charges.

The shooting of Brooks two weeks later raised further questions about the Atlanta department. In a statement, Shields said she chose to resign "out of a deep and abiding love for this city and this department."

Atlanta police chief resigns after fatal police shooting

"It is time for the city to move forward and build trust between law enforcement and the communities they serve," Shields said.

Reynolds said his agents will turn over results of their investigation to Fulton County District Attorney Paul Howard, whose office will decide whether criminal charges are warranted against either of the unidentified officers.

Howard said Saturday his office "has already launched an intense, independent investigation of the incident" without waiting for the GBI's results.

Brooks died after being taken to an Atlanta hospital. One of the officers was treated and released for unspecified injuries.

Bynum reported from Savannah, Georgia. Associated Press writer Pat Eaton-Robb in Hartford, Connecticut, contributed to this report. First COVID-19 vaccine tested in US poised for final testing Minnesota among 4 states added to NY's coronavirus quarantine list First federal execution in 17 years; another set Wednesday Protest in Pennsylvania after cop uses knee to restrain man Cleveland Indians, other teams pressured after Redskins drop nickname

Graphic

Protestors gather outside the Wendy's fast food restaurant in Atlanta on Saturday, June 13, 2020, where Rayshard Brooks, a 27-year-old black man, was shot and killed by Atlanta police Friday evening during a struggle in a drive-thru line. (Steve Schaefer/Atlanta Journal-Constitution via AP)

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

BOOKMARK

ARTICLE DCLVII. BOOKMARK

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 6ELength: 1267 wordsByline: LAURIE HERTZEL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The best news: You've got mailBody

It's been four months since I wrote here about the lost art of letter-writing. I didn't mean to wait so long to revisit this topic, but there's been a lot going on. Winter ended. COVID arrived. The U.S. Postal Service faced bankruptcy. Quarantine began, and with it joblessness and furloughs and worry and doubt and pain. A black man named George Floyd was killed by a Minneapolis police officer, and protesters filled the streets. Curfews were instated.

Through quarantine and curfew, we lost the privilege of hanging out with friends. We turned to Zoom as a way to see another friendly face. We got sick of Zoom.

Could there be a better time to revive letter-writing?

The truth is, after I posed that question - do you still write letters? - you sent me so many letters in response that I couldn't keep up. I tried, for a while, to write back to everyone, sending off a few notes a day, but I was quickly overwhelmed. This is a good thing. I am extremely grateful to all of you who took time to write - hundreds and hundreds of you.

You sent messages by e-mail, by Facebook, and by U.S. mail - handwritten notes, some with decorated envelopes or with tokens tucked inside: a packet of tea, a couple of postcards, some postage stamps. Thank you all, so much. And thank you, too, for your thoughts and for your unwavering belief in the written (handwritten) word.

And your messages were homey and surprising and sometimes sweet. You wrote about how your mother wrote to you weekly when you were away at college and how you are now doing the same with your children; how you still write to your best friend from grade school; how you fell in love with letters when you got a pen pal 40 years ago.

Oh, let's not have me summarize. Let's hear from you, in your own words:

BOOKMARK

Debbi Anderson, Maple Grove: I, too, loved writing letters as a young person, and have always appreciated stamps. I still walk into the Osseo post office and ask for "pretty stamps" - birds, animals, nature. I teach first-graders in a public school, and in my classroom I have a "writing center" stocked with letter-writing and book-making supplies. I hope to motivate each year's class of students to become letter writers.

Mary Tingblad, Minnetrista: It was a wonderful coincidence that I read your article today, as I was going through my stack of Sunday papers to find interesting articles to include with letters I send to deployed military personnel. I joined Soldiers' Angels (soldiersangels.org) about two years ago. This weekend I wrote 12 letters, including one to my adopted Air Force servicewoman and one to a special ops chaplain. I agree that letter-writing has become a lost art, but I am not ready to give it up.

Jane Simon, Minneapolis: I am always delighted by a letter or a card. To receive a real letter is gold! My children were encouraged to write thank-you notes and now they seem to be raising their children to do the same, which delights me. They write such funny things. One grandchild wrote recently, "Dear Grandma Jane, thank you so much for the lovely money!"

Doug Harper, Forest Lake: Once I carried a battered box into a classroom (I'm a sociology prof) and told the class it contained my most precious objects. I then turned it upside down (to their horror) and hundreds of letters cascaded onto the floor. They were mostly from my parents when I lived in Boston and New York. There were many other packets of letters: precious objects that would arrive in an American Express office during a 6½-month wandering study abroad during the Vietnam years. Such a treasure to read them now.

I'm now writing my niece, a college freshman in Oregon. It's great fun. I put them into an envelope and include a $20 bill and often a special book. This week it was Engels' "Condition of the Working Class in 1844." Poor kid. She says she likes them a lot and feels special because none of her friends have such weird relatives.

Norma Gaffron, New Brighton: Yes, letters in an envelope are special. And you can include things like a piece of fabric to show your sister in Milwaukee the material you are using to make new bedroom drapes.

Patsy Ramberg, White Bear Lake: My dad saved piles of letters. These are letters from ordinary people going about their lives. Such as:

"The tomatoes are ripening very slow. I have had some that measured 11½ inches around them and three inches thick. My cucumbers are still producing."

"The past few days have been digging up our geraniums and potting them for the winter. They will be blooming thru January, in the house."

"Where is your brother Henry now? I heard he was in MO. I hear his boy 'Sonny Boy' is a doctor now."

I plan on saving all the letters. I don't know what my kids will do with them. Maybe one will see them as the treasure they are - a social history of American life gone by.

Bryan Rogers, Little Canada: I come from a family of letter writers. On my maternal grandmother's side, they had what they called the Round Robin. It was a large envelope that would circulate among a couple dozen or more of them. When the Round Robin arrived at your house, you would read all of the letters enclosed by the others, and remove your old letter and include a new letter, and send it on to the next person. It would only come around a couple of times a year, so it was always big fun when it would arrive.

BOOKMARK

Mary Ellen Bruski, Robbinsdale: The loss of letter-writing will cause future genealogists and family history writers to weep for what could have been. I am a genealogist and have been thrilled so many times upon finding an old letter or postcard that helped me figure out relationships and where people lived.

I have learned a lot about ancestors via postcards that are over 100 years old. Before home telephones were common they sometimes sent one another postcards across the same city to just say "I'm coming to see you Tuesday." I have one cryptic card that is a real head scratcher, mailed from Toronto to St. Paul: "Well, I can't say much until I hear from you, but I guess I will be OK." Hope he or she was!

Harold Lieberman, St. Cloud: As a junior in high school in the late 1930s, I became interested in history. So I wrote the great historian Charles Beard - his address was in Who's Who - to ask what one could do with a career in history. When two South American countries threatened to go to war over territory, I expressed my probably naïve concern to Undersecretary of State Sumner Welles. When I heard the N.Y. Philharmonic (on the radio) playing "Mark Twain Suite," a new work by Jerome Kern, I wrote telling him how much I liked it. In each case I received a personal response.

In 2015, I ran across a brief biography of my first love during my Army days. I knew that she had died many years ago, but I thought her children might be interested in things I knew about her before they were born. So I wrote the daughter who had written her bio. And suddenly there was an explosion of excited phone calls, e-mails and letters from five of her children and a sister, all saying they knew about me as their mother's "lost love," but they never knew my surname. (It seems their grandmother had intercepted my letters, so my girl thought I had dumped her; the letters were discovered years later.) So I'm now closely connected to a wonderful and talented "alternate reality" family, some of whom have cross-countried to visit me. You never know when life will deal you an unexpected hand.

Now that I'm ancient - I'll be 98 next month - I still write letters. Witness this.

Laurie Hertzell is the Star Tribune's senior editor for books. On Facebook: facebook.com/startribunebooks.

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

CDC built plant at site of '67 riots

ARTICLE DCLVIII. CDC BUILT PLANT AT SITE OF '67 RIOTS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 3DLength: 838 wordsByline: LEE SCHAFFER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Reminders of the one-time giant Control Data Corp. (CDC) can be seen all over the Twin Cities, from a street named Computer Avenue in Edina to its gleaming Bloomington headquarters that is now home to HealthPartners.

The former Control Data North Side plant in Minneapolis is still there, too, now housing a school. It lies between the North Loop neighborhood of Minneapolis and neighborhoods just to the northwest where frustrations among blacks in Minneapolis had boiled over in 1967.

The leaders of Control Data watched what happened that summer and opened that plant to hire people from the nearby neighborhoods in 1968.

This history suddenly feels relevant again, after Minneapolis and St. Paul just experienced the biggest protests against racial injustice since that era.

Even the largest companies with the most forward-thinking leaders have looked flat-footed in response. Expressions of grief and horror, yes, as more than 50 Minnesota executives explained in a joint statement.

They added that the necessary change "needs to start with us." If any have announced any ambitious new efforts, it's escaped my attention.

Big companies, like Control Data in its prime and those on the top of the Star Tribune 50, are the businesses that can make a good-sized dent in a problem. Among other things, they have the money and management expertise to try something big.

Control Data is almost all gone now, but at one time it employed more than 25,000 Minnesotans. It did not even take 10 years, from its 1957 start, to first appear on the famous Fortune 500 ranking.

The motivation of CDC co-founder and CEO Bill Norris seemed to undergo a shift in the late 1960s even as the North Side project was already underway, as described by historian Thomas Misa in his excellent book "Digital State," on Minnesota's computer industry.

CDC built plant at site of '67 riots

Norris clearly saw a chance to make money with the plant, and get some government-training funds for workers. Yet by 1968 he had a much deeper commitment to the North Side plant and other projects like it.

He wrote a colleague that the "poverty and riot situation has gotten so bad that it is by all odds the number one problem for Control Data. We are in the fortunate position of having a little bit of a jump on the situation, but Control Data has to do much, much more."

When he wrote an essay about it a decade later, Norris did not talk about racism, the legacy of housing discrimination in the Twin Cities nor any other root causes. Instead, he simply called the people of Minneapolis he wanted to help "disadvantaged."

That's no longer a fashionable term, but the word clearly establishes that there are Americans born with advantages they didn't earn and others born with disadvantages they didn't deserve.

Control Data laid out some principles to make the North Side plant a success, starting with making a product important to its customers to keep management's full attention. There would be no compromises on quality or productivity.

The company knew it had to train workers and assigned a lawyer to help them with what Norris called "an unusual amount of legal hassle with landlords and stores." And finally, the company's managers realized that workers needed convenient child care.

Control Data eventually created a slew of ventures that could be fit under the umbrella of social programs, although this era did not last long. Control Data spent much of the 1980s restructuring and basically trying to stay afloat, making those initiatives look like distractions.

But Control Data was ambitious. Who in the Twin Cities business community will be that ambitious today?

One of the best things I have recently seen written about the current state of racial injustice is that just by being here we can become part of the problem. We are quick to blame others, and today that blame is heaped on the Minneapolis cop who kept his knee on the neck of George Floyd. But another leader in another civil conflict, the fight for freedom in Eastern Europe not long ago, knew better.

The Czech writer Václav Havel in 1978 wrote an essay that described a grocery manager putting up a tired communist slogan in the shop window. The grocer didn't believe the slogan, of course. He was only showing he hoped to get along in the world. And the grocer reasoned that customers wouldn't even notice it and likely had similar posters where they worked.

Havel showed that people do not have to wholeheartedly buy into the lie to become part of the problem. They just had to be willing to take their own place within it.

Like Havel's grocer, many of us have a hard time even noticing that Americans don't all have an equal shot and deny, despite the evidence, that some people are "disadvantaged," as Bill Norris might've put it.

We don't have to believe that, but if the days turn into months and then years as nothing really changes, it's not them anymore. It's us.

Norris and Control Data maybe didn't solve much half a century ago. They did, however, recognize they had to really try.

CDC built plant at site of '67 riots

lee.schafer@startribune.com · 612-673-4302

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCLIX. CITING LACK OF SUPPORT, OFFICERS QUITTING MPD

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1200 wordsByline: LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITER; LIZ SAWYER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

At least seven Minneapolis police officers have resigned from the department since widespread unrest began over the death of George Floyd last month, and more than half a dozen are in the process of leaving, according to department officials.

The departures, an unusually large exodus, come amid a growing crisis for the state's largest police force, with a state human rights investigation underway, calls for defunding, and even disbandment.

Morale has sunk to new lows in recent weeks, say department insiders, as officers reported feeling misunderstood and squeezed by all sides: by the state probe; by protesters, who hurled bricks and epithets their way; by city leaders, who surrendered a police station that later burned on national television, and by the media. Numerous officers and protesters were injured the rioting.

An uncertain fate for police is likely driving a rash of resignations for those who examine the political climate and think to themselves: "Why should I stay?" said Mylan Masson, a retired Minneapolis police officer and use-of-force expert. "They don't feel appreciated. Everybody hates the police right now. I mean everybody."

But those reactions are unlikely to generate much sympathy from social justice activists, who pointed out the irony of officers' use of tear gas and rubber bullets on crowds protesting Floyd's death and past cases of police brutality.

City spokesperson Casper Hill confirmed that seven officers have left the department, but did not make information about them available. Although their demographics and individual motivations are unclear, several officers in exit interviews cited a lack of support from MPD leadership and City Hall as protests escalated, according to the insiders, who requested anonymity so they could speak freely. Another seven officers are in the process of filing separation paperwork, and several others had to be talked out of leaving.

Citing lack of support, officers quitting MPD

In an e-mail to supervisors earlier this month, a senior MPD official suggested that some officers had simply walked off the job in protest.

"During this busy and trying time I have heard secondhand information that there have been employees that have advised their supervisors that they separated with the city (or quit) without completing paperwork," deputy chief Henry Halvorson wrote in an e-mail, while directing officers wishing to leave to contact the human resources department. "We need to have the process completed to ensure that we know who is continuing to work."

A police spokesman on Friday said that the departures would not affect the quality of public safety services.

"There's nothing that leads us to believe that at this point the numbers are so great that it's going to be problematic," spokesman John Elder said of the parting officers, which include both patrol officers and detectives. "People seek to leave employment for a myriad reasons - the MPD is no exception."

The department currently has about 850 officers, almost 40 short of the number authorized for this year, Elder said, adding that a class of 29 recruits is expected to graduate and hit the streets later this summer.

Like other city departments, the MPD was already facing the possibility of layoffs from the COVID-19 pandemic, with early budget forecasts predicting revenue shortfalls of as much as $200 million this year, or roughly 12%.

And even before the unrest, an aging workforce had pressured police leadership to accelerate hiring to backfill dozens of veterans who joined the force during the Clinton presidency. As of Memorial Day, at least 75 officers were eligible to leave with full retirement benefits.

Andy Skoogman, executive director of the Minnesota Chiefs of Police Association, said the ripple effects from Floyd's death are sure to exacerbate an uphill battle to recruit and retain officers nationwide.

A marked shift in public attitudes toward the profession, coupled with low pay and high turnover, has driven a 25-year low in applicants.

"It sets all of us back," Skoogman said of the fired officers' actions. However, for chiefs appalled by what they saw on the bystander video of Floyd's arrest, he said this may be a chance to rebuild their departments with individuals amenable to change.

"Perhaps it's an opportunity to bring in new blood and new people," Skoogman said, "but I worry that there simply aren't the candidates out there" to replace them.

Determining exactly who is leaving may be just as important as why, said Charles Wilson, president of the National Association of Black Law Enforcement Officers. But the ongoing calls for downsizing the police department could have the unintended effect of alienating young officers who come to the job with a stronger mandate for public service, he said, and will inevitably hinder reform efforts. Intense backlash from Floyd's death reflects on officers in every agency - good and bad, he said.

"What people have to recognize, yes the institution of policing is inherently biased against people of color and it was designed to be that way," said Wilson, a retired Rhode Island chief. "But having said that, it's only a few of the 700,000 police officers across the country who are idiots, and don't know how to treat people with dignity and respect."

Citing lack of support, officers quitting MPD

Current and former police told the Star Tribune that officers were angry about Mayor Jacob Frey's decision to abandon the Third Precinct police station, a move that some within the department took to mean he was siding with the protests.

In an interview earlier this month, Chief Medaria Arradondo defended the action as necessary to protect the public and officers, but said he understood the frustration.

"I absolutely respect and understand how that is a deep part of our culture, but at the same time the cost of any one of my officers being severely injured, it's a cost too high that I refuse to pay," he said.

Floyd's death has been almost universally condemned inside the department, and a handful of officers issued a public letter embracing Arradondo and vowing to work toward regaining public trust.

In some ways, the flurry of recent resignations echoes a theme that surfaced around the time of the Fourth Precinct Occupation in 2015 after Jamar Clark was killed by police, when officers reported feeling abandoned by the administration and City Hall.

A 108-page federal report that followed protests after another controversial police killing described a "dynamic and chaotic" chain of events in which rank-and-file officers felt powerless, "as if they were left to deal with the occupation on their own."

Officers, in interviews with Justice Department officials, said they felt as if police and city leaders had sided with the community against them, particularly after they failed to authorize force in response to a series of attacks one night with rocks and Molotov cocktails.

Then, as now, some officers spoke of feeling underappreciated, and being asked to answer for the actions of one of their colleagues.

"It's a stressful job," said Masson, the use-of-force expert. "Their families are asking, Is it worth it? "

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

libor.jany@startribune.com 612-849-5440 · Twitter: @StribJany

liz.sawyer@startribune.com 612-673-4648

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

ARTICLE DCLX. CONFEDERATE DISPLAYS PUSH AGENCY BACK AND FORTH

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 5BLength: 605 wordsByline: JOHN REINAN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Sauk Rapids bar delisted twice from state tourism websiteBody

It was a topsy-turvy week for Visit Greater St. Cloud, the central Minnesota tourism promotion agency.

The agency pulled the listing for a popular local bar and restaurant from Explore Minnesota, the state's official tourism site, after receiving community complaints over the bar's displays of Confederate paraphernalia.

After a review, the agency said nothing in the listing was against its policies, and it returned Rollie's Rednecks and Longnecks in Sauk Rapids to the site.

Community members, led by the social justice group #UniteCloud, objected again. This time, the tourism agency delisted Rollie's once again from the state website - and from its own, too.

"We hear you. We understand. And we're committed to doing better," Visit Greater St. Cloud said in a statement. "As an organization that promotes travel, tourism and events in a diverse community, we understand the importance of addressing and eliminating hate, prejudice and racism wherever it may occur.

"Now more than ever, Visit Greater St. Cloud is focused on promoting all of the good, positive things to do in our area, and we strive to keep Greater St. Cloud a fun, easy, safe place to visit. We will continue to learn, adapt and grow, and we hope you can join us on that journey."

Rollie's touts itself as "Minnesota's No. 1 honkytonk." Photos on the bar's website show a variety of Confederate memorabilia on display, including flags, signs, posters and items related to "The Dukes of Hazzard," a popular 1980s TV show.

The bar is owned by Roland Hogrefe, who did not return a phone call and a text seeking comment. Hogrefe was convicted of a felony in 2011 after he ran down a black man with his truck on a St. Cloud street. According to Benton County court records, Hogrefe was sentenced to a year and a day in state prison after pleading guilty to a felony charge of leaving the scene of an injury accident. His prison sentence was stayed, and he was ordered to serve 90 days in the county jail.

Confederate displays push agency back and forth

Media reports at the time said Hogrefe drove by a group of African-American men and exchanged insults. He turned his vehicle around and drove back at the men, striking and injuring one, then drove away. He was arrested after police identified his distinctive truck.

Among the first to object to Rollie's Confederate display was Christopher Lehman, a professor at St. Cloud State University.

"As a taxpaying resident of Minnesota, I do not want my tax dollars to go towards promoting a business that glorifies the Confederacy, whose army fought against and killed thousands of Minnesotans," Lehman wrote. "As a taxpaying resident of Minnesota and a descendant of slaves, I do not want my tax dollars to go towards promoting a business that glorifies people who seceded from the United States to defend slavery.

"If, in this post-George Floyd climate, the former Confederate state of Virginia can remove its statue of Robert E. Lee, then the Union state of Minnesota, where Floyd was killed, can stop promoting a restaurant glorifying an army that killed thousands of Minnesotans in the name of defending slavery."

In an interview, Lehman said he wasn't trying to shut down the business.

"All I wanted to do was get the government out of the way," he said. "What goes on in different businesses that are privately owned, they are free to do whatever they want. That's their freedom of speech. I'm not looking for anyone to get shut down or lose their business.

"Since there's some government involvement ... with something that has to do with promoting Confederate imagery during this time we're living in right now, I was greatly opposed to that."

John Reinan · 612-673-7402

Load-Date: June 17, 2020

ARTICLE DCLXI. HOT DISH POLITICS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 2BLength: 504 wordsByline: TOREY VAN OOT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Getting back on the campaign trailBody

The socially distanced campaign season has arrived.

As Minnesotans return to restaurants, gyms and theaters following months of coronavirus closures, some candidates are resuming in-person efforts to court voters.

Minnesota-based staff for the Trump Victory effort have tweeted about knocking on doors as part of the campaign's summer launch. "The shutdown is ending and now we talk with real people in person," one woman tweeted, along with a selfie featuring a mask, clipboard and bottle of hand sanitizer.

Mary Giuliani Stephens, a former Woodbury mayor challenging Senate DFL Leader Susan Kent in a suburban district, sent an e-mail to supporters seeking door-knocking volunteers of her own. "Efforts will use precautions such as stepping back from doors and wearing masks with older voters," the e-mail read.

And Tyler Kistner, a Republican running against U.S. Rep. Angie Craig in a suburban swing district, has been meeting voters at farmers markets and small gatherings. On Wednesday, he spoke at a Rice County Republican meeting. Photos posted to Twitter show no one wearing masks in the open-doored barn.

"I think voters are looking to see more engagement at this point," said Billy Grant, a GOP strategist advising Kistner's campaign. "In all cases, we're taking precautions, still following social distancing. People were glad to see him and glad to see him talking about the issues."

Not everyone is rushing back to the physical campaign trail. DFL Party Chairman Ken Martin said Democrats are "going to continue to follow advice of public health officials and campaign virtually." He criticized Republicans for "doing everything they can to fly in the face of facts and science" and disregarding public health.

"We've been very clear about our guidance and directives, which is to really limit in-person campaigning where possible," he said. "I think a vast majority of Minnesotans still support these socially distancing measures and are still worried about COVID. And we have to respect where the electorate is."

HOT DISH POLITICS

Outside the campaign trail, the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody and the unrest that followed have also prompted more in-person appearances from politicians on both sides of the aisle. Republican U.S. Senate candidate Jason Lewis, who also campaigned during the stay-at-home order, visited damaged businesses, alongside GOP congressional candidate Lacy Johnson. A number of state legislative and congressional Democrats have also made site visits in recent weeks.

Democratic U.S. Rep. Ilhan Omar, who represents Minneapolis, has been one of the most visible members of the congressional delegation in the wake of Floyd's death, attending protests, listening sessions and community service events in the district. Her campaign has partnered with nonprofits for donation drives, turning its headquarters into a "distribution center to provide food and other essentials for members of our community."

"My goal right now," she said, "is to support the community we represent in a critical time."

Load-Date: June 17, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCLXII. HOW TV CAN DO THE RIGHT THING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 10ELength: 667 wordsByline: NEAL JUSTIN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Former Minnesotan Craig Wright shares his thoughts on what Hollywood should - and shouldn't - do next.Body

TV producer Craig Wright was in a writers meeting this month when his mind drifted toward recent events in his former home of Minneapolis. As the creator of "Greenleaf," the Oprah-blessed Memphis megachurch drama that returns for its fifth and final season June 23, he knows firsthand that the arts can play a role in addressing hot-button issues, like racial inequality. But just how to weigh in is tricky business.

Wright, who launched a successful playwriting career out of the Twin Cities before moving to Los Angeles to write for "Six Feet Under," took some time last week to discuss the role that he - and Hollywood - should play in the coming months.

Q: You're working on a "Greenleaf" spinoff and another show for OWN. How might you address what's been happening through those series?

A: Obviously, a lot of shows rely on stories that are, so to speak, ripped from the headlines. I'm not sure how useful those stories are to society. More often than not, they just intensify whatever stereotypes people already have and further numb the audience to the facts. But I will say this about TV writers. Deadlines come up so fast that we're often looking for anything that can fill up a minute of time. The math dictates that sometimes you end up doing "very special episodes." But what's better is to work by misdirection in a slow and steady way.

Q: Can you give me some examples from your work?

A: "Six Feet Under" was "about" mortality and the funeral industry. But what it achieved in terms of normalizing homosexuality for audiences it achieved by never making that the story. David's sexuality was almost shocking in its plainness. Similarly, much of the positive feedback I get about "Greenleaf" is about the chance to see different kinds of very specific black lives. The show is "about" the black church, but it's really about continuing the work of normalizing affluent black characters.

How TV can do the right thing

Q: You made a similar statement by hiring Candis Cayne to play a transgender character in your series "Dirty Sexy Money" without making a big production about it.

A: All I did was hire a transgender person. How on Earth could you do otherwise? It ended up laying the groundwork for that to be more obviously acceptable. I think it's really simple. It's not about telling stories about specific events that have happened these past few weeks. That might make white people feel better for a little while, but it's really about putting black artists in places where they can tell the stories they want to tell. It's about broadening their access to the medium.

Q: Have you started to think of story lines influenced by recent events that you'll incorporate into future writing?

A: If I were to say this was triggering new ideas for me, then I would take myself out behind the barn and shoot myself. What's going on right now is so more profound than art and television. Before anyone starts referencing what happened to George Floyd in fiction, please, write about it in news articles and op-eds first. I shouldn't be commodifying the tragedy. This is going to need to be digested over a long period of time. Now is time for me to listen and wait.

Q: You did, however, write a play after 09/11 called "Recent Tragic Events."

A: But I would never have dared to write a play pretending to commemorate the lives of those who were lost or something profound like that. That work was about how angry I was at the media and its narration, how they were turning the tragedy into a TV show, like Katie Couric putting a camera in someone's face and asking them to tell her what it's like to dig your friend out of the rubble.

Q: What would you like to see less of?

A: At the very least, maybe we could have less shows about cops. They're good for TV writers. They have identifiable tasks, and there's this illusion of good guys and bad guys. Shows about cops are perfect for TV, but not especially good for humanity.

Neal Justin · 612-673-7431

Njustin@startribune.com Twitter: @nealjustin

Greenleaf

When: 8 p.m. June 23 · Where: OWN

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

ARTICLE DCLXIII. INSIDE JAMES BROWN'S WORLD

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 1772 wordsByline: JON BREAM; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Edina author writes about his "wild fantasy" years working with the Godfather of Soul.Body

A couple of days after submitting his letter of resignation, Alan Leeds had to finally face his ex-boss - James Brown, the Godfather of Soul - who was standing outside a private jet.

"He said, 'Mr. Leeds, you're making a big mistake,' " Leeds remembered. "At one point, I almost started to cry. He sensed it and he said, 'There's a lot of man in you, but I see there's still some boy. You'll come to your senses. Maybe we're not done.' "

The Edina music maven shares that story and many others in his entertaining and insightful new book, "There Was a Time: James Brown, the Chitlin' Circuit, and Me."

The book is both a history and a memoir, a splendidly seamless blend of life with Soul Brother No. 1 and Leeds' own story as a DJ, publicist, advance man, tour director and Grammy-winning historian for Brown.

Written in an engagingly conversational fashion, the book chronicles the first act of Leeds' five-decade career behind the scenes in the music business. His later acts involved Prince, Kiss, D'Angelo, Barry White and many others.

In fact, all those other acts got in the way of Leeds finishing this Brown book, which he began writing in 1980.

"This became kind of a running gag with my mother and my wife: Are you ever gonna finish that book?" said Leeds.

Ethically, he didn't think he should be writing a book about his ex-boss while he was working for Prince, Maxwell or any other big star. He didn't want to be known as a tell-all type. Finally, after coordinating comedian Chris Rock's tour in 2018, Leeds retired from the road and focused on writing about his "wildly unpredictable fantasy" with Brown.

Growing up poor in rural Georgia, Brown was a complicated figure, more friendly just-folks than sophisticated music royalty, more patriarch than boss, as Leeds tells it.

"The biggest surprise was how his impulsiveness and ego frequently trumped his vast knowledge of the black music business into decisions that weren't always in his best interest," wrote Leeds, who served as a consultant to two acclaimed 2014 Brown movies, the documentary "Mr. Dynamite: The Rise of James Brown" and the biopic "Get on Up."

A journalism school dropout, Leeds eventually viewed himself as a historian for Brown. While the boss kept copious records of finances and mental stock of loyalty, he never listed credits for musicians on his recordings. Leeds picked the brains of the various JB players for back information as well as combing through libraries for newspaper clippings, accumulating enough details for a 400-page-plus discography, a project for another day.

"That historian aspect of Alan was there from Day 1," said younger brother Eric Leeds, a tenor saxophonist with Prince and others. "Alan was subscribing to the trade journals like Cashbox and Billboard when he was 10 years old. He was really reading them and fascinated with not only that week but also what was going on before and why [that impacted] what is going on this week."

While with the Brown organization, Leeds even scribbled conversations in diaries, enabling him to recreate old dialogue for his book. Like a phone call from Lagos, Nigeria, after a series of concerts in Africa in 1970.

"I'll be glad to get back home," Brown told Leeds. "The women ain't much to look at and the food is a drag - can't get no good ice cream."

Wanting in before he knew where

Growing up in New York City, Leeds became obsessed with R&B, thanks in part to free records from an uncle in radio and an aunt in song publishing.

"The music was an entree to a community made mysterious simply because I had no other access to it," Leeds writes. "It sounded like someplace I wanted to go long before I knew where it was."

He eventually figured out a way in after his family had relocated to Richmond, Va. In high school, he hustled a DJ gig at an R&B radio station and dances. In 1965, he landed the first in a series of radio interviews with Brown and eventually worked his way into a staff position in '69. He toured with the star, toiled in the home office in Cincinnati and later Augusta, Ga., JB's hometown.

To put the Rock Hall of Famer's story in perspective, Leeds, 73, offers a vivid history of the "chitlin' circuit," the U.S. black clubs and theaters where R&B performers traveled in the segregated 1900s, extending well into the 1960s.

In 1964, the Hardest Working Man in Show Business performed 37 shows in 11 days spread over five cities, plus a recording session.

Wrote Leeds: "Getting paid was often an adventure in itself, particularly if tickets didn't sell as expected." The tour manager never carried a gun, but the boss did and would flash it when necessary.

In the end, a modest town in Georgia just wasn't for the self-described "outspoken, pot-smoking Yankee with a Jew-fro." He missed major league baseball, cultural and dining options, the diversity and energy of a city. So he quit in 1972, though quickly rejoined Brown as a consultant ("I had more to learn").

Two decades later, they shared a Grammy Award for collaborating on the liner notes to the 1991 boxed set "Star Time," an acclaimed compilation of vintage Brown recordings.

Comparing Brown, Prince

Even though Leeds barely mentions Prince in his Brown book, comparisons are obvious between the two demanding, hardworking, visionary icons who lived in their hometowns.

"There are definitely similar characteristics," said Leeds, who moved to Minnesota in 1983 to become Prince's tour manager. "I think the biggest contrast is offstage, James was a regular guy. He'd throw on a T-shirt and dungarees and drive a pickup around Georgia. Prince feared the public. James saw the entire global public as one huge audience.

"Walking through any airport terminal with him was a trip because there wasn't an autograph he wouldn't sign. He would smile and greet people who didn't even greet him. Of all the artists I've worked for, he's the most comfortable in public."

Brown was a prominent force in the civil rights movement in the 1960s, whether proclaiming in song "Say It Loud - I'm Black and I'm Proud" or doing a free televised concert in Boston to quell riots after the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated.

Leeds feels that if Brown, who died in 2006 at age 73, were alive, he'd be involved in the aftermath of the George Floyd killing at the hands of Minneapolis police.

Leeds recalls Brown's active role in May 1970 after a 16-year-old black man was found dead amid controversy in an Augusta, Ga., jail - did he fall or was he murdered by other inmates? Demonstrations ensued in the city and six black protesters were shot to death by law enforcement.

On tour at the time, Brown flew home the next day and commanded the microphone on his own radio station to try to bring calm. He insisted that Georgia Gov. Lester Maddox, a controversial segregationist, come to town and appear with him on the airwaves.

Said Leeds: "The only quote I have from James Brown in a newspaper clipping is 'The riot is Augusta's warning ticket. It's more about white ignorance than white hate.'

"That's what he always used to say even as he became a caricature and less political in his later years," said Leeds, one of the few white employees in Brown's camp.

"He was a conservative guy in a lot of ways. He certainly believed in law and order. But his conservatism ended when it came to the plight of black men particularly and black people in general. He said many of the things we've heard recently that were said. As Al Sharpton [a former Brown tour director] suggested [at Floyd's Minneapolis memorial service], the time wasn't ripe yet in James Brown's lifetime."

Back in the day, Brown was close to Vice President Hubert Humphrey, the former Democratic senator from Minnesota whom he endorsed for president in 1968.

"He adored Humphrey," said Leeds, pointing out Brown's later support for Republicans Richard Nixon and Ronald Reagan. "James once told me of all the politicians he ever met that Humphrey was the most real, the most genuine.

Brown was so close to Humphrey that whenever the singer came to the Twin Cities in the '80s and '90s, Skip Humphrey, the VP's son who became Minnesota's attorney general, was invariably backstage.

"James would introduce him to me every time, 'Mr. Leeds, you know who this young man is? This is Vice President Humphrey's son. He's almost like you. I almost raised him.' "

Twitter: @JonBream · 612-673-1719

There Was a Time: James Brown, the Chitlin' Circuit, and Me

By: Alan Leeds.

Publisher: Post Hill Press, 264 pages, $26.

James Brown sounds off

Alan Leeds riffs on six JB songs of social commentary

'Don't Be a Dropout' (1966)

Alan Leeds: A self-explanatory title and lyric, this record led to a national campaign with Vice President Hubert Humphrey encouraging kids to stay in school.

Key lyric: "Said he went for a job/ And Mr. Man said/ Without an education/ You might as well be dead."

'America Is My Home' (1968)

Leeds: JB's attempt to combine his patriotism with his politics failed. Most black radio stations ignored the record entirely and most white stations had stopped playing his records anyhow.

Key lyric: "Now I am sorry for the man/ Who don't love this land/ Now black and white, they may fight/ But when up the enemy come/ We'll get together and run about all side."

'Say It Loud - I'm Black and I'm Proud' (1968)

Leeds: A cultural tipping point. The anthem convinced young African-Americans to identify as "black" rather than Negro. Every black home owned a copy.

Key lyric: "We've been 'buked and we've been scorned/ We've been treated bad, talked about as sure as you're born/ But just as sure as it takes two eyes to make a pair/ Brother we can't quit until we get our share."

'I Don't Want Nobody to Give Me Nothing (Open Up the Door I'll Get It Myself)' (1969)

Leeds: Or as the Rev. Al Sharpton recently said, "Get off my neck." This was the most musically interesting of Brown's "message songs." Maceo Parker's blistering sax solo would open any door.

Key lyric: "We got talents we can use/ On our side of town/ Let's get our heads together/ And get it up from the ground."

'Soul Power' (1971)

Leeds: Specifically aimed at his black audience, this was the Godfather's effort to embrace black self-reliance without the political controversy associated with the term "Black Power."

Key lyric: "What we missing (soul power)/ What we want (soul power)/ What we need (soul power)."

'Funky President (People It's Bad)' (1974)

Leeds: Brown all but gives up when Gerald Ford becomes president: "I need to be the governor and change some things 'round here."

Key lyric: "Let's get together and get some land/ Raise our food like the man/ Save our money like the Mob/ Put up a factory and own the job."

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

ARTICLE DCLXIV. REAL WORLD ECONOMICS: RECKLESS RHETORIC HARMS THE MESSAGE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 14, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1150 wordsByline: Edward LottermanHighlight: Our nation struggles in very difficult times. These are far from over. But the United States has great strengths, including many institutions, and us, the citizenry. We are more sharply divided now than in decades, and modern social media foster propagation of delusional conspiracy theories and malicious propaganda, some from Russia, China and Iran. Yet [...]Body

Our nation struggles in very difficult times. These are far from over. But the United States has great strengths, including many institutions, and us, the citizenry.

We are more sharply divided now than in decades, and modern social media foster propagation of delusional conspiracy theories and malicious propaganda, some from Russia, China and Iran. Yet these same media also facilitate bottom-up organizing for reform.

This is why it is important for citizens and leaders both to avoid "reckless talk." I would have used a stronger term but was reminded correctly of the sincerity of people expressing themselves in ways that I personally think very unhelpful.

Think about two recent but very different examples, one bubbling up from society and the other trickling down from a high public official.

In the first example, after the death of George Floyd and all that ensued, some began asserting we should "abolish the police." This was not just from a few radicals. It became a chant at demonstrations. Nine members of the Minneapolis City Council openly called to "begin the process of ending the Police Department." When Mayor Jacob Frey opposed the plan, he was loudly heckled.

Others have explained instead that "abolish" really means radical reform of policing and moving large sums from police budgets to social programs to aid the most disadvantaged. "Defund" is another common verb.

I understand the deep, longstanding anger and frustration from which these sentiments flow. Our country has severe and long-term problems in policing. These include the probability that any citizen in general - but particularly black people - will be killed by police. For the United States, the percentage is 200 times or more higher than in the United Kingdom, Germany, the Netherlands and other industrialized countries. For all people stopped by the police, the ratio is even higher, and higher yet for members of racial minorities.

There also is an increasing militarization of policing, from the federal government passing on of military fighting vehicles to training that emphasizes actions typical on a battlefield. Trainees are told to "act rather than react." The result has been summary executions by officers who seem too quick act for whatever the apparent violation or provocation, no matter how minor.

There also are protocols that once one member of a group of officers chooses to fire, all members of the group must also fire and continue to do so until their magazines are empty. Hence macabre outcomes, such as one example of two innocent men in a backfiring vehicle having over 140 bullets removed when autopsied. And then there is the surge in executing unannounced warrants.

No doubt we need deep reform in training, leadership, operating protocols, objective review of alleged misconduct, in limitations on the power of police unions, of federal "qualified immunity," of reflexive practices of lying in departments' public statements about questionable incidents and on and on. Fundamentally we need a reorientation of mentality by leaders and officers toward service to community rather than control of a dangerous enemy.

Nevertheless, we will always need police, whether as a "force" or a "service."

That some humans will harm others is an inherent part of the human condition. Securing protection against criminal acts and keeping general public order are key reasons humans banded together and organized governments. Political science textbooks commonly describe government as the entity with "a monopoly on the legal use of force."

Economists see public safety, both against crime and against disasters such as fires, storms, flooding, earthquakes and such, as a prime example of a "public good." That is one defined as having many spillover benefits that cannot be captured by the person providing the service. Therefore, free markets never will generate it in needed quantities. Government action is essential.

Anti-police protesters point to citizen patrols that sprang up on some blocks during recent violence. But such efforts peter out. And enforcement of law is complicated, requiring much training and institutional support in everything from crime scene investigation to maintenance of databases to careful preparation of legal charges for submission to the courts. Voluntary citizen movements cannot do this and often turn into vigilante justice.

So, argue for deep, ongoing reform of policing in our nation. But talk of abolition is reckless and harmful.

Now for the second example, recent reckless talk by a highly placed public official. This week, Federal Reserve Chair Jerome Powell predicted employment and output problems going forward over an extended period. He stated that the Fed will not tighten the money supply, thus increasing interest rates, through 2022. This commitment is imprudent at best.

I respect Powell. He is intelligent, experienced and aware of practical challenges in implementing monetary policy. While his statements may have precipitated extreme fluctuations in stock indexes this week, they are not the underlying cause. Any bubble-beset stock market has inherent problems, including extreme nervousness and volatility.

The imprudence and danger lie in any central bank committing itself to a given policy two years or more into the future. Central banks exist to control money supplies to protect financial systems against a broad range of unexpected events. One should never tie its own hands.

For decades, the Fed avoided making forward commitments about policies or even any hard forecasts about the economy. Officials obfuscated in public pronouncements.

In fact, the Fed long was overly secretive. Chairs Paul Volcker and then Alan Greenspan changed that, releasing more information after policy deliberations. Fed statements began to include statements hinting at whether an increase or decrease would be considered at the next meeting some six weeks ahead. These "views" were not promises, but markets began to assume they were. Soon the Fed felt constrained. It could not raise rates if it had not given a warning one or two meetings earlier.

In the financial debacle from 2007 on, the Fed was quick to lower, but slow to raise. This asymmetry is dangerous in itself. Real World Economics: Consensus can be found on key election issues - among economists Edward Lotterman: Collateralized corporate loans are looming economic peril Real World Economics: After election, trade issues will linger Edward Lotterman: Supreme Court DACA decision returns immigration to the spotlight

Some describe its "forward guidance" as a useful tool to control markets. But global events are fickle. No one knows what crises our economy will face. Making long-term promises it may not be able to keep is dangerous. The Fed needs its hands free, to raise as well as lower.

St. Paul economist and writer Edward Lotterman can be reached at stpaul@edlotterman.com.

Graphic

Edward Lotterman

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

ARTICLE DCLXV. SUNDAY'S WITH SID - CORRECTION APPENDED

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 14, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

 Correction Appended

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 2CLength: 1116 wordsByline: SID HARTMAN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Dungy's success story stands atop the U's listBody

If you want my opinion, there is no better success story in the history of the University of Minnesota than Tony Dungy, who has become one of the most prominent voices during the protests and discussions in the NFL and sports world after the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis.

I have long said that if you rate people on a scale of 1-10, then Dungy is a 20. And he continues to be a real leader in the NFL and the country.

Dungy has been using his great reputation and influence to talk about how proud he has been of athletes and NFL players who are using their platform to try to be helpful and bring change in the Twin Cities and other communities around the country.

"To me, that means more than just doing great things on your off day - visiting young people, all of that's part of it, and we need to do that," Dungy told Sports Illustrated. "But it also is at times like this, when you see things that aren't going right and you've gotta use your voice and you gotta be part of the solution. I think it's very important that our athletes do have a voice, and they need to use it."

I have known Dungy since the day he came to enroll at Minnesota in 1973 after growing up in Jackson, Mich.

Whatever the expectations were of Dungy, he exceeded all of them.

He left the Gophers in 1976 as the all-time leader in passing yards, touchdowns, attempts, completions and total offense.

And his success wasn't just on the field. He was one of the best scholar-athletes in program history.

His pro playing career lasted just a few seasons, but he won a title with the Steelers in 1979 before joining them as a defensive backs coach in 1981.

SUNDAY'S WITH SID - Correction Appended

Yes, Dungy could have been a head coach in Minnesota on several occasions. He had great connections with the Gophers and was also the best defensive coordinator in the NFL during his four seasons with the Vikings from 1992-95.

But instead he spent six seasons coaching the Tampa Bay Buccaneers and then became the first black head coach to win a Super Bowl with the Colts, whom he coached from 2002-08 and won the Super Bowl after the 2006 season. His .668 winning percentage remains the ninth-best mark in NFL history for head coaches with at least 10 seasons in the league.

Retired to do more

Dungy stopped coaching in 2009 and was enshrined in the Pro Football Hall of Fame in 2016, but he has never really retired.

Dungy told me for years that his hope was after his coaching days to mentor young athletes and children in his community, and he has done that and more through the All Pro Dad foundation in Tampa, Fla.

Dungy has also continued to be a prominent voice in the NFL as a lead analyst on NBC's "Football Night in America" on Sunday nights.

There are few people with more respect or a higher profile in the NFL and sports world than Dungy.

So when he talks about what is going on around the country, a lot of people listen. And it can't be easy for him to see this situation in Minneapolis.

But he also has to be proud of such players as the Vikings' Anthony Barr and Eric Kendricks and the Gophers' Rashod Bateman and Brevyn Spann-Ford, who have used their position as athletes to speak up about racism.

Dungy said in that same Sports Illustrated article that this is a time for real communication and change.

"Open up the lines of communication, do a lot of listening, hear people's hearts, hear what's on their minds and then give them the advice," Dungy said. "What can we do to make the situation better? There's a lot of things we can do. Let's focus on what we can do as a team, what we can do as individuals, what you can do as a person to make the situation better. Make sure we keep that as the focus, and if we do that, we've got smart people, good-hearted people, we'll get some good solutions."

Still a leader

Dungy has been doing prayer walks in Tampa and speaking with such organizations as the Fellowship of Christian Athletes to try to lead by example.

That goes as well for his family life with his wife, Lauren. They have three biological children and have adopted seven children while also serving as foster parents.

Dungy told me when he retired from football that he wanted to find a way to keep making a difference.

"I'd like to really do some more stuff one-on-one, reaching out to young boys, especially," Dungy said. "We've got so many guys that come into our league now that didn't grow up with their dads, and I just look back at all the information and all the support that I got from my father and just see so many kids in this country that don't have that."

"You can do a certain amount from a head coaching position and talk to kids and talk to groups, but I'd really like to get into some one-on-one stuff where you're helping young people."

He has done that and more as he continues to be one of the greatest leaders in the United States.

Sid Hartman can be heard on WCCO AM-830 at 8:40 a.m. Monday and Friday and 2 p.m. Friday. · shartman@startribune.com

JOTTINGS

- It seems like the University of Minnesota is preparing to have fans in the stands for the 2020 football season. The school has started promoting season-ticket sales after it announced it will have in-person classes this fall.
- Vikings General Manager Rick Spielman on how the virtual offseason is going: "Give credit to our IT department. I have been in watching some of the meetings, and coaches are doing a phenomenal job with the circumstances. I don't think we're losing anything from the teaching aspect of how we have everything set up where Coach Zim [Mike Zimmer] is able to hold team meetings, we're holding special teams meetings, we're holding offense, defense meetings and individual position meetings. That has all been going very smoothly."
- Joel Maturi, former Gophers athletic director, was on the Division I Committee on Infractions that handed Oklahoma State's men's basketball team three years of probation and banned the Cowboys from postseason play in 2020-21.
- Former Blaine standout and North Dakota hockey player Brandon Bochenski is the new mayor of Grand Forks, N.D.
- The Wolves have just one unrestricted free agent this year, Evan Turner, but Malik Beasley, Juan Hernangomez, James Johnson, Jordan McLaughlin and Kelan Martin are all restricted free agents.
- Ricky Rubio's season is over as the Suns, like the Wolves, aren't heading to Orlando. Rubio ended his first season in Phoenix matching his career high with 13.1 points per game while also notching 8.9 assists per game, the second-highest total of his career.
- Gophers receiver Chris Autman-Bell was named the Lindahl Academic Center Student-Athlete of the Month in May, a great honor. Gophers coach P.J. Fleck is expecting big things from Autman-Bell now that Tyler Johnson is in the NFL.

Correction

This column should have said the Phoenix Suns are one of the 22 NBA teams heading to Orlando to continue playing this season.

Correction-Date: June 21, 2020

Load-Date: June 23, 2020

End of Document

What attorneys learned from Fredrikson & Byron's first legal clinic for riot-damaged businesses

ARTICLE DCLXVI. WHAT ATTORNEYS LEARNED FROM FREDRIKSON & BYRON'S FIRST LEGAL CLINIC FOR RIOT-DAMAGED BUSINESSES

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

June 14, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 477 words

Byline: Patrick Rehkamp

Body

The work of rebuilding has begun for many of the businesses damaged or destroyed during the riots that followed the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis Police custody, and Minneapolis law firm Fredrikson & Byron is trying to help by hosting free legal clinics and offering pro bono services at Midtown Global Market for impacted businesses.

The first of a series of clinics was last Wednesday. Any damaged business can register to attend, though the areas that saw the most damage are on or near Lake Street in Minneapolis, North Minneapolis along West Broadway and the Midway area along University Avenue in St. Paul.

Kiel McElveen, a senior associate with Fredrikson who specializes in corporate law and is one of the organizers of the events, said the needs attorney's heard at the clinic primarily were either for legal help or financial assistance. If the businesses had insurance, their need for legal help is greater. If they didn't have insurance, the financial help is critical.

What attorneys learned from Fredrikson & Byron's first legal clinic for riot-damaged businesses

"There's kind of two camps," McElveen said. "A lot of what we're seeing on the front end is insurance issues. The other one is landlord/tenant issues where a business is trying to understand if there's anything in their lease that allows them to stop paying rent for a while until they get their business back open."

As for insurance, disputes with insurers over claims is the most common issue.

The businesses coming for help are typically retail and restaurants located on or near the Lake Street Corridor, according to McElveen. About 10 business owners came to the first clinic with many more expected for the following events.

McElveen said some pro bono representation could last a year or so, depending on the issues and complexity of insurance disputes.

"I think with some there's the potential where it turns into longer representation," he said. "I also expect there's a bucket where it will be limited representation."

Fredrikson is making roughly 40 of its professionals available for legal help.

For those in need of financial assistance or other services, the Neighborhood Development Center, Metropolitan Economic Development Association, Lake Street Council and The Northside Economic Opportunity Network are also partners in the program.

If there's a silver lining, all of the businesses seeking help want to reopen rather than move on, McElveen said. That being said, the path could be long and stressful.

"There's quite a bit of desperation," he said. "The sense we're getting is people are trying to figure out a way to reopen their businesses."

Contact and other information on the clinics is here, (the information is for the June 10 event, but click on the "See More" link in the Details section for contact information and registration instructions.)

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

911 dispatcher saw George Floyd's arrest on live video, alerted supervisor

ARTICLE DCLXVII. 911 DISPATCHER SAW GEORGE FLOYD'S ARREST ON LIVE VIDEO, ALERTED SUPERVISOR

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 15, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 714 words

Byline: Amy Forliti

Highlight: A 911 dispatcher who was apparently watching in real time as a Minneapolis police officer pressed a knee into the neck of George Floyd called a supervisor to tell him what she saw, not caring if it made her look like a "snitch," according to a recording of the call made public Monday. In the [...]

Body

A 911 dispatcher who was apparently watching in real time as a Minneapolis police officer pressed a knee into the neck of George Floyd called a supervisor to tell him what she saw, not caring if it made her look like a "snitch," according to a recording of the call made public Monday.

In the call, the dispatcher calls a police sergeant and says what she was seeing on live video looked "different" and that she wanted to let him know about it. The dispatcher was in a 911 call center at the time and was watching video from a surveillance camera posted at the intersection where police apprehended Floyd, according to city spokesman Casper Hill.

"I don't know, you can call me a snitch if you want to, but we have the cameras up for 320's call. ... Um, I don't know if they had used force or not. They got something out of the back of the squad, and all of them sat on this man. So, I don't know if they needed you or not, but they haven't said anything to me yet," says the dispatcher, whose name is edited out of the recording.

"Yeah, they haven't said anything, unless it's just a takedown which doesn't count," the sergeant said. "But ... I'll find out."

"No problem," the dispatcher said. "We don't get to ever see it. So when we see it, we're just like whoa. Ah, well? It looks a little different."

Under the police department's use of force policy, officers are not required to notify supervisors if the use of force was a takedown technique, but supervisor notification is required during all other force incidents involving injury or alleged injury. According to the policy, the officer must stay on the scene and immediately tell a supervisor of the force that was used, and supervisors conduct a force review.

Floyd, a black man who was handcuffed, died May 25 after Derek Chauvin, a white officer, used his knee to pin Floyd to the ground in South Minneapolis. Chauvin, who kept his knee on Floyd's neck even after he said he couldn't breathe and stopped moving, has been charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and manslaughter.

911 dispatcher saw George Floyd's arrest on live video, alerted supervisor

The three other officers, Thomas Lane, J. Kueng and Tou Thao, have been charged with aiding and abetting second-degree murder and manslaughter. All four officers were fired.

Widely seen video recorded by a bystander shows Chauvin's actions and Floyd, with his face smashed against the street as he gasps for air. It also shows Thao, who was facing the bystanders. In the bystander video, Lane and Kueng are obscured by a squad car.

The 911 transcripts from two bystanders who called police were also made public Monday. One is from a bystander who said an officer "pretty much just killed this guy that wasn't resisting arrest. He had his knee on the dude's neck the whole time."

The caller goes on to say Floyd "stopped breathing ... He was already in handcuffs ... I don't even know if he dead for sure but dude was not responsive when the ambulance came and got him, and the officer that was just out here left, the one that actually just murdered the kid in front of everybody."

The operator asks if the caller would like a sergeant, and the caller says "Yeah, like that was bogus what they just did."

A second 911 call transcript made public is from a person who works as a first responder.

"I literally watched police officers not take a pulse and not do anything to save a man ... I literally have it on video camera (clears throat). I just happened to be on a walk so, this dude, this, they (expletive) killed him," the caller says.

That person also expresses willingness to speak with a supervisor, but the call is disconnected and the operator tried to reach the caller again four times over the next two minutes, without success, the transcript says.

In the bystander video, a woman can be heard in the background saying she is a Minneapolis firefighter, and repeatedly asking the officers to take Floyd's pulse. Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis' Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting Police looking for dozens who looted Lululemon on St. Paul's Grand Ave. during Floyd unrest George Floyd's family sues Minneapolis officers charged in his death

Graphic

A combination of booking photos of former Minneapolis police officers Derek Chauvin, center, Tou Thao, right, Thomas Lane, top left, and J Alexander Kueng, lower left. (Courtesy of Hennepin County sheriff's office)

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

911 dispatcher saw George Floyd's arrest on live video, alerted supervisor

End of Document

ARTICLE DCLXVIII. READERS WRITE REPORTING FACTS IS NOT THE PROBLEM

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 15, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 10ALength: 1274 wordsBody

MEDICAL EXAMINER

I worked in county government for more than four decades. During that time, I had many occasions to interact with Dr. Andrew Baker, the Hennepin County medical examiner ("Baker is reappointed as Hennepin County's chief medical examiner," June 12).

Dr. Baker is one of the most professional, capable and honest individuals I have ever met. Commissioner Angela Conley's vote to not reappoint Dr. Baker was entirely inappropriate. An autopsy is about science and facts, and the facts are that George Floyd had fentanyl and methamphetamine in his system when he died. Conley was also wrong to assert that "Baker's report gave the very reason not to trust these processes that haven't brought justice in the past."

When autopsy reports stop including all of the scientific data and facts, that is when people should stop trusting the process. Hennepin County is fortunate to have Dr. Baker as its medical examiner.

Gary Shelton, Prior Lake

...

I'm disappointed by the Hennepin County Board's rushed 5-2 vote to reappoint Baker with virtually no debate in the wake of George Floyd's death. Not because we have any reason to doubt his character or to suspect him of intentionally misleading anyone - to my knowledge, we don't. But because this is the exact moment we should be pausing to re-examine "business as usual" at every opportunity.

Minneapolisians are learning that many of our systems are more fundamentally broken than we realized. Floyd's death and its aftermath are highlighting structural failures that go way beyond the actions of four police officers.

Arguably, Dr. Baker's report on Floyd was misused/manipulated by Hennepin County Attorney Mike Freeman, by some media outlets and by many Americans eager for excuses to "blame the victim." I'm grateful that Conley sought exploration of this and that Commissioner Irene Fernando also voted no. Has there been a better time to question the way roles surrounding law enforcement are traditionally performed? Why insist on barreling ahead with little public input?

READERS WRITE Reporting facts is not the problem

Neither commissioner implied that Dr. Baker is a bad guy who did anything substantively different than what medical examiners always do. But this reappointment offered an occasion to stop and explore how we keep mechanically, if inadvertently, replicating the same deadly outcomes over and over.

It's striking that the only commissioners calling for that discussion are the only two people of color on the board, who represent historically unheard communities. To many of us, this is a textbook example of systemic white supremacy in government institutions, regardless of the intentions of individuals in office.

The lives and perspectives of black Minnesotans must matter more than ensuring one white person's uninterrupted career trajectory.

Susan Maas, Minneapolis

MINING

Clean water trumps Bakk's politics

I was appalled to read that state Sen. Tom Bakk, DFL-Cook, and other Iron Range Resources and Rehabilitation Board members have blocked funding for a treatment plant for safe drinking water for the Fond du Lac Band of Lake Superior Chippewa ("Water project snared in mining politics," June 12). Staff at the IRRRB evaluated the funding request and highly recommended it.

Bakk doesn't want to approve the funds for the Fond du Lac band because its members have made truthful observations about the environmental degradation caused by mining.

How much state tax money is going to the IRRRB? I hope the commissioner (appointed by Gov. Tim Walz) will see reason and overrule the board's outrageous recommendation.

Eva Young, Minneapolis

POLICE REFORM

Take a lesson on unions from us

As a lifelong licensed nurse and someone who recognizes a nurse's power over a patient's life and well-being, I cannot understand the inability to legislate standards for peace officer practice that circumvents powerful police unions. While I fully support nursing unions and their bargaining power to improve the lot of practicing nurses, I fully support the loss of an individual's nursing license due to a violation of practice, substance abuse or misconduct.

Policing authorities should be subject to defined legal standards for reporting peace officer misconduct. Suspected misconduct should result in suspension. Confirmed misconduct should result in loss of license. And, the licensing authority should define conditions under which an officer, who has committed an error in judgment, may be returned to duty under monitored reinstatement. Required education, by accredited entities tasked with teaching best policing practices, should be a requirement for license renewal.

It is the constitutional responsibility of our lawmakers that any license conferred under the state's authority should provide the opportunity for life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness of its citizens.

READERS WRITE Reporting facts is not the problem

Standards for achieving this goal is required by my profession and should be required by any in whom the public well-being is likewise entrusted.

Patricia Arneson, St. Paul

...

One of the easier changes the Minnesota Legislature can make to help officers remember that they, too, must obey the law is licensing. As in car license - registration plates on police cars.

They used to show a registration number like vehicles for the rest of us - a readily readable (legible and night-lighted) ID announcing to the public, "Hey, we're all together in this. It's not me against you. My squad car can look up your car's registration at a glance. You can help keep me responsible by a quick check of my plate's registration and as simple call to my superior."

The few occasions I've tried to identify a squad car driver's misbehavior - since knowing it all too well in the military police corps in which I served - it's been tough. An instinctive glance at the plate is like trying to see an officer's eyes through reflector sunglasses. "Police," "sheriff," "state trooper" only tells what's abundantly obvious. Sometimes there's "45" painted on the trunk lid, but of what city, what county? One risks passing in traffic to see door insignia. But even then one's often left to squint.

As the joke goes - one's liquor is more secure if two Baptist preachers are visiting vs. just one. Knowing you're being watched and that we're all "in harness" together under the law constrains bad behavior. Legislators, now's the time!

John Bipes, Mankato, Minn.

RACE

We need to teach about racism

Politicians can change policy. Police can make reforms. People can stick "Black Lives Matter" signs in their front yard. But until discussions of race, racism, whiteness and white privilege happen with children at a young age and continue as they get older, change will never happen. Kids need to learn about race and white privilege starting in elementary schools in order to begin dismantling the enormous power racism holds in this country. People need to be as comfortable speaking about the realities of racism as they are about the weather for change to take place.

Some parents are leery of such discussions entering into their children's curriculum, but this silence has become criminal. Changing K-12 education to include discussions of race needs to be part of this moment in history.

Elizabeth Hillstrom, Minneapolis

The writer is a teacher.

SPORTS

Somebody change that name

READERS WRITE Reporting facts is not the problem

Now that the NFL, the NHL, NASCAR, the NBA and a host of other professional sports organizations have denounced racism and vowed to work for justice for people of color, it shouldn't be long before the racist name of the Washington, D.C., professional football team is changed, right? Or is the "R" word still too sacred?

Karen Barstad, Minneapolis

We want to hear from you. Send us your thoughts here.

Load-Date: July 1, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCLXIX. TWO MAYORS, A TRAGEDY, AND A PUSH TO REFORM

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 15, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 993 wordsByline: EMMA NELSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: For Carter, reckoning in St. PaulBody

When the daily briefing with the governor was done, St. Paul Mayor Melvin Carter jumped in the car, pulled off his cloth face mask and looked into his camera phone. The former vice president was waiting.

Joe Biden, the presumptive Democratic presidential nominee, had brought four mayors together to discuss the aftermath of George Floyd's death at the hands of a Minneapolis police officer. As Carter appeared on the video call alongside his counterparts in Atlanta, Chicago and Los Angeles, Biden brought up the idea of creating a police force that personally knows the community it serves. He wondered aloud if such a scenario is a pipe dream.

"No, that's not a pipe dream at all," Carter responded. "One of the things that we're finding is our residents are very willing, if there's an avenue, to speak up and protest peacefully. What they're not willing to do is return to quiet."

In the days since protests erupted around the world in response to Floyd's death, Carter has kept up a constant conversation with other elected officials and the public about what's happening in the Twin Cities and what happens next, including in his own Police Department. In addition to conversations with Biden and mayors across the country, Carter has made numerous national media appearances.

Black mayors across the country are getting similar requests, said McKinley Price, mayor of Newport News, Va., and president of the African American Mayors Association, of which Carter is a member. Like Carter, Price said the conversations are exhausting, but necessary.

"It is, I think, paramount that we take advantage of where people are in their mind-set, because I think everybody thinks it's now time to do something," Price said.

By necessity, the conversation in St. Paul is not just about what happened in Minneapolis. Though public safety reform has been a focal point during Carter's time in office, local activists - and some who served in his administration - have criticized his police accountability record. Unlike Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey, however, Carter hasn't come under the same pressure to dismantle or defund the Police Department.

TWO MAYORS, A TRAGEDY, AND A PUSH TO REFORM

Minneapolis City Council Vice President Andrea Jenkins, who represents the ward where Floyd was killed and is among the council members who've pledged to "begin the process of ending the Minneapolis Police Department," said in an interview that she hopes his death will spur change in St. Paul.

"There is no institution in Minneapolis or St. Paul that is not a racist institution," she said. "Let me be real clear: Everybody needs to clean up their house."

Carter has not said explicitly whether he supports cutting the Police Department budget or eliminating the force. Instead, he has pointed to the work his administration has already done to change when and how officers use force and direct more money toward community-based alternatives to traditional policing.

"We cannot continue with a public safety framework in America that's centered around fear-based rhetoric," Carter said.

The son of a retired St. Paul police officer, Carter ran for mayor in 2017 on a platform that included public safety reform. The city DFL convention that year happened the day after the acquittal of Jeronimo Yanez, the officer who shot and killed Philando Castile in a suburb north of St. Paul.

Since Carter took office in 2018, the Police Department has updated its use of force policy, launched a mental health unit and limited the use of K-9s. Last year, the City Council passed a $1.7 million public safety budget focused on community initiatives rather than hiring more cops, though investments have been slow to unfold, in part because of the COVID-19 pandemic.

The city has also lost two top staffers focused on police accountability - including one who reached a $250,000 settlement after filing a complaint with the state Human Rights Department - and has struggled to make its police civilian review board effective. A year ago, five officers were fired for failing to intervene the previous summer when a former officer beat another man with a baton.

Carter said St. Paul leaders have committed "pretty steadfastly" to public safety reform in the past few years. He also said there's more to be done - in state law, in the legal system and in police union contracts "that make it so difficult to hold officers accountable when they fall below the standard that we've set."

Carter and Police Chief Todd Axtell have presented a united front, appearing together to announce curfews and address the destruction that ravaged St. Paul as some protests turned violent. The chief, too, has been called on to provide reaction and analysis for a national audience.

"Now's our moment to move forward together; use this tragedy as an opportunity to do what's been needed to be done for many, many years," he told CNN on June 3.

Axtell has already convened his leadership team, with Carter's support, to clarify the department's use-of-force policy, said spokesman Steve Linders.

Council members say they're hearing from constituents and activists who want St. Paul to defund or dismantle its Police Department and plan to meet with police leaders Tuesday to discuss next steps. While most say they want to build on investments they've already made in community-based alternatives to policing, Council Members Mitra Jalali and Nelsie Yang said they support abolishing the Police Department altogether - though Jalali emphasized that won't happen overnight.

TWO MAYORS, A TRAGEDY, AND A PUSH TO REFORM

For Carter, the first black mayor in a city where only 16% of residents are black, there will be challenges that his counterparts in historically black cities do not face, said Duchess Harris, an American studies professor at Macalester College.

"The important thing for people to note is what it means when a black mayor has leadership in what is essentially a white city," she said. "That's what St. Paul has to come to terms with. Can they listen to this black man?"

Emma Nelson · 612-673-4509

Load-Date: July 1, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCLXX. BANHAM WILLING TO HELP BUILD A BRIDGE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 15, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 1CLength: 608 wordsByline: MARCUS FULLER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Ex-Gophers star comes from a family of police.Body

Law enforcement runs strong in Rachel Banham's family. So strong that she has tattoos on her right arm of the badge numbers of her father, mother and late grandfather.

If she were not such a basketball standout, as the Gophers' all-time leading scorer and proud new member of the Lynx, she could have added to her family's legacy of police officers.

Her perspective adds something different to the Lynx's platform to tackle social injustice and promote change in the aftermath of George Floyd's death while in Minneapolis police custody.

"Things need to change," Banham said. "No doubt about it. That's the biggest thing with our team and myself. If I can be a bridge in any type of way when it comes to myself reuniting some sort of trust and communication between communities and law enforcement, I would love to do that.

"I'm not going to say I've given up on police, because that's just who I am."

Banham's grandfather, Don Sr., was the first black police officer at the University of Minnesota. He was in charge of the security detail when Martin Luther King Jr. and his civil rights group visited the U in 1963.

Her father, Don Jr., retired in 2011 as a captain in the Minneapolis Police Department after 29 years on the force, which included leading security for the Vikings. Her mother, Melissa, will retire soon after nearly three decades with the Minneapolis police as a sergeant in the sex crimes unit.

As one of the most recognizable athletes in Minnesota, Banham understands the significance of her voice in the movement. The former Lakeville North star emphasizes that people should educate themselves more on racial issues and vote for officials who can make changes. She supports peaceful protests and feels strongly about donating and volunteering.

"It's just so important because we have such a big platform," Banham said. "Our entire team, we've been talking about how we can give back or be a voice for the people who may not be able to be heard."

Banham willing to help build a bridge

This week, the Lynx and Timberwolves joined other organizations in the Team Up for Change partnership to address ways people can make a difference in fighting systematic racism.

Banham and former Gophers guard Andre Hollins spent several days this week collecting food and supplies at the Sanctuary Covenant Church in north Minneapolis. It's the home church of their trainer and friend Chauncey Hollingsworth, founder of Hoops and Christ.

"There's a lot of humanity out there, a lot of good people wanting to give back," Hollins said. "We wanted to do anything to help out, especially during the coronavirus [pandemic] and the things that have transpired after George Floyd's death."

Banham stopped training for days after watching the video of a white police officer kneeling on the neck of Floyd, a black man, in south Minneapolis. Following protests for justice and against police brutality in Minnesota and worldwide, Banham agreed changes needed to happen "soon" to protect black lives. It was tough for her to see, though, police as a whole portrayed in a bad light.

"I've been brought up in such an incredible family," Banham said. "They sacrificed. They were great cops and great people. They do things the right way. That's how I've been raised."

Banham's tattoos are proof of how proud she is of her family's roots in law enforcement. Along with giving back, she could make part of her mission soon to build stronger relationships between communities and the police.

"Education is huge right now," Banham said regarding racial issues. "Talking to people and having tough conversations that might not be the most comfortable thing. But it's just about being compassionate and empathetic."

Load-Date: July 1, 2020

ARTICLE DCLXXI. POLICING MEETING EMPHASIZES COMMUNITIES WORKING TOGETHER

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 15, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 7ALength: 455 wordsByline: ADAM BELZ; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: About 150 people brainstormed ideas at North Side parkBody

Brian Fullman stood on a rise in North Commons Park and asked people to describe how Minneapolis got to this point, where a police killing of a black man sparked global outrage and, finally, a sense that change is possible.

"This is not just about one death," he said, blaming what he called a history of arrogance, complacency and disrespect from the Minneapolis Police Department. "How did we get here, people?"

A man shouted from way in the back. "By being quiet!"

They were among 150 people gathered Sunday at the park on the North Side of Minneapolis to voice their support for divesting from traditional policing and to map a plan for a safe community under a different model. The event was put together by the Barbershops and Black Congregation Cooperative and the Muslim Coalition.

An emphasis of the meeting was that all black Americans - East Africans, West Africans, the descendants of slaves - must work together.

Abdulahi Farah, a leader of the Muslim Coalition, said the problem is beyond reform. "The only path forward is to dismantle and get rid of it," he said.

Mohamed Sharif, a Somali-American, said he was detained and put in a squad car when he was 10. He had been playing on a soccer field in a game with police officers.

"I've never had any good experiences with the police," he said.

Sharif said his community is overpoliced and has been able to effectively police itself since the unrest started after Floyd's death.

Policing meeting emphasizes communities working together

Christian Ray was at a house party in Minneapolis when he was 17, wearing all red. When the police shut down the party, an officer told him he was probably a gang member and should be arrested. Ray was not arrested because he had no record, but the knee-jerk threat from the officer stayed with him.

"This is how the Police Department views our community - as criminals, thugs, and not as people to be served," Ray said.

People at the meeting broke into smaller groups and brainstormed ideas. Some of the department's $193 million budget should be shifted into programs for young people, said Fullman, an organizer for the faith coalition ISIAAH.

But the core of the meeting was a restatement of the belief that the Police Department in its current form is irredeemable, and that it's up to community members to step forward and organize to work toward something new and concrete when it comes to community safety. An undercurrent of the gathering was a new hope.

Ebony Chambers, a north Minneapolis mother and homeowner, said George Floyd's horrific death was a catalyst, and it seems to her that this time is different.

"Finally I see a difference, a change," she said. "It's a little bit of relief. You don't have in the back of your mind that nobody's listening to you anymore."

Adam Belz · 612-673-4405

Load-Date: July 1, 2020

Rochester man charged with arson after pouring liquid in Minneapolis pawn shop and watching it burn, federal charges say

ARTICLE DCLXXII. ROCHESTER MAN CHARGED WITH ARSON AFTER POURING LIQUID IN MINNEAPOLIS PAWN SHOP AND WATCHING IT BURN, FEDERAL CHARGES SAY

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 15, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 317 words

Byline: Sarah Horner

Highlight: A Rochester, Minn., man was seen on video pouring liquid from a metal container throughout a Minneapolis pawnshop targeted during recent riots and then standing in front as it burned, federal authorities say. An anonymous source provided the video footage of the May 28 arson incident to investigators with the Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco, Firearms [...]

Body

A Rochester, Minn., man was seen on video pouring liquid from a metal container throughout a Minneapolis pawnshop targeted during recent riots and then standing in front as it burned, federal authorities say.

An anonymous source provided the video footage of the May 28 arson incident to investigators with the Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, leading to Montez Terrill Lee's arrest in Rochester on Monday.

Lee, 25, was charged by the U.S. attorney with one count of arson and was expected to make his first appearance in federal court Tuesday.

Peaceful protests and riots broke out across the Twin Cities after George Floyd died in Minneapolis police custody on Memorial Day. Officer Derek Chauvin was caught on bystander video pinning his knee to Floyd's neck for nearly 9 minutes as Floyd pleaded for his life. Two other officers assisted in holding Floyd down while a fourth officer stood guard and kept concerned residents away from the scene.

They arrested Floyd after he allegedly passed a counterfeit $20 bill at a store. All four officers involved were subsequently fired and now face criminal charges.

The ATF and FBI are asking for the public to report information about suspected arson incidents, the use of explosives or other violent acts related to the unrest by calling 1-888-ATF-TIPS or via email ATFTips@atf.gov. Tips can also be submitted anonymously via

Rochester man charged with arson after pouring liquid in Minneapolis pawn shop and watching it burn, federal charges say

Reward money is being offered to tips that lead to convictions of those involved. Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect ReportIt.com. Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis'. St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting. Police looking for dozens who looted Lululemon on St. Paul's Grand Ave. during Floyd unrest. George Floyd's family sues Minneapolis officers charged in his death

Graphic

Montez Terrill Lee

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

End of Document

St. Cloud officer shot during struggle to arrest teen; rumors lead to protests, tear gas

ARTICLE DCLXXIII. ST. CLOUD OFFICER SHOT DURING STRUGGLE TO ARREST TEEN; RUMORS LEAD TO PROTESTS, TEAR GAS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 15, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 321 words

Byline: Associated Press

Highlight: ST. CLOUD, Minn. (AP) - The shooting of a police officer in Minnesota who was struggling to arrest a young man early Monday led to rumors on social media that drew protesters to police headquarters and prompted officers to use tear gas to disperse the crowd.

Body

ST. CLOUD, Minn. - The shooting of a police officer in Minnesota who was struggling to arrest a young man early Monday led to rumors on social media that drew protesters to police headquarters and prompted officers to use tear gas to disperse the crowd.

During a news conference, St. Cloud Police Chief Blair Anderson expressed frustration with the role social media had in spreading a rumor that two black men had been shot by police.

"Things can get blasted all over creation right now and it is very reckless in my opinion and it's very dangerous, and this is the kind of thing that could have escalated, and I am deeply concerned about that kind of stuff," Anderson said.

Officers were attempting to stop and detain the 18-year-old for what Anderson later said was a suspicion that he had a gun. He resisted arrest, drew a handgun and fired a shot that hit the officer in the hand, police said.

The Star Tribune reported that the officer was hospitalized in stable condition. No officers returned fire while struggling with the man, officials said. He was taken to a hospital with minor injuries.

As misinformation spread on social media, about 100 people gathered outside the police station in downtown St. Cloud. Anderson said the building was damaged by people throwing rocks. Chemical irritants were used to disperse the crowd, and there were four arrests, he said.

"This place could have been on fire over a lie. Not just some misinformation, not just a few facts here and there, it was flat out untrue," the chief said.

The shooting comes three weeks after the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis, some 65 miles (104 kilometers) southeast of St. Cloud. The death of Floyd, a 46-year-old black man, has sparked worldwide

St. Cloud officer shot during struggle to arrest teen; rumors lead to protests, tear gas protests over police brutality and racism. He died after Derek Chauvin, a white officer, used his knee to pin down Floyd's neck for several minutes as Floyd pleaded for air and eventually stopped moving.

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCLXXIV.

TWO MAYORS, A TRAGEDY, AND A PUSH TO REFORM

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 15, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1380 wordsByline: LIZ NAVRATIL; ERIC ROPER; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: For Frey, grappling with 'failures'Body

Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey thought he was facing the greatest challenge of his career: a global pandemic that threatened businesses and families as the city's coffers dried up.

Then, on Memorial Day, George Floyd was killed by Minneapolis police. Large areas of the city went up in flames, a police precinct fell to rioters and people had to protect themselves as law and order vanished from the streets.

Gone were the days when there was time to craft each policy proposal and each message. Now, still in his first term, Frey was forced to make split-second decisions as he faced a series of challenges unlike any other mayor in generations.

Frey's handling of one of the worst weeks in Minneapolis history earned him criticism seemingly from all levels: from President Donald Trump to Gov. Tim Walz, the City Council, local businesses and police accountability activists.

"I do have to take responsibility here," Frey told protesters last weekend, as he teed up a message on police reform that he knew would not satisfy them. "I've been coming to grips with my own brokenness in this situation, my own failures."

Leaders in other cities can sympathize, as mayors from Seattle to Louisville to New York City have faced angry demonstrations threatening to overtake their cities as crowds demand sweeping reforms to policing.

The worldwide unrest places even more attention on Frey, mayor of the city where it all began. Not only must he chart a plan for reform, but he must also account for the sins of the city's past. Battered by twin disasters, the city today bears little resemblance to the one Frey first presided over in early 2018, and he faces the task of rebuilding both neighborhoods and public confidence in city leadership.

TWO MAYORS, A TRAGEDY, AND A PUSH TO REFORM

St. Paul Mayor Melvin Carter said he wasn't prepared to "back-seat drive" Frey's decisionmaking. But he did say: "I know a whole lot of mayors around the country, and I think Mayor Frey has faced a series of events that no one I know has ever faced."

A rapid condemnation

On May 26, as many were still waking up to the horror of Floyd's death, Frey appeared alongside Chief Medaria Arradondo and quickly condemned the officers' actions. Later that day Arradondo, with Frey's blessing, fired the four officers involved.

Reflecting on those moments in an interview this month, Frey said he decided that "I needed to come out right away and voice to our city and our nation that what happened was horrific. It was wrong and justice needed to be done."

Those actions earned the mayor widespread praise. But he was unprepared for the scope of what happened next.

The city planned for peaceful protests at the intersection of 38th Street and Chicago Avenue, where Floyd was fatally pinned. Protesters marched to the Third Precinct police station, where they clashed with officers, but it would be nothing like the days to come.

On Wednesday, Frey called for the officers to be charged. Without an arrest, protests intensified. Around 5 or 6 p.m. Frey said he received a call from Arradondo, who told him that the Target store across from the Third Precinct was being looted. He asked for the National Guard. Frey called Walz.

"The governor understood my request, but I did not at that point have a specific time frame as to when we would receive the support," Frey said.

The next day, the mayor kept talking with state officials about getting help from the Guard. Without large-scale assistance, the city reduced the number of officers in the Third Precinct, knowing it was a target. When angry crowds surrounded it and began breaking windows and lighting objects on fire, Frey ordered officers to evacuate.

Looking disheveled and exhausted in a news conference about 1:30 a.m., Frey took responsibility for the decision: "The symbolism of a building cannot outweigh the importance of life, of our officers or the public."

Trump, in a tweet, called for what he called the "very weak Radical Left Mayor, Jacob Frey [to] get his act together and bring the City under control."

But it was another rebuke that dominated the news of the day. On Friday morning, Walz, a fellow DFLer, called the city's response to the riots an "abject failure" and promised to restore order heading into the weekend.

Frey's responses to that criticism have been measured.

"I continue to not fully understand how long it takes to mobilize the National Guard," Frey said. "I'm not passing judgment. I'm saying we needed them earlier."

That night, many suspect, will define Frey's legacy.

TWO MAYORS, A TRAGEDY, AND A PUSH TO REFORM

"The question is, which is going to always be unanswered ... was the burning of the precinct raw meat that gave people a taste of the catharsis of destruction?" said former City Council Member Don Samuels, who chaired the public safety committee. "Or would a defense of the Third Precinct - which would have resulted in people being hurt - created such resentment that people would have been even more destructive?"

Hours after the precinct burned, fired officer Derek Chauvin was arrested and charged with murder and manslaughter. Many people hoped the destructive riots would subside. They did not.

Council members raised concerns about the mayor's response after constituents reported they couldn't get firefighters or police to respond, while officers were firing tear gas and projectiles at protesters.

The imposition of curfews, coupled with the arrival of the National Guard in large numbers on Saturday, appeared to quell the rioting.

With the riots over, the focus turned to remembering Floyd and hashing out the future of policing.

Along the way, Frey's public appearances didn't help his image. He was roasted on social media for sobbing in front of Floyd's casket during the local memorial. Frey has since described it as a "raw moment."

On a Saturday afternoon, Frey emerged to meet the crowd who had marched to his apartment building with a demand to defund the police. He told them he did not favor abolishing the Police Department. The group yelled for him to go home, and the mayor walked alone through the crowd, trailed by shouts of "Shame. Shame. Shame."

The next day, nine City Council members in Powderhorn Park announced a vague plan to "begin the work of ending" the Police Department.

"I think the mayor's position is wrong. That's my personal opinion," Council Member Jeremiah Ellison said in an online event last week. "I think, on some level, you do have to admire his willingness to at least stand firm in his position, even under an immense amount of pressure from the crowd."

Action on police

Together, Frey and the City Council approved a deal with the Minnesota Department of Human Rights that bans officers from using chokeholds, strengthens the requirements for them to intervene in inappropriate use-of-force cases and, in some instances, increases transparency around officers' disciplinary actions.

Days after a judge approved the deal, Frey and Arradondo announced that they were withdrawing from negotiations with the police union - stunning some council members who said they learned about it when the news conference began.

Council Member Steve Fletcher called the move an overstep of the city's authority and said it felt like an effort by Frey to "grab some positive press."

In the days since then, some have supported the mayor. Steve Cramer, president and CEO of the Minneapolis Downtown Council, said he has faith in the mayor and hopes that the council will quickly adopt a more concrete plan for overhauling public safety.

TWO MAYORS, A TRAGEDY, AND A PUSH TO REFORM

The city is still tallying the toll of the riots, but city workers identified more than 1,000 buildings that had some degree of damage.

At least one manufacturer, 7-Sigma Inc., has decided to leave Minneapolis, saying the city failed to protect its business from being destroyed by arson. Cramer said other businesses are thinking of ending their leases if they don't get clarity soon on the city's plans for the police force.

Pastor Brian Herron, a former City Council member, joined other faith leaders at a news conference last week supporting the chief, but he also commends Frey's actions over the past several weeks.

"In this situation he has been saying and doing all the right things," Herron said. "And doing all that he is able to do."

Staff writers Emma Nelson and Andy Mannix contributed to this report.

liz.navratil@startribune.com 612-673-4994

Load-Date: July 1, 2020

Virginia sheriff apologizes to armed black pastor arrested after calling 911

ARTICLE DCLXXV. [VIRGINIA SHERIFF APOLOGIZES TO ARMED BLACK PASTOR
ARRESTED AFTER CALLING 911](#)

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 15, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 609 words

Byline: Associated Press

Highlight: WOODSTOCK, Va. (AP) - A sheriff has apologized to a black pastor who described being arrested when he called 911 on a group of white people who threatened to kill him after trying to dump a refrigerator on his property in Virginia.

Body

WOODSTOCK, Va. - A sheriff has apologized to a black pastor who described being arrested when he called 911 on a group of white people who threatened to kill him after trying to dump a refrigerator on his property in Virginia.

Shenandoah County Sheriff Timothy Carter made the apology to Leon K. McCray Sr. of Woodstock Friday, announcing hate crime and assault charges against the five people involved and saying a weapons charge against the pastor would be dropped.

McCray described the events leading to his arrest in a sermon to parishioners at Lighthouse Church & Marketplace Ministries International.

He said he was visiting an apartment he owns in Edinburg on June 1 when he noticed a man and a woman dragging a refrigerator from another property into his dumpster, and they became irate when he asked them to leave.

McCray said they threatened him and returned with three more people, attacking him physically, saying "they don't give a darn" about "my black life and the Black Lives Matter stuff," and telling him they would "kill" him.

McCray said they backed up when he drew his legal concealed weapon to "save" his life, giving him enough time to call 911. Arriving deputies then took his gun while talking with the five, who continued threatening him and yelling racist epithets at him.

The deputies wouldn't let him tell his side, he said; instead, he was "handcuffed in front of the mob," for brandishing the handgun, and driven away while the group stood with other deputies, waving at him as he went down the road.

Virginia sheriff apologizes to armed black pastor arrested after calling 911

McCray said the deputies rushed to judgment, "disarming a black male brandishing a gun against five white individuals" despite his "second Amendment right to defend myself against five attackers that tried to take my life." The arrest "would not be tolerated if I was white," he added.

"This was indeed the most humiliating, dehumanizing, damning and violating event of my life," McCray said. "I'm a pastor, a decorated 24-year Air Force master sergeant veteran, no criminal record."

Donny Richard Salyers, Dennis James Salyers, Farrah Lee Salyers, Christopher Kevin Sharp and Amanda Dawn Salyers are now being held without bond.

Sheriff Carter sat down with McCray two days after the incident. He said four of the five were already charged with assault or trespassing, but after hearing from the pastor, he initiated a review that led to additional charges against all five. Carter said he also urged a prosecutor to drop the weapons charge against McCray.

"As I told Mr. McCray, if I were faced with similar circumstances, I would have probably done the same thing," Carter said.

Also, two sheriff's office supervisors have been placed on unpaid administrative leave while the investigation continues, Carter said.

Attorney Bradley G. Pollock, representing Sharp, told The Washington Post that his client and Amanda Salyers assumed they had permission to dump the refrigerator in McCray's dumpster, and returned it to their own property after McCray confronted them.

The Post didn't report any response by Pollock to the hate crime allegations, and lawyers for the other Salyers either declined to comment or didn't respond.

"I want the people of Shenandoah County to know that I and the sheriff's office staff appreciate and care about the minority communities, and especially our black community," the sheriff said. First COVID-19 vaccine tested in US poised for final testing Minnesota among 4 states added to NY, NJ, CT quarantine list First federal execution in 17 years; another set Wednesday Protest in Pennsylvania after cop uses knee to restrain man Cleveland Indians, other teams pressured after Redskins drop nickname

Graphic

Donny Salyers, Dennis Salyers, Farrah Salyers, Christopher Sharp and Amanda Salyers (Shenandoah County Sheriff's Office via AP)

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

'Stop fighting!' Atlanta sobriety test quickly turned deadly

ARTICLE DCLXXVI.

'STOP FIGHTING!' ATLANTA SOBRIETY TEST QUICKLY TURNED DEADLY

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 15, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1001 words

Byline: Russ Bynum, Brynn Anderson

Highlight: ATLANTA (AP) - One minute, Rayshard Brooks was chatting cooperatively with Atlanta police, saying he'd had a couple of drinks to celebrate his daughter's birthday and agreeing to a breath test. The next, they were wrestling on the ground and grappling over a Taser before Brooks took the weapon and ran.

Body

ATLANTA - One minute, Rayshard Brooks was chatting cooperatively with Atlanta police, saying he'd had a couple of drinks to celebrate his daughter's birthday and agreeing to a breath test. The next, they were wrestling on the ground and grappling over a Taser before Brooks took the weapon and ran.

Seconds later, three gunshots sounded and Brooks fell mortally wounded.

Atlanta police video released Sunday showing a seemingly routine sobriety check outside a Wendy's restaurant that quickly spun out of control, ending in gunfire. The killing of the 27-year-old black man in an encounter with two white officers late Friday rekindled fiery protests in Atlanta and prompted the police chief's resignation.

Police said Sunday the department terminated Officer Garrett Rolfe, who fired the fatal shots, and officer Devin Brosnan was placed on administrative duty. Rolfe had worked for the department since October 2013, and Brosnan since September 2018.

Meanwhile, authorities announced a $10,000 reward for information finding those responsible for setting fire to the Wendy's restaurant at the shooting scene. Flames gutted the restaurant late Saturday after demonstrations grew turbulent. The protests prompted 36 arrests.

More than 100 people, some sporting umbrellas and rain gear after on-and-off rain, protested peacefully at the site Sunday evening. Police blocked some side streets, slowing traffic in the area as people held up signs.

The two officers' body cameras and the dash-mounted cameras in their patrol cars showed they spent more than 40 minutes peacefully questioning Brooks. The fighting erupted when they tried to handcuff Brooks.

'Stop fighting!' Atlanta sobriety test quickly turned deadly

Andy Harvey, chief of police of Ennis, Texas, who has written books and developed training on community policing, said such moments can turn in a split second.

"The moment you put your hands on someone is when someone will decide whether to comply or resist," Harvey said. "That's what happened in Atlanta."

The Georgia Bureau of Investigation will present the findings of its investigation to prosecutors. Fulton County District Attorney Paul Howard said in a statement Sunday he hopes to reach a decision by midweek on whether to bring charges against the officers.

The officers were called late Friday over complaints of a car blocking the restaurant's drive-thru lane. Brosnan arrived first and found Brooks alone in the car, apparently asleep. Brooks agreed to move the car, showed his license, and Rolfe arrived minutes later to conduct a sobriety check.

"I know you're just doing your job," Brooks says on video after consenting to a breath test. He mentions celebrating his daughter's birthday and says: "I just had a few drinks, that's all."

Rolfe doesn't tell Brooks the results though his body camera recorded a digital readout of 0.108 - higher than the 0.08-gram blood alcohol content considered too intoxicated to drive in Georgia.

"All right, I think you've had too much to drink to be driving," Rolfe tells Brooks. "Put your hands behind your back."

The video shows each officer take hold of one of Brooks' wrists as Rolfe tries to handcuff him. Brooks tries to run and the officers take him to the ground.

"Stop fighting!" one officers yells.

One of the dash cameras recorded the brawl. As Brooks fights to stand, Brosnan presses a Taser to his leg and threatens to stun him. Brooks grabs the Taser and pulls it away. He struggles to his feet, the Taser in his hand, and starts running.

Rolfe fires his Taser and a yelp can be heard above the weapon's electric crackle. Rolfe runs after Brooks, and seconds later three gunshots sound.

Both officers' body cameras were knocked to the ground in the struggle, and none of the four police cameras captured the shooting. Footage released from a Wendy's security camera showed Brooks turn and point an object in his hand at one of the officers, who was steps behind him. The officer draws his gun and fires.

"As I pursued him, he turned and started firing the Taser at me," Rolfe told a supervisor after the shooting in a videotaped conversation. "...He definitely did shoot it at me at least once."

GBI spokeswoman Nelly Miles said Sunday she could not confirm whether Brooks fired the Taser.

Atlanta Mayor Keisha Lance Bottoms said Saturday she doesn't believe the shooting was justified. Police Chief Erika Shields, who joined the department as a beat officer in 1995, resigned.

Brooks' death inflamed raw emotions in Atlanta and across the U.S. following the May 25 police custody killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis.

'Stop fighting!' Atlanta sobriety test quickly turned deadly

Some public officials questioned whether shooting of Brooks was as clearly an abuse as Floyd's death after a white Minneapolis police officer pressed a knee to his neck.

"The question is when the suspect turned to fire the Taser, what should the officer have done?" U.S. Sen. Tim Scott of South Carolina, said on CBS' "Face The Nation." Scott, the Senate's only black Republican, said Brooks's death "is certainly a far less clear one than the ones that we saw with George Floyd and several other ones."

Stacey Abrams, the former Democratic lawmaker who gained national prominence while running for governor in 2018, said "there's a legitimacy to this outrage" over Brooks' death.

L. Chris Stewart, a Brooks family attorney, said the officer who shot him should be charged for "an unjustified use of deadly force, which equals murder."

Stewart said that Brooks, a father of four, on Friday had celebrated the eighth birthday of one of his daughters.

Bynum reported from Savannah, Georgia. Associated Press writers Mallika Sen in New York, Regina Garcia Cano in Washington, D.C., and Sean Murphy in Oklahoma City contributed to this report. Police looking for dozens who looted Lululemon on St. Paul's Grand Ave. during Floyd unrest George Floyd's family sues Minneapolis officers charged in his death 'I'm not a bad guy': Police video captures distraught Floyd Statue of Black protester replaces toppled UK slave trader George Floyd family filing civil suit against Minneapolis, police

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

Mpls. park sign altered to include Floyd name

ARTICLE DCLXXVII.

MPLS. PARK SIGN ALTERED TO INCLUDE FLOYD NAME

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 15, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 6ALength: 217 wordsByline: PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

A sign at a Minneapolis park has been altered to include George Floyd's name, but a city park leader said Sunday that it was changed without permission.

The sign had read George Todd Park until someone added Floyd's surname on Saturday night.

The park along the 5600 block of S. Chicago Avenue is about 2¼ miles south of where a police officer pinned Floyd to the pavement before he died May 25.

A Minneapolis Park and Recreation Board maintenance worker happened to see the "George Floyd Park" sign Sunday at the wedge-shaped park just east of Diamond Lake.

He took a few photographs for his supervisors to see and noted that the added decal was the same font as what was on the original sign.

"We are not sure who placed the decal on the park sign, changing George Todd Park to George Floyd Park," Park Board spokeswoman Dawn Sommers said. "The MPRB has not received any requests nor taken any action for renaming the park at 5600 Chicago Avenue South."

Sommers said the Park Board does not have any immediate plans to remove the decal.

George Todd was a park commissioner from 1957 to 1963. The Park Board named the park in honor of Todd while he was still alive, which was an exception to how parks were traditionally named. The World War I veteran had cancer at the time. He died in 1964 at age 71.

PAUL WALSH

Load-Date: July 1, 2020

Up to $70,000 in reward for tips in Minneapolis and St. Paul arson incidents

ARTICLE DCLXXVIII.

UP TO $70,000 IN REWARD FOR TIPS IN MINNEAPOLIS AND ST. PAUL ARSON INCIDENTS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 15, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 377 words

Byline: Sarah Horner

Highlight: The U.S. Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives is offering up to $70,000 for rewards that lead to the arrest and conviction of 14 individuals suspected of starting fires throughout the Twin Cities during the unrest that followed the death of George Floyd while in Minneapolis police custody. The money is broken down to [...]

Body

The U.S. Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives is offering up to $70,000 for rewards that lead to the arrest and conviction of 14 individuals suspected of starting fires throughout the Twin Cities during the unrest that followed the death of George Floyd while in Minneapolis police custody.

The money is broken down to $5,000 per suspect, and is being offered in addition to the previous two awards the ATF issued in relation to looting and arson incidents in St. Paul and Minneapolis.

"We have methodically worked each of the fire scenes, collecting evidence, interviewing witnesses, and reviewing video footage to help us solve these arson cases," William Henderson, special agent in charge of the St. Paul Field Division, said in a statement Monday. "We've narrowed in on particular individuals who we suspect started one or more fires throughout the Twin Cities. We would appreciate any assistance the public is willing to provide in order to bring these investigations to a successful conclusion."

Anyone with information on the suspects is asked to contact the ATF by emailing ATFTips@atf.gov or by going to www.ReportIt.com or the Report It mobile app, which is available on Google Play or via the Apple Apps Store.

Tipsters should select "ATF - St. Paul Field Division" as the reporting agency when submitting their tips and provide the corresponding ATF ID number of the suspect he or she is offering information about. All ATF ID numbers will be listed alongside the suspects' pictures, which will all be uploaded and available for view on the ATF's website.

Expand

Tipsters can also be made via phone by calling 1-888-ATF-TIPS (1-888-283-8477).

Up to $70,000 in reward for tips in Minneapolis and St. Paul arson incidents

While tips can be anonymous, anyone seeking reward money needs to include contact information in their report to be eligible to receive it. Only those tips that lead to the successful identification, arrest and conviction of a suspect are eligible for rewards.

ATF is looking to identify this man who was caught on surveillance camera at Springboard for the Arts in St. Paul, Minn., during the recent unrest. If you recognize him, email ATFTips@atf.gov or submit info via @Reportitcom. Working with @StPaulFireDept pic.twitter.com/WitvI9iSOJ @sppdmn @MnDPS_SFM

- ATF St. Paul (@ATFStPaul) June 13, 2020

Graphic

The Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives is offering up to $5,000 rewards that lead to the arrest and conviction of 14 individuals suspected of starting fires throughout the Twin Cities during the unrest that followed the death of George Floyd. The individuals pictured are suspected in the St. Paul Enterprise fire. (Courtesy of ATF-St. Paul)

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

End of Document

CULTURAL CONDEMNATIONS

ARTICLE DCLXXIX. CULTURAL CONDEMNATIONS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 15, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 11ALength: 1067 wordsByline: BONNIE BLODGETT, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Why 'Gone with the Wind' should not be gone // There's more to Margaret Mitchell's story than its shelving by HBO Max implies.Body

Last week, the streaming service HBO Max announced that it would remove the film based on Margaret Mitchell's novel "Gone with the Wind" until further notice. I heard the news in my car, having just pulled into the parking lot of the organic food co-op of which I am a proud member/owner. The co-op's windows were plastered with photos of George Floyd. Anyone who didn't blame all cops for his murder was not welcome. I went in anyway.

Just a week before this, I'd been sitting in a different parking lot, in St. Paul's Midway district, to support protesters and to witness their reported violence. To my right, a line of mostly young people began shouting obscenities at the cops. To my left, a line of police unleashed a volley of tear gas canisters. Across the street was a burning building that the cops were attempting to refrain from protecting. They responded to the insulting chant instead, and when a canister hit my car, I knew that discipline had finally succumbed to emotion. Pride. Defensiveness. Call it what you will. I and the person whom I'd asked to drive the car while I took pictures fled the scene.

Fast-forward to the co-op parking lot. This time I resisted the urge to flee - i.e., drive home, unload my groceries and forget the injustice being done to Margaret Mitchell. This time I asked myself to think this through before running away. What exactly had me so freaked out over the banning of a film about the Civil War? Was it connected to the feelings aroused by the line of cops and the George Floyd posters?

Lately, I've been thinking a lot about fascism. Though I didn't experience firsthand Hitler's rise and fall (and maybe because I didn't), I am obsessed with the man in whose long shadow I have lived my entire life.

I grew up in the Cold War era, in which Stalin's rise on the heels of Hitler's demise caused many Americans to equate fascism with socialism. Stalin was not a socialist but a tyrant.

CULTURAL CONDEMNATIONS

My mind wandered. I wondered how German supporters of the Weimer Republic felt as their democratic institutions were sacrificed to economic expansion. In the guise of protecting its citizens from alleged unfairness and abuse, the Third Reich in fact deprived them of their freedom to think for themselves.

I wonder if this is happening to my country, as wealth is now concentrated in the hands of a ruling oligarchy united by a common purpose that overrides social issues: the desire to grow its power even, if necessary and expedient, in the guise of pursuing social justice. It's a slippery slope from censorship to mind control.

"Gone with the Wind" is not racist, any more than Mark Twain's "Huckleberry Finn" is racist - though it, too, has been banned in some quarters. In comparing these novels, I do not mean to invite critiques on their relative literary merit. I will say this: Twain's novel is far superior. I will also say this: Twain was a man. And this: Though it does not appear in the canon, more Americans know what happened to Scarlett and Rhett than what happened to Huck and Jim. Even "bad" literature can have enormous influence. Lots of people read it, for one thing. Harriet Beecher Stowe's "Uncle Tom's Cabin" brought the abolitionist's cause to the attention of enough people deeply moved by the story to spark the Civil War.

I remember first watching "Gone with the Wind" as a teenager. How inspiring it was to see a wily and manipulative (by necessity) daughter of the antebellum South transform from reluctant subservience - she was the classic femme fatale catering to a white-male-dominated society (see also Shakespeare's "The Taming of the Shrew") - to self-sufficiency. Free at last to survive or die on her own terms and by her wits, she channels a deep-seated contempt for a system that enslaved blacks and women alike into what I regard as political action for good. She saves herself, her family and her former servants - first from death and then from poverty.

"Gone with the Wind" has seldom, if ever, been properly interpreted. Its middling literary reputation precludes its being granted the reprieve Twain's masterpiece received in elite circles.

Even before the war, Scarlett's servants admired her rebellious spirit, and their respect deepened into love during and after the war. Thanks to her, they themselves were transformed from menial order-takers to equals in the sawmill she shrewdly anticipated earning her family a fortune as the South began to rebuild.

The love the freed slaves had for their "mistress" was authentic, individual and much more complex than today's labeling of people and their feelings can, perhaps, comprehend or tolerate. Scarlett was not only challenged by the collapse of the South. She was redeemed by it.

As I sat pondering all this in the co-op parking lot, it occurred to me how HBO Max's censorship itself smacked of 21st-century American imperatives, an ominous flirtation with fascism, which feeds on groupthink. The move was not intended to protect blacks, but to promote its brand with young, affluent and politically active consumers. The streaming service fully expects to grow "brand awareness" by jumping on the groupthink bandwagon. A headline story in a national, mainstream media outlet is no mean feat.

The silver lining is this: Maybe the headline story will arouse curiosity about this allegedly profane film. Maybe people will want to read the book that is said to demand censoring. Maybe we will finally have an honest conversation about an American classic.

CULTURAL CONDEMNATIONS

It is not racism that sabotaged "Gone with the Wind" (the film) but sexism. If you do get a chance to see it, ask yourself why the final scene is still remembered as the strong man having the last word ("Frankly, my dear, I don't give a damn."), if not to buttress 1950s misogyny?

In fact, the last word belonged to Scarlett, who realized that Rhett Butler was no longer a selfish con man. The new Rhett had risked his life to rescue not just the woman he loved but also her devoted (former) slaves and the sweet and submissive Melanie, who also loved Scarlett for the right reasons. The war changed both Scarlett and Rhett. Both found a way to be good. She understood that. He would, too, or so she hoped ... some day.

Her parting words were: "I will get him back." She smiled as she said it. He had won her heart fair and square.

Bonnie Blodgett, of St. Paul, specializes in environmental topics. She's at bonnieblodgett@gmail.com

Load-Date: July 1, 2020

La Mexicana looks to find its footing after neighborhood upheaval

ARTICLE DCLXXX. LA MEXICANA LOOKS TO FIND ITS FOOTING AFTER NEIGHBORHOOD UPHEAVAL

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

June 15, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 456 words

Byline: Iain Carlos

Body

East Lake Street grocery store La Mexicana has restocked its shelves and reopened its doors since being looted in the unrest that followed George Floyd's death. But recovery is still a ways off.

Owner Mauro Madrigal says that sales are running at about one-half their usual pace, attributing the decline to the recent chaos on Lake Street scaring away customers, the still-ongoing repairs of La Mexicana's storefront and a surprising new competitor: Food banks that have sprung up in the neighborhood after several other grocery stores were burned or looted. To reinvigorate sales, the store is offering a five percent discount on all items for two months.

Madrigal was fast asleep when his security system wailed on May 28, alerting him that he and his wife's store had been broken into. It was about 1 a.m. May 28, three days after the killing of George Floyd.

La Mexicana looks to find its footing after neighborhood upheaval

He checked his security camera feed and saw three people break in through the backdoor. They ransacked the store, breaking cash registers, smashing windows and making off with produce and La Mexicana's safe - which, luckily, had been emptied the day before. He estimates he lost $15,000 in damages that day.

After that, Madrigal boarded up windows and doors and spent the next few days defending la Mexicana with a ragtag group including his wife, friends, hired security and neighboring business owners. He only got about two hours of sleep each day and he worried for the group's safety, but he thought La Mexicana wouldn't survive if he left. For Madrigal, and his wife, Maria Gutierrez, La Mexicana is more than a business, but the realization of their dreams.

"We came to have something better here in the U.S.," he said. "La Mexicana means the world to us."

With a little clean-up, Madrigal was able to get La Mexicana running again on Monday. His store is insured, but he isn't sure how much of the damage his insurance will cover. With a $5,000 deductible, he's not even sure if the damage is worth claiming at all. The break-in is the first real economic setback La Mexicana. The store earned around $5,000 to $6,000 each day before and during the pandemic before the recent dropoff. He's hoping to receive some financial assistance for the repairs from the Lake Street Council, but otherwise he and his wife will probably pay for the repairs out of pocket.

The store might see more business as other retailers offering produce on East Lake Street have been shut down for a short period of time, Madrigal said.

Given the expressions of support Madrigal has received from his neighbors, he is confident La Mexicana will be running at full-strength again soon.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

CULTURAL CONDEMNATION

ARTICLE DCLXXXI. CULTURAL CONDEMNATION

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 15, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 11ALength: 1158 wordsByline: AHMED THARWAT, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The Holy Land deli debacle: Immigration meets complication // Social-media posts were abhorrent, but this is a tale of who gets a second chance and who doesn't, and of a collective need to change.Body

A few summers ago, on a Friday noonish, I was standing by the door of Holy Land Grocery in northeast Minneapolis. The place was vibrant; people were coming and going at a fast pace. A Somali man in his ironed white khamiis was rushing out of the door carrying some groceries. A policeman hanging around outside seemed concerned and confused by the man. I told him to relax and that the man was not shoplifting. "He probably wants to get home to beat the products' expiration dates." True story.

Unless you were in COVID coma or under strict quarantine, you probably know by now the debacle around the Holy Land Grocery. To recap, the owner's daughter, Lianne Wadi, had posted racist comments on social media that were recently dug out and brought to the attention of the public, creating a huge reaction. Let me be clear here. The postings were repugnant, racist, xenophobic, anti-Semitic, and homophobic, too. That clarified, however, these comments were posted between 2012 and 2014, when Lianne Wadi was only 14 and had assimilated too fast. That is not by any means an excuse, which even she said: "I was so shocked that I even posted something so offensive," she wrote. "I recognize the gravity of my words and how hurtful they can be and how hurtful they were. I wasn't thinking. I was a teenager at the time (although my youth is not an excuse)."

Holy Land CEO Majdi Wadi fired his daughter, who had been the catering director for the company, which in addition to the grocery operates a restaurant and deli and distributed its products to other stores.

A huge outpouring of reaction ranging from condemnation to death threats ensued. Many boycott campaigns emerged, a kind of #MeToo moment for the community. It seems that anyone one with a smartphone can start a boycott petition. Of course, this debacle is taking place during the biggest anti-racist intifada in modern American history, with everyone on edge.

I know Majdi Wadi. We worked together on community projects from time to time. Naturally, we had our agreements and disagreements. You would expect this from two people with different mind-sets: He is a high-energy businessman, and I'm a low-energy media man. However, I'm not here to defend Mr. Wadi.

CULTURAL CONDEMNATION

Clearly, he needs to come clean and face up to any and all accusations and prove to his customers, as he states on the Holy Land Facebook page, that these racists comments don't reflect his own values or the Holy Land values and culture.

Although Wadi and I have not been on speaking terms for years, I invited him for an interview to explain himself and answer some of the questions raised. As of late last week, I was still waiting for his response. The question that he needs to answer is an old Watergate one: "What did he know, and when did he know it?" Clearly, customers have the right to boycott Holy Land or any other products or businesses that they don't share the same values with. Wadi himself boycotted Danish products a few years ago during the debacle of the offensive cartoon of the prophet.

The issue being raised here is the fear of a mob mentality sweeping the community, accusing all Arabs of being racist and anti-black. The reactions of some of the businesses in Twin Cities that are dropping Holy Land products is as if the owner, an immigrant himself, was a slave trader, not a purveyor of Middle Eastern products. Self-righteous co-ops, such as Seward Co-op and others, have had a liberal snap moment and proudly announce to everybody that they don't sell Holy Land products anymore. The Holy Land hummus brand suddenly became a product of Hamas. The same businesses that may carry products from Israel, accused more than once of supporting a system of apartheid toward Palestinians, are now boycotting and trying to destroy a small company of a Palestinian immigrant. Congress even made it illegal to boycott Israeli products, for god's sake. People who seemingly have chips on their shoulders now are acting as if boycotting Holy Land will solve racism in this country.

The Holy Land story is an immigrant success story. Mr. Wadi came to this country, worked hard, and has contributed more than hummus to the Twin Cities community - he gave our community a cultural reference and liberated ethnic food out of the ghetto section in a major supermarket. Now is the community going to abandon and marginalize him at the first sight of mistake, appalling as it may be? It seems that immigrants and people of color don't get a second chance in this country, but Walmart, Target, Amazon, GM and Facebook do. Holy Land deserves a second chance and an opportunity to make it right. Arabs lost the Holy Land in the 1967 war with Israel; now, a Palestinian immigrant who worked all his life to build his store is at risk of losing even the right to have the name on his storefront.

The problem of racism in this country is bigger than Holy Land, but Arab-Americans need to face up to their own role in perpetuating it. In the Arab community, calling a black person a slave (in Arabic, 'abd) may come as a surprise for most, but it happens more than we would like to admit, this prejudice toward dark-skinned people. However, it never amounted to the racism that we have here in America. As Prof. Fouzi Slisli explained in a recent conversation that I shared on YouTube, racism in America is the most sophisticated, comprehensive system that is supported by science, history, the education system, biological research and culture.

The Arab-American community must face its own prejudices, bigotry and biases, much of these the residual effects of colonial history and pure ignorance of Arab history and culture. Arabs themselves are people of color, but in most cases, immigrants come to this country and adopt the attitudes of others around them, which are racist attitudes toward blacks. As Sanna Towns, a civil-rights activist, said on my show, "They see the hierarchy in our social order, and they side with the winner's side." Arabs and other immigrants need to educate themselves about black history, the lack of justice and the civil-rights struggles. They need to realize that without blacks' struggle, most of us wouldn't be here. The Somali community with their energy and political activism has changed the way people talk about Muslims and immigrants. U.S. Rep. Ilhan Omar has done for the Palestinian causes in one year more than what Arab leaders have done for years. She has changed the narrative here in America. Arabs' and Pan-Africans' struggle against the colonial project in Africa is undeniable.

CULTURAL CONDEMNATION

The killing of George Floyd and protests against racism and police brutality will not happen in vain. In this sobering time of our country's shared grief, we all need to change.

Ahmed Tharwat, host and producer of the local Arab American TV show "BelAhdan with Ahmed," writes for local and international publications. He blogs at Notes From America: www.Ahmediatv.com. Follow him on Twitter: @ahmediaTV.

Load-Date: July 1, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCLXXXII.

GO SLOW ON COVID BORDER BATTLE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 15, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 10ALength: 692 wordsHighlight: Wisconsin's experience doesn't necessarily apply to Minnesota on disease control.Body

Fans in the stands don't clamor for Paul Bunyan's Axe, the traveling trophy that goes to the winner of the Gophers-Badgers college football matchup, to be awarded to the team ahead early in the game's second quarter. It's not even halftime yet, and a lot can happen in the time left on the clock.

A similar, this-is-far-from-over approach is the smart take when it comes to another Minnesota-Wisconsin border battle emerging during the COVID-19 pandemic. Nationally, both are among the 22 states where new confirmed cases are trending downward, according to the New York Times disease tracker. A recent report from federal health officials also found both states to be well below the national average when it comes to nursing home deaths per 1,000 residents.

But if there were a scoreboard for key COVID-19 statistics, Wisconsin would be ahead of Minnesota at this moment. It has a slightly larger population, but it's had fewer cases - 21,926 vs. 29,316 as of Friday morning. It's also had fewer deaths - 682 compared with 1,280.

And since mid-May, it's had no statewide shelter-in-place order in effect. A lawsuit brought by Republican legislators challenged Wisconsin's "Safe at Home" order, arguing that it had usurped lawmakers' authority. The state Supreme Court agreed, and its May 13 ruling ended restrictions.

So far, it doesn't appear that doing so has fueled COVID-19 infections. A recent paper from the National Bureau of Economic Research (NBER) concluded: "We find no evidence that the repeal of the state [shelter-in-place order] impacted social distancing, COVID-19 cases, or COVID-19-related mortality" during the two weeks after the ruling's enactment.

Calls for Minnesota to be like Wisconsin and lift remaining restrictions are understandable but still premature. It is important to note that while the court ruling ended statewide disease control measures, many of Wisconsin's most populous areas put health orders in place to maintain social distancing for citizens and businesses, including Milwaukee, Eau Claire County and Dane County, home to Wisconsin's capital city of Madison.

The state didn't just open up all at once. Its continued progress in containing COVID-19 may well be due to local officials who stepped in when the statewide protections were struck down. The NBER paper also noted that state residents generally continued staying home after the order was tossed. If that's the case, lifting the order may not be an economic panacea either. May's state-by-state unemployment rates aren't out yet, so there's no evidence yet that this provided an economic boost.

Another important caveat is that controlling this new virus has been, at best, a fluid situation. Things change and often do so rapidly. If COVID-19 containment were a Gophers-Badgers football game, Minnesota would have been ahead for the first quarter.

Until May 7, Minnesota had fewer cases than Wisconsin, according to a new data tracker from the respected Kaiser Family Foundation. But from that date, Minnesota cases went up dramatically while Wisconsin's increased at a much slower pace. Our guess: This split coincided with outbreaks that hit Minnesota meatpacking plants hard. Wisconsin also had more cumulative deaths than Minnesota through April 29.

Reminders of how quickly COVID-19 containment can change came from elsewhere across the country this week. There are now alarming increases in cases in states such as Arizona, Utah and Texas that had so far escaped widespread illness. Those states were early "reopeners," with Arizona significantly easing restrictions May 16 and with Utah and Texas on May 1.

The recent protests following George Floyd's death adds another layer of volatility to reopening decisions. In an interview with an editorial writer, Dr. Nasia Safdar, an infectious disease specialist with the University of Wisconsin-Madison, cautioned against applying one state's experience - good or bad - to another because so much remains unknown about this virus.

This is a time to err on the side of caution, not get overconfident so early in the matchup against COVID-19. There's still a long way to go before this virus is under control.

Load-Date: July 1, 2020

ARTICLE DCLXXXIII.

LEGISLATORS OF COLOR HOLD NEW SWAY AS RACIAL TENSIONS FLY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 15, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 967 wordsByline: TOREY VAN OOT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The Minnesota Legislature was once a lonely place for state Rep. Rena Moran. After her election in 2010, the St. Paul Democrat was the only black woman serving in the 134-member state House. Just seven of 201 state lawmakers identified as minorities.

"It was taxing," she said. "We [were] trying to represent communities of color's voices through legislative policy and practice and that can get lost in a body of 134 individuals."

By 2017, the share of lawmakers from communities of color had doubled. While Moran was still one of just a handful of African-American legislators, more American Indian, Hmong, Latino and Somali Minnesotans were filling the chamber. With power in numbers, Moran said she found ample "support to look at our work as legislators through a race-conscious lens."

The People of Color and Indigenous Caucus was born.

The coalition, known as the POCI Caucus, has grown in size and influence in recent years, especially in the DFL-led House. But the death of George Floyd in police custody and the protests that followed have brought new visibility and power to the 19-member caucus.

Members of the caucus are taking the lead in drafting and advocating for a sweeping criminal justice and police accountability package now at the center of the special session that started Friday. Some are vowing to withhold votes on a major public works bill and other top legislative priorities without action on the slate of police reform proposals.

"That's the power of having numbers, the power of having a caucus," Moran said of the ability to vote as a bloc on legislation. "It's the power for us to say: 'We need to negotiate there.' "

The current Legislature is believed to be the most diverse in state history. Twenty-one lawmakers are from communities of color, according to self-reported data collected by the Legislative Reference Library. All but two are Democrats and members of the POCI Caucus.

Legislators of color hold new sway as racial tensions fly

Even with those gains, the members make up just 10% of the Legislature. And communities of color remain underrepresented compared with the state's overall population.

Since forming in 2017, the POCI Caucus has sought to overcome those gaps by coalescing around issues of equity and representation. Members successfully pushed for a state task force on Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and increased funding to recruit and retain teachers of color. Last year, in a show of political strength, members threatened to derail a University of Minnesota regents vote over concerns about a lack of diversity among candidates.

The caucus' 2020 agenda included dozens of proposals related to educational, health and economic disparities. Sen. Jeff Hayden, a Minneapolis Democrat who is one of two black state senators, said the caucus' strength - and challenge - has been bringing members from a range of cultures and backgrounds together to advocate for the "same overarching goals" of improving lives for marginalized communities.

"I think that's when we're at our best," Hayden said. "We have a clear goal and we're speaking in a unified voice."

Members say they've also been able to influence what's included in bills to be more responsive to the needs of people of color. Rep. Carlos Mariani, DFL-St. Paul, said that power in part comes from other legislators wanting POCI Caucus members' votes. But Mariani noted that white committee chairs are now carrying bills that address equity in education, housing and other areas.

"We get our names, energy and our lobbying effort behind specific issues that we believe are incredibly important to our communities," said Sen. Patricia Torres Ray, DFL-Minneapolis.

POCI Caucus members say Floyd's death and the unrest that followed have brought new urgency to their work and the need for leadership from communities most affected by police brutality and racism.

Rep. Ruth Richardson, a freshman Democrat from Mendota Heights, hailed the current moment as "a critical point" at a recent news conference on the criminal justice measures.

"It's 2020," she said. "If you're not going to listen to us today, you're never going to listen to us. And it is incumbent on our communities to lift up the voices of the people who have been most impacted by the pain."

The special session that started Friday will offer a fresh test of the POCI Caucus' power, as the politically divided Legislature works to find common ground on lingering coronavirus response measures, the criminal justice reform package, an expected $1 billion-plus public works bonding bill and another measure that could include money for Twin Cities communities damaged by looting and arson.

"This is a moment that offers a way for that group to accelerate its influence and its skills," said Mariani, a public safety committee chair working on the criminal justice package. "Particularly as the [House DFL] majority has been very open about saying that, 'We're going to take our cue and our leadership from you on this issue, because we're not as well versed as you are.' "

That deference from DFL leaders was on display during a recent POCI Caucus news conference on police reform. House Speaker Melissa Hortman, the chamber's highest-ranking Democrat, spoke last, pledging to "listen ... stand back and create space for leadership to come from the voices and the people of color and Indigenous members of the Legislature and then to stand with them and to act."

Legislators of color hold new sway as racial tensions fly

Moran, who serves as POCI Caucus chair, saw the gesture as a "sign of change." But the commitment to sit back and listen remains a "double-edged sword," she said, when members of color remain in the minority.

"We also need her to help us lead," she said. "We need our white colleagues, men and women, to step into this arena and help us make a difference."

Staff writer Jessie Van Berkel contributed to this report.

Torey Van Oot · 651-925-5049

Load-Date: July 1, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCLXXXIV.

MINN. FIRM GETS OK TO SELL TEST FOR COVID-19

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 15, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1205 wordsByline: JOE CARLSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

An embattled COVID-19 test that senses the presence of the virus by detecting antibodies to it has been found to be accurate enough that its Minnesota distributor can sell it, just as other tests are being removed from the market.

Premier Biotech, a Minneapolis drug-testing firm that has pivoted to distributing a Chinese-made test for detecting COVID-19 antibodies, plans to ramp up sales in coming weeks. The Food and Drug Administration granted an emergency-use authorization (EUA) for the test on June 4, and on Thursday posted the results of an independent performance assessment by the National Cancer Institute.

"For me, having the results published was a big deal, so the rest of the country could know what we knew from the beginning, which is that this is a good test," Premier Biotech

CEO Todd Bailey said Sunday.

Other tests are being taken off the market. One, made by BioMedomics and sold by major medical technology firm BD, was removed in early May after the FDA updated the rules on performance characteristics needed to get EUA.

A second-generation test is in the works. Tests made by Phamatech and Tianjin Beroni Biotechnology Co. were also voluntarily withdrawn.

Researchers and medical labs generally use two overarching kinds of tests for COVID-19 - serology tests and molecular tests.

Serology tests like the one distributed by Premier Biotech react to the presence of specific antibodies that a person's immune system makes to fight off the novel coronavirus that causes COVID-19.

Antibody tests on the market today including Premier's cannot be used to diagnose a specific case of COVID-19. But they can be used in "seroprevalence" studies on overall rates in well-defined populations.

Minn. firm gets OK to sell test for COVID-19

Scientists are still trying to refine their knowledge about how much time needs to pass before people have detectable numbers of antibodies.

One early study of antibody testing, not yet peer-reviewed, looked at 173 patients with COVID-19 in China and found the rates of correct detection of the IgG and IgM antibodies was at its highest at 16 days after symptom onset.

Last week, Mayo Clinic announced availability for a new antibody test produced by Rochester-based Vyriad to look for the presence of neutralizing antibodies.

Molecular tests, on the other hand, are the gold-standard method of diagnosing an active COVID-19 infection. Often called PCR tests, these tests detect the presence of viral genetic material in swabs taken deep from the throat or nose.

Their accuracy peaks around eight days after exposure, a study-of-studies in the Annals of Internal Medicine shows.

The Minnesota Department of Health says diagnostic testing has been used to confirm 30,471 cases of COVID-19 in residents since early March, including 311 cases added to the tally Sunday.

Of those, about 26,100 people have passed a 14-day self-monitoring period and no longer need to self-isolate.

In Minnesota, 1,298 people have died from COVID-19, including 1,030 residents of long-term care and assisted living.

The vast majority of fatalities happened in people 50 or older. Underlying health conditions increase the risks, including chronic lung disease, uncontrolled severe asthma, serious heart conditions, immunocompromise, obesity with BMI greater than 40, diabetes, chronic kidney disease requiring dialysis, and liver disease.

Both the rate of new deaths and the rate of newly confirmed cases has been slowing in Minnesota for two weeks despite increased PCR testing and large-scale civil rights demonstrations over the death of George Floyd.

Nationally, the United States has recorded more than 115,000 deaths among more than 2 million confirmed cases.

The number of new cases is rising in states including California, Arizona, Texas, Florida and Georgia, with some of the rise due to increased testing. Case counts are declining in New York, New Jersey, Illinois and Massachusetts, according to the New York Times' closely watched case tracker.

Early in the pandemic, the FDA responded to the sudden and overwhelming demand for COVID-19 tests in the U.S. by lowering the bar to entry for many.

PCR tests started to be sold with only minimal prior validation by their manufacturers, while more than 100 antibody tests flooded the market with no direct oversight by the FDA.

As a result, many tests suddenly became available with scant evidence supporting their quality.

Minn. firm gets OK to sell test for COVID-19

The Associated Press reported Sunday that even now, months into the pandemic, "no one really knows how well many of the screening tests work."

The U.S. House Subcommittee on Economic and Consumer Policy entered the fray in April, demanding to know why the FDA allowed unproven tests to go to market and why some tests' claims of accuracy on packaging were not reproduced in independent testing. The subcommittee claimed credit for forcing the FDA to require antibody test makers to submit data and get emergency use authorization.

One of the tests singled out for extra scrutiny was the one sold by Premier Biotech.

A letter from the subcommittee to the company CEO alleged that academic researchers in California had found far lower rates of accuracy for the test in an unpublished study than what was advertised on the product label.

The subcommittee's letter said the test correctly identified the presence of a specific antibody called IgG only 53% of the time in 129 validation tests. An April 28 letter from the subcommittee said the test's sensitivity was "deeply troubling."

But last Thursday the FDA publicly posted the results of federally funded performance assessments done at the Frederick National Laboratory in Maryland that found the Premier Biotech test correctly identified the IgG antibody 93% of the time in 30 samples. A second antibody, IgM, was positively identified in all 30 tests. The test didn't return positive results for any of the 160 negative samples used on it.

Virtually all of the tests on the FDA's web page for validated antibody tests today have positive-detection values between 90 and 100%.

Bailey said Sunday that the independent review, which used specimen-handling methods described on the product label, agreed with the validation results Premier had seen from other organizations.

"We were extremely excited, but not surprised," Bailey said. "We knew the test was performing well. But having the [federal laboratory] do the study themselves as a federal study, that is the best part."

Like many antibody tests, the Premier Biotech test is only validated today for use in certified labs for high- and medium-complexity work. The company is working on research to show it can also be accurate at the point-of-care using blood drawn from a finger stick, but that work is ongoing.

Joe Carlson · 612-673-4779

TRACKING CORONAVIRUS

Minnesota cases, daily change*

30,471 -- Total cases

311 -- June 13 new cases

*Chart data is a net count of new confirmed cases minus previously announced cases that were removed by MDH on that date.

Minnesota deaths, new daily

Minn. firm gets OK to sell test for COVID-19

1,298 -- Total deaths

15 -- June 13

U.S. cases, new daily

2,084,923 -- Total cases

25,335 -- June 13

U.S. deaths, new daily

115,445 -- Total deaths

693 -- June 13

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete charts.)

Sources: New York Times, Minnesota Dept. of Health

Note: U.S. data lags a day behind Minnesota

Load-Date: July 1, 2020

Monday coronavirus update: 6 Minnesota deaths lowest daily count in about 2 months

ARTICLE DCLXXXV.

MONDAY CORONAVIRUS UPDATE: 6 MINNESOTA DEATHS LOWEST DAILY COUNT IN ABOUT 2 MONTHS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 15, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 543 words

Byline: Katrina Pross

Highlight: Minnesota recorded six additional deaths on Monday from the coronavirus - the lowest daily count in more than two months. The state also recorded on Monday its lowest number of people needing hospital care since April. Still, health officials urged Minnesotans to continue to protect themselves from the virus as they monitor the trends here [...]

Body

Minnesota recorded six additional deaths on Monday from the coronavirus - the lowest daily count in more than two months.

The state also recorded on Monday its lowest number of people needing hospital care since April. Still, health officials urged Minnesotans to continue to protect themselves from the virus as they monitor the trends here and other states as restrictions are loosened and businesses reopen.

"I think it's too early for us to look upon, Texas and Arizona and say, 'Oh, we dodged that bullet' but we're certainly monitoring what's happening there so that we're fully cognizant of what could happen here," said Kris Ehresmann, the Minnesota Department of Health's Infectious Disease Division director.

Arizona saw its new cases triple this past week compared to two weeks before. Texas saw its highest number of hospitalizations yet on with 2,326 patients on Monday, according to the .

The death toll in Minnesota from COVID-19 reached 1,304 on Monday. The additional six deaths was the lowest since April 13 when there were none reported. The high was on May 28 when the state recorded 33 deaths.

The Department of Health also reported on Monday another 230 confirmed infections. In total, Minnesota has had 30,693 confirmed cases of COVID-19.

COVID-19 hospitalizations are also at their lowest levels since April 29, with 353 patients. Last month, hospitalizations for the virus peaked in Minnesota at 606 on May 28.

Even though hospitalizations related to COVID-19 are now lowering, total hospitalizations including other conditions are placing hospitals at fairly high capacities, state officials said.

Monday coronavirus update: 6 Minnesota deaths lowest daily count in about 2 months

Last week, the state announced new community testing centers for those who attended large gatherings and protests surrounding the death of George Floyd. So far, the state has seen a low percentage of positive cases from those testing sites.

Other highlights from Monday's data include:

LONG-TERM CARE FACILITIES Of the state's total deaths, 1,034 were long-term care or assisted living center residents. Of Monday's reported deaths, four were long-term care or assisted living residents. HOW ARE PATIENTS DOING? There were 26,609 patients Monday that no longer need to be isolated because they have recovered enough. This is an increase from 26,090 yesterday. The 353 patients with COVID-19 in Minnesota hospitals is a decrease from 369 the day before. Of those patients in hospitals, 186 are in intensive care, a decrease from 191 on Sunday. WHO IS GETTING SICK? Number of health care workers who have tested positive for COVID-19: 3,198 The age group with the most infections remains 30- to 39-year-olds, with 6,234 cases. The age group with the most deaths remains 80- to 89-year-olds, with 448 deaths.

Correction: An earlier version of the "MN coronavirus hospitalizations, deaths, positive tests" chart had an inaccurate deaths trend line because of a data entry error.

Minnesota Wild hosting Essential Supply Drive for St. Paul Midway community Texas Department of Health St. Paul Saints and MyTalk 107.1 asking for best cat videos for Cat Video Festival Wednesday coronavirus update: 8 more MN deaths, 578 new cases First COVID-19 vaccine tested in US poised for final testing Trump administration rescinds rule on foreign students

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

ARTICLE DCLXXXVI.

PETITIONS SEEK DOWNTOWN ST. PAUL BUSINESS IMPROVEMENT DISTRICT

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 15, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 745 wordsByline: Frederick Melo

Highlight: On Monday, Joe Spencer sent out petition packets to owners of some 60 commercial properties asking them to take a leap of faith and make a cumulative $600,000 commitment to downtown St. Paul. Spencer, president of the St. Paul Downtown Alliance, hopes to launch a nonprofit Downtown Improvement District in and around Rice Park - [...]

Body

On Monday, Joe Spencer sent out petition packets to owners of some 60 commercial properties asking them to take a leap of faith and make a cumulative $600,000 commitment to downtown St. Paul.

Spencer, president of the St. Paul Downtown Alliance, hopes to launch a nonprofit Downtown Improvement District in and around Rice Park - stretching out some 30 or more square blocks from the Xcel Energy Center - by 2021.

The goal in the first year is to create a public safety "fusion center" where private security firms, social service agencies and St. Paul, Ramsey County sheriff and Metro Transit law enforcement authorities can trade notes on crime trends and hot spots.

In 2022, Spencer hopes to see street ambassadors fan out downtown to provide litter pickup, graffiti removal, directions to visitors and other general assistance.

"They are eyes and ears, so they become a kind of force multiplier for the police," Spencer said. "The services of the district are in addition to existing city services, so it's an enhanced level of services downtown."

To demonstrate the street ambassador program, the alliance launched a pilot effort in the summer of 2019, and had hoped to have the same in place permanently by 2021.

Then came the COVID-19 pandemic and riots and demonstrations surrounding the death of George Floyd, a black man who died in custody of Minneapolis police. The initial vision for a $1.4 million launch in the first year was effectively cut in half.

Petitions seek downtown St. Paul Business Improvement District

Still, complaints about vagrancy and acts of vandalism have only escalated, with some residents complaining of feeling less safe on downtown streets.

"I would say its actually more relevant and necessary now, with COVID, but because of those uncertainties we wanted to give (property owners) time to plan for those costs," Spencer said. "We won't see any ambassadors on the street until 2022."

Some call the planning overdue. Unlike other city-driven efforts downtown, "this is truly a privately-led, privately-managed endeavor," said Pat Skinner, general manager of Wells Fargo Place.

"It's been a topic that's been on the table, in some variation, for at least 10 years," Skinner added. "It's about creating basic curb appeal, just as if it were the front yard of your home or your neighborhood, that says it's safe and it's welcoming."

The district, in its initial phase, would encompass the western half of downtown, an area bounded by Cedar Street, Kellogg Boulevard and Interstate 35E. The district would also include a panhandle extending east from Cedar Street, bounded by Sixth, Seventh and Jackson streets.

Minneapolis maintains a Business Improvement District that spans 120 blocks, and similar districts of varying size operate in some 1,000 cities across the U.S. and Canada. St. Paul is believed to be the largest city in the country without one.

The road ahead for the Business Improvement District is far from settled.

The proposed fee in 2021 - $600,000 - would be based on square footage and street frontage, and limited to commercial properties alone. The total comes out to less than 3 cents per square foot, plus $6 per linear foot of street frontage.

If an ordinance and budget is approved by the city council, the fee would be added to commercial property taxes within the district. It would then be transferred by the city to a nonprofit managing board, which would oversee the improvement district.

If 25 percent of the petitioned property owners agree, the city council will move forward with a public hearing. Ultimately, the creation of a district could be derailed if 35 percent of property owners object.

State law does not compel owners of residential properties to participate, but the hope is they would appreciate the benefits and seek voluntary membership down the line, Spencer said.

"I think it's important to note we do plan to solicit those residential buildings to see if they do want to participate and get some of the benefits of the program," Spencer said.

"Because residential properties don't pay into this but for voluntary contributions, we wanted to start it where we had the core of support," he added. Two shot, one fatally, in St. Paul's Summit-University neighborhood St. Paul City Council puts mayor's pick for Port Authority on hold Making the jump: St. Thomas granted approval to move to Division I in 2021 Police looking for dozens who looted Lululemon on St. Paul's Grand Ave. during Floyd unrest Minnesota Museum of American Art director released from job

Graphic

The St. Paul Downtown Alliance has proposed a commercial downtown improvement district that would span more than 30 square blocks in and around Rice Park. The district would extend from Kellogg Boulevard to Cedar Street and from Interstate 35E to Shepard Road. A panhandle extends from Cedar Street along 7th Place East to Jackson Street. (Courtesy of the St. Paul Downtown Alliance)

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

End of Document

Tattoo parlors look to make their mark once again as coronavirus restrictions ease

ARTICLE DCLXXXVII.

TATTOO PARLORS LOOK TO MAKE THEIR MARK ONCE AGAIN AS CORONAVIRUS RESTRICTIONS EASE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 15, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 526 words

Byline: Bob Shaw

Highlight: Black Coffin Tattoo has come back from the dead. The St. Paul tattoo parlor was silent as a graveyard for two months - due to Gov. Tim Walz shutting down non-essential businesses because of the coronavirus pandemic. The parlors were re-opened on June 1 - with some of them bouncing back, and others closed with [...]

Body

Black Coffin Tattoo has come back from the dead.

The St. Paul tattoo parlor was silent as a graveyard for two months - due to Gov. Tim Walz shutting down non-essential businesses because of the coronavirus pandemic.

The parlors were re-opened on June 1 - with some of them bouncing back, and others closed with no plans to re-open.

Black Coffin has jumped back to life, even with all the mandated hygiene rules. "It was scary for a while," said owner Garrett Rautio. "But now the phone is ringing off the hook."

Other shops remained shuttered even 10 days after the re-opening date. "A lot of them have chosen to remain closed," said Marx Barry, owner of Rose of No Man's Land in Woodbury, which is open.

Several were hit with an additional blow - rioting and protests following the killing of George Floyd by a Minneapolis policeman. Acme Tattoo in St. Paul remained boarded up on June 12, but owner Gabriel Bosquez said business has rebounded to normal levels.

"Customers are anxious to come in. They have been waiting a long time," said Bosquez.

As might be expected from places that poke needles into people, the parlors are managed by hygiene fanatics.

Rose owner Barry said tattoo shops have always worked to prevent blood-related diseases - but not necessarily airborne diseases like coronavirus.

But they have adapted. They have added masks for clients and staff, installed Plexiglas dividers, and accept customers by appointment only.

Tattoo parlors look to make their mark once again as coronavirus restrictions ease

Black Coffin has added one more innovation - contacting clients one week after they leave, to see if they have come down with any symptoms.

Owner Rautio also takes temperatures of his staff every day, not only the clients who arrive.

The shops, and most other businesses in Minnesota, were closed March 27 by Walz's stay-at-home order. Walz allowed the tattoo parlors to re-open on June 1 at 25 percent capacity.

Black Coffin was set to open then, but delayed the opening for one week because of the protests.

Some of the owners said the shutdown order was unfair. "I see all the businesses, with thousands of people, open - Menards, Home Depot, Target - and they shut us down," said Hung Nguyen, owner of Hung's Tattoo Parlor in St. Paul.

"All the little guys have been dying for two months, and the big guys make money."

But Andy Rowe said he accepted the shutdown as necessary. Rowe's shop, Port and Starboard Tattoo and Piercing in St. Paul, is so small that he was the only person working last Wednesday.

"Tattoos are not essential," he said. "They are a luxury item."

Black Coffin's Rautio agreed. "We are not curing cancer. We are drawing skulls."

What has been the toughest adjustment to make?

"Not shaking hands," said Rose owner Barry.

He described the impulse that he now has to fight every day. "You meet people, say hello, say goodbye, you shake their hand," he said. "You give me money, I shake your hand." Trump looks to curb landmark environmental act for projects ViacomCBS cuts ties with Nick Cannon, cites 'hateful speech' Appeals court temporarily halts Dakota Access pipeline shutdown Joe Biden's \$2 trillion climate plan aims to reframe debate NBC's video service Peacock stresses 'free,' looks to 2021

Graphic

Black Coffin Tattoo owner Garrett Rautio adds ink to Veronica Erickson at his studio in St. Paul on Friday, June 12, 2020. "Other than the masks not much has changed for us," said Rautio, "The masks make it hard to hear and I don't hear very good to begin with." Black Coffin Tattoo already practices stringent cleaning protocols for blood-borne pathogens and has added temperature checks and hand sanitizer, along with mandatory masks, as precautions against COVID-19. (John Autey / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

THE DRIVE

ARTICLE DCLXXXVIII. THE DRIVE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 15, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 7ALength: 587 wordsByline: TIM HARLOW; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Scooters may return to Mpls. by next monthBody

Electric scooters have been missing from the transportation landscape this year. But they are just a City Council vote away from returning to Minneapolis streets.

The city's Policy and Government Oversight Committee (POGO) is expected Thursday to approve up to six scooter vendors. The measure then would go to the City Council on June 26. If passed, "scooters would be deployed the first part of July," said spokesman Casper Hill.

Minneapolis scored applications from six vendors in March using several criteria, including safety, equity and efforts to increase active transportation. City officials chose two of them: Bird and Lyft.

But due to challenges arising from the COVID-19 pandemic, officials are revising their original plan of having only two vendors for the 2020 program, saying it's "no longer appropriate," according to a new licensing agreement proposal that POGO will discuss. The city had not executed license agreements with either Lyft or Bird, allowing for the change in plans.

Each vendor selected will have to deploy at least 200 scooters by July 1, with another 200 by Aug. 1; after that they can deploy up to their allotted total. A maximum of 2,500 scooters divided among selected vendors would be allowed on city streets under the new proposal.

There were more than 150,000 unique scooter users in 2019, according to city data, and scooters provided more than 1 million rides.

But it remains to be seen if scooters will remain popular as concerns over shared transportation due to COVID-19 continue. Nice Ride, the city's bike-sharing program, has seen a noticeable downturn this year, said spokeswoman Kaitlyn Carl.

Through June 6, the popular bike-share program had tallied 43,471 rides. That includes rides taken by those on the front lines fighting the coronavirus pandemic who were given free memberships this year. Nice Ride users logged 59,629 trips during the first two months of the 2019 season.

THE DRIVE

Last week, ridership was down by about 6,000 compared with the same week last year. The program was temporarily shut down last week at the direction of the city, which may have contributed to part of the large drop-off, Carl said. The program since has reopened.

Lyft, which operates Nice Ride, is forging ahead. It debuted its new fleet of electric pedal-assisted bikes this month and hopes its scooters will follow, Carl said.

Hourcar on Lake Street

Hourcar, a Twin Cities carsharing program, is looking to reopen its Lake Street hub after its 2014 Honda Civic, parked in the Midtown Exchange ramp, was destroyed in a fire following the death of George Floyd, the black man who died at the hands of Minneapolis police May 25.

CEO Paul Schroeder said Hourcar is talking with the ramp manager and property landlord to get the south Minneapolis hub reopened as soon as possible. Until then, users are being directed to the nearest Hourcar hub about a mile away at the Midtown YWCA.

Hourcar has been on Lake Street since 2012 and the Midtown hub has been "well used," Schroeder said. It's important to be there as the diverse and low-income neighborhood attempts to rebuild and heal, Schroeder said.

"This hub has a history for us, and we want to keep it," he said.

Hourcar may increase its Lake Street presence. The company is looking to open additional hubs along the corridor, Schroeder said.

Follow news about traffic and commuting at The Drive on startribune.com. Got traffic or transportation questions, or story ideas? E-mail drive@startribune.com, tweet @stribdrive or call Tim Harlow at 612-673-7768.

Load-Date: July 1, 2020

Wipfli will consolidate suburban offices in downtown Minneapolis, bringing 185 employees

ARTICLE DCLXXXIX.

WIPFLI WILL CONSOLIDATE SUBURBAN OFFICES IN DOWNTOWN MINNEAPOLIS, BRINGING 185 EMPLOYEES

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

June 15, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 500 words

Byline: Nick Halter

Body

Accounting firm Wipfli LLP will consolidate its two Twin Cities suburban offices in Edina and Lake Elmo into a single office in downtown Minneapolis.

The company has signed a lease for 32,500 square feet in Fifth Street Towers. The space will accommodate Wipfli's 185-plus Twin Cities employees, according to Jason Muhlstein, Wipfli's Twin Cities Market Leader.

"We expect this will increase collaboration among associates and our centers of influence resulting in value add for our clients, associates and our new talent acquisition efforts," Muhlstein said in an email.

Wipfli said it was attracted to downtown because of its growing and thriving professional business community, skyway system, proximity to sports and culture and public transportation options. Fifth Street Towers' relatively new fitness center, tenant lounge and other amenities were appealing to Wipfli, Muhlstein said.

Wipfli will consolidate suburban offices in downtown Minneapolis, bringing 185 employees

Minneapolis-based HGA is designing Wipfli's new office, which will be in the complex's 150 Tower on the 19th and 20th floors.

"Our new Wipfli Workplace Strategy - which is our office space design and technology blueprint - takes into account recent workspace trends of associates working remotely and wanting flexibility in where they work and the spaces they have available to them when they are in the office," Muhlstein said.

Wipfli is scheduled to make the move in November and acknowledges that Covid-19 may still be a concern at that time.

"I expect that we will re-evaluate and adjust our internal policies and the physical workspaces closer to our move date," he said. "We are considering process and potential work space furniture modifications as a way to address the fluid Covid-19 situation."

Downtown Minneapolis has attracted many suburban tenants in recent years, and Fifth Street Towers played a big role in that migration. Other tenants making the move from the suburbs to Fifth Street Towers include Country Financial (130 employees) and hearing aid distributor Amplifon (200 employees).

Wipfli signed the lease before Covid-19 hit and before the death and aftermath of George Floyd's killing in police custody. Minneapolis Downtown Council CEO and President Steve Cramer said he's pleased to see Wipfli stick to its plans despite some tumultuous times in Minneapolis.

"It raised some questions about the future of downtown," Cramer said of Covid and the fallout from the Floyd killing. "We are glad to see Wipfli continue with their decision to come downtown and we hope it will be a signal to others that downtown is going to be alive and well as we come out of this in the months and years ahead."

Transwestern's Minneapolis offices handles leasing for Fifth Street Towers.

Milwaukee-based Wipfli is an accounting and business consulting firm with 2,400 associates and 50 offices.

Correction:

An earlier version of this story gave an incorrect time for when Wipfli signed the lease.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: June 15, 2020

WNBA to return in late July with 22-game regular season

ARTICLE DCXC. WNBA TO RETURN IN LATE JULY WITH 22-GAME REGULAR SEASON

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 15, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 552 wordsByline: Dane MizutaniHighlight: After months of delay due to the coronavirus pandemic, and significant discussions with everyone involved, the WNBA announced Monday that it will officially return to play in late July. The plan itself features a 22-game regular season followed by a traditional playoff format, according to a release, and will take place at IMG Academy in [...]Body

After months of delay due to the coronavirus pandemic, and significant discussions with everyone involved, the WNBA announced Monday that it will officially return to play in late July.

The plan itself features a 22-game regular season followed by a traditional playoff format, according to a release, and will take place at IMG Academy in Bradenton, Fla. That also will be the site for league-wide training camps, which are expected to start in early July.

"We are finalizing a season start plan to build on the tremendous momentum generated in the league during the offseason and have used the guiding principles of health and safety of players and essential staff to establish necessary and extensive protocols," commissioner Cathy Engelbert said in a release. "We will continue to consult with medical experts and public health officials as well as players, team owners and other stakeholders as we move forward with our execution plan."

All players will receive their full pay and benefits during the season. No fans will be in attendance due to the coronavirus pandemic.

In a prepared statement Lynx coach and general manager Cheryl Reeve said while the team is excited to learn more details about the upcoming season, it won't lose sight of the social issues it has been so vocal about in the past.

"Our team is committed to continuing the conversation around the racial injustice issues that permeate our society," Reeve said in a statement. "It is important that we use our voices to amplify the inequities that black and brown people face every day and we will work tirelessly to address these issues, particularly, issues pertaining to police brutality, especially in Minneapolis."

WNBA to return in late July with 22-game regular season

That commitment will continue at a league level, too, as the WNBA said it plans to build on its commitment to social justice and will support players in launching a bold social justice platform as a call to action to drive impactful, measurable and meaningful change. "The WNBA opposes racism in all its forms, and George Floyd and Breonna Taylor are the latest names in a list of countless others who have been subject to police brutality that stems from the systemic oppression of Black Lives in America," Engelbert said in a release. "It is our collective responsibility to use our platforms to enact change."

This is an important time for the WNBA, according to Women's National Basketball Players Association president Nneka Ogwumike, as it gives the players a platform to amplify their collective voices in an effort to enact change.

"We have always been at the forefront of initiatives with strong support of #BlackLivesMatter, #SayHerName, the LGBTQ+ community, gun control, voting rights, #MeToo, mental health and the list goes on," Ogwumike said in a release. "This is not only necessary from a humanitarian perspective. It may be one of the biggest opportunities that this league has and will ever have." Karima Christmas-Kelly has played just six games for the Lynx. Now she's a team captain. John Shipley: So far, nothing enjoyable about rebooting pro sports 'She's my shero.' Lynx teammates praise Maya Moore's fight for justice Lynx take high road as peers complain about conditions inside WNBA bubble Jace Frederick: Athletes, coaches must be extra vigilant in maintaining safety as sports return to play

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

End of Document

'You can call me a snitch if you want'

ARTICLE DCXCI. 'YOU CAN CALL ME A SNITCH IF YOU WANT'

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1A

Length: 886 words

Byline: LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: 911 dispatcher recorded asking supervisor to respond to Floyd scene.

Body

A 911 dispatcher watching real-time footage of George Floyd's arrest in south Minneapolis last month became concerned about the officers' behavior and told a police supervisor she didn't want to "snitch" but thought he should be made aware of the situation, according to an audio recording.

The supervisor promised to "find out" what was happening, but didn't immediately respond to the scene.

The recording of a phone conversation between the supervisor and the dispatcher - neither of whom was identified - was released Monday on the city's website, along with transcripts of two 911 calls about the incident.

Floyd, 46, died May 25 after being pinned to the pavement by the neck by officer Derek Chauvin, who has since been charged with murder and manslaughter. Three other officers involved in the encounter, Thomas Lane, J. Alexander Kueng and Tou Thao, have been charged with aiding and abetting manslaughter and murder. All four have been fired.

Taken together, the new revelations raise yet more questions about the events that led to Floyd's death on a South Side street corner, which ignited worldwide protests over racial injustice and police brutality.

In the recorded phone conversation, the dispatcher appeared concerned about a police encounter outside Cup Foods, at 3759 Chicago Av., but told the supervisor she didn't know whether force had been used.

"I don't know, you can call me a snitch if you want to but we have the cameras up for [squad] 320's call, and ... I don't know if they had to use force or not, but they got something out of the back of the squad, and all of them sat on this man, so I don't know if they needed you or not, but they haven't said anything to me yet," the dispatcher is heard saying, using the call sign of the police squad being driven by Lane and Kueng.

The supervisor responds: "Yeah, they haven't said anything yet ... just a takedown, which doesn't count, but I'll find out."

'You can call me a snitch if you want'

"No problem, we don't get to ever see it so when we see it we're just like, well, that looks a little different, but ...," the dispatcher said, her voice trailing off.

"Sounds good, bye," the supervisor said.

The phone conversation, according to the time stamp, lasted less than a minute and ended at 8:31 p.m.

Under department rules, a supervisor is supposed to be notified anytime an officer uses force, with few exceptions, and the supervisor usually responds to the scene.

A police dispatch report shows that the first supervisor to the scene was Sgt. David Pleoger, who didn't arrive until 8:45 p.m. - about 37 minutes after officers first encountered Floyd and 14 minutes after the call with the dispatcher ended. Pleoger is a supervisor on the Third Precinct's middle watch. It's unclear whether he is the supervisor in the recording.

Department spokesman John Elder declined to comment on the recording, citing the ongoing investigation into Floyd's death. But he said that much like other cities, Minneapolis relies on a network of 250 to 300 cameras spread across the city, called the Milestone system, to help solve crimes and monitor developing events.

"Really what it does is help us have another set of eyes at key locations throughout the city," Elder said, adding that he didn't know what first drew the dispatcher's attention to the Floyd call.

The incident began with police being called about a counterfeit $20 bill and ended with three officers pinning the handcuffed Floyd to the ground, ignoring his repeated pleas that he couldn't breathe.

Locally, the case has raised serious questions about the department's future amid a burgeoning state probe, with activists and some council members calling for dismantling the Police Department in favor of a "public safety system" that is more equitable.

The telephone recording underscored the chaotic nature of the evening of Floyd's death, after which a police spokesman sent out a brief statement saying that Floyd had died from a "medical incident," while a bystander's video of the encounter quickly went viral. Department officials said they were working from the information they had at the time, and later revealed more details of the incident.

The latest data release also included transcripts of two 911 calls made by bystanders to report the officers involved, including one by an off-duty city firefighter who happened upon the scene.

"Hello, I am on the block of 38th and Chicago and I literally watched police officers not take a pulse and not do anything to save a man, and I am a first responder myself, and I literally have it on video camera," the unidentified firefighter says, according to the transcript. "I just happened to be on a walk so, this dude, this, they [expletive] killed him so ..."

The transcript shows that the firefighter asked to speak with the officers' supervisors to explain the situation, but then the line disconnected. The dispatcher tried to call back several times, but the calls went to voice mail each time.

The transcript of the second 911 call, which came in at 8:32 p.m., features someone reporting that an officer "pretty much just killed this guy that wasn't resisting arrest." When the call taker asks whether there is a supervisor on the scene, the caller doesn't respond; eventually, the caller is transferred to a sergeant at the Third Precinct.

'You can call me a snitch if you want'

Libor Jany · 612-673-4064

Twitter: @StribJany

Load-Date: June 19, 2020

End of Document

Blake girls soccer team leads an active soccer community fundraiser to rebuild Lake Street, support social justice

ARTICLE DCXCII. BLAKE GIRLS SOCCER TEAM LEADS AN ACTIVE SOCCER COMMUNITY FUNDRAISER TO REBUILD LAKE STREET, SUPPORT SOCIAL JUSTICE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 688 words

Byline: Jace Frederick

Highlight: A college athlete-driven fundraiser in California raised nearly $80,000 for Black Lives Matter earlier this month. The premise of the fundraiser was simple: Athletes around the country would walk, run, bike or swim 8.46 miles to signify the 8 minutes, 46 seconds in which a Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin knelt on the neck of [...]

Body

A college athlete-driven fundraiser in California raised nearly $80,000 for Black Lives Matter earlier this month. The premise of the fundraiser was simple: Athletes around the country would walk, run, bike or swim 8.46 miles to signify the 8 minutes, 46 seconds in which a Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin knelt on the neck of George Floyd last month, killing him.

Blake girls soccer coach Kelsey Hans caught wind of the fundraiser when the UCLA women's soccer program announced it was joining the effort. Hans immediately thought to ask her team's captains - Amelia Reyes, Cate Moe, Bailey Abraham and Rachel Winkey - if they would like to do something similar.

They were in.

"We went from there pretty quickly," Reyes said.

The team decided to do 8.46 miles Wednesday - by walking, running, biking or swimming - with a goal of raising at least $8,460. They had nearly hit the $5,000 by mid-Tuesday afternoon. They had nearly hit the \$5,000 by mid-Tuesday afternoon.

While Hans sprouted the idea and helped set up the GoFundMe page, her players have since taken the reins.

"It's been really student-driven, which has been fun to see," Hans said. "I think that age of kids can be very ego-centric and just concerned with their social group or what's going on in their lives, and so it's rewarding and I'm just kind of inspired by their drive to make a change."

Blake girls soccer team leads an active soccer community fundraiser to rebuild Lake Street, support social justice

It's not just her team, either. The Bears players have spread the fundraiser to other teams through social media and word of mouth.

Blake, Orono, Edina, Eagan, Minneapolis Washburn, Coon Rapids, Breck, Wayzata and Minnetonka, as well as a host of club teams, have joined the effort and will support and/or participate in the fundraiser. The Blake girls team will participate alongside the Bears boys team.

"I didn't really think it'd reach outside of the Blake program," Hans said. "It's fun and neat to see just how interested people are in raising awareness about racial injustice, especially at that age."

The proceeds for the fundraiser will go directly to the Lake Street Council to help rebuild the community that was significantly impacted in the aftermath of Floyd's killing.

Winkey said a number of Blake players had been doing things on their own, such as donating food, and were able to go into the city and witness the destruction firsthand. They wanted the money to help rebuild the local community.

"There's like a community aspect to the whole thing," Reyes said. "Rebuilding Lake Street seems like something that's positive and it still brings attention to issues."

Hans has made a point to speak with her captains about those issues, specifically racial and social inequalities. Those are things that she said should be recognized and discussed. She wants to make sure her team is creating an open space for everyone on the field and in the school to feel comfortable being who they are.

"I think that it isn't even a question of why is it important. It just should be," Reyes said. "If you think it's not important or you don't care, you must not be paying attention. I think we all understand the severity and the importance of it all."

Winkey said with the chaos and inequality taking place, being silent and failing to step forward isn't a valid way to support those issues.

MSHSL's potential COVID-19-induced budget shortfall could fall to member schools All options still on the table for fall sports as MSHSL awaits state's decision on schooling St. Paul champion gymnast Sunisa Lee: 'It's been hard to stay positive. I'm trying' Hopkins girls basketball coach Brian Cosgriff officially retires Saints create prep baseball tournament to give seniors last chance to play ball

"You really have to get out and do something," she said. "I think it's important to us as athletes to be taking a stand and trying to help."

The captains also agreed Wednesday will provide a nice opportunity to reconnect with teammates they haven't seen in months, and do so in an active way. As of last week, they weren't yet sure which method of transportation they'd take.

Their coach was, though.

"I'll probably bike it," Hans said, "because I can't run that far."

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

Blake girls soccer team leads an active soccer community fundraiser to rebuild Lake Street, support social justice

End of Document

Protesters demonstrate for a second night in St. Cloud; police use tear gas

ARTICLE DCXCIII. PROTESTERS DEMONSTRATE FOR A SECOND NIGHT IN ST. CLOUD; POLICE USE TEAR GAS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 289 words

Byline: Associated Press

Highlight: ST. CLOUD, Minn. (AP) - Police used tear gas to disperse a crowd early Tuesday during a second consecutive night of unrest in St. Cloud.

Body

ST. CLOUD, Minn. - Police used tear gas to disperse a crowd early Tuesday during a second consecutive night of unrest in St. Cloud.

About 100 people demonstrated with some protesters chanting some of George Floyd's last words "I can't breathe" before he died on a Minneapolis street.

A dumpster was set on fire and pushed into the middle of a street, the St. Cloud Times reported.

Officers used their patrol cars to cordon off Southtown Liquors store, which appeared to have been broken into with glass and bottles strewn about.

Police arrested 37 adults and two juveniles on unlawful assembly charges. One adult was arrested on suspicion of burglarizing the liquor store.

A similar crowd had gathered early Monday after a rumor spread on social media that police had shot two black men. In fact, a police officer was shot in the hand while struggling to make an arrest. No officers returned fire while struggling with the man, officials said.

Th protests come about three weeks after Floyd's death in Minneapolis, some 65 miles southeast of St. Cloud.

The death of Floyd, a 46-year-old black man, has sparked worldwide protests over police brutality and racism. He died after Derek Chauvin, a white officer, used his knee to pin down Floyd's neck for several minutes as Floyd pleaded for air and eventually stopped moving. Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis' Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting Police looking for dozens who looted Lululemon on St. Paul's Grand Ave. during Floyd unrest George Floyd's family sues Minneapolis officers charged in his death

Protesters demonstrate for a second night in St. Cloud; police use tear gas

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCXCIV. ADVOCATING FOR POLICE REFORM, ST. PAUL MAYOR TESTIFIES TO U.S. SENATE PANEL VIA VIDEO

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 743 words

Byline: Frederick Melo

Highlight: Recalling "superhero officers" who knew him by name as a child and efforts at police reform in his own city, St. Paul Mayor Melvin Carter added his voice to a national policing debate on Tuesday when he delivered remarks via a video link to the U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee in Washington. "It's not just about [...]"

Body

Recalling "superhero officers" who knew him by name as a child and efforts at police reform in his own city, St. Paul Mayor Melvin Carter added his voice to a national policing debate on Tuesday when he delivered remarks via a video link to the U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee in Washington.

"It's not just about hiring officers (of color)," said Carter, in response to a question about the impact of diversity in hiring within police forces. "It's about understanding people who are part of the community in the first place. ... If you know the children in the community ... you come up with a whole lot of reasons not to shoot someone."

The committee, chaired by Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-South Carolina, held a full hearing on police use of force standards and police community relations, including the proposed Justice in Policing Act.

The act, authored by Democrats, would establish new national standards for police departments, mandate data collection on police encounters and reroute existing funds toward community-based policing programs. It would also make it easier to prosecute officers for excessive force.

Carter, who testified in support of the act, was invited by and introduced to the committee by U.S. Sen. Amy Klobuchar, a co-sponsor of the proposed legislation.

Klobuchar, a Democrat, along with fellow Minnesotan Sen. Tina Smith and 23 colleagues, has asked U.S. Attorney General William Barr and the Department of Justice to open an investigation into "patterns and practices" of racially discriminatory and violent policing in the Minneapolis Police Department.

Barr has yet to formally respond to the request, which was triggered by the recent death of George Floyd, a black man in the custody of four Minneapolis police officers.

Advocating for police reform, St. Paul mayor testifies to U.S. Senate panel via video

The mayor noted his father, Melvin Carter Jr., served 28 years as a police officer and sergeant after the court-ordered integration of the St. Paul Police Department.

"Because of that integration order, my friends and I grew up surrounded by superhero officers who knew us by name, were invested in our future and solved local problems in ways that literally no one else could," Carter said.

"Still, I grew up with a set of rules that did not apply to my white classmates: they could drive a decent vehicle, admire a nice house, jog through a business district, or glance into a passing squad car without fear of being stopped and questioned by police," the mayor said. "Experiences like these, which are common among black and brown Americans, breed distrust and resentment which hurt us all."

Carter said studies show individuals who trust law enforcement are more likely to cooperate with officers, report a crime in progress and come forward as cooperative witnesses.

"It's time we challenge our country's long held myth of public safety as a simple function of police, prisons and prosecutors," the mayor said. "We spend nearly $200 billion on law enforcement and corrections annually, to maintain the highest imprisonment rate on the planet. Yet, despite steady increases in public safety budgets over three decades, Americans feel less safe every year."

In St. Paul, the city has rewritten policies governing use of force and limited use of police dogs, and in progress.

The city has also embedded social workers with officers to co-respond to individuals in crisis and added restorative justice circles for nonviolent offenders.

Last year, the city reduced the police department's authorized strength by five officers in favor of .

The mayor joined other advocates in calling for ending qualified immunity for officers, which shields law enforcement from most federal civil suits around police brutality.

"We fire officers only to see them shielded from accountability, reinstated through arbitration, or hired into another agency that has no knowledge of their past," Carter said. Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis' terminated five officers accused of willfully failing to stop an assault a "Community First" public safety effort that, to the frustration of some city council members, is still being fine-tuned at city hall Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting Police looking for dozens who looted Lululemon on St. Paul's Grand Ave. during Floyd unrest George Floyd's family sues Minneapolis officers charged in his death

Graphic

Sen. Mazie Hirono, D-Hawaii, and Sen. Cory Booker, D-N.J., listen to video testimony from St. Paul, Minn., Mayor Melvin Carter during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on police use of force and community relations on Capitol Hill, Tuesday, June 16, 2020 in Washington. (Jonathan Ernst/Pool via AP)

Advocating for police reform, St. Paul mayor testifies to U.S. Senate panel via video

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCXCV. DULUTH'S RECKONING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 894 wordsByline: KATIE GALIOTO; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Walz says 'unbroken line' ties lynchings to FloydBody

DULUTH - Gov. Tim Walz gazed up at three bronze faces memorializing the men murdered a century ago Monday on the very downtown corner where he stood.

The governor got a tour of Duluth's painful history exactly 100 years after a white mob lynched three black circus workers, Elias Clayton, Elmer Jackson and Isaac McGhie.

Carl Crawford, Duluth's human rights officer, met Walz and his family at the former police station where the men were ripped from their cells on June 15, 1920. The trio was among a group of six black men accused of raping a white woman, Irene Tusken, though her doctor found no evidence of an assault.

From the jail, Crawford brought Walz to the memorial at the intersection of First Street and E. Second Avenue, the spot where Clayton, Jackson and McGhie were killed.

"There is an unbroken line between what happened on that street corner 100 years ago right to George Floyd's murder on the streets of Minneapolis," Walz said later, speaking from the steps of Duluth's City Hall.

The governor's visit marked his first trip outside the Twin Cities since Floyd's death at the hands of Minneapolis police three weeks ago. The killing sparked protests across the country, spurring a surge of calls for criminal justice reform and the defunding of police departments.

"I think the frustrations, the anger, the things that spiraled out of control in some of the rioting - all of those are part of a story, but we can't let it detract from what the narrative is here," Walz said. "Systemic racism is prevalent and has been here. It has caused great pain and it is holding all of us back from being the type of state that we want to be."

"Whether you like it or not," he added, "we're going to be defined either by the murder of George Floyd or by how we respond to the murder of George Floyd."

Duluth's reckoning

Walz praised Duluth for acknowledging the lynchings, which for decades were barely discussed. In the early 2000s, a group of local activists raised money to build the memorial and remind the city of the shameful episode in its history. Long-planned events slated to bring 10,000 visitors to Duluth for the centennial were postponed because of COVID-19.

Once again linking the past and present, Walz urged Minnesotans not to shy away from tough conversations about race and equity happening since Floyd's death.

"I think if this moment passes, the systemic issues of racism will be so much harder to change," he said.

The governor met privately with 10 Duluth residents, all people of color, to discuss police brutality and other concerns for their community.

"I think it struck a chord with him because he probably didn't expect to hear me say that the same stuff has now happened to three generations - my parents, myself and my son," said Christina Trok, who sat in the meeting beside her 15-year-old son, Sterling.

"As a mother, I have to fear every single day when my son walks out the door if he's going to come back," she said.

Trok said the governor's words gave her hope. Walz said his goal as governor on issues of race is "to get things through that people in these communities have said will make a difference in their lives for, in many cases, generations."

He spoke broadly of intent to implement policies to lessen gaps between the state's white and black populations, mentioning health, housing and education disparities.

The former high school teacher noted he was talking with his daughter, Hope, about how painful parts of Minnesota's history often aren't in today's textbooks - like the Duluth lynchings and the Native history of "the land that we stand on."

"We need to think deeply about how we teach these in school," he said. "We need to think deeply about having that reconciliation so the story is told."

On Friday, the state corrected a chapter in its legal history by granting of its first posthumous pardon ever to Max Mason, who was convicted, without evidence, of Tusken's rape in 1920. Backers of the pardon called Mason - who worked alongside Clayton, Jackson and McGhie - a "scapegoat" to excuse the actions of the lynch mob.

"We can't control what our grandma and grandpa did, but we can control what we do," Minnesota Attorney General Keith Ellison said Monday at the memorial, where about 150 people gathered for a cookout.

Walz, Ellison and state Supreme Court Chief Justice Lorie Gildea make up the three-member board that voted to grant Mason's pardon.

The governor placed Ellison in charge of prosecutions related to Floyd's death. Derek Chauvin, the white officer who kept his knee on Floyd's neck for more than eight minutes while he pleaded for breath, faces second-degree murder charges. Three other officers have been charged with aiding and abetting.

Duluth's reckoning

"This is a social disease buried deep in the core of our identity. It was there from the beginning," Ellison said.

Some laid flowers beneath the reliefs of Clayton, Jackson and McGhie as Bob Marley's music blasted from speakers. Sterling Trok posed for a photo with Ellison and received an offer from a federal judge to come shadow him in court someday.

Christina Trok, who was born and raised in Duluth, said it felt "therapeutic" to share her perspective with those in positions of power.

"I felt solidarity in the room. I felt strength in the room," she said. "And I felt that people were listening."

Staff writer Brooks Johnson contributed to this story.

Katie Galioto · 612-673-4478

Load-Date: June 19, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCXCVI. SENATE GOP TO RESTRICT POLICE CHOKEHOLDS IN EMERGING BILL

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1150 wordsByline: Lisa MascaroHighlight: WASHINGTON (AP) - Driven by a swift-moving national debate, Senate Republicans are on the brink of introducing an extensive package of policing changes with new restrictions on police chokeholds and other practices as Congress rushes to respond to mass demonstrations over the deaths of George Floyd and other black Americans.Body

WASHINGTON - Driven by a swift-moving national debate, Senate Republicans are on the brink of introducing an extensive package of policing changes with new restrictions on police chokeholds and other practices as Congress rushes to respond to mass demonstrations over the deaths of George Floyd and other black Americans.

It's a sudden shift of GOP priorities, with President Donald Trump signaling support. The White House will announce its own executive actions on law enforcement procedures on Tuesday, a crush of activity that shows how quickly protests over police violence and racial prejudice are transforming national politics.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell opened the chamber Monday declaring that Senate Republicans are developing "a serious proposal to reform law enforcement."

While the emerging GOP package isn't as extensive as the sweeping Democratic proposal, which is headed for a House vote next week, it includes perhaps the most far-reaching proposed changes to policing procedures from the party long aligned with a "law and order" approach. Confronted with a groundswell of public unrest over police violence, in cities large and small nationwide, even the most conservative senators are joining the effort.

Sen. Tim Scott of South Carolina, the sole African American Republican in the Senate, has been crafting the package set to roll out Wednesday, and said he spoke with Trump about it over the weekend. Scott warned that pushing voting into later this summer would be a "bad decision." He has said the chokehold, in particular, "is a policy whose time has come and gone."

The weekend shooting death of Rayshard Brooks by a white officer in Atlanta led to a renewed public outcry, more street protests and the police chief's swift resignation.

Senate GOP to restrict police chokeholds in emerging bill

Democrats have said the GOP package doesn't go far enough to match the outpouring of support for reforms. Senate Democratic leader Chuck Schumer warned Republicans not to settle for minor changes.

"Now is the time to seek bold and broad-scale change, not change around the margins," Schumer said Monday.

Two senior administration officials told reporters that Trump's executive order would include establishing a database that tracks police officers who have complaints about excessive use of force in their records. The officials said the president wants to keep officers facing such accusations from being able to hop from one police department to another.

The officials said the executive order would also establish a national credentialing system that would give police departments a financial incentive to adopt best practices on such things as use of deadly force. The two officials briefed reporters on the executive order on the condition that they not be identified.

With the political debate fluid, it is unclear whether the parties will be able to find common ground. The proposals share many similar provisions but take different approaches to address some of the issues. Neither bill goes as far as some activists want in their push to "defund the police" by fully revamping departments.

The debate is changing almost daily, complicated by the fall election, with the Senate Republican majority at risk. McConnell, who is up for reelection in November, is backing the GOP effort after the death of Breonna Taylor when police entered her home in Louisville. It's a dynamic political environment in the aftermath of the killing of black Americans and the outpouring of protests and Black Lives Matter demonstrations that have overwhelmingly altered the national conversation.

The Senate Judiciary Committee is scheduled to consider policing issues at a hearing Tuesday.

Central to the Republican package would be the creation of a national database of police use-of-force incidents, similar to what the president is proposing in the executive order to improve transparency so officers cannot transfer without public oversight of their records. The Democrats have a similar provision.

The GOP bill would encourage police body cameras and include a long-stalled effort to make lynching a federal hate crime.

Additionally, the Republican package is expected to restrict the use of chokeholds by withholding certain federal funds to jurisdictions that continue to allow the practice, according to a Senate Republican unauthorized to discuss the pending bill and granted anonymity.

While chokeholds have become a symbol of police brutality - and a ban is included in the Democrats' bill - the maneuver is already banned in many departments. Police nationwide are far more likely to kill someone by shooting.

Yet the Republican bill does not go as far as the Democratic proposal, particularly on the issue of eliminating "qualified immunity," which would enable those injured by law enforcement personnel to sue for damages. The White House has said that is a line too far. But it's a timely issue after the Supreme Court on Monday declined to get involved, rejecting cases to take up the issue. As an alternative, Scott has suggested a "decertification" process for officers involved in misconduct.

Still, Democrats signaled a willingness to look at the Republican approach for areas of common ground.

Senate GOP to restrict police chokeholds in emerging bill

"Nothing is a non-starter," said Rep. James Clyburn of South Carolina, the House's third-ranking Democrat, on a conference call with reporters.

Democrats face criticism over activists' calls to defund the police, and party leaders in Congress have distanced themselves from that approach. It focuses on shifting policing resources to other community services. Democrats did not include it in their bill, which instead provides grants for jurisdictions to consider new ways of policing.

Leading civil rights groups have backed the Democratic bill, but it's unclear if the Republican proposal will be extensive enough to gain broad support.

"This is really a moral issue at this point," said Vanita Gupta, president and CEO of The Leadership Conference on Civil and Human Rights.

In an interview, she warned that any bill with "half measures" will be "woefully insufficient to meet the moment."

At the same time, one large police union, the influential Fraternal Order of Police, said in a statement it is working with Congress and the White House on the proposals, having provided "feedback" on the Democratic bill and "substantial input" on the emerging GOP package from Scott.

Associated Press writers Mary Clare Jalonick, Kevin Freking, Colleen Long, Michael Balsamo and Padmananda Rama contributed to this report. Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis' Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting Police looking for dozens who looted Lululemon on St. Paul's Grand Ave. during Floyd unrest George Floyd's family sues Minneapolis officers charged in his death

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

POLICING

ARTICLE DCXCVII. POLICING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 7ALength: 714 wordsByline: PETE STAUBER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: We need reform, but we also need police // Here I offer some important changes that must be made, from hiring and firing practices to policing with the community.Body

When I first became a law enforcement officer over two decades ago, I swore an oath to serve and protect the people of Duluth. As I watched the video of George Floyd dying at the hands of police officers who swore this same oath in Minneapolis, I was at a loss for words. What I saw in that video went against everything I stood for as a police officer. Their inhumane actions betrayed the badge and damaged the public's trust in law enforcement officers, the overwhelming majority of whom serve their communities with compassion and dedication.

George Floyd's life mattered, and I believe the best way to honor his memory is by enacting meaningful and lasting change within police departments nationwide. Reforms must be made at all stages of policing to prevent more abuses of power and restore the public's trust.

When it comes to hiring an officer, there is no room for mistakes. Reforms must be made to ensure education standards, comprehensive psychological screening and extensive background checks before new officers are hired. When new officers hit the streets, they must follow a qualified training program administered by a training officer who is a leader within their department, understands the community they serve and operates under a community policing philosophy.

Police training officers must be chosen based on their character, community relations skills, knowledge and experience and must continuously train on relevant topics.

It is also imperative that officers and departments alike are held to the highest degree of accountability. This means implementing body cameras in every department. Body camera footage can be used for training purposes, to identify bad policing conduct, to assist in prosecution, and to exonerate.

Changes also must be made to help police chiefs fire bad police officers. Currently, in Minnesota, police departments are public employers and therefore state law allows any termination to be appealed. This process, called arbitration, is all too often the flip of a coin and allows officers who consciously and continuously make egregious mistakes to return to policing. This system must be reformed.

POLICING

During my 23 years on the police force, I became an expert in community policing. When community policing practices are properly implemented, you do not end up policing your community, you end up policing with your community. To build up trust between law enforcement and the communities they serve, it is crucial that police have meaningful interactions with their community on a regular basis.

Therefore, I believe one of the most important steps going forward is requiring police departments to implement a set of community policing standards, using best practices that allow officers to be viewed as participants in the community rather than just responders to calls for service. Any federal funding that is distributed must follow the implementation of community policing best practices.

As violent riots and civil unrest took place in the Twin Cities and across the nation, countless attacks on law enforcement and citizens occurred without repercussion. Despite what the Minneapolis City Council might think, law enforcement is necessary, and abolishing the Minneapolis Police Department is not the answer. We need to inspire the best and the brightest to come forward to serve as police in our communities, but it will be impossible to do so if violence against law enforcement is tolerated and if we don't recognize most of our police officers are of good character.

Assaults on a law enforcement officer must be met with consequences and we must encourage good people to enter policing.

As a former police officer turned congressman, I remain committed to enacting change at the federal level. However, implementing community policing best practices alone isn't going to be enough. Lasting reform truly begins at the kitchen table with our loved ones. We must teach our children to love their neighbor, encourage them to stand up for others, and inspire them to serve as forces for good in our respective communities.

As Americans, we all have a role to play in the healing of our nation. I have no doubt that we will rise to the occasion.

Pete Stauber, a Republican, represents Minnesota's Eighth Congressional District in the U.S. House.

Load-Date: June 19, 2020

ARTICLE DCXCVIII.

INJURED PHOTOGRAPHER SUES LAW ENFORCEMENT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 679 wordsByline: PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Lawsuit says her last photo shows Minneapolis police firing at her during protest.Body

A journalist who was covering the recent rioting in Minneapolis alleges in a lawsuit that law enforcement blinded her in one eye with a nonlethal projectile fired at her despite her declaring in words and documentation that she was a member of the news media.

Linda Tirado's suit, filed last week in U.S. District Court, names as defendants the city of Minneapolis and its police chief, Medaria Arradondo; Lt. Robert Kroll, in his capacity as head of the city's police union; state Department of Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington, and State Patrol Col. Matt Langer.

"John Does 1-4" are also among the defendants, referring to unidentified officers she alleges played a role in her injury soon after curfew on the night of May 29, when the 37-year-old from Nashville was wounded.

The suit does not specify which agency's officers injured Tirado; however, her attorneys told the Star Tribune on Monday that the officers who targeted her were with the Minneapolis Police Department.

Tirado's attorneys provided a photograph that they say was her last at the scene and that it shows Minneapolis officers aiming at her before opening fire.

Police spokesman John Elder said in response that "it very well could have been us" who injured Tirado with a foam bullet as her attorneys contend.

Other than Elder's comments on behalf of the Police Department, defendants associated with the city have not responded to requests for reaction to Tirado's allegations.

While standing between protesters and a line of officers near the Third Precinct police headquarters in south Minneapolis, police "ignored the press credential she wore around her neck" and first marked her with a "ballistic tracking round" and then "shot her in her face with foam bullets," according to the suit.

A bleeding Tirado "cried out repeatedly, 'I'm press!' But the police ignored her," the suit continued, while also pointing out that Gov. Tim Walz's nighttime curfews during the unrest had exempted on-duty news media.

The shot shattered her protective goggles, allowing tear gas to burn her eyes, the filing read. She continued to yell "I'm press!" while bleeding, but no law enforcement personnel came to her aid, her suit alleges.

Protesters led her to a medic before she was taken to a hospital, where she awoke from surgery and was told she was permanently blind in her left eye.

Bruce Gordon, a spokesman for defendants Harrington and Langer, said "the State Patrol is unable to discuss specifics of the litigation."

However, Gordon did point to a statement state law enforcement issued in reaction to an earlier lawsuit brought by the American Civil Liberties Union on behalf of several journalists who were injured or arrested over the course of the protests.

"When conducting law enforcement operations to restore order and keep people safe, it can be difficult for officers to distinguish journalists from those who are violating a curfew order or not complying with commands to leave an area," the statement read. "While not all of the incidents involve the Minnesota State Patrol, we are reviewing the incidents involving our troopers in an effort to prevent similar incidents in the future."

Tirado, the mother of a 9- and 7-year-old, has lost some hearing in her left ear from the projectile hitting her in the head, the suit said.

Her injuries have meant that she "does not anticipate returning to anything approaching her usual work life for at least six months," the suit noted.

The suit does not specify a dollar amount being sought for Tirado, but it asks for punitive and compensatory damages along with an order from the court of the defendants to stop using "excessive force to stifle coverage of protests."

One of Tirado's attorneys, Davida Williams, said her client intends to donate a portion of what she might receive to social justice causes.

Along with being a photographer, Tirado is a published author. She wrote a memoir titled "Hand to Mouth: Living in Bootstrap America." She's also written for the Guardian in London, the Daily Beast and other online outlets.

Paul Walsh · 612-673-4482

Load-Date: June 19, 2020

What's in Trump's executive order on police procedures? Here's a look.

ARTICLE DCXCIX. WHAT'S IN TRUMP'S EXECUTIVE ORDER ON POLICE PROCEDURES? HERE'S A LOOK.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 871 words

Byline: Associated Press

Highlight: WASHINGTON (AP) - President Donald Trump signed an executive order Tuesday aimed at curbing police brutality by directing federal dollars to those police departments that meet certain credentialing standards on the use of force. The executive action also makes it harder for those officers with a troubled history from getting hired by other departments.

Body

WASHINGTON - President Donald Trump signed an executive order Tuesday aimed at curbing police brutality by directing federal dollars to those police departments that meet certain credentialing standards on the use of force. The executive action also makes it harder for those officers with a troubled history from getting hired by other departments.

Congress is also moving toward passing policing bills, but Trump was anxious to put his own stamp on the issue with a Rose Garden press conference in which he was flanked by representatives from the nation's leading law enforcement groups.

Here's a look at some of the topics in the order:

WHAT ARE THE MOST IMPORTANT PROVISIONS?

The executive order would give police departments a financial incentive to adopt best practices and encourage programs in which social workers join police when they respond to nonviolent calls involving mental health, addiction and homeless issues.

The president's executive order also requires the attorney general to create a database tracking terminations, criminal convictions and civil judgments against law enforcement officers for excessive use-of-force. It encourages participation by providing certain grants only to those agencies that submit the required information.

WHY TRACK OFFICER MISCONDUCT?

Many officers who wind up involved in a fatal incident have a long history of complaints made against them by the public, including Derek Chauvin, the white Minneapolis police officer who has been charged with murder in the death of George Floyd. Chauvin had at least a dozen complaints made against him, according to records.

What's in Trump's executive order on police procedures? Here's a look.

But those records are often not made public, making it difficult to know if officers have a track record. And some police departments do a bad job of keeping track of misconduct claims, since not all are substantiated for a variety of reasons, and police reform groups say it's a missed opportunity to identify and correct problem behaviors before it turns fatal.

WHAT WILL A NATIONAL DATABASE DO?

A national database would force some departments into more transparency and accountability, but like other national clearinghouses, it depends on the locality's willingness to participate.

ARE CHOKEHOLDS BANNED?

Trump said he was banning chokeholds, but that's not the case. Rather, he's encouraging such bans through financial incentives.

Chokeholds have become a symbol of police brutality again following the death of Floyd. They are a potentially tactical maneuver in which an officer cuts off air to a person's neck. The officer involved in the death of Eric Garner was accused of using one, but has maintained he was employing a legal takedown maneuver called the seatbelt which is similar but doesn't block air. But chokeholds are already largely banned by many departments around the country.

CAN THE ADMINISTRATION SET CONDITIONS ON FUNDING?

That could be a matter of legal dispute.

There have been a number of lawsuits brought in the past against the Trump administration for attempting to condition the same law enforcement funding on specific policies.

A similar situation happened in 2017 when the Justice Department said it would withhold grant money from so-called sanctuary cities and states until they gave federal immigration authorities access to jails and provide advance notice when someone in the country illegally is about to be released.

Courts around the country have been divided on the issue.

A federal judge in Los Angeles ruled last February to block the Trump administration from imposing conditions that police departments cooperate with immigration authorities to receive law enforcement grants. But earlier this year, a federal appeals court in New York said the administration can withhold millions of dollars in law enforcement grants to force states to cooperate with immigration enforcement. That decision conflicted with three other federal appeals courts.

HOW WOULD CERTIFICATION WORK?

The executive order instructs the Justice Department to push local police departments to be certified by a "reputable independent credentialing body." Under the order, the Justice Department would ensure a department could only be credentialed if its use-of-force policies adhered to federal, state, and local laws.

An organization called the Commission on Accreditation for Law Enforcement Agencies already credentials police departments. It lists more than 1,000 departments it has credentialed, out of roughly 18,000 nationwide.

What's in Trump's executive order on police procedures? Here's a look.

Matthew Hickman, a professor and criminal justice expert at Seattle University, said there's no definitive research proving credentialed agencies better serve the public.

"It's good for the public, arguably, to know that their agency has gone through a professional accreditation process," he said. "It says something about the commitment to best practices." Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis' Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting Police looking for dozens who looted Lululemon on St. Paul's Grand Ave. during Floyd unrest George Floyd's family sues Minneapolis officers charged in his death

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCC. READ 'RACE IN MINNESOTA' FREE IN LATEST STATEWIDE BOOK CLUB EFFORT

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 442 words

Byline: Mary Ann Grossmann

Highlight: "A Good Time for the Truth: Race in Minnesota" is the second book in the Minnesota Center for the Book's statewide One Book One Minnesota book club. Readers will have free, unlimited access to the e-book until Aug. 23. Edited by Sun Yung Shin and published by Minnesota Historical Society Press, the book is made [...]

Body

"A Good Time for the Truth: Race in Minnesota" is the second book in the Minnesota Center for the Book's statewide One Book One Minnesota book club. Readers will have free, unlimited access to the e-book until Aug. 23.

Edited by Sun Yung Shin and published by Minnesota Historical Society Press, the book is made up of essays by 16 of Minnesota's best writers who provide a range of perspectives on what it is like to live as a Native person or person of color in Minnesota.

One Book One Minnesota is presented by Friends of the St. Paul Public Library acting as Minnesota Center for the Book, in partnership with State Library Services, a division of the Minnesota Department of Education. Its aim is to read a common title and come together to reflect and discuss.

Beth Burns, president of the Friends, explains in a prepared statement why this book was chosen:

"When we started this program two months ago with 'Because of Winn-Dixie' by Kate DiCamillo, it was in response to the isolation and resource gaps created by the COVID-19 pandemic...Since then, the Minneapolis police murdered George Floyd, and, led by Black community members and activists, the world erupted in grief, protest, and perhaps finally a reckoning that we must confront institutional and systemic racism - and that means all of us. Reading this book in community offers some Minnesotans the opportunity to see their experiences broadly shared and others a chance to educate themselves and to discover ways to act on their convictions."

During the summer, through local libraries, Minnesotans will be invited to read the featured book and will have access to reading guides, conversation facilitators, and virtual book club discussions. All Minnesotans will be invited to participate in a statewide virtual discussion with the editor in August.

Read 'Race in Minnesota' free in latest statewide book club effort

The book is available on multiple platforms, including the digital book offered free on Ebooks Minnesota for 10 weeks. Hard copies will be available through the Minnesota Historical Society Press and independent bookstores around the state, as well as public libraries as social distancing allows. The public will be encouraged to visit their local library's website for information on the book and virtual discussions. Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis' Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting Police looking for dozens who looted Lululemon on St. Paul's Grand Ave. during Floyd unrest George Floyd's family sues Minneapolis officers charged in his death

Graphic

Sun Yung Shin is the editor of "A Good Time for the Truth: Race in Minnesota." (Courtesy of Dan Markworth)

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCCI. DOWNTOWN RESIDENTS CONCERNED OVER POLICE PROPOSALS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 5BLength: 348 wordsByline: DAVID CHANEN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Group speaks to Mpls. City Council members.Body

Board members of a downtown Minneapolis neighborhood group Monday raised concerns about the City Council's intention to create a new public safety model.

Council Member Steve Fletcher spoke to the group of about 40 via Zoom teleconferencing. People on the call asked several questions, ranging from the possibility of a charter amendment to change the Police Department to the number of peace officers who would continue to be paid to respond to 911 calls.

"The city has been through a lot," said Fletcher. "Three weeks ago, we thought we were in a crisis we never thought we would be governing through because of COVID. Then we woke up to the aftermath of the death of George Floyd."

The meeting was sponsored by the Minneapolis Downtown Neighborhood Association, which covers the Downtown West and East neighborhoods. Its website said it represents the interests of 150,000 people who live, work and own property in the area.

Board member Joe Tamburino, who frequently advocates for more downtown safety and police officers, said the City Council's announcement of a possible charter change for a new public safety model was "reckless" and "sent shock waves" to residents.

Board vice chairman Kevin Frazell said he knows something has to be changed with the Police Department, but hoped that neighborhoods could come together to discuss it. "I hear words like defund, abolish and dismantle, but there isn't a common definition of what these mean," he said. "Before voters go to the polls to change the charter, we need to know what will happen. Fear, anger and trauma can't be the guides for a new public safety department."

Board chairwoman Pam McCrea voiced some frustration about seeing only white faces during the meeting, but said "Floyd's death has brought us all together." She said she heard from relatives living in north Minneapolis that they don't call 911 because they have issues with police.

Downtown residents concerned over police proposals

Fletcher said he saw hope that a culture change might be happening after a group of Minneapolis police officers signed a letter condemning Derek Chauvin's actions.

David Chanen · 612-673-4465

Load-Date: June 19, 2020

End of Document

Rumors, unrest in St. Cloud after officer shot in hand by teen

ARTICLE DCCII. [RUMORS, UNREST IN ST. CLOUD AFTER OFFICER SHOT IN HAND
BY TEEN](#)

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 685 wordsByline: PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Police, civic leaders decry those spreading falsehoods on social media that police had shot two black men.Body

A St. Cloud police officer was shot in the hand early Monday by a teenager who was resisting arrest, an encounter that ignited rumors of two black men being hit by police gunfire followed by swift rebuttals from civic leaders.

The encounter with the 18-year-old occurred about 12:10 a.m. and ended in the 1000 block of S. 10th Avenue, according to police. The officer was hospitalized with noncritical injuries.

The shooting comes in the midst of global outrage over the deaths of two black men in recent weeks during encounters with white police officers. Three weeks ago in Minneapolis, George Floyd died after officer Derek Chauvin kept his knee pinned to Floyd's neck for roughly 8 minutes. Late last week, a white police officer in Atlanta chased and fatally shot a black man.

In connection with the St. Cloud shooting, rumors were quickly posted on social media that two black men had been shot by officers, and a large and at times unruly crowd assembled outside police headquarters overnight, said Police Chief Blair Anderson.

The building "did experience some damage [from] people throwing rocks," the chief said. Officers directed tear gas and chemical irritants to disperse the crowd, and four arrests were made for minor offenses, he said.

Anderson expressed frustration with the role social media had in spreading the rumors.

"It's very dangerous," he said during a news conference at police headquarters. "This is the type of thing that could have escalated. ... This place could have been on fire over a lie."

Rumors, unrest in St. Cloud after officer shot in hand by teen

Denise Fale, president of the St. Cloud chapter of the NAACP, said the chief came to her about "the miscommunication" circulating in the community.

Word of "two young African-American males being shot ... was not the case," Fale said at the police news conference.

Fale went on to praise how police responded at the scene, saying, "The young man had a gun. ... The officers could have shot him, but [they] showed a tremendous amount of restraint."

The Rev. James Alberts, pastor at the Church of God in Christ in St. Cloud, addressed at the same news conference the trouble that bubbled up outside police headquarters.

"We are sitting in an unprecedented time," Alberts said, pointing to global protests over police in the United States killing black men and women. "The community is rightfully concerned, but there is no one dead here today. We are thankful.

"I am thankful that our police department did not follow in some of the footsteps that we have seen around the country. It is possible to police and not kill."

St. Cloud officers do not wear body cameras, Anderson said. Department squad cars have dash cameras, but those at the scene did not record the incident, the BCA said. Investigators will review nearby video surveillance and video from cameras on police Tasers for evidence, the agency said.

According to a statement police released a few hours after the shooting and a follow-up statement from the state Bureau of Criminal Apprehension (BCA):

Officers were attempting to stop and detain the suspect at a gas station for what Anderson later said was a suspicion that he had a gun. The suspect ran, and officers soon caught up with him near S. 10th Avenue and University Drive.

"At that point, the suspect physically resisted arrest," a statement from police read.

During the suspect's struggle with police, he drew a handgun and got off a shot that hit one of the officers in the hand.

No officers returned fire while subduing the teen and arresting him. The suspect suffered what appeared to be a cut during his arrest. He also was taken to a hospital and was in stable condition.

One gun was recovered at the scene and another in a nearby residential yard.

Police identified the suspect and said he lives in St. Cloud. The Star Tribune generally does not identify suspects before they are charged.

The wounded officer is a 14-year veteran of the St. Cloud Police Department, and he is among four officers on the force now on standard paid administrative leave. Their identities will be released, the BCA said, once initial interviews with them have been completed.

Paul Walsh · 612-673-4482

Load-Date: June 19, 2020

Rumors, unrest in St. Cloud after officer shot in hand by teen

End of Document

'When does it stop?' Rayshard Brooks' family makes tearful plea

ARTICLE DCCIII. 'WHEN DOES IT STOP?' RAYSHARD BROOKS' FAMILY MAKES TEARFUL PLEA

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1152 words

Byline: Russ Bynum, Kate Brumback

Highlight: ATLANTA (AP) - Pleading through tears Monday, the family of a black man killed by Atlanta police outside a drive-thru demanded changes in the criminal justice system and called on protesters to refrain from violence amid heightened tensions across the U.S. three weeks after George Floyd's death in Minneapolis.

Body

ATLANTA - Pleading through tears Monday, the family of a black man killed by Atlanta police outside a drive-thru demanded changes in the criminal justice system and called on protesters to refrain from violence amid heightened tensions across the U.S. three weeks after George Floyd's death in Minneapolis.

An autopsy found that 27-year-old Rayshard Brooks was shot twice in the back late Friday by a white officer who was trying to arrest him at a fast food restaurant for being intoxicated behind the wheel of his car. Brooks tried to flee after wrestling with officers and grabbing a stun gun from one of them.

"Not only are we hurt, we are angry," said Chassidy Evans, Brooks' niece. "When does it stop? We're not only pleading for justice. We're pleading for change."

Atlanta Mayor Keisha Lance Bottoms announced Monday that she was ordering changes to police use-of-force policies, including requiring that officers receive continuous training in how to deescalate situations and use those techniques before taking action that could be fatal. She said she also was requiring officers to intervene if they see a colleague using excessive force.

The mayor said that after Brooks' shooting, it was clear Atlanta did not have "another day, another minute, another hour to waste" in changing police practices.

Other cities nationwide are taking similar steps, and packages of police reforms have been proposed or are emerging in Congress.

About 20 of Brooks' children, siblings, cousins and other family members sobbed at a news conference as over 1,000 people gathered not far away at an NAACP-led protest outside the Georgia Capitol.

'When does it stop?' Rayshard Brooks' family makes tearful plea

Floyd's death May 25 after a white Minneapolis officer pressed his knee into the black man's neck touched off demonstrations and scattered violence across the U.S., and Brooks' killing rekindled those protests in Atlanta. The Wendy's restaurant where Brooks was shot was burned down over the weekend.

Evans said there was no reason for her uncle "to be shot and killed like trash in the street for falling asleep in a drive-thru."

"Rayshard has a family who loves him who would have gladly come and got him so he would be here with us today," she said.

Relatives described Brooks as a loving father of three daughters and a stepson who had a bright smile and a big heart and loved to dance. His oldest daughter learned her father was slain while celebrating her eighth birthday with cupcakes and friends, wearing a special dress as she waited for Brooks to take her skating, said Justin Miller, an attorney for the family.

"There's no justice that can ever make me feel happy about what's been done," said Tomika Miller, Brooks' widow. "I can never get my husband back. ... I can never tell my daughter he's coming to take you skating or for swimming lessons."

She asked those demonstrating to "keep the protesting peaceful," saying: "We want to keep his name positive and great."

Several Democratic lawmakers joined protesters and called for Georgia to pass reforms including the repeal of the state's citizen's arrest and stand-your-ground laws.

While some Republican leaders pushed back against swift action on some proposals, GOP House Speaker David Ralston endorsed rapid passage of a hate-crimes law, telling lawmakers that failure to act would be "a stain on this state we can never wash away."

Morgan Dudley, 18, skipped work to join the demonstration after her job kept her from joining protests following Floyd's death three weeks ago.

"I was like, 'You know what? This is not a trend. This is an actual problem that we're facing,'" said Dudley, who is black.

Officials nationwide are responding to calls for reform while protests persist. The New York City Police Department is disbanding the type of plainclothes anti-crime units that were involved in the 2014 chokehold death of Eric Garner and have long been criticized for aggressive tactics, Commissioner Dermot Shea said Monday.

In Chicago, Mayor Lori Lightfoot said a panel of residents, activists and one police official will review the Police Department's policy on when officers can use force. Albuquerque, New Mexico, Mayor Tim Keller said he wants a new department of social workers and civilian professionals to provide another option when someone calls 911.

And New Jersey's attorney general ordered police to begin divulging names of officers who commit serious disciplinary violations.

In Congress, Republicans are on the brink of introducing a bill with restrictions on police chokeholds and other practices, while a Democratic proposal would limit legal protections for police, create a national database of excessive-force encounters and ban chokeholds. The White House will announce its own executive actions Tuesday.

'When does it stop?' Rayshard Brooks' family makes tearful plea

In the Atlanta shooting, Officer Garrett Rolfe, who fired the shots that killed Brooks, was fired, and the other officer at the scene, Devin Brosnan, was put on desk duty. Police Chief Erika Shields resigned.

Police released the officers' disciplinary histories, which showed Rolfe received a written reprimand in 2017 for use of force with a firearm but provided no other details. Rolfe, who was hired in October 2013, also got a written reprimand in 2018 and an oral admonishment in 2014, both for vehicle crashes. A firearm discharge case from 2015 listed no conclusion.

Brosnan was hired last June and had no disciplinary history.

Fulton County District Attorney Paul Howard said he hopes to decide by midweek whether to charge the officers. The Georgia Bureau of Investigation took over the investigation.

Police were called to the restaurant over complaints of a car blocking the drive-thru lane. An officer found Brooks asleep in the car.

Police video showed Brooks cooperating with the officers for more than 40 minutes until a breath test determined his blood-alcohol level was over the legal limit. When one of the officers moved to handcuff him, Brooks tried to run and the officers took him to the ground.

Brooks broke free and took off with a stun gun but was shot. Rolfe told authorities that Brooks fired the stun gun at him.

Asked why Brooks ran, family attorney L. Chris Stewart suggested that he may have feared for his life.

"They put George Floyd in handcuffs and he was subsequently killed," Stewart said. "So just getting put in handcuffs if you're African American doesn't mean, oh, you're going to get nicely taken to the back of a police car."

Bynum reported from Savannah, Georgia. Associated Press writer Ben Nadler in Atlanta contributed to this report. Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis' Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting Police looking for dozens who looted Lululemon on St. Paul's Grand Ave. during Floyd unrest George Floyd's family sues Minneapolis officers charged in his death

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

Brainerd man arrested in Colorado for Minneapolis police fire

ARTICLE DCCIV. [BRAINERD MAN ARRESTED IN COLORADO FOR MINNEAPOLIS
POLICE FIRE](#)

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 451 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: A Minnesota man arrested in Colorado has been charged on suspicion of setting some of the fires that destroyed a Minneapolis police station on a night when protests over the death of George Floyd turned violent.Body

A Minnesota man arrested in Colorado has been charged on suspicion of setting some of the fires that destroyed a Minneapolis police station on a night when protests over the death of George Floyd turned violent.

Dylan Shakespeare Robinson, 22, appeared briefly in federal court in Denver by video on Tuesday to be advised of the aiding and abetting of arson charge filed against him. He was arrested Sunday in the parking lot of the recreation center in the ski resort community of Breckenridge by the U.S. Marshals and agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. Investigators initially traced him to the Denver area.

Robinson, of Brainerd, is represented by assistant federal defender Edward Harris, whose office does not comment on cases. He will be kept in custody at least until a detention hearing is held on Friday.

According to the criminal complaint, Robinson is suspected of lighting a Molotov cocktail that was thrown by another person into the police station on May 28 as he stood nearby and throwing another incendiary device into the building himself. He is also accused of setting another fire inside the station that night, which was allegedly captured in a video posted on Facebook. According to the document, a video posted on Robinson's Snapchat account showed at least one person who appeared to be making a Molotov cocktail while others discussed how to do it and someone objected to making one.

A mother of a former classmate at a school in the Brainerd area identified him as one of the arson suspects shown in surveillance video images released by authorities, according to the complaint. The document also said that Robinson is on probation for possessing hallucinogens and had told his probation officer he wanted to move to Denver.

Last week, Branden Michael Wolfe, 23, of St. Paul was charged with aiding and abetting arson in connection with the police station fires. According to the criminal complaint, Wolfe was arrested June 3 a few blocks from a Menards home improvement store in St. Paul where he was fired earlier in the day from his job as a security guard. He was wearing body armor with his name written on duct tape on the back, a police utility belt and carrying a baton as he tried to get into the store, the complaint said. Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis' Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting Police looking for dozens who looted Lululemon on St. Paul's Grand Ave. during Floyd unrest George Floyd's family sues Minneapolis officers charged in his death

Brainerd man arrested in Colorado for Minneapolis police fire

Graphic

Dylan Shakespeare Robinson was identified in surveillance video images from the May 28, 2020, Minneapolis 3rd Precinct arson fire, according to the U.S. Attorney's office. (Courtesy of U.S. Attorney, District of Minnesota)

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCCV. MINNESOTA SENATE DEBATES POLICE ACCOUNTABILITY PROPOSALS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 738 wordsByline: Steve Karnowski

Highlight: The Republican-controlled Minnesota Senate on Tuesday debated a package of police accountability measures drawn up following the death of George Floyd, but with a more extensive set of bills advancing in the Democrat-dominated House critics warned the Senate proposals don't go far enough. The full House is expected to vote this week on a package [...]

Body

The Republican-controlled Minnesota Senate on Tuesday debated a package of police accountability measures drawn up following the death of George Floyd, but with a more extensive set of bills advancing in the Democrat-dominated House critics warned the Senate proposals don't go far enough.

The full House is expected to vote this week on a package developed by the bicameral People of Color and Indigenous Caucus that has some elements in common with the Senate plan.

But the House slate also includes proposals that Republicans have ruled out, including having the state attorney general prosecute all police-involved deaths. Democratic Attorney General Keith Ellison is already prosecuting the four former Minneapolis police officers charged in Floyd's May 25 death. GOP leaders oppose giving more power to Ellison, a fiery progressive and longtime police critic.

An early procedural vote on a series of Democrat-proposed amendments split along party lines and set the stage for the rest of the debate. Democratic Sen. Melisa Franzen, who belongs to the caucus, called the process a travesty.

"This is a disgrace and I'm going to call it out, because this is an injustice. ... Play the political games that people are tired of hearing. You will reap the consequences in November," she said.

Earlier Tuesday, President Donald Trump signed an executive order to encourage better police practices and establish a database to keep track of officers with a history of excessive use-of-force complaints. Mirroring the partisan divide in the Minnesota Legislature, the GOP-led U.S. Senate and Democratic-controlled House are working on competing policing reform packages.

Minnesota Senate debates police accountability proposals

It remains to be seen whether the Minnesota chambers will agree on any changes during the special session. Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, of East Gull Lake, reiterated that he intends to adjourn Friday, regardless of what the House does.

The main thrust of the Senate plan is to ban the use of chokeholds and neck restraints in all but the most dire situations, and add a duty to intervene and report when one officer sees another officer using excessive force. The rewrite of a statewide model policy would stress the importance of the sanctity of life. Law enforcement agencies would be obligated to update their use-of-force policies accordingly.

The Senate package would also preserve a $9 million annual funding stream that supports diversity training for officers, which is due to revert to $3 million after next year. It would require that any use of force resulting in death or great bodily harm be reported to the state - something most Minnesota law enforcement agencies already do. Confidentiality would be protected for officers and other first responders who get peer support after critical incidents. Background checks, currently required during officer hiring, would be extended to other police employees.

"These are important first steps. This is laying foundation stones for more subjects to be addressed in the future," Senate Judiciary Chairman Warren Limmer, of Maple Grove, said at a news conference ahead of the Senate's floor debate.

House Democratic leaders, including Speaker Melissa Hortman, of Brooklyn Park, said the GOP proposals won't deliver justice or public safety for all.

"Not a single item in the Senate proposals addresses the problem of a lack of accountability for police," Hortman said in a statement. "The House proposals, shaped by working with members of our communities, would take the first steps in making systemic change that will lead to accountability."

None of the GOP proposals has attracted significant opposition, and they have the support of law enforcement groups. But state Human Rights Commissioner Rebecca Lucero and several others who testified at a hearing Tuesday said the Senate is wasting an opportunity to make bold change.

"While the policy proposals before you today address some of those concerns, I don't believe they go far enough," State Corrections Commissioner Paul Schnell said.

Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis' Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting Police looking for dozens who looted Lululemon on St. Paul's Grand Ave. during Floyd unrest George Floyd's family sues Minneapolis officers charged in his death

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

Employee's fundraising effort saves The Fixery repair shop in Highland Park

ARTICLE DCCVI. EMPLOYEE'S FUNDRAISING EFFORT SAVES THE FIXERY REPAIR SHOP IN HIGHLAND PARK

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 413 words

Byline: Isabel Saavedra-Weis

Highlight: Loyal customers and staff have come to the rescue of The Fixery, a St. Paul repair shop that was looted during the unrest that followed George Floyd's death on Memorial Day. On May 28, the Highland Park shop was robbed of nearly all its merchandise during the rioting that unfolded after Floyd's death in Minneapolis [...]

Body

Loyal customers and staff have come to the rescue of The Fixery, a St. Paul repair shop that was looted during the unrest that followed George Floyd's death on Memorial Day.

On May 28, the Highland Park shop was robbed of nearly all its merchandise during the rioting that unfolded after Floyd's death in Minneapolis police custody. More than 200 watches and watchbands were stolen. But acts of generosity have helped it recover.

The Fixery has been in the Highland Park neighborhood for more than 40 years. Mark Wilsey has been an employee for 27 of them, hired right out of high school by store owner Mark Kafka.

"My dad worked at The Fixery since the time I was in elementary school," Wilsey said. "He talked the owner into employing me despite him hearing for years that I was always causing trouble at home."

The Fixery used to be a multi-store franchise. Now, the St. Paul location at Cleveland Avenue and Ford Parkway is sole survivor, and Wilsey is the only employee.

"The Fixery is my life," he said. "When we got broken into, it was like someone broke into my house."

Kafka is not one to take donations, Wilsey said. But Wilsey knew insurance wouldn't cover all the damage and theft, and The Fixery hadn't generated income for two months after closing during the coronavirus pandemic. So he secretly started an online fundraising effort to support Kafka and his business.

The GoFundMe page was launched on June 1 with a $10,000 goal, which was met Tuesday morning.

"We were on the fringe of going out of business," Wilsey said. "But through social media and donations, we are going to survive this."

Employee's fundraising effort saves The Fixery repair shop in Highland Park

The Fixery has reopened since the break-in and is performing repairs, battery changes and other services. Business is slow, but it's better than it was during the beginning of the pandemic.

Wilsey's fundraising efforts only remained a secret for a few days. Kafka was grateful when he found out, but reluctant to accept the donations. But for Wilsey, the fundraiser was about more than saving a business.

"After being around someone for close to two-thirds your life, you consider them family, not your boss," Wilsey said. "And when they're hurt, so are you."

Experts say Twitter breach troubling, undermines trust Target joins list of major retailers mandating masks Demolition underway for new entrepreneur space at University and Dale in St. Paul Coronavirus career-switch: Franchises appeal to displaced workers Nick Cannon apologizes for 'hurtful' anti-Semitic comments

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

ARTICLE DCCVII. FLOYD DECAL SPURS RENAMING DISCUSSION FOR PARK

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 326 wordsByline: PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Minneapolis Park Board leadership is discussing the renaming of a park in honor of George Floyd, the agency's president said two days after a "Floyd" decal was mysteriously placed on a park sign and later removed.

"I do not know who put the decal up" on the George Todd Park sign, Park Board President Jono Cowgill told the Star Tribune late Monday afternoon, "but I commend whoever it was for their creativity and detailed work."

"I am very open to a park name change for George Floyd," he said, "and have had a few preliminary conversations on the topic with other commissioners."

He said that any decisions about such a move "must be grounded in black and brown community voices."

The unauthorized alteration of the sign along the eastern border of the park occurred Saturday night and was spotted by a maintenance worker on Sunday.

Board spokeswoman Dawn Sommers said the agency had no immediate plans to peel off the Floyd decal to reveal Todd's name underneath.

"I learned [Monday] that the decal is gone," Sommers said. "On Sunday, we had issued the directive to our staff to not remove the decal. ... Unfortunately, one of our early morning weekday crew members was unaware of the directive and removed the decal [Monday] morning."

As for the label, which was a good match to the sign's design, "it was unsalvageable and could not be re-adhered."

Sommers said maintenance workers routinely remove materials posted or displayed throughout the park system, "so it's unfortunate the early morning staff that start at 6 a.m. were unaware of the directive ... to not remove the decal."

Floyd decal spurs renaming discussion for park

The park east of Diamond Lake and along the 5600 block of S. Chicago Avenue sits about 2¼ miles south of where a police officer pinned Floyd to the pavement before he died May 25.

George Todd was a park commissioner from 1957 to 1963. The board named the park in honor of Todd. The World War I veteran had cancer at the time. He died in 1964 at age 71.

Paul Walsh · 612-673-4482

Load-Date: June 19, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCCVIII. NEW TWISTS IN BREMER LAWSUIT

Finance and Commerce

June 16, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 BridgeTower Media All Rights Reserved

FINANCE & COMMERCESection: NEWSLength: 812 wordsByline: Brian JohnsonBody

Recently unsealed court documents are shedding new light on the legal dispute over ownership of Bremer Bank, an acrimonious battle that pits members of the Otto Bremer Trust against seven directors of the Bremer Financial Corp.

The dispute dates to November, when the Bremer Financial Corp. and seven of its directors sued three other directors who are also trustees of the Otto Bremer Trust to stop a planned sale of the bank.

Otto Bremer Trust owns more than 90% of the bank's voting shares, but it controls only three of the 10 board seats and 20% of the voting shares. Bremer employees and directors own the remaining voting shares.

In the lawsuit, the seven directors claimed among other things that the sale would violate terms of the trust's founding documents, which required the trust to hold Bremer shares "in perpetuity" except in the case of "unforeseen circumstances. "

On Monday, the trust cited newly unsealed court documents as evidence that the trust had a "clear right" to sell its Bremer Financial Corp. holdings, and that Bremer Financial management and directors were "informed of this right" as long ago as 1988.

For example, the trust cited a 1988 presentation from Bremer Financial Corp. senior management. The presentation states that an offer to buy or merge "could be received" at some point and that trustees "have a responsibility to consider any valid offer. "

The trust argues that if the sale of the bank had gone through as planned last fall, the trust could have doubled its charitable giving to everything ranging from low-income housing to rebuilding efforts in the wake of the George Floyd protests.

A spokesman for the Otto Bremer Trust said in an email Tuesday that the trust made charitable investments totaling $56.8 million in 2019 to 650 organizations in Minnesota, Montana, North Dakota and Wisconsin.

Assets for Otto Bremer Trust were $1.03 billion last year. Various sources reported that the bank could have been sold last year for $2 billion, and if that had happened the trust's assets would have doubled, the spokesman said.

In a statement, the trust said the unsealed court documents show that the bank "has known for decades that [Otto Bremer Trust] trustees have the right, in fact the responsibility, to sell if they believe a sale enhances the trust's charitable purposes. "

"BFC's seven non-Trustee directors have not only wasted millions of dollars in needless legal fees at the expense of the trust and its beneficiaries, their improper tactics have deprived OBT of the opportunity to substantially increase its charitable assets by selling the bank before recent events severely disrupted the marketplace. Those wasted and lost assets could have should have been better spent to help those in need across our service area: individuals and families struggling against daily challenges, against a pandemic, a severe economic downturn and, as we've been painfully and tragically reminded by the killing of George Floyd, against the corrosive effects of persistent racism. It is long past the point at which the bank's obstruction should have ended," the statement continues.

In addition, the trust has argued that the sale is necessary to keep the trust in compliance with federal tax law, and that the deal would benefit shareholders, employees and customers, as well as the charities it supports.

A spokesperson for Bremer Bank said in a statement that the trustees' allegations "are false and legally improper, and cannot change the pattern of self-interested transactions at issue in the lawsuit. "

"It is disappointing that the trustees now appear to be relying on the pandemic to support their baseless claims, and it is unfortunate that they continue to rely on intimidation to further their arguments. Bremer Bank was not for sale last October, and it is not for sale today.

"Bremer was founded in 1943 and the trust was established the next year for the express purpose of ensuring that as long as the bank existed, the communities it served would benefit from its profits. That is a partnership Bremer Financial Corp. has been proud to be a part of for more than 75 years, serving as the financial engine that powers the trust's charitable works. Since 1989, Bremer has distributed over $800 million to the Otto Bremer Trust, including over $80 million in 2019 alone.

"Bremer's financial results and market position remain strong. We remain focused on serving our customers and our communities through this extraordinary global crisis, including making nearly $1.5 billion in Paycheck Protection Program loans to organizations throughout our footprint, helping to protect the paychecks of more than 170,000 people," the bank said.

[divider]

Like this article? Gain access to all of our great content with a month-to-month subscription. Start your subscription here.

Copyright © 2020 BridgeTower Media. All Rights Reserved.

Load-Date: June 22, 2020

Tennessee man charged with pointing gun at public employee during St. Paul parking dispute

ARTICLE DCCIX. TENNESSEE MAN CHARGED WITH POINTING GUN AT PUBLIC EMPLOYEE DURING ST. PAUL PARKING DISPUTE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 444 words

Byline: Deanna Weniger

Highlight: A Tennessee man has been charged with assault after allegedly pointing a gun at a St. Paul city employee during a dispute over parking at a downtown hotel. The early June incident was noted this week by a Ramsey County commissioner, who praised police for their handling of the matter and used it as an [...]

Body

A Tennessee man has been charged with assault after allegedly pointing a gun at a St. Paul city employee during a dispute over parking at a downtown hotel.

The early June incident was noted this week by a Ramsey County commissioner, who praised police for their handling of the matter and used it as an example of ongoing racial tensions in the city.

"The individual who was threatened with a gun was an African-American male working for us on contract at the time," Commissioner Toni Carter said at Tuesday's board meeting. "It definitely had overtones of racial injustice."

According to the criminal complaint, James Bailey, 56, of Seymour, Tenn., has been charged with second-degree assault and making threats of violence.

About 1:30 p.m. June 4, officers were called to the Hampton Inn at 200 W. Seventh St.

A hotel employee had called the police after Demond Jackson parked his vehicle in the hotel's valet space and allegedly refused to move it. Jackson was working under contract for Ramsey County on providing temporary housing for the homeless at the Holiday Inn across the street from the Hampton Inn.

The employee told police that Jackson was hostile and aggressive, causing her to be afraid. She was working alone and had been fearful because of the recent civil unrest after George Floyd's death in Minneapolis police custody.

The employee contacted a woman who had been staying in the hotel for the last month, telling her she needed help. The woman brought her friend Bailey to the lobby.

Tennessee man charged with pointing gun at public employee during St. Paul parking dispute

Bailey allegedly pointed a handgun at Jackson, telling him to move his car. When he realized it was a parking dispute, he put the gun away, police said.

Jackson told police that the hotel employee had been rude to him when she asked him to move his car and that he was afraid for his life when Bailey approached.

Carter said the city contacted the hotel and both she and Mayor Melvin Carter spoke with the hotel's general manager and with a Hampton Inn executive, who promised an apology to Jackson and disciplinary action for the employee.

"We are looking forward to hearing more from the corporate office about additional steps that are being taken, including the dismissal of the employee who was involved," said Toni Carter, who is the mayor's mother.

Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis' Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting Police looking for dozens who looted Lululemon on St. Paul's Grand Ave. during Floyd unrest George Floyd's family sues Minneapolis officers charged in his death

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCCX. THEY'RE YOUNG AND READY TO STAND UP FOR JUSTICE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 784 wordsByline: ZOE JACKSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The killing of George Floyd by Minneapolis police has pulled thousands of people across the country out of quarantine and into the streets. Protests and rallies in Minneapolis have drawn those living just blocks from the intersection of 38th Street and Chicago Avenue, where Floyd was killed, as well as those who traveled hours to get here. As the city enters its fourth week of protests, young people in particular have turned out to voice their anger and mourn Floyd's death. Some were inspired to attend their first-ever protests in recent days. Many of these participants are currently out of work because of the coronavirus, or have yet to find their first post-graduation job. With so much time on their hands, some said there is nowhere else they'd rather be.

Desiree Falkowski, 22, and Shannyn Chesley, 22, of Minneapolis

As recent graduates from Winona State University, Desiree Falkowski and Shannyn Chesley finished their education just before Floyd's death. On Wednesday, they were taking in artwork at the memorial outside of Cup Foods, where the incident began.

"I moved back here, got done with my degree and not even a week later George Floyd was murdered," Falkowski said. "I didn't want to just sit in the suburbs with my education and feel that guilt of not taking action. I'm here, it's COVID, I don't have a job, so I might as well go out there and show up for my community."

It was Falkowski's second visit to the memorial.

"In the beginning I felt more anger, just a lot of emotions," she said. "Now when I come to this site it feels like more of a celebration."

Falkowski said she has recently made connections with other young adults who are passionate about justice issues.

At Winona State, causes like women's or LGBTQ rights were well represented, both Chesley and Falkowski noted, but there were few opportunities to uplift people of color.

THEY'RE YOUNG AND READY TO STAND UP FOR JUSTICE

"It was very quiet for the black community," Chesley said.

Chesley studied social and political sciences. She said being silent right now was not an option.

"With an education, it's your duty as a young individual to be out there, educating and helping where you can," Chesley said.

Sadie Tollefson, 24, and Cody Rogala, 25, of Edina

Cody Rogala has black friends. But seeing how Floyd died and how the country has rallied around him opened his eyes to the reality of being black in America.

"I think that everyone needs to speak out and everyone needs to stand up, because if we don't then it's just going to be silenced," Rogala said.

Neither Rogala nor Sadie Tollefson had ever participated in a protest before Floyd's death. But they both felt it was necessary to do their part to better the nation.

"I just think it's important to realize that we all have a part to take in this," Tollefson said. "It's time to open our eyes and realize what we need to do to help."

The recent University of North Dakota graduates would normally be working on a June day. But without jobs because of the coronavirus, taking action felt natural.

"I'm currently laid off, so it's kind of a good time to take the time that you would usually be working to try and help any way you can," Rogala said.

They are both hopeful that other young people continue to show up in the Twin Cities and across the country.

"I think a lot of young voices are more progressive and actually want to make a change in the world," Rogala said.

Patricia Rogers, 23, of Minneapolis

Patricia Rogers has protested before, notably after the fatal shooting of motorist Philando Castile by a St. Anthony police officer in 2016. But she's never protested like this.

The 23-year-old said she has been out every day since Floyd was killed, with no plans to slow down. "Out of all of them, this was the one that hit me the most," she said.

Other police killings, while no less horrifying, often involve a firearm. Watching the video of Floyd struggling to breathe with a Minneapolis officer's knee on his neck was particularly chilling.

"My ancestors weren't able to record, they weren't able to speak up for themselves," Rogers said. "They were lynched. They were killed for speaking up for themselves. I'm not going to stop coming out here until I see justice."

She has seen people of all ages participate, but she has been particularly encouraged by teenagers and people in their 20s who have made protesting a priority in recent weeks.

THEY'RE YOUNG AND READY TO STAND UP FOR JUSTICE

Rogers hopes that youth participation only increases, because black and brown people are tired, she said. Either way, she will keep showing up.

"I refuse to live in a world where I'm not equal," she said.

Zoë Jackson covers young and new voters at the Star Tribune through the Report For America program, supported by the Minneapolis Foundation. 612-673-7112 · @zoemjack

Load-Date: June 19, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCCXI. JIM NEWTON: RODNEY KING'S BEATING PROVIDES A ROAD MAP FOR INVESTIGATING POLICE MISCONDUCT

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 930 words

Byline: Jim Newton

Highlight: So, which is it? Are police officers who commit misconduct simply "bad apples" scattered among the 99% of good cops? Or is their behavior symptomatic of a deeply flawed system infected with racism and brutality? It is possible to find the answer, and the historical example of Rodney King's brutal beating by police provides a [...]

Body

So, which is it? Are police officers who commit misconduct simply "bad apples" scattered among the 99% of good cops? Or is their behavior symptomatic of a deeply flawed system infected with racism and brutality?

It is possible to find the answer, and the historical example of Rodney King's brutal beating by police provides a road map for making the determination. When a commission was established to investigate that incident, it took on a mission that went beyond simply determining what happened. It looked at the far broader culture of policing in Los Angeles, which is what needs to happen in all cases of serious misconduct.

For starters, it was important to understand the events that preceded King's beating. On the night in 1991 that he was beaten, one of the LAPD officers involved had responded earlier to a domestic violence call involving a black couple. He described it to a fellow officer, using the department's official, monitored message system, as "right out of 'Gorillas in the Mist.'"

And then there were the circumstances of the beating itself. More than a dozen officers from the Los Angeles Police Department, the California Highway Patrol and the Los Angeles School Police watched as other officers beat King into submission - a brutal attack that was overseen and directed by a police sergeant. Not one officer at the scene made any formal report of misconduct based on what they'd seen; indeed, they joked about it later.

The following year, a civilian commission under the leadership of Los Angeles lawyer - and later, Secretary of State - Warren Christopher uncovered electronic messages, again from the LAPD's official system, using coarsely racist language. One particularly pungent piece of code: Officers' shorthand for domestic incidents involving African Americans was "NHI," short for "no humans involved."

Jim Newton: Rodney King's beating provides a road map for investigating police misconduct

Rodney King was not beaten because an officer or two had a bad day. He was the victim of a deliberate use of force, directed by a veteran supervisor, observed by others and laughed about later. He was the victim of police misconduct, yes, but also of a debased and racist police culture.

These distinctions matter. When a Minneapolis police officer jams his knee into the neck of a black man suspected of passing a phony $20 bill, that suggests misconduct; when three of his fellow officers stand by for more than eight minutes while the suspect pleads for help, that points to a cultural problem. When Buffalo, N.Y., officers knock down a 75-year-old white man for merely being in their way, that could be evidence of a couple of bad apples; when the colleagues of those officers applaud them as they leave a court hearing, it suddenly looks like a cultural issue.

Let's take something simple. When officers cover their badge numbers or black out the names on their uniforms, as has happened in cities around the country during the recent protests, that's cultural, not individual. They should be fired, for starters, but the inquiry should not stop there. Whoever authorized or encouraged those actions also needs to come under scrutiny, along with whatever culture suggested that hiding police identities was appropriate. The leadership of their departments bears responsibility, not a few "bad apples."

Before the problem of rogue police can be solved, it has to be characterized correctly. If the LAPD's problem in 1991 was that Officer Laurence Powell, who delivered most of the blows to King, was an aberrant, out-of-control cop, then the solution would be to fire him or put him in jail, or both. Powell was, in fact, convicted of violating King's civil rights and served time in prison.

But that didn't begin to address the real issue, the one that was illustrated by the blase reactions of bystander officers or the policing mindset that led to such vile electronic messages. The methods for addressing those alarming revelations included forcing out Police Chief Daryl F. Gates, strengthening civilian oversight, improving training and tracking complaints against police using modern technology. Together, those reforms - many implemented pursuant to a federal consent decree - bought improvements because they recognized and addressed cultural corruption. Was it enough? Not nearly. Reform has to be an ongoing process.

In Minneapolis, firing and prosecuting Officer Derek Chauvin may protect those he might have later tried to arrest, but they won't address the question of why his fellow officers seemed untroubled by his actions or why so many complaints of police abuse in that department appear to have received little attention. In Buffalo, the bigger question is not why two officers knocked a 75-year-old man to the pavement, but why others thought that was something to cheer about.

Yes, some acts of police misconduct are nothing more than the work of a stray, misguided officer, a bad apple. But contrary to the 1970 Osmonds hit, one bad apple can spoil the whole bunch. And once a few officers in a department have started to rot, a whole new barrel is needed.

Journalist and author Jim Newton covered the LAPD for the Los Angeles Times from 1992 to 1997. His most recent book is "Man of Tomorrow: The Relentless Life of Jerry Brown." He wrote this column for the Los Angeles Times.

Josh Greenman: Gov. Cuomo's cringeworthy COVID victory lap Mariel Garza: Oh no. It's California Lockdown 2.0 Adam Schuster: Public pensions are at risk of insolvency, but COVID-19 is not to

Jim Newton: Rodney King's beating provides a road map for investigating police misconduct

blame John Kass: When Black children are killed, where's the outrage from the white and the woke? Andrea Gabor: U.S. schools must reopen - safely

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

End of Document

3M Open on, but fans out

ARTICLE DCCXII. 3M OPEN ON, BUT FANS OUT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 2CLength: 477 wordsByline: JERRY ZGODA; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Tournament personnel will be only observers at July 23-26 PGA Tour stop.Body

The PGA Tour will play next month in Minnesota, with major championship winners Brooks Koepka and Dustin Johnson expected, but without spectators admitted.

The 3M Open arrives at TPC Twin Cities in Blaine for a second year, and tournament organizers revised a 29-page proposal submitted to state officials nearly a month ago that would have allowed a limited number of fans - 6,000 maximum.

They will proceed instead with one that requires only about 1,200 workers - players, caddies, officials, staff, television crews, media, volunteers - needed to stage it as a made-for-TV event spread over 250 physical-distancing acres. It will be telecast July 23-26 by Golf Channel and CBS, part of a 2020 PGA Tour schedule completely remade because of the coronavirus pandemic.

"We're very disappointed we're not allowed to have fans," 3M Open executive director Hollis Cavner said. "On the other hand, we have to be safe and the governor's office felt it wouldn't be prudent with galleries."

Fans who bought tickets starting last winter can get a refund, donate the money to the tournament's designated charities or apply it to next year's fee.

Pro-am days that fund tournament operations and the charities it benefits will be Monday and Wednesday during tournament week. This year, those charities will include ones that are pandemic-related or help rebuild parts of Minneapolis and St. Paul after unrest following the killing of George Floyd by police that shook both cities.

Cavner and his Pro Links Sports company's staff chose their path forward after they conferred with Gov. Tim Walz's office and state health officials, as well as tour officials and 3M's board. They did so after they considered canceling, as the John Deere Classic in Illinois did. It had been scheduled two weeks before the 3M Open.

3M Open on, but fans out

"This very well could be the only live [pro sports] event in Minnesota this summer," 3M Open tournament director Mike Welch said.

The PGA Tour returned to action last week in Fort Worth, Texas, after it suspended its season March 13. It did so without spectators at historic Colonial Country Club; Daniel Berger won the Charles Schwab Challenge in a playoff. PGA Tour Commissioner Jay Monahan called it a "phenomenal start to our return."

The PGA Tour will pay for rapid viral testing for players, caddies and many others on site. Everyone entering the grounds must answer a health questionnaire and have their temperatures measured.

If current guidelines continue, food and beverage workers and possibly others will be required to wear face masks.

Tournament officials will monitor the latest coronavirus statistics and adjust safety policies if there's an increase in cases in Minnesota, Welch said.

Cavner said he doesn't foresee circumstances where the 3M Open still could be canceled. "There'd have to be something very drastic happen not to host the event now," he said.

Load-Date: June 19, 2020

ATF releases photos of 14 arson suspects during riots, looting

ARTICLE DCCXIII. ATF RELEASES PHOTOS OF 14 ARSON SUSPECTS DURING RIOTS, LOOTING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3B

Length: 389 words

Byline: PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: Rewards offered for info leading to a conviction.

Body

Federal authorities announced a $70,000 reward for help identifying suspects wanted in connection with fires set during unrest in Minneapolis and St. Paul following the death of George Floyd.

The U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) also released surveillance images Monday of 14 suspects and offered $5,000 for information that leads to identification, apprehension and conviction of each suspect (tinyurl.com/ATFsuspects).

"We have methodically worked each of the fire scenes, collecting evidence, interviewing witnesses and reviewing video footage to help us solve these arson cases," FBI special agent William Henderson of the St. Paul field division said in a statement accompanying the release of the photos.

"We've narrowed in on particular individuals who we suspect started one or more fires throughout the Twin Cities. We would appreciate any assistance the public is willing to provide in order to bring these investigations to a successful conclusion."

The photos showed eight locations that were damaged by arson. Seven were in Minneapolis: A Wells Fargo branch, Office Depot, the Third Precinct police headquarters, Minnesota Transitions Charter School, H & R Block, Chicago Lake Family Dental and Auto Zone. In St. Paul, an Enterprise car rental outlet was on the ATF's list.

The ATF said tips can be submitted by e-mail at ATFTips@atf.gov, at www.ReportIt.com, or by 1-888-ATF-TIPS (1-888-283-8477).

These cases are being investigated by the ATF with the help of law enforcement and fire department agencies in Minneapolis and St. Paul along with the state fire marshal, the FBI, the U.S. Postal Inspection Service, the U.S. Marshals Service and the U.S. Attorney's Office in Minnesota.

ATF releases photos of 14 arson suspects during riots, looting

Also Monday, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced that it has charged Montez T. Lee, 25, with arson in connection with a fire May 28 at the Max It Pawn Shop, 2726 E. Lake St. in Minneapolis.

Lee was arrested Monday in Rochester and will make his first appearance Tuesday in U.S. District Court.

Prosecutors said they obtained a video of a masked man, later identified as Lee, pouring liquid from a metal container throughout the pawnshop.

A second video showed the masked man standing in front of the burning shop threatening to burn it down.

Staff writer Randy Furst contributed to this report.

Paul Walsh · 612-673-4482

Load-Date: June 19, 2020

End of Document

DFL seeks $300M for shops hit in riots

ARTICLE DCCXIV. DFL SEEKS $300M FOR SHOPS HIT IN RIOTS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 851 wordsByline: JESSIE VAN BERKEL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Both House and Senate pitch quick cash infusion for damaged businesses.Body

Ibrahim Demmaj listened as Democratic legislators and city leaders stood by the rubble of his Minneapolis furniture store on Monday to debut a roughly $300 million plan to help rebuild communities damaged by arson, vandalism and looting.

"We need your help; we need your support. We don't want to be relocated," Demmaj said of his business near the corner of Chicago Avenue and Lake Street, an area hit hard by the unrest that followed George Floyd's death in Minneapolis police custody.

Minnesota House Speaker Melissa Hortman noted that the steel beams in his building "melted like noodles."

Demmaj's was one of more than 1,500 buildings damaged or destroyed in Minnesota during the protests and riots that shook the nation in the week after Floyd's death. The charred remains of his business served as the backdrop Monday for Democratic lawmakers and St. Paul and Minneapolis officials as they gathered to announce the "Promise Act," legislation they hope will pass during this week's special session at the State Capitol.

But prospects for a quick infusion of state aid remain uncertain during a legislative session that could adjourn as early as Friday.

Republican House Minority Leader Kurt Daudt, R-Crown, said last week that leaders must learn more about communities' needs and financial options for how the state can help, adding, "This might take some creative tools." A House Republican spokesman said Monday that he had no comment on the DFL plan.

The Promise Act would include $125 million in cash from the state's general fund for immediate grants and loans to business owners, said House Majority Leader Ryan Winkler, DFL-Golden Valley. If the Legislature approves it in the next couple of weeks, he said, affected businesses could start seeing the money in two to three weeks.

DFL seeks $300M for shops hit in riots

The plan, originating in the DFL-controlled House, also would set up a $125 million special compensation fund that could take three to six months to start operating, Winkler said. It would be patterned after funds created following the I-35W bridge collapse and Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. The money would also come from the state's general fund.

A slightly different rebuilding plan has emerged in the GOP-led Senate.

Sen. Eric Pratt, R-Prior Lake, has introduced a bipartisan bill that would use $200 million in federal CARES Act money to reimburse the state for COVID-19 recovery expenses. Pratt's bill would then allow that general fund money to be used to help the riot-damaged areas.

Winkler also mentioned using CARES Act dollars to free up general fund money for aid. He said the federal assistance, along with reserves and other resources, would cover the DFL's $300 million rebuilding effort even as the state faces a projected $2.4 billion budget deficit.

Pratt suggested Minnesota follow the model of how the state spends money to respond to natural disasters, which allows the money to be sent immediately. "We should try to get something moving right away. ... We can't have a healthy Minnesota economy without a healthy Minneapolis and St. Paul," he said.

Business owners and city leaders are still trying to assess the extent of the damage, determine how much insurance policies will cover, and gauge the size of philanthropic donations, Pratt said.

"In the meantime, we just need to figure out a way to get some funding to these folks right away, not funding to set up a whole bureaucracy to see how it will work later," Pratt said, taking aim at a piece of the DFL proposal that would create a special panel to review cases of damage and direct the compensation.

A third, longer-term piece of the Democratic plan would seek to help build local businesses and microbusinesses in damaged areas while preventing gentrification and properties being sold off, Winkler said. It would use a new eighth-of-a-cent metro sales tax to support the work of a Metropolitan Area Redevelopment Corp. to come up with a long-term redevelopment plan. The DFL package also included property and sales tax breaks for some sites.

The hardest hit areas of the Twin Cities - the Lake Street corridor in south Minneapolis, W. Broadway in north Minneapolis and University Avenue in St. Paul - house many immigrant- and black-owned businesses that have historically struggled for access financial capital.

Demmaj said his business on Lake Street was underinsured and many others in the community are in the same position. He said business owners were already struggling from income lost during the pandemic; riot damage was additional devastation.

Before the special session began, legislators on both sides of the aisle and Gov. Tim Walz toured communities to survey the damage. One of Walz's stops during his community tours was Elsa's House of Sleep in St. Paul, where windows were damaged. Nneka Constantino, whose husband owns the store, said people showed up to clean the neighborhood after the unrest.

"The community is really stepping up," Constantino said. "And I expect legislators to - in a nonpartisan way - to follow suit aggressively."

Staff writer Briana Bierschbach contributed to this report.

DFL seeks $300M for shops hit in riots

Jessie Van Berkel · 651-925-5044

Load-Date: June 19, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCCXV. MN GOV. TIM WALZ PRESSES LAWMAKERS TO PASS BONDING BILL

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 496 words

Byline: Bill Salisbury

Highlight: With just three days remaining in Minnesota's special legislative session, Gov. Tim Walz on Tuesday turned up the heat on lawmakers to pass a massive public infrastructure construction bill. That measure, known as the bonding bill, was the Legislature's main task heading into the regular session in February, but lawmakers could not reach a deal [...]

Body

With just three days remaining in Minnesota's special legislative session, Gov. Tim Walz on Tuesday turned up the heat on lawmakers to pass a massive public infrastructure construction bill.

That measure, known as the bonding bill, was the Legislature's main task heading into the regular session in February, but lawmakers could not reach a deal before the constitutional deadline for adjourning in May.

Passing that bill, plus providing aid to cities and counties for costs related to the COVID-19 crisis and responding to the rioting that followed George Floyd's death while in Minneapolis police custody, were the main reasons Walz ordered lawmakers back to the Capitol last Friday.

The Democratic-Farmer-Labor governor proposed a record $2.6 billion construction program in January. The House DFL majority supports his spending level, but leaders in the Republican-controlled Senate set a $1.3 billion limit on bonding.

During a news conference, Walz said he's confident they can resolve their differences yet this week. "We will try to find common ground and compromise," he said.

And if they don't and Senate Republicans carry out their threat to adjourn and go home on Friday? "I could bring them back on Saturday," he said.

Walz suggested he would call as many special sessions as it takes to pass a bonding bill. He said that funding package is necessary to maintain and improve the land and buildings the state and local governments own, create construction jobs and revive Minnesota's economy in the wake of the coronavirus pandemic.

RELATED: Odds are good for these projects if a bonding bill happens

MN Gov. Tim Walz presses lawmakers to pass bonding bill

He said he has been talking privately to legislators about cutting a deal, and he will continue to press them on that issue, as well as the COVID-19 relief bill and a package dealing with changes to the criminal justice system.

"Let's show (Minnesotans) that divided government can work," Walz said. "We can solve problems together."

Gov. Walz predicts bonding deal and says face mask mandate still possible Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis' \$1.35 billion bonding bill, tax cuts advance at Minnesota Capitol What would \$1.8B bonding bill cover? \$52M for Third St/Kellogg Bridge, \$55 for bus rapid transit lines, more Legislative leaders agree to \$1.8 billion infrastructure deal, but minority parties could block it House Republicans blocked that chamber from passing a bonding bill in May, largely because they objected to Walz's use of emergency powers to require Minnesotans to stay home and force businesses, schools and churches to close during the pandemic.

House Minority Leader Kurt Daudt, R-Crown, continues to object to Walz's unilateral policymaking authority.

"Our priority is reducing our budget deficit and ending the governor's emergency powers," Daudt said in a prepared statement. "If the governor and the other legislative leaders are willing to have a discussion on those items, we remain open to a bonding bill."

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

Poll: Americans are the unhappiest they've been in 50 years

ARTICLE DCCXVI. POLL: AMERICANS ARE THE UNHAPPIEST THEY'VE BEEN IN 50 YEARS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1044 words

Byline: Tamara Lush

Highlight: ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. (AP) - It's been a rough year for the American psyche. Folks in the U.S. are more unhappy today than they've been in nearly 50 years.

Body

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. - It's been a rough year for the American psyche. Folks in the U.S. are more unhappy today than they've been in nearly 50 years.

This bold - yet unsurprising - conclusion comes from the COVID Response Tracking Study, conducted by NORC at the University of Chicago. It finds that just 14% of American adults say they're very happy, down from 31% who said the same in 2018. That year, 23% said they'd often or sometimes felt isolated in recent weeks. Now, 50% say that.

The survey, conducted in late May, draws on nearly a half-century of research from the General Social Survey, which has collected data on American attitudes and behaviors at least every other year since 1972. No less than 29% of Americans have ever called themselves very happy in that survey.

Most of the new survey's interviews were completed before the death of George Floyd touched off nationwide protests and a global conversation about race and police brutality, adding to the feelings of stress and loneliness Americans were already facing from the coronavirus outbreak - especially for black Americans.

Lexi Walker, a 47-year-old professional fiduciary who lives near Greenville, South Carolina, has felt anxious and depressed for long stretches of this year. She moved back to South Carolina late in 2019, then her cat died. Her father passed away in February. Just when she thought she'd get out and socialize in an attempt to heal from her grief, the pandemic hit.

"It's been one thing after another," Walker said. "This is very hard. The worst thing about this for me, after so much, I don't know what's going to happen."

Among other finding from the new poll about life in the pandemic:

- The public is less optimistic today about the standard of living improving for the next generation than it has been in the past 25 years. Only 42% of Americans believe that when their children reach their age, their standard of living will be better. A solid 57% said that in 2018. Since the question was asked in 1994, the previous low was 45% in 1994.

Poll: Americans are the unhappiest they've been in 50 years

- Compared with surveys conducted after President John F. Kennedy's assassination in 1963 and after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, Americans are less likely to report some types of emotional and psychological stress reactions following the COVID-19 outbreak. Fewer report smoking more than usual, crying or feeling dazed now than after those two previous tragedies, though more report having lost their temper or wanting to get drunk.

- About twice as many Americans report being lonely today as in 2018, and not surprisingly given the lockdowns that tried to contain the spread of the coronavirus, there's also been a drop in satisfaction with social activities and relationships. Compared with 2018, Americans also are about twice as likely to say they sometimes or often have felt a lack of companionship (45% vs. 27%) and felt left out (37% vs. 18%) in the past four weeks.

What is surprising, said Louise Hawkey, a senior research scientist with NORC at the University of Chicago, was that loneliness was not even more prevalent.

"It isn't as high as it could be," she said. "People have figured out a way to connect with others. It's not satisfactory, but people are managing to some extent."

The new poll found that there haven't been significant changes in Americans' assessment of their families' finances since 2018 and that Americans' satisfaction with their families' ability to get along financially was as high as it's been over nearly five decades.

Jonathan Berney, of Austin, Texas, said that the pandemic - and his resulting layoff as a digital marketing manager for a law firm - caused him to reevaluate everything in his life. While he admits that he's not exactly happy now, that's led to another uncomfortable question: Was he truly happy before the pandemic?

"2020 just fast forwarded a spiritual decay. When things are good, you don't tend to look inwards," he said, adding that he was living and working in the Miami area before the pandemic hit. As Florida dealt with the virus, his girlfriend left him and he decided to leave for Austin. "I probably just wasn't a nice guy to be around from all the stress and anxiety. But this forced an existential crisis."

Berney, who is looking for work, said things have improved from those early, dark days of the pandemic. He's still job hunting but has a little savings to live on. He said he's trying to kayak more and center himself so he's better prepared to deal with any future downturn in events.

Reimagining happiness is almost hard-wired into Americans' DNA, said Sonja Lyubomirsky, a psychology professor at the University of California, Riverside.

"Human beings are remarkably resilient. There's lots and lots of evidence that we adapt to everything. We move forward," she said, adding that she's done happiness studies since the pandemic started and found that some people are slightly happier than last year.

Melinda Hartline, of Tampa, who was laid off from her job in public relations in March, said she was in a depressed daze those first few weeks of unemployment. Then she started to bike and play tennis and enrolled in a college course on post-crisis leadership.

Poll: Americans are the unhappiest they've been in 50 years

Today, she's worried about the state of the world and the economy, and she wonders when she can see her kids and grandkids who live on the West Coast - but she also realizes that things could be a lot worse.

"Anything can happen. And you have to be prepared," she said. "Whether it's your health, your finances, whether it's the world. You have to be prepared. And always maintain that positive mental attitude. It's going to get you through it."

The survey of 2,279 adults was conducted May 21-29 with funding from the National Science Foundation. It uses a sample drawn from NORC's probability-based AmeriSpeak Panel, which is designed to be representative of the U.S. population. The margin of sampling error for all respondents is plus or minus 2.9 percentage points. Experts say Twitter breach troubling, undermines trust Homeowners rush to refinance as 30-year rate falls below 3% Colorado governor issues statewide mask order as coronavirus cases rise US executes 2nd man in a week; lawyers said he had dementia Nick Cannon apologizes for 'hurtful' anti-Semitic comments

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCCXVII. WISCONSIN BORDER COMPARISON COMPLICATES COVID-19 RESPONSE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 16, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1355 wordsByline: JEREMY OLSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Minnesota is showing signs of progress in the COVID-19 pandemic, reporting its lowest daily counts of deaths and hospitalizations since April on Monday, at a time when more than 20 other states are reporting rising case counts.

"We want to celebrate every day that those numbers are low," said Kris Ehresmann, state infectious disease director.

But Minnesota has a Wisconsin problem.

While both neighbor states show declining growth in COVID-19 cases and deaths, Minnesota has reported 1,304 deaths so far in the pandemic compared with Wisconsin's 694. And Wisconsin achieved its progress despite being more populous and having its stay-at-home order lifted prematurely on May 13 via a Wisconsin Supreme Court ruling.

The variation has grown from a statistical curiosity to a source of political tension that could upend Gov. Tim Walz's pandemic response, which included a 51-day stay-at-home order followed by a gradual reopening of businesses and activities. Late last week, Republican lawmakers used the variation to oppose an extension of peacetime emergency powers giving the governor sweeping authority over the state's response.

"It is difficult to make that case when Wisconsin has been doing fine without emergency powers for 4 weeks," said Rep. Pat Garofalo, R-Farmington, in a tweet.

Minnesota health officials have reached out to their cross-border counterparts to learn what has worked, but state Health Commissioner Jan Malcolm said on Monday that it is too simplistic to use the Minnesota-Wisconsin comparison as a referendum on whether stay-at-home orders are worth the economic pains they cause.

Wisconsin border comparison complicates COVID-19 response

"Even as the state restrictions [in Wisconsin] were relaxed, the more significant population centers, the cities, kept restrictions in place," she said. "So it wasn't like a complete, all-at-one-time reopening for the most part."

Minnesota was the 22nd of 39 states and the District of Columbia to declare a stay-at-home order, according to data from the Institute for Health Metrics and Evaluation in Washington. Among 29 states that ended those orders, Minnesota's ranked 12th in length at 51 days.

Walz was cautious in scaling Minnesota back following the order, though. Limited retail shopping wasn't permitted until June 1, and limited indoor restaurant and bar service wasn't allowed until June 10.

Wisconsin reopened fully when the court lifted its order after 49 days, but cities such as Milwaukee imposed local restrictions. Arizona reopened fully as well on May 16 after 47 days - specifically barring local restrictions - and it has seen a near tripling of daily case counts that prompted some health officials to call for renewed restrictions to slow the spread of the virus.

"That doesn't mean you need to close down the state ... but if you wait too long that could become the only choice," Andy Slavitt, a former Medicare administrator and health care adviser who lives in Edina, said in a news conference for Arizona media on Monday.

The takeaway from the varied experiences is that it is foolhardy for now to compare Minnesota with any state, especially when the pandemic is "in the second inning of a nine-inning game," said Michael Osterholm, director of the University of Minnesota's Center for Infectious Disease Research and Policy.

Osterholm agreed that Arizona and other states need to take action on their rising COVID-19 cases, but that doesn't mean that every other state should do the same.

"I see far too many people out there making conclusions based on one state or comparing one state to another," he said. "I think we're way short of being able to do that with any scientific accuracy."

Osterholm predicted the virus would spread at different rates in different states but would ultimately infect at least 60% of the U.S. population unless a vaccine is developed.

The muddled national picture is reflected on the COVID Exit Strategy website, which lists 27 states as trending poorly, 18 states including Minnesota as making progress and six states including Wisconsin as getting better.

The key difference between Minnesota and Wisconsin, per this website's analysis, is that Wisconsin has more capacity in its available intensive care beds right now.

Minnesota as of Monday had 1,053 of its 1,253 available intensive care beds filled by patients with COVID-19 or other unrelated medical needs.

The state has another 944 ICU beds that could be readied if needed within 72 hours, though, and on Monday received final clearance to use a former long-term care facility in Roseville as an overflow facility for non-COVID-19 patients if needed.

The state on Monday reported a daily low since April 12 of six deaths and 353 COVID-19 patients who were hospitalized - below the peak of 606 hospitalized patients on May 28.

Wisconsin border comparison complicates COVID-19 response

Minnesota has now reported 30,693 lab-confirmed cases of COVID-19, compared with Wisconsin's 22,932.

Malcolm said outbreaks in several food-processing plants - including the JBS pork plant in Worthington that contributed to 1,620 cases in Nobles County alone - could explain some of Minnesota's increased case count.

Almost all of the deaths in Minnesota involved the elderly or people with underlying health conditions such as asthma, diabetes or diseases of the lungs, heart, kidneys or immune system. And 1,034 of the deaths involved residents of long-term care or assisted-living facilities.

Malcolm said it is a relief that Minnesota's case growth is declining, but that it is unclear if the state could follow others such as Arizona that showed eventual increases.

The impact of recent events in Minnesota on disease transmission are unclear. Health officials expect to know by week's end whether the protests over the May 25 death of George Floyd in police custody resulted in an increase in cases.

Diagnostic testing is recommended for anyone involved in the mass events, regardless of whether they have any symptoms. Results of free testing for such people at four sites in Minneapolis and St. Paul last week found the virus in 1.8% of 3,200 people. HealthPartners reported a positivity rate of 0.99% in the recent testing of 8,500 asymptomatic people.

The state's current rate of positive COVID-19 tests is 3.5%. That higher percentage in part reflects the symptomatic patients who seek testing from their doctors and are more likely to be infected.

Health officials stressed that it is too soon to assess any increase in cases in Minnesota related to the relaxation of restrictions on June 1 and the latest steps on June 10 that allowed for the reopening of movie theaters and bowling alleys and for group meetings of 10 people indoors and 25 people outdoors.

Ehresmann said it probably takes 21 days to see an effect based on the incubation period of two to 14 days for the novel coronavirus that causes COVID-19, and the usual delay before people who get sick seek medical attention.

Slavitt highlighted recent research showing higher average COVID-19 case growth in states that reopened faster. However, he said state comparisons aren't very meaningful right now and that Minnesota can benefit more by improving its strategies to prevent outbreaks in food processing plants and nursing homes, and its ability to respond to virus hot spots.

"We should understand that the virus, biologically, goes to the places where it hasn't been," Slavitt said. "So anyone that looks at New York or Arizona and says, 'Ah, we're smarter, we're better,' they're missing that fundamental understanding."

Jeremy Olson · 612-673-7744

TRACKING THE TOLL

Minnesota

30,693 Cases

Wisconsin border comparison complicates COVID-19 response

1,304 Deaths

3,630 People hospitalized

Wisconsin

22,932 Cases

694 Deaths

3,061 People hospitalized

TRACKING CORONAVIRUS

Minnesota cases, daily change*

30,693 -- Total cases

230 -- June 15 new cases

*Chart data is a net count of new confirmed cases minus previously announced cases that were removed by MDH on that date.

Minnesota deaths, new daily

1,304 -- Total deaths

6 -- June 15

U.S. cases, new daily

2,103,990 -- Total cases

19,067 -- June 14

U.S. deaths, new daily

115,762 -- Total deaths

317 -- June 14

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete chart.)

Sources: New York Times, Minnesota Dept. of Health

Note: U.S. data lags a day behind Minnesota

Load-Date: June 19, 2020

ARTICLE DCCXVIII.

MINNESOTA PEACE OFFICER BOARD TO REVIEW GEORGE FLOYD'S DEATH

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 285 wordsByline: The Associated Press

Highlight: A Minnesota board that licenses and set training standards for all peace officers in the state plans to review the death of George Floyd. The Minnesota Board of Peace Officer Standards and Training (POST) is required to review all misconduct complaints against licensed police officers. If the complaint is ruled justified, the board can revoke [...]

Body

A Minnesota board that licenses and set training standards for all peace officers in the state plans to review the death of George Floyd.

The Minnesota Board of Peace Officer Standards and Training (POST) is required to review all misconduct complaints against licensed police officers. If the complaint is ruled justified, the board can revoke any officer's license, the Star Tribune reported.

All four Minneapolis police officers who have been charged in the May 25 death of Floyd were fired from the department, but they are still licensed Minnesota peace officers.

The POST Board has asked the court for copies of the criminal complaints against former officer Derek Chauvin, who is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter, as well as former officers Tou Thao, Thomas Lane and J. Kueng, who are all charged with aiding and abetting. A witness video captured Chauvin, who is white, pressing his knee against Floyd's neck before the handcuffed black man died in Minneapolis.

In a statement, the board said Chauvin's actions do not reflect any training that officers receive.

"The video is troubling and disturbing and it is the Board's position that sanctity of life must be the guiding principle for all law enforcement officers," the statement said.

Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis' Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting Police looking for dozens who looted Lululemon on St. Paul's Grand Ave. during Floyd unrest George Floyd's family sues Minneapolis officers charged in his death

Graphic

Former Minneapolis police officers, from left, Derek Chauvin, Tou Thao, Thomas Lane and J. Alexander Kueng

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCCXIX. FBI DIRECTOR VISITS MINNEAPOLIS OFFICE TO GET UPDATE ON GEORGE FLOYD INVESTIGATION

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 247 wordsByline: The Associated PressHighlight: FBI Director Christopher Wray visited the bureau's Minneapolis field office on Tuesday to check in on employees and get briefed on the federal civil rights investigation into the officers involved in the death of George Floyd. Minneapolis FBI spokesman Kevin Smith said Wray came to the local office in Brooklyn Center on Tuesday morning for [...]Body

FBI Director Christopher Wray visited the bureau's Minneapolis field office on Tuesday to check in on employees and get briefed on the federal civil rights investigation into the officers involved in the death of George Floyd.

Minneapolis FBI spokesman Kevin Smith said Wray came to the local office in Brooklyn Center on Tuesday morning for a quick "welfare check" on employees who have been working on the civil rights investigation, as well as investigations into violent protests and civil unrest. Smith said Wray offered his support and acknowledged the office's hard work.

Smith said Wray also got a thorough briefing on the civil rights investigation, and underscored that investigators need to move swiftly but correctly as they determine whether to charge former Minneapolis police officers Derek Chauvin, J. Kueng, Thomas Lane and Tou Thao with violating Floyd's civil rights.

Floyd, a black man who was handcuffed, died May 25 after Chauvin, who is white, pressed his knee into Floyd's neck, even after Floyd said he couldn't breathe and stopped moving.

Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis' Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting Police looking for dozens who looted Lululemon on St. Paul's Grand Ave. during Floyd unrest George Floyd's family sues Minneapolis officers charged in his death

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

Goodman, Montgomery, Finney, Arneson, Brunzell, Miller: Women police leaders speak out about police reform and gender

ARTICLE DCCXX. GOODMAN, MONTGOMERY, FINNEY, ARNESON, BRUNZELL, MILLER: WOMEN POLICE LEADERS SPEAK OUT ABOUT POLICE REFORM AND GENDER

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1077 words

Byline: Laura Goodman, Linda Finney, Juliann Brunzell, Kris Arneson, Deborah Montgomery and Linda S. Miller

Highlight: Our state and nation are grieving. The horrific murder of George Floyd is an image that will be indelibly etched into our minds as our nation calls out for justice. We know this murder was not an isolated incident. Black and brown people are too often killed with impunity by police. Now may be a [...]

Body

Our state and nation are grieving. The horrific murder of George Floyd is an image that will be indelibly etched into our minds as our nation calls out for justice. We know this murder was not an isolated incident. Black and brown people are too often killed with impunity by police. Now may be a tipping point and we should not squander this opportunity to make fundamental changes in policing.

The psychology behind "group think," especially among male officers, results in an "us vs. them" mentality in police agencies even when there is benevolent leadership at the top. In Minneapolis, this is underscored by a union president (like other police union leaders who are usually men) who has been modeling this mindset for years. No matter how egregious the behavior, even in a video-documented officer-involved killing, he has not condemned the officers involved in the death of George Floyd and is seeking to have the fired officers reinstated.

Politicians, community leaders, police organizations, task forces are all advocating for change; from addressing systemic racism to making substantive reforms in policing.

From all of these meaningful ideas, we have yet to hear the voices of women in law enforcement or an analysis of how gender plays a role in the use of force by law enforcement.

When leaders do take initiatives, as President Obama did with his Task Force on 21st Century Policing or Minnesota did with its Working Group on Police-Involved Deadly Force Encounters, women in policing are seldom invited. How can anyone honestly be interested in changing the police culture and not have the voices of women police at the table?

We know much about the differences between how men and women police. Research informs us that women usually do not use excessive force and tend to be more oriented toward community policing. We are not talking about a few token women, but when gender parity is realized, policing fundamentally changes.

This is not to say that women in law enforcement never act inappropriately or that they are better police officers than men, but the fact is that women in law enforcement respond differently. Women are comfortable with "policing by consent," the original model of community policing developed by Sir Robert Peel in 1829. Peel believed that the quality of people chosen to be police officers would contribute to the organization's legitimacy. The characteristics he deemed critical were that officers be even-tempered, reserved and principled in enforcing the law.

Current U.S. policing structures, including hiring practices, have historically been created by men to fulfill their idea of policing, which leans toward aggressiveness with an emphasis on physical strength and gaining compliance by force. Conversely, policing by consent includes problem solving, defusing disturbances, and working in diverse neighborhoods - being real community partners in preventing and solving crime. This is the kind of policing where women excel.

Despite compelling evidence that women police are less likely to use excessive or deadly force, on average the number of women in police departments in the United States is staggeringly low. Why? We know that there continues to be widespread discrimination in the hiring and selection practices of police departments. For example, in many departments, position descriptions still focus on the most extreme physical aspects of the job, generally followed by pre-hire physical agility testing that promotes brawn while minimizing the importance of community policing.

We are not recommending "lowering" the standards for becoming a police officer. We are asking for the standards to be realistic. In the 1970s, when we were young women testing for police jobs, one of the physical requirements was jumping over a 6-foot wooden fence - a prerequisite that we never actually did in our work. The 6-foot fence was a ruse - a subterfuge that kept many women and smaller-framed men out of policing.

Unfortunately, some of these antiquated fitness skills are still required. Many women get washed out during this process, or do not even apply. Consequently, departments squander opportunities to hire some really talented people who would be excellent officers. Police leaders everywhere need to rethink what skills are required to do the job, then have the courage to make changes.

We know there are myriad complex issues in addition to hiring more women that must occur to transform the police culture. The evils of systemic racism and racial disparities must change in a significant way. We also see promise in re-thinking policing to enhance public safety - ending the militarization of departments, dramatically increasing the recruitment and retention of women (especially women of color) and making real commitments to community policing. Policing is a noble profession and we are deeply troubled by those who resist change.

We call on all levels of government to put forward bold initiatives beginning with the ideas and voices of the communities most impacted by poverty, racism, and distrust of law enforcement. As we move forward, women in law enforcement must have a seat at the table. We have much to offer and would like to help.

Goodman, Montgomery, Finney, Arneson, Brunzell, Miller: Women police leaders speak out about police reform and gender

Laura Goodman was deputy chief of police, Brooklyn Center, and is a former Minnesota state ombudsman for crime victims.

Juliann Brunzell was a special agent at the Minnesota Bureau of Criminal Apprehension and chairs the board of trustees of the International Association of Women Police.

Kris Arneson is a former assistant chief of police at the Minneapolis Police Department.

Linda Finney is former superintendent of the Minnesota Bureau of Criminal Apprehension.

Deborah Montgomery was assistant commissioner of the Minnesota Department of Public Safety. She also is a former senior commander in the St. Paul Police Department and a former St. Paul city council member.

Linda S. Miller was a sergeant in the Bloomington Police Department and is founding director of the Upper Midwest Community Policing Institute. She is the author of "Community Policing: Partnerships for Problem Solving."

Letters: Regarding 'The other First Minnesota,' amplifications and corrections Soucheray: This progressive transfer of wealth from renters to developers and big corporations Caryn Sullivan: A thinning blue line John Shipley: So far, nothing enjoyable about rebooting pro sports Benner, Magnuson: SPPS should learn to say 'no' with love - and high expectations

Load-Date: July 18, 2020

ARTICLE DCCXXI. AUNT JEMIMA BRAND RETIRED BY OQUAKER DUE TO RACIAL STEREOTYPE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 925 wordsByline: Alexandra OlsonHighlight: NEW YORK (AP) - America's painful struggles over racism have finally caught up with Aunt Jemima, that ubiquitous fixture served up at breakfast tables for 131 years.Body

NEW YORK - America's painful struggles over racism have finally caught up with Aunt Jemima, that ubiquitous fixture served up at breakfast tables for 131 years.

Quaker Oats announced Wednesday that it will retire the Aunt Jemima brand, saying the company recognizes the character's origins are "based on a racial stereotype." Indeed, the logo was inspired by 19th century minstrel celebrating the "mammy," a black woman content to serve her white masters. A former slave, Nancy Green, became the first face of the pancake product in 1890.

Aunt Jemima's downfall is the latest signal of the powerful cultural moment unleashed by the Black Lives Matter protests, which have spread around the world and prompted companies to rethink their policies, from hiring practices to giving employees off for Juneteenth, the anniversary of the end of the slavery in the U.S.

Other companies said they are reconsidering racial imagery in their branding.

The owner of the Uncle Ben's rice says the brand will "evolve" in response to concerns about racial stereotyping. Caroline Sherman, a spokeswoman for parent company Mars, said the company is listening to the voices of consumers, especially in the black community.

Geechie Boy Mill, a family-owned operation in South Carolina that makes locally-grown and milled white grits, said it is "listening and revising our overall branding," though no decisions have been made. Geechie is a dialect spoken mainly by the descendants of African-American slaves who settled on the Ogeechee river in Georgia, according to Merriam-Webster.com. In a statement to The Associated Press, the company said a name change has been under consideration for the past year and discussions have ramped back up given the current climate.

Earlier this year, Land O'Lakes announced that it would no longer use the Native American woman on its packages of butter, cheese and other products since the late 1920s.

Aunt Jemima brand retired by Quaker due to racial stereotype

But reconsideration of the images also raises questions about why they have endured for so long in the first place, beyond the Civil Rights movement and ensuing decades of protests against discrimination and violence against African-Americans. Brands with ethnic and racial stereotypes still abound, from Nestle's Eskimo Pie and Miss Chiquita of banana fame, to the ongoing debate over the Washington Redskins football team.

Riché Richardson, an associate professor of African American literature at Cornell University, called for Aunt Jemima's retirement five years ago in a New York Times opinion piece - part of a wider discussion about Confederate statues and other imagery after the massacre of nine black parishioners at a church in Charleston, South Carolina.

Richardson said Aunt Jemima epitomizes the dark comfort that some Americans take from imagery of black servitude, so normalized that it's on their box of pancake mix. She said it was problematic that Aunt Jemima is such a ubiquitous symbol of black femininity when there are so many real women who are icons of African American history.

"The question becomes, 'do we want to hold onto images that hearken back to a past when blacks were servants and expected to know their place?'" Richardson said. "People who are holding onto these symbols are almost suggesting that those are times they are nostalgic about. I don't think people intend to send that message but at this time, we cannot afford to send mix messages."

Quaker, which is owned by PepsiCo, said its overhauled pancake mix and syrup will hit shelves by the fourth quarter of 2020. The company will announce the new name at a later date. PepsiCo also announced a five-year, $400 million initiative "to lift up black communities and increase black representation at PepsiCo."

"We recognize Aunt Jemima's origins are based on a racial stereotype," said Kristin Kroepfl of Quaker Foods North America. "While work has been done over the years to update the brand in a manner intended to be appropriate and respectful, we realize those changes are not enough."

Quaker tried over the years to purge Aunt Jemima of her "mammy" roots, exchanging her kerchief for pearls by 1989. Still, the image was of eager domesticity and her name could not be dissociated from its racist origins.

Aunt Jemima's years of success as a marketing image made it risky for the company to part with it completely, said Brenda Lee, founding director of the marketing research firm Vision Strategy and Insights.

"It's a huge deal. They've invested quite a bit in establishing that brand with all that goes along with the logo," Lee said. "The calling to make this change has been around for years and the most they had been willing to do was update her looks, but they were not willing to relinquish the name."

Lee said the risk calculation for companies is quickly changing, in part because of the Black Lives Matter movement's effort to draw attention to where black dollars are spent.

Earlier this week, the singer Kirby posted a TikTok video called "How to Make a Non Racist Breakfast" explaining some of the backstory of the Aunt Jemima brand. That video went viral.

Aunt Jemima brand retired by Quaker due to racial stereotype

Associated Press Writer Anne D'Innocenzio contributed to this story. House committee advances bill to assist Twin Cities businesses damaged in George Floyd unrest MN small business relief grant winners selected from pool of 27,400 applicants Stress rises for unemployed as extra \$600 benefit nears end Twin Cities home values climb as inventory plummets, no shortage in demand due to COVID-19 3M files lawsuits to halt fraudulent sales, price gouging of N95 masks

Load-Date: July 18, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCCXXII. READERS WRITE KROLL SHOULD WANT WHAT WE WANT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 6ALength: 1155 wordsBody

POLICE

My interpretation of Lt. Bob Kroll's job as president of the Minneapolis police union is to protect and serve the ones who are sworn to protect and serve us. Just as it is misplaced for the public to paint all police with the same brush as brutes with badges, wouldn't it be mistaken for him to tarnish the badges of good cops by affording bad cops the same protections?

Wouldn't the idea of weeding out incompetent officers actually strengthen his union and therefore strengthen the police force?

Throughout our lives we all know who the bad apples are: In school we knew who the troublemakers, bullies and disrupters were by their propensity for bad behavior; in the military we knew who in our platoon was the malcontent bringing trouble down on us from our superiors; in the workplace we could all spot the slacker, liar, cheat. It would be disingenuous to believe that everyone from the rank-and-file patrol officer through top command doesn't have someone on their radar as a bad cop.

Want to build a better police force? Want to serve your worthy union members better? Don't let the ineffective, ill-trained and incapable infect our police. Serve your constituents better by proactively replacing bad cops. Reinforce proper training, and institute stringent requirements. Maybe, just maybe, the public would be happy to pay for more police if we knew they all served us with a higher standard.

Terry Friedlander, Minneapolis

...

This man had a burned out taillight. This man failed to dim his headlights. This man fell asleep in his car. This man may have stolen a couple of cigars. This man allegedly tried to pass a fake $20 bill. This man was trying to sell cigarettes on the sidewalk. And a few minutes later all of these people were either choked or shot dead.

Have we lost our minds? When doing police training, does anyone ever talk about the difference between the letter of the law and the spirit of the law? Is the fine art of de-escalation being taught anywhere these days? Committing a felony demands one kind of response. Committing a minor infraction of the law, if that, demands a very different kind of response.

I realize that policing today is a very difficult job, but none of these men should have been killed. What if the police told that man to go get his taillight fixed this week? End of story. Or, "Next time, dim your headlights"? End of story.

The prophet Micah asks us to do justice but also to show mercy to others and to walk humbly with our God. Ancient words that are still so relevant, and needed, for today.

Paul L. Harrington, Rosemount

The writer is a pastor.

'GONE WITH THE WIND'

A undeniably racist film

I was appalled by Bonnie Blodgett's claim in her commentary that "Gone with the Wind" is not racist ("Why 'Gone with the Wind' should not be gone," Opinion Exchange, June 15). Black people were protesting it from the day it came out. Even as children in the 1950s, we laughed at the caricatures of black slaves in the film. Later, we realized just how much the slave-era South and the Confederacy were normalized and even glorified in the film.

The book is even worse. According to a June 14 article in the New York Times, "Scarlett, while riding alone through a shantytown, is nearly raped by a black man, which prompts a retaliatory raid by the Klan." In the film, "the attacker is a poor white man, and the nature of the posse that rides out to avenge her honor is not specified." Even David O. Selznick, the film's producer, couldn't stomach making the Ku Klux Klan avenging heroes.

I understand white nostalgia for racist, sexist or just plain lousy films, but nostalgia shouldn't blind us to their very real faults.

Daniel Pinkerton, Minneapolis

PROTESTS

Gatherings spread disease, no matter why we have them. Right?

Since the tragic and senseless death of George Floyd at the hands of the Minneapolis Police Department, understandable calls for justice and action of transpired. We've seen tens of thousands of Americans all throughout the country raise their voices in an effort to foment just change.

Circa six weeks ago, there were also protests around the country by Americans whose livelihoods have been destroyed. Unemployment is at an all-time high, people can't afford their bills, and people grew desperate. Protesters stormed state capitols and demanded COVID-19 lockdown restrictions be lifted.

The reaction to these two types of protests, which happened within a month, could not be more stark. One one hand, we've seen people who claimed if someone is anti-lockdown and they protest, they are selfish and they "want grandma to die." The government, at all levels, said it was irresponsible for people to be gathering in the protesting.

READERS WRITE Kroll should want what we want

But later, we saw tens of thousands of people congregate (and continue to do so to this day) to protest racial inequity. Where have the voices who claimed those who protest want grandma dead gone? Why has the government shifted its attack on relatively smaller protests to passively encouraging the nationwide protests we see today?

COVID-19 hasn't disappeared, but you can still pass along the coronavirus at a social justice protest as well as a "reopen America's economy" protest.

If anything, these large protests have become an experiment to truly test the infectivity of COVID-19. If the U.S. doesn't see the largest spike of infections since all of this started, it is time to fully reopen America.

Nathan Dull, Eden Prairie

REMOVING MONUMENTS

He still did it, even without a statue

This may be a way to think about the question of whether or not to take down Confederate leaders' statues: Let's say your high school named you the valedictorian of your graduating class. And in your honor, they awarded you a trophy and put it in the school's trophy case. Then, after many years, the trophy case became too crowded and they had to move some trophies into storage, so students could no longer pass by your trophy and see your name.

Would this mean that you were no longer the valedictorian of your class? Of course not. The record would still show that you had earned that honor. It would simply mean that the trophy, emblematic of your work, was no longer displayed in the school trophy case.

Jon Hersch, Hamel

...

I hope the statue of me in our backyard will not someday be torn down because I offended some liberal in the past.

Darrell E. Ritzema, Fridley

...

I've never given much thought to public statues. Most pay tribute to old dead guys who probably did as much as good as bad. Except Ole Bull. My grandpa, Ernest/Ernie/Ole Olson, used to take me for walks and play in Loring Park in the early 1950s. I still remember the statue of Ole Bull, so tall and magnificent - stirring really. He was a violinist. And not a killer of people like so many other men who have monuments in public squares.

Let's have more statues of violinists instead of killers.

Mike Fralick, Litchfield, Minn.

We want to hear from you. Send us your thoughts here.

READERS WRITE Kroll should want what we want

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

End of Document

After unrest in St. Cloud, 18-year-old charged with shooting officer

ARTICLE DCCXXIII.

AFTER UNREST IN ST. CLOUD, 18-YEAR-OLD CHARGED WITH SHOOTING OFFICER

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 388 words

Byline: The Associated Press

Highlight: ST. CLOUD, Minn. - Prosecutors charged an 18-year-old man Wednesday with shooting and wounding a St. Cloud police officer who was trying to arrest him - a shooting that sparked unrest after rumors surfaced that police had shot two black men. The Stearns County Attorney's Office charged Sumaree Boose, of St. Cloud with first-degree assault, [...]

Body

ST. CLOUD, Minn. - Prosecutors charged an 18-year-old man Wednesday with shooting and wounding a St. Cloud police officer who was trying to arrest him - a shooting that sparked unrest after rumors surfaced that police had shot two black men.

The Stearns County Attorney's Office charged Sumaree Boose, of St. Cloud with first-degree assault, using deadly force against a peace officer who was shot in the hand. Bail was set at $400,000 with conditions.

Boose denied that he intentionally shot the officer, whose name hasn't been released. On the contrary, he said the officer, perhaps unintentionally, shot him in the chin during the struggle early Monday and that the bullet also went through the officer's hand, authorities allege in the criminal complaint.

Authorities deny Boose's version of events, saying no officers opened fire while arresting him.

After the shooting, a rumor spread on social media that police had shot two black men, leading to a crowd gathering early Monday outside of police headquarters. Officers used tear gas to disperse the crowd.

After two nights of unrest, the Rev. James Alberts of Higher Ground Church of God in Christ shared a megaphone with people Tuesday night who wanted to talk about their experiences with racism and other issues.

Alberts encouraged the roughly 150 demonstrators to keep the gathering peaceful, which they did.

"We are not here at this moment in time because everything is peachy keen, but we are also not here to burn things down," he said, according to the St. Cloud Times.

After unrest in St. Cloud, 18-year-old charged with shooting officer

The protests have been over George Floyd's death in Minneapolis and racial injustice. Floyd, who was black and handcuffed, died May 25 after a white police officer used his knee to pin down Floyd's neck for several minutes as Floyd begged for air and eventually stopped moving. His death has sparked protests around the world.

Two men arrested in connection with Wednesday's fatal shooting have been released; investigation continues Former Anoka middle school theater teacher charged with 7 counts of criminal sexual conduct Iowa meth kingpin is 3rd executed by US government this week Black Lives Matter signs stolen and damaged, Roseville police say. Dead raccoons left near others. St. Paul man said 'speak the language I speak,' then drove into woman at Little Canada park, bias charges say

Load-Date: July 18, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCCXXIV.

HIGH SCHOOL ATHLETES MOVE TO HELP LAKE STREET REBUILD

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 515 wordsByline: ERIN ADLER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Hundreds of athletes will try to raise a total of $8,460 on Wednesday.

Body

What started as a single soccer team trying to help out has blossomed into hundreds of students running, walking, biking or swimming to raise awareness of racism along with money for Minneapolis businesses damaged by rioting after George Floyd's death.

On Wednesday, Rachel Winkey, a captain of the Blake High School girls soccer team, will meet up with 40 other players at Nine Mile Creek Regional Trail to jog and walk 8.46 miles to represent the 8 minutes, 46 seconds a Minneapolis police officer knelt on Floyd's neck before he died.

Athletes from eight other soccer teams - Breck, Coon Rapids, Washburn in Minneapolis, Eagan, Edina, Minnetonka, Orono and Wayzata - will join the Blake Bears, exercising on their own turf for the same purpose.

The teams hope to funnel $8,460 into one GoFundMe account to give to the Lake Street Council in Minneapolis. The money will aid businesses along a devastated stretch of Lake Street as they rebuild. As of Tuesday afternoon, the fund had raised $4,925.

Blake head girls soccer coach Kelsey Hans got the idea to have her team raise money from the UCLA women's soccer team, which ran 8.46 miles on June 8, generating tens of thousands of dollars for Black Lives Matter.

"I thought it was really neat," Hans said. "I initially thought I'd have to do most of it but [the team] was really excited about it."

Winkey, who had recently pitched in by participating in a food drive for areas hit hard by the riots, picked the Lake Street cause when she heard many businesses didn't have insurance to cover the damage.

Soon, the Blake boys team was on board, then Edina girls soccer joined in. Coon Rapids High School is having all of its sports programs participate, as are many of Orono's teams. Several metro-area soccer club teams, including Tonka Fusion, Tonka United, Minnesota Thunder Academy and Minneapolis United, are signed up, too.

High school athletes move to help Lake Street rebuild

"I think it's really important for kids to get involved because it allows them to be informed," Winkey said, adding that it's especially crucial when they are young and still learning. Winkey said she believes the collaboration will meet its financial goal.

Every team is meeting at a different place and time Wednesday. If students have a conflict, they can do it on their own. When done, Winkey said, they're encouraged to post a photo of themselves with the hashtag #MN846ForChange.

Hans said this project shows how passionate high school students can be.

The team is less focused on how they raise than they are on getting as many students involved as possible, she said.

Katie Aafedt, Edina High School's head girls soccer coach, said she had "total buy-in" from her players. Thirty to 40 of them will show up at 3 p.m. Wednesday, where they will alternately walk and run a 2-mile loop around Kuhlman Field, the site of their home games. The fundraiser is a way to contribute that's in the girls' wheelhouse as athletes, she said.

"It's important for these girls to see what life's like outside their own world," Aafedt said. "It forced some discussion that would have never happened otherwise."

Erin Adler · 612-673-1781

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

ARTICLE DCCXXV. MINNESOTA STATE SCHOOLS TO REVIEW POLICE TRAINING FOLLOWING GEORGE FLOYD KILLING

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 245 words

Byline: Josh Verges

Highlight: The Minnesota State college and university system will convene a work group to examine what's being taught in its law enforcement training programs following the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody. Chancellor Devinder Malhotra said during Wednesday's Board of Trustees meeting that the group will include faculty, campus administrators, students and community members. [...]

Body

The Minnesota State college and university system will convene a work group to examine what's being taught in its law enforcement training programs following the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody.

Chancellor Devinder Malhotra said during Wednesday's Board of Trustees meeting that the group will include faculty, campus administrators, students and community members.

Their task will be to support the "critical examination of current law enforcement curricula and pedagogy using an anti-racism and equity-focused lens," he said.

Malhotra said that beyond reviewing law enforcement training, the system of 30 state colleges and seven universities will undergo ongoing anti-racism training and review its policies and procedures with an eye toward equity.

Derek Chauvin, who is charged with second-degree murder for kneeling on Floyd's neck for several minutes on May 25, attended three of the system's schools. Chauvin is white and Floyd was black.

Three other officers are charged with aiding and abetting murder. House committee advances bill to assist Twin Cities businesses damaged in George Floyd unrest Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis' Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting Police looking for dozens who looted Lululemon on St. Paul's Grand Ave. during Floyd unrest

Load-Date: July 18, 2020

Minnesota State schools to review police training following George Floyd killing

End of Document

Feds charge man in 3rd precinct fire

ARTICLE DCCXXVI.

FEDS CHARGE MAN IN 3RD PRECINCT FIRE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 522 wordsByline: STEPHEN MONTEMAYOR; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Dylan Shakespeare Robinson was arrested Sunday in Colorado.Body

Federal authorities on Tuesday charged a 23-year-old Brainerd-area man in connection with fires started at the Minneapolis Police Department's Third Precinct building amid rioting over the May 25 police killing of George Floyd.

Dylan Shakespeare Robinson, 23, made his first appearance in federal court in Colorado, two days after being arrested in Breckenridge, Colo., as he traveled west along Interstate 70.

Robinson - identified as having grown up in the Brainerd area and currently serving a probation sentence for drug possession - was recorded by security cameras tossing incendiary devices at the Third Precinct building the night it burned, according to a federal criminal complaint. A Facebook video also showed Robinson setting a fire just outside the first-floor stairwell on the building's west side, the complaint said.

Robinson is charged with two felonies related to aiding and abetting arson. His next court appearance is scheduled for Friday in Colorado. An attorney representing Robinson was not immediately available.

According to the federal criminal complaint affidavit sworn by an agent for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF), Robinson also posted footage on Snapchat of himself and others trying to make Molotov cocktails near the precinct building.

At one point in the comments section of the video, Robinson posted, "These guys have never made a Molotov," and called them "Rookies," the complaint said. When another Snapchat user commented that the group should siphon gasoline for the devices, the charging document said, Robinson replied, "Got it covered."

According to charges, investigators scoured publicly available social media accounts, including YouTube, Facebook, Instagram, Snapchat and TikTok in the days after the Third Precinct building - and numerous others - were damaged or destroyed by fires as unrest raged across the Twin Cities following Floyd's death.

Feds charge man in 3rd precinct fire

A day after the ATF publicly released photos of suspects involved in the fires, a woman who said her son had attended Pillager Area Charter School with Robinson identified the man in one of the photos. The ATF says she also provided a link to Robinson's Facebook account and told agents that he was also responsible for the fire that destroyed an AutoZone store near the Third Precinct.

Agents also used cellphone data to trace Robinson near the Third Precinct building the night of May 28 and into the early morning of May 29. They later tracked him to the Denver area.

Robinson's arrest is the latest in an ongoing federal law enforcement probe of scores of fires set around the Twin Cities after Floyd's death. On Monday, federal authorities announced a $70,000 reward for help identifying, arresting and prosecuting the suspects involved. William Henderson, special agent in charge of the ATF's St. Paul field division, said that authorities have "narrowed in on particular individuals who we suspect started one or more fires throughout the Twin Cities."

The photos showed eight locations damaged by arson.

Staff writer Paul Walsh contributed to this report.

Stephen Montemayor · 612-673-1755

Twitter: @smontemayor

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

ARTICLE DCCXXVII.

CARTER GOES BEFORE SENATE POLICING PANEL

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 957 wordsByline: JIM SPENCER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

WASHINGTON - St. Paul Mayor Melvin Carter on Tuesday urged Congress to make broad national police accountability reforms, including standards that would outlaw chokeholds or neck restraints like the one that cost George Floyd his life at the hands of Minneapolis police.

"We can establish a national standard of policing to curb brutality, end racial profiling, and eliminate qualified immunity," Carter told a Senate panel considering police reforms. "Undoubtedly, you will be pressured by powerful friends who will paint these critical reforms as hostile to law enforcement, but our work to restore Americans' faith in our justice system is a lifeline for officers who serve in good faith."

Carter's testimony came as President Donald Trump signed an executive order providing incentives for better police training, higher certification standards and a national database to track police misconduct, though his reform package fell short of the demands of many protesters and activists.

Carter's comments, delivered remotely at a hearing of the powerful Senate Judiciary Committee, came in the wake of the anger that enveloped the Twin Cities after Minneapolis officer Derek Chauvin pressed his knee into Floyd's neck as Floyd begged for his life.

Carter, whose father was one of St. Paul's first black police officers, said mayors like him need federal support to regain control in an atmosphere where use of force often takes precedence over helping address what causes crime to begin with.

"Our country's enforcement-heavy public safety strategies aren't designed to address the root causes of crime, only the symptoms," Carter said. "We deserve more than a swift response after a crime is committed, we deserve investment to reduce the number of times we have to call police in the first place."

Carter also asked for a national record-keeping system that will help localities and states weed out problem officers. "We fire officers only to see them shielded from accountability, reinstated through arbitration, or hired into another agency that has no knowledge of their past," he said.

Carter goes before Senate policing panel

Democratic Sen. Amy Klobuchar of Minnesota invited Carter to address the Senate committee as Republicans and Democrats in Congress work on separate packages of police reforms. House Democrats have proposed reforms that would ban police chokeholds and make it easier for victims of police brutality to sue officers and departments, something many Republicans oppose.

Trump, working with Senate Republicans, offered a more limited package that also bans chokeholds except in certain circumstances. Echoing many reform activists, the president's order calls on departments to involve social workers and mental health professionals on calls dealing with homelessness, mental illness and addiction.

State lawmakers in St. Paul also are working on police reform legislation this week, though the outcome remains unsettled.

Agreement in Congress may prove more difficult. Democrats and Republicans differ on how much criminal and civil immunity police officers should receive for alleged misconduct. Democrats generally favor less immunity.

Klobuchar, a Judiciary Committee member, pointed to unsuccessful attempts by her and other senators to persuade the U.S. Justice Department to investigate police practices in Minneapolis. The ability of federal officials to compel changes in police behavior, such as prohibiting the use of chokeholds, may find common ground. Other details of reform will likely need negotiation, committee members seemed to agree.

Facing pressure to take action following Floyd's death, Trump announced his order in a Rose Garden gathering where he praised both law enforcement and the families of those who lost their lives during interactions with police.

"We have to find common ground," Trump said "But I strongly oppose the radical and dangerous efforts to defund, dismantle, and dissolve our police departments. ... Americans know the truth: Without police, there is chaos; without law, there is anarchy; and without safety, there is catastrophe. We need leaders at every level of government who have the moral clarity to state these obvious facts."

Among those attending the White House rollout was Republican U.S. Rep. Pete Stauber of Minnesota, a former police officer. "The death of George Floyd calls for lasting change, and I am proud to see the President take decisive action on this issue," Stauber tweeted afterward.

Andy Skoogman, executive director of the Minnesota Chiefs of Police, said the chiefs welcome the "consistency" that will come from policies set at by the state and federal government. "We do have agencies across the state that have different policies," he said.

Skoogman pointedly noted, however, that the hold used by Chauvin and Floyd was "unacceptable, unreasonable and unnecessary."

Steve Linders, spokesman for the St. Paul Police Department, said chokeholds already have been banned for years in St. Paul. "No one in our leadership can remember when they were even taught in the academy," Linders said, adding that a new policy in the wake of the Floyd killing made it "crystal clear" that they are "explicitly" banned.

Carter goes before Senate policing panel

South Carolina Sen. Tim Scott, the only black Republican in the Senate, is expected to introduce a GOP police reform package Wednesday that could win Trump's support. But Judiciary Chairman Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, a top Trump ally, cautioned that Republicans and Democrats cannot talk "past one another" if they want to pass a reform law.

He referred to Scott, who has been stopped five times by police in the capital, saying, "Tim and I have completely different experiences with the cops. Why is it?"

Staff writer Rochelle Olson contributed to this report.

Jim Spencer · 202-662-7432

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCCXXVIII.

POLICING REFORMS DEBATED AT CAPITOL

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 871 wordsByline: BRIANA BIERSCHBACH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: GOP-led Senate has slate of bills, but gulf remains with DFL-led House.Body

Republicans in control of the Minnesota Senate faced pushback on a package of police reform proposals on Tuesday from Democrats and community members who said the bills don't go far enough to hold officers accountable in cases of deadly force.

A wide gulf remained between House Democrats and Senate Republicans on the lengths of police reform measures in the wake of George Floyd's May 25 killing by Minneapolis police, which sparked outrage across the globe. It's unclear what both chambers will be able to pass during the short special session of the Legislature, which Republicans say they plan to adjourn Friday.

"This is a first step in a special session that has limited time," said Sen. Warren Limmer, R-Maple Grove, the chairman of the chamber's judiciary committee. "This is not a last step; we need to continue this discussion, regardless of what happens in the November election."

The bills being advanced by the GOP-controlled Senate late into Tuesday evening continue state funding to reimburse local governments for law enforcement training on crisis intervention and implicit bias. The Senate package also expands support for officers struggling with their mental health, increases background checks for law enforcement employees and requires reporting of some use-of-force cases to the Minnesota Bureau of Criminal Apprehension.

Another bill requires the Minnesota Board of Peace Officer Standards and Training, which handles law enforcement licensing and standards, to develop a statewide policy banning chokeholds and neck restraints like those used on Floyd by former Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin, who now faces murder charges. The POST board also would have to adopt policies that require officers to intervene and report in some cases of excessive force.

Those measures line up with a handful proposed by Democrats in control of the House, but their package of roughly 20 public safety and criminal justice bills go further than the Senate measures. The DFL bills would ban "warrior-style" training, eliminate cash bail for misdemeanor offenses, and spend $15 million on community interventions and policing alternatives.

Policing reforms debated at Capitol

House Democrats also are pushing to give Attorney General Keith Ellison's office responsibility for prosecuting officer-involved deaths, a measure GOP leaders oppose. Another point of contention is a DFL measure to restore felons' voting rights while they are on probation.

GOP lawmakers have raised concerns with tying felon voting restoration to police reform and said they oppose having Ellison, an outspoken progressive Democrat, handle cases of deadly or excessive force.

"We don't think that the attorney general should have more powers. He used to be the [DNC vice chairman.] We think he's partisan and we don't think he's the right guy to have more powers," said Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, R-East Gull Lake. "We don't think we should have felon voting, and we don't think we should dismantle the police."

Calls by a majority of the Minneapolis City Council to disband or dismantle the city's police force have become a focal point of criticism for Republicans nationwide, including President Donald Trump, who issued an executive order Tuesday outlining a more limited set of police reforms.

But some witnesses in a nearly three-hour Minnesota Senate hearing said the GOP legislation doesn't go far enough to address broader problems with police accountability.

Department of Corrections Commissioner Paul Schnell, who previously served as chief of police in Inver Grove Heights, encouraged senators to support a House DFL bill that changes the arbitration process to prevent some problematic officers from returning to their job after being fired.

"The spotlight is turned on us, the world is watching us as Minnesota is at the center of another tragedy," he said. "We cannot accept that things will just calm down; we cannot accept that things will get back to normal after this. That's just not possible."

Policing reform is just one issue legislators are trying to tackle during the special session, which was triggered by Gov. Tim Walz's extension of his emergency powers in response to the coronavirus.

The Senate passed a bill that would allocate more than $841 million in federal aid for local governments struggling with COVID-19 costs.

The House has yet to hold a special session hearing on the federal aid but it has bipartisan support.

Lawmakers also want to help businesses damaged during riots in Minneapolis and St. Paul.

Walz asked the Legislature on Tuesday not to leave until they have police reforms as well as a bonding bill to fund public works projects statewide.

Walz has proposed a $2.6 billion bonding bill to renovate state buildings, water systems, roads and other infrastructure. Gazelka has said he's willing to go up to $1.35 billion.

"This is the rainy day that Minnesota has been preparing for," Lt. Gov. Peggy Flanagan said. "The time for a robust bonding bill is right now and we must act." House Republicans, however, are still demanding that the governor first end his emergency powers, which they say are no longer needed.

Staff writer Jessie Van Berkel contributed to this report.

Policing reforms debated at Capitol

Briana Bierschbach · 651-925-5042

Twitter: @bbierschbach

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCCXXIX.

'BETTER ANGELS': ST. PAUL PUBLIC ART HONORS LINCOLN'S FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 396 wordsByline: Emma Harville

Highlight: On the brink of civil war, President Abraham Lincoln addressed the nation with a simple plea: "We are not enemies, but friends. We must not be enemies." More than a century later, the words from Lincoln's First Inaugural Address inspired St. Paul artist Nicole Mary Milligan's next public art installation in downtown St. Paul: A [...]

Body

On the brink of civil war, President Abraham Lincoln addressed the nation with a simple plea: "We are not enemies, but friends. We must not be enemies."

More than a century later, the words from Lincoln's First Inaugural Address inspired St. Paul artist Nicole Mary Milligan's next public art installation in downtown St. Paul: A piece called "Better Angels."

The steel framework is 20 feet long, 10 feet wide and 14 feet tall and includes several hundred blue and white pinwheels resembling angel wings. When assembled, the pinwheels appear as one large pair of angel wings.

Landmark Plaza, adjacent the Landmark Center, is hosting the project until Sept. 30. The plaza hosted another art installation by Milligan last summer.

In his address, Lincoln asked a divided America to be inspired by "the better angels of our nature" - a message that will be posted on a sign alongside the installation.

While especially relevant amid Black Lives Matter protests taking place across the country, Milligan says the concept for "Better Angels" was developed last year.

"I just noticed that there has been a lack of civility," said Milligan, who is working with her husband and fellow artist, Allan Milligan. "For some reason the world is at this particular crucial moment, and we as citizens of the world have to go, 'Where is my humanity? Where is the humanity in others? Who are we?'"

The installation was sponsored by the St. Paul Downtown Alliance, the Rice Park Association and Landmark Center.

'Better Angels': St. Paul public art honors Lincoln's first inaugural address

Landmark Center director Amy Mino said the installation is an opportunity for people to enjoy art this summer despite COVID-19 restrictions.

"The reason we sponsored it is because it's creative and inspiring, and we hope it inspires people to think big," Mino said.

Milligan encourages you to see the angel wings, share photos of them on social media with the hashtag #BetterAngelsStPaul and remember that "we're all supposed to get along."

Twin Cities home values climb as inventory plummets, no shortage in demand due to COVID-19 St. Paul parking revenue is down by \$2M. Here's how city officials are preparing for the shortfall. Luz María Frías, former St. Paul director, appointed as MN deputy attorney general Man fatally shot in St. Paul ID'd as 25-year-old; 1 of 2 under arrest was wounded in shooting Workers at Cerenity Humboldt Care Center in St. Paul plan 24-hour wage strike

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

End of Document

Hamline professors: If they want to improve policing in Minnesota, legislators need to know this

ARTICLE DCCXXX. HAMLIN PROFESSORS: IF THEY WANT TO IMPROVE POLICING IN MINNESOTA, LEGISLATORS NEED TO KNOW THIS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1260 words

Byline: Shelly Schaefer, Jillian Peterson, Sarah Greenman, and Gina Erickson

Highlight: The Minnesota House of Representatives and Senate are debating several bills to "reform," "reclaim" and "re-imagine" police oversight and accountability. However, much of the proposed legislation fails to address the systemic failures inherent in police education, licensing and training in Minnesota. Understanding why these bills will not reform policing in Minnesota requires an understanding of [...]

Body

The Minnesota House of Representatives and Senate are debating several bills to "reform," "reclaim" and "re-imagine" police oversight and accountability. However, much of the proposed legislation fails to address the systemic failures inherent in police education, licensing and training in Minnesota.

Understanding why these bills will not reform policing in Minnesota requires an understanding of Minnesota's licensing model and the fundamental breakdowns built into this complex system. Here are the key breakdowns:

Pre-service

Minnesota is one of the few states that requires a post-secondary degree to become a peace officer. Individuals seeking a career in law enforcement can choose to attend one of the 30 Peace Officer Standards and Training (POST) accredited education programs. The board certifies that these schools are covering the 410 learning objectives adopted by the MN POST Board.

However, Minnesota rules do not require that accredited schools evaluate or provide assessment of how they are meeting objectives. There is no standardization of who is teaching the courses, what is being taught, and the POST board does not require proof that students are mastering individual learning objectives.

Psychological exam

Hamline professors: If they want to improve policing in Minnesota, legislators need to know this

At this point, potential officers have to pass a standardized psychological exam - typically the MMPI - administered by private psychologists throughout the state. The MMPI is a personality inventory designed to measure abnormal behavior.

But it has shown limited ability to predict officer performance. And the MMPI has been criticized for being racially biased, with black applicants failing the exam more often than white applicants in law enforcement settings.

Skills

After completing their educational training and passing the psychological exam, new potential officers have to pass a skills program at one of 10 providers in Minnesota. Taught by current and former officers, skills programs follow a paramilitary structure

Some curriculum follows the nationwide trend of being largely stress-based or "based on the military model and typically involves intensive physical demands and psychological pressure."

This fear-based model trains officers to view every interaction as a threat or a potential threat.

Written exam

All potential officers must now pass a written exam - administered by Pearson Vue.

But students and their universities are only told whether they pass or fail the computerized exam - not what score they received or which areas they are weak in, such as communication or cultural competency. This misses an early, critical opportunity for intervention. Law enforcement agencies also don't have access to the data for hiring decisions.

Screening by departments

At this point, potential officers apply to individual law enforcement agencies. Each department has its own hiring procedures and screening that may include another psychological exam.

This process is different for each department and can result in a potential officer failing one agency's psychological exam but passing another's. There are no agreed-upon requirements, resulting in officers across the state who have failed psychological testing and some who have no required experience with diverse populations.

Field training

After being accepted as a police officer, each department requires supervised field training. The length of field training varies by department, with Minneapolis requiring six months.

Hamline professors: If they want to improve policing in Minnesota, legislators need to know this

As we have now learned, Derek Chauvin was a training officer in the MPD, illustrating that an officer with 17 citizen complaints and several prior use-of-force incidents can be promoted to a training officer.

In-service training

Officers in Minnesota are required to attend 48 hours of in-service training every three years - with use-of-force training required every year.

But there is little to no screening of course content or trainer qualifications, and no evaluation of the training or its impact.

In fact, the POST board does not keep application materials and therefore makes any sort of evaluation difficult, if not impossible.

The "gold standard" in de-escalation training, for example, is CIT Training, which is taught by current and former officers, costs $700 plus a week of salary per officer, and little can be said about its effectiveness.

The last two officers to face murder charges in Minnesota - Derek Chauvin and Mohamed Noor - were both CIT-trained officers.

Re-licensing

Officers have to renew their license every three-years using an online form.

Re-certification in many pre-service skills and physical fitness standards are not required, and background checks are not re-run as part of this process - current officers have to self-report any changes to their criminal histories like DUIs and domestic assaults.

POST Board

Oversight for all of this falls to the POST Board.

The POST Board operates outside the authority of the Department of Public Safety, thus, it is unclear who has the authority to hold the POST Board accountable. The majority of seats on the board are law enforcement members.

The POST Board has authority over "selection, training, and licensing of peace officers," however, when it comes to enforcing authority over active officers, the board does not oversee discipline of officers and instead defers to the agency of employment. Under this oversight, license revocation in Minnesota is unlikely without a criminal conviction. The result is a well-documented problem of hundreds of officers with charges of misconduct, excessive use-of-force complaints, or even criminal convictions who continue to work in Minnesota agencies.

Hamline professors: If they want to improve policing in Minnesota, legislators need to know this

Minnesota policing has some bad apples - which should have been screened out at multiple checkpoints - growing on a rotten tree. The problems we've detailed here relate to reimagining the very concept of policing - its purpose and values as well as its practice.

Some of the proposals on the floor of the Minnesota Legislature could have a real impact on policing in Minnesota - like creating citizen-led critical-incident review boards, requiring record-keeping, changing the use-of-force statutes, and having the attorney general prosecute officers accused of serious crimes.

Other proposals miss the mark entirely, like requiring more in-service training that is not research-based.

And the reforms do not go far enough because they fail to adequately rethink the role and authority of the POST Board.

Our current system of training and overseeing police in Minnesota has failed. For real reform, we have to admit the tree is rotten. It's time to plant a new one.

The writers are associate professors in the criminal justice and forensic science department at Hamline University who educate future practitioners in the field of criminology and criminal justice. Shelly Schaefer, department chair, works on crime policy evaluation and community crime prevention. Jillian Peterson is a forensic psychologist who studies mass shootings and mental illness in the justice system. Sarah Greenman is a criminologist who researches community crime prevention and risk factors for violence and victimization. Gina Erickson is a sociologist who focuses on criminal justice program evaluation and quantitative methods.

Letters: Regarding 'The other First Minnesota,' amplifications and corrections Soucheray: This progressive transfer of wealth from renters to developers and big corporations Caryn Sullivan: A thinning blue line John Shipley: So far, nothing enjoyable about rebooting pro sports Benner, Magnuson: SPPS should learn to say 'no' with love - and high expectations

Load-Date: July 18, 2020

ARTICLE DCCXXXI.

ST. PAUL PUBLIC SCHOOLS WEIGHS REMOVAL OF POLICE OFFICERS FOLLOWING GEORGE FLOYD'S DEATH

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 618 wordsByline: Josh VergesHighlight: The St. Paul school board will decide next week whether to continue placing police officers at seven of its high schools. School district administrators are recommending the continuation of the school resource officer program despite a flurry of opposition following the May 25 death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody. Superintendent Joe Gothard said [...]Body

The St. Paul school board will decide next week whether to continue placing police officers at seven of its high schools.

School district administrators are recommending the continuation of the school resource officer program despite a flurry of opposition following the May 25 death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody.

Superintendent Joe Gothard said school district officials recently have received over 1,000 emails on the subject, most of which urged them to end the program. High school principals, however, think the officers should stay, he said.

Students also overwhelmingly support having officers in seven high schools, according to a survey of high school juniors last year.

School board members discussed the matter at length Tuesday night but did not reach a consensus. They're expected to decide June 23 whether staff should negotiate another contract with the city police department.

Board member John Brodrick favors keeping the program, saying the district has had a good partnership with the police.

Zuki Ellis said she doesn't think police officers belong in schools. At the same time, she said, the officers in the St. Paul schools "are really good people and we've been fortunate to have them in our schools."

Steve Marchese said he's willing to remove the officers at some point but first wants to see a plan for how schools will operate without them.

St. Paul Public Schools weighs removal of police officers following George Floyd's death

The school board has debated the merits of the program each year since 2016, fueled by the forceful arrest, caught on video, of a former student who was trespassing at Central Senior High.

An advisory team of students appointed by the board ushered in changes to school police practices later that year. The membership of the Student Engagement and Advancement Board has changed but the board renewed a call on Tuesday to remove the officers.

"I don't think I'd feel safe going back to school," said Kalid Ali, a Como Park high schooler who said he might not return to school in the fall if a police officer is in the building.

Chauntyll Allen, a board member and former educational assistant, said some of the changes to the program, which included a more casual uniform, made no difference.

"It was the same gun on their hip, and it was the same cuffs on their other hip," she said, suggesting the money can be better spent on staffers who positively support students.

The St. Paul school board has come close to ending the program, but its most recent vote, last December, was unanimous in favor of another one-year contract. The board was told then that 97 percent of juniors said it was a "good idea" to have officers posted in schools.

The current contract expires this month. It calls for the school district to pay the city up to $775,000 for the use of seven officers; the actual cost will be smaller this school year because the officers were reassigned after schools closed in March due to the coronavirus pandemic. Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis' Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting Police looking for dozens who looted Lululemon on St. Paul's Grand Ave. during Floyd unrest George Floyd's family sues Minneapolis officers charged in his death

Six of the district's seven school resource officers are people of color.

Tuesday's discussion came as law- and policymakers across the country were weighing a response to Floyd's death, which has captured the world's attention like perhaps no other case of police brutality.

Earlier this month, the Minneapolis school board said it would end its relationship with that city's police department.

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

BLACK WOMEN HEED CALL TO RUN

ARTICLE DCCXXXII.

BLACK WOMEN HEED CALL TO RUN

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1031 wordsByline: BRIANA BIERSCHBACH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Floyd's killing inspires local action, national push for changeBody

Marquita Stephens has been active in her Woodbury community for more than 20 years, working with victims of domestic violence and advocating for safe placements for black children up for adoption. A few months ago, in a moment of prayer, she made a promise to herself: if someone called upon her to take her work to the next level, she would.

She didn't expect that person would be George Floyd, a man she's never met, seen on a video crying out for his mother while a Minneapolis police officer knelt on his neck.

"To have him holler for his mother at that point, you know you had to respond," said Stephens, the mother of two black sons. "If something would happen to them, I'm putting on my shoes and I'm going. That's what a mom does."

Days later, Stephens filed to run for a seat in the state Senate, a 162-year-old institution that has yet to elect a black woman. And she wasn't alone. Three other black women have filed for state Senate seats since Floyd's death, while a half-dozen others filed to run for offices from the state House to Congress.

They're scientists, lawyers, business owners, real estate agents and former employees of corporate America who have been organizing in their communities for years. They're all women, and most are mothers of black children. Only a few had planned to run for office this year before Floyd cried out to his mother and took his last breath. Now they're on the ballot, saying they're answering his call.

"There's never going to be a right time. There's never going to be a time when all the stars are going to align," said Zina Fizer, a self-described "mom first," longtime activist and independent consultant who filed to run for an open state Senate seat in Plymouth. Before Floyd's killing, she planned to wait until 2022 because of the pandemic. "You have to get in right now, because this is the state of emergency that we're in. In order for things to change, it has to be while we're in this perfect storm."

BLACK WOMEN HEED CALL TO RUN

Some are running against other Democrats in primaries. But they say their reason for running now goes beyond traditional political alliances - they want to be at the table for decisions about police reform and racial disparities.

While the number of people from communities of color serving in the Legislature has grown over the years - to 21 out of 201 members - it's still not representative of the state as a whole. People of color make up 20% of Minnesota's population statewide, but only 10% of the Legislature. There are six black and Somali-American legislators currently serving, or 2% of the total Legislature. Statewide, people who identify as black or African-American make up 8% of the population.

In response to Floyd's killing, Democratic state lawmakers are pushing a wide-ranging overhaul of law enforcement. Some of their ideas have Republican support. But previous efforts over the years have been thwarted by divided government or lack of political will. Organizers say they've spent too long working behind the scenes to prop up other candidates who made similar promises, notably after black men like Jamar Clark and Philando Castile were killed at the hands of police.

"You know what? We don't have time for folks to figure it out anymore," said Anika Bowie, vice president of the Minneapolis NAACP. "We don't have time for elected officials, no matter what side of the aisle you are on, to finally treat members of the African-American community and black community with dignity."

During a rally for Floyd, Bowie got on Facebook Live and put out the call to other black organizers: if you're thinking about running for office, now is the time. She teamed up on recruitment with Alberder Gillespie, a candidate in the Fourth District in Congress and co-founder of Black Women Rising.

Gillespie started the group after years of working in DFL politics helping train and coach other candidates, many of them white. But when it comes to black women running themselves, she said she's heard it all: "It's not our time, we shouldn't do that, we would love it, but ... " she said. "There's not a system that's supportive of us. The idea that they can represent me, but I can't represent them."

When Gillespie called Laverne McCartney Knighton about running for a state Senate seat in St. Paul, her first response was: "Me for Senate, are you crazy?" McCartney Knighton worked for 13 years in philanthropy at Target and now connects black students with college scholarships at the United Negro College Fund. She'd pondered running for local office before, but never imagined she'd run for the Senate.

But after discussing it with family and pondering this moment, she said it made sense. "It's weighed on me in ways I didn't even know it would, and I ask myself every day, what are you doing? What are you getting ready to do?" she said.

Husniyah Dent Bradley is a lawyer who works at Mitchell Hamline and ran unsuccessfully for the DFL endorsement in a south Minneapolis House seat. She was weighing whether to run in a primary when her phone started lighting up with messages about Floyd from friends across the country. She ran over to 38th and Chicago, the site where Floyd was killed, and before long she was addressing the crowd. After that, her decision became clear.

"Regardless of if I win, my community needs me and they need voices like mine to lift up their experiences and circumstances," she said.

BLACK WOMEN HEED CALL TO RUN

Aarica Coleman is running in a district represented by Sen. Warren Limmer, R-Maple Grove, the chairman of the chamber's judiciary committee. He's become a target of legislative Democrats, who say he blocks everything from gun control to criminal justice reforms. That's one reason Coleman is running. But as a real estate agent and longtime advocate for affordable housing, she's also running to tackle the larger ecosystem of disparities for black residents from housing and education to economic opportunity.

"I've already been pushing for this and advocating for policy and action that follows it up. There are so many people who have gone unheard and unlistened to," Coleman said. "What happened to George Floyd put it over the top for me."

bbierschbach@startribune.com 651-925-5042 · Twitter: @bbierschbach

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCCXXXIII.

GROCERY DONATION EFFORT TO AREAS HIT BY UNREST SPREADS THROUGHOUT METRO

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 688 wordsByline: Nancy Ngo

Highlight: Now here's a partnership for feeding people from areas hit hard during the unrest after the death of George Floyd. The idea is starting to catch on and could be coming soon to a community near you. Minneapolis resident Sarah Friedman wanted to do something to feed those in need after fires and looting left [...]

Body

Now here's a partnership for feeding people from areas hit hard during the unrest after the death of George Floyd.

The idea is starting to catch on and could be coming soon to a community near you.

Minneapolis resident Sarah Friedman wanted to do something to feed those in need after fires and looting left several communities in need of essentials. At the same time, she wanted to make sure that whatever items she assembled into bags would be used.

To take out any guesswork, Friedman reached out to community organizations mobilizing pop-up food shelves to find out what families were saying they needed the most. Common themes were shelf-stable foods and personal-care items.

"I asked around to several pop-ups and it seems these are the items that are needed across the board. Healthy, shelf-stable items were needed the most," she said. "And as people are donating more and more food, self-care items are becoming a need as well."

She knew others wanted to give, too. But some didn't have the time. Others didn't know what items were needed. Some didn't know where to donate to.

Friedman and a group of volunteers decided they could coordinate all of those things to make it easier for others to contribute to various pop-up food shelves that continue to be organized around town. She needed a place with groceries and personal-care items available for purchase where people could donate. At first, Friedman ran into hurdles finding a grocery partner.

"Some grocery stores I talked to only donated to a specific nonprofit," she said. "And you don't get a tax writeoff with these pop-up food shelves."

Grocery donation effort to areas hit by unrest spreads throughout metro

Friedman eventually found a partnership with the Cub Foods near her home.

"I thought that it was a great idea," said Vicky Brekke, store director at Cub Foods in Fridley. "Someone can come in and do their regular grocery shopping and pick up a bag and drop it off right away and it will get delivered. Once it caught on, people would just start picking them up."

The two worked together to find a way to make it easy to get food and supplies to areas that needed it.

How it works: Friedman and volunteers bag items containing things community organizations say are needed. One bag might have foods like cereal, tuna, pasta, peanut butter and jelly. Another might have personal-care items.

Their grocery bags are displayed at a table in the store and available for purchase. Customers can add the bags, priced around $10 to $20 depending on what's in them, to their carts and pay for them at the register along with their other groceries. There's a drop-off bin to place the donated grocery bags into before leaving the store.

Each week, Friedman and a group of volunteers pick up the bags and deliver them to the pop-up food bank that has been chosen for the week. The first week, enough money was raised to donate 100 grocery bags to Sanford Middle School. Food banks will change throughout the week, with ones such as Northside Emergency Resource Pop Up on the roster this past week.

Brekke said having volunteers bag and deliver the groceries is a huge help.

"We'll donate bags to organizations year-round," she said. "What makes it so much easier is that she's willing to pick it up and drop it off."

Brekke said word is spreading about the store's efforts. And this past week, other Cub Food stores across the metro began participating too. Donation bags are now set up at several Cub Foods throughout the Twin Cities area, including Stillwater, Maplewood, Lakeville, Blaine and Coon Rapids.

She said her store will continue to feature the donation display in the coming weeks.

"We'll have it up there for a while," Brekke said. "There are a lot of people in need right now and we have a lot of giving people that want to help."

MN small business relief grant winners selected from pool of 27,400 applicants Stress rises for unemployed as extra \$600 benefit nears end Twin Cities home values climb as inventory plummets, no shortage in demand due to COVID-19 3M files lawsuits to halt fraudulent sales, price gouging of N95 masks Ramsey County judge hears arguments alleging Gov. Walz's executive orders violate civil liberties

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

Minnesota Freedom Fund plans next steps with more than $30 million raised - and criticism pouring in

ARTICLE DCCXXXIV. MINNESOTA FREEDOM FUND PLANS NEXT STEPS WITH MORE THAN \$30 MILLION RAISED - AND CRITICISM POURING IN

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 816 words

Byline: Dane Mizutani

Highlight: In the span of a couple of days last month, the Minnesota Freedom Fund went from a fledgling local nonprofit to a viral sensation that has since eclipsed more than $30 million in donations. That outpouring of support came in response to George Floyd's death on Memorial Day and the massive protests that followed. While [...]

Body

In the span of a couple of days last month, the Minnesota Freedom Fund went from a fledgling local nonprofit to a viral sensation that has since eclipsed more than $30 million in donations.

That outpouring of support came in response to George Floyd's death on Memorial Day and the massive protests that followed.

While the movement started in the Twin Cities, and eventually reached an international stage, somewhere along the way the Minnesota Freedom Fund emerged as a worthy cause, raising so much money that it actually had to tell people to stop donating.

As the money started to roll in, with big-name celebrities like Justin Timberlake calling for donations, board member Jared Mollenkof recalls going through a full palette of emotions.

Thrilled. Overwhelmed. Terrified

"All of those things at once," Mollenkof said. "It was a huge responsibility to take on knowing that such a small organization was being entrusted by so many people with so much money."

In an effort to be transparent, the Minnesota Freedom Fund disclosed on Twitter earlier this week that it had spent well over $200,000 of the money raised, which immediately sparked criticism from people saying it wasn't nearly enough.

That overall reaction was reasonable, according to Mollenkof, who said he understands why so many people are calling for transparency right now. After all, the Minnesota Freedom Fund is a local nonprofit that had previously never broken $200,000 in annual donations.

Minnesota Freedom Fund plans next steps with more than $30 million raised - and criticism pouring in

"I completely get being afraid that this moment is going to be co-opted by people that don't have the interests of black activists at heart," Mollenkof said. "There are people that genuinely want to hold folks accountable in service to the movement and that doesn't bother me at all.

What does bother Mollenkof are the people pushing a more divisive rhetoric.

"I think the reality is that a number of right-wing organizations were involved in orchestrating some of the outrage and that's fairly obvious by looking at my (social media) mentions," Mollenkof said. "That's frustrating when people get distracted by folks that are not engaging in a good-faith conversation."

There was also misinformation spread on social media saying the board of directors comprised mostly white people. That information was outdated, according to Mollenkof, who added that four of seven current board members are people of color.

As for how the Minnesota Freedom Fund plans to handle the unprecedented number of donations, Mollenkof emphasized that it's going to take some time. While it has bailed out every protester it has become aware of over the past few weeks, it needs to continue to grow to make an even bigger impact down the road.

As recent as last month the local nonprofit - which was established in 2016 and pays bail bonds mostly for inmates booked on low-level charges - had one full-time employee and a part-time employee. It now has two full-time employees and one part-time employee on staff and is committed to widening its reach across the state.

There are already tangible signs of growth, according to Mollenkof, who said the Minnesota Freedom Fund has bailed out 50 people exactly in the past few weeks. For context, it bailed just shy of 130 people total from New Year's Day to Memorial Day.

"Just an enormous scaling up in the rate at which we are bailing people out," Mollenkof said. "We are continuing to pick up momentum, too, which is exciting for us."

That's largely due to the influx in donation, which Mollenkof still has a hard time contextualizing in the grand scheme of things. This wasn't a select group of billionaires that cut a bunch of large checks. This more than a million individual donors that wanted to make a difference.

"I think it was something like $46 for our average donation," Mollenkof said. "Just an incredible number of people wanting to do something in this moment and entrusting us to help them do that."

Demolition underway for new entrepreneur space at University and Dale in St. Paul Habitat for Humanity's ReStore reopens in New Brighton, Minneapolis In downtown St. Paul, a boutique hotel now houses 34 homeless parents and kids MN Gov. Walz allocates \$12M toward food shelves as demands increase amid pandemic Endowment will expand UMN professor's research on health and racial equality Maybe the biggest thing Mollenkof wants people to understand is that the local nonprofit was not created in response to the protests. The Minnesota Freedom Fund's ultimate goal has always been to abolish a "discriminatory, coercive and oppressive" system of cash-bail that disproportionately punishes low-income people.

Minnesota Freedom Fund plans next steps with more than $30 million raised - and criticism pouring in

"We wanted to bail out protesters and we let people know we were going to bail out every single protester (who) got arrested," Mollenkof said. "We were bailing people out before that, though, and we are going to keep bailing people out until the government abolishes this unjust practice."

Load-Date: July 18, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCCXXXV.

PUTTING THE PRO IN PROTEST

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 3CLength: 812 wordsByline: ANDREW KRAMMER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Vikings' Ifeadi Odenigbo is taking an active role in battling social injustice.Body

Ifeadi Odenigbo hopped into a car and told the driver to find a protest.

Odenigbo didn't wake up May 31 planning to march in Chicago, where the Vikings' fourth-year defensive end attended Northwestern, but he wanted to take action six days after George Floyd was killed while in Minneapolis police custody. Odenigbo quickly found himself in a crowd of strangers unaware that an NFL player was walking with them.

"I just quietly joined in and didn't say a word," he said. "Marched with them for a good 2 miles."

Speaking up is what Odenigbo, the first member of his Nigerian family born in the United States, encourages most in the fight against police brutality and social injustice.

"It was cool to see people of all skin colors," Odenigbo said. "To the people who weren't black, I said, 'Hey, thank you. This wouldn't be possible if it wasn't for you marching or protesting or speaking up.' I'm really grateful for that."

Odenigbo shared his experiences, why he believes education is a root for change and more in an interview for the Access Vikings podcast. This excerpt has been edited for length and clarity.

To listen to the full interview, go to startribune.com/sports.

Q: What led you to jump into that car?

A: You watch that footage and you see a man begging for his life. Asking for some pity. The fact that officer did not give him any type of pity. I'm pretty empathetic, but I think every black person watches that footage and says that could've been me. It's almost like a moral responsibility I have to do something. Hopped in an Uber and said, "Hey driver, I want to go protest." He was a cool Jamaican guy; he was like, "I'm with you, mon." He ended up dropping me off in the middle of downtown Chicago. Ten minutes later, by the grace of God, I was able to see a bunch of people protesting perfectly peacefully. Then I just quietly joined in and didn't say a word and marched with them for a good 2 miles.

Putting the pro in protest

Q: What was your emotion like seeing the video in Minneapolis?

A: It didn't really hit me hard like that, because I was almost thinking like, "Man, another black person dying in America." But I called my mom about it and when I was talking to my mom, I broke down and started crying. This man was calling for his mom. You take everything away from him. For a grown man to call for his mom and you still didn't let up? That was devil's work right there.

Q: How have you taken in the way protests have spread across race and nationalities?

A: The murder of George Floyd really opened everyone's eyes, like yo, this has been going on for a while and we just live in an era where we have cameras now. So now we have proof this is happening. The '90s, '80s, you have musicians that rap about it and talk about it and say this is what the police do, but nobody really believes you.

Q: You've said education can create change and you want to talk with Northwestern about solutions. How can that help?

A: I have a platform and I want to do whatever I can to try to educate people - the people who say they don't understand. Segregation wasn't just 150 years ago. The way people talk about segregation and racism and different bathrooms stalls as if it was 150 years ago, but your parents may remember when there were colored bathrooms, and that doesn't get talked about at all. How you can help is educating yourself, the history of why this has been happening. Once you have the education, you can be empathetic.

Q: How have your experiences shaped your perspective?

A: I was arrested when I was 18 years old in Chicago for hopping the turnstile. At the time, I was wrong. Not saying I wasn't wrong, but at the time they didn't accept credit cards so I needed $2.25 and I simply didn't have $2.25, and I hopped it. Usually a citation, but an undercover cop saw me, put me in handcuffs immediately, read me my rights and asked me if there was a warrant for my arrest. I had a Northwestern jacket and he's asking me, "Where did you steal this jacket from?" I remember just being mindblown by that stuff. I'm just an 18-year-old college kid who didn't have $2.25 on him.

Q: What about the NFL changing its rhetoric about protests during the national anthem?

A: It's the right steps, but I think they were kind of late. Obviously, my teammates like Eric Kendricks had to speak up and let the NFL know like, "You guys were late." We'll find out in the years to come how authentic it is. I did economics, and the thing you got to realize is people have incentives. Obviously from the NFL standpoint, they were getting a lot of heat so they had to speak up. We gave them no choice but to speak up.

Q: What else would you like to add?

A: People in privileged positions should speak up and have their voices be heard. As a minority, I can only say so much. We need the majority of people to speak up and put those people in check that are doing these racist things or forms of racism.

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

$30M raised, $250K spent by nonprofit

ARTICLE DCCXXXVI.

\$30M RAISED, \$250K SPENT BY NONPROFIT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1A

Length: 957 words

Byline: KELLY SMITH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

The Minnesota Freedom Fund became a viral sensation on social media, with celebrities and donors around the world giving $30 million to bail out protesters after George Floyd's death.

But the instant social media fame is also drawing Twitter attacks and strong scrutiny of the small Minneapolis nonprofit for so far spending only $250,000 of what it collected. That funded bail for 42 people in Hennepin and Ramsey county jails since May 28.

The nonprofit says it wasn't prepared to handle the unprecedented flood of donations, just adding a third paid employee last week in addition to an all-volunteer seven-member board. The leaders say they will continue to spend donations on bail for any other protesters as well as others who are incarcerated, such as in immigration cases.

"Folks are angry and upset and they rightfully should be and they rightfully should call for transparency," said board president Octavia Smith, adding that the nonprofit is "rapidly scaling up to meet the demand of our current environment."

Greg Lewin, one of the nonprofit's three paid staff and the former board president, said he was doxxed online Tuesday when his home address was shared on Twitter. But beyond the personal threat, he said, he wasn't surprised by the storm of criticism - some of which came from right-wing commenters and some from black civil rights activists.

"People should keep their rage. I'm very sympathetic to impatience," he said. "We'd like them to shout with us."

Hundreds of people were arrested protesting in Minneapolis after Floyd's death at the hands of police. But Lewin said an estimated 400 to 600 people were released without having to post cash bail while others were charged without being imprisoned. The nonprofit has to be notified by the person or their attorney about their case and has paid every request it has received, Lewin said.

$30M raised, $250K spent by nonprofit

Leaders of the small nonprofit, which aims to abolish cash-bail, vow to use the rest of the millions of dollars in donations to continue to pay bails, including planning its first-ever "mass liberation" of a jail by bailing out a large group of people. Smith said they could also use donations to back a campaign for policy change, such as lobbying at the Capitol to end the cash-bail system. The Minnesota Freedom Fund's position is that the "discriminatory, coercive and oppressive" system of cash-bail disproportionately punishes low-income people.

Besides Lewin, the nonprofit also hired staff to oversee communications and operations, and Lewin said they could hire more staff as the nonprofit grows. Usually, the Minnesota Freedom Fund receives about $150,000 a year in donations and grants.

"We've never broken $200,000, let alone $30 million," said Steve Boland, the board treasurer. "It's not that people are sitting in jail not being helped. We're being successful in getting them released without bail, which is great. That means that there are more resources used to help other people who are jailed for other things and to end the process of cash-bail in the first place."

The $250,000 the nonprofit has spent on bail in the past two weeks compares to the usual $1,000 a day the nonprofit typically paid in bail before the outcry over Floyd's death. It would cost $50 million to bail out everyone currently in the Hennepin County jail for any charges, Boland said.

Growing quickly

The Minnesota Freedom Fund has grown quickly since registering as a nonprofit just three years ago with all volunteers.

Criticism about the lack of transparency to donors is a reflection of the nonprofit not having a system in place to communicate to the more than 900,000 donors who contributed in the past two weeks, Boland said.

The Minnesota Freedom Fund didn't conduct an organizing campaign to seek donations and yet cash flooded in, boosted by celebrities such as Justin Timberlake and Steve Carell promoting it on Twitter. The average donation: $41.

The nonprofit received so many donations that it asked people to donate elsewhere, to other local nonprofits fighting for racial justice or rebuilding Minneapolis businesses that were burned and looted.

President Donald Trump and the Republican National Committee then criticized staffers on former Vice President Joe Biden's presidential campaign for donating to the Minnesota Freedom Fund, saying it was posting bail for people arrested for destroying the city.

In 2018, the nonprofit spent only about $15,000, according to the most recent tax forms filed publicly. But Boland said that's because most bail bonds are returned when the person makes their court date, and the funds can be recycled to spend helping someone else with bail. When asked if the small nonprofit needs $30 million, Lewin, a former research analyst, said, "We've got a lot of work to do."

Criticism on Twitter, however, expanded beyond an impatience for the nonprofit to spend donations.

Local civil rights attorney Nekima Levy Armstrong called the spending "unacceptable" on Twitter and added that "we literally have buildings burned down in North Minneapolis and Black businesses and families without essential resources." She also criticized the board for not having any black members.

$30M raised, $250K spent by nonprofit

Of seven board members, four are people of color, including Smith, who added that the nonprofit has historically had a majority of white leaders and is working to continue to increase diversity. She said that for safety reasons, the Minnesota Freedom Fund isn't posting names of its board publicly.

She also said the organization can't legally spend money on issues unrelated to its mission and bylaws.

Smith said those actions will "just take a little bit more time and they can't happen in the span of two weeks. But we are dedicated and committed to the work."

Kelly Smith · 612-673-4141

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

End of Document

City official admits communication was lacking

ARTICLE DCCXXXVII.

CITY OFFICIAL ADMITS COMMUNICATION WAS LACKING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 734 wordsByline: MIGUEL OTAROLA; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Mark Ruff, the city coordinator, cited multiple crises, vowed to restore trust.Body

The top staff in Minneapolis City Hall Tuesday apologized for what they described as a lack of communication following the killing of George Floyd last month, vowing to regain the trust of residents as they work to rebuild devastated areas of the city.

Leaders of the city's health, public works, housing and economic development departments shared the latest statistics in the aftermath of Floyd's death in police custody.

City Coordinator Mark Ruff said they were committed to racial equity as the city began to emerge from "multiple crises," including the coronavirus pandemic, the destruction of buildings and lack of shelter for a surfacing homeless population.

"We as staff know that we have lost some of your trust in the actions over the last three weeks, that we have not met your expectations in terms of response, that we have seen parts of our city that have been frankly impacted that will take years to recover from," Ruff said. "We will be here shoulder to shoulder with you to bring a better future for our city as soon as possible."

Ruff, who was chosen as the city coordinator in April after serving as its chief financial officer, said city departments could have communicated better over the past several months, adding that they sometimes stayed silent while they worked to certify information related to the pandemic and the tally of destruction across the city.

"We want to be 95% sure the information we're giving you is completely accurate. Until we have that certainty, we usually don't distribute information. In a time of crisis, that's not always possible. Sometimes, the silence was worse than having information that was 60% or 70% or 80% accurate."

He continued: "Hearing nothing is disturbing in a sense that there's not a functioning level of government."

Although the city's 911 emergency response was overwhelmed in the days following Floyd's death, the fire department is now "fully operational" and the police department is "at the ready," Ruff said. He recognized some may be hesitant to call the police but that people should "rely on reliable, licensed options for security."

City official admits communication was lacking

More than 1,000 buildings were reported by the city as having damage, many of them at or around the Lake Street corridor. Erik Hansen, the city's director of economic policy, said it was too early to get an accurate cost of the final damage, though previous estimates were at least $150 million.

Steve Poor, the city's director of development services, encouraged business owners to call their insurance companies before beginning to clean up and rebuild, and said a dedicated phone line to the city's zoning office would be posted on the city website Wednesday. Appraisers with the city assessor's office have also begun to reassess damaged properties.

Two affordable housing complexes built with city financing were damaged during the unrest, and another that was under construction was destroyed, said Andrea Brennan, the city's director of housing policy and development. Thirty-five households were displaced, she said, 21 of which were able to return after their homes were repaired.

The city's health department is also doing a "public health assessment" of two growing encampments in Powderhorn Park in south Minneapolis, Brennan said, where many homeless residents moved after they were evicted from a nearby hotel that had been turned into a makeshift shelter by volunteers.

The department leaders praised them and other residents who over the past month helped clean tons of debris and trash, set up food pantries and protect businesses across the city.

"I wept over it, seeing that we, the city, were bolstered by our volunteers," Public Works Director Robin Hutcherson said. "It was possible to feel a sense of inspiration."

Ruff acknowledged the past few weeks of unrest were "a result of structural racism within every institution," and that white leaders, including all the department heads at Tuesday's briefing, would need to stop being defensive in order to make meaningful change for people of color.

"We are all, as leaders, tired. We have spent not just the last three weeks but the last three months working 10- to 12-hour days," he said. "But we are keenly aware of those who work within the city and outside the city who say, 'We are tired from 30 years of living with structural racism. We are tired of being the ones to carry forward the message.' "

Miguel Otárola · 612-673-4753

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

ARTICLE DCCXXXVIII.

CORONAVIRUS WEDNESDAY UPDATE: 12 MORE MINNESOTA DEATHS AND 414 MORE CASES

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 576 wordsByline: Christopher MaganHighlight: Minnesota Department of Health officials say a delay in a private laboratory reporting led to Wednesday's record number of daily test results. Health Commissioner Jan Malcolm said the daily record of 19,442 test results reported Wednesday actually stretch back into tests completed late last week. Issues that led to the delayed reporting of results have [...]Body

Minnesota Department of Health officials say a delay in a private laboratory reporting led to Wednesday's record number of daily test results.

Health Commissioner Jan Malcolm said the daily record of 19,442 test results reported Wednesday actually stretch back into tests completed late last week. Issues that led to the delayed reporting of results have been remedied, she said.

The 414 new positive coronavirus cases reported in the results are roughly double the number of daily new cases reported this week. Malcolm says downward trends related to daily case numbers, hospitalizations and test positivity rates continue to hold true.

"It does look to us that the general pattern over the weekend and early this week did represent a continuation of the gradual decline in positive test results that we have been reporting," Malcolm said. "That pattern appears to be holding, at least to this point."

The state also continues to receive results from testing of residents who participated in demonstrations and other large gatherings after the Memorial Day death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police. Another 2,000 people were tested Tuesday at community testing sites in St. Paul and Minneapolis.

About 1 percent of participants in mass gathers have tested positive for the coronavirus, but all of the test results have not yet been returned. Despite the first protests being more than three weeks ago, health officials say they want to leave a relatively long window to gauge the impact.

"We want to be cautious in how we interpret what that means going forward," said Kris Ehresmann, director of the state Department of Health's infectious disease division.

Coronavirus Wednesday update: 12 more Minnesota deaths and 414 more cases

Mower County saw an 11 percent increase in positive cases, a rise of 73 infections for a new total of 733 coronavirus patients. Ehresmann said health officials will offer widespread community testing over the weekend to better understand why Mower County now has the second largest infection rate per capita in Minnesota.

Nobles County has the highest per capital rate in the state. The largest total number of infections remain in the Twin Cities metro's two most populous counties of Hennepin and Ramsey.

In addition to a backlog of test results, the state Department of Health reported another 12 deaths Wednesday caused by COVID-19. Those whose deaths were reported ranged in age from their 60s to more than 100 years old, and 10 were residents of long-term care.

There are 27,404 patients, more than 87 percent of all confirmed cases, who have recovered enough to no longer need to be isolated.

Hospitalizations are continuing to trend downward with 351 patients hospitalized and 181 of them in critical condition.

The test results reported Wednesday bring the statewide total to 448,587 samples screened since local testing began in March. The number of positive results also continues to trend downward with a 3.1 positivity rate Wednesday.

Correction: An earlier version of the "MN coronavirus hospitalizations, deaths, positive tests" chart had an inaccurate deaths trend line because of a data entry error.

M Health Fairview offers antibody tests for \$45 MN small business relief grant winners selected from pool of 27,400 applicants Stress rises for unemployed as extra \$600 benefit nears end As coronavirus regulation complaints stack up, officials warn bars and restaurants to enforce them Minnesota hospital group urges Gov. Tim Walz to require masks to slow COVID-19 spread

Load-Date: July 18, 2020

Don't overabbreviate the special session

ARTICLE DCCXXXIX.

DON'T OVERABBREVIATE THE SPECIAL SESSION

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 6ALength: 529 wordsHighlight: Deliberations need not drag on, but there are a variety of issues to tackle.Body

Minnesota is at the midpoint of what may be a one-week legislative special session if the Republican-controlled Senate has its way. It is time to consider whether enough work can be done in the remaining days to be considered successful, or to acknowledge that 201 adults with competing views and equal standing may need more time to accomplish anything meaningful.

This special session, unlike most, started with Gov. Tim Walz calling lawmakers back to St. Paul without the usual carefully negotiated set of agenda points and an agreed-upon end date. By Minnesota law, only the governor can declare a special session, but only the Legislature can end it. In this case, one half of that equation, the Senate, filled in the missing date, declaring that all work would be done within a week.

Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, in talking with an editorial writer, said that much of the work before them had been heard in regular session, such as bonding, but failed to make it over the finish line. Police reform had resurfaced after George Floyd's death in police custody, but Gazelka said Senate Republicans had adopted some proposals from the People of Color and Indigenous (POCI) Caucus, such as a ban on chokeholds and neck restraints, along with additional training and a requirement that use-of-force reports be filed to the state.

Walz, on the other hand, saw the aftermath of Floyd's death as a time to think bigger on police reform, to address long-festering inequities not just in criminal justice, but also in education, the economy and other aspects of society.

One vision leaves too little time to meet the demands of the moment. Underrepresented communities must be given a chance to be truly heard, to be part of forming the solution. The other vision is so vast that it must be given dimension and deadlines if it is to have any chance of being realized. Walz acknowledged as much on Wednesday, saying that "a deadline is not a bad thing."

There is obvious common ground here, and much of it has taken shape just recently. Both sides now are on record in favor of greater police accountability and some specifics. Though a gulf separates them on the amounts, both sides want a bonding bill. That is needed now more than ever given a pandemic-induced recession. It is too important an issue to get hung up on Walz's emergency powers, which governors in nearly every state are still using to deal with COVID-19.

Don't overabbreviate the special session

We urge Walz, Gazelka, House Speaker Melissa Hortman, the POCI Caucus and others to work together on legislation that takes a little from both, that is both pragmatic and innovative, attuned to what can be done soon, but goes beyond just the expected.

That will take longer than a week, but it shouldn't be open-ended. Consensus takes a little time and a little willingness. If the Senate passes bills but leaves no time to work out differences with the House, nothing meaningful will have been accomplished.

There is a chance in the special session to do something worthy on several important fronts, to respond in a meaningful way to events that have thrust this state onto the world stage for the worst possible reasons.

That is worth a little extra time.

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

ARTICLE DCCXL. HCMC'S BULLISH USE OF STEROID BACKED

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1161 wordsByline: JEREMY OLSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Promising U.K. study results could increase drug usageBody

A British trial showing that a common steroid could reduce deaths in severe COVID-19 cases by one-third was good news for Minnesota physicians who have been battling the infectious disease without a vaccine or proven treatment - and even better news for intensivists at Hennepin County Medical Center.

They have been using the drug for treatment of severe COVID-19 cases almost from the start of the pandemic, despite discouragement from national medical societies.

"This is helpful because it kind of supports what our practice has been," said Dr. James Leatherman, director of HCMC's medical ICU.

The debate over dexamethasone for treatment of severe COVID-19 cases - patients needing ventilation and suffering from acute respiratory distress syndrome (ARDS) - might have been overshadowed by the political fervor over whether to use hydroxychloroquine to treat the disease. But doctors are split over whether the risks of this steroid outweighed the benefits.

Leatherman said most of the 80 patients with COVID-19 and ARDS at his ICU received dexamethasone. Three weeks ago, the hospital also started offering it to COVID-19 patients outside of the ICU to prevent the onset of ARDS that can increase death risks.

"Since we are not randomizing patients, I can't say what would happen if we didn't use it, but it's been our impression that a number of patients seem to improve after we initiate the treatment with these steroids," said Leatherman, though some severely ill patients still died.

Across town at Abbott Northwestern Hospital in Minneapolis, doctors resolved to wait for clinical trial results before using a steroid that had the potential to boost the novel coronavirus that causes COVID-19. Studies of the drug's use in the SARS and MERS viral epidemics suggested it had this effect.

Preliminary results of the Recovery trial led by the University of Oxford suggest a strong benefit. The researchers issued a news release Tuesday showing that the drug reduced mortality by one-third in COVID-19 patients placed on ventilators and by one-fifth in patients receiving supplemental oxygen without ventilation.

The drug offered no benefit to patients who didn't need respiratory support. The study was based on 6,400 patients - with one-third randomly selected to receive the steroid and two-thirds receiving standard care.

"COVID-19 is a global disease - it is fantastic that the first treatment demonstrated to reduce mortality is one that is instantly available and affordable worldwide," said Martin Landray, a leader of the trial and an Oxford population health professor.

In Minnesota, COVID-19 has been diagnosed through testing in 30,882 patients and caused 1,313 deaths.

Growth in cases has been ebbing, but state health officials are watching for upticks in cases and hospitalizations this week. Protests following the May 25 killing of George Floyd in police custody could have spread the virus.

Any effect from those demonstrations should appear this week, said Kris Ehresmann, state infectious disease director, but increased mobility following the relaxation of state restrictions in June could increase virus transmission as well. That effect might not show up for two weeks.

A state health analysis of the first 2,428 people hospitalized in Minnesota for COVID-19 showed that 666 needed intensive care, 365 needed ventilation, and 335 died in hospitals.

The results of the steroid trial fit the evolving narrative of COVID-19, said Dr. Timothy Schacker, vice dean for research at the University of Minnesota's School of Medicine. Dexamethasone doesn't appear to help in the early stage of COVID-19 when the virus is spreading and symptoms are emerging, but he said it could play a lifesaving role in the next phase when the immune system overreacts and exacerbates breathing problems in some patients.

"Most of the damage being done late stage is all about inflammation and an overzealous immune response," Schacker said. "Dexamethasone suppresses that."

Schacker said he wouldn't endorse the drug for Minnesota patients until the full study results are published. The release of preliminary data before it's published is rare in medicine but more common amid the race to find treatments for COVID-19.

Schacker called dexamethasone a "blunt hammer that just sort of shuts everything down" and said more targeted immune system therapies might end up working as well.

The U has been studying a cancer drug, tocilizumab, that blocks an inflammatory protein called IL-6. Patients with COVID-19 are screened for IL-6 levels to determine if that drug might help prevent immune system overreactions.

Infectious disease experts at Abbott met Tuesday and discussed the findings by respected British researchers but didn't see enough proof yet to prescribe dexamethasone.

"These are fine investigators, but we have squat for information," said Dr. Frank Rhame, a virologist at Abbott.

HCMC's bullish use of steroid backed

The Infectious Disease Society of America discourages corticosteroids for COVID-19 patients with pneumonia and encourages their use for patients with COVID-19 and ARDS in clinical trials only. The Society of Critical Care Medicine issued only a weak recommendation for steroids in treatment of COVID-19 with ARDS.

Research is finding niches for drugs to treat COVID-19. A U.S. trial validated treatment of COVID-19 with an antiviral drug, remdesivir, which appears most effective in patients who are hospitalized but whose infections haven't resulted in the need for ventilation.

Studies have found no benefit of hydroxychloroquine. The U will soon publish findings on whether the drug treats early symptoms, but the Food and Drug Administration on Monday revoked its emergency use authorization as a treatment for COVID-19.

Leatherman said other hospitals are using dexamethasone aggressively for COVID-19, and that the decision to offer it earlier to patients, before they developed ARDS and needed ventilation, was based on success at the Henry Ford Hospital in Detroit.

Leatherman is awaiting the final published results of the British study as well, but said the preliminary data suggests even broader use of the drug.

"The problem with COVID has been that it has exploded on us so fast," he said. "Ideally, we always want to operate on best evidence, which usually means randomized trials. But people have had to make decisions with empirical data. If this [benefit] turns out in fact to be true, it's very helpful."

Jeremy Olson · 612-673-7744

TRACKING CORONAVIRUS

Minnesota cases, daily change*

30,882 -- Total cases

197 -- June 16 new cases

*Chart data is a net count of new confirmed cases minus previously announced cases that were removed by MDH on that date.

Minnesota deaths, new daily

1,313 -- Total deaths

9 -- June 16

U.S. cases, new daily

2,124,082 -- Total cases

20,092 -- June 15

U.S. deaths, new daily

116,210 -- Total deaths

HCMC's bullish use of steroid backed

448 -- June 15

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete charts.)

Sources: New York Times, Minnesota Dept. of Health

Note: U.S. data lags a day behind Minnesota

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCCXLI. MINNESOTA FIRMS MAKE JUNETEENTH A HOLIDAY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 557 wordsByline: NICOLE NORFLEET; KAVITA KUMAR; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Target, Best Buy, U.S. Bank join celebration that marks the end of slaveryBody

Minnesota-based companies Target Corp., Best Buy and U.S. Bank have moved to establish Juneteenth, the June 19 celebration of the emancipation of African-Americans from slavery, as an official company holiday as more businesses continue to adjust their internal policies in the wake of widespread streets protests on racial equity.

While all Target stores and distribution centers will remain open on Friday, full-time hourly team members will have the option to take the day off with full pay. Hourly employees who decide to work that day will be paid time and a half. The Minneapolis headquarters offices will be closed in observance.

"We recognize that the racial trauma the country is experiencing now is not new, but throughout recent weeks there has been a sense that this time is, and has to be, different," said Brian Cornell, Target's chairman and chief executive, in a statement. "Juneteenth takes on additional significance in this moment."

Best Buy, which began to reopen stores to walk-in traffic this week, will give all employees a paid volunteer day that can be used Friday or any remaining day this year. The stores will remain open Friday. Next year, Juneteenth will become a formal, paid company holiday.

"We do this with the sincere hope that any employee who chooses to use this time as one of reflection, speech, protest or community service will be able to without worry or cost to them," the company said on its corporate blog.

In its announcement, Best Buy leadership also said for the first time ever, the company will shorten hours of operation on Election Day, Nov. 3.

U.S. Bank said it will close its offices and branches early at 1 p.m. on Friday in recognition of Juneteenth. The nation's fifth-largest bank, it has more than 2,700 branches in 26 states.

Minnesota firms make Juneteenth a holiday

"The events of the past few weeks have changed the conversation and added a sense of urgency that has motivated more people across the globe to act to address social injustice," Andy Cecere, U.S. Bank CEO, said in a statement. "We are encouraging our employees to use this time to serve in our communities, commit to inclusion and advocacy, or simply educate themselves on this very important topic."

National push

There has been a national push to make Juneteenth a federal holiday, a campaign that has intensified in the wake of the case of George Floyd who died in the custody of Minneapolis police last month and ignited global demonstrations on equality and police brutality. Target, Best Buy and U.S. Bank join several other companies that have announced the move to recognize Juneteenth as a company holiday, including Twitter, Nike and Minneapolis-based employee scheduling software company When I Work.

The holiday (a mash-up of the words June and 19th) celebrates June 19, 1865, when Union Maj. Gen. Gordon Granger informed slaves in Galveston, Texas, that the Civil War had ended and they were free.

Minneapolis has been home to one of the largest Juneteenth celebrations in the country.

At Target, Juneteenth is now observed in addition to six other paid holidays. Target stores are closed on Easter and Christmas Day and for a portion of the day on Thanksgiving. The Juneteenth announcement follows Target's pledge of $10 million to social justice organizations, as well as community rebuilding efforts.

Nicole Norfleet · 612-673-4495

Kavita Kumar · 612-673-4113

Load-Date: June 17, 2020

Pandemic, civil unrest, recession, election year ... can Minnesota government rise to the occasion?

ARTICLE DCCXLII. PANDEMIC, CIVIL UNREST, RECESSION, ELECTION YEAR ... CAN MINNESOTA GOVERNMENT RISE TO THE OCCASION?

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 666 words

Byline: Dave Orrick

Highlight: Here's a quick summary of progress on the big issues before the Legislature in this week's special session.

Body

Under an unprecedented crush of circumstances stressing the fabric of society, the economy and government, Minnesota's elected lawmakers returned to St. Paul this week.

And promptly drew political lines in the sand, pointing fingers in predictable partisan directions.

It is, after all, an election year. Every seat in the state House and Senate will be on the ballot in November, as will a president who has inspired polarization like few others.

Yet, an undercurrent of bipartisanship exists for the big issues now before the Legislature in its special session: responding to the coronavirus pandemic, reforming police departments in the wake of the killing of George Floyd, and a public works and infrastructure spending plan that members of both parties see as necessary and a potential shot in the arm to a struggling economy.

Whether common ground will be found, whether it could be found in days, or whether, if it's not found in days, they'll give up and go home all remained unclear Tuesday as Gov. Tim Walz implored: "I think the next three days are really critical ... to the psychology of Minnesota, that we can solve problems together."

Republicans have set a Friday deadline to get the work done or leave. Walz could always call them back.

Here's a quick summary - based on the priorities Walz articulated when he called the lawmakers back into session last week.

POLICE REFORM

On Tuesday, Senate Republicans, who hold the majority in that chamber, pushed ahead with several changes to law enforcement statutes that Democrats derided as weak and not getting at the core of the problem of police killing unarmed black men.

The Republican-backed proposals seek to ban chokeholds in nearly all situations, increase mental health training for officers and strengthen requirements for cops to step in if they see a fellow officer using excessive force. Democrats, meanwhile, who control the House, are pushing a suite of bills that range from creating new crimes for officers who use excessive force to allowing municipalities to reinstate residency requirements for cops.

Pandemic, civil unrest, recession, election year ... can Minnesota government rise to the occasion?

Whether Democrats will settle for less, and whether Republicans will entertain more, remains to be seen. Debate continued into Tuesday evening. It's possible nothing could ultimately reach Walz's desk.

LOOTING DAMAGE

As of Tuesday, there was no formal proposal for how to help businesses that were damaged in the violence that erupted from some protests following Floyd's death. Walz said he's angling for a funding mechanism that is likely to face skepticism from Republicans, who note that the recession has turned the state's projected \$1.5 billion budget surplus into a projected \$2.4 billion deficit.

COVID-19 FUNDING

The Senate moved ahead with a bill that guides how more than \$841 million in federal coronavirus response can be spent. While there was wide bipartisan support in the Senate on Tuesday, there's some disagreement in how the money is doled out, especially when it comes to how it affects local governments. Also, Walz wants assistance for renters, arguing it should be part of an economic stimulus package. Its future was uncertain Tuesday.

BONDING BILL

Walz has proposed a record $2.6 billion borrowing-and-spending plan to repair aging infrastructure, from sewers to National Guard armories, while Senate Republicans have set a $1.3 billion ceiling. Bipartisanship, even in the Democratic-controlled House, is needed. There's widespread bipartisan support for such a plan, but it remains unclear whether lawmakers will be able to overcome the differences over the dollar amounts.

Gov. Walz predicts bonding deal and says face mask mandate still possible Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis' \$1.35 billion bonding bill, tax cuts advance at Minnesota Capitol What would \$1.8B bonding bill cover? \$52M for Third St/Kellogg Bridge, \$55 for bus rapid transit lines, more Legislative leaders agree to \$1.8 billion infrastructure deal, but minority parties could block it

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

Shooting in north Mpls. wounds man and leads to standoff; suspect escapes

ARTICLE DCCXLIII. SHOOTING IN NORTH MPLS. WOUNDS MAN AND LEADS TO STANDOFF; SUSPECT ESCAPES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1B

Length: 255 words

Byline: PAUL WALSH; LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

One person was shot Tuesday morning before a standoff with officers at a north Minneapolis apartment building that stretched into the afternoon until authorities realized the suspect had eluded capture, police said.

SWAT teams and negotiators were at the building on the northwest corner of Broadway and Irving avenues shortly after gunfire was reported about 8:45 a.m.

Many onlookers, angry with police in the wake of George Floyd's death while under arrest on May 25, were agitated but remained peaceful.

Around 1:40 p.m., police realized the suspect had fled and remains at large, said department spokesman John Elder.

"We know who he is," Elder said. "We will arrest him."

A man also inside the building at the time was suffering a medical episode and was assisted out by emergency personnel, Elder said.

The victim of the gunfire was taken to a hospital in critical condition around 9 a.m., Elder said.

Elder added that the victim, who is expected to survive, was not hit by gunfire from law enforcement.

Authorities have not disclosed the circumstances of the standoff or the shooting. Identities of those involved have yet to be released.

The victim was described by medical responders as a man in his mid-20s with a gunshot wound to the upper right chest, according to emergency dispatch audio.

He was "alert and oriented" just before being taken to North Memorial Health Hospital, one of the responders reported to dispatch.

Shooting in north Mpls. wounds man and leads to standoff; suspect escapes

Staff photographer Anthony Soufflé contributed to this report.

Paul Walsh · 612-968-2483

Libor Jany · 612-673-4064

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

End of Document

UPLIFTING ON LAKE STREET

ARTICLE DCCXLIV.

UPLIFTING ON LAKE STREET

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 17, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 777 wordsByline: JEAN HOPFENSBERGER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: A Minneapolis nonprofit pivots from food relief to business stipends and moreBody

Olivia Rodriguez spent the week sweeping up the shattered remnants of the car audio systems that she sold in her small Lake Street store before it was ransacked in the violence following George Floyd's death at the hands of police.

She didn't know it yet, but she and her neighboring small-business owners on Lake Street were in for a much-needed surprise.

In the weeks ahead, about 140 businesses are expected to receive stipends of several thousand dollars to help replenish inventory, repair broken glass and rebuild under a new project of Urban Ventures, a nonprofit supporting children and families in south Minneapolis.

Many businesses also will be cranking out gift cards and gift certificates, which will be purchased by Urban Ventures and donated to the community to spark reinvestment and jobs in the neighborhood.

"We want to help those businesses that didn't burn to the ground, and we want to do it fast," said Urban Ventures CEO Dave Hawn. "We can do that right now, while other [larger] business programs work through their requirements."

Fast financial aid would definitely be a boost, said Rodriguez.

"We lost about $25,000 in merchandise," said the owner of El Rey Car Audio. "If I had more money, I would buy more merchandise, a computer, a security camera. It would be a big help."

As charities and faith groups have rushed to provide emergency food relief for Lake Street-area residents whose grocery stores were shuttered during the protests, Urban Ventures is among the organizations able to now pivot to a second relief phase aimed at the future.

Thanks to a wide network of business, religious and individual supporters, and a recent $800,000 anonymous donation, the south Minneapolis nonprofit next hopes to feed the finances of its business neighbors.

UPLIFTING ON LAKE STREET

Its emergency grocery donations and giveaways will continue until at least the end of the month, said Hawn. The Minnesota Timberwolves organization, for example, was on hand Tuesday with thousands of boxes of donated food and household supplies. Megachurches such as Eagle Brook, which brought a semitrailer of goods about two weeks ago, is launching a similar donation Wednesday, Hawn said.

But helping neighborhood grocery stores and other essential services reopen is a critical part of the food equation, said Hawn. Offering free gift cards to purchase locally is a win-win situation, he said.

"Giving away free stuff is great in a crisis," said Hawn. "But we need to get these small grocery stores, markets and restaurants back open."

Cash jump-start needed

Urban Ventures, in a typical summer, offers academic support for neighborhood students, music lessons, athletics and other services to support families. Much of that is now online because of health restrictions related to COVID-19. Instead, for the past month its gymnasium has been converted into an enormous food and household goods center, with thousands of residents walking or driving over to retrieve them.

More recently, staff have been taking an inventory of their business neighbors to learn what they need to rebuild. The overwhelming conclusion: They needed cash to jump-start.

That cash suddenly became available when two anonymous donors, a local businessman and his father, offered $800,000 for direct aid, said Hawn. Those funds soon will be directed to businesses on Lake Street between Portland Avenue and Interstate 35W.

A walk down Lake Street shows a dire need. Most storefronts near Urban Ventures, located near 4th Avenue and Lake Street, remain boarded up. A few have opened back entrances, such as the Lake Plaza mall, which offers Latin American and East African wares.

Rodriguez was among several store owners at the mall cleaning up the shards of her livelihood. She said she's been helped by Urban Ventures ever since she first began cleaning up the place, first with free meals as she sorted through the mess and next with information on how to apply for programs that could help her rebuild.

"We had insurance, but it didn't cover robbery or vandalism," Rodriguez sighed. "In two hours, they destroyed what took us 10 years to build."

Nearby, Sahra Jama took a break with her daughter in an empty stall of her Diriye Store that once held carpets, curtains, blankets and other home decor items from Africa and the Middle East. They had repainted a section of the walls, added some shelves. But they were still grappling with $40,000 in lost or damaged merchandise.

Such scenes are repeated over and over in the Lake Street area, said Hawn. He wants to focus on long-term economic recovery, adding, "Recovery is not just as bricks and mortar, but as recovering the whole community."

Jean Hopfensperger · 612-673-4511

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

UPLIFTING ON LAKE STREET

End of Document

ARTICLE DCCXLV. A UNION OF NECESSITY, AS WORLD WATCHES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 18, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1330 wordsByline: STEPHEN MONTEMAYOR; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Keith Ellison and Mike Freeman go back nearly three decades - sparring in courtrooms, praising each other at inaugural ceremonies and examining together how police killings are handled in Minnesota.

Now, two of the state's biggest legal personalities are again reunited to confront a legal quagmire that could either gild or tarnish their careers: the prosecution of four former Minneapolis police officers involved in the May 25 killing of George Floyd.

For Ellison, the state's first black and Muslim attorney general, it has also required defending a partnership with a white male prosecutor who lost the trust of many people of color.

"I would hope that if people want us to do something that really has not been done yet, which is to convict a police officer of second-degree murder, that people would not try to prescribe how I do it and who I do it with," Ellison said in an interview last week. "We're trying to come up with justice for George Floyd, and for anyone to say you've got to do it this way and only with these people seems to me kind of unfair."

Freeman declined to comment for this article. He has not spoken publicly since May 31, when Ellison took the lead in prosecuting former Minneapolis police officers Derek Chauvin, J. Alexander Kueng, Tou Thao and Thomas Lane. Instead, the former two-time gubernatorial candidate and longtime Hennepin County prosecutor has been silent. Ellison, meanwhile, has become the public face of the prosecution, participating in a battery of national news interviews since the case began.

At the outset, theirs has been a union of necessity: Freeman leads the state's biggest criminal prosecution unit and last year won the only murder conviction against a Minnesota police officer: Mohamed Noor, who fatally shot Justine Ruszczyk Damond in Minneapolis three years ago.

Ellison, who has a deep history in civil rights activism, enjoys a trust from Minnesota's black community that Freeman cannot claim.

"They both need each other and, quite frankly, I think that justice requires it in the context of their partnership and working this case together," said Ramsey County Attorney John Choi, who was the first to charge a Minnesota officer in the death of a civilian when he unsuccessfully prosecuted former St. Anthony Police Officer Jeronimo Yanez in the 2016 killing of Philando Castile in Falcon Heights.

A UNION OF NECESSITY, AS WORLD WATCHES

Gov. Tim Walz said he asked Ellison to take over the case upon the urging of Floyd's family. Ellison faces continuing calls to elevate the murder charges against Chauvin to first degree, which would require proof of premeditation. His partnership with Freeman could also fray Ellison's support among the same civil rights activists with whom Ellison has marched for decades.

"When you start off praising Mike Freeman, then where is our justice going to come from?" said Spike Moss, a longtime Minneapolis civil rights activist, who said Ellison surprised him in May when he brought Freeman to a meeting that Moss helped arrange with the Rev. Jesse Jackson.

Activists like Moss point out that Noor - the only police officer convicted by Freeman's office - was a black man who shot a white woman. Many took issue with what they described as Freeman's boastful tone while highlighting that case when he announced the initial charges against Chauvin: third-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter.

More than 20 years ago, Moss led a protest after a black 16-year-old Minneapolis boy was shot by police and charged with threatening the officers with a pellet gun. Ellison represented the boy and rejected a plea deal before Freeman agreed to drop charges. At the rally, Ellison told a Star Tribune reporter that "police brutality ... won't change unless we're willing to do something about it."

In 2015, then a congressman, Ellison flew back to Minneapolis to huddle with protesters enraged at the Minneapolis police killing of Jamar Clark. The case prompted an 18-day encampment at the city's Fourth Precinct police station. Freeman declined to file charges in that case, citing evidence that the officers involved feared for their lives during a struggle over a gun. Ellison met with Freeman and urged him to stop using secretive grand juries to make charging decisions in police killings. Freeman has since made those calls himself.

Clark's death was among the many deadly police encounters that weighed on Ellison's mind as he and Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington convened a working group on the subject last year. Freeman spoke at several public forums and voiced support for giving Ellison's office authority to lead all of the state's prosecutions of officers charged with killing civilians.

Earlier this month, the Minnesota County Attorneys Association formally agreed to recommend legislation that would require such cases to be investigated by Ellison's office. Washington County Attorney Pete Orput said the decision followed a "very, very long and intense discussion."

Orput gave up jurisdiction in a recent manslaughter case against a sheriff's deputy in his county to avoid accusations of a conflict of interest. He supports this being standard practice for all police-involved homicides.

"Because there's some cynicism out there, and I'm not sure it's not unwarranted," Orput said.

Ellison has a long record of trying cases, but all of that has come as a defense attorney. He said in an interview that he "probably" won't personally try the four former Minneapolis officers charged in the death of Floyd. Either way, longtime prosecutors and former attorneys general still say his work on approaching cases from the defense's perspective could serve him well.

A UNION OF NECESSITY, AS WORLD WATCHES

"The interesting thing in this is that ... the facts involved in this matter are known - they're on videotape, for crying out loud," said Mike Hatch, a former Minnesota attorney general. "So it's not going to be a great deal of investigation going on to find out what happened. What it's going to be is a great deal of legal issues that crop up - everything from a change of venue to the difference between second- and third-degree [murder]."

Freeman, 72, is not expected to seek re-election in 2022. He faced swift pressure to charge all four officers in the case after a bystander's video went viral, showing Chauvin kneeling on Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes as he pleaded that he couldn't breathe.

Freeman's public comments around the initial charges he filed against Chauvin failed to stem the growing unrest over Floyd's death. The first criminal complaint was seen as hastily assembled. Critics noted that it misspelled Floyd's name twice and that it seemed to provide more of an argument against prosecution than in support of charges.

"The charges didn't fit the crime at all, and any intelligent judge would've dismissed it," said Joe Friedberg, a veteran Minneapolis defense attorney.

Two days after Chauvin's arrest, Freeman asked Ellison for help and sent out a news release saying the two would jointly be working the case. But the governor caught Freeman off guard later that evening by publicly declaring that it was his call to tap Ellison to take the lead.

It threatened to implode the partnership before it could begin. But the men quickly agreed to work together on what soon became a crucial chapter in the case.

"We just talked a lot, shared ideas, listened to each other, and we got there," Ellison said.

Less than 48 hours later, Chauvin faced tougher charges of second-degree unintentional murder and the three other former Minneapolis police officers involved in Floyd's death were jailed and accused of aiding and abetting.

With Freeman standing quietly by his side in front of a room full of national and local press, Ellison reminded all that he would do the talking in this case.

"We have one goal and one goal only: justice for George Floyd," Ellison said.

As the attorney general opened the news conference up for questions, Freeman left the room without explanation.

Stephen Montemayor · 612-673-1755

Twitter: @smontemayor

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

ARTICLE DCCXLVI.

STATE LICENSING BOARD TO REVIEW FLOYD KILLING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 18, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 280 wordsByline: GREG STANLEY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: POST Board has the power to revoke the four former Mpls. cops' licenses.Body

The Minnesota Board of Peace Officer Standards and Training (POST) said in a court filing Tuesday that it will review the circumstances surrounding the killing of George Floyd.

The POST Board, which licenses and sets training standards for all officers in the state, is required to review all misconduct complaints against licensed police officers. If the complaint is ruled justified the board can revoke any officer's license.

While all four officers who have been charged in the killing of Floyd were fired from the Minneapolis Police Department, they are still licensed Minnesota peace officers.

The POST Board has asked the court for copies of the criminal complaints against former officer Derek Chauvin, who is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter, as well as the complaints against former officers Tou Thao, Thomas Lane and J. Alexander Kueng, who are all charged with aiding and abetting second-degree murder.

As witness videos of Floyd's killing in police custody were seen by millions and sparked protests around the world, the POST Board released a statement saying that Chauvin's actions do not reflect any training that officers receive.

"The video is troubling and disturbing and it is the Board's position that sanctity of life must be the guiding principle for all law enforcement officers," the statement said.

Due to the "extraordinary global interest" in the cases of the four former officers, the court also issued an order Tuesday to create a web page where all public documents in each of the four cases will be uploaded. The site is at mncourts.gov/media/StateofMinnesotavDerekChauvin.aspx.

Greg Stanley · 612-673-4882

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

State licensing board to review Floyd killing

End of Document

Prosecutors: Derek Chauvin had his knee on George Floyd's neck for 7:46, not 8:46, but case unaffected

ARTICLE DCCXLVII. PROSECUTORS: DEREK CHAUVIN HAD HIS KNEE ON GEORGE FLOYD'S NECK FOR 7:46, NOT 8:46, BUT CASE UNAFFECTED

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 18, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 750 words

Byline: Amy Forliti

Highlight: MINNEAPOLIS (AP) - Minnesota prosecutors acknowledged Wednesday that a Minneapolis police officer had his knee on the neck of George Floyd for 7 minutes, 46 seconds - not the 8:46 that has become a symbol of police brutality - but said the one-minute error would have no impact on the criminal case against four officers.

Body

Minnesota prosecutors acknowledged Wednesday that a Minneapolis police officer had his knee on the neck of George Floyd for 7 minutes, 46 seconds - not the 8:46 that has become a symbol of police brutality - but said the one-minute error would have no impact on the criminal case against four officers.

The initial May 29 complaint alleges Derek Chauvin "had his knee on Mr. Floyd's neck for 8 minutes and 46 seconds in total. Two minutes and 53 seconds of this was after Mr. Floyd was non-responsive." But timestamps cited in the document's description of the incident, much of which is caught on video, showed Chauvin had his knee on Floyd for 7 minutes, 46 seconds, including 1 minute, 53 seconds after Floyd appeared to stop breathing.

"These kinds of technical matters can be handled in future amendments to the criminal complaint if other reasons make it necessary to amend the complaint between now and any trials," Hennepin County Attorney Mike Freeman's office said in a statement. "The one minute error made no difference in the decision to charge nor in the continuing legal hearings."

The office had no further comment.

The Associated Press began asking about the error the day after the initial charges were filed, and continued to inquire about it after Minnesota Attorney General Keith Ellison became the lead prosecutor on the case. Prosecutors repeatedly declined to address the discrepancy, even as the time frame of 8:46 began being used by protesters worldwide.

Prosecutors repeated their timeline and the 8 minutes, 46 seconds detail on June 3 when they added a more serious murder charge against Chauvin and announced charges against the other three officers. The AP published a story about the issue June 4, and at the time John Stiles, a spokesman for Ellison's office, said prosecutors were continuing to review new evidence.

Prosecutors: Derek Chauvin had his knee on George Floyd's neck for 7:46, not 8:46, but case unaffected

Stiles had no additional comment Wednesday.

Floyd, a black man who was handcuffed, died May 25 after Chauvin, a white officer, used his knee to pin Floyd to the ground. Chauvin, who kept his knee on Floyd's neck even after he said he couldn't breathe and stopped moving, has been charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and manslaughter.

The other officers, J. Kueng, Thomas Lane and Tou Thao, have all been charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and manslaughter. All four officers were fired. If convicted, they potentially face the same penalty as Chauvin: up to 40 years in prison.

It was not immediately clear whether the criminal complaints would be amended. In this case, one minute is unlikely to have a major legal significance.

But in the days after Chauvin's initial charges, outraged protesters, politicians and mourners seized on 8:46 as a quiet way to honor Floyd at a time of angry and sometimes violent clashes with police. It also became a symbol of the suffering Floyd - and many other black men - have experienced at the hands of police.

"A one-minute difference is not significant in the grand scheme of things," said Nekima Levy Armstrong, a civil rights activist and former head of the Minneapolis NAACP. "The bottom line is, it was more than enough time for Derek Chauvin to know that he was literally choking the life out of George Floyd."

When someone takes a moment of silence for 7:46, or 8:46, you realize just how much time that is, Levy Armstrong said.

"It was more than enough time for any rational, compassionate and professional human being to know that their actions were deadly and unconscionable," she said.

Earlier this month, in Boston and Tacoma, Washington, demonstrators staged "die-ins" for precisely 8 minutes, 46 seconds. In Washington, Democratic senators gathered in the U.S. Capitol's Emancipation Hall for the nearly nine minutes of silence. Mourners at a memorial service for Floyd in Minneapolis stood in silence for 8 minutes, 46 seconds, after the Rev. Al Sharpton asked them to "think about what George was going through, laying there for those eight minutes, begging for his life."

"We can't let this go," he said at the memorial. "We can't keep living like this." House committee advances bill to assist Twin Cities businesses damaged in George Floyd unrest Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis' Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect Wisconsin duo wants stiffer penalties for wrecking statues St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting

Load-Date: July 19, 2020

Prosecutor corrects restraint time: 7:46

ARTICLE DCCXLVIII.

PROSECUTOR CORRECTS RESTRAINT TIME: 7:46

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 18, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 7ALength: 694 wordsByline: PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The length of time prosecutors said a Minneapolis police officer planted his knee into George Floyd's neck - 8 minutes and 46 seconds - has become a rallying cry for those seeking justice across the country.

The symbolism of 8:46 has been held up and embraced throughout the country in ways big and small. It has echoed in sanctuaries where Floyd has been memorialized, is starkly displayed on T-shirts and street art and is the length of moments of silence in Floyd's name.

But now, nearly three weeks after those charges were filed with 8:46 emphasized, the Hennepin County Attorney's Office on Wednesday acknowledged that the length of time is off by one minute. Now-fired officer Derek Chauvin had Floyd pinned to the pavement for 7 minutes and 46 seconds.

The publicized 8:46 comes down to a math error in the complaints signed by Matthew Frank, the assistant attorney general under Keith Ellison, who is heading the prosecution of the former officers. As of now, the County Attorney's Office has no plans to change any of the complaints.

"These kinds of technical matters can be handled in future amendments to the criminal complaint if other reasons make it necessary to amend the complaint between now and any trials," said office spokesman Chuck Laszewski.

Laszewski also made it clear that "the one-minute error made no difference in the decision to charge nor in the continuing legal hearings."

The complaints say that Chauvin "pulled Mr. Floyd out of the passenger side of the squad car at 8:19:38 p.m., and Mr. Floyd went to the ground face down and still handcuffed. ... The defendant placed his left knee in the area of Mr. Floyd's head and neck."

Later, the complaint read, "At 8:27:24, the defendant removed his knee from Mr. Floyd's neck."

The discrepancy was brought to the attention of the Star Tribune after a Seattle Times inquiry. A reporter first asked the County Attorney's Office about the time conflict on June 3, five days after the charges were filed.

Prosecutor corrects restraint time: 7:46

"There is way too much stuff going on for anyone to look into this," Laszewski said at the time. "Ultimately, as this case moves along, if there is a discrepancy, it will have to be dealt with."

Star Tribune inquiries continued until the error was acknowledged Wednesday. Laszewski declined to say why the office took so long to confirm the error.

Eric Nelson, Chauvin's attorney, declined to comment.

Earl Gray represents Thomas Lane, who was pinning Floyd's legs. Gray was unaware of the incorrect calculation but doesn't believe it changes the cases as they go forward for his client or the others.

"Who signs the criminal complaint isn't the person who testifies," Gray said.

Still, the change in time is unlikely to affect the widespread impact of 8:46.

It's the title of a Netflix commentary on police brutality by comedian Dave Chappelle that has been viewed by millions. From Boston to Tacoma, Wash., demonstrators held "die-ins" for precisely 8 minutes, 46 seconds.

In the U.S. Capitol's Emancipation Hall, Democratic senators gathered, some standing, some kneeling on the marbled floor in silence for that length of time.

Mourners at the memorial service for Floyd in Minneapolis stood in silence for 8 minutes, 46 seconds, asked by the Rev. Al Sharpton to "think about what George was going through, laying there for those eight minutes, begging for his life."

On Wednesday, high school athletes planned to jog and walk 8.46 miles on the Nine Mile Creek Regional Trail in Floyd's memory and with the goal of raising $8,460 to aid businesses along a devastated stretch of Lake Street as they rebuild from unrest late last month.

Regardless of the mistake, "my initial reaction, 8:46 or 7:46 is too long and should not have happened," said Kelsey Hans, the girls' head soccer coach at Blake School who helped organize the event and got the idea from the UCLA women's soccer team, which ran 8.46 miles on June 8 to raise money for Black Lives Matter.

"The number is symbolic [and] more just about raising awareness of issues that have been happening for a long time and have gone unchecked," Hans said. "Whatever the minutes he was on the ground and held there is too long."

Paul Walsh · 612-673-4482

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

ARTICLE DCCXLIX. LAW FIRM CO-FOUNDER DON LEWIS: WHITE COMMUNITIES HOLD THE KEY TO CHANGING TWIN CITIES

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

June 18, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 939 words

Byline: Patrick Rehkamp

Body

Editor's note: This week, Business Journal reporters sought out black business leaders on their beats to get their thoughts on how the killing of George Floyd has raised up and changed the conversation on racism and equity in the Twin Cities. These leaders also spoke on how businesses can be part of the solution. This is one of those conversations.

If the Twin Cities is going to put systemic racism behind it, white people, white business leaders and white policymakers will need to lead the way, says Don Lewis, a co-founder of the law firm Nilan Johnson Lewis.

Lewis was born and raised in St. Paul's Rondo neighborhood. He later received an undergraduate degree from Northwestern University in the Chicago area and then a law degree from Harvard University. He's a former assistant U.S. attorney for Minnesota, a former dean of the Hamline Law School, and co-founder of the Minnesota Association of Black Lawyers.

Law firm co-founder Don Lewis: White communities hold the key to changing Twin Cities

Lewis spoke this week with the Business Journal about George Floyd's death, how the Twin Cities heals after the riots and what needs to change. The conversation has been edited for length and clarity.

I've seen it many times. I think I saw it when most of the country did. I was watching "CBS Morning News" and it was a breaking story. I remember very vividly Gayle King's reaction. She was overcome by it. I was just struck by the barbaric nature of the act. It was really tough to watch. The one thing I'll never forget is the look in Derek Chauvin's eyes. We've all seen a lot of police videos, but we rarely got to look in their eyes. It was chilling in terms of his facial expression, just so deliberate and cold.

I want to answer that question, but keep in mind that the George Floyd incident occurred in the midst of the Covid-19 pandemic. Both of those have done a lot to unmask systematic inequalities. Regarding Covid-19, it unmasked the inequalities in health care. Regarding Floyd, I think the biggest outcome is people now understand, I think more so now than at any other point, the systemic racism issues. It's being understood more broadly and being talked about by youth. They're the ones protesting.

If you ask me what's the most important thing, and I think it's starting to be addressed, it's that white citizens, white institutions and white-owned businesses need to take ownership of systemic racism. They have to solve it. The issues will not be erased until the majority community owns it and solves it. Black and brown institutions can help and be resources, but at the end of the day it has to be white communities that deal with it.

Secondly, I think major reforms to public safety, police and criminal justice need to happen. One of the inequities in criminal justice, for example, are drug and nonviolent crimes in black communities. Those criminal records tend to block them from employment, which hurts businesses from being able to diversify, so it becomes a business community issue, too. We have to take advantage of the momentum building. People are talking about disbanding or defunding the police department. Those calls resonate with me. It's not much different than zero-based budgeting for a business. Instead of tweaking expenditures, why not approach it by throwing out the budget and starting over and starting fresh? I'm a strong proponent of taking that approach.

I think the third thing we have to do is rebuild the business corridors that were destroyed. We need to look at the approach that New York City took after [the terrorist attacks of] 9/11 or here after the Interstate 35W bridge collapsed. It needs to be urgent and have an expedient timeframe. We need that urgency and spirit and to rebuild with more resources than before.

There's many more, such as education, housing and health care, but the three I mentioned are where I'd start.

Well, they have a major role to play in how the Twin Cities goes forward. Systemic racism here helped build the Minneapolis business community. The business community has a key role in taking ownership of the problem. I would like to see some version of The Itasca Project where individuals tackle these issues. I don't think the business community has done enough. We need businesses to adopt values and activist strategies where solving some of the problems of minority communities is a priority.

I am hopeful some positive change comes out of this. I can't help but be hopeful because the alternative is unacceptable. I've always been struck by Martin Luther King Jr.'s observation that the arc of the universe is long but bends towards justice.

Law firm co-founder Don Lewis: White communities hold the key to changing Twin Cities

I think those are two very different cases. In the Castile case, there were some facts that had ambiguity. The key fact was that Castile had a firearm, legally, but the officer got scared and shot him. That's a far contrast from what we see with Derek Chauvin in terms of George Floyd. There was some minimal resistance at first. While he was on the ground he was not a threat. There will be some interesting arguments with the other three officers who have been charged. I think those cases are less clear-cut than Chauvin.

Don Lewis

Co-founder, Nilan Johnson Lewis

Age: 67

Family: Married with three children and eight grandchildren

Education: Undergraduate degree, Northwestern University; Juris Doctor, Harvard University

Boards: American Employment Law Council, Minnesota Association of Black Lawyers (co-founder and board of directors), National Bar Association (board of governors), National Association of College and University Attorneys, National Employment Law Council

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

ARTICLE DCCL. 12 WAYS TO OBSERVE JUNETEENTH IN THE TWIN CITIES

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 18, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 774 wordsByline: Isabel Saavedra-WeisHighlight: Juneteenth commemorates the day enslaved African-Americans in Galveston, Texas, first heard the news they had been freed. It was on June 19, 1865, that a Union Army general arrived in the port city telling residents the Civil War had ended and that the slaves were free. That was about two months after Confederate Gen. Robert [...]Body

Juneteenth commemorates the day enslaved African-Americans in Galveston, Texas, first heard the news they had been freed.

It was on June 19, 1865, that a Union Army general arrived in the port city telling residents the Civil War had ended and that the slaves were free. That was about two months after Confederate Gen. Robert E. Lee surrendered and two and a half years after President Abraham Lincoln signed the Emancipation Proclamation.

Events in the Twin Cities metro area provide opportunities to celebrate, protest, learn and do community service on Juneteenth. Here's a list:

St. Paul Virtual Juneteenth Celebration

The city of St. Paul, St. Paul Public Library and Ujamaa Place are presenting an online celebration, including remarks from St. Paul Mayor Melvin Carter and music by ArtUs Youth Drummers and The War and Treaty. The program will begin at 9 a.m on June 19. Website: .

June 19th Community Celebration

This event will provide free food, a chance to connect with local businesses, and access to mental health resources for those experiencing trauma after the death of George Floyd.

Location: 1900 Nicollet Ave. S., Minneapolis Time: June 19, 2-5 p.m. Juneteenth: Community Festival and Rally for Justice

Racial Justice Network, Guns Down Love Up and CAIR-Minnesota organized a rally in honor of George Floyd, and a free giveaway of food, household items and mental health kits for children. There will be food and musical performances.

12 ways to observe Juneteenth in the Twin Cities

Location: 701 Broadway Ave. W., Minneapolis Time: June 19, 12-6 p.m. Juneteenth Celebration - Unite and Rebuild MSP

Voices from the Ashes and Rights and Passage are hosting a family friendly celebration with live music, food trucks, and guest speakers. Attendees are encouraged to bring donations for their food and supplies drive for nonprofits A Mother's Love and Voices from the Ashes.

Location: Target parking lot at Lake Street and Minnehaha Avenue, Minneapolis Time: June 19, 3-8 p.m. Juneteenth Cookout and Donation Drive

There will be free food and open mic performances at the Cup Foods near the site where George Floyd was killed.

Location: 3759 Chicago Ave., Minneapolis Time: June 19, 3 p.m. Blackout Bike Ride

Slow Roll, Free Black Dirt and Paige Ingram are planning a community bike ride. The ride will start and end at the Robert J. Jones Urban Research and Outreach-Engagement Center, and will make stops at the Walker Art Center and George Floyd's memorial on 38th and Chicago.

Location: 2001 Plymouth Ave. N., Minneapolis Time: June 20, 4-5:15 p.m. Caravan Parade

Attendees are invited to decorate their cars and join the caravan that will loop through North Minneapolis. The route starts and ends in the Robert J. Jones Urban Research and Outreach-Engagement Center parking lot, and closes with a community prayer.

Location: 2001 Plymouth Ave. N., Minneapolis Time: June 20, 11 a.m. Reparations Rally at Minnesota State Capitol

Black Lives Matter Minnesota, Communities United Against Police Brutality, St. Paul for Justice and the Green Party of Minnesota are hosting a rally to demand economic reparations from President Donald Trump and the U.S. government.

Location: 75 Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. Blvd., St. Paul Time: June 19, 1-4 p.m. Social Justice Rally at Brooklyn Park City Hall

A social justice rally will be hosted by Sen. John Hoffman, Hennepin County Commission candidate De'Vonna Pittman and community members Denise Butler, Lee Henry Jordan and Cedrick Frazier.

Location: 5200 85th St. N., Brooklyn Park Time: June 19, 5-8 p.m. Ashes to Beauty Block Party

A celebration of the African-American community in Apple Valley will include music, speakers and family activities. It will also feature black-owned food and retail vendors.

Location: 6855 Fortino St., Apple Valley Time: June 19, 5-8 p.m. A Day of Service: Serving our Northside Community

Positive Image is hosting a day of service in North Minneapolis. They are looking for over 50 male volunteers to help cook and distribute food.

Location: 710 Broadway Ave. W., Minneapolis Time: June 19, 10 a.m.

12 ways to observe Juneteenth in the Twin Cities

ABC News will air a primetime special about the legacy of Juneteenth and its relevance to current events. It will air on June 19 at 8 p.m. Eastern time. Thousands have protested over George Floyd's death. These are the stories of 4 and what they're trying to change. sppl.org/juneteenth The quiet life of Derek Chauvin before the public death of George Floyd House committee advances bill to assist Twin Cities businesses damaged in George Floyd unrest Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis' Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCCLI. [SECOND CENTRAL MINNESOTA MAN CHARGED IN MINNEAPOLIS
POLICE STATION ARSON](#)

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 18, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 587 words

Byline: Jennifer Kraus

Highlight: BRAINERD, Minn. - Another central Minnesota man was charged in federal court this week in connection with the burning of the Minneapolis Police Department's 3rd Precinct during the violent unrest that followed the death of George Floyd in police custody on Memorial Day. On Wednesday, U.S. Attorney Erica H. MacDonald announced the charges filed against [...]

Body

BRAINERD, Minn. - Another central Minnesota man was charged in federal court this week in connection with the burning of the Minneapolis Police Department's 3rd Precinct during the violent unrest that followed the death of George Floyd in police custody on Memorial Day.

On Wednesday, U.S. Attorney Erica H. MacDonald announced the charges filed against a second man - 26-year-old Bryce Michael Williams of Staples - for conspiracy to commit arson. On Tuesday, MacDonald's office announced charges against a 22-year-old Brainerd man, Dylan Shakespeare Robinson, who was charged with aiding and abetting an arson in connection with the Minneapolis police station fire.

Williams, who was arrested Tuesday, made his initial appearance earlier Wednesday before Magistrate Judge David T. Schultz in U.S. District Court in Minneapolis.

According to the allegations in the complaint, on the night of May 28, the 3rd Precinct was overrun and heavily damaged due to vandalism and arson. Investigators with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives identified multiple separate fires that were started in the building on East Lake Street.

Investigators stated they were able to identify Williams in surveillance video footage from the police station. Williams, who was wearing a mask, a baseball cap, and a hooded sweatshirt, can be seen in the video standing near the entrance of the police station holding a Molotov cocktail while other individuals attempt to light the wick. Soon after, the surveillance video shows the crowd mostly disperse and Williams is fully viewable holding the Molotov cocktail.

ATF investigators also reviewed videos posted on Williams' TikTok account May 28 and May 29. In one of the videos, Williams can be seen standing in front of the burning 3rd Precinct building wearing clothing consistent with the clothing he was wearing in the surveillance video, the complaint stated. In another video, Williams' face is clearly visible and he appears to be in close proximity to the 3rd Precinct, prosecutors stated in the complaint.

Second central Minnesota man charged in Minneapolis police station arson

Williams was booked into the Hennepin County Jail in January 2015. This booking photo matches the face of the unmasked individual depicted in the videos, which includes a distinctive bird tattoo on his chest.

During the investigation, authorities reviewed a video posted on Instagram, with an account holder identified as "n830show" who conducted an interview with Williams. During the interview, Williams told the person that he was "there when they first burned down the police station" referring to the night of May 28. Williams also told the person he participated in the protests during the day and the riots at night.

Williams said, "I participated in the riots at night of course, cause I'm with my people. They all doing (explicit) and getting tear gassed, of course, I'm going to riot too."

During the interview, Williams was asked if he would consider burning down the building part of the rioting?

"Yeah, definitely that's part of rioting, its mass destruction - that's what a riot is, its mass destruction," he said as quoted in the complaint.

House committee advances bill to assist Twin Cities businesses damaged in George Floyd unrest Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis' Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect Wisconsin duo wants stiffer penalties for wrecking statues St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting

Graphic

Bryce Williams

Load-Date: July 19, 2020

ARTICLE DCCLII. LAW ENFORCEMENT PROGRAMS TO RECEIVE SYSTEMWIDE REVIEW

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 18, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 731 wordsByline: RYAN FAIRCLOTH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Minnesota's system of public universities and community colleges will conduct a "critical examination" of its law enforcement training programs after Minneapolis police killed George Floyd during an arrest.

Ex-officer Derek Chauvin, who pressed his knee on Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes, attended a Minnesota State community college, as did the three other officers charged in Floyd's death. The state college system educates approximately 80% of Minnesota police officers through its 22 professional peace officer education programs.

Minnesota State Chancellor Devinder Malhotra told the Star Tribune this week that system leaders believe law enforcement needs to be "transformed" after the "senseless and tragic death" of Floyd. A systemwide working group will soon begin meeting to review and re-envision Minnesota State's law enforcement curricula and teaching methods using an "anti-racism and equity-focused lens," he added.

"Our colleges and universities certainly have a part and a role to play," Malhotra said. "At Minnesota State, we are fully committed to ending discrimination and racism in all its forms."

The Minnesota State system joins a growing list of higher education institutions that are acting in response to Floyd's death. This week, the University of Minnesota and Hamline University announced scholarships in honor of Floyd. The University of St. Thomas announced Wednesday the formation of a new "Racial Justice Initiative," which will facilitate research, conduct community engagement and sponsor conversations on history, race and obstacles to progress.

Minnesota State's police officer programs are certified by the Minnesota Board of Peace Officer Standards and Training (POST). System law enforcement programs include training on skills such as firearm safety, SWAT, interrogation, crime scene investigation and threat assessment.

Law enforcement programs to receive systemwide review

Minnesota State can do more than just meet the POST Board's requirements for certification, Malhotra said. It can better educate aspiring officers on cultural competence, systemic racism and social justice issues.

Details are still being hashed out, but the group will begin its work soon "given the sense of immediacy and urgency," Malhotra said. System officials will work with campus administrators, faculty and students to review programs and curricula.

The college student association LeadMN, which represents 165,000 community and technical college students across Minnesota, called on Malhotra to establish this working group in a resolution on June 6.

"What we've seen repeatedly is when students put pressure on those decisionmakers ... it can drive reform, it can drive change," said Michael Dean, executive director of LeadMN.

Students were surprised to learn the four officers charged in Floyd's death attended a Minnesota State college; three of the officers attended a Minnesota State law enforcement program.

"This has become a wake-up call that we are contributing to this unhealthy culture of racial bias and excessive force in policing," said Oballa Oballa, president of LeadMN and a student at Riverland Community College in Austin, Minn.

Andy Skoogman, executive director of the Minnesota Chiefs of Police Association, said the working group is a logical step forward in light of recent events. It could also lead to more consistency in law enforcement training.

The POST Board puts out numerous learning objectives for police officer programs, leaving colleges and universities with "a great deal of leeway" in determining what's in their curricula, Skoogman said.

"The first courses will help shape our future police officers, so I think it's critical that they are taught some of the key principles of law enforcement and then they're taught in a very consistent manner," he said.

Mylan Masson, a longtime Minneapolis police officer and former director of Hennepin Technical College's law enforcement and criminal justice education center, is doubtful that curriculum changes can make a difference without police department reforms.

New officers are "taught differently on the streets," she said, and those who don't do what they're told may be ostracized quickly.

"Our students were told many times, 'Forget what you were taught in skills, forget what you were taught in school. We're going to teach you the right way on the street,'" Masson said.

"That never sat well with me at all."

Ryan Faircloth · 612-673-4234

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

ARTICLE DCCLIII. WHAT MPLS. CAN LEARN FROM CAMDEN

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 18, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 12ALength: 509 wordsHighlight: New Jersey's police reforms aren't a perfect model, but there are critical takeaways.Body

The death of George Floyd while in police custody has prompted calls to defund or dismantle the Minneapolis Police Department and other law enforcement agencies around the nation. As a result, Camden, N.J., has been held up as a model for doing just that. Seven years ago, that city abolished its police department and started over.

Since then, statistics from the city of 74,000 indicate some success. Excessive use-of-force rates plummeted, and homicides and other violent crimes decreased in a municipality that was once dubbed the most dangerous city in the state. Yet the New Jersey city's reforms cannot simply be superimposed on Minneapolis. For starters, the political circumstances in Camden a decade ago must be understood.

In the early 2010s, Camden was a city in deep financial trouble and was facing laying off about half of its 300-plus officers. The department had a reputation for use of discriminatory policing in a city that was more than 90% black and Hispanic. Police were often accused of corruption and of using excessive force.

In May 2013, the Camden City Council voted to eliminate its police department and establish a new one under county control with the blessing and funding from the state. The remaining city cops were all laid off and had to reapply to work for the county, under far less generous, nonunion contracts. The force was increased to nearly 400 officers.

The Camden police reforms remain politically divisive. That's in part because union contracts were thrown out, leaving many on the force earning a lower salary with fewer benefits. Eventually, collective bargaining returned with a contract that allowed the chief and his managers more disciplinary and termination power.

It's also critical to note that some members of the Camden community fought the changes and filed a lawsuit to save the department. The case ultimately ended up in front of the state Supreme Court, which ruled 6-0 in favor of the residents in 2015. But at that point it was too late: The Camden County Police Department had been established, and the old force was gone.

What Mpls. can learn from Camden

From 2012 to 2018, Camden experienced a 23% drop in violent crime and a 48% drop in nonviolent crime, although many factors likely played a role. Crime rates dropped in most New Jersey cities during that same period.

Officers on the reinvented Camden force say they see their jobs in a new way, and there's greater emphasis on community relations and de-escalation. Beat cops are more apt to check in with individuals and businesses even when they are not responding to calls for service. Officers marched with protesters after Floyd's death.

Camden increased the number of cops on the streets while pushing through a number of now-progressive police reforms that changed the culture of the force. And leaders mustered the political will to get needed contractual changes so that the chief and his managers could hold officers accountable for their actions.

Although Camden is not a perfect model for Minneapolis, there are lessons to be learned from the New Jersey experiment.

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

Man from Staples charged with arson

ARTICLE DCCLIV. MAN FROM STAPLES CHARGED WITH ARSON

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 18, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 657 wordsByline: STEPHEN MONTEMAYOR; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Bryce Michael Williams is at least the tenth to face federal charges since unrest over George Floyd's killing.Body

In the days after protesters set the Minneapolis Police Department's Third Precinct station ablaze, Bryce Michael Williams trekked across the country with a documentary film crew to join other protests over George Floyd's killing in Los Angeles, Las Vegas and Denver.

Recounting the journey on an Instagram interview show this month, the 26-year-old self-described semiprofessional basketball player and "TikTok influencer" from Staples, Minn., explained that he was there when the Third Precinct caught fire.

"But at night, I participated in the riots at night of course, cause I'm with my people," Williams told the interviewer. They're "getting teargassed, of course I'm going to riot too."

This week, Williams became the latest in a largely homegrown group of people charged in connection with rioting and destruction of buildings that erupted across the Twin Cities after Floyd's killing by police on May 25.

Williams was charged Monday with conspiracy to commit arson in a sealed federal criminal complaint, which became public Wednesday after he made his first appearance in federal court. He is being held in Sherburne County jail ahead of a Friday detention hearing.

According to a criminal complaint affidavit sworn by a U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives agent, Williams was recorded by surveillance cameras at the entrance of the precinct holding and helping light a Molotov cocktail.

Williams is at least the tenth person charged with either federal rioting or arson charges in connection with the unrest over Floyd's death. All but one of the defendants are from Minnesota thus far and federal court documents have yet to detail any affiliation with organized groups.

Man from Staples charged with arson

As with previous cases, investigators described relying heavily on videos posted online on platforms including YouTube, Facebook, Instagram, Snapchat and TikTok. In this case, authorities said Williams posted to his TikTok account a video of himself standing outside the burning Third Precinct building. According to charges, a New York Times photo depicted Williams holding a Molotov cocktail outside the precinct. A YouTube compilation video of the unrest also purportedly shows Williams holding a Molotov cocktail while another person tried to light it, the complaint says.

Investigators also relied on the June 14 interview Williams gave to an Instagram account called the "n830show," during which Williams described participating in the demonstrations in Minneapolis.

At one point, the interviewer asked Williams whether he considered "burning down the buildings part of the rioting."

"Yeah, definitely that's part of rioting, it's mass destruction - that's what a riot is, it's mass destruction," Williams said.

At the end of the interview, a commenter asked what it was like watching the precinct burn.

"It's just a surreal moment," Williams said. "For once we feel like we're in complete control. The police can't do anything. We're burning down their sanctuary, their home."

Williams criticized the looting of area stores, however, "because it defeats the overall purpose of the entire protest."

The interviewer asked, "At what point does violence become justified in the face of injustice?"

Said Williams: "To the point where you're finally heard. I honestly believe in do whatever it takes."

His court appearance came one day after a Brainerd-area man appeared in federal court in Colorado on arson charges related to the Third Precinct fire. Dylan Shakespeare Robinson, 22, was arrested in Breckenridge, Colo., on Sunday.

Federal authorities say Robinson is on probation for drug possession. He was recorded by security cameras tossing incendiary devices at the Third Precinct building the night it burned, according to a federal criminal complaint. A Facebook video also showed Robinson setting a fire just outside the first-floor stairwell on the building's west side, the complaint said.

Stephen Montemayor · 612-673-1755

Twitter: @smontemayor

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

ARTICLE DCCLV. MINNEAPOLIS FED PRESIDENT SAYS SYSTEMIC RACISM HURTS THE ECONOMY

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 18, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1348 wordsByline: New York TimesHighlight: By Jeanna Smialek Two days after George Floyd was killed at the hands of police and as videos of his death circulated on social media, the president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis, Neel Kashkari, did something unusual for an official in his position: He sharply and publicly denounced law enforcement actions. The Fed [...]Body

By Jeanna Smialek

Two days after George Floyd was killed at the hands of police and as videos of his death circulated on social media, the president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis, Neel Kashkari, did something unusual for an official in his position: He sharply and publicly denounced law enforcement actions.

The Fed is a famously tight-lipped institution when it comes to social issues, and most of its officials are not active on social media, so it was notable when Kashkari posted on Twitter that the killing indicated "institutional racism that is actively taught and reinforced."

His colleague Mary Daly, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco, followed two days later with a post stating that "hate thrives when people stay quiet." And Raphael Bostic, the Atlanta Fed president and the Federal Reserve's only black policymaker, published a post online Friday decrying systemic racism.

The comments mark the latest stage in long-running evolution at the Fed, which has increasingly weighed in on societal concerns with an economic bent - like wealth and income inequality and job market disparities - in recent years.

In an interview with the New York Times, Kashkari, who joined the Fed in 2016, said he believed it was important to use his platform to speak up and that race in America ties back to foundational economic issues, from who has the opportunity to obtain a good education to who has the resources to build wealth. Racial disparities, he said, are holding back workers from reaching their full potential.

Kashkari, a former assistant secretary in the Treasury Department who oversaw the Troubled Asset Relief Program, the $700 billion bailout that Congress passed in 2008, also discussed the lessons the Fed was taking from the financial crisis as it rushes to save a pandemic-damaged economy, and what dangers might lie ahead in the banking sector. The following is a partial transcript of that Friday conversation.

Minneapolis Fed president says systemic racism hurts the economy

Q: You wrote on Twitter that the fact that police treated Floyd so violently while being recorded "indicates institutional racism that is actively taught and reinforced." That is an unusually strong remark for a Fed president to make on a social issue. What prompted you to express your views?

A: It was just an honest expression of my reaction. It had been in the news for the past day or so, and I'd seen it, and I'd seen other footage of black men being killed by the police, and I was struggling to figure out - why did this feel so different to me? And it felt so different to me because you could see, there were witnesses standing around the police officers, and the police officers didn't care. They were so confident in what they were doing; they were sending a message - that we're not doing anything wrong.

I think I've just learned, if we don't speak out about what we're seeing, if everyone doesn't speak out about what they're seeing, then nothing changes.

Q: Do you think it's the Fed's place to weigh in on such matters, and, if so, why?

A: I don't think it's the Fed's place to weigh in on partisan political issues or picking sides Republican versus Democrat. But I live in Minnesota. I'm a voter in Minnesota. Our employees live here. We live in our community, and if there are really pressing issues in our community, I think we have a responsibility to speak up. We've launched the Opportunity and Inclusive Growth Institute; we've already made a commitment that we're going to do what we can to improve economic outcomes for all Americans. We've already said this is going to be an important issue for us. And then you have George Floyd being murdered in Minnesota itself - the epicenter of this. I think it's totally appropriate for us to weigh in.

Q: Do you think institutional racism hurts the economy, and do you see that playing out in Minneapolis?

A: If white children in Minneapolis had the educational attainment that African-American children have, this problem would have been solved a long time ago. I think racism is an undercurrent of the status quo. And then you have huge chunks of our population who are not getting a good education, who do not have good job opportunities - it absolutely holds our economy back.

There are big chunks of our population whose innate human capital is basically being squandered because they are not getting an education that enables them to take advantage of their natural talents and gifts. That not only hurts them; that hurts all of us. It hurts our society and our economy.

Q: What role can the Fed play here?

A: If we can use our economic research capabilities to analyze issues using the best data and evidence possible and put forward policy recommendations that other policymakers can implement, that's an important contribution for us to make.

The Fed has a big role to play, even if it's outside of monetary policy, because people trust us as honest researchers.

Kashkari has pushed for legislation in Minnesota that would make quality education a right in the state. The Minneapolis Fed is also conducting an analysis of what the impact would be of a local minimum wage increase, he said.

Minneapolis Fed president says systemic racism hurts the economy

Q: This isn't the only thing on your mind right now, clearly. There's a debate at the Fed right now about whether banks should be forced to conserve more capital as the pandemic continues, including halting dividend payments. You've been outspoken that they should. Why?

A: The longer this crisis goes on, the more likely the losses roll up into the banking sector. When the virus crisis flared up, we didn't know - maybe it will only be a two-month crisis.

It seems very clear now this is a year, 18-month, even two-year journey that we're on now until the economy fully recovers.

Kashkari has called for a suspension to bank dividend payouts and thinks that banks should raise equity instead. While the Fed Board in Washington could stop banks from making payouts, it has so far chosen not to. Officials have suggested that could change after the results of annual bank stress tests are reported June 25.

Q: The Fed is also a cornerstone of the government's relief program for businesses and local governments. What lessons did you learn during TARP that should carry through to the current moment?

A: We have to err on the side of being generous.

We tried to be very targeted in our assistance, helping homeowners who were deserving, who needed only a little bit of help. It ended up that we didn't help very many homeowners, and the housing correction was more severe than it needed to be. It's better to be generous in your assistance, even if that means you help people who are quote-unquote not deserving.

Q: Will more be needed, especially on the fiscal side, and if so, what?

A: I think more will be needed on the fiscal side.

Many of these jobs are not going to come back for a long time. Those workers who have been laid off are going to need to be able to pay their bills.

More focus on unemployment assistance for those jobs that are not coming back anytime soon - I think that's going to be critical, not only for the families themselves but also for the economy as a whole. If people can't pay their rent, can't pay their mortgage, that's how things start to spill over.

Q: When the economy does rebound, should the Fed pay attention to racial unemployment rates when it thinks about when to raise rates?

A: I don't think we have the ability to say, "We're going to target a reduction in this type of inequality through interest rates." But I do think paying attention to these disparities gives us better insight into labor market slack in general.

The fact of the matter is - the Fed raised rates too quickly and too soon - referring to increases that began in late 2015 as the central bank tried to make sure inflation didn't rocket higher as the jobless rate fell. We thought there was less slack out there than in fact there turned out to be. We have to learn from that. And how were we surprised? It turned out that there were more minorities who wanted to work and more old people who wanted to work than our models anticipated. We need to understand the disparities.

Graphic

Neel Kashkari took office as president and chief executive officer of the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis on January 1, 2016. (Courtesy of the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis)

Load-Date: July 19, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE DCCLVI. READERS WRITE ADD SCHOOL FUNDING TO THE LIST

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 18, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 12ALength: 1134 wordsBody

ADDRESSING INEQUALITY

Recent events have publicly exposed wide-ranging racial and class-based inequities and the need for change. If state officials are serious about addressing these inequities, one thing they should address is the formula for K-12 funding that uses property taxes of the community surrounding public schools. This inequitable formula perpetuates disparities in school funding and opportunities among school districts. Wealthier, more affluent school districts with higher property values are able to generate more funding than low-income districts. This makes educational funding dependent upon property values in the district, not on providing an equal opportunity education.

The formula perpetuates inequities that will not fix themselves. Low-income districts and communities suffer. Kids lose good teachers, programs and activities are cut, and opportunities are lost. They should not be left to the uncertainty of a local levy referendum.

Continuing the status quo is unacceptable. What are we waiting for?

Stephen C. Fiebiger, Burnsville

MINNEAPOLIS LEADERSHIP

That commentary sure didn't help

In his June 17 commentary ("Defund and disband City Hall leadership"), former Sen. Norm Coleman writes that "in times of great tragedy there are those who rise from the ashes to give comfort to the afflicted" and that "there are those who provide leadership when communities are clamoring for a way out from desperation."

Coleman rises from the ashes to do neither. Instead, he casts blame from afar, regurgitates conservative half-truths and sows division. He offers no constructive suggestions or solutions. Rather, as someone who staunchly defended the status quo throughout his career, he has the temerity to criticize Minneapolis leaders for not ending the status quo. Same old Norm: opportunistic, divisive and hypocritical. We haven't missed you, senator.

Ed Butterfoss, St. Paul

. . .

Coleman's commentary regarding the disbanding of the Minneapolis Police Department is right on the mark. The city has for years been run by Democrats, and how they can now all of a sudden say the Police Department has issues when they (Democrat) politicians have not been able to solve the issues in all these years is absurd. Hope for the sake of Minneapolis citizens that the politicians read it and pay heed.

Jerry Bich, Wayzata

. . .

The president, the Republican Senate and aging Republican spokesmen like Coleman send a clear message - no change. They acknowledge a few bad apples and they promise to frown on chokeholds - but not ban them; and they run from holding police accountable. They cast blame on mayors and council members for not protecting the businesses destroyed in the looting - property always being more important than black lives.

To be sure, not all police people are racist, but those who tolerate racism among their peers are as guilty as those who practice it. Changing the way we police is important from both a practical and a symbolic perspective. Police have demonstrated dramatically that they cannot "protect and serve." We need to answer that with real change.

Robert Veitch, Richfield

BAIL NONPROFIT

Tune out Freedom Fund detractors

The emerging local and national criticism of the Minnesota Freedom Fund is both grossly unfair and does a disservice to the small staff and volunteer board ("$30M raised, $250K spent by nonprofit," June 17). The organization's mission is simple - to end cash bail and create a criminal justice system that does not keep people in jail for minor offenses simply because they cannot afford a minimal bail.

The skyrocketing financial support since the George Floyd tragedy has been incredible. In an average year, the fund received around $150,000 in donations and grants and spent around $1,000 a day posting bail for people who could not afford to pay. In the 14 days following Floyd's killing, the fund received more than $30 million donated by almost 1 million people and has spent an average of over $17,000 a day posting bail. That is an incredible success story.

The recent criticism of this worthwhile program was started by the usual conservative media and commentators. Among them is the president, whose campaign criticized members of Joe Biden's staff for donating. These groups are simply opposed to the fund's mission and are creating a controversy where none exists. The Minnesota Freedom Fund shows years of commitment to a just cause. It has reacted to the unprecedented donations professionally and is actively seeking additional staff and volunteers to manage the tremendous growth.

The fund should be praised for its work, and I look forward to a follow-up article in six months showing the positive impact these donations and this organization have had on all Minnesotans.

Jason Lonstein, St. Paul

MINIMUM WAGE

It's a bad time to inch toward $15

As we watch the private enterprise employers in Minneapolis try to rebuild from the travesties of recent days, be it civil unrest or a pandemic, we also watch as a wage increase nears for those who work in this fair city. A $0.75-per-hour increase for small businesses over last year's minimum is required by July 1. Many believe $15 an hour is the line in the sand where poverty starts and stops, but now is not the time to put this burden on those who hope to build or in many cases rebuild their legacy and future in Minneapolis.

We need to delay the increase. Be it for a year or only six months, the entrepreneurs in this town need help, as do the employees. Now is the time to work with those owners as they work so desperately hard to resurrect their businesses and our city at the same time.

Jim Fisher, Eden Prairie

MASKS

Would you risk these odds?

Take a six-shooter. Load one chamber. Spin the barrel. And then point it at me.

That's what they're doing to me, every time unmasked shoppers enter my grocery store. They hem me in with a 1 in 6 chance of dying a miserable death. Because those are the precise odds, in my age range, of dying once infected with COVID-19. So says the data from the Minnesota Department of Health.

I'm not a fan of Russian roulette. That's why I set my alarm to shop at the few early morning hours set aside for COVID-vulnerable populations. But there they are. Again. The barefaced shoppers. Tainting the only brief bubble of safety we might have.

Yes, Patrick Henry indeed proclaimed, "Give me liberty or give me death." Barefaced shoppers need to note, however, that he was speaking about sacrificing his own life, not condemning others to death for his benefit.

Please, folks, stop imperiling our lives. Stop pointing that gun at our heads. Enjoy your liberty at times other than those set aside for your vulnerable neighbors, so that they, too, might continue to enjoy theirs.

C. Mannheim, Apple Valley

We want to hear from you. Send us your thoughts here.

Load-Date: June 18, 2020

Real estate pro D'Angelos Svenkeson explains how his industry - and yours - can become more diverse

ARTICLE DCCLVII. REAL ESTATE PRO D'ANGELOS SVENKESON EXPLAINS HOW HIS INDUSTRY - AND YOURS - CAN BECOME MORE DIVERSE

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

June 18, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1190 words

Byline: Nick Halter

Body

D'Angelos Svenkeson is co-founder of NEOO Partners, a commercial real estate and community engagement firm based in downtown St. Paul.

Svenkenson grew up in St. Paul's Rondo and Frogtown neighborhoods and lives in Rondo today. He was previously vice president of development for Minneapolis-based Thor Cos., which has since shut down.

He spoke to the Business Journal in an interview about racism in the wake of the death of George Floyd. It has been edited for length and clarity.

Given the death of George Floyd and ensuing protests and riots in the Twin Cities and across the nation over police brutality and institutional racism, what would you like to see happen next in the Twin Cities, and what role should the local business community play?

Real estate pro D'Angelos Svenkeson explains how his industry - and yours - can become more diverse

From the Fortune 500 companies all the way down to ... the startup world, there's four things that are really tangible that they can do without having to ask a lot of people, so that means there's not a lot of red tape. No. 1 and probably the simplest thing is hire. You can hire, diversify your staff, your boards and your committees to be more inclusive and have diverse perspectives, but also be more representative of the future population that the U.S. is really going to look like. There's a lot of statements that have gone out from organizations and this is the basic accountability check for organizations. Show me how this shows up in your hiring practice and how do people who don't look like the majority feel about your organization who already work there?

The second thing is spend. Our Fortune 500 community, as well as our local businesses, can do a lot by spending or procuring services, goods and commodities from diverse businesses. There's a social justice component to everything, but because I'm in business, I understand that we cannot have less economic inclusion while we're fighting for social justice.

The third and fourth things I would say is, share leadership and partner. I sent out an email to our stakeholders talking about basic things that people can do, and the No. 1 thing is to partner. A lot of organizations do not have the expertise. They don't have the vision, but they also don't have the lived experience to make the solution for community, whether it's a physical solution or whether it's a service solution. If they're going to have a systemic change, they need to have strategic partnerships where they are not the leader. They bring their resources and their horsepower to the table and they allow others who are more adept at getting solutions acutely for the community to be their partner and drive the initiative.

To what extent do you think systemic racism is an issue in the Twin Cities?

It permeates everything in the Twin Cities and in the country. I don't think it's anything that is in other states and not here. It shows up in all the things that I talked about - hiring practices, procurement and leadership opportunities. [Robin] DiAngelo talked about it in her "White Fragility" book. Progressive white allies are the ones who have the hardest time seeing their privilege because they believe they're so evolved in their thinking when they still have issues that create a systemic barrier for others. Because we have such a strong, progressive, purple-ish state, we can be blind to our own biases that are still permeating throughout and that still reinforces barriers in banking, business and churches. So we have these natural barriers, whether you're conscious or unconscious about it, that perpetuates systemic racism.

There are fears that the calls to action will fade and again little progress will be made. How does the business community and broader community not lose momentum and keep pushing?

Having been in conversations with elected officials over the past two weeks, there are a lot of people in the community who want to fight for small wins right now and think the small wins return the populace back to a level of comfort. And in order for us not to resort back to the status quo and for the energy to fade, we have to keep the discomfort present.

There's a hard push right now to say we can't just wait for small wins. We can't go for low-hanging fruit right now. Right now is the time for widespread systemic change. What I'm seeing on social media right now is not for small wins. I think organizational leaders see small wins, but the populace of the community does not care about a small win. They want to see broad sweeping change that shows widespread results.

Real estate pro D'Angelos Svenkeson explains how his industry - and yours - can become more diverse

You work in an industry that is overwhelmingly white male, and I'm talking about commercial real estate. That industry has been talking for years about becoming more diverse, but I've seen very little progress in that regard. Do you agree with that, and what do you think needs to be done to make CRE a more diverse industry?

Real estate is an historic wealth industry. I've seen the emails come to me from my colleagues around acknowledging that they can't be a part of the status quo any longer. Institutional real estate developers acknowledge that they are going to double down on the partnership, because they're doing projects in urban communities, and they know that they and their staff don't look and reflect those communities. They're keenly aware of their deficits now, despite their balance sheets. So they're going to focus on partnerships, but if you have no reflectivity of that community, you cannot provide solutions for that community.

Beyond partnership, shouldn't the big developers and brokerages in town be hiring more people of color? Because 99% of the big deals in town are done by white people.

You can hire as much as you want, but if your culture or your workplace are toxic to diversity or toxic to black, indigenous, Hispanic, Latino and Asian people, they're not going to stay. That's what Greater MSP found with Make it. MSP. is that you can hire people from all over the country, but if your workplace culture is toxic - which gets back into the business practices around white liberal or progressive mindsets that they're evolved - they still can have a toxic environment for people of color to be retained. Most people love the Twin Cities, but if they can't find an employer or a pathway within the work environment for growth, they're not going to stay. People aren't going to put up with lip service on the hiring process, but no follow through on employee development.

Is there anything else on your mind?

People keep asking, what should they do? Stand up. Take action. Hold friends, family and loved ones accountable for their hatred and bigotry. Partner where you've never partnered before. Give where you've never given before. And most importantly, love where you've never loved before.

D'Angelos Svenkeson

Co-founder and CEO of NEOO Partners Inc.

Age: 32

Family: Wife, Kimberly; boys, D'Angelos II and Toussaint

Education: Bachelor of Arts, planning and community development, St. Cloud State University; Master of Arts, city and urban community and regional planning, Jackson State University (Mississippi)

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: June 19, 2020

Vikings' Ifeadi Odenigbo says game day brings out the black swan in him

ARTICLE DCCLVIII.

VIKINGS' IFEADI ODENIGBO SAYS GAME DAY BRINGS OUT THE BLACK SWAN IN HIM

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 18, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1077 words

Byline: Bob Sansevere

Highlight: Entering his fourth season in the NFL, defensive end Ifeadi Odenigbo, 26, is planning on being a full-time starter for the Vikings this fall while also becoming an advocate for change in how racial issues are viewed in America. This is the season I become a full-time starter. It is exciting. Everyone kind of knows [...]

Body

Entering his fourth season in the NFL, defensive end Ifeadi Odenigbo, 26, is planning on being a full-time starter for the Vikings this fall while also becoming an advocate for change in how racial issues are viewed in America.

This is the season I become a full-time starter. It is exciting. Everyone kind of knows the situation, especially the ugly duckling part. I was cut twice by the Vikings, once by Cleveland, once by Arizona. Finally to get an opportunity as a starter is a dream come true, and I'm going to take full advantage of it.

Now I'm the black swan. That's what I call myself. It's my alter ego, my persona, on the field. One of my favorite movies is "The Black Swan." People think that's a weird movie to make your favorite movie. You have to understand the gist of it. Natalie Portman does a great job being the white swan but she has a hard time tapping into that dark side, the black swan.

I'm the white swan during practice. When game day hits, for 60 minutes of regulation, it's all black swan right there.

I can play in this league. I know I can. I just have to be patient.

You don't just give a spot (in the starting lineup) to a person. You have to work for it. That's what I have to do. Nothing is given to you in life. You have to earn everything. I have to earn it.

The first impression is the most important thing. I think when I first got to the Vikings, my first impression was terrible. I think I was intimidated, looking at all the older vets. That might have got into my head. I was cut and on the practice squad. I decided to keep my head down and learn the technique. I was going against starters every day and realized this is one helluva privilege to do that.

Vikings' Ifeadi Odenigbo says game day brings out the black swan in him

I've always felt I belong, but I don't think my first impression rubbed people the right way. I didn't realize how raw I was coming out of Northwestern. It's about refining the little details.

It's working out.

When I talk to kids, I say, "Don't ever give up. You don't know where the finish line is." It's an invisible finish line, and a lot of people give up right before the finish line.

I haven't thought much about kneeling. I think the most important thing is getting a message across and really educating people. Everyone thought kneeling was disrespecting the flag. But what Colin Kaepernick was trying to do was promote awareness. I haven't thought about kneeling or not. I'm just trying to start this year.

If I'm not starting or playing well, I won't even have an opportunity to kneel.

We haven't met as a team. It's hard to get people's vibe when you do Zoom meetings. When we get to camp, we'll talk more. We can voice our opinions on Zoom, but it's different than one-on-one.

After that whole George Floyd tragedy, everyone who watched that footage, especially people who are black ... People who are white simply just don't understand. They don't have to worry about it. You're not a minority. Every day, everywhere you walk in, you're with a bunch of white people. You see that footage and realize ... That could have been me.

If someone were to tell me a police officer did that and they had no footage, I wouldn't have believed them. I feel terrible to say that, but I'd say, "There's no way someone could be that wicked." That's the closest thing I've seen to the devil right there.

A man is pleading for his life, saying he can't breathe, and (the policeman) has his hands in his pocket. You'd think he'd done it multiple times.

I get sad even thinking about it, that someone has it in his heart to do that.

In the offseason, I like to stay in Chicago because of the connections I made at Northwestern. When protesting happened, I got up Sunday morning and said, "Yo, man, I'm angry. I'm going to have kids someday and my kids are going to say, 'Dad, tell me about 2020. What did you do?' " I'd be very disappointed in myself if I did absolutely nothing. I have a moral obligation to speak up. I'm going to be a father someday and I want something my kids can be proud of, and I'm standing up for what's right.

I'm first generation. My parents were born in Nigeria.

I've faced quite a bit of racism. I went to an all-white school near Dayton, Ohio. At times, I felt like an outcast. I had no one to share what I was going through. A lot of my African-American brothers went to integrated schools. I would hear the most racist things ever. I'm the minority. I grew up with a bunch of white people. You have situations where they get drunk and get comfortable and I hear more racist things.

A lot of black people can tell when they walk through places how people view them. I have been called the N-word before. I heard it in middle school and everybody tried to downplay it.

Vikings' Ifeadi Odenigbo says game day brings out the black swan in him

Ask any black person and they can tell you the moment they were first called the N-word. I heard it the first time in seventh grade during recess. When that kid said that to me, it really opened my eyes. "I am a minority and don't ever forget that, Ifeadi."

I'm so numb to this that I forget how crazy that is.

We're people. We have hearts. We sleep. We dream. We want to be at an equal playing level. It's a weird thing.

I just hope this doesn't become a trend. Black Lives Matter: Yeah, I'm all on board. Six months later, COVID is done. Hey, black people we gave you our attention, now I have to focus on work.

To be a police officer, your moral compass needs to be in the right place. Your job as a police officer is to protect someone.

Newest Vikings lineman Ezra Cleveland ready to make it rain in Minnesota Washington's NFL team drops 'Redskins' name after 87 years Money, market, ideal fit? Pat Mahomes got it all in Kansas City NFL to play Black anthem before national anthem, source says

What needs to happen is people need to understand the history of the tension of African-Americans and whites. Nobody wants to talk about slavery because it's awkward to talk about.

Your father remembers when there were colored bathrooms, which is a crazy concept. When I talk to my D-line coach, he's 60 years old, Coach (Andre) Patterson. He was telling me he remembered colored bathrooms. That blew my mind.

If I wasn't playing football, I probably would have gotten into investment banking. What I really want to do is impact people. I've lived a pretty blessed life, being a first-generation immigrant. I want to get my story out and inspire other people.

I'm excited for the season and excited to work with Coach Patterson.

My first name is pronounced If-AH-Dee. And my last name is O-Denny-Bo.

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

Minnesota Democrats press for sweeping policing changes; GOP says it's pushing ideas 'both sides can support'

