Minnesota Gov. Tim Walz has challenged Republican lawmakers to approve a Democratic-backed package of police accountability bills crafted following George Floyd's death so he can have the "poetic justice" of signing them Friday to celebrate Juneteenth, which marks the end of slavery in the country.

The Minnesota Senate's GOP majority passed a limited set of measures late Tuesday and early Wednesday that the Democratic governor dismissed as "weak sauce." He said at a news conference Thursday that he would consider this week's special session "a total failure" if lawmakers don't pass the policing overhaul as well as relief for neighborhoods damaged during the unrest that followed Floyd's death on May 25.

Leaders of the House Democratic majority scheduled a series of votes for Thursday night to pass their policing measures. But Republican Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka said he still intends to adjourn Friday night, regardless of whether the two chambers have reached any agreement. The partisan split in Minnesota mirrors the divide in Congress over policing reform.

"If destiny and history is not raining down on Minnesota today and tomorrow, I don't know what is," Walz said. "The image of us and the Senate walking away from systemic change on Juneteenth adds to the legacy of what the rest of the world is looking at here. It is unacceptable. ... And the poetic justice and the decency of being able to sign those bills on Juneteenth to make a change in this state is pretty obvious."

Gazelka told reporters the governor's comments shocked him. He said Republicans have focused on policing ideas that both sides can support instead of proposals that won't pass, and that most Minnesotans support their local police, with exceptions in Minneapolis.

He said negotiations were continuing.

The Republican leader said Minnesotans are upset about the "lawlessness" during some protests over Floyd's death and Walz's slow response, and for allowing protesters to tear down a Christopher Columbus statue on the Capitol grounds.

The People of Color and Indigenous Caucus developed the Democratic package, and caucus members joined the governor in complaining that their community was shut out of the process of drafting the Senate's legislation. Walz said three of his cabinet members were given only three minutes each to testify at a committee hearing.

Democratic Rep. Rena Moran of St. Paul said she considered the GOP package an insult.

"We are in a moment in time here in Minnesota to do the right thing, to hear the voices of the people - black people, indigenous people, Asian people, Latino people, brown and black people from across the world, and white people," she said. "This is not a black issue. This is not a people of color issue. This is a world issue."

The 22 House proposals are wrapped into three bills on the themes of "Reclaiming Community Oversight," "Reforming Accountability" and "Reimagining Public Safety." It includes several proposals that Republicans have ruled out, including having the state attorney general prosecute all police-involved deaths and restoring voting rights for felons.

The Senate package consists of five modest proposals that partially overlap some House proposals, including banning the use of chokeholds and neck restraints, mandating a duty for officers to intervene and report when they witness another officer using excessive force, and providing help for officers recovering from traumatic events.

Rep. Carlos Mariani of St. Paul, who chairs the House public safety and criminal justice reform committee, said getting rid of the bad apples in policing requires Senate help to grow a healthy new tree.

"I call on them to stop 'coming small' to the table," he said. "They have small stuff, it's OK. I can do that small stuff. Most of us can do that small stuff. That's not the issue. Stop coming in small. Let's have the conversation about the tree. I call on the Senate to see the tree, to change the system, and to join the people who want to begin growing a healthy tree."

With theater performances on pause for the foreseeable future, the Mixed Blood Theatre in Minneapolis is lending its space and platform to community members and local artists.

Mixed Blood Theatre is located in the Cedar-Riverside neighborhood, which is home to a large African immigrant community. Many of its residents relied on Lake Street stores for their groceries, but civil unrest after the death of George Floyd left many of those stores damaged, looted or burned.

Members of the Cedar-Riverside community reached out to Mixed Blood, asking if they could use their space to set up a small food pantry. Mixed Blood agreed, and after sharing details about the pop-up pantry online, donations started rolling in.

"We were expecting to have one table, but we have a whole theater filled with food," said Hanah Ahmed, a community leader in Cedar-Riverside.

The 23-year-old Ahmed is a regular volunteer at the food shelf. She knows English, Arabic, Somali and Swahili, which has been useful when speaking with residents in the diverse neighborhood.

"It feels really good to be helping our community," Ahmed said.

The overwhelming flood of donations have been consistent for the past three weeks, said Catherine Campbell, the theater's production manager. Just last week, a group of neighbors showed up with 10 cars filled with food and supplies.

"Everyone is pitching in. It felt like the whole of Minneapolis came together," Ahmed said.

Looking forward, community leaders and theater staff are adjusting to fit community needs. Since Brian Coyle Center already has a food pantry in Cedar-Riverside, Mixed Blood now only collects non-food items. Long-term plans are undecided, but the theater plans help its neighbors for as long as it is needed, Campbell said.

"Serving others when we can't do theater is at the front of our attention," she said.

Mixed Blood has also launched Mixed Blood Responds, a project engaging and amplifying the voices of local actors and artists as they process the aftermath of Floyd's death.

The theater commissioned a racially diverse group of artists to share their messages of anti-racism, solidarity, and pain. Their work has been posted to Mixed Blood's website and social media.

"It's important to activate those who identify with black and indigenous communities, and communities of color at this time, because theater doesn't always do that," Campbell said.

While the financial impact the pandemic and shutdown will have on the theater's future remains uncertain, those concerns takes a back seat to helping the community, Mixed Blood leaders said.

"We must lend our attention to the systemic racism and issues that have been hidden and unveiled in our industry for centuries," Campbell said.

ARTICLE DCCLXI. OFFICER CHARGED WITH MURDER FOR SHOOTING RAYSHARD BROOKS

Length: 1274 wordsByline: Kate BrumbackHighlight: ATLANTA (AP) - Prosecutors brought murder charges Wednesday against the white Atlanta police officer who shot Rayshard Brooks in the back, saying that Brooks was not a deadly threat and that the officer kicked the wounded black man and offered no medical treatment for over two minutes as he lay dying on the ground.Body

ATLANTA - Prosecutors brought murder charges Wednesday against the white Atlanta police officer who shot Rayshard Brooks in the back, saying that Brooks was not a deadly threat and that the officer kicked the wounded black man and offered no medical treatment for over two minutes as he lay dying on the ground.

Brooks, 27, was holding a stun gun he had snatched from officers, and he fired it at them during the clash, but he was running away at the time and was 18 feet, 3 inches from Officer Garrett Rolfe when Rolfe started shooting, District Attorney Paul Howard said in announcing the charges. Stun guns have a range of around 15 feet.

"I got him!" the prosecutor quoted Rolfe as saying.

The felony murder charge against Rolfe, 27, carries life in prison or the death penalty, if prosecutors decide to seek it. He was also charged with 10 other offenses punishable by decades behind bars.

The decision to prosecute came less than five days after the killing outside a Wendy's restaurant rocked a city - and a nation - already roiled by the death of George Floyd under a police officer's knee in Minneapolis late last month.

"We've concluded at the time that Mr. Brooks was shot that he did not pose an immediate threat of death," Howard said.

A second officer, Devin Brosnan, 26, stood on Brooks' shoulder as he struggled for his life, Howard said. Brosnan was charged with aggravated assault and violating his oath.

The district attorney said Brosnan is cooperating with prosecutors and will testify, saying it was the first time in 40 such cases in which an officer had come forward to do so. But an attorney for Brosnan emphatically denied he had agreed to be a prosecution witness and said he was not pleading guilty to anything.

Officer charged with murder for shooting Rayshard Brooks

A lawyer for Brooks' widow cautioned that the charges were no reason to rejoice.

"We shouldn't have to celebrate as African Americans when we get a piece of justice like today. We shouldn't have to celebrate and parade when an officer is held accountable," attorney L. Chris Stewart said.

Brooks' widow, Tomika Miller, said it was painful to hear the new details of what happened to her husband in his final minutes.

"I felt everything that he felt, just by hearing what he went through, and it hurt. It hurt really bad," she said.

The news came on a day of rapid developments involving race and equal justice. Republicans on Capitol Hill unveiled a package of police reform measures. And the movement to get rid of Confederate monuments and other racially offensive symbols reached America's breakfast table, with the maker of Aunt Jemima syrup and pancake mix dropping the 131-year-old brand.

Brooks' killing Friday night sparked new demonstrations in Georgia's capital against police brutality after occasionally turbulent protests over Floyd's death had largely died down. Atlanta Police Chief Erika Shields resigned less than 24 hours after Brooks died, and the Wendy's restaurant was burned.

Rolfe was fired after the shooting, while Brosnan was placed on desk duty.

Ahead of the district attorney's announcement, Rolfe's lawyers issued a statement saying the officer feared for his safety and that of others around him and was justified in shooting Brooks. Rolfe opened fire after hearing a sound "like a gunshot and saw a flash in front of him," apparently from the stun gun.

"Mr. Brooks violently attacked two officers and disarmed one of them. When Mr. Brooks turned and pointed an object at Officer Rolfe, any officer would have reasonably believed that he intended to disarm, disable or seriously injure him," the lawyers said.

But the district attorney said the stun gun that Brooks held had already been fired twice and was thus empty and no longer a threat.

Brosnan's lawyer, Amanda Clark Palmer, said the charges against the officer were baseless. She said Brosnan stood on the wounded man's hand, not his shoulder, for a short period of time - seconds - to make sure Brooks did not have a weapon.

Police had been called to the restaurant over complaints of a car blocking the drive-thru lane. An officer found Brooks asleep behind the wheel, and a breath test showed he was intoxicated.

Police body-camera video showed Brooks and officers having a relatively calm and respectful conversation - "almost jovial," according to the district attorney - for more than 40 minutes before things rapidly turned violent when officers tried to handcuff him. Brooks wrestled with officers, grabbed one of their stun guns and fired it at one of them as he ran through the parking lot.

Officer charged with murder for shooting Rayshard Brooks

An autopsy found he was shot twice in the back. One shot pierced his heart, the district attorney said. At least one bullet went into a vehicle that was in line at the Wendy's drive-thru.

After Brooks was shot, he was given no medical attention for over two minutes, despite Atlanta police policy that says officers must offer timely help, Howard said.

The district attorney said Rolfe and Brosnan had until 6 p.m. Thursday to surrender. He said he would request $50,000 bond for Brosnan and no bail for Rolfe.

The charges reflect a potential "sea change" in tolerance for violence by police, said Caren Morrison, a Georgia State University law professor who used to be a federal prosecutor.

Morrison said the view until now has generally been that officers are justified in using deadly force in a case in which the suspect had a stun gun or other weapon that could cause "grievous bodily harm."

Later Wednesday there had been reports that Atlanta police officers were walking off the job or calling in sick in protest of the charges against Rolfe and Brosnan. The APD said in a Tweet that it is experiencing a higher than usual number of officers calling out for their shifts but that, "We have enough resources to maintain operations & remain able to respond to incidents."

Atlanta Mayor Keisha Lance Bottoms said on CNN that many of the department's partners had been notified just in case they needed to call others in but that "we are fine" (tonight) and that the true test would be on Thursday.

"If we have officers that don't want bad officers weeded out the force then that's another conversation we need to have," Bottoms said.

In the Minneapolis case, Derek Chauvin, the officer who put his knee on Floyd's neck for several minutes, has been charged with murder. Three other officers have been charged with aiding and abetting. All four were fired and could get up to 40 years in prison.

In Washington, meanwhile, Senate Republicans announced the most ambitious GOP police-reform package in years, including an enhanced use-of-force database, restrictions on chokeholds and new commissions to study law enforcement and race.

The bill is not as sweeping as a Democratic proposal set for a House vote next week, but it shows how swiftly the national debate has been transformed since Floyd's death.

A new poll by The Associated Press-NORC Center for Public Affairs Research says more Americans today than five years ago believe police brutality is a very serious problem that too often goes undisciplined and unequally targets black Americans.

The University of Minnesota Law School has started a new scholarship honoring George Floyd.

The fund will support a student of color - particularly a black law student who's pursuing a career in law - in hopes they can help diversify a largely white profession and help pursue racial justice.

The fund was started by two alumni, Catlan McCurdy and Sanjiv Laud, with a match from the U Law School. The married Minneapolis couple, who met at the school and are both lawyers, were inspired by North Central University, which hosted the Minneapolis memorial for Floyd and created a scholarship in his honor.

"George Floyd's death was just a symbol of a larger problem of racial injustice in this country," Laud said. "And it was one thing we could do. He's never going to be forgotten at the law school."

The endowed scholarship will continue indefinitely. The first scholarship will likely be awarded in 2021. (To support the fund, go to law.umn.edu.)

Garry Jenkins, dean of the University of Minnesota law school, said in an e-mail to the school's community that they are doubling down on "promoting racial justice and changing perspectives, practices, and institutions (in all kinds of ways) to help contribute to the change we need."

Floyd, 46, died May 25 after Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin pinned his neck to the pavement. Chauvin has been fired and charged with murder and manslaughter. Three other officers involved in the incident have been charged with aiding and abetting manslaughter and murder.

Years before Minneapolis police killed George Floyd, the world saw Philando Castile's last moments on Facebook Live as a St. Anthony officer shot him in his car.

In the racially charged case, the officer, Jeronimo Yanez, was ultimately acquitted of second-degree manslaughter and endangering safety. The ruling hung on a central question: Did the officer reasonably fear that Castile was reaching for a gun, one he disclosed having when he was stopped?

That question - and the state law that prompted it - is now central to the debate as lawmakers and community leaders call for massive overhauls of policing.

During a special session of the Legislature, Democrats are pushing to dramatically change the state's deadly force statute, which allows officers to use such force when they "reasonably believe" someone will cause "death or great bodily harm" if not apprehended. Deadly force is also allowable under law if used by officers to protect themselves or others, or to capture someone they know or have "reasonable grounds to believe" has committed or will commit a felony using force.

When Rep. Rena Moran, DFL-St. Paul, reads the law, one word sticks out: "believes."

"The officer believes that something is going to happen, whether or not it is a real threat, he just believes it is," she said. "It's so open to their beliefs, or how they see the world, or how they see people of color."

That subjectivity, critics argue, allows for bias, even as officers often have to make split-second decisions about life and death.

Moran and others say the current standard gives wide latitude to officers to use force, and it has kept officers from facing charges or being prosecuted when those encounters turn deadly. Hennepin County Attorney Mike Freeman cited the deadly force law when he declined to charge the officers involved in the killing of Jamar Clark in 2016 and Thurman Blevins in 2018, both black men killed by Minneapolis police.

'Belief' is at heart of deadly force debate

In 2019, Freeman successfully prosecuted former Minneapolis police officer Mohamed Noor for fatally shooting Justine Ruszczyk, a white woman, while responding to her 911 call. Noor, who is Somali-American, is believed to be the only officer convicted of murder in the history of the state.

Derek Chauvin and three other officers involved in Floyd's arrest are facing charges.

More than 100 cases of excessive use of force resulted in death or injury over the past five years, according to a state report this year on police encounters. Despite many high-profile cases occurring in the Twin Cities, 60% of those events took place outside the metro area, said Department of Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington. Half of the cases involved people in a mental health crisis.

Moran is pushing a proposal to make legislative intent clear: The authority to use deadly force is "a critical responsibility that shall be exercised judiciously and with respect for human rights." It would also require an "imminent" threat of death or harm to an officer or someone else before deadly force is used. Moran also wants the state attorney general to handle all deadly force cases, instead of local prosecutors who have close relationships with police.

Those provisions have run into strong resistance from Republicans who control the Senate. They are pushing their own proposals that direct a statewide officer licensing board to draft a policy to ban tactics like chokeholds and neck restraints, such as those used on Floyd. The bill would also require the state board to establish sanctity of life standards respecting the value of all human life and requiring officers to intervene when they see a colleague using excessive force.

"Oftentimes when you go in, the situation has already exploded into violence. But we really want to make sure the training emphasizes sanctity of all life," said Warren Limmer, R-Maple Grove, the author of the bill. "Not only protecting the officer but the people they [interact with]."

Another proposal, from Sen. Bill Ingebrigtsen, R-Alexandria, would require law enforcement agencies to report monthly use-of-force cases to the Minnesota Bureau of Criminal Apprehension. It's something many agencies already do, he said, but requiring it would increase transparency.

"When you get down to [small] agencies, a chief and one person or two people in smaller rural communities, they are probably having more difficulty with that," said Ingebrigtsen, who spent 34 years in law enforcement.

But those hoping to change the language in the law argue it's not just about accountability after the fact: Officers would be more likely to try de-escalation or other tactics if the law was less open-ended on when they can use force.

In 1985, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that under the Fourth Amendment officers can't shoot fleeing suspects unless they have probable cause to believe they pose a threat to the officers or others. That ruling led to a change in laws and to a 13% to 23% decrease in deadly force in states, according to a 1994 study.

"The idea is to instill a new culture, a new belief system, so that when there's training and awareness made of these laws, officers know that something is different," said Jim Hilbert, a Mitchell Hamline School of Law professor and civil rights attorney. "That's the whole point of laws: to help encourage certain behaviors and then provide accountability when people don't match what the law requires."

POHLAD KNOWS MLB NEEDS TO RETURN SOON

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 2CLength: 1053 wordsByline: SID HARTMAN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The Twins owner remains optimistic the owners and players can resolve their differences.Body

While the NBA, NHL, NFL and MLS have all come up with some kind of plan for how to resume their seasons, Major League Baseball owners and players continue to be in a big labor dispute that has really hurt the image of the game over the past few weeks.

The latest offer from MLB to be made public features a 60-game season with 100% of prorated salaries for players with games starting on July 19.

Twins owner Jim Pohlad said in a Wednesday interview that everyone wants baseball back, and the faster the two sides can reach an agreement, the better.

"Everybody wants it back as soon as possible," Pohlad said. "The fans want it back as soon as possible, MLB wants it back as soon as possible and the players want it back as soon as possible. So from a baseball standpoint and a brand standpoint, I think it is really important that it gets back as soon as possible."

While Commissioner Rob Manfred said last week that he was 100% certain there would be baseball played this summer, that became less certain this week as the MLB Players Association and the owners continue to be far apart on a deal.

Pohlad's optimism about a season being played has changed over time.

"It's really hard to say. All I can do is sense optimism coming from the commissioner's office," Pohlad said. "And that has gone back and forth."

Pohlad said communication with the commissioner's office has been steady with the club, but not directly between himself and Manfred.

"There are weekly calls [with] just a control person on the call, and those are update calls for the most part," Pohlad said. "They don't call for a lot of action, but they are updates and we have those. Then there is infrequent contact with the commissioner on a one-on-one basis."

Baseball's role

With the country going through various stages of lockdown over the coronavirus and with Minneapolis being the center of a nationwide discussion about social justice and racism, Pohlad said the role of baseball has never been clearer.

"Baseball at its best is an activity, a diversion for people for enjoyment, social interaction, competition, so I think in all those respects with what everybody has gone through, it is very important," he said. "But we can't in any way minimize the importance of the health of people in the country as a result of the pandemic and the fight for social justice. Because those are two way more important issues than baseball."

The Twins and the Pohlad Cos. - run by Jim, Robert and Bill Pohlad - made a recent contribution of $25 million which they said will be used to help fight systemic racism in the United States.

Jim Pohlad said this has been one of the most important times for his family in terms of finding ways they can help the community. The Pohlad Family Foundation already has done a lot of charitable work involving homelessness and housing, but with the coronavirus and now the growing discussion on racism, the family has looked for even more opportunities to help.

"Well, it's really important. I mean, hugely important for us," he said. "There are a lot of difficult decisions to be made during all of this time, starting probably [when coronavirus concerns surfaced] in mid-March, and there have been a lot of difficult decisions. But the decision to support a movement toward social justice, racial justice came about relatively recently and the moment with George Floyd has just magnified [getting more involved] for us and for everybody, we hope."

State of the Twins

Pohlad reported that the Twins are financially stable, even though they currently have almost no revenue coming in. He said he believes the club can weather whatever happens this season.

"The Twins are in satisfactory financial condition right now," Pohlad said. "I mean, there is no club that can say they're in great financial condition because we have a lot of expenses and virtually no revenue, so that's not a good situation. But we're confident of the organization's ability to make it through all of this."

Last season the club drew 2.29 million fans, their most since 2013, and had visions of attracting at least 2.5 million this season. But Pohlad said he believes fans aren't likely to return to Target Field in 2020.

"Baseball has deferred to the public health officials on that one," Pohlad said. "I would think that it would be unlikely, for sure in the regular season, to see any fans in the stands. If the playoffs happen and if the Twins were to be in the playoffs, I just don't know. I can't say [for sure] about fans, [it's] possible and you can judge your degree of probability."

The Twins were coming off one of the most enjoyable seasons in a decade, winning 101 games and hitting the most home runs in MLB history. With the addition of former MVP Josh Donaldson at third base and a bolstered rotation, this club has World Series aspirations.

So how hard is it to not have games scheduled at this point?

"The offseason breeds optimism at every club, but the Twins were coming off a great season last year and I thought we made some really key, good signings," Pohlad said. "We were excited about our prospects, about the returning team and the new players. I would say that we were highly anticipating the 2020 season and the success that we believed the Twins would have."

Pohlad knows MLB needs to return soon

If baseball does get restarted, the Twins are going to have as good a chance to win the World Series as any club. Not only do they have a great major league club, but their minor league prospects are as good as any organization in baseball.

Operation changes

Pohlad said for the most part, the Twins have tried to operate as normally as possible, but that has been difficult even with events such as the MLB draft.

"We have operated as normal as we can be, given the fact that we're not playing any games," he said. "I think that people have, clearly, less to do, some more than others. So I think that we're operating normally but in a weird environment. I have been very pleased with the Twins and our organization throughout the Pohlad Companies, of how everybody has adapted to the change that is required here.

"I think that we're a highly communicative organization, so everybody has stayed in contact with one another and is doing a good job."

Scorn for the brown brick corner store keeps pouring in: "They call the cops on black people," one person says in an online business review. "Racially profiled a man." "Disgusting."

The outrage is aimed at Cup Foods, a neighborhood market in South Minneapolis where a teenage clerk called 911 to report that George Floyd had bought cigarettes using a fake $20 bill. Floyd was sitting in a parked car just outside the store when a white police officer responding to the call pinned Floyd's neck to the asphalt for nearly nine minutes.

"People were saying we were responsible for his death, that we had blood on our hands, that we're the reason he died," said Mahmoud Abumayyaleh, an owner of the market.

Now, Cup Foods has become indelibly connected to the police killing of a black man that set off weeks of protests and a national reckoning over racism in policing and in many other parts of American life.

On Monday, Cup Foods reopened its doors for the first time since protesters poured into the neighborhood. The deli was again stocked with fresh vegetables and meat, but the newspapers on the rack were precisely three weeks old - the last editions before Floyd's death began to dominate every front page.

The air inside was still, and customers were scarce in the morning. A newly hired security guard paced in and out of the building. Inside, signs commemorated Floyd and declared that "Getting arrested shouldn't be a death sentence."

In the weeks since Floyd's killing May 25, mourners have sought to transform the pavement and sidewalks outside the store into hallowed ground. They have left hundreds of bouquets, hung banners and signs, and painted a mural of his face on the store's exterior walls.

The vigils and protests echo scenes from the Triple S Food Mart in Baton Rouge, La., where police killed Alton Sterling in 2016, and the Ferguson Market and Liquor in Missouri, where a report of a "stealing in progress" precipitated the police killing of Michael Brown in 2014. Over the weekend in Atlanta, protesters burned down the Wendy's where a white police officer had shot and killed Rayshard Brooks, a black man who had aimed a Taser at an officer while running away.

For more than 30 years, Cup Foods has been a neighborhood mainstay but also a source of complaints at the corner of Chicago Avenue and 38th Street.

"Cup Foods is the hub," said Rashad West, owner of Dragon Wok, a restaurant across the street whose surveillance video captured part of Floyd's arrest. "This is like their block."

It is a lifeline where customers, Floyd among them, bought cigarettes, fresh produce and more minutes for their cellphones. Neighbors said they swung by to pick up cilantro and limes for tacos, and adults remember spending childhood hours playing the Street Fighter II arcade game there. Abumayyaleh said his family was on a first-name basis with many customers.

But it is also a place where shootings have erupted nearby and undercover officers have surveilled patrons. Amid reports of rising crime more than 20 years ago, the Police Department urged the store to call 911 on people loitering outside. In the 1990s, police reported spotting a series of drug sales around the store, and the Minneapolis City Council tried at one point in 2000 to revoke Cup Foods' business licenses.

As the neighborhood began to gentrify and barbershops and clothing stores closed as a cafe and art spaces moved in, Cup Foods - the name originally stood for "Chicago Unbeatable Prices" - did not budge.

Floyd's apartment in St. Louis Park was about a 20-minute drive from Cup Foods, but he often visited the store to buy cellphone credits at the market's MetroPCS counter. Eric Hardin, a friend, said Floyd knew many of the store's employees.

"He'd been going there for years," said Hardin, who called Floyd by a nickname Slim. "Any problems with his phone he would take it to them and get a resolution. Slim was comfortable with those people."

In an interview, Abumayyaleh provided new details of the moments before Floyd's fatal encounter with four Minneapolis police officers, saying that another man had tried to use a fake $20 bill minutes before Floyd walked into the store.

The first man handed the bill to an older employee who had worked at the shop for several years and used a special marker to determine that the bill was counterfeit, Abumayyaleh said. The employee refused the sale and handed the bill back to the man, who left.

A few minutes later, Floyd walked in and gave a $20 bill to a teenage clerk, who did not immediately recognize the bill as fake. After a machine scan determined that the bill was counterfeit, the young clerk followed Floyd outside, asking him to return the items he had bought, but he refused, according to a transcript of the clerk's call to 911.

"He's only been in the States for about a year," Abumayyaleh said of the teenage clerk, who is no longer working at the store. "It's his first time probably ever calling the police."

Abumayyaleh, who is Palestinian American and has spent all of his 35 years in Minneapolis, said he had left the store about three hours before the killing. It had been a busy day, like most Mondays, Abumayyaleh recalled, but he was used to that. The store had always been in his family, and by age 10, he was helping out behind the counter. By 15, he was working there full time.

Aftermath of George Floyd's death acutely felt at Minneapolis corner market where he was killed

That night, just after 8 p.m., an employee called Abumayyaleh, crying and screaming, saying, "they're killing him," he recalled. He said he told the employee to record the scene and "to call the police on the police."

Since then, Abumayyaleh said, he has been bombarded with hateful messages. He asked a member of a local violence prevention group to serve as a spokesman and issued a public statement condemning Floyd's killing and saying that the store supported the protesters and shared their rage.

Things have been even worse for the teenage clerk, Abumayyaleh said, describing the aftermath as "a nightmare." He also said that Cup Foods has been rethinking when its workers should call police. Abumayyaleh said they will now only call 911 to report violence.

Floyd's death was not the first time that Cup Foods has been drawn into a killing that drew national scrutiny.

When a 17-year-old boy went on trial for the 2002 killing of an 11-year-old girl, he insisted he was at Cup Foods and not at the scene of the crime. Sen. Amy Klobuchar was the district attorney in Hennepin County who oversaw the first prosecution of the teenager, Myon Burrell, and an investigation by the Associated Press raised serious questions about the verdict and shadowed her presidential campaign.

Investigators never followed up with two people whom Burrell said he was with at Cup Foods during or following the shooting. Both told the AP they were with him.

Since the killing of Floyd, several residents have said they support the store and its owners. On Monday, Kendrick White, 26, arrived at the store to connect with some friends, something he has done for years.

"You see brothers, sisters, cousins, people from the neighborhood," White said. "There are people who grew up here who have been coming here their whole lives."

But everything had changed. The streets were barricaded off, and many nearby businesses were still closed. Visitors snapped photos as they wandered around the memorials and wilting flowers.

"We respect the fight, but it's emotionally draining for those of us who have been in the heart of it," said Ebony Wright, 38, who lives near the store and has been kept awake by people shouting into megaphones and playing music from speakers. "People who come down here don't realize that there are people who actually stay here."

GREATER MINNESOTA GBETA DIRECTOR PRECIOUS DREW ON WHO GETS TO BE AN ENTREPRENEUR

Editor's note: This week, Business Journal reporters sought out black business leaders on their beats to get their thoughts on how the killing of George Floyd has raised up and changed the conversation on racism and equity in the Twin Cities. These leaders also spoke on how businesses can be part of the solution. This is one of those conversations.

Precious Drew was just one year removed from college when she became the director of Gener8tor's gBETA startup accelerator in St. Cloud.

A co-founder of skin care startup Perk while she was still at College of St. Benedict, Drew joined Gener8tor in September 2019 and led the accelerator through its first cohort. She's recruiting the program's second cohort now.

While Drew works in St. Cloud, she lives in Brooklyn Center and has borne witness to the protests and civil unrest that have shaken the Twin Cities since George Floyd was killed by a Minneapolis police officer.

Drew recently spoke with the Business Journal about why the protests aren't that shocking to her and what obstacles black entrepreneurs and startup founders face as they grow their businesses. The interview has been edited for length and clarity.

I've definitely done my part as far as protesting and donating. I think it really boils down to, you can only do a people wrong for so long before it hits the ceiling. I think what we're seeing here is over 400 years of built-up pain and intolerance have gotten people to the point where they don't think being peaceful works.

I think this moment is different for nonblack people. This is something that the black community has faced before again and again. Philando Castile was killed in our backyard a few years ago. I think the dramatic change here is the amount of nonblack people who are now becoming enraged with injustice. That's not to say we haven't had nonblack allies in the past, but we certainly haven't had them at this level, in my opinion. You know, we watched a man die for 8 minutes and 46 seconds. I think that any human who has feelings will be enraged.

I had this conversation with a white counterpart last weekend, and she expressed feeling guilty in this moment. Though she didn't kill George Floyd, she felt guilty that another person did. And what I encouraged her to do, to be completely transparent, I told her to sit in her guilt. It's OK to sit in that guilt, feel the guilt, think about the guilt, reflect on the guilt, because it's a systemic issue. However, I don't want you to just sit in that guilt. I want you to figure out how you can invoke change, invoke conversation with your white counterparts beyond when this isn't in the news anymore. Let that guilt empower change. Let it empower conversation.

I think the first thing is that, across the industry, we're definitely failing our black entrepreneurial community, and that's really at every level, from recruitment to hiring at high levels within companies to investment. We really miss the mark at every level, and there's definitely room for improvement. We might be doing a little bit better over the years, don't get me wrong, but there's so much more we can do.

What are some concrete examples of obstacles black entrepreneurs face?

I think one of the biggest things is the network. You know, anybody can email an investor. However, if I, as a black founder, don't have anyone in my network to introduce me, that's already set me back a stage. As far as recruitment efforts go, I don't think lack of diversity is done intentionally. However, that doesn't make them excusable.

That's another thing, coming up and doing some entrepreneurial ventures as a young black kid, I never looked at it as, "Hey, I'm an entrepreneur." I was just doing it to survive, just to have extra money on the side. There's a language barrier of, "Do I even consider myself an entrepreneur? Do I consider calling myself a founder? Why should I be thinking about investment opportunities? Why should I be thinking of scaling?" Because for myself and a lot of people in the black community, especially when you're looking at the inner city, some people are just trying to survive, to buy a new pair of shoes, buy school supplies, buy a snack on the weekend. So it's looked at in a different way, and if you don't have that lived experience, it's harder to even understand what I'm saying.

Absolutely. That's where my role as a director comes in. There are a lot of companies that need investment dollars, but there's also a lot of work to be done before you get to the point where you should be looking for investment. It's a free space to fail, as well as to learn.

Greater Minnesota gBETA Director Precious Drew on who gets to be an entrepreneur

Black people, if they fail once, especially when you're looking at the entrepreneurial world, that could be the end. There may not be a network that's going to help you get back up. However, when you're looking at nonblack founders, they're allowed to fail one, two, three, four, five times. They maybe even have a mother or father help them with their living situation. But when you're looking at black founders, especially from those underrepresented neighborhoods, it's like, "Yeah, I'm doing this startup on the side, but I also have a full-time, 40-hour job because I need to feed my family."

When you look at roles within different organizations, are there hiring opportunities at that high level for black people besides your diversity and inclusion role? You want to hire black people at a high level, but just in that role? What about marketing? What about finance, accounting, CEO, president? We are deserving of these roles, as well.

THE DEATH OF GEORGE FLOYD

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 18, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 13ALength: 848 wordsByline: JACOB FREY, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Worldwide change starts in Minneapolis // To do that, we need to shift police culture and push reform on arbitration.Body

George Floyd's young daughter Gianna declared that her dad is going to "change the world." Those words struck a note of hope that reverberated across not just our city but the entire country.

In the last two weeks, a chorus of diverse and diverging views on the future of public safety and policing have emerged. But one common thread running throughout each of those views? George's family is right: What happened to their father and their brother will change the world. That change must start in Minneapolis.

We need to move forward with the urgency the moment demands and the deliberation required to get overdue reforms right.

Let's start with continuing the push to shift police culture.

J.J. Scott Thomson, the former president of the Police Executive Research Forum, recently noted that, "Within a Police Department, culture eats policy for breakfast." He's right, and our ability to deal with the officers who build the culture is limited. The Minneapolis Police Federation has for decades worked to resist changes that would allow for effective disciplinary measures or termination.

Presently, if Chief Medaria Arradondo fires an officer, that decision is nearly as likely to be overturned through arbitration as it is to stick. Successful leaders and managers - in any workplace - need a full range of proven tools to help their organization thrive. Sometimes that includes discipline or even termination.

We need to use a scalpel, not an ax, to fix this broken piece of the arbitration process embedded in state law.

Legislators can and should seize the opportunity presented by the special session to usher in accountability for police departments across Minnesota.

THE DEATH OF GEORGE FLOYD

The House is taking a closer look at how arbitrators are selected and their qualifications. That's a fine start. But it's even more important that the state addresses the core problem: arbitrators' authority to reverse or reduce disciplinary decisions.

Lawmakers should update state statutes to completely remove arbitrators' authority to reverse or reduce the discipline imposed by police chiefs when the employer demonstrates that a peace officer engages in gross misconduct. Examples of such conduct could include engaging in unreasonable use of force, providing an untruthful formal statement or failing to intervene when witnessing another officer use unreasonable force.

In the meantime, we're pursuing new ways to help shape officer conduct in the line of duty.

A new officer's conduct and overall approach to the job can be profoundly shaped by their partner - for better or worse. Researchers at Northwestern University thoroughly reviewed the records of Chicago police officers named in multiple complaints from 2007 to 2015 to understand the role officers play in shaping the likelihood of misconduct among their peers. One key takeaway: An officer exposed to the use of excessive force is more likely to be named in such complaints in later years. In other words, bad behavior begets bad behavior.

We need smarter guidelines around pairing new officers to help curb this "social transmission" of misconduct. That's why we're proposing a policy to limit new officers' exposure to those who have a history of sustained misconduct complaints.

New technology has paved the way for massive change and disruption across every profession, public safety should be no exception. We have, at our fingertips, software that makes it possible to go further.

Chief Arradondo announced last week that the department is moving forward with a first-of-its-kind, research-backed early intervention system. The new system includes a series of predictive models and algorithms that can more precisely identify high-risk conduct and allow supervisors to intervene earlier.

Our commitment to the new program's success needs to be cemented in policy.

That's why we're strengthening our use-of-force reporting requirements to consistently feed more data points into the system. Our officers will now be required to report, among other things, when they draw or point a firearm, manipulate an individual's joints, or use escort holds. The new data collected coupled with the new system will help supervisors see in real time which officers need early intervention to get them back on track and which officers should no longer be police.

Finally, we're in this for the long haul and we know the hard work of transforming public safety will require community leadership and support. Last week we announced the creation of three task-forces that will feature community members, national experts and local government leaders. Each new group will bring to bear their experience and expertise to help shape new initiatives and policy recommendations.

Since its inception, our criminal justice system has failed communities of color. Now for the first time in generations, we have the necessary momentum on our side to change that very system. George Floyd's pleas for help went unanswered, but we can honor his memory and his family's words by answering their call: Changing the world starts here, in Minneapolis.

As the protests have settled and social-distancing restrictions have eased, Twin Cities black-owned beauty salons and barbershops are reopening their doors and trying to find their feet again on radically upturned ground.

They'll be working hard to make up for business they've missed since Gov. Tim Walz ordered them to shut their doors March 17. Reopening at partial capacity - with masked staff and reservation-only service - has been on the table for barbershops and salons since June 1, but some owners decided to wait in light of the recent protests.

Omari Brow Studio, a St. Paul salon on 1050 Selby Ave. that specializes in facial hair removal and threading, has seen an influx of new customers since reopening on June 9. Omari's owner, Syreeta Seve, attributes the influx to a desire among some St. Paul residents to support black-owned businesses in the wake of the killing of George Floyd.

But Seve is unsure whether these new customers will become regulars or are just a temporary boost. At the same time, her usual clientele is cautious to come to the shop, and she fears she's lost some of her regulars altogether.

"I'm not really optimistic, I'm not pessimistic either, I'm just going with the flow," Seve said. "Even though we are trending busy, revenue-wise, we aren't where we need to be to make all of our bills comfortably."

Seve estimates Omari has missed out on $38,000 in business since shutting down in March. That blow has been softened a bit by a $29,000 DEED loan Seve received, as well as a $3,000 PPP loan, in addition to some grants from community nonprofits.

The pandemic also played havoc with the Beauty Lounge Minneapolis and The Nail Bar, businesses that had just moved into new shared space on Hennepin Avenue in December, an effort that cost a combined $85,000.

Beauty Lounge owner Melissa Taylor successfully applied for a PPP loan in the second round and recently received an Economic Injury Disaster Loan. Nail Bar owner Kiara Ellis also received a PPP loan from the Community Reinvestment Fund.

Those loans helped lessen the blow and let them prepare for a reopening with social-distancing measures. But both businesses had to delay planned openings again after the George Floyd protests. "I kind of started planning for Covid, but I definitely didn't plan for a revolution," Taylor said. Ellis reopened her business June 3, and Taylor this week.

"It is a rollercoaster," Ellis said. "I think we've been resilient and I think that's the story of minority entrepreneurs."

Ellis says that since The Nail Bar reopened, she's seen an uptick in business from white clients, as well as more reviews and postings on social media about her business.

While the new customers have been good for business, Ellis has mixed feelings. "It's almost like they didn't see us before," Ellis said. "They see us now, but will it continue?"

Taylor, for her part, is counting on a diverse customer base. She'd developed The Beauty Lounge after observing how multiracial families visited different salons for service, she said, and weddings would have to hire different stylists to handle different hair textures. So when she started Beauty Lounge in 2011, she wanted it to be a place anyone could go to get their hair done.

"The beauty industry has always been really segregated, and I think that we've grown so accustomed to the way it always has been," Taylor said. "But the more that we got our mission out in front of people and our values out in front of people the more people began to realize that, yes, this is important, and yes, there is power in this."

Wilson's Image, a barbershop on 2124 West Broadway Ave. in Minneapolis, also reopened on June 3, and has seen customers trickling back in. Not as many customers as usual, owner Teto Wilson said, but he added the business is "doing okay."

Wilson's regulars have shown caution due to the pandemic - many have called Wilson to ask to come in when business is slow.

Black-owned salons reopen with caution, resilience

Shutting down in March was hard, as Wilson didn't have revenue to pay rent with. Because his staff is contracted and not on payroll, he didn't apply for a PPP loan. Luckily, Wilson worked out a deal with his landlord to reduce payments.

"I'm optimistic that things will get back to normal capacity at some point, I just don't know how long that may take," Wilson said. "But I'm pretty positive about it."

The Minnesota Chamber of Commerce's foundation announced a program Thursday that will offer free services for businesses affected by the coronavirus pandemic and recent civil unrest in the Twin Cities.

The Restoration and Recovery Resources program will consist of a "network of expertise, services and volunteer time," according to a statement from the Minnesota Chamber Foundation.

More than 40 Chamber of Commerce member companies have agreed to extend their services to struggling businesses through the program, which includes legal services, construction and business advising among others.

"These businesses are integral to the fabric of these local communities and through our efforts, we hope to help them rebuild and restore important community services and jobs," Chamber of Commerce president Doug Loon said in a statement.

Nine people were wounded by gunfire across Minneapolis on Tuesday, including eight in a two-hour span, adding to a rash of violence since last month's unrest over the police killing of George Floyd.

Police Department statistics show that a record 149 people have been shot since the start of the year; nearly half of those happened within the past three weeks.

The most recent violence started shortly after 10 p.m. Tuesday, when patrol officers responded to calls of gunfire in the 2900 block of Columbus Avenue, only to learn that a male victim had been dropped off at a hospital. A preliminary investigation showed that an argument between a group of people preceded the shooting, according to police, who offered few other details.

About 11:25 p.m., police were called to a reported drive-by shooting in the 1100 block of N. 21st Avenue, a block west of the Hawthorne Crossings strip mall. When they arrived, they found two women with gunshot wounds; officers applied a tourniquet to help save one of the women's lives, a department spokesman said. A third victim showed up later at a hospital, with a nonlife-threatening injury from the same incident, police said.

Police said that about seven minutes after the 21st Avenue shooting, gunfire broke out a few blocks east of that location, in the area of N. 5th and W. Broadway; two men were later dropped off at a hospital, both with nonlife-threatening injuries, police said.

Around the same time, two men with gunshot wounds showed up at HCMC after apparently being injured when gunfire rang out in the area of S. 38th and Chicago avenues. The block, thrust into the international spotlight after Floyd's killing by a former Minneapolis officer May 25, has long had a reputation for gang violence, police and neighbors said.

No arrests have been announced in the incidents.

9 shot in separate incidents, continuing a run of violence

The exceptionally violent stretch Tuesday night followed a shooting earlier in the day, which resulted in an hourslong standoff that ended when police realized the suspect had eluded capture.

The violence comes amid a sharp rise in shootings in the 22 days since Floyd's death. From May 26 to Tuesday, 66 people have been shot, or about 45% of the total shooting victims for the year, according to data from police.

The first week after Floyd's death saw a record 22 gunshot victims, while the following two weeks had 16 and 19 victims, respectively - all among the top five most violent weeks in the city since 2016. Overall, 149 people have been struck by gunfire so far in 2020 - the highest tally in at least the past five years.

Criminologists have noted similar patterns in other cities, most recently Baltimore, which have seen violent crime rise in the wake of a controversial police killing. MPD officials were not immediately available for comment.

In an unrelated incident, police said a man was stabbed at 12:41 a.m. Wednesday in the 300 block of W. 32nd Street. The victim reportedly told police he didn't know what happened.

On Sunday, seven people were wounded in a shootout outside the Broadway Pub & Grille, 200 W. Broadway, which officials said involved more than 100 rounds fired. One victim, Marcus Lashaun Banks Jr., 22, of Spring Lake Park, died the next day of a gunshot wound to the head, according to the Hennepin County Medical Examiner.

The Minnesota Department of Health will offer free testing coronavirus in Austin, Minn. this weekend to anyone who wants it, regardless of symptoms, to try to better understand the scope of the outbreak in Mower County.

The southern Minnesota county along the Iowa border now has the state's second largest number of cases per capita with 744 confirmed infections. That's about 18 cases for every 1,000 people in a small rural county with about 40,000 residents.

Most Minnesota cases are in the Twin Cities metro, but several counties with meatpacking facilities have also seen outbreaks. State health officials said this week the outbreaks in Mower could be tied to large employers in the area.

Testing will be available at the Mower County Fairgrounds from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. Saturday and Sunday.

State health officials have already offered free testing over the Memorial Day weekend at six National Guard sites. Organizers were surprised by the demand for testing, collecting roughly 10,000 samples, which was about 150 percent higher than expected.

Health officials just completed their second week of community testing in St. Paul and Minneapolis for residents who attended protests and other mass gatherings after the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police.

Health Commissioner Jan Malcolm said more than 7,000 people were tested at four sites in the Twin Cities. Early results suggest about 1 percent of those tests were positive.

Minnesota has tested 460,879 patient samples for the coronavirus since local testing began in March.

Coronavirus Thursday update: 19 more Minnesota deaths and 379 new infections

The Minnesota Department of Health reported another 379 new laboratory-confirmed coronavirus cases and 19 more deaths Thursday. Those who died ranged in age from their 30s to more than 100 years-old.

Kris Ehresmann, state director of infectious disease, noted the Hennepin County resident in their 30s who died did not have any underlying health conditions. She said it was a point of caution for young people to take precautions to slow the spread of the coronavirus such as wearing a mask, social distancing and frequent hand washing.

"It is a stark reminder that COVID-19 is not only a disease of advanced age," Ehresmann said. "This disease continues to surprise us in unfortunate ways."

The vast majority of those who have died of COVID-19 have been over the age of 60. But there are 91 of the state's 1,344 deaths younger than 60 and several of the young people who have died did not have underlying health conditions that put them at higher risk.

There are 27,566 patients, about 87 percent of the state's 31,675 confirmed cases, who have recovered enough they no longer need to be isolated. There are 345 patients hospitalized with 171 in critical condition.

MADISON, Wis. - The Juneteenth flag celebrating the day that commemorates the end of slavery in the U.S. will fly over the Wisconsin Capitol for the first time in state history, Gov. Tony Evers announced Wednesday.

The Juneteenth flag will fly over the Capitol's east wing on Friday, replacing the rainbow gay pride flag for one day. That flag is up all month and flew for the first time in Wisconsin history last year. The U.S. flag and Wisconsin state flag will continue flying on the same flagpole above the Juneteenth flag. The POW-MIA flag will continue flying on a different flagpole as it does every day, Evers' office said.

Juneteenth, which is also called Emancipation Day and Freedom Day, is celebrated on June 19. Wisconsin is one of 47 states and Washington, D.C., that recognize Juneteenth. Although it is a state holiday only in Texas, there is a movement nationally to bring more recognition to the day, including making it a holiday in more states and nationally.

Juneteenth commemorates June 19, 1865, when news finally reached African Americans in Texas that President Abraham Lincoln had issued the Emancipation Proclamation freeing slaves living in Confederate states two years earlier. When Union soldiers arrived in Galveston to bring the news that slavery had been abolished, former slaves celebrated.

The flag was created in 1997 by Ben Haith, the founder of the National Juneteenth Celebration Foundation. It was later revised in 2000 and 2007. The red, white and blue design with a star in the middle is meant to represent the history and freedom of American slaves and to declare that they, along with their descendants, are all Americans, according to the foundation's website.

The flag is a "symbolic reminder of the injustices of our past, our current moment, and hope for our future," Evers' order calling for it to be flown said.

Evers orders Juneteenth flag flown over Wisconsin Capitol

"As a state that sees some of the most disparate outcomes for Black Wisconsinites, it is as important as ever that we recognize and reflect on our history, celebrate Black resiliency, and move forward in solidarity and strength toward a more racially equitable and just society," Evers said in a statement.

Lt. Gov. Mandela Barnes, Wisconsin's first black lieutenant governor, said Juneteenth has particular significance this year in the middle of a movement for racial justice. George Floyd's death last month after a Minneapolis officer pressed his knee into Floyd's neck sparked protests across the country, including in Madison in and around the state Capitol.

Also Wednesday, 29 Democrats in the Wisconsin Assembly asked Evers to call a special legislative session starting Friday to enact changes to the criminal justice system, including to police use of force policies. The Legislative Black Caucus first made the request last week.

Evers did not immediately respond to the request Republican legislative leaders, who can also call a special session, also did not immediately respond.

FIREFIGHTERS BLAST CITY RIOT RESPONSE

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1311 wordsByline: MIGUEL OTAROLA; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Firefighters within the Minneapolis Fire Department are criticizing their leaders' response in the nights of unrest following the killing of George Floyd, challenging the fire chief who did not call in major reinforcements as gas stations, post offices and businesses burned across the city.

Chief John Fruetel relied on mobile units of firefighting crews and increased staff by about 10 during the height of the unrest. He did not follow St. Paul's example in calling in more off-duty firefighters and, with one exception, did not call surrounding city fire departments for help.

The president of the local firefighters union, Mark Lakosky, said he was dumbfounded by the department's strategy during its biggest and longest crisis in modern history.

"There were a couple of nights that some engines didn't run and I know that fires were burning," Lakosky said this week. "How many buildings have to be on fire before you call people in and start running every rig you got?"

He and other firefighters are also questioning the whereabouts of Fruetel, who has served with the department for 41 years and on Wednesday was nominated by Mayor Jacob Frey for another term as chief as they transition to a replacement later this year.

In a statement, Frey acknowledged firefighters could not respond promptly to fires until Saturday, four days after riots broke out, but said the reason was a lack of protection.

"Our firefighters responded to every single call they received - delays were not the result of insufficient fire department capacity, but insufficient law enforcement presence to ensure firefighters' safety prior to the National Guard's arrival," he said. "Our firefighters displayed courage in preventing the fires from spreading to residential housing, and deserve recognition that there was no loss of life."

Minneapolis firefighters responded to at least 69 fires between May 27 and 31, according to the city. More than 100 buildings were either damaged or destroyed by fire, according to data compiled by the Star Tribune.

Firefighters blast city riot response

In an interview Wednesday, Fruetel said he was proud of the department's response that week, saying it was nimble and effective, and that they did not need backup from other cities.

"Some people had time to prepare for something in their communities because they watched what was happening in Minneapolis. We didn't have that advantage. This just happened and within hours it expanded dramatically," Fruetel, 67, said. "Once we had security secured for our firefighters, I thought it worked out very, very well."

Instead of dispatching crews from the city's strategic information center, Fruetel was out on the field during much of the week, driving back and forth between fires and relaying decisions from the ground.

Lakosky questioned that decision. "I don't know how you assess the big picture if you're not out where all the cameras are and where all the information is flowing in."

But Fruetel said that it was better to be down on the ground looking out for firefighters rather than at the information center.

"I felt that I needed to be out on scene to actually help with ensuring the safety of the firefighters," he said.

Fruetel was on the phone being interviewed live by CNN's Don Lemon as flames burst from the Third Police Precinct building May 28. "Chief, you said you've had a number of fires in the area. Your department is stretched thin," Lemon told Fruetel.

"It's a challenging time for us right now, Don, I'll be honest with you," Fruetel responded. "And everybody is working really hard and we're doing it a little bit short-staffed because of the way we've defined our response at the present time."

The response was drastically different in St. Paul, which saw fewer fires and days of devastation. The St. Paul Fire Department brought in dozens of additional firefighters on overtime pay, bringing their staffing to almost 200 firefighters between May 28 and 31, according to St. Paul Deputy Chief Roy Mokosso. It also called in crews from Roseville, Maplewood, Woodbury and other jurisdictions. Fire Chief Butch Inks sat alongside Mayor Melvin Carter in the emergency operations center for much of the week receiving and prioritizing calls.

"The St. Paul firefighters felt very confident in the resources that our administration gave us," said Mike Smith, president of the St. Paul Firefighters Local 21. "We were well-prepared for the worst-case scenario."

St. Paul crews were ready to assist Minneapolis, Smith said.

"For the amount of fires that they had Wednesday, Thursday, Friday [and] Saturday, I'm surprised that St. Paul wasn't called in to help them," he said.

Like St. Paul, Minneapolis used a "task force" model that included a combination of fire and rescue vehicles and that allowed them to move through blazes quickly, Fruetel said. The department used about four task forces to respond to fires; St. Paul formed seven.

That was in part due to the safety of the firefighters, who were pelted with rocks and bottles as they attempted to fight some of the biggest fires; Fruetel told Lemon the windows on his own car were busted by rocks as he surveyed the scene. Response to some fires was delayed until law enforcement agencies secured the area.

Still, other firefighters were eager to help but were never called upon, Lakosky said.

On May 29, firefighters from Station 8 on 28th Street and Blaisdell Avenue reached out to Lakosky wondering why they weren't being dispatched as a post office burned just blocks away on 31st Street.

"I had guys calling me: 'Why aren't we going? Why are we sitting here?'" he said.

Fruetel said there was one callback for additional firefighters the night before the precinct burned, though Lakosky disputed how many firefighters showed up and whether they were actually used. The department then staffed up from 110 to 120 firefighters each consecutive night.

Firefighters from Edina were also called in to help with one unrelated fire near 58th Street and Xerxes Avenue, Fruetel said. Two additional task forces made up of other partners were organized but never used.

"We did not request them because we didn't feel the need," Fruetel said.

Council Member Linea Palmisano, chair of the city's audit committee, said Wednesday that she felt the fire department was limited in its response because it lacked enough security. She said she wants the department leadership to debrief and learn from the days after Floyd's death to prepare for future unrest.

"We need to take a very systematic look at how communications broke down across three shifts," she said. "It sounds like there might have been some serious communication problems within the fire department, and I'm looking to get that corrected."

Post offices, gas stations, pawnshops and a large apartment building under construction were set ablaze during the middle of confrontations between protesters and police that week. Dozens of households had to be evacuated.

On one night, an entire apartment building in south Minneapolis was evacuated as an O'Reilly Auto Parts and Family Dollar were engulfed in flames. Firefighters did not arrive to extinguish the fire until about two hours after neighbors called 911.

"I don't understand our response model anymore," said Lakosky, who responded to the I-35W bridge collapse in 2007 and the tornado that swept through north Minneapolis in 2011.

One fire captain, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said firefighters were "in tears because of frustration and shame and anger" by the end of the first week of unrest. Morale is low, he said, and the department as it stands is a "very frustrating and dispiriting environment."

"It was harrowing, if you think about seeing the city that you live in and or serve burning," he said. "A lot of the people took personally that we failed the citizens."

Longtime landlord Sabri says Lake Street will rebuild, but businesses shouldn't wait for 'freebies'

Basim Sabri owns 15 properties on Lake Street or within six blocks of the bustling corridor that was severely damaged during late May riots.

His properties are largely occupied by immigrant-owned businesses, including Karmel Mall, the International Bazaar, Sabri Commons and the nearly complete Rana Village apartment complex.

Almost every one of his properties was damaged during the riots, but none more than Lake Plaza at 417 E. Lake St. It's known as Plaza Mexico because of the 100 primarily Latino-owned businesses that sell food, clothing and jewelry.

"It was heavily looted," Sabri said. "This property is very close to me. It touched my heart the most because many of my tenants have no insurance and what they had in there was what they lived off."

Those businesses had already been reeling from more than two months of government-mandated shutdowns of shops and restaurants due to the Covid-19 pandemic. They were getting ready to reopen when the riots struck Lake Street. Because of the shutdowns, Sabri said he only collected about 50% of rent from his retail tenants, though he was able to defer payment on his loans.

Sabri said he donated $305,000 to his tenants at Plaza Mexico and $200,000 to tenants at his other Lake Street properties who didn't have insurance. He is also going to waive the next two months of rent for them.

Sabri is working to repair broken windows and doors and to get the plaza reopened in late June.

"I'm very determined to bring it back," he said.

So far, he said, none of the 100 businesses in Plaza Mexico have told him they are going to call it quits.

Sabri has spent the past 25 years acquiring and developing properties along Lake Street, building a portfolio of 1.5 million square feet. Many of his tenants have branched off to open larger businesses in other properties.

He is confident that the street will rebound.

"A lot of those owners have insurance," Sabri said. "They're not going to just take the money and run. They're going to either rebuild or sell it. And if they sell it to someone, the [buyer is] not going to let it sit vacant."

Sabri said the damage done on Lake Street is only material.

"I don't get too attached to things. Buildings are things and money is things, and they come and go," he said. "You can replace things, but you certainly can't replace [George Floyd's life, for instance."

Sabri said that when he saw the damage, it reminded him of 1967 when he was a little kid and living in a Palestinian city near the border of Israel. The city of 25,000 to 30,000 people were told to leave the town and had to live in exile for 45 days.

"Upon my return, my home looked like Lake Street [after the riots]. It kind of reminded me a little bit of that destruction and looting," he said. "Everything was looted from my house."

Business and property owners shouldn't wait around for "freebies" from the city, state or federal government, Sabri said, because that will slow down the rebuilding of Lake Street.

However, he did have one suggestion for the city and county. Lake Street businesses near Interstate 35W have dealt with a trifecta of pain: the freeway construction project, Covid-19 and riots.

"If the government wants to help everybody across the board, waive the real estate taxes completely for the year 2020," he said.

MINNESOTA PROMISES LATE JULY DECISION ON K-12 SCHOOLS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

Length: 645 wordsByline: Steve KarnowskiHighlight: MINNEAPOLIS (AP) - Minnesota health and education officials on Thursday asked school administrators to plan for three scenarios on reopening in the fall under the cloud of the coronavirus, and promised a decision by the last week of July on whether students can return for in-person classes.Body

Minnesota health and education officials on Thursday asked school administrators to plan for three scenarios on reopening in the fall under the cloud of the coronavirus, and promised a decision by the last week of July on whether students can return for in-person classes.

The state health and education departments asked K-12 school administrators to prepare for: in-person learning for all students; hybrid learning with social distancing and capacity limits; and distance learning only. They said their decisions may change toward fall as officials determine which contingency plan will best serve health and safety, and conceded that distance learning didn't work well for all students or their families.

Deputy Education Commissioner Heather Mueller said at a briefing that it's even possible that schools may have to switch models mid-year if coronavirus cases start to rise again.

The Minnesota Department of Health this week also issued new guidance for long-term care facilities, including nursing homes and assisted living centers, on how to allow window visits and outdoor visits as the pandemic unfolds.

Restrictions on visitors that have been in place since March have kept many older Minnesotans isolated from their families, Health Commissioner Jan Malcolm acknowledged. Many safety restrictions must remain in place she said, but added that officials understand the need to balance health concerns with psychological and social well-being.

Mueller said Minnesota schools just ended "a year like we've never seen before, that brought uncertainty and unforeseen challenges for our students, their families, our educators and our school communities. ... We know it was not easy, and it was especially hard for our communities of color and our indigenous communities."

Minnesota promises late July decision on K-12 schools

The Department of Health issued a 16-page planning guide for schools, while the Department of Education published a more extensive 100-page document.

"The trauma experienced by our students with the dramatic changes (that) the pandemic brought to their lives, and with the murder of George Floyd, students are going to need the caring and thoughtful adults in their lives to show up for them now more than ever before," Mueller said.

Republicans quickly criticized the state for waiting until late July to make a decision. Rep. Ron Kresha of Little Falls and Rep. Sondra Erickson of Princeton, the GOP leads on a pair of education committees, said in a statement that locally elected school boards and superintendents should be allowed to "chart the best path forward."

Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, of East Gull Lake, called it a "non-announcement ... This direction is as clear as mud, and the inability to make a decision will hamper learning for students in the fall."

Gazelka noted that the usage of intensive care beds by COVID-19 patients is down, the daily death toll is trending lower and the feared spike in cases after the mass protests over the Floyd's death hasn't materialized.

Gov. Tim Walz gave the order in mid-March for Minnesota public and charter schools to close and switch to distance learning as coronavirus cases were just starting to show up in the state. That order affected nearly 900,000 students and their families. The governor followed his school closure order with a statewide stay-at-home order later in March.

The governor later extended the closure through the school year, and essentially banned large-scale high school and college graduation ceremonies for the class of 2020 as the number of coronavirus cases in Minnesota grew. A mobile post office will open this week in the Kmart parking lot off Lake Street in south Minneapolis to help fill the service gap left by two postal facilities destroyed in the unrest following the death of George Floyd.

The mobile office at 10 W. Lake St. will be open 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Thursday and Friday, though it may return at a future date, according to U.S. Postal Service officials.

Customers may buy stamps and money orders and send packages at the mobile unit, using cash, checks and credit or debit cards. Post office box services and package pickups won't be available.

During the riots and looting that followed Floyd's death on May 25, the Minnehaha and Lake Street post offices were reduced to burned-out husks.

Postal officials say they are exploring options to re-establish permanent service for the neighborhoods along the Lake Street corridor. In a news release Wednesday, officials said the Postal Service "is already moving forward to provide customers with a local facility to call their own."

It was unclear whether both facilities will be replaced. The Lake Street site was owned by the Postal Service, while the Minnehaha facility was leased.

Customers in the 55406 ZIP code area who used the Minnehaha facility were referred to the main post office in downtown Minneapolis. Those who used the Lake Street post office from ZIP codes 55408 and 55409 are temporarily using a postal facility in Loring Park.

Special windows have been set up at the downtown facility for post office box customers and to retrieve mail held for damaged businesses or residences. About 1,300 customers had post office boxes in the destroyed facilities, officials said. Identification will be required for mail pickups.

Postal officials also said that street mailboxes removed from Minneapolis and St. Paul neighborhoods as a precautionary measure in recent weeks will be restored.

Mobile post office comes to Lake St.

"They will be back in service when it is deemed safe to do so, and when we are able to collect the mail within them without incident," officials said.

WASHINGTON - Portraits honoring four former House speakers who served in the Confederacy were removed Thursday after Speaker Nancy Pelosi declared that the men "embody the violent bigotry and grotesque racism of the Confederacy.?"

Pelosi directed the House clerk to oversee the immediate removal of portraits depicting former speakers from three Southern states: Robert Hunter of Virginia, James Orr of South Carolina and Howell Cobb and Charles Crisp, both of Georgia.

Calling the halls of Congress "the very heart of our democracy,?" Pelosi said, "There is no room in the hallowed halls of Congress or in any place of honor? to commemorate the Confederacy.

Hours later, the portraits were gone, taken away by workers and placed in storage. The ornately framed portraits had hung outside the House chamber for decades, barely noticed by lawmakers, staffers and journalists who crowded into the carpeted Speaker's Lobby adjacent to the chamber.

Three of the portraits hung near a staircase used by lawmakers to enter the House chamber; Crisp's portrait was in the Speaker's Lobby, where portraits of House leaders dating to the earliest days of the republic are displayed in honor.

Pelosi noted that Friday is Juneteenth, honoring the day in 1865 when many African Americans learned of the end of slavery after the Civil War. She called Juneteenth "a beautiful and proud celebration of freedom for African Americans" and noted that this year's celebration comes "during a moment of extraordinary national anguish, as we grieve for the hundreds of Black Americans killed by racial injustice and police brutality, including George Floyd, Breonna Taylor, Ahmaud Arbery and so many others."

Orr, who served as speaker from 1857-59, swore on the House floor to "preserve and perpetuate" slavery in order to "enjoy our property in peace, quiet and security," Pelosi said in her letter to the House clerk.

Portraits of former Confederate leaders removed from Capitol

Hunter, who served at nearly every level of the Confederacy, including as Confederate secretary of state, was speaker from 1839-41.

Cobb served as speaker from 1849-51, while Crisp served after the Civil War, from 1891-95.

Earlier this month, Pelosi urged the removal of Confederate statues from the Capitol and the renaming of U.S. military bases that honor Confederate Army officers.

The abrupt removal of the Confederate portraits brought back memories of 2015, when then-Speaker Paul Ryan ordered the removal of a portrait of former Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., after he pleaded guilty in federal court to breaking banking laws in a hush money scheme. The payments were meant to silence a male student that Hastert had sexually abused while he was teaching high school decades before.

In the Senate Thursday, Democrat Cory Booker of New Jersey, one of three black senators, unsuccessfully pressed for immediate passage of a bill to remove statues of Confederate notables such as Jefferson Davis of Mississippi, president of the Confederate States of America, from display in the Capitol.

"The continued presence of these statues in the halls is an affront to African Americans and the ideals of our nation," Booker said.

The chairman of the Senate Rules Committee, Sen. Roy Blunt, R-Mo., said he is open to holding a hearing on the bill, but he opposed immediate action because it would upend a process set in law governing the display of state-sponsored statues in the Capitol.

Blunt, a member of the GOP leadership team, said he is heartened by states such as Arkansas that are replacing Confederate statues on their own.

PUBLIC TRANSIT CEO LUTHER WYNDER SAYS CHANGE CAN START IN MINNESOTA

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

Body

Luther Wynder said he was so busy at work that it just didn't register with him immediately that something happened in Minneapolis on Memorial Day. He was eating when his brother called, in tears, to tell him about George Floyd.

Then it sank in.

The CEO of Minnesota Valley Transit Authority, the public transportation agency for the south metro, since 2016, Wynder moved to Minnesota from the East Coast, having previously served as chief performance officer for Delaware Transit Corp. Now he's a one-man marketing team for the state, having convinced his brother and a cousin's family to relocate here.

Wynder recently reflected on Floyd's death and all that has followed in an interview with the Business Journal. The conversation has been edited and condensed.

Public transit CEO Luther Wynder says change can start in Minnesota

I think what has been heartening to see is individuals coming together for some level of healing, to try to move the conversations forward about what changes need to be made here in the Twin Cities, and maybe nationally. Not only nationally; this started a global conversation in places as far away as Syria.

The great thing about public transit is we've been there. We've dealt with these kinds of issues, obviously, with Rosa Parks and the civil rights movement, and that's what led to integration on buses. I'm so proud to work in an industry that has seen change, that has seen change from a demonstration, from protest.

I hope the Twin Cities continues to move in a direction where it's just like public transit is today, where it's just a microcosm of society.

There are very few individuals of color who would say they have not had issues where they believe they maybe ran into some level of unconscious bias or racism. There are many different terms for it, but it all says that uneasy feeling.

I've always felt from personal experience that this place has been very welcoming and very accommodating. But just like any other place in the country, in the world, there's always work to do.

I knew if change was going to happen it was going to come from here, because it's a different perspective here, that I don't think people get unless you come here. It's not that the issues aren't here, but I do think there's a willingness to have the conversation, tackle those issues or try to work on those issues, to move forward.

In order to have change, you have to have discussion. In order to have change, you have to have realization that there's a problem.

Now, once you have some level of consensus from most individuals that there is a problem, that's when change can start to happen, because dialogue starts. I'm pleased to see the dialogue I've seen.

Whether it be some of the things the governor has talked about in terms of reform or what the Legislature is looking at - just that conversation, I think that's how change comes about. Now, what that looks like, I don't know. But I do think definitely some benefit is going to come from that.

I think it's about inclusion. I think the more voices you have at any table, the better the conversation is.

It won't be a harmonious conversation, but we don't necessarily want a harmonious conversation. We want an authentic dialogue, and that's how you move things forward.

If you feel that your business or you feel as if your organization doesn't have the minority representation that you may see in the diverse population, what steps can you take as an employer, what steps can you take as a government entity, what steps can you take to maximize, at least, opportunity for individuals to access those boards or those places of employment or those government jobs?

That's the thing: Everyone just wants the opportunity. Everyone wants the opportunity to have an encounter with any type of law enforcement and come out exactly the same. Everyone wants the opportunity to be seen, heard and move forward.

It's up to us as business leaders, up to us as organizations, as electeds, as community members, just to keep that in the forefront.

Public transit CEO Luther Wynder says change can start in Minnesota

Any given day there's news cycle. Any given day there's a new issue. A couple of weeks ago, it was about Covid, and Covid is still there. Covid is still very much a reality, very much a reality. But also, too, so is us trying to get to that more perfect union.

I have had friendships and acquaintances and talked to individuals who have disliked me just based on the color of my skin, but I have forged in my lifetime good working relationships with those individuals just through dialogue and talking about what our common humanity is, what our common goals are.

There's no parent alive who doesn't want their kids to go to school and come back safely. That's universal. There's no parent who doesn't love their son, daughter, sister, brother.

Once we start talking in those terms, we start to humanize each other. I think that's why this is different. That's why this will be different, hopefully. Because we should all be seeing each other just as human beings who want the same things.

At the Furniture Barn on University Avenue in St. Paul, you could hear the fans blowing from the street last week.

They were there to dry out the store, which was flooded by its sprinklers after looters set two fires in the building during civil unrest that followed the killing of George Floyd while in custody of Minneapolis police.

What merchandise wasn't looted from the sales floor was destroyed by water damage, as was all the furniture in the warehouse beneath the shop. Windows were broken. Tools and two delivery trucks were stolen.

"For the most part, we might as well say we got destroyed," said Randy Young, Furniture Barn's store manager.

St. Paul's Midway businesses plan comeback from destruction

However, at Furniture Barn, as well as elsewhere in the Midway neighborhood, many business owners plan to be open sooner rather than later. Young, for example, thinks the store will reopen sometime in July.

Even businesses that were totally leveled by arson are finding ways to get their feet under them.

Lloyd's Pharmacy on Snelling Avenue, which was completely destroyed by fire, plans to open in a smaller location nearby in July, said Chad Kulas, executive director of the Midway Chamber of Commerce. Lloyd's expects to reopen its current location sometime in 2021.

Bolé Ethiopian Cuisine, a restaurant on University Avenue, expects to operate out of a food truck for the time being while its owners plan its long-term future, Kulas said. Bolé has raised over $151,000 through a GoFundMe campaign since the restaurant was destroyed.

A group of local organizations called Neighbors United Funding Collaborative has launched the Midway United fund. Unlike some of the funds that are providing riot relief, Midway United is intended to provide long-term support for the neighborhood. It was already helping local businesses recover from economic losses due to Covid-19, receiving donations from corporations like Allianz Life Insurance Co. of North America, as well as from individuals.

Moving forward, the fund will try to support businesses owned by black, indigenous and people of color, as well as immigrants, said Brandon Long, executive director of the Union Park District Council. One reason for that focus is to help protect Midway's diverse character, which is threatened by not just Covid-19 and the cost of riot repairs, but also by outside developers attracted by the $957 million Green Line and the $250 million Allianz Field.

During a booming economy, redevelopment had sparked the creation of new small businesses like the LGBTQ bar Black Hart of St. Paul and new housing along University Avenue. Now that times are tougher, some business owners might opt to cut their losses, which Long and Kulas worry could be a recipe for gentrification.

"I'm definitely concerned we could lose that [neighborhood character] if people come in and redevelop," Kulas said.

Some businesses owners, like Nancy Rosenberg of Big Top Liquors, have said they're weighing all of their options moving forward and aren't committed to reopening.

A full picture of the damage to the neighborhood won't emerge until business owners hear back from insurance companies, if they're fortunate enough to be insured, Kulas said.

Furniture Barn's losses are likely covered by insurance. Young said that he noticed after the fires that the store had been paying $36 annually for a riot insurance policy. He joked that he would have deemed the clause a waste of $36 had he noticed it earlier.

"In St. Paul, Minnesota?" he said.

He's not complaining now.

"Thank God it was there," Young said

WEST BROADWAY WILL REBUILD, BUT WHO WILL BENEFIT FROM IT?

There's no question that the business district on West Broadway Avenue in North Minneapolis will recover from damages sustained in the days after a Minneapolis police officer killed George Floyd.

Who will lead the rebuilding, however, is an open question.

Community and business leaders are worried about land grabs and gentrification, fearing that North Minneapolis' main business district will be remade by outsiders.

Warren McLean, president of Northside Economic Opportunity Network, said he's already heard about land speculators who have made low-ball offers to entrepreneurs affected by destruction and arson. Those speculators are taking advantage of the desperation of others, he said.

While the bulk of the civil unrest after Floyd was killed happened along Minneapolis' Lake Street, a smaller group of people looted grocery stores, smashed windows and set fires in North Minneapolis the week Floyd died. That group also set fires in local businesses, including some blocks away from West Broadway's busiest areas.

West Broadway will rebuild, but who will benefit from it?

Many local businesses are particularly vulnerable because they either don't have insurance or have questionable policies, said Sarah Clyne, executive director at Northside Funders Group.

Clyne was on the street cleaning debris and boarding up business windows Friday, May 29, with Felicia Perry, an artist and executive director of the West Broadway Business and Area Coalition (WBC), when they decided to join forces and raise money to support the local community.

Their fundraiser has pulled in $1.95 million so far. The WBC will distribute the money as grants to local businesses, though parameters around the maximum size of a grant and who will be eligible haven't yet been determined. It will be similar to a separate $400,000 fund that Northside Funders Group distributed earlier this year to assist with economic recovery related to Covid-19; that fund supported 89 businesses with grants of up to $5,000.

The money is a nice start, but it won't be enough to return West Broadway to what it was, Clyne said. She doesn't yet have a figure for the damage, but is sure it's more than $1.95 million.

She believes that recovery will eventually require city, state and corporate partners, who won't understand what the area needs as well as those who live there. Clyne is urging those partners to focus their efforts around black Minneapolitans and native Northsiders.

"Rebuilding and restoration needs to be in the hands of the community that was impacted. We certainly don't want to displace folks in this moment," she said.

The week after the destruction, Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey announced a coalition to rebuild affected neighborhoods that included Perry of the WBC. Neither Perry nor a representative of the mayor's office could be reached for comment.

Much of the damage on West Broadway was to local, black-owned businesses. Flora's Hair Design, a black-owned hair salon that has operated in North Minneapolis since 1986, was destroyed by fire four days after Floyd was killed. Black-owned barbershop Fade Factory was also burned down. GoFundMe pages have raised hundreds of thousands of dollars to help those businesses reopen.

Organizations in North Minneapolis have long imagined a business community that is prosperous, led by multicultural entrepreneurs, and is sustainable, NEON's McLean said. Sustainability meaning that businesses on the Northside will have the stability to do things that other businesses take for granted, like buying quality insurance.

"The goal for our community is not just rebuilding, but transformation," he said.

JUNETEENTH: A DAY OF JOY AND PAIN - AND NOW NATIONAL ACTION

In just about any other year, Juneteenth, the holiday celebrating the day in 1865 that all enslaved black people learned they had been freed from bondage, would be marked by African American families across the nation with a cookout, a parade, a community festival, a soulful rendition of "Lift Ev'ry Voice and Sing."

But in 2020, as the coronavirus ravishes black America disproportionately, as economic uncertainty wrought by the pandemic strains black pocketbooks, and as police brutality continues to devastate black families, Juneteenth is a day of protest.

Red velvet cake, barbecued ribs and fruit punch are optional.

For many white Americans, recent protests over police brutality have driven their awareness of Juneteenth's significance.

"This is one of the first times since the '60s, where the global demand, the intergenerational demand, the multiracial demand is for systemic change," said Cornell University professor Noliwe Rooks, a segregation expert. "There is some understanding and acknowledgment at this point that there's something in the DNA of the country that has to be undone."

Friday's celebrations will be marked from coast to coast with marches and demonstrations of civil disobedience, along with expressions of black joy in spite of an especially traumatic time for the nation. And like the nationwide protests that followed the police involved deaths of black men and women in Minnesota, Kentucky and Georgia, Juneteenth celebrations are likely to be remarkably more multiracial.

"I think this year is going to be exciting to make white people celebrate with us that we're free," said 35-year-old Army veteran David J. Hamilton III, who has organized a Juneteenth march and protest through a predominantly black, Hispanic and immigrant neighborhood in the Brooklyn borough of New York.

Juneteenth: A day of joy and pain - and now national action

Hamilton, who is black, said this year is his first treating "Juneteenth with the same fanfare as the Fourth of July or Memorial Day."

In Tulsa, a day ahead of a planned presidential campaign rally Saturday for Donald Trump, the Rev. Al Sharpton and Tiffany Crutcher, the twin sister of a black man killed by a city police officer in 2016, plan keynote addresses about the consequences of racial prejudice. Their commemoration will take place in the Greenwood district, at the site known as Black Wall Street, where dozens of blocks of black-owned businesses were destroyed by a white mob in deadly race riots nearly a century ago.

In Washington, D.C., and around the country, activists affiliated with the Black Lives Matter movement will host in-person and virtual events to celebrate the history of the black liberation struggle and amplify their calls for defunding police in the wake of high-profile police killings of African Americans.

As of Thursday, organizers with the Movement for Black Lives said they had registered more than 275 Juneteenth weekend events across 45 states, through its website.

Rashawn Ray, a David Rubenstein Fellow at the nonprofit public policy Brookings Institution, said many now view Juneteenth as an opportunity for education and to push to dismantle structural racism.

"There's going to be a lot of people who are also going to double down on the push for reparations," Ray said. "There's no reason why black people have been the only group in the United States to be systematically discriminated against, legally, by the federal government and not receive reparations."

Juneteenth marks the day on June 19, 1865, that Union soldiers told enslaved African Americans in Galveston, Texas, that the Civil War had ended and they were free. The Emancipation Proclamation freed the slaves in the South in 1863 but it was not enforced in many places until after the end of the Civil War in 1865.

The day is recognized in 47 states and the District of Columbia, according to the National Juneteenth Observance Foundation. Hawaii, North Dakota and South Dakota are the only states without an official recognition. And it is not yet a federal holiday. It took roughly 18 years after the assassination of the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr. before his birthday was observed as a federal holiday.

Still, more workers than perhaps ever in history will have the day off on Friday: Nike, the NFL, Twitter and its mobile payments services company Square, along with a handful of media outlets, have announced plans to observe Juneteenth as a company holiday. On Wednesday, New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo signed an executive order recognizing Juneteenth as a paid holiday for state employees.

The abolition of slavery in the U.S. was followed by the birth of Jim Crow segregation, relegating many black Americans to poor, redlined neighborhoods with under-resourced schools. After the passage of landmark civil rights protections in the 1960s, decades of mass incarceration policy and employment discrimination eroded opportunities and economic stability for black people and families. All along, police brutality has been a fixture of the black American experience. And now, COVID-19 is killing black people at more than three times the rate that it kills white people.

Much of the systemic racism and atrocities visited on black Americans have gone unanswered. This week, the Equal Justice Initiative, which in 2015 cataloged thousands of racial terror lynchings of black people by white mobs, added nearly 2,000 Reconstruction-era lynchings confirmed between 1865 and 1876, bringing the total number of documented lynchings to nearly 6,500.

Juneteenth: A day of joy and pain - and now national action

"Our continued silence about the history of racial injustice has fueled many of the current problems surrounding police violence, mass incarceration, racial inequality and the disparate impact of COVID-19," said Bryan Stevenson, director of the Equal Justice Initiative.

"We need a new era of truth and justice in America," he said in a statement. "We must acknowledge our long history of racial oppression and then repair the damage this history has created - including the presumption of dangerousness that gets assigned to black people by police and others."

Juneteenth also comes at a time when the nation is at a political crossroads, and Black Voters Matter co-founder LaTosha Brown said it is shaping up to be a politically defining moment ahead of the November election.

"The devaluing of black lives is built into this American system to the point that the ideas around democracy don't apply to us the same way that they apply to white folks," Brown said, adding black voters are demanding change.

"So Juneteenth is a celebratory event but we're not celebrating the country. We're celebrating our own freedom and our own ability to be liberated and the resiliency of black people."

AP-NORC POLL: MANY IN US SAY PROTEST IMPACT WILL BE POSITIVE

A majority say they approve of the protests.

NEW YORK - Ahead of the Juneteenth holiday weekend's demonstrations against systemic racism and police brutality, more than 4 in 10 Americans say they expect recent protests around the country will bring positive change. A majority say they approve of the protests.

Despite headline-making standoffs between law enforcement and protesters in cities nationwide, the poll from The Associated Press-NORC Center for Public Affairs Research finds a majority of Americans think law enforcement officers have generally responded to the protests appropriately. Somewhat fewer say officers used excessive force.

The findings follow weeks of peaceful protests and unrest in response to the death of George Floyd, a Black man who died pleading for air on May 25 after a white Minneapolis police officer held his knee on Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes. A dramatic change in public opinion on race and policing has followed, with more Americans today than five years ago calling police violence a very serious problem that unequally targets Black Americans.

Bill Ardren, a 75-year-old retired resident of Maple Grove, Minnesota, a suburb of Minneapolis, said he supports the protests. He blames protesters and law enforcement equally for why some demonstrations turned into ugly clashes scarred by looting and arson.

"People finally got fed up because of this last incident," said Ardren, referring to Floyd's death, "and it spread all over the country."

The new poll finds 54% of Americans say they approve of the protests, while 32% disapprove. Another 14% say they hold neither opinion.

More think the protests will mostly change the country for the better than bring about negative change, 44% to 21%. A third say they won't make much difference.

AP-NORC poll: Many in US say protest impact will be positive

An Associated Press tally of known arrests through June 4 found more than 10,000 people were arrested at demonstrations in the U.S., many of which defied citywide curfews and some daytime orders to disperse. The count grew by the hundreds each day, as protesters were met with overwhelming shows of force by local officers, state police and National Guard members. Los Angeles had more than a quarter of the nation's arrests, according to the AP's tally, followed by New York, Dallas and Philadelphia.

One of the nation's largest demonstrations took place in Philadelphia on June 6, when tens of thousands of people met near the Philadelphia Museum of Art and peacefully marched through Center City. Kipp Gilmore-Clough, a resident of the city and associate pastor at Chestnut Hill United Church, joined that day's protest and said that kind of response to police abuse was "long overdue."

"I've been fairly heartened by the ongoing presence in the streets, because the systemic racism that has generated these protests is longstanding and deeply embedded," said Gilmore-Clough, who's among those who believe the protests will have a positive impact. "My hope is that this persistence leads to results, changes of laws, changes of institutions and changes to our patterns that have normalized white supremacy."

Seven percent of Americans say they've participated in a protest in the past few weeks. While Black Americans were significantly more likely to say so than white Americans, the poll found about half of those who said they protested were white. The demonstrations have been noted as remarkably diverse compared with those seen as affiliated with the Black Lives Matter movement that emerged nearly seven years ago.

About 8 in 10 Black Americans say they approve of the protests. About half of white Americans approve, while about a third disapprove.

Overall, Americans are somewhat more likely to say the protests have been peaceful than violent, 27% vs. 22%, but 51% think there's been a mix of both. White Americans are more likely than Black Americans to call protests violent, 20% to 7%, though 54% of white Americans say there has been a mix.

Gilmore-Clough said he was disappointed by law enforcement's use of excessive force at the protests. At times, police officers across the country were caught on video indiscriminately swinging batons, firing rubber bullets, deploying tear gas and pepper spray - even shoving people to the ground. Officers in many other places joined protesters, including some symbolically kneeling alongside demonstrators.

A majority of Americans, 55%, say law enforcement responded to recent protests appropriately, while fewer, 44%, say they used excessive force. And 54% say President Donald Trump's response to the recent unrest - he suggested sending the U.S. military into cities where local officials struggled to quell unrest, before later backing off the idea - made things worse.

Just 12% say Trump made things better, while 33% say his response had no impact.

Anne Oredeko, a supervising attorney in the racial justice unit of the Legal Aid Society of New York, one of the nation's largest public defender agencies, said the New York Police Department's response to peaceful protests undermined civil rights. Mass arrests also threatened public health during the coronavirus pandemic, making the idea that anyone believes the law enforcement response was appropriate troubling, she said.

AP-NORC poll: Many in US say protest impact will be positive

"There's something deeply bankrupt about our inability to see the value of life, across color and ethnicity," Oredeko said. "There's something missing in this country. If you understand the point that protesters are making, saying that there is a deep distrust of police and a need for systemic reforms, your response shouldn't be to maim them."

While 7 in 10 Black Americans said law enforcement officers responded to the protests with excessive force, about half as many white Americans said that. Roughly 6 in 10 white Americans said law enforcement officers responded to protests appropriately.

Destiny Merrell, a 20-year-old Black college student from Unadilla, Georgia, said she has not participated in the protests out of fear she could be harmed by police or other demonstrators.

"We matter, but we don't matter to certain people," she said.

Fingerhut reported from Washington.

The AP-NORC poll of 1,310 adults was conducted June 11-15 using a sample drawn from NORC's probability-based AmeriSpeak Panel, which is designed to be representative of the U.S. population. The margin of sampling error for all respondents is plus or minus 3.7 percentage points.

Though the WNBA season is set to begin next month, the Lynx's work on reform - centered racial equality and criminal justice - is far from finished.

Cheryl Reeve made that much clear Thursday.

"This is really what's at the forefront of our minds," Minnesota's coach and general manager said in a conference call Thursday. "Playing basketball is what we do, but a bigger part of us is wanting to make the world a better place for everyone."

Reeve didn't mince words when discussing what must be done locally - specifically with the Minneapolis Police Department - to spark such changes.

"If we don't have change at the top, this is never going to get better," she said. "So we continue to call for the removal of (Lt.) Bob Kroll as the head of the union."

The Lynx and Kroll have a history. In 2016, days after Philando Castile was shot and killed in Falcon Heights, the Lynx decided to hold a pregame news conference featuring Rebekkah Brunson, Maya Moore, Seimone Augustus and Lindsay Whalen. They wore T-shirts stating "Change Starts With Us" on the front and "Black Lives Matter" on the back, and spoke out against racial profiling and a two-tier criminal justice system. It was an attempt to raise awareness of the issues and start working toward change.

Four off-duty Minneapolis Police Officers who were set to work security that night walked out of the arena in protest of the Lynx's protest.

Kroll responded to various media outlets that week by saying the Lynx were "wading into waters that they shouldn't," adding they're professional athletes who should "stick with playing ball." He also said the Lynx only needed four off-duty officers at games because they "have such a pathetic draw."

Even after Lynx season starts, their battle for justice will continue

In the midst of the riots that stemmed from Floyd's killing last month, Kroll wrote a letter to union members blasting the state's leadership for their lack of support as the city burned. He also said Floyd had a "violent criminal history" and said he was working with labor attorneys to "fight" for the jobs of the four cops fired for the part they played in Floyd's death, saying they were "terminated without due process."

Several entities have decided to part ways with the MPD, from Minneapolis Public Schools to the Park Board. Reeve was asked if the MPD would still work Lynx games at Target Center. She suggested that isn't the organization's call. Target Center is city owned. And while Reeve would be in favor of removing MPD from the sidelines at games, she doesn't think that's a long-term solution to current issues.

"The solution is to make meaningful change," Reeve said, "as (MPD) chief (Medaria) Arradondo is trying to do."

Reeve insinuated the union, as currently constructed, is getting in the way of such change. She said the union was supposed to be "a voice for the black and brown employees, not to be a safe haven for aggressive cops."

"And until that changes, it doesn't matter what we do," she said.

And Reeve doesn't think that will change so long as Kroll is in a leadership position. How do you remove him? She's not sure.

"I just know that there is a union and a vote and people say it's hard to remove somebody. But I would say the laundry list of his discriminate behavior would be enough, which is concerning, because he was voted to be that leader," Reeve said. "The culture is rotten, and we've got to cut off the head of the snake to make real progress."

Reeve suggested people are now truly understanding the work Moore, who is set to miss another Lynx season, has been doing to help reform the criminal justice system. Reeve herself is proud of the work the Lynx put forth in an attempt to make change in 2016, "but I also feel like we didn't get there, so to speak."

"Not a whole lot had changed," Reeve said. "So I want to be better."

So she and her players will keep this current discussion as an "A" topic in the constant conversation about what needs to change and how. Reeve will keep talking about it, and she hopes the media doesn't grow tired of listening.

"This is what's interesting, during this time, is when people start talking about things that black people have been talking about for years. ... We've been talking about these things, we've been talking about it for years. I think this is the tipping point for many of us," she said. "We're not going away and you have to be relentless, just as the great players are relentless in their pursuit of being great. This is what it's going to take to reach the idea that it's not enough just to do one or two things. Reaching an equitable situation for all, that's a tall order, because there are many people that don't want that change."

Even after Lynx season starts, their battle for justice will continue

Reeve said there have been many conversations centered on what players can do in this continued battle, while also playing out the season. She said players will be "hard at work" finding different ways "to continue to amplify these problems."

"I think what we're going to do down there in Bradenton," she said, "should end up proving to be pretty powerful."

OTHER VOICES: THE TIMELY LESSONS OF JUNETEENTH

The cause of equal rights for African Americans got a modest, yet thoroughly unexpected, boost from perhaps the least likely of figures when President Donald Trump announced he was going to hold his first political rally in months in Tulsa, Okla., on June 19. This is the date known as Juneteenth, when the end of slavery in this country is commemorated. And Tulsa is the site of the Tulsa Race Massacre of 1921, an awful incident of racial violence in U.S. history that may have left hundreds dead (unreliable records leave the exact count in dispute 99 years later).

A furor so pronounced that even the White House noticed ensued, and the rally was moved one day. A small victory for the cause of social justice, admittedly, but a telling one. Symbols and holidays, statues and flags, they all have meaning. And 2020 deserves to be one of the most meaningful Juneteenth celebrations on record.

It is not overly dramatic to suggest that the United States is having a racial reckoning right now. The televised death of George Floyd, who pleaded for his life while under the knee of a now-former Minneapolis police officer, was the May 25 kickoff. And how police specifically, and the criminal justice system generally, deals unfairly with minorities has been the central focus. But Black Lives Matter and the protests that have spread across the country these last three weeks also address something much more fundamental: How is the founding document's aspiration of "all men are created equal" looking nearly 244 years after it was signed up the road in Philadelphia?

The answer? Clearly still aspirational. We are not yet there, not by any reasonable measure. Not when blacks suffer higher unemployment, worse health care outcomes - including a greater likelihood of death from the coronavirus - more often victimized by violence, more commonly imprisoned, receive lower pay and less schooling than their white counterparts. And the list of inequities is much longer than that.

That makes Juneteenth the right holiday for the times. Not just because it's about achieving freedom and equality for those who had previously been enslaved, but because of its peculiar circumstances. Juneteenth is not set on the day that Robert E. Lee surrendered at Appomattox. That was more than two months earlier, on April 9. It is not celebrated on the day that Abraham Lincoln signed the Emancipation Proclamation. That was more than two years prior, on Jan. 1, 1863.

No, Juneteenth recognizes the day the last outpost of slavery was given the word that the chains were coming off. It's the day in 1865 when Gordon Granger, a Union general, came to Galveston, Texas, to read aloud orders that all enslaved people in Texas had been set free - and had with him enough troops to make sure that directive was enforced.

The lesson here is that freedom isn't achieved with the stroke of a pen. It isn't always granted equally or willingly or peacefully. And so, to cap a week that saw the self-described "law and order" president sign an executive order intended to encourage police reform, and when stronger measures to prevent tragedies like the murder of George Floyd are being debated in Washington, D.C., and in state capitals across the nation and in seats of local government, we are reminded that this moment is neither the beginning nor the end of the crusade.

To quote civil rights activist and lyricist James Weldon Johnson, there is a hopeful future "out from the gloomy past," so let us "lift ev'ry voice and sing." Not because new laws are being debated or politicians are making speeches but because the cause is just and Americans increasingly support it.

What could not have been imagined a few years ago let alone a century and a half is the degree to which the current protests have won over hearts and minds around the world. A poll published this week by the Pew Research Center found about two-thirds of Americans support the Black Lives Matter movement. Support among minorities is higher, but even six out of 10 whites contacted for the survey endorsed it (or roughly the same percentage as Americans who find President Trump "prejudiced" under another recent Pew poll).

The evidence can be seen everywhere. In police officers kneeling with protesters. In the diversity of the crowds, young and old, black and white, urban and rural. In parallel protests in foreign countries. This nation has come a long way since Gen. Granger read that order. It still has a way to go. As many will likely sing on Juneteenth and beyond, "Let us march on 'til victory is won."

Editor's note: This editorial originally referred to Union General Gordon Granger as "The Rock of Chicamauga." That was incorrect. Union General George Henry Thomas was known as "The Rock of Chicamauga."

Juneteenth, a day of celebration marking the abolition of slavery for millions in the United States, has merged this year with the wave of activism sparked in Minneapolis by the death of George Floyd to take on added significance.

And while the last holiday, Memorial Day, brought Floyd's death, organizers say that Juneteenth will be the first holiday since then to celebrate his life.

The Twin Cities' biggest Juneteenth festival was canceled this year due to the COVID-19 pandemic. But a long slate of events are planned for Friday in Minneapolis, St. Paul and the metro suburbs, many featuring entertainment, free food and rallies, and incorporating donation drives.

Misha Bartlett said the fresh attention paid to the holiday shows how far the country has come, though there's still a long way to go.

"I think there has been a place in time that has been opened up and I think it's going to define us all as a world," said Bartlett, an organizer of the Juneteenth celebration sponsored by Unite & Rebuild MSP, one of the events planned Friday in the Twin Cities.

An 8 a.m. memorial run for Floyd will kick off outside Cup Foods at the south Minneapolis corner where he died, followed by a cookout and donation drive. People are planning to gather outside the State Capitol for a Juneteenth Reparations Rally at 1 p.m. hosted by Black Lives Matter Minnesota and other activist groups.

The day also will be marked in some suburbs. Apple Valley's Kelley Park will host Ashes to Beauty Block Party Friday evening, with food ven dors and retail from black owners. At Brooklyn Park City Hall, local leaders will hold a social justice rally.

Juneteenth events pop up across metro area

Juneteenth marks June 19, 1865, when enslaved African-Americans in Galveston, Texas, first learned that the Civil War was over and that they were free under the Emancipation Proclamation signed 2½ years before.

Minneapolis for years has hosted large Juneteenth celebrations. In 2010, more than 15,000 people came together on the North Side for Twin Cities Juneteenth, one of the largest such celebrations in the country.

Now activists are calling for Juneteenth to be recognized as a national holiday. Officials with Target, U.S. Bank and Best Buy all recently announced they will make it a company holiday.

"There is going to be an absolute large number of people that will engage in [Juneteenth] because of the time and space we're in. I think this is going to be a really great day of awareness for people," Bartlett said.

Sounds of Blackness singer Jamecia Bennett will perform at the Unite & Rebuild MSP event in the parking lot of Target in the Longfellow neighborhood of south Minneapolis, the center of much of the protesting and rioting along E. Lake Street that followed Floyd's death.

The popular ensemble is releasing a new single in honor of Floyd, Breonna Taylor, Ahmaud Arbery and other recent victims of racist violence. Music director and producer Gary Hines said the song, "Sick and Tired," was inspired by the words of the late black activist Fannie Lou Hamer.

"Juneteenth is the vanguard of really highlighting the relevance of everything that's happening today with 1865. It's all part of the same story and all interconnected even though a century apart," Hines said.

Bennett, who will perform with her band J Movement, said this Juneteenth will be different from years past. While she didn't like to see buildings burn in the aftermath of Floyd's death, she said, "It was a battle cry of 'See us, hear us, feel us.' We are free and we have to be treated as such."

"We celebrate this day every year, but I think this year has a much broader meaning," she said. "I think people have become more involved since the George Floyd incident. People's eyes have been open to a lot of things. ... For the first time, we're at a pause. We have no choice but to allow this to resonate."

The death of George Floyd was a chapter in a story that is as old as our nation and is, sadly, still being written in communities across the country. Philando Castile, Breonna Taylor, Rayshard Brooks: These names serve stark notice that policing across the United States needs transformational reform.

The problems with policing are deeply rooted in the structural racism that permeates our society and its institutions. The current rallying cries around "defunding," "dismantling" or "abolishing" the police are grounded in a basic truth that sweeping and visionary reforms are needed.

The answer is not to simply defund or dismantle the police. We need to address societal racism and rebuild our infrastructure so that we can reduce our reliance on policing. Minneapolis receives more than 400,000 calls for police services every year. Housing, education, health care, mental health and the environment are key fronts for enhancing safety.

Without a doubt, the Minneapolis Police Department needs transformational reform. But we oppose the current proposal to amend the Minneapolis City Charter to remove the Police Department. This charter amendment will not advance the transformational reform that is needed. In fact, it is a distraction from the necessary work at hand.

We believe we have a leader in place who can bring about the much needed change in the Police Department if he has adequate support. Chief Medaria Arradondo is an ethical, professional and compassionate leader. He knows our city and loves its people. He has a reform agenda, but has experienced opposition from the police union and has lacked support from the City Council. We call on our citizens to support Chief Arradondo in his effort to transform our Police Department.

We have an opportunity brought about by tragedy but it is an opportunity we can't waste. Minneapolis can become a model for the nation by rethinking the mission of policing. Only then can Minneapolis fulfill this moment and develop a new, bold model for a safe, inclusive community.

WASHINGTON - Sen. Amy Klobuchar of Minnesota announced late Thursday that she was withdrawing from consideration to be the running mate of former Vice President Joe Biden on the Democratic ticket.

Klobuchar, who mounted her own campaign for the presidency before dropping out and becoming one of Biden's most spirited surrogates, said during an MSNBC interview that she called Biden on Wednesday night and told him he should choose a woman of color to be his running mate.

Klobuchar, a moderate and veteran of the Senate like Biden, was known to have a strong rapport with the presumptive Democratic nominee and was an early favorite of a significant number of his donors and supporters. But her case for being Biden's running mate was badly damaged after the Memorial Day killing of George Floyd in the custody of Minneapolis police officers. The death, which has prompted weeks of demonstrations and protests against police violence across the country, led to renewed scrutiny of Klobuchar's career as Hennepin County attorney.

Klobuchar oversaw the first prosecution of 17-year-old Myon Burrell in the 2002 killing of an 11-year-old Minneapolis girl, and an investigation by the Associated Press raised serious questions about the verdict and shadowed her presidential campaign.

"After what I've seen in my state and what I've seen across the country, this is a historic moment and America must seize on this moment," she said on MSNBC. "I truly believe, as I told the vice president last night, that I believe that this is a moment to put a woman of color on that ticket."

In a Twitter post late Thursday, Biden praised Klobuchar and described her as a key ally in the contest to beat President Donald Trump in November.

Amy Klobuchar withdraws from consideration to be Biden's running mate

Biden committed to naming a woman as his vice presidential pick during a debate with Sen. Bernie Sanders on March 15. His team's search committee has contacted roughly a dozen women, and eight or nine are being vetted more intensively, according to people familiar with the process.

Sen. Kamala Harris of California, who also ran against Biden and is the only black woman in the Senate, is widely regarded as a strong candidate for the vice presidential slot. Several other black women are being vetted by Biden's search committee, including two whose prospects have risen as the national debate over racial justice amplifies calls for him to select a woman of color: Rep. Val Demings of Florida and Mayor Keisha Lance Bottoms of Atlanta. Biden is also considering Susan Rice, the former national security adviser under President Barack Obama, the people familiar with the process have said.

Klobuchar was still being vetted until her Wednesday night phone call to Biden, according to a person familiar with Biden's selection process. But in conversations earlier this week, Klobuchar suggested to friends that she recognized that her own history made it difficult for Biden to select her, given the widespread Black Lives Matter protests.

As Hennepin County attorney, Klobuchar developed a tough-on-crime reputation 20 years ago that is a difficult fit with modern Democratic Party politics. Although she has rebutted criticism that she failed to prosecute police misconduct, her record was scrutinized during the presidential campaign and would quite likely have become a major headache for Biden's campaign had he selected her as the running mate.

One person she spoke with Monday said Klobuchar relayed then that she understood she would not be selected and said she cited the scrutiny of her record as prosecutor. A Klobuchar spokeswoman disputed the recollection of the call.

Klobuchar's declaration that Biden should choose a woman of color created something of an awkward political dynamic for Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, another former presidential rival who is being considered by Biden as a possible running mate. Warren is the most prominent and formidable white candidate in the running, and she is far along in the vetting process.

Other white candidates under consideration include Sen. Tammy Baldwin of Wisconsin, Gov. Gretchen Whitmer of Michigan and Gov. Gina Raimondo of Rhode Island.

Asked by MSNBC host Lawrence O'Donnell if her past record as a prosecutor would have made it difficult for her to "function" as Biden's running mate, Klobuchar said it was not a factor in her decision.

"I think I could have functioned fine," she said. "There's a lot of untruths out there about my record, and now is not the time to debate them."

Sen. Amy Klobuchar said Thursday night that she asked Democratic presidential candidate Joe Biden to take her name out of consideration as his vice presidential running mate, and recommended that he choose a woman of color.

"America must seize on this moment, and I truly believe, as I told the vice president last night, that I think this is a moment to put a woman of color on the ticket," Klobuchar said in an interview on MSNBC.

In a follow-up interview with the Star Tribune, Klobuchar clarified that she reached out to Biden to ask him to pull her name from his VP list, not the other way around. She said she was still being vetted for the vice presidential slot, though many Democrats believe Klobuchar's chances suffered after the unrest that sprang up in the wake of George Floyd's killing by Minneapolis police officers on May 25.

"I told him how hard this has been in our state, and how tragic it's been, and how I've got a lot of work to do as Minnesota's senator," Klobuchar said. She said Biden was "kind" in response.

Many leading Democrats have called on Biden to choose a woman of color to round out his ticket, especially after the nationwide Black Lives Matter-inspired protests that followed Floyd's death.

Klobuchar, who has represented Minnesota as a U.S. senator since 2007, mounted her own bid for the Democratic presidential nomination this year. She finished an unexpected third in the New Hampshire primary, but poor showings in several subsequent states pushed her out of the race by early March.

Klobuchar immediately endorsed Biden upon dropping out, which helped propel him to a surprise win in Minnesota's presidential primary. It also quickly put her on a shortlist of VP prospects, but she subsequently fell as pressure grew on Biden to choose a woman of color.

Klobuchar said such a move would help the country heal. She declined the chance to suggest any possibilities. Among those mentioned have been Sen. Kamala Harris of California, Rep. Val Demings of Florida, Atlanta Mayor Keisha Lance Bottoms, and New Mexico Gov. Michelle Lujan Grisham.

Sen. Klobuchar drops from VP consideration

Klobuchar said she sees an important role for herself in the Senate in pushing legislation to respond to the questions and concerns raised anew by Floyd's death. Klobuchar is hoping to lead in the Senate on protecting and expanding voting rights, which has emerged as a contentious issue in this year's presidential race.

WASHINGTON - The Air Force inspector general is investigating whether the military improperly used a little-known reconnaissance plane to monitor protests in Washington and Minneapolis this month, the Air Force said on Thursday.

The inquiry was apparently prompted by lawmakers who expressed concerns to Pentagon officials that the use of military surveillance airplanes may have violated the civil liberties of the mostly peaceful protesters demonstrating against the police killings of George Floyd in Minneapolis as well as other African Americans around the United States.

"Following discussions with the secretary of defense about shared concerns, the secretary of the Air Force is conducting an investigation into the use of Air National Guard RC-26 aircraft to support civil authorities during recent protest activity in U.S. cities," Brig. Gen. Patrick S. Ryder, the chief Air Force spokesman, said in response to questions from the New York Times.

In a statement, Ryder declined to address any other questions, pending completion of the investigation led by Lt. Gen. Sami D. Said, the Air Force inspector general.

The Air Force's action comes days after the Pentagon's top intelligence policy official told Congress that the nation's military intelligence agencies did not spy on American protesters during the wave of nationwide demonstrations.

In a letter last week to the House Intelligence Committee, Joseph D. Kernan, the undersecretary of defense for intelligence and security, said he had received no orders from the Trump administration to conduct such surveillance, and he underscored citizens' constitutional right to protest peacefully.

Air Force reviewing use of reconnaissance plane during Minneapolis, Washington protests

Kernan reminded lawmakers of the role of Pentagon intelligence agencies to help defend against foreign interference in domestic political affairs.

The deployment of more than 5,000 National Guard members to the nation's capital, and thousands more to cities across the country to help quell the civil unrest, has cast a harsh spotlight on the National Guard's response to the protests.

Defense Secretary Mark T. Esper last week ordered a review of the National Guard's response, and the new Air Force inquiry is expected to shed light on how and why the secretive RC-26 and some supporting ground units were deployed.

The deployment of U.S. military intelligence units on American soil in support of domestic law enforcement operations is unusual, but it has happened before.

In 2002, at the request of the FBI, the Army deployed secret surveillance planes as part of a broadening effort to catch a sniper in the Washington area.

ATLANTA - Atlanta police officers called out sick Thursday to protest the filing of murder charges against an officer who shot a man in the back, while the interim chief acknowledged members of the force feel abandoned amid protests demanding massive changes to policing.

Interim Chief Rodney Bryant told The Associated Press in an interview that the sick calls began Wednesday night and continued Thursday, but said the department has sufficient staff to protect the city. It's not clear how many officers have called out.

"Some are angry. Some are fearful. Some are confused on what we do in this space. Some may feel abandoned," Bryant said of the officers. "But we are there to assure them that we will continue to move forward and get through this."

Prosecutors brought felony murder and other charges against Garrett Rolfe, a white officer who shot Rayshard Brooks after the 27-year-old black man grabbed a Taser during a struggle and ran, firing it at the officer, Fulton County District Attorney Paul Howard said.

Howard said Brooks was not a deadly threat at the time and that the officer kicked the wounded man and offered no medical treatment for over two minutes as he lay dying. Another officer, Devin Brosnan, who the district attorney said stood on Brooks' shoulder as he struggled for his life, was charged with aggravated assault and violation of his oath.

Rolfe and Brosnan both contend their actions were justified and turned themselves in Thursday. Jail records show Brosnan was released on a signature bond, meaning he only has to pay if he fails to show up for court, while Rolfe was being held without bond. Rolfe has been fired and Brosnan placed on desk duty.

Atlanta police call out sick to protest charges in shooting

A few hours after reporting to the Fulton County jail in Atlanta, Rolfe was moved to the jail in neighboring Gwinnett County, according to online records.

The decision to prosecute the officers came less than five days after the killing rocked a city - and a nation - still reeling after George Floyd's death at the hands of police in Minneapolis set off nationwide protests that have urged an extensive rethink of policing and an examination of racism in the United States.

L. Chris Stewart, a lawyer for Tomika Miller, Brooks' widow, told reporters the charging of the officers brought the family no joy.

"Some people thought that we'd be happy and be celebrating and have a fist in the air, but it's more a disappointment that this is the state of policing and this is where we're at," he said.

Bryant, who took over after the previous chief resigned in the wake of the shooting, wore a navy blue shirt Thursday, rather than the white shirt typically worn by command staff, to show solidarity with the officers.

In the roughly three weeks since protests of Floyd's killing first broke out in Georgia's capital, officers have worked shifts of 12 or more hours and have been yelled at, spit on and had things thrown at them, Bryant said.

"At some point, people get tired, I recognize that, and physically exhausted," he said. "We will definitely get beyond it, and I'm certain that we will see our sick-outs drop back to normal, average."

The weeks since Floyd's killing have seen lawmakers pass police reforms, Americans reconsider statues commemorating controversial figures, and ideas like defunding police become part of the national conversation. The largest labor group in the Seattle area voted to expel the city's police union Wednesday, saying the guild representing officers failed to address racism in its ranks, and California's police chiefs on Thursday endorsed a plan to more aggressively weed out cops who break the law or have a history of complaints.

But the drive for change has also drawn pushback, and divisions over the role police should play are becoming a major political flashpoint.

Georgia Gov. Brian Kemp, a Republican, issued a strong message of support for police on Thursday.

"We remember those who died in the line of duty and their families, who still mourn their passing," he said in a video his office posted to social media.

While some have hailed the prosecutor's office for moving quickly in the Brooks killing, Bryant said he was surprised at the speed, noting that the Georgia Bureau of Investigation hadn't yet finished looking into it.

He would not say how many officers called out. But just one officer showed up for work Thursday morning in one zone, which several dozen are assigned to patrol, according to Vince Champion, southeast regional director for the International Brotherhood of Police Officers.

Atlanta officers are walking off their shifts or not responding to calls because they feel "abandoned, betrayed, used in a political game," Champion told the AP.

Atlanta police call out sick to protest charges in shooting

Champion said he's heard from several officers that they fear using force to protect themselves will get them fired or arrested.

Brooks' funeral is set for Tuesday at Atlanta's historic Ebenezer Baptist Church, which was the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.'s congregation, the Rev. Raphael Warnock announced. Tyler Perry, the actor and filmmaker, has offered financial help for the services, officials said.

Warnock urged people to remember all the lives lost in recent weeks in interactions with police.

"Tragically and involuntarily they all have become visible victims in an urgent public conversation about justice and fairness in our nation," said Warnock.

Police in Atlanta were called to a Wendy's last week over complaints of a car blocking the drive-thru lane and found Brooks asleep behind the wheel. A breath test showed he was intoxicated. Officers had a relatively calm conversation with Brooks before things rapidly turned violent when officers tried to handcuff him.

Rolfe shot Brooks after he grabbed a Taser, fired it and ran, Howard, the prosecutor, said. But when the officer fired, Brooks was too far from him for the Taser to be a danger, and it had already been fired twice, so it was empty, Howard said.

Rolfe's lawyers said he feared for his and others' safety. Rolfe opened fire after hearing a sound "like a gunshot and saw a flash in front of him," apparently from the Taser.

The felony murder charge against Rolfe, 27, carries life in prison or the death penalty, if prosecutors decide to seek it. He was also charged with 10 other offenses punishable by decades behind bars.

The district attorney said the other officer, Brosnan, 26, is cooperating with prosecutors and will testify. But his attorneys said he hasn't agreed to be a witness for prosecutors.

One of this lawyers, Don Samuel, said Thursday that Brosnan suffered a concussion during the struggle with Brooks and put his foot on Brooks only briefly when he heard gunshots because he didn't know where they were coming from.

"He's worried that he may have access to a weapon," Samuel said.

Minnesota State Science Standards are changing to include standards about climate change. I applaud the Minnesota Department of Education for taking a stance on this increasingly urgent issue. I would like to see similar progressive action taken for English Language Arts.

The death of George Floyd in Minneapolis has pushed the world into an urgency for action. Minnesota State ELA Standards need to reflect this desire for change. I propose making a change to explicitly include standards about race and inclusivity.

As a high school English teacher, I have appreciated the freedom the standards allow in terms of texts and assignments. This freedom is necessary for culturally relevant pedagogy so that teachers can pick texts and assignments that are relevant to their students. However, the standards explicitly cite Shakespeare as a necessary text (11.4.4.4 and 11.4.7.7). Yet, the word "race" is never mentioned. Page 8 of the ELA Academic Standards states that "The Standards define what all students are expected to know and be able to do, not how teachers should teach." In order to be an informed citizen in the United States, it is necessary to study American race relations because it affects all aspects of American life. I would argue that reading and viewing texts from diverse racial perspectives is at least as necessary and helpful as reading Shakespeare.

The standards as they are make it possible for a school to have an English curriculum with all white authors. In my years as an educator, I have noticed a resistance to including non-white authors, particularly as you move farther away from the Twin Cities. For example, I was teaching at a high school 45 minutes from Minneapolis. The veteran teachers had a curriculum that I had to follow; I could not deviate from what they had already set up. Throughout the year, I noticed a lack of diversity. When I suggested that we include some authors of color, my five colleagues unanimously said no. However, I do not think they were racist individuals.

Leah Dorschner-Karim: Update our school standards now - we need non-white voices, too

Teachers feel comfortable teaching the status quo because classic works like "The Great Gatsby" seem safe. Race is uncomfortable to talk about. Some teachers are scared to talk about race themselves, afraid of saying the wrong thing. Their solution then is to just not talk about it, which is how most white Americans deal with race. But there is also a fear of administration. There is a fear that white students and parents will complain, and if your administration does not support you, this could mean losing your job.

We saw this happen when Shannon Gibney was reprimanded for discussing race at MCTC because white students complained that it made them uncomfortable. In every school that I have worked at, teachers were constantly afraid of losing their jobs - tenured and non-tenured alike - which made them hesitant to tackle difficult topics in their lessons. If teachers could point to a state standard and say, "I am doing what I am supposed to do," it would relieve this fear of being reprimanded for talking about race.

The world is watching how Minnesota will change its policing to prevent instances of police brutality. But, in the event of a trial, our criminal justice system relies on the decision of a jury. We need to see students as future jurors and we need to make sure that the 12 people who make a jury will not allow skin color to cloud their judgement. This undoing of 400 years of racism begins in the classroom.

The current conversation around race has been focusing on the difference between not being racist, and being anti-racist. The English curriculum needs to be anti-racist.

In my years teaching 10th grade, I have successfully taught Critical Race Theory and implicit bias. Students of color and white students alike have found these lessons engaging and beneficial.

Our schools need to stop talking about racism as if it is something that happened in the past. Literature has the power to humanize marginalized voices. The English Language Arts standards need to require that non-white voices be included in the curriculum to promote empathy among the races and to spark discussions about systemic racism.

The Twins have removed the statue of former team owner Calvin Griffith, who once said he moved the team from Washington to Minnesota "when I found out you only have 15,000 blacks here," from a pavilion outside of Target Field.

The statue was removed early on Friday, the day celebrated as Juneteenth because June 19, 1865, was the day enslaved people in Texas were informed that the Civil War was over and they could no longer be another person's property.

"While we acknowledge the prominent role Calvin Griffith played in our history, we cannot remain silent and continue ignoring the racist comments he made in Waseca in 1978," the Twins said in a statement released Friday morning. "His disparaging words displayed a blatant intolerance and disregard for the Black community that are the antithesis of what the Minnesota Twins stand for and value."

On Sept. 28, 1978, former Pioneer Press columnist Nick Coleman documented comments made by Griffith at a Lions Club dinner in Waseca while working in the Rochester bureau of the Minneapolis Star. Griffith, who had moved the the Washington Senators to Minnesota before the 1961 season, told attendees he chose Minnesota, "When I found out you only had 15,000 blacks here."

"Black people don't go to ball games, but they'll fill up a 'rassling' ring and put up such a chant it'll scare you to death," Griffith continued. "It's unbelievable. We came here because you've got good, hard-working, white people here."

The Twins erected a bronze statue of Griffith outside of Target Field when the stadium opened in 2010, not far from the No. 29 entrance honoring former Twins all-star Rod Carew and his own bronze statue. Carew, now 74 and a ubiquitous presence with the club, left the Twins for the California Angels shortly after Griffith made his comments, saying, "I'm not going to be another \(n-word\) on his plantation."

In a statement released Friday morning, Carew said he respected the Twins' decision and also believed Griffith's views on race changed over time, and that Griffith was the first person he called after Carew was inducted into the Baseball Hall of Fame in 1991.

"While I've always supported the Twins' decision to honor Calvin with a statue, I also remember how inappropriate and hurtful his comments were on that fateful day in Waseca," Carew said. "The Twins did what they felt they needed to do for the organization and for our community. While we cannot change history, perhaps we can learn from it."

"Rodney was right," Griffith's son Clark, 78, said Friday. "Rodney and I have been friends for a long time. Calvin was not a racist."

Clark Griffith, a longtime Twin Cities attorney, said it was "anticipated" that his father's statue would be taken down and that he had talked with the Twins about the possibility. He did not argue that it should be left up, Griffith said, but declined to elaborate.

"We're honored that it was up for 10 years," he said.

The Twins and the rest of Major League Baseball are on hiatus as the league and its players negotiate a return to play amid the novel coronavirus pandemic. The Twin Cities became the epicenter of protests over racial injustice after George Floyd died under the knee of a police officer in south Minneapolis.

"Our decision to memorialize Calvin Griffith with a statue reflects an ignorance on our part of systemic racism present in 1978, 2010 and today," the Twins said. "We apologize for our failure to adequately recognize how the statue was viewed and the pain it caused for many people - both inside the Twins organization and across Twins Territory. We cannot remove Calvin Griffith from the history of the Minnesota Twins, but we believe removal of this statue is an important and necessary step in our ongoing commitment to provide a Target Field experience where every fan and employee feels safe and welcome."

The Twins have been under the ownership of the Pohlad family since it bought the club in 1984.

Also Friday, Washington D.C. removed the statute of the former owner of the Washington Redskins from outside the team's former home at RFK Stadium. Protesters recently vandalized the statue of George Preston Marshall, the last NFL owner to integrate his team.

The complete Twins statement:

"When we opened Target Field in 2010 in conjunction with our 50th season in Minnesota, we were excited and proud to welcome fans to our 'forever ballpark.' As such, we wanted to pay permanent tribute to those figures and moments that helped shape the first half-century of Minnesota Twins baseball - including a statue of Calvin Griffith, our former owner and the man responsible for moving the franchise here in 1961.

"While we acknowledge the prominent role Calvin Griffith played in our history, we cannot remain silent and continue ignoring the racist comments he made in Waseca in 1978. His disparaging words displayed a blatant intolerance and disregard for the Black community that are the antithesis of what the Minnesota Twins stand for and value.

We cannot remove Calvin Griffith from the history of the Minnesota Twins, but we believe removal of this statue is an important and necessary step in our ongoing commitment to provide a Target Field experience where every fan and employee feels safe and welcome.

"Past, present or future, there is no place for racism, inequality and injustice in Twins Territory."

Rod Carew's full statement:

"I understand and respect the Minnesota Twins' decision to remove the Calvin Griffith statue outside Target Field. While I've always supported the Twins' decision to honor Calvin with a statue, I also remember how inappropriate and hurtful his comments were on that fateful day in Waseca. The Twins did what they felt they needed to do for the organization and for our community.

"While we cannot change history, perhaps we can learn from it.

"I first met Calvin Griffith in 1964 when he traveled to New York City to watch me work out at Yankee Stadium. Calvin and longtime Minnesota Twins scout Herb Stein must have liked what they saw as they signed me to a professional contract shortly thereafter. I can tell you when I got to the major leagues with the Twins in 1967, Calvin was my most ardent supporter. He told manager Sam Mele that I was the Twins' everyday second baseman. I saw no signs of racism whatsoever.

"In 1977, my MVP year, I made $170,000. When the season was over, Calvin called me into his office, thanked me for a great season, told me that I had made the team a lot of money and handed me a check for $100,000. You could have knocked me over. A racist wouldn't have done that.

"There is no way I can apologize for what Calvin said in Waseca in 1978. His comments were irresponsible, wrong and hurtful. I recall my response at the time reflected my anger and disappointment.

The Twins think so](#) Twins' Jose Berrios has final tune-up before Opening Day For loaded Twins, 30-man active roster might be overkill Twins' 'crowd noise' crew learning on the fly balls

"Now that more than four decades have passed, I look back on Calvin's comments and our personal relationship with additional context and perspective. In my view, Calvin made a horrible mistake while giving that speech in 1978. I have no idea what happened that day, but who among us has not made a mistake? I know Calvin paid a heavy price for those comments and I believe his thoughts on race evolved over time.

"When he traded me prior to the 1979 season, Calvin told me he wanted me to be paid what I was worth. Later that year the Angels made me the highest paid player in baseball. A racist wouldn't have done that.

"In 1991, the first person I called after I was told I had been elected to the National Baseball Hall of Fame was Calvin.

"I have long forgiven Cal for his insensitive comments and do not believe he was a racist. That was NOT my personal experience with Calvin Griffith - prior to or following that day in 1978."

CORRECTIONS OFFICER FIRED FOR USING EXCESSIVE FORCE

A Minnesota corrections officer accused of using excessive force on a restrained prisoner following a staff assault last Friday has since been fired from the agency.

The fight began around 6:40 p.m., as three officers responded to a reported policy violation in the B-west cellblock at Stillwater prison. A confrontation with two inmates quickly escalated. Two officers suffered a dozen blows to the face and head, while a third was stabbed in the ribs with a metal shank.

At some point during the attack, a prisoner reportedly said: "This one's for George Floyd."

All three officers were treated for noncritical injuries at an area hospital and later released.

Corrections Commissioner Paul Schnell condemned the attack and vowed to seek criminal assault charges for the inmates involved. He praised his officers for their response, calling their initial use of force to detain the assailants as "reasonable, proportionate and measured."

However, he said things went awry when an injured officer - later identified by the Star Tribune as Travis Hansen - sprayed a subdued inmate in the face with chemical irritants.

"We are the professionals here and we have to hold people to our standards," said Schnell, who reviewed surveillance footage of the incident. "What happened to them was wrong ... it's a serious crime. But that absolute wrong does not legitimize an after-the-fact use of force on somebody who is already under our control. It can't."

Schnell declined to comment further on his disciplinary decision, citing restrictions under the state's Data Practices Act. But a department spokesman confirmed that Hansen was dropped from the payrolls on Tuesday.

Corrections officer fired for using excessive force

Hansen, a 16-year veteran at the agency, could not be reached for comment. As a union member, he is entitled to a lengthy appeals process. AFSCME Council 5, the union representing 2,500 state corrections officers, declined to comment for this report.

"We need to respect the process," executive director Julie Bleyhl said in a text message.

Hansen's public personnel file includes one commendation for his response to a large inmate altercation in 2013, where the associate warden applauded his ability to maintain "composure in a high stress environment." His file also includes two written reprimands, one of which was for refusing to work the post he was assigned to.

The attack came just three days after another officer at the same facility was placed on paid leave for an outburst during a statewide moment of silence for Floyd, who died under the knee of a Minneapolis police officer last month.

"Is this for the injustice of having Derek Chauvin locked up?" the officer reportedly said, referring to the fired Minneapolis officer now charged with second-degree murder in Floyd's death.

Autopsy examiner in Floyd case defended as 'fair-minded'

Body

Nationwide, people expressed outrage when prosecutors released the preliminary findings of George Floyd's autopsy, highlighting cardiovascular disease and "potential intoxicants" in his system, as if those factors might explain his death as police officers pinned him to the ground.

The findings contained just one mention of physical trauma, noting that Floyd's body showed no signs of asphyxia or strangulation. The public and some medical professionals cried foul, putting Dr. Andrew Baker, Hennepin County's medical examiner, squarely in the hot seat.

But neither Baker nor his office had released those findings. He was still performing Floyd's autopsy at the time. The preliminary findings were summarized by prosecutors in the initial charging documents against former officer Derek Chauvin, the veteran Minneapolis police officer who had pinned his knee onto Floyd's neck for nearly 8 minutes as Floyd begged for air and witnesses pleaded with officers to stop.

The preliminary findings hung over the case for five days before Baker released the full autopsy report. He ruled Floyd's death a homicide, finding that the officers killed him by subduing him, restraining him and compressing his neck.

The way the preliminary results were first presented confused the public and prompted demands for Baker to resign or be fired. Opinion articles, published around the country, demanded that medical examiners have more independence from law enforcement. Two Hennepin County Board members voted against renewing Baker's contract.

Yet some defense attorneys say Baker's been given a bum rap.

"The details that we initially saw were cherry-picked by prosecutors," said Mary Moriarty, Hennepin County's chief public defender. "They were taken out of context of the entire report. But Dr. Baker was doing what a medical examiner does: document absolutely everything they see."

Autopsy examiner in Floyd case defended as 'fair-minded'

The Hennepin County Medical Examiner's Office is independent. The examiner answers only to the County Board. Moriarty acknowledged, however, that even independent medical examiners or coroners can skew their findings in favor of prosecutors or police officers.

Baker has never been one of those medical examiners, she said.

"He has always been independent and fair-minded," Moriarty said. "We don't always agree, but he certainly is not affiliated with prosecutors or in anyone's pocket."

Baker declined to comment for this article.

The controversy

The earliest findings from the autopsy were released when Hennepin County Attorney Mike Freeman's office filed third-degree murder charges against Chauvin four days after Floyd's death. Prosecutors cited three preliminary autopsy findings: That there were no physical signs Floyd died of asphyxia, that he had cardiovascular disease, and that his health conditions, plus "any potential intoxicants" and the police restraints, likely caused his death.

Floyd's family and their lawyer cried foul. They hired two pathologists who conducted a second autopsy that concluded Floyd died of asphyxia.

A collective statement written on behalf of nearly 20,000 black physicians from around the country called the preliminary findings "misleading," saying they inappropriately raised doubts about Floyd's character and undermined Chauvin's role in his death.

The early findings had little medical relevance to the cause of death, said Dr. Derica Sams, a physician in Chapel Hill, N.C., who helped organize and write the statement. It was meaningless to point out that there were no traumatic signs of asphyxia, Sams explained, because asphyxiation can often occur without leaving behind obvious signs of trauma.

She said it was irresponsible at best for prosecutors to note that Floyd may have had drugs in his system before the toxicology reports were complete. That merely served to present Floyd in a bad light and indicate that other medical problems may have killed him, she said.

The full report

Facing a public outcry, Minnesota Attorney General Keith Ellison took over the prosecution two days before the full autopsy was released. Once it became public, Ellison added more severe second-degree murder charges against Chauvin and charged the other three officers at the scene of the arrest as accomplices.

Baker's autopsy report found that Floyd died when his heart stopped as officers subdued and restrained him by compressing his neck. The report lists heart disease, fentanyl intoxication and recent methamphetamine use as "other significant conditions," indicating that they may have made Floyd's death more likely.

Listing underlying diseases and drug intoxication in an autopsy report is "usual practice" for a medical examiner, Dr. Sally Aiken, president of the National Association of Medical Examiners, said in a statement. "Death is a complex process and often occurs with multiple interacting contributing causes," she wrote.

These kinds of restraint-associated cases are especially complex, said Dr. Judy Melinek, a forensic pathologist in the San Francisco Bay Area with no connection to the Floyd case. Forensic pathologists may disagree over what to include under "other significant conditions," Melinek said. "But it doesn't change the fact that it's a homicide."

Floyd's family paid for a second autopsy conducted by Dr. Michael Baden, a former chief medical examiner of New York City, and Dr. Allecia Wilson of the University of Michigan. While their full report hasn't been released, Baden and Wilson said at a news conference that they determined that Floyd died of asphyxia, caused when the police restraints cut off blood and oxygen to his brain.

Baden disputed Baker's findings of heart disease.

"I wish I had the same coronary arteries that Mr. Floyd had that we saw at the autopsy," he said.

Wilson hedged, however, noting that second autopsies have some limitations, and that they didn't have access to certain parts of organs.

Both Melinek and Aiken said second autopsies typically provide less information overall, because body tissues are altered during the first autopsy or even removed for further analysis. Melinek said she would expect any parts of Floyd's heart that showed disease to be removed and kept by the medical examiner's office.

Freeman's office declined to be interviewed for this story.

On June 11, the Hennepin County Board voted 5-2 to reappoint Baker to another four years as medical examiner. Explaining her no vote, County Board member Angela Conley cited the early findings that "any potential intoxicants" may have contributed to Floyd's death.

" 'Potential' does not necessarily mean that you are certain," Conley said. "So why would we list that?"

Conley said she believed the early findings were the catalyst for what she called the initial, "insufficient" third-degree murder charge against Chauvin.

Baker's bio

Baker has been the Hennepin County medical examiner since 2004. He graduated from the University of Iowa Carver College of Medicine and served in the U.S. Air Force. In the late 1990s, he helped the FBI investigate crimes against humanity in Kosovo, providing evidence for an international criminal tribunal.

He was stationed in Washington, not far from the Pentagon, during the Sept. 11 attacks. For several months, he helped identify those who died at the Pentagon and on American Airlines Flight 77.

Baker has often been an expert witness for prosecutors and defense attorneys alike. He is widely respected, said Barry Scheck, a longtime defense attorney in New York who co-founded the Innocence Project. His testimony in 2017 helped exonerate Kirstin Lobato, who had been wrongfully convicted in 2006 and sentenced to up to 45 years in prison. Lobato was represented by lawyers with the Innocence Project.

Autopsy examiner in Floyd case defended as 'fair-minded'

"If the prosecutors, the public defenders and your colleagues in the medical community all have respect for you, it says a lot," Scheck said. "He is a straight shooter."

Scheck said that by highlighting that there were no physical signs of asphyxiation, prosecutors misled people into believing that Baker had ruled out neck compression as a cause of death, he said.

Scheck said he doesn't see much that separates Baker's official findings with the autopsy conducted at the behest of Floyd's family.

"Now that we've seen the ultimate conclusion, I don't see any material differences for legal purposes between the two autopsies," Scheck said.

VIEW BEYOND THE GAME

Cheryl Reeve is as good as her word.

The Lynx general manager and coach pledged last week to keep social justice issues on the front burner even as the WNBA prepares to get back to work. And so, in a Zoom conference call with local media Thursday, she did.

She noted how Maya Moore's work and sacrifice is finally being understood. She talked about the news that former Lynx guard Renee Montgomery had decided to take a year off to work on social justice issues.

"This is at the forefront of our minds," Reeve said. "Playing basketball is what we do. The other part of us is wanting to make the world a better place for everybody."

Reeve was asked if she would stop having Minneapolis police help with game security when basketball returns to Target Center. Reeve noted that, though she would be in favor of such a move, the team might not have that power because the arena is owned and operated by the city of Minneapolis.

And then she took on Bob Kroll, president of the Police Officers Federation of Minneapolis. Saying the union had become a "safe haven" for aggressive cops, she called for change.

"If we don't have change at the top, this won't get better," she said. "The biggest step we can make right now is we cannot accept Bob Kroll as the leader."

And then, later: "The culture is rotten. And we've got to cut off the head of the snake to make real progress."

There is history. In 2016, after the shooting death of Philando Castile, the Lynx donned Black Lives Matter T-shirts before a home game, prompting officers providing security to walk off the job. Kroll supported their decision and was critical of the Lynx organization.

There was some basketball talk, too:

View beyond the game

· Asked if she was worried about the league preparing to play at the IMG Academy in Bradenton, Fla., because of the spike in coronavirus cases in Florida, she said assistant GM Clare Duwelius and head athletic trainer Chuck Barta went down for a site inspection.

"Every decision made is about safety, the integrity of the clean site," she said. "I will be stressing this with the group. For this to be successful and as safe as possible, we can't be dismissive or lax. The only thing I'll say is we won't be out and about."

· On the 22-game season, Reeve said: "You can't lose a week. That's three games. From a competitive situation, this will be pretty interesting."

· Playing without fans? The Lynx will lose one of the better home court advantages in the league. But? "Once the ball gets tossed up, and we're going, we'll just be competing," Reeve said.

· The overall positive, Reeve said, is that the game is returning. "We're going to be playing basketball," she said. "From a players' standpoint, that's going to be big." One key, she said, is getting as many games as possible on national television. "This could be an interesting way to grow our business," Reeve said.

A special session of the Minnesota Legislature ended in a stalemate early Saturday with both parties deeply divided on how far lawmakers should go toward remaking policing in the state where George Floyd was killed.

Negotiations continued throughout Friday night - with progress being made at times - but ultimately failed around 6 a.m. Saturday when the Republican-controlled Senate adjourned.

The Democratic-controlled House early Friday passed an extensive package of police accountability measures wrapped into one bill. It includes elements of five more modest policing bills that the Republican-controlled Senate passed earlier in the week but would make bigger changes than what Senate Republicans have said they'll accept.

As lawmakers huddled behind closed doors, or met on the floors to pass less-contentious legislation, around 400 demonstrators held a Juneteenth rally outside the Capitol, where they chanted Floyd's name and called for lawmakers to pass the House bill.

GOP Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, of East Gull Lake, repeatedly said that Friday, or early Saturday morning, was his deadline for adjournment, and that lawmakers should focus on proposals both parties can support. But Democratic leaders from both chambers urged him at a news conference to allow more time so that both sides could seek compromises on policing and other thorny issues. He postponed indefinitely his own news conference set for Friday afternoon.

"We have to do something on police accountability and reform," Democratic House Speaker Melissa Hortman, of Brooklyn Park, told reporters. "The tragic murder of George Floyd on May 25th changed the entire legislative agenda. There is no way for us to look away from this injustice, and to not do the work that thousands of Minnesotans and millions of people around the world are demanding that governments take up."

That basic dynamic - Democrats claiming a moment in history demanded action while Republicans argued their more modest proposals were more prudent but still profound - never really changed. However, around 1 a.m., significant progress appeared to be in the making as Republicans agreed to several Democratic demands, while Democrats gave to several Republican demands, including abandoning a plan to have the state attorney general's office be the lead prosecutor in all instances of police killings of civilians.

Democratic Gov. Tim Walz said Friday night on TPT's "Almanac" public affairs program that he remained hopeful a compromise can be reached and that negotiations were continuing.

"We have gone through some of the most tumultuous times in Minnesota's history," Walz said, citing the killing of Floyd and the state's reopening from the coronavirus shutdown. "And I think there's a desire of folks here to seize that moment and make those systemic changes."

On Thursday, Walz challenged lawmakers to put the House bill on his desk in time to sign on Juneteenth, a holiday that has long commemorated the emancipation of enslaved blacks but turned this year into one of protest against police brutality and racism following the killing of Floyd, an African American who died after a white Minneapolis police officer pressed a knee into his neck for several minutes.

"Today as people across the state and nation recognize and observe Juneteenth, Senate Republicans are sending a loud message by choosing to pack up and leave before we've finished the work that Minnesotans are expecting us to do," Democratic Senate Minority Leader Susan Kent, of Woodbury, told reporters. "Black, Indigenous and people of color have spent years fighting for justice. We can spend a little more than a week doing the same."

Walz, who has called for making Juneteenth a state holiday, spoke Friday with musician Pharrell Williams, who tweeted that he's asking every governor to make it a paid holiday for state employees, and that he spoke with a number of governors Friday. "Thank you for fighting for this issue. #Juneteenth is an important part of our history, and it should be recognized and remembered by our entire state each year," Walz wrote as he retweeted Williams' thanks.

The two parties also remained divided on the main unfinished business of the 2020 regular session, a public construction borrowing package known as a bonding bill, which could potentially include money for rebuilding neighborhoods in Minneapolis and St. Paul where businesses were damaged and destroyed in the unrest that followed Floyd's killing. Other unresolved issues included a potential tax break that could benefit businesses seeking to rebuild, and how to allocate federal coronavirus relief money to local governments from the $2.1 billion the state received under the CARES Act.

If there is no agreement on the big issues, lawmakers are likely to get another chance in mid-July. Assuming Walz intends to issue another 30-day extension of the emergency powers he's been using to respond to the COVID-19 pandemic, he's legally required to call another special session for July 12 to let lawmakers object. That's why he called this special session. House Democrats blocked a Senate GOP attempt last week to remove the governor's emergency authority.

Dave Orrick contributed to this report.

RACIAL EQUITY

ARTICLE DCCXCVIII. RACIAL EQUITY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 19, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 7ALength: 669 wordsByline: AISHA GOMEZ; HODAN HASSAN; JEFF HAYDEN; PATRICIA TORRES RAY; ANGELA CONLEY; ANDREA JENKINS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Transportation access creates real change // Funding bus-rapid transit in Minneapolis can help families.Body

Our streets should be welcoming places that create opportunity for all. Instead, our streets reflect systems of racial and economic injustice. To begin to remedy this, Gov. Tim Walz and the Legislature must invest to build opportunity and fairness across our communities. We can begin to accomplish this by investing in bus-rapid transit in this year's bonding bill.

Community conversations are rightly focused on the need for systemic change in this moment - George Floyd's death is part of our long history of injustice, and we need systemic solutions. Our discriminatory and harmful systems of police enforcement need reform; land use systems that segregate neighborhoods by race need reform; systems that harm our climate and perpetuate horrifyingly inequitable health outcomes for black and brown communities need reform.

Our transportation system also creates and reinforces injustice for communities of color. It, too, needs reform.

Investing in transit is essential to building a more racially just transportation system. Our transit riders are disproportionately people of color, and investing in transit lifts up communities of color and begins to reclaim our streets as democratic and just spaces.

Thankfully, we don't have to look far to find important and impactful projects to support. The B Line, D Line and E Line are three bus-rapid transit lines we could invest in right now that will have an enormous impact on people's lives. They will provide faster, more frequent and more reliable service along Lake Street, Chicago Avenue and Hennepin Avenue - all communities whose residents and businesses have been directly impacted by George Floyd's murder and the aftermath.

These lines need $75 million in investment, a critical benefit for all of us, but especially communities of color who make up more than half the people riding buses along these routes. Two of these lines are shovel-ready and will provide immediate construction jobs.

RACIAL EQUITY

Transit connects people to the important places in their lives. If we fund these lines, transit will move people faster, saving riders hundreds of thousands of hours a year that they can spend with their loved ones or pursuing their dreams. If we fund these lines, transit will allow people to get there cheaper: An annual transit pass costs under $1,500, while car ownership puts families $9,000 in the hole each year.

This means that if we invest in a transit system people can depend on, families can take the money they would have spent on a car and put it toward things like education, rent and healthy food. If we fund these lines, our communities will be more stable, because the tens of thousands of essential employees who rely on transit can get to work.

And investing in the B, D and E lines is not just about investing in new riders and new lines. These critical lines will substantially replace and improve upon the current 21, 5 and 6 bus routes. These are three of the four highest ridership routes in Metro Transit's system, and 52% of riders on these lines are black, indigenous or people of color. Bus-rapid transit investment is about helping real people now. The sooner we invest, the sooner we make a positive difference in peoples' lives.

The protests in the aftermath of George Floyd's murder were clear: We need systemic change across the board to begin to deliver racial justice. Investing in transit creates more opportunity for all of us and is a tangible way that Minnesota can do more than pay lip service to our communities of color. People in our communities need the state of Minnesota to invest $75 million in the B, D and E lines. It is time to act, so that our streets take a tangible step toward becoming the places of opportunity we envision they can be.

Aisha Gomez and Hodan Hassan are members of the Minnesota House; Jeff Hayden and Patricia Torres Ray are members of the Minnesota Senate; all are Minneapolis DFLers. Angela Conley is a Hennepin County commissioner. Andrea Jenkins is vice president of the Minneapolis City Council.

Wild star Matt Dumba said he felt helpless a few weeks ago, watching from afar as parts of the Minneapolis and St. Paul went up in flames.

He understood the anger after George Floyd's killing at the hands of a former Minneapolis police officer. He also wanted to make sure he did his part to help in the aftermath.

After a couple of weeks of discussion with family and friends, the 25-year-old Canadian launched an initiative on Thursday designed to help rebuild Lake Street in Minneapolis. He has partnered with the Lake Street Council and will match donations up to $100,000.

"Being a professional athlete has given me a platform and I have chosen to use it to amplify your voices and help the community," Dumba said. "I will be silent no more."

The Chicago company that bought Calhoun Square last fall said it is dropping the name of the historic Uptown mall due to John C. Calhoun's racist past.

Northpond Partners said in a post on the property website that it's been exploring a name change since it acquired the mall, but decided to expedite the process following the death of George Floyd in custody of police.

"The tragic death of George Floyd and ensuing events throughout the country have made it crystal clear that to move forward as a community we must remove painful reminders of the worst chapters in our nation's history. John C. Calhoun was vice president of the United States from 1825 to 1832 and later a U.S. Senator. He was one of the foremost defenders of slavery. His ties to Minnesota are minimal; he sent a surveyor to

The Twins removed a statue of former owner Calvin Griffith at Target Field Friday morning.

"While we acknowledge the prominent role Calvin Griffith played in our history, we cannot remain silent and continue ignoring the racist comments he made in Waseca in 1978," the team said in a statement. "His disparaging words displayed a blatant intolerance and disregard for the black community that are the antithesis of what the Minnesota Twins stand for and value."

While he was invited to speak to the Waseca Lions Club, Griffith made a range of racist statements, according to an article written at the time by former Star Tribune reporter Nick Coleman.

When Griffith was asked why he moved the Twins to Minnesota, he lowered his voice and "asked if there were any blacks around."

Twins replace statue of Calvin Griffith at Target Field with Pohlads

"I'll tell you why we came to Minnesota," he said. "It was when I found out you only had 15,000 blacks here. Black people don't go to ball games, but they'll fill up a rassling ring and put up such a chant it'll scare you to death. It's unbelievable. We came here because you've got good, hardworking, white people here."

Griffith then called Twins legend and Hall of Famer Rod Carew "a damn fool" for signing a three-year contract for $170,000 per year.

When the Star Tribune asked Griffith to comment after the remarks were made public, he denied he was intending to be racist.

"What the hell, racism is a thing of the past. Why do we have colored ballplayers on our club? They are the best ones. If you don't have them, you're not going to win."

The Twins said Friday the decision to memorialize Griffith with a statue reflects an ignorance of systemic racism.

"We apologize for our failure to adequately recognize how the statue was viewed and the pain it caused for many people - both inside the Twins organization and across Twins Territory. We cannot remove Calvin Griffith from the history of the Minnesota Twins, but we believe removal of this statue is an important and necessary step in our ongoing commitment to provide a Target Field experience where every fan and employee feels safe and welcome."

The Gophers men's basketball program has assembled all the puzzle pieces and laid each of them out on the table. You can start to see the elements of a starting lineup and role players.

Now, head coach Richard Pitino hopes they can all fit together when next season starts.

Minnesota added two non-graduate transfers in 7-foot center Liam Robbins and 6-foot-6 swingman Both Gach, but both will need waivers from the NCAA in the next few months in order to play immediately.

"I thought our program got a lot better this spring," Pitino said, including graduate transfer forward Brandon Johnson. "I'm really really excited whenever we do get to resume just to be able to get with these guys because I think we have some versatility, some talent and some depth."

After failing to get a waiver for the 2018-19 season, Pittsburgh transfer Marcus Carr became one of the best point guards in the Big Ten last season, but the rising junior is now entertaining a move to leave early NBA and has to decide by August whether he will stay or go.

"I want him to mentally be really, really comfortable with whatever he wants to do," Pitino said. "He's got the time, so there is no point in rushing him. We will support him in whatever he wants to do. I think he understands that if he does come back, obviously being a sophomore captain, that he is going to have to really put this team on his back, and I think there is a lot of talent around him. I think we can compete at a high level."

Pitino shared those comments and more in a 15-minute interview with the Pioneer Press this week.

How do you look at the three transfers coming in?

Gophers basketball coach Richard Pitino says rebuilt team can 'compete at a high level'

I think obviously for everybody the way that you do your job has been greatly impacted as well as the way you live your life.

For us to be able to get some of the best transfers out there in this climate is a testament to the job my staff did as well as I think we were able to sell individual success, a good team coming back as well as team success, and I think people really want to be a part of it.

What was the process in recruiting Gach? And what do you think he brings to your team?

I remember when we were playing Utah (in Salt Lake City last November) and I went out early. ... I sat on the bench because I didn't want to sit in the locker room. I saw Both going through his pregame routine and he is drenched in sweat and I'm sitting there going, "OK, this kid is going so hard, he is not going to have any energy for our game." (Laughs)

That was the furthest thing from the truth. He played really, really well. (He finished with a team-high-tying 19 points and four rebounds in the Utes' 73-69 win over the Gophers.)

It's a testament to him. (Gach attended Austin High School in Minnesota before a year at Arizona Compass Prep.) and he got better and better. He has worked his butt off.

Ever since losing Amir (Coffey) early to the NBA, we weren't able to replace him with really good length on the perimeter. We (were looking for) that. We stayed patient. Then when Both decided to transfer, it was a no-brainer for us with what our needs are to try to go after him hard.

The big question is if Liam and Both are able to get waivers. You've expressed optimism about that; what is the source of that optimism?

Without going into great specifics, we feel really, really confident with both. Both situations are different, with Liam's and Both's. (It's pronounced Booth Gatch.) Both wanted to come back home and be with his family during a pandemic. I think that makes a lot of sense for the NCAA to see that. One of the benefits, I guess, is for a kid from Minnesota, we are the only school close to home. ... It makes complete sense for the NCAA to give both of those kids waivers.

Obviously if we do get them, we feel like we have a really, really talented team.

Fans remember that Marcus didn't get a waiver two years ago. Do you see that as a completely different situations?

They are different because the thing about Marcus is although in my mind it's rational to think a player should get a waiver when his coach gets fired (Kevin Stallings from Pitt in March 2018), the NCAA hasn't really put that into a bylaw.

We've kind of heard that kids that want to transfer closer to home during the coronavirus, it would make sense for them to be able to do that and play right away.

Gophers basketball coach Richard Pitino says rebuilt team can 'compete at a high level'

As much as the Marcus thing made sense, it also wasn't anything in there that said (if a) coach gets fired, you are ruled eligible right away. Where I don't see how the NCAA can't do that for any kid that wants to go across the country to be closer to home - during a pandemic - I just don't see how that makes any sense for them to hold a kid up.

What is the latest with Marcus?

Just staying in communication with him on it. It's such a weird process. I feel bad for him. I think he wants to test the waters to the best of his ability, but really what can you do? You are not getting workouts and those things (with NBA teams due to COVID-19). We are in daily communication on how he is doing. Is he staying safe? Is he working out?

Looking back on last season's tough stretch for the Gophers - losing eight of 10 games - how did that impact you and the team? (The U was 15-16 and going to miss the NCAA tournament when the season was cancelled.)

There are two types of scoreboards that you are going to be judged by. The public scoreboard, as a coach, it makes sense, wins and losses. But you have to have a coaches scoreboard and say are we playing the right way. Is it a missed free throw here, is it an unlikely break there? Are we far off? Where are we at? I still to this day believe that if we won two more games in the conference tournament, we would have gone to our third NCAA tournament in four years - which hasn't happened here. We played a very, very challenging schedule with a young team. The Big Ten was one of the hardest conferences in the history of the sport this year. Just a couple of close losses.

That is what you do at this time of year: you evaluate - hey is there something that we are not doing right or can we get better at this? Certainly across the board there are things that we can get better at, but I thought we were pretty close. You look at all those numbers, with strength of schedule and our KenPom stuff. We are not far off by any means. Whenever we do get back to work, it's just get a little bit better in everything we're doing because we are pretty confident that we are continuing to go in the right direction.

You had seven new players last year and will have six newcomers this year. What's key to making the transition with so many new guys?

We're fortunate to have back-to-back NBA players coming out of this program. That is something that we are very, very proud of. When you talk about recruiting, you can sell the individual success of Daniel Oturu and the growth. Any big kid that we recruit we can show them that we had a top-50, top-75 recruit come into our program and play a good amount as a freshman, develop into an All-American as a sophomore and go on to the NBA to potentially be top-15 or top-20 pick. Amir with his success as well, so the more you are developing guys and recruiting better guys, you are going to have to replace them. Moreso with the one-time waiver thing, if it does pass (the NCAA is exploring immediate eligibility for one-time transfers), it's just going to have to get used to new faces.

For me, it's making sure how we play ... they understand it. You can't confuse them. We have to make sure that the vocabulary and the terminology is consistent so when you get a guy that isn't going to be here until the end of the summer and they are transferring or whatever, they are ready to pick it up from Day 1. So we try to be really, really consistent with what we are doing and be very, very clear and concise in our teachings. It's been able to work. We've had pretty good success with some new faces that have come into the program.

With George Floyd's death, how have you addressed that and social-justice issues with the team?

When that happened, I think everyone was so shocked and disgusted by it all. Then to couple that with it being in Minneapolis. There is some shock and awe to it all. I reached out to the team on a team Zoom (call). I'm a white man in his 30s, who has been very lucky and very privileged, so I just tried to give them the floor.

Zooms are hard. It's just not quite as personal. When we do get them on campus, that's when we can really move forward with these really good and difficult conversations. I just told them, 'Hey, guys, have you endured any racism that you want to talk about that maybe a coach like myself wouldn't know?'

I would say on a Zoom, it's not as ideal as maybe person-to-person. Then just Facetime with each guy and ask them have you guys endured anything because a white male in his 30s is going to have blind spots that a black person wouldn't. It's individually trying to talk to them as well as collectively and see how can you guys help me and how can we make a change.

When we do bring them back, we talked about as a staff what can we do within the pandemic guidelines and all that to get speakers here and do some community service stuff. Not just send a tweet out, but make change and be a part of that.

You took a 10 percent paycut to help with revenue shortfalls due to coronavirus. Are there other things that have come up for your program in how you are trying to cut costs?

(Athletic director Mark Coyle) and his staff are evaluating everything and trying to figure it out. There are certain things that we are trying to cut on besides head coaches' salaries and so on that we are trying to figure it out, whether it's travel or if it's through budgets or so on, that is kind of evolving. It's like anything else. We are all in it together and we've got to make sure as a men's basketball program that we are doing our part because this athletic department has provided unbelievable resources for us and we have to make sure that we are doing our part to give back to make sure that everybody can operate at a high level - the right way financially.

Is there a timeline on when you could get back on campus for workouts?

We were waiting on that vote from the NCAA on when we would be allowed to work with them. I didn't want to bring them back here if we weren't able to be with them. I think that everybody is safe at home and we are finding ways to safely work out and stay in shape. We trust those guys to do that, but we are looking at bringing them in the week of (July) 13th and go through all the testing and quarantining and be prepared to go July 20 and start workouts.

POLICE REFORM

In his June 16 commentary, U.S. Rep. Pete Stauber advocates for comprehensive and long-overdue police reforms "within police departments nationwide" ("We need reform, but we also need police," Opinion Exchange). Stauber also argues that it will be difficult to attract quality police recruits "if violence against law enforcement is tolerated and if we don't recognize most of our police officers are of good character."

Minnesota Statute Section 609.2231(c) makes it a felony to physically assault a police officer if the assault inflicts demonstrable bodily harm and the officer is effecting a lawful arrest or executing any other duty imposed by law. Thus, Minnesota law already provides enhanced penalties for citizens who assault police officers. But there is no similar enhanced criminal penalty for police officers who assault citizens - the "bad apples" on the police force are rewarded for their conduct with union protection and are typically reinstated. Given that police are entrusted with a special obligation to protect and serve, officers who violate that trust should be punished in the same way that citizens who assault police officers are punished. Perhaps it is time to make it a felony for a police officer to assault a citizen by using excessive force during an arrest.

Stauber also repeats the unprovable mantra that despite all of the documented cases of police misconduct across the country, the "overwhelming majority" of police officers serve their communities "with compassion and dedication." If that statement is true, one must question why we need nationwide comprehensive police reform.

whining or crying. I saw no leadership, no decisive action except his forward movement to protect his job. Gov. Tim Walz called the city's response an "abject failure" and removed authority from Frey's hands by calling out the National Guard.

Frey states, "lawmakers should update state statutes" to remove arbitrators' decisions. I believe they should be updated to remove politicians who fail their duties and obligations to uphold the law on both sides of this debate. That would include a weak mayor, council member or police chief who fails to protect the law-abiding public or each law-abiding individual or their livelihoods.

The current Minneapolis mayor and police chief seem incapable of meeting that standard whether on behalf of George Floyd or the citizens of Minneapolis. Please note that Minneapolis is well ahead of last year in shootings and is no longer safe under Frey's lack of leadership.

SUPREME COURT

One Scalia was plenty, thanks

Noah Feldman ("Supreme Court ruling is a power play by Gorsuch," Opinion Exchange, June 17) reflects on Justice Neil Gorsuch's welcome opinion granting civil rights to all humans, noting, "it will mean liberals must treat Gorsuch as a serious justice, not just a Trump minion. This in turn will help Gorsuch's bid to become the new Scalia."

As a Harvard law professor, Feldman cannot have forgotten Scalia's role in the law-free judicial coup of Bush v. Gore; Scalia's stay disenfranchised Florida voters by stopping a recount in the 2000 presidential election.

Issued before written briefs had been submitted and before oral arguments had even been scheduled, the stay prompted attorney Vincent Bugliosi to write in the Nation, "It wouldn't be because you had already made up your mind on what you were determined to do, come hell or high water, would it?"

Bugliosi footnoted the "pathetic" attempt at justification by Berkeley law professor John Yoo: " 'We should balance the short-term hit to the court's legitimacy with whether ... it was in the best interest of the country to end the electoral crisis.' Translation: If an election is close, it's better for the Supreme Court to pick the president, whether or not he won the election, than to have the dispute resolved in the manner prescribed by law." Not much later, thanks to crooked Tony, we got Yoo's legal opinions approving torture.

We didn't need the old Scalia; the last thing we need is a new one.

NATURE CENTER

Cheap, beautiful and now closing

What is only 1% of the city of Maplewood's budget, brings joy to people of all ages and protects the environment with its educational programs? That would be the Maplewood Nature Center.

When I entered my doctoral program as a director of Wood Lake Nature Center, I decided to study the value of nature centers. I discovered that more than any other tax-supported facility, they served the highest variety of ages with over 76 different benefits and services. Nature centers also are an economic boost to real estate and the economy in general. I have traveled to Maplewood solely to visit this wonderful oasis. Nature centers serve schoolchildren who, now more than ever, need to get outdoors. Richard Louv (who wrote "The Last Child in the Woods") tells us how children will have better attention spans and overall better mental health if they spend more time learning how to appreciate nature's wonders. Adults also need places to de-stress, learn how to bird watch with the help of expert guides.

Maplewood has been on the brink of pulling the plug on this unique and needed facility and now is using the pandemic to put the last nail in the coffin of a facility that is relatively cheap to run. It is myopic and I feel sorry for the generations to come who will no longer enjoy the benefits of the hardworking naturalists who go out of their way to design programs and exhibits for their visitors.

Maplewood needs to be complimented for its support of Maplewood Nature Center over the years but called out for shutting down a place its residents and wildlife need now more than ever.

Wish I could mask up, but I can't

Regarding the letter on June 18, "Would you risk these odds?": I would love to wear a mask. I would feel much more comfortable wearing one. However, if I did wear one, I would go into a severe asthma attack within 30 to 60 seconds. That's seconds, not minutes. I know, I've tried wearing one. I cannot breathe with anything covering my face. So I don't (can't) wear one even though I am also in the higher-risk demographic for COVID-19. If I have to go to the grocery store, I go as early as I can, go through as quickly as I can and do my best to distance myself from anyone else.

So please don't judge a person who is not wearing a mask. Just like those with handicap stickers, one cannot always see a person's handicap.

ARTICLE DCCCIV. RETURN OF THE DRIVE-IN

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 956 wordsByline: CHRIS HEWITT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Right now, drive-in theaters are the best option around for fun-starved moviegoers.Body

Drive-in theaters have been a part of the moviegoing landscape for 100 years, but current events have shifted them from a minor, seasonal player in the movie industry to the best game in town.

After delays, the sprawling Vali-Hi in Lake Elmo finally opened last week, but other drive-ins have been popping corn since mid-May, with rules in place to protect staff and customers during the COVID-19 pandemic, such as filling lots to only 50% capacity to make physical distancing possible.

The wide-open outdoor spaces of drive-in theaters have lately attracted non-movie events, rented out by day for graduations, church events and corporate meetings. Some have staged concerts. But the real business of drive-ins begins at dusk.

"The nice thing is everybody knows what to do and does what we ask," said Dave Quincer, owner of the Starlite Drive-In in Litchfield, one of two classic drive-ins in Minnesota still using signage from the 1950s (the other is the Long Drive-In in Long Prairie). "They're parking where we need them to park, observing the social distancing marks on the floor, following signs and doing what they're supposed to do."

In a textbook chicken-or-egg situation, studios have hesitated to release new movies until they're confident multiplexes will be widely open - Warner Bros. just moved the highly touted "Tenet" from July 17 to July 31 - but theater owners, who gradually began reopening last weekend, are reluctant to do so with no movies to play. And questions linger about the pandemic.

So operators of outdoor theaters have gotten creative. Some are screening recent-ish blockbusters (Vali-Hi will have "Jurassic World" and "Jumanji: The Next Level" this weekend). Others are showing pre-pandemic releases that still have some life in them: Pixar's "Onward" and Harrison Ford in "The Call of the Wild" have popped up a lot.

The Starlite has played those movies, but it has two screens, and one has been devoted to vintage titles such as "Grease" and "Beverly Hills Cop." This weekend offers maybe the splashiest retro bill, pairing classics that seem made for giant outdoor screens: "Jaws," which marks its 45th anniversary this weekend, and the original "Jurassic Park," which celebrated its 27th anniversary last week. "Jaws" will also chomp on swimmers at the Sky-Vu in Warren, Minn.

Return of the drive-in

Response has been good. Quincer said the fact that people are heading out to see movies they could stream at home suggests that, when it's safe, customers will be eager to return to theaters.

"People want to be out of the house. To me, that says something. The message Hollywood should be getting is, even though we can sit at home and watch movies on our TVs, we still want to get out. We still want to be with people," said Quincer, adding, "There are a lot of reasons people want to go to the movies."

If you're contemplating a trip to the drive-in, here are a few things to keep in mind.

Minnesota has six drive-in theaters. In the Twin Cities metro area, the Vali-Hi in Lake Elmo has room for about 375 cars at half capacity. In summers past, though, the Vali-Hi has sold out frequently, with cars lined up long before showtime. Other options include the Starlite in Litchfield, which Quincer said has been doing great business but has not sold out its 250 spaces so far; and Elko Speedway in Elko New Market, which shows a single movie on weekend evenings rather than the standard double- or triple-feature. The Starlite is about a 90-minute drive from Minneapolis but the Elko, which has "Star Wars: The Rise of Skywalker" and "Terminator: Dark Fate" this weekend, is just over 30 minutes. (The others, in Warren, Luverne and Long Prairie, are heftier road trips.)

What to bring

Some drive-ins initially required customers to stay in their cars, but that has loosened. Familiar practices such as reversing your pickup and lying in the flatbed or using folding chairs are still allowed, but chairs are not allowed on the sides of vehicles, to ensure physical distancing. It's also a good idea to bring a portable radio to pick up the sound, so you don't have to leave your car radio on. Some theaters have a limited number of radios available, or you may be able to pick up the signal on your phone.

Check websites

The show goes on, rain or shine, and starts around dusk, about 9:30 p.m. this time of year. But some things have changed, so it's wise to visit the website of the theater you plan to attend. The rules are similar at most venues - mask use is encouraged, wash your hands frequently, stay six feet apart - but some have additional requirements. The Vali-Hi, for instance, allows only one person per car to visit the concession stand and does not accept credit cards, whereas the Elko stand only accepts cards. The Sky-Vu in Warren has a military discount (even at full price, drive-in tickets are generally cheaper than multiplex tickets). The Starlite and other theaters have installed signage to keep restrooms and concession stands more safe.

Other 'drive-ins'

Many arts institutions are getting inventive with events that take advantage of the relative safety of staging events outdoors with social distancing. Crooners in Fridley is doing drive-in concerts. New Dawn Theatre's free screenings of "A Breath for George" continue this weekend at Pillsbury House and Yellow Tree theaters, collecting poems, interviews and songs honoring the memory of George Floyd. Franconia Sculpture Park near Taylors Falls is doing a monthly series of outdoor films, including "Fantastic Fungi" on July 18. Many Twin Cities parks and arts groups host outdoor movie nights but have not announced plans because of COVID-19. Keep your eyes peeled to see if they're scheduled as summer picks up steam.

Gov. Tim Walz implored a divided Minnesota Legislature Thursday to pass a sweeping package of police reforms before wrapping up a special session overshadowed by the police killing of George Floyd, the unarmed black man whose death sparked weeks of protests around the world.

Recalling that Friday is Juneteenth, the holiday that commemorates the end of slavery in the United States, the DFL governor warned that the world will be watching if lawmakers adjourn without passing any legislation addressing police accountability.

"If destiny and history is not raining down on Minnesota today and tomorrow, I don't know what is," Walz said as he faced Friday's planned adjournment deadline set by Senate Republican leaders. "The image of us and the Senate walking away from systemic change on Juneteenth adds to the legacy of what the rest of the world is looking at here. It is unacceptable."

Walz's remarks came as House Democrats were poised to pass roughly 20 police reform bills, including measures to tighten use-of-force standards, increase oversight of police discipline and encourage community-based alternatives to traditional law enforcement.

Working into Thursday night, DFL lawmakers also planned to advance bills that would ban "warrior-style" police training, eliminate cash bail for misdemeanor offenses, and spend $15 million on community interventions.

The Republican-led Senate passed a more modest package of policing bills earlier this week that direct a state licensing and standards agency to write policies banning chokeholds and neck restraints, such as those used on Floyd. The GOP reforms also would mandate more background checks for law enforcement employees, data collection on use of deadly force and training on implicit bias for officers. They also would require officers to intervene in cases of excessive force.

But Republicans have balked at DFL proposals to restore felons' voting rights while they are on probation and to put Attorney General Keith Ellison's office in charge of prosecuting officer-involved deaths.

Walz issues dire plea on police reform

While Democrats say the GOP law enforcement reforms don't go far enough, Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, R-East Gull Lake, noted that he'd heard little opposition to the measures contained in the Senate-passed reform package.

"In a short special session, you have to know that you run out of time," Gazelka said. "Why don't we do these things we agree with? Why don't we do all of the criminal justice reforms that we agree with and not jam each other? Why don't we do the federal spending for local government aid that we all agree with? Why don't we do the bonding bill that we all agree with?"

The issue of arbitration rights for disciplined police officers also remained unresolved Thursday. Minneapolis police Chief Medaria Arradondo, Mayor Jacob Frey and other civic leaders called Thursday on state lawmakers to overhaul a arbitration system that they say too often allows officers accused of "egregious" misconduct to get their jobs back.

Under proposed DFL legislation, which is backed by the Minnesota Chiefs of Police Association, arbitrators would no longer be allowed to "reverse or reduce" discipline meted out in such cases. But the GOP package in the Senate does not contain that provision.

Friday's expected adjournment would end a special session triggered by the extension of emergency powers Walz invoked to fight the pandemic. Republicans pressed to end the emergency powers last week but lacked the votes in the DFL-controlled House.

Although the special session was convened for the pandemic, it was overtaken by anger over Floyd's death and at times emotional debate over abuses of police power. The racial tensions have, at moments, spilled out into the ranks of the Legislature, with members of the People of Color and Indigenous Caucus accusing Senate Republicans of not consulting with them on any of their policing proposals.

"The lack of understanding from our perspective, our lived experiences, it's shameful," said Rep. Mohamud Noor, DFL-Minneapolis. He also said he was frustrated by comments he heard in a House hearing in which other members suggested Minneapolis and St. Paul should start their own online fundraiser to repair damage caused by looting and riots.

Going into the final day of the session, Democrats continued to press for a broader agreement from Republicans to increase accountability in cases of deadly police force.

"When I saw the senators' bills, I was insulted," said Rep. Rena Moran, DFL-St. Paul. "And so many, many more from the community and across the world are insulted, that that's what the Senate put forth. That has no accountability, no systemic change."

Gazelka said there's still time to come to a deal, and there are conversations happening behind the scenes to find common ground before the weekend. But he warned: If the DFL-controlled House pushes proposals that Senate Republicans don't agree with, nothing at all could happen.

Still, Walz's peacetime emergency is set to expire July 14, meaning lawmakers could be returning again to St. Paul next month to review Walz's powers and continue the debate on police reform.

The second of four fired Minneapolis police officers charged in the death of George Floyd posted bail and was released Friday night.

J. Alexander Kueng, 26, who had been held in lieu of $750,000 bail, was released from the Hennepin County jail just before 7:30 p.m. Friday, according to online jail records.

Kueng is one of three former officers charged with aiding and abetting second-degree murder and aiding and abetting second-degree manslaughter in connection with the restraint of Floyd before he died May 25.

Thomas Lane, 37, is the only other ex-officer charged in Floyd's death to be released on bail.

Tou Thao, who also faces aiding and abetting charges, is still in jail in lieu of $750,000 bail.

So is Derek Chauvin, who is charged with second-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter for kneeling on Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes. Chauvin's bail is set at $1.25 million.

Kueng, of Plymouth, was working only his third shift as a full-time officer, defense attorneys said.

About 8:08 p.m. on May 25, Kueng and Lane responded to a call about a man using a counterfeit $20 bill at the Cup Foods on the corner of Chicago Avenue and E. 38th Street.

The two officers found Floyd sitting in a nearby car, handcuffed him and attempted to put him in their squad car.

Chauvin and Thao arrived to assist.

A witness' video of Floyd's arrest showed bystanders pleading with the officers to stop as Lane restrained Floyd's legs and Kueng held onto his back while Floyd, cuffed, lay stomach-down in the street.

Kueng took Floyd's pulse and told his colleagues, "I couldn't find one," according to the criminal complaint.

Chauvin kept his knee on Floyd's neck for about two minutes after Kueng's remarks, the charges state.

The bystander's video of the arrest scene sparked worldwide outrage and led to widespread protests and continuing calls for racial justice and greater police accountability.

A second former Minneapolis police officer charged in the death of George Floyd is out of jail after posting bail.

According to online records, J. Kueng, 26, posted bail of $750,000 and was released from the Hennepin County Jail, with conditions, about 7:30 p.m. Friday.

Kueng is charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and manslaughter for his role in the May 25 death of Floyd, a handcuffed Black man who died after another officer, Derek Chauvin, pressed his knee into Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes.

Another former officer charged with aiding and abetting in Floyd's death, Thomas Lane, 37, posted bail earlier this month. The third ex-officer charged with aiding and abetting, Tou Thao, 34, remained in jail Saturday. Chauvin, 44, is being held on $1 million bail at Minnesota's maximum security prison in Oak Park Heights.

Kueng's attorney did not immediately reply to a email seeking comment Saturday. Lane's attorney, Earl Gray, has said that Lane was a rookie, and that the only thing he did was hold Floyd's feet so he couldn't kick.

ACTIVIST'S VOICE A RISING FORCE IN MINNEAPOLIS

Growing up as one of the few black people in rural Maine, Kandace Montgomery longed to escape.

Kids picked on her. She had no black teachers and learned little of African-American history. She struggled with whether to try to fit in or hide. She felt angry, even suicidal.

"People honestly, literally, had almost never seen a black person before in their life," Montgomery recalled. "I was like, 'Let me get out of here.' "

So she did - moving after college to Minneapolis, where she joined other young black organizers who have spent years protesting police brutality and calling for the defunding of the Police Department.

The 29-year-old Montgomery drew national exposure when she asked Mayor Jacob Frey whether he supported abolishing the police. The video of Frey saying no to Montgomery, and her dismissive response, went viral the day before a City Council majority backed defunding.

But Montgomery and her allies had long pushed those issues, well before the killing of George Floyd ignited public demands for reforming police here and around the country.

"People are seeing leaders who have been on the ground working and organizing and speaking for years," said Molly Glasgow, a member of MPD150, a group that advocates for defunding police.

As outrage swept the country over the 2014 police shooting of black teenager Michael Brown in Ferguson, Mo., Montgomery and other activists launched the Minneapolis chapter of Black Lives Matter. They led a large protest against police brutality that shut down part of the Mall of America, leading to the arrest of her and other activists.

A year later, they confronted police brutality on their own turf when police shot and killed 24-year-old Jamar Clark in north Minneapolis. Montgomery and other Black Lives Matter supporters led 18 days of protests outside Fourth Precinct police headquarters until authorities asked them to leave.

Within weeks, they shut down the megamall again with a massive demonstration. Clark's shooting, she said, showed "this violence and terror is real, this systemic racism and inequity is real, this economic inequity is real."

Montgomery later joined the Black Lives Matter Global Network as an organizer. From there, she was influenced by the mandate of activist Mary Hooks for black people to "be willing to be transformed in the service of the work." She learned, too, that it was OK to be unapologetically black.

Community solutions

Montgomery found a way out of the racial alienation of her childhood when someone stopped at her dorm room at the University of Massachusetts Amherst and told her about a class on grassroots community organizing.

"For the first time in college, there was this alternative to how I could live my life and how I could see my people," she said.

Montgomery became the first person in her family to graduate from college, with a degree in public health. TakeAction Minnesota, a liberal advocacy organization, hired her as an organizer and she fell in love with Minneapolis, especially its unusual communities of color.

Montgomery and her allies formed Black Visions Collective in 2017 after the local Black Lives Matter chapter disbanded, with the goal of increasing the power of black people over the long term. It became clear to them that mere policing reforms would not be enough.

So the collective, which has 50 members, worked with Reclaim the Block to lobby the City Council to divert $1.1 million from the Police Department to community programs and a new Office of Violence Prevention in 2018. They faced a setback in December when Frey approved $8.2 million more for the police budget.

Advocates for defunding the police want the city to stop adding to the $193 million police budget and start shifting that money to social workers, public health specialists and other professionals who can handle public calls related to mental health, addiction and other social issues.

"There's just a little bit of fear of the unknown, and we have a responsibility to educate folks in our community ... that when we say abolish the police, what we are actually saying is find community-funded solutions that actually keep us safe," Montgomery said. "Fund life-affirming institutions and health and education and housing that actually mitigate the need for any type of harm to be inflicted."

Some have questioned how such an approach would guarantee public safety in cases of homicide, armed robbery and life-threatening crimes. Montgomery and other defunding advocates maintain their strategy will lead to a decrease in violent crime in the long run as more people's needs are met. And she said that having police does nothing to lower crime.

MPD150 said there may still be a need for a smaller group of public safety workers to focus on serious crimes. Asked if she agreed, Montgomery said: "We want community-led solutions to be able to respond with people who have professional skills and cultural competency to address all kinds of harm."

'Go home, Jacob!'

It's less likely that such views would have received serious consideration from the City Council if not for the international outcry that followed the video of officer Derek Chauvin kneeling on Floyd's neck while two other cops held him down and another stood at the scene.

"Folks in a very decentralized way are mobilizing to the streets to demand justice," Montgomery said, comparing the Floyd response to the protests in the early days of Black Lives Matter. "Organizers have been clear on this forever, but the general public is more clear that we need to eradicate systemic racism and abolish the police, and that is what feels different now."

On June 6, nearly two weeks after Floyd's death, the Black Visions Collective led a march to Frey's northeast Minneapolis apartment. Montgomery had seen Frey voice empathy for African-Americans protesting injustice and footage of him sobbing at Floyd's memorial. Yet she was skeptical.

"We don't want no more police - is that clear?" she said to the crowd from a stage at the rally, while Frey stood on the ground below. "We don't want people with guns toting around in our community, shooting us down. Do you have an answer?" She asked Frey if he would commit to defunding the city police, yes or no.

Montgomery expected Frey to answer in the affirmative, since he had walked into a rally promoting their cause. When he responded that he wouldn't support abolishing the department, she retorted, "Get the f - out of here!" as the crowd erupted and demonstrators chanted "Go home, Jacob, go home!"

Some found the moment divisive. "I thought it was unfortunate," said City Council Member Andrea Jenkins. "I think we all have to come together as a community and think about how to solve our public safety [issues], and nobody is expendable. We can't throw people under the bus."

Jenkins said she's hearing from constituents worried that defunding police will make them less safe. But people recognize, she said, that the city needs to find another way to address some of the social issues that police deal with so they can focus on serious crime.

Montgomery said she's angry that Frey seems to prioritize developers and the city's wealthy and upper middle class over the poor and people of color. "I was channeling a righteous rage from those folks in the crowd who are sick and fed up of him thinking he can come up to us with his sob story about how he's feeling when people are literally mourning another death by the hands of the police," she said.

The day after her exchange with Frey, Black Visions Collective and Reclaim the Block hosted a rally in Powderhorn Park at which nine City Council Members pledged to "begin the process of ending" the Police Department. On stage, Montgomery acknowledged the human toll behind the movement.

"It shouldn't have taken so much death," she said, "to get us here."

Minnesota's Black Lives Matter chapter took to the state Capitol on Friday to mark Juneteenth with a demand for reparations and real police reform in a continued push for racial justice following the death of George Floyd.

Juneteenth, the traditional commemoration date of the emancipation of enslaved African Americans, has taken on new resonance this year. There have been protests around the U.S. and beyond stemming from Floyd's death after being restrained by Minneapolis police officers.

Amid chants of "Reparations now" and "Cut the check," Black Lives Matter organizers and several other activist groups called Floyd's death a remnant of slavery's legacy. Floyd, a Black man in handcuffs, died after a Minneapolis police officer pressed his knee into his neck for nearly 8 minutes, ignoring Floyd's cries of "I can't breathe".

"For 400 years, the United States government has had its knee on the neck of the black community socially, politically, economically and spiritually," said Trahern Crews, a leader of the Minnesota BLM chapter and organizer of the event. "Today we are here to demand full and complete reparations for the American descendants of the slaves who built this country."

The issue of reparations resurged last Juneteenth, when a U.S. House Judiciary subcommittee held a hearing to examine the legacy of slavery and a possible path toward reparations. Several 2020 Democratic presidential hopefuls expressed support for the idea.

Along with demands for reparations, the hundreds of demonstrators at the Capitol chided lawmakers for not agreeing on police reform legislation. The Democratic-controlled Minnesota House passed a broad package in this week's special session that went beyond measures approved by the Republican-controlled Senate, and there was no indication the two sides would come together ahead of adjournment.

Juneteenth in Twin Cities: Demonstrations, celebrations and a call for reparations

"Right now while we're standing on this lawn, their principles across the street at the Senate is to not pass any police accountability measures," said John Thompson, a state House candidate and friend of Philando Castile, a Black man who was killed by a St. Anthony police officer in 2016.

Minneapolis did everything President Barack Obama asked of it.

Its mayor and City Council appointed a reform-minded police chief who emphasized a guardian mentality instead of a warrior one. They held listening sessions with the community and updated policies to create more transparency and accountability. They promoted officer wellness by offering yoga and meditation classes.

Yet none of this stopped officer Derek Chauvin from pinning his knee on the neck of George Floyd until he lost consciousness and died.

Minneapolis is a case study in a city that embraced the pillars of the final report from the President's Task Force on 21st Century Policing, a signature blueprint from the Obama era on how to reform American law enforcement. After five years, the city is no closer to achieving the primary objective of creating trust between police and the communities they serve.

After the killing of Floyd and the uprising against police that followed, culminating in the torching of the Third Precinct station, Minneapolis is at a crossroads. It can continue on the path of slow cultural change, or it can opt for a blank slate - to "end the current policing system as we know it," as City Council Member Alondra Cano, who heads the council's committee on public safety, said recently.

The 21st Century Policing model for reform came out of a moment similar to the one Minneapolis faces now. In August 2014, a white police officer shot and killed Michael Brown, a young black man, in Ferguson, Mo. The shooting and decision not to indict the officer laid bare long-standing civil unrest over racial disparities in policing and use of force. It led to protests and riots throughout the suburban St. Louis city and a federal investigation that determined the Ferguson Police Department engaged in a pattern of unlawful and racist policing.

In May 2015, the President's Task Force on 21st Century Policing released a report of recommendations for cities to move into a new era of law enforcement. The document emphasized the need for a cultural revolution in American police departments, which the authors said would come through more transparency and accountability. Police would have to reset their philosophy to focus on community policing rather than the militarized, warrior-minded tactics embraced by so many officers. The trust of skeptical citizens - key to a functioning democracy, according to the report - would come from police forces reflecting the values of the communities in which they work.

All in on police reform, Mpls. comes up short

One barrier that has prevented Minneapolis from achieving these goals has been pushback from the police union and its president, Lt. Bob Kroll, against policy and culture change, said Michelle Phelps, a sociology professor at the University of Minnesota. Last year, when Mayor Jacob Frey announced Minneapolis would become the first city to ban warrior-style training, Kroll countered by publicly announcing free warrior training for rank-and-file officers.

"Cultural change is really hard," Phelps said. "We can see the resistance to this change in the election and re-election of Bob Kroll. And the union exerts its own independent push against reform."

There is also a bureaucracy that complicates the very idea of ground-level change. Phelps points out that Minneapolis is under jurisdiction of not only Minneapolis police, but also University of Minnesota police, park police, Metro Transit police and state and federal law enforcement, all of whom answer to different leadership hierarchies.

The Minneapolis Police Department has made some progress toward more accountability over the past five years. In 2016, following the police killing of Jamar Clark, a black man, the department updated its use-of-force policy with greater emphasis on "sanctity of life." The new language made it possible for the city to take swift action against Chauvin and the other three officers who stood by and watched as Floyd pleaded that he couldn't breathe, Phelps said.

"The fact that all four officers got fired immediately means something," she said. "And yet it's woefully inadequate."

It's too early to say whether Minneapolis is giving up entirely on the Obama model. A majority of the City Council has publicly committed to dismantling the police department, but they have yet to come to a clearly defined consensus of what that means. Phelps said even radical changes could end up looking more like a "21st Century Policing-plus" model than an entirely new playbook.

The death of Floyd has moved the Overton window - the range of ideas deemed politically acceptable - "insanely quickly," Phelps said. "I think everybody's catching their breath and trying to figure out what that means."

The measure of success of a functional police department is also in the eye of the beholder, said Sandra Susan Smith, a sociology professor at University of California-Berkeley.

Communities of color in particular have historically seen the role of police as about "confinement and control" vs. "protect and serve," Smith said. Through that lens, many Americans view efforts to make police more accountable as "nibbling around the edges," rather than addressing the fundamental problems of policing head on.

"Some people argue that police are doing exactly what they're intended to do," she said.

The 21st Century Policing model is predicated on the philosophy that police are an important resource in communities, Smith said. Making dramatic changes - including better training, more accountability and redirecting some police duties to other city departments - could still be compatible with the Obama-era reform model.

All in on police reform, Mpls. comes up short

"What is incompatible is the abolition of the police," she said.

Earlier this month, the City Council approved a resolution for "intent to create a transformative new model for cultivating safety in our city." Mayor Frey, who signed the resolution, is pushing for change within the current department, rather than starting over. What exactly changes will likely come down to Minneapolis voters in the form of a referendum, which some council members say could appear on the ballot this year.

In the meantime, unrest over American policing continues to generate protests across the country in the name of Floyd and other victims of police brutality. Many look to Minneapolis for what comes next.

Kim Homes felt tears well up on Friday as she walked up to the corner of Lake Street and Minnehaha Avenue, where a plastic projectile had struck her leg as she protested the killing of George Floyd.

She didn't see any police now. The National Guard had left. The looters were gone. The fires were out.

Hundreds of people had come to the Target parking lot to celebrate Juneteenth across from the Minneapolis Police Department's Third Precinct headquarters, which demonstrators set on fire following Floyd's May 25 death under the knee of officer Derek Chauvin.

"When I found out [the celebration] was here, it gave me a good feeling," said Homes, who visited the event from north Minneapolis with her two children. "The positive vibe in this is great."

After more than three weeks of protests over police brutality and racial injustice, the annual holiday commemorating the news about the end of slavery in 1865 took on a deeper meaning in the Twin Cities and across the nation. Gov. Tim Walz proclaimed Friday as Juneteenth Freedom Day and called on the Legislature to make June 19 an annual state holiday.

People danced in the streets, listened to speakers, rallied at the State Capitol and held somber reflections at the corner where Floyd died. In dozens of events across the metro, they contemplated not just past freedoms won but also a way toward a more just future.

"I think it's a reminder for us ... to celebrate where we've come from, and at this point how much further we need to go," said Tiffane Gayle. "I think for us this celebration is about liberation, it's about freedom, and right now it does not feel as if we have the freedom that some people think that we have here."

From the stage, Brittany Lewis told the crowd that Juneteenth is a day that people are called to acknowledge the evils of chattel slavery and its aftermath.

"We are a community in dire need of healing," said Lewis, research associate at the Center for Urban and Regional Affairs at the University of Minnesota. The protests and riots following Floyd's killing created an "uprising where many who had been in denial about the depths of white supremacy and the institutionalized nature of racism in this country could no longer hide behind their own silence and fear."

Some African-Americans voiced pleasant surprise that after a lifetime of celebrating Juneteenth among themselves, they now saw far more people showing interest.

"It's been around for 155 years and I feel like America is just now acknowledging this history. ... It's a very important holiday, and now others are coming on board," said Raichel Brown.

Breyonne Golding, a city planner, was heartened to see more people learning about African-American culture and history.

"I really feel like Minneapolis is going to show the world how to finally do racial healing," she said.

North Siders could hear the music from the Cub Foods parking lot a few blocks away, as joyful revelers celebrated at a block party-style event.

In south Minneapolis, outside the CTUL workers center on Chicago Avenue near the spot where Floyd died, a gathering focused on freedom from police brutality.

There was a reading on the history of Juneteenth and a moment of silence for Floyd. Then Tony Williams, a contributor to the MPD150 project examining the history of policing in Minneapolis, took the stage. For Williams and others, policing only reaffirms the goals of slavery.

"I think the city is moving toward a new kind of abolition and seeing the connections between this and the abolition we had to go through to get through slavery," he said.

This year's celebration was unique both because of Floyd and the number of events happening across the city, said Philip Holmes, who's celebrated Juneteenth for 40 years.

"I love the energy and the festive mood of the people - that's what we want to keep alive and capture in the spirit of George Floyd," Holmes said.

But he added that he wanted "something that's more proactive and substantive. It's good to celebrate and things like that, but we need to change a lot of these laws that are detrimental to us."

Maiya Hartman celebrated by working on a mural to honor Floyd as part of a new artists' collective called Creatives After Dark.

"It's been really important to me, being a part of the movement of black artists getting our work out there. I think a lot of the art in this city is very saturated by nonblack artists," Hartman said. "This is our day."

She criticized the Floyd tribute in front of Cup Foods, which she said was largely the work of white artists, adding, "I think it's really important that we have black people telling our story."

Outside the State Capitol, a rally advocating reparations for slavery drew a few hundred quiet participants who sat in front of the steps listening to speakers and engaging in call-and-response chants.

Most proposals from the speakers were less about specifics than the need to continue momentum and stick together. One speaker asked for support to turn the torched Minneapolis Police Third Precinct property into a civil rights museum.

Joy, rallies, reflection at cities' Juneteenth

"It's going to take not one weapon but all weapons to dismantle the evil that is racism," said the Rev. James Alberts of St. Cloud, president of the faith coalition Isaiah.

Like many speakers, Alberts referred to Floyd's death. "If they are comfortable with their knee on our neck, they will leave it there," he said, adding: "I'm not afraid of their knee. It's been on my neck."

The statue of former owner Calvin Griffith, the man who brought Major League Baseball to Minnesota in 1961, was being removed.

In the early hours of Friday morning, just that occurred. The statue of the first team owner, standing in front of Target Field since the ballpark opened in 2010, was hauled away by a construction crew. A sheet of plywood, with a handmade "BLM" (Black Lives Matter) sign attached, was all that remained by mid-morning.

LaTroy Hawkins was one of the former players contacted by Twins President Dave St. Peter and told of the team's plans. Hawkins, who pitched for the Twins from 1995 to 2003 and is black, was unaware of the racist statements Griffith made during an appearance at the Waseca Lions Club in 1978.

St. Peter read Griffith's statements during a telephone conference call; Hawkins' reaction was similar to many across the country who are re-examining the placement of statues and names on buildings in honor of people with ties to racism.

"DSP read us exactly what [Griffith] had said," said Hawkins, a Twins special assistant to baseball operations. "The world is changing. It's taking a hard right turn and there is no place for racism. I don't care if you said it 40 years ago. I don't care if you said it 120 years ago. We have made a conscious effort not to glorify people who were known racists."

The Twins discussed what to do with the statue as fans began to send e-mails and social media messages that questioned its presence outside the ballpark. They consulted with current and past employees. They asked themselves about what the organization wants to stand for in the aftermath of the death of George Floyd, who was killed by Minneapolis police on May 25, an event that sparked nationwide outrage.

"While we acknowledge the prominent role Calvin Griffith played in our history, we cannot remain silent and continue ignoring the racist comments he made in Waseca in 1978," the team said in a statement. "His disparaging words displayed a blatant intolerance and disregard for the Black community that are the antithesis of what the Minnesota Twins stand for and value."

Griffith, who was the last major league owner to integrate his team's spring training camp, died in 1999 at age 87.

During a speech at the Waseca Lions Club on Sept. 28, 1978, he said: "I'll tell you why we came to Minnesota. It was when I found out you only had 15,000 blacks here. Black people don't go to ballgames, but they'll fill up a rassling ring and put up such a chant it'll scare you to death. It's unbelievable. We came here because you've got good, hardworking, white people here."

Griffith's statue went on the plaza in 2010, the year Target Field opened. The other statues on the plaza are of Hall of Famers Rod Carew, Harmon Killebrew and Kirby Puckett; former manager Tom Kelly; former players Kent Hrbek and Tony Oliva; and Carl Pohlad with his wife, Eloise.

Griffith sold the team to Carl Pohlad in 1984; Pohlad died in 2009, and the principal owner of the team now is his son Jim. The Pohlad family announced last week it would donate $25 million from its foundation to seek racial justice.

Orphaned at age 11, Griffith (who was born Calvin Robertson) was adopted by his uncle, Washington Senators owner and Hall of Famer Clark Griffith, and worked his way up the organization after being a batboy as a youngster.

Major League Baseball was integrated when the Brooklyn Dodgers added Jackie Robinson in 1947. The Senators integrated in 1954 by adding Cuban star Carlos Paula; that was a year before Clark Griffith died, leaving the franchise to Calvin Griffith as majority owner.

Griffith moved the team to Minnesota in 1961. The Twins' spring training camp in Orlando was not integrated until 1964, and that came after pressure from politicians and civil rights groups.

Carew was the Twins' star player in 1978 and was furious after hearing reports of Griffith's remarks, which included Griffith saying, "Carew was a damn fool to sign [his most recent] contract. He only gets $170,000 and we all know damn well that he's worth a lot more than that, but that's what his agent asked for, so that's what he gets." Carew was traded to California that offseason.

On Friday, Carew, a Twins special assistant, issued a statement that said: "In 1991, the first person I called after I was told I had been elected to the National Baseball Hall of Fame was Calvin. I have long forgiven Cal for his insensitive comments and do not believe he was a racist. That was NOT my personal experience with Calvin Griffith - prior to or following that day in 1978."

Even after the Twins moved to the Metrodome in 1982, Griffith continued to run them in a discount style as major sports started being populated with independently wealthy owners. Carl Pohlad bought the team for $38 million on Sept. 7, 1984.

The combination of the Pohlads' donation to fight injustice and the removal of Griffith's statue are strong statements, Hawkins said, about the kind of organization the Twins want to be. Hawkins said the club is planning initiatives that focus on inclusion and fairness as they do their part to help the nation emerge from a tumultuous few weeks.

"We took a huge step forward today as an organization," Hawkins said. "Our organization reiterated to the black community that they are not just in it for the short term. The Pohlads family have made decisions that indicated they are in it for the long haul in terms of equality and justice and education in the inner city."

TWINS' STATEMENT ON STATUE REMOVAL

The Twins removed Calvin Griffith's statue from the Target Field plaza Friday and issued this statement:

"When we opened Target Field in 2010 in conjunction with our 50th season in Minnesota, we were excited and proud to welcome fans to our 'forever ballpark.' As such, we wanted to pay permanent tribute to those figures and moments that helped shape the first half-century of Minnesota Twins baseball - including a statue of Calvin Griffith, our former owner and the man responsible for moving the franchise here in 1961.

"While we acknowledge the prominent role Calvin Griffith played in our history, we cannot remain silent and continue ignoring the racist comments he made in Waseca in 1978. His disparaging words displayed a blatant intolerance and disregard for the Black community that are the antithesis of what the Minnesota Twins stand for and value.

"Our decision to memorialize Calvin Griffith with a statue reflects an ignorance on our part of systemic racism present in 1978, 2010 and today. We apologize for our failure to adequately recognize how the statue was viewed and the pain it caused for many people - both inside the Twins organization and across Twins Territory. We cannot remove Calvin Griffith from the history of the Minnesota Twins, but we believe removal of this statue is an important and necessary step in our ongoing commitment to provide a Target Field experience where every fan and employee feels safe and welcome.

"Past, present or future, there is no place for racism, inequality and injustice in Twins Territory."

READERS WRITE NOT HELPFUL, MAYOR FREY

POLICE REFORM

As a supporter of Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey, I looked forward to reading his thoughts on moving the city forward ("Worldwide change starts in Minneapolis," Opinion Exchange, June 18) but by the time I finished, my excitement was gone.

Early on he talks about the obstacle of the Minneapolis Police Officers Federation, agreeing that "culture eats policy for breakfast" - but then he proceeds to lay out policy change after policy change, apparently believing that somehow things are going to be different. Sorry, Mayor, without addressing Lt. Bob Kroll and the legacy that created such a toxic culture, your policy proposals don't stand a snowball's chance on a hot summer day of ever making a difference.

Mayor, focus your energy at the source of the problem, and many of the changes you want to put in place may happen. If you don't, expect the citizen vote this fall to change the city charter to do the job for you.

Howie Smith, Minneapolis

Frey speaks of needing a scalpel rather than an ax to change the Minneapolis Police Department, but he needs to brush up on his surgery skills. He identifies a quantifiable definition of bad apples: officers "who have a history of sustained misconduct complaints." But his solution is merely to limit new officers' exposure to this rotten core rather than to remove the core itself. This problem won't wait on the tortuous path of updating legislation that Frey advocates. If the only way to bring meaningful reform to an insidiously corrupt department is to raze and rebuild, it's time to pick up the ax.

Meanwhile, another nail pounds into Hennepin County Attorney Mike Freeman's career with the revelation that his office prematurely released autopsy findings with the implication that George Floyd's death could be attributed to something other than the knee upon his neck. Freeman's latest tenure as county attorney began 10 years ago when he refused to prosecute the Metro Gang Strike Force, a police unit that flagrantly abused its charter by harassing innocent citizens and looting confiscated property. Freeman's more recent failures to bring proper charges against the officers who killed Jamar Clark and George Floyd make it crystal clear that certain citizens can always count on immunity from his prosecutorial duties.

There is a petition in circulation to recall Freeman from his post. There is one to recall Frey as well. The urgency of this moment demands that officials who can't move us forward must get out of the way.

Jeff Naylor, Minneapolis

The commentary in Wednesday's Star Tribune by Norm Coleman, "Defund and disband City Hall leadership" (Opinion Exchange), was excellent and hit the nail on the head in so many ways. It should be read by every single lawmaker in the state. It puts the blame where it should be for the mess Minnesota is in today - namely, on the leaders and not the Police Department - and gives suggestions for cleaning up this great state. The governor and Minneapolis City Council need to read every word of it and wake up. We need more articles like this and less on the trashing of the Police Department.

There is probably a kernel of truth in Coleman's assertion that "the remedy isn't to defund and disband the Police Department": In a less-than-ideal world there likely will always be a need for law enforcement. However, he fails to consider what many of us want from such a monumental change to the city's approach to social problems. My understanding of the call for disbanding is not that we desire anarchy and chaos, but rather that "policing" is a treatment of symptoms of far more profound and pervasive problems, and a much better (look to New Jersey, of all places) approach is to treat those fundamental, underlying problems. ("What Mpls. can learn from Camden," editorial, June 18.)

In my own view, money freed up by substantially defunding the police, as well as by increasing tax revenue, should be directed to improved education, nutrition, housing, health care, living-wage requirements, jobs, environmental protection and public transportation, really a long litany of social ills. Unfortunately, media coverage of this aspect of the call has been scant at best, perhaps because proposals like those will not make for striking headlines, and, maybe more likely, because those in the public eye calling for change do not yet have a good grasp of what needs to be done.

John D. Tobin Jr., St. Paul

MEDICAL EXAMINER

Trust the doctor, and the process

Thank you for the article in support of Dr. Andrew Baker, the Hennepin County medical examiner ("Autopsy examiner in Floyd case defended as 'fair-minded,'" June 19). The reaction to the preliminary report was unfortunate and damaged the reputation of Dr. Baker and his office. It is unfortunate that so many educated people were not just unaware of the process but never bothered to understand and jumped to the conclusion they wanted to hear. "Preliminary" is just what it means. In the end, the two autopsy reports of George Floyd are nearly identical.

Apologies to Dr. Baker and thank you for not jumping to the desired conclusion.

Mark Odland, Edina

HISTORICAL FIGURES

Treat them all with complexity

Jennifer Brooks wrote a thoughtful and thought-provoking column about the toppling of the Columbus statue at the Capitol ("History at Capitol isn't carved in stone," June 18).

But there was one jarring sentence in the piece: "You can find two statues of aviator and Nazi enthusiast Charles Lindbergh at the Capitol."

In an opinion piece that delves into the complexity and need to understand the historical background of our heroes and villains, I found the cavalier and shallow reference disturbing.

Lindbergh remains one of the most complex and interesting characters in the American pantheon. His historic flight opened up the world of aviation. He invented a biomedical pump that helped develop the science of heart surgeries. His support of Robert Goddard helped America lead the world for a time in rocketry. He was spokesman for millions in trying to keep the U.S. from the war, and when war was declared, he flew 50 combat missions as a civilian and made useful suggestions on improving our military. He spent much of his later life promoting environmental causes.

He has been accused of anti-Semitism, which he denied. He was an advocate of eugenics. He accepted a medal from Hermann Goering, which he refused to return. He fathered seven children with three women while still married to Anne Morrow Lindbergh.

OK, let's sum all that up with "aviator and Nazi enthusiast." Doesn't seem to capture the essential Lindbergh, does it? Or, as Brooks stated: "If you listen to just one side of history over and over, you can miss the most important parts and the most interesting people."

Al Zdon, St. Paul

RECENT UNREST

Good work, firefighters

Great job to the Minneapolis firefighters for their work during the very difficult circumstances they were up against during the nights of unrest in the city ("Firefighters blast city riot response," June 18). I was personally very proud of all of you for the hard work that you did while putting your lives on the line. Hopefully your mayor and fire chief have some emotional empathy and understanding toward all of you and what you all had to endure and experience during those nights.

Please also know that post-traumatic stress disorder is very real. All fire chiefs need to recognize that and take it seriously because there are lasting consequences for those who do not seek or ask for help. Don't be afraid to reach out. PTSD or any other symptoms related to what you witnessed or experienced can be treated.

Federal authorities have charged a Rochester man with setting a fire at a pawnshop near the site of protests over the police killing of George Floyd.

Montez T. Lee, 25, was charged Monday in a federal complaint with one count of arson for a May 28 fire at the Max It Pawn, 2726 Lake St. The pawnshop is about two blocks from Minneapolis police's Third Precinct station, which was set on fire the same night by other suspects as thousands protested the death of Floyd, a 46-year-old black man from St. Louis Park who was killed May 25 after then-Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin knelt on his neck for nearly eight minutes.

Federal authorities on Friday also announced that they had charged Jessica L. White, 33, of Andover, with conspiracy to commit arson on May 28 at an Enterprise Rent-A-Car location in St. Paul.

Lee is at least the 11th and White the 12th person charged in federal court in connection with arson and other crimes that took place in Minnesota in the aftermath of Floyd's death. Court filings indicate that the investigations are continuing.

White, who was arrested June 16, was captured on surveillance cameras inside and outside the rental car company, according to a news release from the U.S. Attorney's Office. Video allegedly showed White outside the business knocking on a window and looking through a door while two companions were inside, the release said. After her companions exited, it said, flames and smoke were seen in the lobby. The building was destroyed by fire.

The criminal complaint does not identify her companions. The affidavit filed to substantiate the complaint was sealed, indicating the investigation remains open.

According to the criminal complaint against Lee: On June 8, investigators with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives received three videos from an anonymous source that allegedly showed Lee setting fire to the pawnshop.

Rochester man charged with arson in pawnshop fire during Floyd riots

One video showed a man pouring liquid from a metal container throughout the building and then standing outside holding his fist in the air as it burned, the complaint says. A second video showed a man standing in front of the burning building speaking to the person recording, it says.

"[Expletive] this place," he said, according to the complaint. "We're gonna burn this [expletive] down."

A third video showed the suspect among a group of men joking about attacking restaurants, then people looting the pawnshop, the charges say.

Investigators found a Facebook profile allegedly linked to Lee that contained a public post about the pawnshop fire. The post included the caption, "Prod The Real Activist Doe," followed by emojis of a laughing face, a fire and a skull, according to the criminal complaint.

Floyd's killing set off days of protests around the metro and the world that also included the looting, vandalism and burning of hundreds of buildings in the metro area.

All four former officers who were at the scene of Floyd's killing face criminal charges and are scheduled to appear in court June 29.

A carjacking/robbery spree in a silver Lexus stolen in Maplewood on Friday afternoon ended with a car crash in Minneapolis and two suspects hospitalized later that night, police said.

The crimes are the latest in at least 20 quick-hitting robberies by an organized group of juveniles spanning the Twin Cities and northern suburbs over the past two weeks.

"We had three in rapid succession, all the same suspects," said Sgt. Michael Nye of the Maplewood Police Department. "They arrived in a stolen car and stole another car."

The carjackings were all in residential areas in Maplewood and all near the 5 p.m. hour, when people were arriving home from work. The suspects started on the west end of Maplewood and continued into St. Paul and over to Minneapolis.

According to police:

At 4:51 p.m., suspects approached a person who was just getting out of a vehicle on Eldridge Avenue. They implied they had a gun and stole a silver Lexus. The Lexus was spotted in at least five other robberies, which is how police know it's the same group.

At 5:01 p.m. in the 1700 block of North Birmingham Street, the suspects approached a person standing on his lawn. They grabbed the keys to the car, but left the car behind.

At 5:10 p.m. in the 2300 block of East Stillwater Road, a man had just pulled into his garage when he was approached by the suspects, who threatened him with a gun and pulled him from the vehicle. The stolen BMW was found abandoned 10 minutes later.

Carjacking spree in stolen Lexus ends with car crash; two suspects still at large

At 9:15 p.m. near the intersection of Albert Street and Goodrich Avenue in the Macalester-Groveland neighborhood of St. Paul, four males pulled up in the stolen Lexus and grabbed a woman as she was walking. The woman told police a suspect said, "Gimme your purse, black lives matter. I have a gun."

At 9:26 p.m., in the 40 block of South Dale Street in the Crocus Hill neighborhood, two males with guns jumped out of the stolen Lexus and robbed a pedestrian.

At 9:31 p.m., a couple of blocks away near the intersection of Dale and Lincoln Avenue, two teens jumped out of the stolen Lexus, implied they had a gun and robbed a group of pedestrians.

At 10:45 p.m., in the 600 block of 2nd Avenue in Minneapolis, a victim was robbed at gunpoint. About 11:15 p.m., Minneapolis police spotted the vehicle near Hennepin Avenue and Interstate 35E. The suspects took off at a high rate of speed and crashed into another occupied car. The Lexus rolled onto its side near the intersection of Hennepin Avenue and Buchanan Street.

Two of the four occupants were injured. The other two left the vehicle and fled on foot. The victim in the car that was hit suffered minor injuries and was treated at the scene. The two injured suspects were transported via ambulance to North Memorial Medical Center. The suspects that fled remain at large.

Ramsey County Sheriff Bob Fletcher said the county had dozens of cars on the streets looking for the suspects all evening Friday.

"Whenever we have a string of six in a row from the same group, it generally means there are some kind of narcotics involved as well," Fletcher said. "This increases the risk of someone getting seriously hurt."

Minnesota lawmakers Saturday morning adjourned without approving any aid for businesses and residents in St. Paul and Minneapolis affected by civil unrest from protests over the killing of George Floyd that turned violent.

Leaders of the Democratic-controlled House and Republican-controlled Senate negotiated through the night on several pressing issues, but the aid appeared to take a back burner after an ambitious and complicated Democratic plan that included a tax hike failed to gain any traction with Republicans.

The failure when the Senate adjourned some time around 6 a.m. Saturday after a weeklong special session culminated with an all-night scramble that showed progress at times but ultimately failed.

The House approved a plan that appeared to offer more than $290 million in various forms of relief that included grants and tax breaks to businesses, as well as commercial and residential rent and lease relief. It would aid a stretch along University Avenue in St. Paul, a stretch along Lake Street in Minneapolis and another area around West Broadway Avenue in Minneapolis.

However, the plan, which had seen little public discussion before Friday, also faced immediate opposition from Republicans on several fronts. It includes a new 0.125 percent metro-wide sales tax, allows for eminent domain as part of an effort to protect against gentrification and would create a pseudo-governmental agency governed by a board, of which "each appointee must be a person of color or an indigenous person."

An Andover woman has been charged with conspiracy to commit arson in connection with one of the destructive fires that were set in St. Paul amid the violent unrest following the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody.

She was arrested Tuesday and made her initial appearance Wednesday in the U.S. District Court in Minneapolis.

Investigators with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) identified Jessica Lynn White, 33, and two other individuals through surveillance video footage from cameras located inside and outside the Enterprise car rental business at 1161 W. University Ave.

According to the federal criminal complaint, White can be seen outside the business about 8:45 p.m. May 28, knocking on the front window and looking into the front door while two other individuals, one being a juvenile, are inside for several minutes.

Shortly after the two individuals exit the building, the front lobby is filled with smoke and fire can be seen flickering in the reflection of the front window of the building. The building was destroyed by fire.

White, whose Facebook page said she worked for AnyTime Bail Bonds and studied violence prevention at Metropolitan State University in St. Paul, was described as having blue/green hair and wearing all black.

According to the ATF report, the juvenile at the scene is believed to be White's son.

The charges are the result of an investigation conducted jointly by the ATF, the FBI, the St. Paul Police Department and the Minnesota State Fire Marshal Division. The case is being prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney Bradley M. Endicott.

GRAND FORKS, N.D. - The Department of Homeland Security deployed helicopters, airplanes and drones over 15 cities where demonstrators gathered to protest the death of George Floyd, logging at least 270 hours of surveillance, far more than previously revealed, according to Customs and Border Protection data.

The department's dispatching of unmanned aircraft over protests in Minneapolis last month sparked a congressional inquiry and widespread accusations that the federal agency had infringed on the privacy rights of demonstrators.

But that was just one piece of a nationwide operation that deployed resources usually used to patrol the U.S. border for smugglers and illegal crossings. Aircraft filmed demonstrations in Dayton, Ohio; New York City; Buffalo, New York; and Philadelphia, among other cities, sending video footage in real time to control centers managed by Air and Marine Operations, a branch of Customs and Border Protection.

The footage was then fed into a digital network managed by the Homeland Security Department, called "Big Pipe," which can be accessed by other federal agencies and local police departments for use in future investigations, according to senior officials with air and marine operations.

The revelations come amid a fierce national debate over police tactics and the role that federal law enforcement should play in controlling or monitoring demonstrations. The clearing of demonstrators from Lafayette Park in Washington for a presidential photo op is still under scrutiny. The Air Force inspector general is investigating whether the military improperly used a reconnaissance plane to monitor peaceful protesters in Washington and Minneapolis this month.

Officials at the Customs and Border Protection base here rejected any notion that their fleet of aircraft had been misused, either to violate privacy rights or intimidate protesters.

DHS aircraft monitored protesters in Minneapolis, dozen of other cities

"The worst part for me is when we're made out to be storm troopers," said David Fulcher, the deputy director for air operations at the National Air Security Operations Center in Grand Forks. "We believe in peaceful protests."

Jay Stanley, a senior policy analyst at the American Civil Liberties Union, said the aircraft could discourage people from protesting. The concern is not only what the border agency is doing with the footage but how future operations could adapt to technology.

"You see an aircraft, you have no idea currently what technologies that aircraft is carrying," Stanley said. "There is something militaristic and dominating about a militarized police aircraft hovering over you when you're out there protesting police abuse."

The Calhoun Square retail center in Uptown will be renamed as its property owners work to disavow the slavery advocate for which the building was originally named.

While leaders of Northpond Partners had contemplated a name change for the south Minneapolis retail building since the Chicago investment firm purchased the property last fall, the police killing of George Floyd and the ensuing worldwide demonstrations and discourse on police use of force and racial equity have pushed the firm to expedite the process.

"The tragic death of George Floyd and ensuing events throughout the country have made it crystal clear that to move forward as a community we must remove painful reminders of the worst chapters in our nation's history," according to a statement by Northpond Partners on Calhoun Square's website. "A property named for a known racist and champion of slavery has no place in Minneapolis or anywhere in our society."

Calhoun Square, which was constructed in 1984 and has had several turnovers in ownership, bears the name of John C. Calhoun, a Southern politician who was an ardent supporter of slavery and the removal of American Indian people from their lands in the early 19th century.

The building, located on the busy corner of Hennepin Avenue and Lake Street, is just east of Bde Maka Ska, Minneapolis' largest lake that also once bore the Calhoun name. Last month, the Minnesota Supreme Court ruled that the state Department of Natural Resources had the authority to rename the lake to its original Dakota name.

Signage for Calhoun Square, which includes a prominent lighted sign above the building, was removed Thursday morning, a spokesman for Northpond Partners said. The group said a new building name will be unveiled.

A Calhoun erasure

Nearby Calhoun Village shopping center, which is owned and managed by Bloomington-based Doran Management, will also no longer carry the Calhoun name.

"Like a lot of retail spaces that wanted to signal our proximity to the lake, our venue bore the name 'Calhoun,'" Doran Management founder and principal Kelly Doran said in a statement. "Recognizing the pain this name has caused, we will be changing the name of our venue."

Doran Management hopes to have the legal work completed to change the shopping center's name by the end of the year.

Calhoun Square is 2 miles from where Floyd died as a Minneapolis police officer, who has since been fired and charged in his death along with three other officers, pinned his knee onto Floyd's neck for nearly 8 minutes. Floyd's death and bystander video of the incident led to widespread protests and calls for police reform.

Over recent weeks, activists and protesters have called for the removal and sometimes forcibly removed or defaced statues and monuments of Confederate leaders and Christopher Columbus across the country.

LEGISLATURE AT IMPASSE ON POLICE REFORMS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 20, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 844 wordsByline: BRIANA BIRSCHBACH JESSIE VAN BERKEL; PATRICK CONDON; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: DFLers want far-reaching changes; GOP proposals are more modest.Body

Republicans and Democrats in the Legislature remained at an impasse Friday on a package of police reforms sparked by the death of George Floyd, a logjam that threatened to upend a weeklong special session where they also hoped to provide relief to cities and towns battered by rioting and the ongoing coronavirus pandemic.

Negotiations stretched into the evening, even as Gov. Tim Walz said conversations with both parties were continuing in "very good faith."

Walz pleaded with Republicans to stay at the Capitol long enough to strike a deal on all of the outstanding issues, including a major infrastructure package that got caught up in the partisan standoffs over police accountability and the governor's emergency powers.

Republicans who control the state Senate signaled that they planned to adjourn Friday night or early Saturday, with or without agreement on new law enforcement initiatives. But legislative aides said talks could continue in the coming weeks, even if a deal could not be reached in the special session.

"Minnesotans expect us, like they do in their jobs, to finish when the work is done," Walz said. "With the idea that what transpired over the last several weeks with the killing of George Floyd is certainly something that is at the center of what we should be doing."

Democrats have pressed for a series of far-reaching police accountability measures in response to the killing of Floyd, who died at the hands of Minneapolis police. Among other changes, their package of roughly 20 bills would tighten the state's deadly force laws and put the attorney general in charge of all cases where deadly force is used. They would also ban "warrior-style" training for law enforcement and restore voting rights for felons on probation,

"If we could just stay a few more days, we could get some amazing things done," said House Speaker Melissa Hortman, DFL-Brooklyn Park.

But Senate Republicans oppose some of those provisions, particularly those that would give the attorney general's office jurisdiction over cases against officers accused of improper use of deadly force. The GOP-led Senate instead passed a more modest package earlier this week that requires reporting and intervention in deadly force cases and directs a state officer licensing board to ban chokeholds and neck restraints, which were used on Floyd.

Democrats said the GOP measures don't go far enough, and protesters outside the Capitol Friday called for broader reforms. Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, R-East Gull Lake, argued that many of the Senate policing proposals "match up" with those put forward by House Democrats.

Lawmakers also have left unsettled a plan to distribute $841 million in federal COVID-19 aid to communities around the state. Gazelka charged that new spending proposals attached to the federal aid plan by Democrats go beyond a deal struck earlier by legislative leaders. "A deal is a deal," Gazelka tweeted Friday.

Also hanging in the balance are a major bonding bill to fund public works projects and a special aid package for Twin Cities businesses damaged by civil unrest following Floyd's death.

The House passed a $300 million package to help those businesses Friday in a 74-53 vote. A different Senate proposal creating a "protest response fund" did not get a hearing during the special session.

"Many people are depending on us. They are waiting on us," said bill sponsor Rep. Mohamud Noor, DFL-Minneapolis. "This comprehensive package sends the right message, creates that opportunity, builds an economic system that we can all rely on."

House Republicans said more deliberation is needed. They cited concerns about a metro tax to support redevelopment, use of eminent domain and the creation of an unelected board to guide rebuilding efforts.

The special session was triggered by Walz's extension of emergency powers to respond to the pandemic. Republicans pushed last week to end his authority, but that move was blocked by House Democrats.

Some of those negotiations have been over those powers, which Walz has used to close down schools, bars, restaurants and other businesses to limit the spread of the virus. Many of those restrictions have been loosened in recent weeks.

Walz said there could be a deal on how those powers are used going forward, one that could help clear the way for a bonding bill, which requires a three-fifths majority to pass. Discussions about the bonding bill, which would authorize long-term borrowing for public infrastructure projects around the state, have hovered between $1.3 billion and $2 billion. Both sides stressed the importance of the construction projects in helping revive the state's economy.

"I told them, I'm more than happy to give up some of these things because I get blamed for everything," Walz said. "I'm someone who truly believes that separation of powers is really important."

Another extension of Walz's emergency powers in July could bring lawmakers back to St. Paul for yet another special session.

Pick Six is a half-dozen cool things in music, from two points of view.

David Murphy of Bloomington:

1 "Picture Show: A Tribute Celebrating John Prine." Produced by his widow, Fiona, on YouTube, this celebration brought tears of joy to fans new and old: Jason Isbell, Amanda Shires, Sturgill Simpson and a moving version of "Angel From Montgomery" by Bonnie Raitt. Even a surprise appearance by Bill Murray.

2 Blue Ox Virtual Music Festival. A virtual version of this annual Eau Claire, Wis., festival featured great performances by Sam Bush, Charlie Parr, Warren Haynes and, of course, hosts Pert Near Sandstone. Well done, boys.

3 "There Was A Time: James Brown, the Chitlin' Circuit, and Me" by Alan Leeds. This excellent book gives a complete historical picture of the Godfather of Soul. Leeds, of Edina, was front and center for much of Brown's career in the 1960s and '70s. This is a great read in these times, comparing what Brown experienced to our modern-day godfather of soul, Prince, along with George Floyd and others. #BLM.

Jon Bream of the Star Tribune:

1 Sounds of Blackness, "Sick and Tired." The mighty Grammy-winning Twin Cities choir is usually on the optimistic tip, but on this terrifically potent new single they're fired up, with horns ablazing and Jamecia Bennett's fervent, roof-raising voice echoing the words of activist Fannie Lou Hamer, George Floyd and others. This is the (protest) song that Minneapolis - and the world - needs right now.

2 Terrace Martin, "Pig's Feet" video. With the help of Denzel Curry, Kamasi Washington and others, this L.A. rapper pairs enraged words with raging videos and photos of recent police brutality and unrest, with some scenes from Minneapolis. Hip-hop hasn't sounded this urgent and intense in a long time.

PICK SIX

3 Bettye LaVette, "Strange Fruit." The new single from her August album, "Blackbirds," couldn't be more timely - a hauntingly spare reading of the Billie Holiday classic about lynching of black people. No one summons hurt in song like LaVette with her deeply emotive, profoundly pained voice.

SOUNDS OF BLACKNESS PENS POWERFUL ANTHEM

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 576 wordsByline: JON BREAM; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Grammy-winning group drops fiercest song "Sick and Tired" on Juneteenth.Body

It was May 26, the first day of protests after George Floyd was killed, and Gary Hines, director of the Sounds of Blackness choir, was near 38th Street and Chicago Avenue in south Minneapolis.

"A white teenage girl recognized me," Hines remembered, "and said 'Mr. Sounds of Blackness, you guys are one of my favorite groups. I know you guys are going to do a song about this, please don't make it a hold-hands song.' "

He promised her that would not happen, recalled Hines, whose Grammy-winning, gospel-infused choir is known for such positive pieces as "Optimistic" and "I Believe."

"We've had plenty of offers from all over to come do kumbaya-type songs," Hines said this week. "That's not what the zeitgeist is, that's not what the mood in the streets is."

Instead, Hines wrote and recorded "Sick and Tired," the Sounds' fieriest, fiercest, most powerful song in their 51 years. It's an enraged, horn-blasted call to action featuring Jamecia Bennett's breathtakingly fervent voice. It's the perfect sound coming from Minneapolis at this moment.

This new anthem for our times was released to radio on Friday, Juneteenth, the African-American celebration of freedom from slavery.

"It's about the anger, the outrage and a call to action," Hines said of his new recording. "I think right now a kumbaya song could be counterproductive, that false sense of 'I feel better.' No, we've got to deal with this."

He actually started writing the song after Ahmaud Arbery, a black man, was shot to death while jogging in Georgia this winter. Then Hines was up all night after Floyd was killed in police custody on "the streets where we ran" and finished writing the song.

Sounds of Blackness pens powerful anthem

The words are inspired in part by the famous line from 1960s civil rights activist Fannie Lou Hamer: "I'm sick and tired of being sick and tired." Hines got to meet Hamer at the funeral for the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. in 1968.

Hines taught his new song to Sounds of Blackness singers during their regularly scheduled rehearsals via Zoom.

When it came to recording "Sick and Tired," there were two challenges: Finding a studio because their usual place, Atomic K, was closed, and practicing social distancing.

At one of the Minneapolis rallies, Hines ran into David (TC) Ellis, the former rapper who runs the High School for Recording Arts in St. Paul. Fortunately, that facility was unscathed in the incendiary protests on University Avenue - and it has a spacious studio where nine socially distant microphones could be set up. So Ellis offered his studio.

"Sick and Tired" features 12 singers from Sounds of Blackness, including powerhouse soloist Bennett, as well as three vocalists from High School for the Recording Arts plus six horn players and Hines on various instruments.

Recorded, mixed and mastered in seven days, "Sick and Tired" captures the mood of the times.

"Talking to that young woman, you could feel the anger, the outrage, the frustration. This needs to be captured, expressed and represented. That is a big part of any true artist's job," Hines said.

"Too often a music is just a balm. 'Everybody calm down, it's going to get better.' We believe that and will never stop believing that. But this moment is getting to the heart of the matter. It's more than George Floyd and Ahmaud Arbery. This has happened for 400 years in one way or another. Around the world, people are saying, 'Enough is enough.' So the music has to get to the heart of the matter."

EX-NFL STAR TO FOOT LEGAL DEFENSE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 20, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 699 wordsByline: STEPHEN MONTEMAYOR; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Kaepernick's charity will pay a "substantial" sum to aid protesters charged with violating curfew.Body

Melody Hubertus said she came equipped with milk jugs and gauze pads to aid people gathered near her Minneapolis home to protest the May 25 police killing of George Floyd.

Gov. Tim Walz had just ordered an emergency curfew for the Twin Cities as the seething unrest over Floyd's death escalated to violence. As law enforcement closed in one evening, the 22-year-old former University of Minnesota neuroscience student rushed to the aid of a fellow protester who was bleeding after being struck by a tear-gas canister.

Moments later, Hubertus was hit by a rubber bullet, she said. Her knee throbbing with pain, she crumpled behind a car before becoming one of more than 60 people arrested and charged with violating the curfew in Hennepin County.

Now, Hubertus can thank former NFL star and civil rights activist Colin Kaepernick for helping to foot her legal bills. Kaepernick's Know Your Rights Foundation has donated what's being described as a "substantial" sum to attorneys in Minnesota and around the country to help defend protesters like Hubertus, who said she is between jobs and was recently homeless.

"I'm so unbelievably grateful and really excited that there is an organization that does that and that people don't have to be afraid to go out and protest injustice," Hubertus said.

Her attorney, Ryan Garry, has been tapped by Kaepernick's foundation to also draft legal motions to be shared with other lawyers in similar cases in Minnesota. Garry said he is seeking to dismiss all cases like Hubertus' on First Amendment grounds.

Garry said he was not in it for the money. "I'm doing it because I think it's the right thing to do and I think at this pivotal moment in our nation's history we are going to look back and say, 'How did we react?' " he said. "I want to react and try to do the right thing."

Garry said he wants to see all of the cases joined together to be defended in court.

"We're in it for the end game," he said. "We're not going to court to just simply plead out. We're doing this because these folks had a right to protest and the government is punishing them for exercising their constitutional right to free speech."

Walz imposed nearly a week of nighttime curfew orders and fully mobilized the Minnesota National Guard after riots led to arson and vandalism to scores of buildings and businesses across the Twin Cities. About 100 people have been charged with violating the emergency curfew order in Minneapolis and St. Paul. Like Hubertus, many still have charges pending and face fines of up to $1,000 or 90 days in jail.

Kaepernick - the former San Francisco 49ers quarterback who became one of the country's most visible civil rights advocates when he took a knee in 2016 during the national anthem to protest police brutality - launched his new Know Your Rights Camp Legal Defense Initiative amid the widespread unrest following Floyd's death in Minneapolis. The legal fund is being paid for through Kaepernick's charity.

"When there is an injustice within our community, it is our legal right to address it, by any means necessary," reads a message on the fund's website.

Ben Meiselas, a Los Angeles civil rights lawyer and general counsel for the legal defense initiative, said it keeps in touch daily with attorneys like Garry. The fund won't disclose how many lawyers it is working with or how much money has been raised, but Meiselas described the effort as "a significant undertaking with some of the top legal professionals."

"It is a systemic approach that we are in for the long haul," Meiselas said.

Hubertus struggles to find the right words to describe the feeling of knowing that her legal defense is being paid for. Looking back on the protests, she said, "I am very, very proud of my city. I couldn't be happier with how things turned out."

She said the rubber bullet fired at her "blew out" her knee and that she had to spend 23 hours a day in her cell because of coronavirus restrictions before being released. Still, even without the legal aid, Hubertus said she would hit the streets again if she deemed it necessary.

"I would be much more afraid, but I wouldn't do anything different," Hubertus said.

FOOD SHELVES WORKING TOGETHER TO FILL THE GAPS

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 1103 wordsByline: MARA KLECKER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Mobilized in crises, nonprofits assist south Minneapolis, look to the futureBody

Three weeks ago, Angel Swann was bustling around an art gallery turned pop-up food distribution site in the wake of George Floyd's death. A line of those in need stretched into the parking lot, and she was prepared to keep the doors open into the fall.

Things are much quieter now at All My Relations gallery. While the backroom is still piled high with donations, items are given out just three days a week. That's set to continue only through mid-July.

"We're out of that initial crisis mode," said Swann, the donation coordinator. "The need is still there, but we have to figure out our resources and our best role."

Across south Minneapolis, similar calculations are being made by the many food distribution networks that popped up after grocery stores were looted and burned in the protests after Floyd's death. Grassroots organizers who stepped up to fill the immediate need have now entered a period of transition.

As city officials and hunger relief organizations work to determine the extent of food insecurity in the Twin Cities, some of the dozens of pop-up food shelves have closed or partnered up so as not to duplicate services. Others have reduced hours and changed their distribution models to better accommodate crowds and follow social distancing guidelines.

Still, the on-the-ground energy is what will continue to drive much of the work, officials say.

Prioritizing community ideas while providing organizational support can be a "delicate balance," said Tamara Downs Schwei, local food policy coordinator with a citywide effort called Homegrown Minneapolis. "The issue here is the scale, the depth and the breadth of the need," she said. "We want to defer to the community without leaving people in crisis."

"We have to let the community groups lead this effort," said Sophia Lenarz-Coy, the executive director of the Food Group, a local nonprofit that supports area food shelves and offers a mobile food market, among other programs. "The last thing south Minneapolis needs is a bunch of hunger relief institutions coming in and designing what this needs to look like. We're coming in when asked."

Holy Trinity Lutheran Church is still operating its food distribution site, which is now drawing upward of 2,000 people three days a week. The city brought in metal gates to help form lines that often begin at 9 a.m.

As the smoke cleared in the neighborhood around the church on E. 31st Street, it started collecting donations to serve an area that had become a food desert overnight. The first day brought a few hundred neighbors, and then that started to double nearly every day, said Ingrid Arneson Rasmussen, the church's lead pastor. Serving thousands has required shifting away from a model that allowed families to pick out their own items. Now items are prepackaged and everyone gets the same bag.

The church has partnered with hunger relief organizations including Second Harvest Heartland, the Food Group and the Sheridan Story to source food and assist with ideas to best serve such a large number of people, many of whom are now coming from outside the immediate neighborhoods. A recent weekday brought dozens of families from across the metro area, including Angel Jonas, a 34-year-old who came from Coon Rapids.

"It's a hard time for everyone, for the entire country," Jonas said. "What I get here makes a huge difference."

Retail stores in the neighborhood aren't expected to open for at least a few months and even then, it will likely be much longer before a full range of grocery stores returns.

Holy Trinity will likely continue offering food and basic necessities with no questions asked until the neighborhood has another option, but its leadership is considering whether it could continue the work.

"Is this a call for our ministry in this moment or is this pointing us to a new direction of ministry to sustain over the long term?" Rasmussen said. "We feel that it's too early to answer that question."

Norma Parsons, 60, lives just a couple blocks from the church and has come frequently to get basic goods. Without a vehicle, she was used to walking to the local Cub or Aldi for her groceries, both of which have closed.

"This means so much to us, to this area," she said, adding that she is worried about how sustainable it is to have thousands of people standing in line for goods multiple times a week.

Tensions in the crowds have dissipated with the new prepackaged model, but it's been difficult to fully allay worries about scarcity, said Doug Mork, an associate pastor at Holy Trinity.

"We know there's need stacked on need here," he said.

Food shelves were already strapped by increased demands from the COVID-19 pandemic. Some shelves across the metro saw double or triple the need, with many first-time users.

"I've never seen need like this and I thought that was true before [the riots], when COVID hit," Lenarz-Coy said.

FOOD SHELVES WORKING TOGETHER TO FILL THE GAPS

Finding solutions has also been made more difficult by the loss of area grocery stores. Some food shelves relied on food rescue from the stores that are now shuttered. Despite the influx of donations from the community, finding sources of fresh produce and ways to keep those items properly stored has been challenging for existing and pop-up food distribution sites.

Many aid organizations had also limited the use of mobile food shelves so as not to draw crowds that would make social distancing difficult.

"We've been in high gear and we're going to need to keep it up," said Allison O'Toole, CEO of Second Harvest Heartland, which will continue to help with food distribution and emergency grocery pop-ups. "Hunger is getting in the way of our work to rebuild - it is complicating efforts to build stronger, more equitable community and effectively fight COVID-19."

Simply reopening a grocery store won't be enough to fix the many factors contributing to the growing food insecurity in Minneapolis, nonprofit leaders say. That wouldn't address the many jobs or hours cut due to COVID or riot-related business closures, and it won't help solve the challenges of getting groceries to seniors and high-risk populations who are still sheltering in place.

"This need didn't start overnight and this response will have to be sustained," said Lenarz-Coy of the Food Group. But, she added, there's opportunity in crisis, particularly with the demonstrated wave of support, energy and input from the community.

"What we've seen for the past few weeks is this beautiful way that we know how to care for each other," she said. "When it feels like the world is crumbling around us, there's something really human in asking 'Can I just feed you?' "

Section: INSPIRED; Pg. 1INLength: 637 wordsByline: ROHAN PRESTON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Improv troupe delights from afarBody

Margaret Chasteen was watching the news one evening when she saw a story about a Twin Cities improvisational troupe that takes calls from strangers and delights them with witty conversation, something many need given the social isolation of the COVID-19 pandemic.

Curious, she dialed the phone number, expecting a 10-minute call.

"I ended up talking with a lady for about an hour," said Chasteen, 59, who has been under lockdown at her assisted living facility attached to a nursing home.

"I have not left the town of Barrett since March 12," she said. "This was my little escape and I have to tell you, it was really a day brightener."

You've heard about retail therapy and cleaning therapy. How about improv therapy?

The idea occurred to writer and improviser Keren Gudeman during a jog around Lake of the Isles in Minneapolis. Gudeman works with the Theater of Public Policy, founded in 2012 by Tane Danger and Brandon Boat to tackle complex societal issues with humor and intelligence. They offer workshops, an improv cafe, virtual tours and now "a space to talk about race and being anti-racist," in the wake of the killing of George Floyd.

After her run, Gudeman contacted her operations team.

"I was thinking about how to connect people for, even in time of Facebook and social media, people are very disconnected," Gudeman said. "And improv artists are great listeners and generally fun to talk to."

The team applied for a small grant at Springboard for the Arts and got $500 to launch. They set up the program, "Phone a Friend," where anyone can call in between 10 a.m. and noon every Tuesday and Thursday for free. The number is 1-833-542-T2P2. The program is scheduled through the end of June.

When Chasteen rang, she got Erin

Roberts.

"All of my work went away with the pandemic," Roberts said, "so this was an opportunity to use what I do for a living to contribute something meaningful, to make people happy and laugh. As an improviser, I'll try anything once."

Chasteen was curious about her host's work in improv. So she questioned Roberts about theater, and shared her own interest in the form.

"She was really easy to talk to and a really good listener - it was just nice," Chasteen said. "It's something I never expected when I called the number. I told her, 'You should be a counselor.' "

Chasteen even tried out a joke on her audience of one, about a time she considered trying her own hand at comedy. "In '06, I had a ruptured aneurysm and a stroke as a result of complications, so I had to use a wheelchair," Chasteen recalled.

"And I said I wanted to be the first sit-down comedian."

Improvisers, including those at the legendary Brave New Workshop, are among the riskiest cohort of theater artists. They get onstage without a net. What could be so hard about talking with random strangers?

"We are all trained in the skills of being present," Gudeman said. "We have all these skills and angles for levity and comedy. In lieu of in-person connection, what are the different ways for people to connect?"

"Oh, the telephone, what a novel idea."

The team that takes calls first listens, then goes with the caller's flow. Roberts recently took a call from someone who was nervous before going in for a surgical procedure. She told some jokes to lighten the mood.

It's a service, but they have a disclaimer. "We're not therapists," Roberts said. "We're human beings who care about other human beings and like to listen."

The pandemic has changed how most people listen and talk. Now, it's all a mediated Zoom world, with a multitude of faces inside squares. Hearing a singular voice on the phone is a comforting throwback.

"Human beings crave social connection so their willingness to open up to a stranger is not shocking," Roberts said. "But when you experience it directly, it feels like a gift."

Minnesota Central Kitchen, the restaurant-and-nonprofit partnership that employs restaurant workers to make hot meals for those in need, has added another kitchen to its roster.

Sean Sherman's the Sioux Chef will be cooking 400 meals a day from its kitchen in the Midtown Global Market.

"Over these past few crazy months in Minneapolis, especially the past few weeks, we really wanted to mobilize and help make a difference with what we do," Sherman said in a video conference Wednesday morning. "Our focus has always been bringing awareness to indigenous foods and creating access to it. But now is the time, even more importantly, to have this access in our communities."

Second Harvest Heartland, the region food shelf supplier, leads the initiative, with contributions from four restaurant partners. The Sioux Chef joins Chowgirls Catering, Surly Brewing Co. and the Wedge Table.

Production kitchens at UnitedHealth Group and other partners are also contributing to the nearly 450,000 hot meals that have been distributed since mid-March. Loaves & Fishes, Appetite for Change, the Sanneh Foundation and Catholic Charities in St. Cloud get the meals to the people who need them.

Minnesota Central Kitchen was launched as restaurants were closing dining rooms to prevent the spread of the coronavirus. The collaboration was meant to employ chefs, rescue food before it becomes waste and feed the hungry.

Second Harvest Heartland CEO Allison O'Toole says that need is more pressing now than ever.

"We are seeing and hearing reports of double and triple need right now in the early summer months," she said in a video conference this week. O'Toole expects that need to grow in mid-to-late summer. The need for fresh food was compounded by the unrest in south Minneapolis following George Floyd's death in police custody.

The Sioux Chef joins relief effort

"The pandemic has made clear to many of us that our collective health and well-being are interconnected," she said. "The choices we make today can honor that new, hard earned understanding that brings us closer together."

Meanwhile, Sherman has had to put his own plans on hold. He was to open his first restaurant this spring, but "right before COVID hit, we had to put the brakes on it."

But the pandemic hasn't stopped him from holding to his mission to train and employ indigenous cooks who make healthful indigenous meals in his Indigenous Food Lab.

"We're still moving forward with getting food out where it needs to," he said.

None of it.

Minnesota lawmakers from both parties and Gov. Tim Walz couldn't agree. The House is controlled by Democrats and the Senate by Republicans; Walz is a Democrat.

The failure - called a "train wreck" by a bipartisan advocacy group - became apparent when the Republican-controlled Senate adjourned some time around 6 a.m. Saturday after a weeklong special session culminated with an all-night scramble that showed progress at times but ultimately failed.

The action played out in the odd new reality of the state Capitol: Only lawmakers, staff and media were allowed inside the stately building, which remains fenced off and during Friday and into the evening featured demonstrations outside calling for racial justice on the African American holiday of Juneteenth.

No grassroots activists, or well-connected lobbyists, were allowed inside.

But they were watching - and taking note.

'Train wreck': Minnesota lawmakers adjourn after failing to agree on major issues

Willmar City Council member Audrey Nelsen, who chairs the bipartisan Coalition of Greater Minnesota Cities, put out a scathing statement Saturday morning divvying up the blame.

The statement was remarkable for a group whose members include important political constituencies for members of both parties in an election year when every seat in the Legislature will be on the ballot.

Here's Nelson's entire statement:

"The special session was a train wreck. Between the COVID-19 pandemic, economic downturn and recent civil unrest, Minnesotans need strong state leadership at the Legislature now more than ever. Instead we got arbitrary deadlines, broken deals and partisan battles.

"I'm frustrated at the Senate GOP majority for their insistence on adjourning prematurely. The decision to adjourn this morning was completely arbitrary, and clearly there is plenty of work left to do. They have chosen to go home rather than continue to seek resolutions on important issues like the CARES Act distribution, bonding bill and police reforms.

"I am also disappointed at the breakdown of the agreement to provide $841 million in federal CARES Act money to local governments. The Senate passed a clean bill that would have distributed money fairly and quickly, but the House DFL essentially killed the bill when they chose to tack on unrelated measures. It has been 86 days since Congress passed the CARES Act, and local governments in Greater Minnesota still haven't received a penny.

"And for months, long before the pandemic, city leaders have been calling on the Legislature to pass a bonding bill that will create thousands of jobs and invest in infrastructure needs across the state. Legislative leaders kept saying they were close to a deal, yet nothing tangible materialized. As a result, our communities must continue to delay critical projects that are needed to ensure clean water, safe roads and bridges, and repair other ailing infrastructure.

"There is plenty of blame to go around for this disastrous special session. The people of Minnesota deserve better."

House Speaker Melissa Hortman, DFL-Brooklyn Park, released the following statement:

"The Minnesota House DFL is ready and willing to continue working to find agreement with Senate Republicans and the Governor on policing reform and accountability, addressing COVID19 and its economic impacts, bonding, taxes, and much more. This moment in history calls upon us to deliver transformative policy to further racial justice. There is nothing more pressing than the need to change law and policy so that it values and protects the lives of Black, Indigenous, and people of color in Minnesota. It's a big task, and it will take an enormous commitment of time and goodwill to achieve. We won't let the end of this special session derail our efforts to work with our colleagues in the legislature and the executive branch to enact nation-leading policies to make systemic change and ensure police are accountable to the communities they serve."

Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, R-East Gull Lake, released the following statement:

"I'm frustrated this morning because I thought we were actually going to do some things together. We had the opportunity to do good things for the state with the federal COVID funds, pass a bonding bill, and reform police accountability. I actually thought we could get something done, but the behind the scenes arm-twisting from the Governor has ended any hope of working together right now. ... I think it's best if we get away from this place while we keep working on the things left undone. We are not walking away from the table, but we do need to reset the table so we can move forward. I do believe we will have another special session, but not until all the parties can agree."

Walz could decide to call lawmakers back to session immediately, but a spokesman Saturday morning said no decision had been made on whether to do that.

Shortly before 3 a.m., Walz held out hope that agreements might be struck and sent to him to sign.

When he was asked about the prospect of a total failure, here's what he said: "Minnesotans know that you don't mow half your yard and go home. Get the work done."

MINORITY OFFICERS KEPT FROM MONITORING CHAUVIN IN JAIL

Eight minority Ramsey County corrections officers have filed discrimination charges with the state's Department of Human Rights after they were barred from guarding or having any other contact with former Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin last month.

Chauvin was booked at the county jail the same day he was charged with third-degree murder and manslaughter in the death of George Floyd.

As Chauvin arrived, all officers of color were ordered to a separate floor, and a supervisor told one of them that, because of their race, they would be a potential "liability" around Chauvin, according a copy of racial discrimination charges obtained by the Star Tribune.

"I understood that the decision to segregate us had been made because we could not be trusted to carry out our work responsibilities professionally around the high-profile inmate - solely because of the color of our skin," wrote one acting sergeant, who is black. "I am not aware of a similar situation where white officers were segregated from an inmate."

Bonnie Smith, a Minneapolis attorney representing the eight employees, said the order left a lasting impact on morale.

"I think they deserve to have employment decisions made based on performance and behavior," she said. "Their main goal is to make sure this never happens again."

In explaining his actions, jail Superintendent Steve Lydon later told superiors that he was informed Chauvin would be arriving in 10 minutes, and made a call "to protect and support" minority employees by shielding them from Chauvin.

"Out of care and concern, and without the comfort of time, I made a decision to limit exposure to employees of color to a murder suspect who could potentially aggravate those feelings," Lydon reportedly said in a statement given during an internal investigation and provided by the Sheriff's Office. He has since been demoted.

Formal charges filed Friday night are expected to automatically trigger a state investigation. It would mark the second Department of Human Rights racism probe into a law enforcement agency in recent weeks. The agency launched a sweeping inquiry into the Minneapolis Police Department after Floyd's death. That investigation will examine MPD policies and procedures over the past 10 years to determine whether the department has engaged in discriminatory practices.

Human Rights Commissioner Rebecca Lucero declined to comment on the pending case in Ramsey County.

'Segregation order'

On May 29, word spread that Chauvin had been arrested and would be booked at the Ramsey County jail. A black acting sergeant who typically oversees the transport of high-profile inmates started a routine pat-down on Chauvin. Lydon instructed the sergeant to stop and replaced him with white officers, the charges say.

A fellow sergeant informed him that Lydon had ordered all minority employees from the fifth floor, where Chauvin was being held in isolation, and prohibited them from having any contact with Chauvin. In every case, white colleagues were swapped in to perform their normal duties.

Later that afternoon, officers of color gathered on the third floor to console one another about what they deemed a "segregation order." Some were crying, charges say, while others were openly contemplating whether they should quit. Individuals who complained were told to take it up with Lydon.

In written statements, all eight staffers recount a meeting with Lydon where he admitted to banning officers of color from the fifth floor but denied being racist. He defended that decision, charges say, yet reversed the order within 45 minutes.

A union steward complained to top brass, prompting the internal investigation. During his interview, Lydon explained that he recognized Floyd's death would "likely create acute racialized trauma" for minority staff and felt he had a duty to protect them from Chauvin. Lydon claimed the decision was not related to his workers' professionalism or concerns over Chauvin's safety.

"I realized that I had erred in judgment and issued an apology to the affected employees," he said.

But by then, at least one officer's work schedule had already changed for the weekend.

Lost confidence

On May 30, multiple officers reported seeing surveillance footage of a white lieutenant who was granted special access to Chauvin's cell, where she sat on his bunk and allowed him to use her cellphone - a significant policy violation.

The Sheriff's Office declined to comment on that allegation. Chauvin was moved to the Hennepin County jail on May 31 and for security reasons transferred again to the Oak Park Heights maximum security prison, where he remains.

Minority officers kept from monitoring Chauvin in jail

Nearly a week after the initial incident, dozens of jailers met with Sheriff Bob Fletcher and elected an acting sergeant to read a two-page letter on the behalf of the minority staff. The note recalled his confrontation with Lydon, the shock he felt upon being called "a liability" around Chauvin and the command to notify other officers of color that they were being reassigned to a different floor.

"I immediately left feeling sick to my stomach," the letter states. "The hurt and anger these officers displayed was evident not only in their body language, but in their voice."

The sergeant went on to explain that the order caused division among the ranks and cast doubt on the professionalism of even veteran officers.

In response, Fletcher promised to reassign Lydon from the jail and follow up with an e-mail regarding how the agency could move forward, charges say. Employees claimed he never did.

Fletcher declined multiple requests for comment. Sheriff's office spokesman Roy Magnuson initially refused to name Lydon's current position or divulge whether he'd been transferred. On Saturday, Magnuson said Lydon had been removed from his role as jail superintendent. He will now report to Undersheriff Bill Finney, who's been tapped to run the Detention Division in the interim.

The department's admission that several officers were reassigned from their posts that day, however briefly, stands in stark contrast to its original narrative to the press.

When Reuters inquired about a segregation order, Magnuson responded via e-mail that there was "no truth to the report" and that Chauvin "was treated according to procedure."

The outright denial only deepened the wound for officers of color.

"They were calling us all liars," said an acting sergeant, who asked not to be named for fear of retaliation. "I can't go to work and hold my head up knowing that they can just brush this under the rug."

The sergeant said he was so disturbed by the decision to segregate staff that he left work early in tears. He later turned down a promotion and the added pay that came with it.

When pressed about the agency's initial statement, Magnuson claimed: "When I asked, that's what I was told."

All eight employees, whose tenures range from two to 10 years, characterized the order as the "most overtly discriminatory act" they've experienced working for Ramsey County.

"My fellow officers of color and I were, and continue to be, deeply humiliated, distressed, and negatively impacted by the segregation order," the charges say, which describe a "hostile work environment" at the detention center since officials' failure to address the incident.

"The damage had been done. These jobs are super sensitive, highly dangerous at times and involve an immense amount of trust," said Smith, their attorney. "They struggle walking into a building where the superintendent is still affiliated."

Eight minority employees of the Ramsey County Jail say they were discriminated against when their supervisor prohibited them from interacting with former Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin while he was being housed at the jail last month, according to a complaint filed with the Minnesota Department of Human Rights.

The corrections officers were told they were a "liability" because of their skin color and were ordered to stop any work that put them into contact with Chauvin, who has been charged with the murder of George Floyd, said Bonnie Smith, a Minneapolis attorney representing the eight employees.

Chauvin, who was arrested May 29, was jailed in the Ramsey County Adult Detention Center at 425 Grove St. for two days before being moved to a different facility.

On May 29th, the eight employees - six men and two women - say they were ordered, along with other people of color, to the third floor of the jail and prohibited from going to the fifth floor, where Chauvin was housed.

In their complaint, they said the county discriminated against them because it "openly singled out and segregated officers" and did so "because we could not be trusted to carry out our work responsibilities professionally around the high-profile inmate - solely because of the color of our skin."

"Can you imagine being a person who worked hard to get the job of your dreams ... and then being told you can't perform your job because of the color of your skin? It's horrible. It's outrageous," Smith said Sunday during a news conference.

Smith said the employees are remaining anonymous because they fear retaliation.

Ramsey County Sheriff Bob Fletcher is reviewing the matter to determine whether any additional action is necessary. He said Sunday that the order by Superintendent Steve Lydon was a "complete error in judgment."

Fletcher said his office met with employees June 4 and began making changes immediately, including having Undersheriff Bill Finney temporarily head the Detention Division with Lydon reporting to him with "modified duties."

Lydon told the sheriff's office that the move was made to protect employees. He made the following statement, which a spokesman for the sheriff's office released Sunday.

"Recognizing that the murder of George Floyd was likely to create particularly acute racialized trauma, I felt I had an immediate duty to protect and support employees who may have been traumatized and may have heightened ongoing trauma by having to deal with Chauvin. Out of care and concern, and without the comfort of time, I made the decision to limit exposure to employees of color to a murder suspect who could potentially aggravate those feelings. Shortly after making the decision, Corrections staff expressed concern with the change and within 45 minutes I realized my error and reversed the order. I then met with the individuals that were working at the time and explained to them what my thought process was at the time and assured them that the decision was made out of concern for them and was in no way related to a concern regarding their professionalism or Chauvin's safety. I realized that I had erred in judgement and issued an apology to the affected employees."

The employees' complaint gives the following details:

After employees were forbidden from working on the fifth floor where Chauvin was being housed, they were sent to the third floor.

One officer, an acting sergeant who said he is a captain in the U.S. Army Reserve and has commanded the largest company in the Minnesota Army National Guard, had been doing a routine "patdown" of Chauvin when he was told he was to not perform his regular duties of escorting high-profile prisoners.

Shortly after this, he said he learned that all "minorities" were no longer permitted on the fifth floor, where the high-profile inmate was to be held, and had been ordered to the third floor.

One lieutenant, a white woman, asked him to help explain to others why the employees were being segregated. He said no.

"I politely refused," he said, explaining to her that he didn't want it to look like he supported the "discriminatory order."

According to the complaint, he said, "throughout my career, I had followed many orders that I had not liked or agreed with, but this was the first time I had to refuse an order."

He then went to the third floor to try to "console" the employees who had been sent there.

"All were extremely upset and offended," he said. Some were weeping.

In addition, the employees ordered to the third floor were also forbidden from responding to an "A-Team Response" emergency that requires that "correctional officers are to drop what they are doing in order to assist the affected inmate and help transport the inmate to the 5th floor."

Minority Ramsey County jail employees allege they were ordered to avoid Derek Chauvin

"Several officers of color including me responded to the call, but were prohibited" from participating, one officer wrote in the complaint.

That same day, Lydon met with correctional officers and defended his orders, saying that he was not racist in making them, but that he had now changed his mind about it.

In the charging documents, Smith says that Ramsey County officials initially denied the order to the Reuters news agency.

To address "the harm they have faced," Smith says the eight officers are asking for the county to do the following:

Implement in-person training about discriminatory behavior for employees at the Ramsey County Adult Detention Center. Remove Lydon from the jail and discipline any "complicit" officers. Make a "formal apology and formal retraction for the lie the county stated to Reuters." Compensate the eight officers for emotional distress and lost earnings. FIGHTING RACISM WITH FREE BOOKS

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 922 wordsByline: JENNA ROSS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Carolyn Holbrook's new book wasn't supposed to be released until August. But then George Floyd died after a police officer pinned him to the pavement.

So the University of Minnesota Press made the memoir available now - for free - along with two dozen other e-books that challenge the racism spotlighted by Floyd's death.

"This is urgent," said Holbrook, a Minneapolis-based author and teacher. "I'm not going to get any royalties; I'm losing sales. And you know what? I don't care.

"This moment is too important."

During this time of unprecedented protest, publishers, libraries, booksellers and authors are getting anti-racist titles into people's hands and heads.

The U of M Press has released a collection called "Reading for Racial Justice," available online for free through August. The Friends of the Hennepin County Library group is making e-books such as "How to Be an Antiracist," by Ibram X. Kendi, available immediately, without a wait. Individuals are buying out their local bookstores, rocketing black authors to the top of the bestseller lists.

"It's clear that what people are asking for is radical change," said Jason Weidemann, the U of M Press' editorial director. Its staff felt a responsibility to contribute by making available books from the past 20 years that illuminate racial inequities throughout local and national history.

"We can help support this change by acknowledging and understanding the racist past of this state."

A similar effort is taking place across the arts. Funders have banded with the MSP Film Society to make films such as the James Baldwin documentary "I Am Not Your Negro" available free, followed by online conversations that dig into the issues they've raised.

Film society programmer Craig Laurence Rice leads those conversations with scholars, activists and filmmakers during which the movies "become a platform to talk about larger issues - what's going on today."

He pointed to Spike Lee's "Do the Right Thing," released in 1989, the landmark film that reflects racial tensions through a hot day on a Brooklyn block. That movie's story is today's story, Rice said, "and how long ago was that?" Finally, "people are tapping into what African-American filmmakers have been saying and what African-American writers have been writing."

Films cannot cause a revolution, he continued. But they can educate and enlighten.

"I really hope people can engage in this and open themselves up to perspectives that may not be in their comfort zone," Rice said. "For specifically white people who have ignored what's been going on - this is not comfortable."

"And it's not going to be comfortable."

Following the killing of Floyd, the Hennepin County Library was inundated with requests for books that grapple with the knotty topics of white privilege and white supremacy. More than 4,000 people put "White Fragility," "How to Be an Antiracist" and "Me and White Supremacy" on hold. With funding from Friends of the Hennepin County Library, the library's nonprofit fundraising partner, the library made those e-books available immediately.

The nonprofit has committed $100,000 to keeping anti-racist titles available, said Kristi Pearson, the Friends chief executive.

The new pick for the statewide book club "One Book, One Minnesota," offers a similar education.

"A Good Time for the Truth: Race in Minnesota," edited by Minneapolis poet Sun Yung Shin, is a collection of 16 essays by Minnesota writers of color. Announcing the title, Beth Burns, president of the Friends of the St. Paul Public Library, said that Floyd's death has led to "a reckoning that we must confront institutional and systemic racism - and that means all of us."

At this time, when many bookstores and campus libraries are closed, when people are donating their extra resources to food drives and rebuilding, the U of M Press decided it was important to get its anti-racist titles out there, said Weidemann, editorial director. Around the country, a few other university presses have done the same.

The U of M Press has long published works on racial justice, he said. "There's a lot of pain, there's a lot of struggle, and there's a lot of inspiration, frankly, in that history."

Want to learn about the Minneapolis-born American Indian Movement, credited with protecting property during recent protests? Read "Survival Schools: The American Indian Movement and Community Education in the Twin Cities," by Julie L. Davis. Want to learn more about the L.A. riots and what followed them? Try "Civil Racism: The 1992 Los Angeles Rebellion and the Crisis of Racial Burnout" by Lynn Mie Itagaki. Want to hear about a Minnesota civil rights leader? Check out "Hope in the Struggle," Josie Johnson's memoir.

Holbrook helped Johnson write that book. Her own memoir, "Tell Me Your Names and I Will Testify," which the U of M Press is publishing, was 30 years in the making. Its essays capture, in part, the ghosts who have guided her, telling her: "Don't hold back, child. Someone out there needs to hear what you have to say."

They also capture the subtle racism often hidden beneath "Minnesota Nice."

These books can "play a major role in educating people about the other side of liberal Minnesota - the underside," Holbrook said. But she's disappointed it took "something like this cop so blatantly murdering that man on camera" for people to begin listening to black people's stories. She hopes that interest continues past this crisis.

"We've been around forever; we're not new," she said. "We've been yelling for centuries."

FIRED OFFICERS HAVE A PROVEN CAREER SAVER

June 21, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1584 wordsByline: JENNIFER BJORHUS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

One Minnesota officer was fired for kicking an unarmed suspect who was already on the ground being attacked by a police dog.

Another was fired for repeatedly punching a handcuffed, intoxicated man in the face.

A third was fired after failing to write up nearly four dozen cases, copying a judge's signature onto search warrants and lying during the investigation.

They all got their jobs back, gun and badge intact.

The killing of George Floyd by a Minneapolis police officer triggered rage and a fresh wave of resolve to reform policing in the United States. It has also prompted renewed scrutiny of Minnesota's system for disciplining police officers, one that sets the bar high for firing officers for misconduct.

More than 80 police officers across Minnesota were fired and fought their discharge in arbitration over the past 20 years. About half got their jobs back, according to a Star Tribune analysis of decisions logged with the Minnesota Bureau of Mediation Services.

The true figure could be slightly higher. Minnesota's public records laws prohibit releasing any information at all when arbitrators overturn a decision to fire a cop without imposing any type of discipline. Such total exonerations, while uncommon, are erased from public record.

The arbitration records include 10 cases involving Minneapolis police officers. Eight of them got their jobs back - one of them twice.

Although the Minneapolis Police Department quickly fired the four officers involved in Floyd's death, it doesn't typically fire many officers. Assistant Chief Mike Kjos said there are more separations than arbitration records indicate. Some cases never go to arbitration, and some are negotiated and classified as resignations or retirements. Plus, the department can't make a termination public until the grievance process has played out.

Fired officers have a proven career saver

The fact that firing an officer could end up in arbitration - and be reversed - weighs on decisions to officially terminate, Kjos said.

At a June 10 news conference announcing his withdrawal from contract negotiations with the Police Officers Federation of Minneapolis, Chief Medaria Arradondo noted the discipline and arbitration process as areas needing reform.

"There is nothing more debilitating to a chief from an employment matter perspective, than when you have grounds to terminate an officer for misconduct, and you're dealing with a third-party mechanism that allows for that employee to not only be back on your department, but to be patrolling in your communities," Arradondo said.

He repeated that Thursday at a news conference with Mayor Jacob Frey and several other elected officials from around the Twin Cities. If the Legislature is serious about making changes, they said, it will tackle arbitration.

Police reform efforts, however, collapsed at the Legislature Saturday as the special session ended without the Democrat-controlled House and Republican-controlled Senate finding middle ground on those issues.

Rep. Michael Howard, DFL-Richfield, who authored the House arbitration reform bill, blamed the Senate: "Given the importance of this moment and with the world watching, it is deeply disappointing that the Senate chose to ignore Minnesotans crying out for change and instead walk away."

Obstacle to accountability

The Bureau of Mediation Services says police officers win their jobs back at roughly the same rate as other public-sector employees.

Veteran arbitrator Laura Cooper, a retired University of Minnesota labor law professor, said arbitration is not a monolithic thing. It's a creature of agreement that can be altered. If employers don't like the discretion arbitrators have, they should change their labor union contracts, she said, to require specific consequences for specific violations of performance standards.

The process is designed to protect union employees from capricious decisions by employers, with a "just cause" standard for termination that has been universally accepted in collective-bargaining agreements, said Cooper and labor unions. Arbitrators are neutral and look just at the facts, they say.

Arbitration numbers capture only a fraction of the Minnesota officers fired each year, according to Law Enforcement Labor Services, the state's largest law enforcement union. Only the most difficult cases end up in arbitration, it says, and it's unfair to use them to judge police discipline. If law enforcement departments are losing cases, they need to look at how they're handling their discipline, said Sean Gormley, the union's executive director.

Police chiefs have decried arbitration as a major obstacle to police accountability. The high chance that a fired officer will be back in uniform undercuts the entire disciplinary system, said Chuck Wexler, executive director of the Police Executive Research Forum, a Washington, D.C., think tank.

In Minneapolis, some officers have gotten their jobs back not once, but twice.

Jason Andersen was fired in 2009 for a misdemeanor domestic assault charge that was later dismissed. An arbitrator ordered him reinstated after concluding there wasn't enough evidence the assault occurred.

He was fired again in 2010 after allegedly kicking a teen in the head and being untruthful about it during an investigation. An arbitrator ordered him reinstated again after concluding that Andersen, who told investigators he couldn't recall the details but knew he did not kick the teen in the head or face, could not be expected to remember an event from a year earlier without seeing his report on it, which he was not allowed to see.

Andersen was not fired, however, for shooting and killing Fong Lee, a teen who was running from police in 2006. He was cleared of criminal wrongdoing and in a wrongful-death lawsuit after a federal jury found he used reasonable force. He's now the MPD's chaplain coordinator.

Most recently, an arbitrator last fall overturned Arradondo's decision to fire Officer Peter Brazeau, who had repeatedly punched a belligerent drunk man in the face as the man lay handcuffed on his back.

The arbitrator agreed that Brazeau violated the use-of-force policy but reduced his discipline to an 80-hour suspension. According to the decision, the reason was that police leadership had enough confidence in Brazeau to appoint him a training officer while the matter was churning through the discipline process, and also because of the MPD's "lack of specific training as to how to deal with a handcuffed individual who continues to kick, flail and resist."

An MPD spokesman said neither Andersen nor Brazeau could comment for this story.

Reforms in play

The House arbitration reform sought to change the way arbitrators are chosen for police misconduct disputes. It called for an arbitrator to be automatically assigned from a roster of specialists appointed by the governor.

Currently, the employer and union take turns striking an arbitrator from a list of seven as either too pro-employer or too pro-employee, until only one remains. Critics say that creates an incentive for arbitrators to maintain a 50-50 record. Employers and unions typically split the cost of an arbitrator.

Testifying recently at the State Capitol, Coon Rapids Police Chief Brad Wise discussed the effects of having discipline overturned.

"There's nothing worse, in my view, for an organization than to lose an arbitration," Wise testified. "I think it creates distrust within the workplace. Frankly, it saps the confidence of a police leader. And it makes police leaders be reluctant to even let cases go to arbitration for fear of losing them."

Andy Skoogman, executive director of the Minnesota Chiefs of Police Association, called Howard's measure a step in the right direction. His group wants all police officer termination cases heard by an administrative law judge.

The legislative push followed unsuccessful court challenges to arbitrators' decisions.

The city of Richfield dug in its heels after its police chief fired an officer in 2016 after he verbally attacked a Somali teen and smacked him on the head. Among other things, Nate Kinsey failed to report his use of force as required. An arbitrator concluded Kinsey's smack was not excessive and ordered him reinstated, cutting the discipline to a three-shift suspension and full back pay.

Fired officers have a proven career saver

The Minnesota Supreme Court last year fully backed the arbitrator's decision; Kinsey is back on the Richfield force.

Duluth, too, lost its challenge to an arbitrator's decision to reinstate an officer who dragged an intoxicated, handcuffed man 100 feet. In December, the state Supreme Court denied its petition for review.

Improving accountability

Cooper, the arbitrator, said she'd be "shocked" if any arbitrators were tracking their mix of decisions in the manner the chiefs association suggests.

"I think it's scapegoating," she said. "Ninety to 95% of the time if you actually read the decision, it makes perfect sense."

Arbitrators work hard, she said, to weigh multiple factors to determine whether there was just cause for termination. The most common reasons chiefs lose a case, she said, is that the investigation was not thorough, they didn't properly notify the officer the behavior was wrong, or they imposed discipline that differed from what other officers received in similar circumstances.

In her mind, preventing excessive-force misconduct is a more effective way to improve accountability, she said. That means clear rules, better training and strong supervision.

Said Cooper: "I want a system that stops killing people unjustly."

Minnesota United players showed they're united when they recorded a social justice video they posted across their social media platforms Saturday afternoon.

A 20-second video shot with a drone opens with an image of the words "Black Lives Matter" on a T-shirt and then moves out to show veteran defender Ike Opara down on a knee, right fist raised, at Allianz Field's midfield. As the camera moves away, teammate Thomas Chacon strikes the same pose to Opara's right and Mason Toye to his left until the video shows all players following Opara's lead around the pitch's midfield circle.

Players wrote their own captions when each posted the video on Twitter, Instagram and other social media.

Opara wrote, "Change is coming." Ethan Finlay wrote, "We Are United, there will be change." Team captain Ozzie Alonso said, "We all bleed the same color." Young midfielder Jacori Hayes posted, "Today and Always" while goalkeeper Greg Ranjitsingh added, "We are united."

Veteran defender Michael Boxall simply included a black fist emoji.

Players coordinated with the club's front office and coaching staff about posting the video that's part of worldwide unrest spurred by the killing of George Floyd by Minneapolis police.

"Like I've said all along, it's time for change," United coach Adrian Heath said. "I'm really proud the way our players have responded to what's gone on in the last few weeks here in Minnesota. We haven't had to prompt them. They've been out there marching. They've been out there showing their solidarity with everybody, and it doesn't surprise me they've organized that today. We all think it's time for change, and hopefully this is the beginning."

Heath's interview was conducted by a team employee and provided to media after the Loons trained at Allianz Field on Saturday for the first time in nearly three months.

Remember the "state that works?"

That was the image Minnesota presented the world on the cover of Time magazine's Aug. 13, 1973, edition featuring a gleaming Gov. Wendell Anderson, clad in a flannel shirt, holding up a northern pike.

"The good life in Minnesota," the magazine proclaimed over the backdrop of a pristine lake.

But not everyone was living the good life.

Fast-forward nearly a half-century: A viral video shows the world Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin kneeling on George Floyd neck, killing him and stamping the city permanently into the annals of the global struggle for civil rights.

The ensuing civil unrest lit the Twin Cities aglow and turned Minneapolis into an icon of what the political right sees as a dystopian future. Asked what would happen if he is not reelected, President Donald Trump predicted that "the whole country will be Minneapolis."

The stakes were not lost on Gov. Tim Walz, another Minnesota leader partial to flannel. He implored a special session of the Legislature to pass meaningful police reforms to address well-documented racial inequities.

"If destiny and history is not raining down on Minnesota today and tomorrow, I don't know what is," Walz said, adding: "the rest of the world is looking."

Much has happened since America set out three weeks ago to become a more racially tolerant nation.

Confederate monuments have been removed. NASCAR banned the Confederate flag. Companies in Illinois and elsewhere are declaring Juneteenth a holiday. And Aunt Jemima has been fired from the high-profile position she has held for 130 years.

Some corporations are patting themselves on the back for finally doing what they should have done decades ago. They refused to change because they didn't have to.

In the era of George Floyd, blatant racist images and behaviors suddenly have become taboo. Many companies and institutions, as well as some individuals, are scrambling to figure out what steps they can take to make themselves look like torchbearers for social justice rather than the racism enablers they've been.

Some aren't looking for real solutions, though. They are seeking quick fixes that make them seem progressive but do nothing to address systemic racism, the greatest barrier to social justice.

Removing Aunt Jemima's name and picture from bottles of syrup, giving employees a day off to celebrate Juneteenth or tossing money into the pot to help the black cause isn't good enough. Corporations should be leading the charge to revamp economically deprived neighborhoods that have long suffered from disinvestment.

Most African Americans will shed no tears for Aunt Jemima. But we aren't ready to embrace the Quaker Oats Co. and say job well done either.

Dahleen Glanton: So long, Aunt Jemima. Now it's time for some real change, not just window dressing

The company always knew that Aunt Jemima was a racist stereotype. That's why it changed her image in 1968 and again in 1989 to make her appear more socially acceptable. Yet it kept using her to make money until the social climate in America shifted and blatant racist acts fell out of fashion.

The Chicago-based company announced that it is donating $5 million over the next five years to support projects in the black community. That's a drop in the bucket for a corporation that has made billions exploiting black people with the use of a racist image.

If the company wants to have a real impact, it should open a production facility on Chicago's West Side and commit to hiring and training chronically unemployed residents.

Much of the soul-searching occurring in the aftermath of Floyd's death at the hands of Minneapolis police is necessary. Some of the decisions are an honest attempt to address past wrongs and promote a better understanding of how complacency enables racism.

City officials in Jacksonville, Fla., rightfully removed a 122-year-old monument to fallen Confederate soldiers that stood in a public park in the heart of downtown. The same is true of those in Louisville, Ky.; Alexandria and Norfolk, Va.; Mobile, Ala.; Asheville, N.C.; and other cities where statues were taken down.

These fixtures had no place in public squares, forcing taxpaying African Americans to pay tribute to figures who fought to keep black people enslaved.

The Confederate flag, however, is more complex. All Americans have the right to fly the rebel flag on their front porch or pin one to the tail of their pickup truck. This is America, after all - the land of free expression.

For years, NASCAR provided Confederate flag lovers the biggest forum to gather and celebrate their heritage. Being a private company, NASCAR was under no obligation to change the way it has accommodated its most loyal fans. But officials decided that removing the flag was in the best interest of America.

By banning the Confederate flag from all events and properties, NASCAR gave its biggest supporters a direct slap in the face. It chose instead to provide a "welcoming and inclusive environment for everyone," including its lone African American racer.

The move sent a clear message to the rebel establishment that it was no longer willing to be part of the Confederate culture that promotes division and superiority. But that's not enough.

NASCAR remains one of the whitest sports in America. Its black driver, Bubba Wallace, can't change that. If NASCAR wants to help move America forward, it has to actively recruit and train a diverse roster of competitors.

Instead of closing banks on Juneteenth, banking executives should put their heads together and figure out how to remove barriers that historically have kept blacks from obtaining loans to buy homes and start businesses.

It's time for real change in America, not just window dressing. As a friend told me recently, "Brushing rotten teeth isn't enough when you need a root canal."

Dahleen Glanton: So long, Aunt Jemima. Now it's time for some real change, not just window dressing

ARTICLE DCCCXXXVI. FIGHT FOR RACIAL EQUITY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 15ALength: 1017 wordsByline: LORI STURDEVANT, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Why did the spark catch here, now? // The demography of our city and state, and how it's changed, can bring some insight to the big question many of us are asking.Body

Why here? Why now?

Those questions have simmered in plenty of Minnesota minds, I'd guess, ever since the sorry Memorial Day evening when four Minneapolis cops made this state the flash point for globe-spanning outrage over racial injustice.

Why did that happen here, at the wellspring of Hubert Humphrey progressivism? Why did this spark catch fire now, more than 50 years after this state last watched an urban commercial district go up in flames during race-related unrest?

Those are the kind of questions that send an erstwhile columnist to the state demographer. Demography can't explain everything. But it usually reveals things worth knowing, I've found, especially when big questions about society start with "why." Or when thoughts turn, as they now must, to "what's next?"

For example, know this: While Minnesota remains "whiter" than many American states, it also has witnessed dramatic growth in the share of its population counted as people of color. While that growth has slowed somewhat since 2010, it hasn't stopped, and likely won't for many years to come.

"Minnesota's racial diversity has lately been increasing at about half a percentage point a year - and that's rapid for a society," state demographer Susan Brower told me last week.

Especially, I'd add, for a state in which people of color accounted for just 1.2% of the population in 1960, as the 20th-century U.S. civil rights movement gathered steam.

A big change for Minnesota came between 1990 and 2010, Brower said, when immigration brought waves of people born in Asia and Africa to the state. That took the share of Minnesotans of color from a little more than 6% in 1990 to nearly 17% in 2010.

FIGHT FOR RACIAL EQUITY

It's at an estimated 20.4% today. That means that, much more so than during Humphrey's heyday, racial injustice is no mere abstraction in this state. The slogan "Black Lives Matter" is much more likely to be personal to Minnesotans. Barriers to the well-being of people of color are more immediately and frequently encountered. Awareness that the whole state is diminished when people of color suffer runs wider and is more keenly felt.

But so far, that awareness has not produced much narrowing of the many racial gaps Minnesotans have been hearing about for years - in household income, educational attainment, homeownership, life expectancy and the rest. Brower closely watches those metrics of inequality, and says she's been expecting to see the gaps narrow as the state population diversifies. By and large, they have not.

"We have had many people working on these issues for a long time. But the regular processes of change haven't been effective enough, or quick enough," she lamented. "Even when people at the top are sympathetic and paying attention, we're still not seeing the movement people would like to see. That's what a lot of people are reacting to now."

Instead, in some quarters (say the headquarters of the Minneapolis Police Federation), Minnesotans are seeing the resistance that rapid change in a population's racial composition can trigger. So said Brower's predecessor Tom Gillaspy, who schooled scores of journalists during 33 years as state demographer and kindly gave me a brief refresher course last week.

"Some attitudes become more entrenched in the face of changes like this," Gillaspy said. He suspects that the rural/urban and red/blue partisan divides that have seemingly widened in recent years are driven in part by disparate responses to Minnesota's changing racial composition.

But his answer to "Why now?" hearkens back to something I was taught by his predecessor as state demographer, Hazel Reinhardt: When the young adult cohort in a population becomes uncommonly large, pressure for social change spikes.

Gillaspy noted that Minnesota's population now has two outsized bumps - baby boomers and millennials, whom we boomers know as "our kids." In Minnesota, millennials overtook boomers in numbers in 2014, a few years sooner than in the nation as a whole.

Those two big cohorts may be acting in concert now as agents of social change, Gillaspy said. Not all boomers lost the idealism of their youth, he noted.

"A lot of boomers are thinking, can we make this any better? Weren't we going to have more of an effect [on eliminating racism] than we had? Meanwhile, millennials have certainly become a force, some fairly strident," he said.

They're a force capable of political impact. Brower noted that the millennial generation now ranges from 24 to 39 in age. That's full political maturity - older than were many of the boomers who marched for racial justice and an end to the Vietnam War 50 years ago.

Millennials came of age during the worst economy since the Great Depression, many of them loaded with a heavier college debt burden than any previous American generation carried. They've struggled to reach financial security, for many of them only to see paychecks lost to a virus this year. It's a situation that allows society's structural inequalities to be sorely felt.

FIGHT FOR RACIAL EQUITY

"The movement of the millennial generation into adult roles is foundational to understanding this as a moment that's ripe for some social movement to take place. It's the foundation that helps today's movements find fertile ground," Brower said.

Thus, two demographic trends combined to propel grief, outrage and demands for change into the streets in the last four weeks. A growing population of color in Minnesota is making racial injustice real. A large young adult population is making demands for remedies urgent.

Gillaspy likened this demographic moment to an alignment of planets "that come together, then go spinning off in opposite directions. You have to take advantage of that alignment when you can, because the moment won't last."

What's next? An opportune moment has come to bend Martin Luther King's famous arc more directly toward justice. Seize that chance this year, or risk what could be many more years of watching an ever-larger share of Minnesotans - and the state itself diminished by racism.

Neither Abraham Lincoln nor the Republican Party freed the slaves. They helped set freedom in motion and eventually codified it into law with the 13th Amendment, but they were not themselves responsible for the end of slavery. They were not the ones who brought about its final destruction.

Who freed the slaves? The slaves freed the slaves.

"Slave resistance," as historian Manisha Sinha points out in "The Slave's Cause: A History of Abolition," "lay at the heart of the abolition movement."

"Prominent slave revolts marked the turn toward immediate abolition," Sinha writes, and "fugitive slaves united all factions of the movement and led the abolitionists to justify revolutionary resistance to slavery."

When secession turned to war, it was enslaved people who turned a narrow conflict over union into a revolutionary war for freedom. "From the first guns at Sumter, the strongest advocates of emancipation were the slaves themselves," historian Ira Berlin wrote in 1992. "Lacking political standing or public voice, forbidden access to the weapons of war, slaves tossed aside the grand pronouncements of Lincoln and other Union leaders that the sectional conflict was only a war for national unity and moved directly to put their own freedom - and that of their posterity - atop the national agenda."

All of this is apropos of Juneteenth, which commemorates June 19, 1865, when Gen. Gordon Granger entered Galveston, Texas, to lead the Union occupation force and delivered the news of the Emancipation Proclamation to enslaved people in the region. This holiday, which only became a nationwide celebration (among black Americans) in the 20th century, has grown in stature over the last decade as a result of key anniversaries (2011 to 2015 was the sesquicentennial of the Civil War), trends in public opinion (the growing racial liberalism of left-leaning whites), and the rise of the Black Lives Matter movement.

Over the last week, as Americans continued to protest police brutality, institutional racism and structural disadvantage in cities and towns across the country, elected officials in New York and Virginia have announced plans to make Juneteenth a paid holiday, as have a number of prominent businesses like Nike, Twitter and the NFL.

There's obviously a certain opportunism here, an attempt to respond to the moment and win favorable coverage, with as little sacrifice as possible. (Paid holidays, while nice, are a grossly inadequate response to calls for justice and equality.) But if Americans are going to mark and celebrate Juneteenth, then they should do so with the knowledge and awareness of the agency of enslaved people.

Emancipation wasn't a gift bestowed on the slaves; it was something they took for themselves, the culmination of their long struggle for freedom, which began as soon as chattel slavery was established in the 17th century and gained even greater steam with the Revolution and the birth of a country committed, at least rhetorically, to freedom and equality. In fighting that struggle, black Americans would open up new vistas of democratic possibility for the entire country.

To return to Ira Berlin - who tackled this subject in "The Long Emancipation: The Demise of Slavery in the United States" - it is useful to look at the end of slavery as "a near-century-long process" rather than "the work of a moment, even if that moment was a great civil war." Those in bondage were part of this process at every step of the way, from resistance and rebellion to escape, which gave them the chance, as free blacks, to weigh directly on the politics of slavery. "They gave the slaves' oppositional activities a political form," Berlin writes, "denying the masters' claim that malingering and tool breaking were reflections of African idiocy and indolence, that sabotage represented the mindless thrashings of a primitive people, and that outsiders were the ones who always inspired conspiracies and insurrections."

By pushing the question of emancipation into public view, black Americans raised the issue of their "status in freedom" and therefore "the question of citizenship and its attributes." And as historian Martha Jones details in "Birthright Citizens: A History of Race and Rights in Antebellum America," it is black advocacy that ultimately shapes the nation's understanding of what it means to be an American citizen. "Never just objects of judicial, legislative, or antislavery thought," black Americans "drove lawmakers to refine their thinking about citizenship. On the necessity of debating birthright citizenship, black Americans forced the issue."

After the Civil War, black Americans - free and freed - would work to realize the promise of emancipation and to make the South a true democracy. They abolished property qualifications for voting and officeholding, instituted universal manhood suffrage, opened the region's first public schools and made them available to all children. They stood against racial distinctions and discrimination in public life and sought assistance for the poor and disadvantaged. Just a few years removed from degradation and social death, these millions, wrote W.E.B. Du Bois in "Black Reconstruction in America," "took decisive and encouraging steps toward the widening and strengthening of human democracy."

Juneteenth may mark just one moment in the struggle for emancipation, but the holiday gives us an occasion to reflect on the profound contributions of enslaved black Americans to the cause of human freedom. It gives us another way to recognize the central place of slavery and its demise in our national story. And it gives us an opportunity to remember that American democracy has more authors than the shrewd lawyers and erudite farmer-philosophers of the Revolution, that our experiment in liberty owes as much to the men and women who toiled in bondage as it does to anyone else in this nation's history.

McLean, Reid Reid McLean of Saint Paul, Minnesota passed away June 6, 2020, of pancreatic cancer. Reid was actively engaged in a remarkable variety of cultural and creative communities, and will be deeply missed by all who knew him. Wherever he went, Reid enjoyed a reputation for generosity, intelligence, decency, and wit. Born August 25, 1950 in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Reid grew up in nearby West Allis. He was a graduate of Nathan Hale High School, Macalester College (BA, English), and the University of Minnesota (MA, communications studies). During and after his undergraduate studies, Reid played keyboards and woodwinds for several local rock bands, and eventually moved into booking, managing, and mentoring younger musicians in the Twin Cities new wave scene. Graduate studies and work in marketing and communications consulting led him to the Minnesota Orchestra, where for 15 years he developed, booked, and promoted multiple concert series and special events, including the much lauded "Day of Music." In 2006 Reid returned to Macalester to work in the advancement office, building the Mac community and promoting philanthropic support of the college's mission. Reid joined his late wife Brigid in supporting political campaigns centered on equity and social justice. He served on the board of Ampersand Families and on the Development Committee of the American Composers Forum. With Brigid, Reid hosted and advised many Macalester international students. He generously guided his own nieces and nephews in their college choices. Reid had exquisite taste in music, including jazz, classical, and rock. He knew and loved fine food and wine, contemporary film, and literature. He admired the work of Montaigne and was an advocate for and avid player of the Brazilian urban pop music known as choro. The Byrds were his favorite band. Reid is survived by his mother Helen Jane McLean; siblings Joanne (Scott) Winters, Carol (Steve) Lukaczer, David (Patty) McLean; siblings-in-law Maura (Kevin) Cope, Richard McDonough (Mimi Exon) & Maureen McDowall (Peter Anderson); nieces and nephews Rory, Shannon, and Ryan Stewart; Shawn Cope; Miles and George McDowall; Eric (Kristen) Winters; Bethany (Sloan) King; David, Grace, and Marcus Lukaczer; Erin (Javier) Mantilla; Reid (Jenney) and Laura McLean; and great nieces and great nephews Molly Winters & Grayson and Easton King. He was preceded in death by Mary Brigid McDonough (Wife), Roger McLean (Father), Hon. Judge John T. McDonough (father-in-law), Mary Horgan McDonough (mother-in-law), Molly McDonough Stewart (sister-in-law), Erin Stewart (niece), and Paul McDowall (brother-in-law). He wanted everyone to know he had a great life with Brigid, his family, and his friends. A virtual memorial gathering will be held on Friday, June 26 at 10:00 a.m. Please send an email to reidmcleanmemorial@gmail.com to receive the link. Memorials preferred to Macalester College and Ampersand Families.

Carruth, Donald H. age 106, of Excelsior. Preceded in death by wife, Florence, and 10 older siblings. Survived by his 4 children: Donna (Mel) Hladky, Minnetonka; Don (Marge) Carruth, Minnetonka; Lee (Cheri) Carruth, Maple Grove; Robert (Kathryn) Carruth, Savage; 7 grandchildren, DeAnn (Rick) Conzet, Killeen TX; David (Christie) Hladky, Jordan; Bob (Jeanne) Carruth, Jackson Hole WY; Julie (Chris) Lange, Baldwin KS; Leigh Carruth, Sacramento, CA; Jessica (Karl) Hammerstrom, Savage; Max (Amy) Carruth, Chanhassen; 12 great grand children; 5 great, great grandchildren. In 1918, at the age of 5, Don became so ill with the Spanish Flu that his parents placed him in a snow bank to lower his body temperature. The doctor came out to the farm twice to try to help and told the family to prepare for his death. All of his hair fell out, yet he survived and his hair came back in abundance. Don served in WW II (1944-46) and was trained as a pharmacist. He played saxophone in the Navy band stationed in Washington state. In 1976, at the age of 62, Don retired from Minnetonka Schools after a long career as school principal, teacher and coach at the old Excelsior High School. Don was the school principal at Excelsior at the beginning and end of his career with some years at Minnetonka West in the late 60s. Don also coached community baseball from Little League through town ball. In 1966 all 3 of his sons were on the Chanhassen Red Birds town team that he coached. Don grew up on a farm near Danvers, the youngest of 11 children where music and sports were a big part of family life. Don played all instruments and the piano taught by his older sister, Mildred. He, with older brothers Mick and Connie, sang and played saxophones in MN bands as teenagers and young adults before starting the Don Carruth Combo in the 1970s and continuing into 1990s. The Don Carruth Combo included local musicians who played throughout the Twin Cities in a variety of genres with the big band sound being his favorite. He played in bands to support his family in the early 1930s while getting his Bachelor's degree in teaching at St. Cloud Teacher College and later his Master's in School Administration at the University of MN. Don's musical career included being the band for his oldest grandson David's wedding and culminating with spectacular saxophone solos at both his youngest granddaughter Jessica's wedding and his oldest great granddaughter, Angie's wedding at the age of 86. Don was an avid golfer. He and his wife, Florence, were members of IVCC in Waconia where he recorded a 'Hole in One' and played well into his 90s. He "shot his age" at 83. He and Florence enjoyed golf vacations in FL, AL and CA. On January 13th, 2019, Don was featured in a Boyd Huppert special on KARE 11, "Cribbage for the Ages", where he was the 105 year old "kid" who took on the 108 year old master, Harry Camp, in a cribbage tournament at Presbyterian Homes in North Oaks. Cribbage was a daily family activity throughout Don's life. Don lived in his own home until age 102, moved to assisted living at Summerwood in Chanhassen continuing to drive his own car until age 103. He moved to Sunrise of Minnetonka in late December 2019 where he passed away on Friday, June 12th at 4:12 pm surrounded by the supportive staff who loved to sing songs with him. The family wishes to thank the staff at Summerwood in Chanhassen for their 4 years of support to Don and to Sunrise of Minnetonka who provided a most caring environment for the last few months of his life. Funeral arrangements facilitated by HUBER Funeral Home of Excelsior. A private family memorial service held Friday, June 19th at Excelsior United Methodist Church. In lieu of flowers, the Carruth Family invite contributions to the Minnetonka School District, 5621 Hwy 101, Minnetonka 55345. Condolences and memories can be put online here at Star Tribune or at the Huber Funeral Home www.huberfunerals.com

Leonard, Rod Rod Leonard, a policy expert on food and nutrition, and agricultural issues who worked in the Kennedy, Johnson, and Carter administrations, died on June 13, 2020 in Winona, Minnesota. He was 90. As a staff member to U. S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) Secretary Orville Freeman in the 1960's, Rod helped develop policy and strategy to create and implement some of the most important federal anti-poverty and nutrition programs, including WIC, food stamps, and free and reduced-price school lunch programs. He also worked in the Carter White House as the Deputy Director of the President's Office of Consumer Affairs. Rod founded the Washington, D. C.-based Community Nutrition Institute in 1969 and retired as its executive director in 1998. Rod served on the board of Minneapolis-based Institute for Agriculture and Trade Policy from 1990 -2010. Rod was born on December 7, 1929, in Eureka, Kansas, to Brownie and Muriel (Barnard) Leonard. He graduated from Kansas State University and served as a U. S. Army corporal in some of the most dangerous combat zones in the Korean War from 1951-1953. While attending graduate school and working on the University of Minnesota Daily as an assistant editor, Rod met Betty Berg in 1954. Betty was the first woman outside of war times to be editor-in- chief of the Daily. Betty and Rod married in 1955. In 1958 Rod became Minnesota Governor Orville Freeman's press secretary and legislative troubleshooter. Rod and family followed Governor Freeman to Washington D.C. when Freeman became USDA Secretary in 1961. Rod and Betty retired to Betty's family's Mille Lacs County farm in 1998. Betty died in 2001. Rod is survived by his children Karin (Karl) Sonneman of Winona, Jane (Lori) Leonard of St. Paul, and John (Lucia) Leonard of Chicago, his Friedman, (Mary) "Marjorie" (Nee Peck) Passed away June 14, 2020 at age 98. Predeceased by husband Sy H. Friedman. Marj is survived by beloved children and step-children Michael (Lisa) Steinberg, Martha (Martin) Waibel, David (Joan Schumacher), Robert (Debb Cash) and Barbara Lee; cherished grandchildren Jeffrey (Chell) Waibel, Gabe Steinberg (Leah Karason), Adler Steinberg; great-grandchildren Joe & Jack Waibel, Cooper & Calvin Steinberg, devoted relatives and friends. Marj loved life, traveling the world, making friends of strangers. A lifelong learner and listener, Marj held Master's Degrees in Education and Counseling. Her guiding principles were truth, respect and compassion for the welfare of others. Marj taught for over 20 years in St. Louis Park. The secrets of her longevity, she said, were "Diet, exercise & attitude!" She was an avid supporter of musical theater, and will be missed by friends, young and old. Special thanks to Home Care Solutions for their sweet & tender care in Marj's final days, and gratitude for the Cherrywood Staff and valued new friends she made there. A devoted teacher in life and death, Marj requested her body be donated to the University of Minnesota Anatomy Bequest Program.

Anglim, Richard Thomas Age 91, of South Minneapolis, died June 13th, 2020. Richard served in state & local government his entire life, including work for Civil Defense, Ramsey and Hennepin Counties. Public service was central to Richard's outlook on life. He believed in an honest, fair, and responsible government, run by the people it served. Born in Duluth, his service-oriented life began in his teens when he earned his Eagle Scout badge. After earning a BA in Business Economics at the University of Minnesota, Richard served in the U.S. Army as a Technical Sgt. from 1952-1954. Afterward, he went on to earn an MA in Public Administration from the U of M, where he met his future wife, Mary Ann Pool. He was a long-time member of the American Legion and served as a Commander of Richfield Post 435 from 1998 to 1999. He was also a life-long member of the DFL and occasionally worked as a supporter of local and state representatives. Richard is preceded in death by his wife, Mary Ann Anglim; his daughter Nancy Anglim; parents, Edward T. and Agnes Anglim; and brother Edward Anglim. He is survived by sons Chris and John; daughter Kathy; grandchildren James, Amelia and Mary Katharine. A private ceremony will be held at Fort Snelling National Cemetery. and went on to pursue a Doctor of Education degree from University of Minnesota. He held a variety of teaching positions at high schools in Cambridge, Richfield, Roseville, and Spring Lake Park, MN, as well as in higher education at the University of Minnesota, Mankato State, Saint Cloud State, and the University of Wisconsin, Stout. He transitioned to full time engineering in, MN, to continue his work at Glasstite, Inc. with its line of pickup toppers and utility bodies. Alan was a prolific product developer and was well-known for inventing on napkins over coffee. Notable projects include go-karts, Shriner's helicopters, the Windjammer, SnoCoupes, various bathing systems, medical devices, farm equipment, and snowblowers. His creativity was rewarded with numerous U.S. patents. Regardless of the task, Alan always valued the company of those around him. Through the years, his associations with students, family, colleagues, church, and fellow hobbyists resulted in lifelong friendships. In later life, he particularly appreciated those that enabled him to continue his routines, including coffee, EAA hanger activities and lunch outings. In addition to his many friends, Alan enjoyed a large and loving family. He met his wife, Jane, while attending Stout, and they were married for 59 years. Together, they raised five children and became grandparents to many. Alan loved attending his children's events, and playing with his grandchildren, if they did not sit in his chair. The quality time he spent with each of his kids and grandkids and his pride in their accomplishments made them all feel special. The only time his family did not come first was during the EAA air show in Oshkosh. Extended family was also a source of pride and enjoyment for Alan. He treasured the opportunity to help loved ones with any project, and in turn enjoyed their assistance. Family gatherings provided a favorite social activity and visiting with family was important to Alan. Alan found faith at summer camp and continued the journey throughout his life. He was comforted by his faith in God and was looking forward to being reunited with Jane, other family, and many friends. A family service was held and a memorial service will follow at a later date. www.kozlakradulovich.com "A Celebration of Life" 763-783-1100

Pulson, Ruth Beatrice (Newland) Ruth Beatrice (Newland) Pulson, 103, of Coon Rapids, MN passed away on June 12, 2020. Ruth was born in Minneapolis, MN on Oct 14, 1916 to the late Mary and Fletcher Newland. She grew up in Minneapolis and at age 17 moved with her family to Nowthen, MN. She later worked for Chester, a small dairy farmer, and eventually married him. After Chester passed away she worked for West Bend Thermo-Serv in Anoka for several years before retiring and moving to California. She later moved to Maui, Hawaii and then to Arizona before returning to Coon Rapids to live with her sister Alice. Ruth was a hard working individual who loved music and painting. She was always active and enjoyed swimming at Twin Lakes in Nowthen. She loved her stationary bike and regularly exercised even well after her 100th birthday. Her music, laughter, and love of life will truly be missed. She didn't have children but was blessed with nieces and nephews that loved her as a mother. Jean Barth and Jerry Olson became close to her when she returned to Minnesota and cared for her during her final days. Ruth leaves behind many nieces and nephews. She was preceded in death by her parents and four sisters: Adelaide Horman, Mary Burdick, Dorothy Moore, and Alice Rootes. Her final resting place will be at Forest Hill Cemetery, 2520 Fairoak Ave, Anoka, MN 55303. In lieu of flowers the family asks that any donations to go to The Animal Humane Society. A private memorial service will be scheduled at a later date. Ruth's family would like to extend a special thanks to the staff at the Mary T Creekside Cottage and her hospice care givers. Ryerse, Marilyn Lela (McGandy) "And ever has it been known that love knows not its own depth until the hour of separation." It is with profound sadness that we announce the peaceful passing of our beloved wife, mother, grandmother and great- grandmother Marilyn Lela (McGandy) Ryerse, age 88, on June 12, 2020, at Abbott Northwestern Hospital in Minneapolis. Marilyn was a resident of Friendship Village and lived in Edina, Minnesota and Naples, Florida. Marilyn was born on July 10, 1931 at Northwestern Hospital in Minneapolis to Dr. Robert F. and Lela McGandy, and was raised in Edina, Minnesota, along with her brothers Dr. Robert B. McGandy and Douglas McGandy. She attended Wooddale School in Edina, and graduated from Northrop Collegiate School (now The Blake School) in 1949 where she was class president and a member of the drama, glee, world affairs, modern dance, awards, and public relations clubs. While attending the University of Minnesota, where she was a member of Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority, she met William (Bill) Carlisle Ryerse. They were married on September 21, 1951. Marilyn is survived by William (Bill), her devoted husband of 68 years; children Scott (Emily), Mary

Dow (Allen Gooch) and Malcolm (Mary); was the loving grandmother of Katherine (David) Aafedt, Meghan (Evan) Feige, Michael, Davis Gooch (Abby), Grant, Adam and Luke, and the proud great-grandmother of Michael (Fuzz), Reese, Mac and Elodie. She is pre-deceased by her parents and two brothers. Marilyn was the matriarch of her family and always made the family her top priority. She was highly sociable and had an incredible gift of making people, from dear friends to bare acquaintances, feel comfortable, as though they were the only ones in the room. She always had a kind word for everyone. She was known by all to be a lovely woman and friend to all who met her. She was a tremendous role model to her children as a person who treated everyone with warmth, respect, empathy, class and humor and who had a deep understanding of the right way to treat others. In short, she was the glue that held us all together. Her favorite time was holding and cuddling each of her grandchildren and great-grandchildren as babies. She never missed a birthday and was a mentor to all her offspring, instilling in them her strong values. She was quick with a smile and an acknowledgment to everyone with whom she had contact. Marilyn had wide-ranging interests to which she devoted much time and energy. She was a camp counselor as a teen at Camp Hilloway and in Big Timber, Montana, and recalled her time there fondly. She served both as President of the Alumnae Association and a trustee of Northrup Collegiate School (now Blake) and volunteered for Abbott Northwestern Hospital Auxiliary. She was a fan and supporter of classical music including the Minnesota Orchestra. She loved parties, was fond of telephoning her friends to check on them, and relished opportunities to get together with the those in her social network. She was an avid gardener and voracious reader. She loved orchids, bunnies, manatees and the color blue. She adored yellow labradors, especially her long-time companion Chamois (she actually had 4, all named Chamois). She was a phenomenal cook, a hostess extraordinaire, a master at making lobster bisque, and loved to pass along her recipes to friends and family. Marilyn had a particular soft spot for strawberries and chocolate, all the better when served together. And despite appearances, she suffered for years with the agony of a bad back, and no one could ever tell how much pain she endured. We are grateful that she is now pain free. A family-only memorial service will be held per her wishes at St. Alban's Episcopal Church in Edina. Memoriams may be directed to Marilyn's favorite organizations including: The Blake School, Abbott Northwestern Hospital Foundation, and St. Alban's Episcopal Church. It has been said that people may forget what you said and forget what you did, but they will never forget how you made them feel. There will be no end to missing her. The family would like to thank the doctors and nurses on station 3100 East at Abbott Northwestern Hospital for their truly compassionate care. www.Washburn-McReavy.com Edina Chapel 952-920-3996 West 50th St. & Hwy 100

Findorff, Robert L. 91, of Tampa, FL passed away on June 7, 2020. He was preceded in death by his wife of 55 years, Jocelyn, and sons Robert and Paul. Survived by daughters Jean Findorff, Laura (Doug) Norberg, and Mary (Alan Peterson) Findorff, and sons Karl (Cindy) Findorff and John (Nancy) Findorff. Also survived by 11 grandchildren, 5 great-grandchildren, plus 2 step-grandchildren and 3 step-great grandchildren. He is also survived by his well-loved scoundrel of a cat, Sunshine. Bob was born in Northeast Minneapolis to Hugo and Elfriede Findorff. He graduated from Edison High School and went into the army for the GI benefits. After the army, he earned a Bachelor of Business Administration from the University of Minnesota, a Master of Business Administration from the University of Minnesota, and a Juris Doctor magna cum laude from William Mitchell College of Law. He also served in the Air Force Reserves as an officer. Bob and Jocelyn married in 1953 and raised 7 children in Chicago, IL, Bloomington, MN, Cresco, IA, and Edina, MN. He worked for Donaldson Company, Inc. for 36 years, retiring in 1994 as senior vice president. Upon retirement, he and Jocelyn relocated to Tampa, FL where they spent many years traveling the world, making new friends, and engaging in lifelong learning. Bob was involved in mentorship through SCORE in Florida. He was also a strong supporter of college education and athletics, establishing scholarships at the University of Minnesota, St. Catherine University and Central Lakes College and vociferously cheering for many hapless sports teams in both Minnesota and Florida. He was curious and always wanted to learn more about history so he took many classes through OLLI of the University of South Florida, primarily focusing on the Civil War. He eventually learned so much that he began teaching courses himself. The family would like to extend our deep gratitude to Bob's sister-in-law, Lynn Roth and her husband, John for watching over Bob these past many years. Their genuine caring gave us peace while we lived far away. We also want to thank the caring staff at Arbor Terrace, Citrus Park, FL for the patience and kindness they extended towards Bob over the last eight months. We also want to thank his many doctors, especially Dr. Bymaster and Dr. Wong. Due to COVID-19, a private funeral will be held on Tuesday, June 23, 2020 at St. Patrick's Church of Edina. Private interment following at St. Mary's cemetery in Minneapolis. Beth (Scott Alpaugh), Paul (Karen Kooda), Martha (Dan Conners), Rob (Ann), Amy (Tony Baregi), and Sara (John Ince) (daughter-in-law), her cherished and well-loved grandchildren, Eric and Angie (Andie Mazorol) Andersen, Rachael Smith, Jeff (Tami) Alpaugh, Megan (Sam Beuch), and Zach Alpaugh, Nathan, Katie, Jeremy, Michael, Emily, and Maggie Conners, Bridget, Molly (Nathan Bittner), Tom (Catherine), and Will Andersen, Tony (Terese), Willy (Lauren) and Annie Baregi, and her treasured great-grandchildren, Ginnifer, Peyton, Elliot, baby-to-be Baregi and baby-to-be Beuch. Also survived by her brother Dale (Kathy) Hennessy, and many nieces, nephews and faithful friends. Born to William "Harry" and Edna Hennessy in Minot, ND on March 17, 1932 (Is there a better reason to celebrate St. Patrick's Day?) they moved to Minneapolis in 1941. Lois graduated from Roosevelt HS, attended the College of St. Catherine's and went on to work at Donaldson Dept Store where she not only was the Junior Dress buyer, but more importantly, met the love of her life, Bill. After years at home raising her children (and volunteering on numerous school, church and Archdiocesan committees), she found a second career as a Children's Librarian in Hennepin County. She was passionate about spreading her love of reading to little ones, and devoted many hours to helping improve the literacy of those in the community. While she enjoyed and excelled in her careers, her most treasured vocation was being a mom, grandma, and great-grandma. The consummate host, nothing pleased her more than being able to set a beautiful table and cook a delicious meal for her family and friends. She relished this time spent with family and friends, and any birthday, Feast Day or life event was cause for a party in her book. To honor Lois, we invite you to bake a pan of bars, invite friends over and read a book to a child. Memorials preferred to Assumption Catholic Church or Blessed Trinity Catholic School for their Library Fund. Due to CoVid limitations, a family only Mass of Christian Burial will be at 11am on Monday, June 29, 2020 at Assumption Catholic Church 305 E 77th St., Richfield, MN with burial to immediately follow. The mass will be live-streamed Monday morning. Directions to the live stream and a worship aid for the mass can be found on the Morris Nilsen website. A Celebration of Life will be planned for a later date. The family would like to thank Brighton Hospice for helping us navigate mom's final days, as well as extend a very special thank you to Dr. Maas and his staff at Bluestone Physicians and the staff at The Commons on Marice, especially mom's very favorite aide, Shewaye, for the love, care and dignity they gave to her these last five years. Kraft, Fred Richard passed away peacefully at Aurora Transitional Care in Edina on June 15, 2020. He had phone conversations with his children in the last hours of his life, and his death was quick and decisive, and without preamble or drama. That was Fred's way of doing things. Fred was born in Austin, Minnesota on March 21, 1930 to 100% Czech parents, Anna and Louis Kraft. Anna was a homemaker and Louis worked at the Hormel meatpacking plant. Fred had two younger sisters, Helen and Mary. They lived in a modest 1 01/2 story house; Fred's bedroom was in the uninsulated attic and he would wake up with frost on his face some winter mornings. Fred attended Sumner Elementary School and graduated from Austin High School in 1948. Money was tight, and at one time, Fred held four jobs while attending school: setting pins at a bowling alley, delivering newspapers, cleaning at a bakery, and working at an arcade. Fred remembered his dad driving up to the Cities and dropping him off at the State Fair with just a nickel. Fred earned a law degree from the University of Minnesota. He met Donna Cole while at the university and they were married on September 8, 1951. After graduation, Fred and Donna moved to back to Austin where they raised their four children. Fred was a devoted husband, father, and provider. The family attended Westminster Presbyterian Church where Fred was an usher and Elder. Fred was an attorney in Austin for over 35 years. During that time, he was Austin Municipal Judge and Mower County Attorney. Fred and Donna moved back to the Twin Cities in 1987, and Fred worked as a title examiner for Edina Realty until his retirement. They took full advantage of the city, walking regularly around the lakes, attending concerts at Orchestra Hall, and trying out the latest restaurants. Fred and Donna, along with their growing extended family, took annual vacations to Hilton Head Island and to the North Shore (staying near the resort where they honeymooned). They travelled internationally extensively, and treated their four children and spouses to a Mediterranean cruise in celebration of their 50th wedding anniversary. Large holiday celebrations were hosted in their home until they were well into retirement. Their devotion to family created a strong extended-family foundation and bond for their children and grandchildren. Fred and Donna were members of Christ Presbyterian Church in Edina. Fred's beloved wife Donna died in July 2017. Fred missed her terribly, but remained active and engaged in his home and church communities. He retained a sharp and active mind, and read the Star Tribune, Wall Street Journal, and New Yorker magazine (covering the full political spectrum) religiously. He enjoyed sharing his thoughts and opinions on all topics. He had a remarkable memory for everything from sports statistics to details of family trips (his memories of family travels were often food-focused), to each grandchild's birthday. Fred was known both for his thrift and for his extravagance (at one time the family had two Cadillacs) and generosity. He (and Donna) regularly made the grandchildren's holiday wishes come true. Fred was preceded in death by his wife of 66 years Donna (Cole) Kraft, parents Louis and Anna (Mudra) Kraft, and his sisters Helen Bogenschutz and Mary Reiersgaard. He is survived by his children John Kraft (Rachel Madden), Kathryn Burger, Rebecca Kraft (Marc Soderbloom), Daniel Kraft (Michelle); 11 grandchildren and 1 great grandchild. There will be a private family service. Memorials are welcome to People for Parks Minneapolis or Alzheimer's Association Minnesota-North Dakota.

Sitka, William (Wasy) & Darlene (nee Savchuk) William Sitka 02/12/1923 - 05/24/2020 See his obituary from 05/31/2020. Darlene Sitka Age 92, of West St. Paul on 06/16/2020, 27 days after her 70th Wedding Anniversary and 23 days after the death of her husband. Eternally together! Both died from Covid-19. She had a great life! They had a special life together! Survived by loving son: Gregory (Lili) and adoring granddaughter: Alexandra. Also survived by several cousins. She was born to Ukrainian parents and raised in St. Paul. She graduated from Wilson High School in 1945, went to business college and worked as a secretary. She met her husband at a church dinner and they were married in 1950. She embraced her role as a homemaker and she sure knew how to set a table! She lived for her family and was a member of the Ukrainian Orthodox Church. We wish to thank Southview Acres Health Care Center for their compassionate care. As they loved being together, a double funeral will be held. In light of the current Covid-19 circumstances, a graveside service will be held at Hillside Cemetery on June 23rd, 2020 at 11 AM. Memorials may be directed to St. Michael's and St. George's Ukrainian Orthodox Church. Vichnaya Pamyat! Memory Eternal! www.kozlakradulovich.com "A Celebration of Life" 612-789-8869

Blyth, T. Peter A beautiful life has ended. Peter died of congestive heart failure on June 10th. Those in his orbit will miss his delicious English sense of humor, his compassionate soul, his inquisitive mind. He was a cherished husband, father, brother, brother-in-law and uncle. He was a devoted friend. Peter was born in August 1941 in Gravesend, England. He grew up on the Channel Island of Jersey where he graduated from Victoria College. He completed a five-year apprenticeship program training as a chef. He began his exciting and rewarding hotel career in 1963 at the new London Hilton. It was Hilton that brought Peter to the United States in 1965. He was with Westin Hotels for 19 years serving as a general manager, the Director of Food and Beverage Worldwide and a development officer. He ended his career with Radisson Hotels and Resorts as Executive Vice President, Business Development Worldwide. He spoke English, French and Norwegian. His friendships circled the globe. In retirement he became an accomplished Japanese sumi-e painter. He planned long summer bike rides with friends on Minnesota's remarkable bike trail system. He recently joined a CBS men's bible study group which brought him endless joy. Peter is survived by his wife of 50 years, Linda; their children, Libby and Philip; sister, Trish Bloxham and her husband, David; his brother, Michael and his wife, Sylvia; brother-in-law, Bill Shoemaker and his wife, Annie Gehan; sister-in-law, Annie Moore and her husband, Floyd; a niece and five nephews. He was predeceased by his parents, Tom and Tru Blyth, and his nephew, Benjamin Blyth. He will be inurned in the Memorial Garden at House of Hope Presbyterian Church in St. Paul. Due to the restrictions of Covid-19, a memorial service for family and invited guests will take place at a later date. Peter supported programs that cared for children in impoverished countries. Memorials preferred to Buildabetterbenin.org which provides a home and schooling for abandoned children in Benin, Africa. Anderson Funeral Home (651)776-2761 www.andersonfuneralhome.com

Nelson, Dr. Robert T. passed away on June 3, 2020. Dr. Nelson was born on September 23, 1938, in Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, to Dr. Robert and Blanche Nelson. Dr. Nelson was an avid swimmer and was Captain of the swim team at Central High School in Minneapolis. He received his degree in dentistry at the University of Minnesota, and was inspired to study dentistry and serve in the military by his father, Major Robert V. Nelson, who was a dentist in the U.S. Army, and died as a Prisoner of War in World War II. Dr. Nelson worked for many years at his own successful dental practice in Edina. He was a life-long resident of Minnesota, except for two years practicing dentistry for the U.S. Army in Germany. He loved nature, every SAAB ever made, and in his younger years, riding his motorcycle in the Black Hills of South Dakota. He also loved going to car shows and even showed an Opel which he purchased from a junk yard in California and helped restore it. In 2010, Dr. Nelson survived a major stroke, and as a testament to his determination to recover, was able to overcome the paralysis caused by the stroke, and even regained his driver's license. He is survived by his wife of 30 years, Karen, sisters Carol Tiernan and Marge (Dick) Kellor, children Cynthia, Greg (Dayna), and Julie, five grandchildren, and three nieces. Interment will be at the Fort Snelling National Cemetery at a future date, as will a celebration of his life. Matsuura, Minnie Age 97 peacefully departed our earthly company on May 17, 2020. Preceded in death by parents, Goro and Hichimi Matsuura and by brothers Arthur (Fumi) and Herb (Shigeko) and niece Rhonda Matsuura. Survived by brothers Yoshimi (Kazuko-deceased) and Taro (Masa) Matsuura and sister Jane Hayano (George-deceased), and many nieces and nephews and relatives in Japan. Born in Fowler Ca., she attended Fresno State College before relocating to Minnesota. She was employed by the University of Minnesota Press until retiring in 1987. Her love of travel kept her busy visiting many countries but when home, tireless volunteer work and the Minnesota Orchestra were her other joys. However, she was most passionate about all U of M sports, especially Gopher Hockey, a season ticket holder since 1962! She always fondly referred to the players as "Her Boys". We will miss her gentle, caring and gracious nature and in honoring her wish, a private celebration of her life will be held with family.

Bengston, Julia Anna (Fylling) nee Kowalczyk age 94, peacefully passed away in June, 2020, from Alzheimer's disease in Payson, AZ. Born in Minneapolis, MN to Joseph and Anna Kowalczyk. Julie married Arthur Fylling and they had four children. Art died in 1965. Julie was employed at Sperry Univac/Honeywell for over 30 years in MN, NM and AZ. In 1969, Julie was united in marriage to Dale Bengston of Apple Valley, MN and gained five stepchildren whom she loved as her own. Julie and Dale spent many years in AZ and were charter residents of Escapees/North Ranch in Congress, AZ. Together they visited over 20 states in their RV, seeing relatives, panning gold, fishing, playing cards, and games.

Brickley, Michael Earl Age 55, strolled through the gates of glory in the early morning of June 15th. He passed away peacefully the day after his sister, Mary's birthday who greeted him at the door while scolding him for being late (as he usually was). He held his arms open to hold his beautiful daughter, Meghan and embrace his parents, Pat and Carol, as well as his in-laws, Ray & Muriel, and sister in-law, Kay, all whom preceded him in death. What a glorious reunion it must have been. Mike grew up on the shores of Lake Minnetonka and Long Lake boating, fishing and enjoying all things that had to do with the water. He loved playing hockey, loud music, good beer, hunting, the great outdoors, and the company of good friends as long as they were willing to listen. The man could talk. Known for his sense of humor, Mike had a heart of gold accompanied by a smile and quick wit that made him loved by many. Nothing mattered more to Mike than his wife and his girls. In his short battle with cancer he proved that, by sheer will alone, holding on until he came home to be with them. He passed the next morning knowing he was surrounded by the love of all of his girls. He came home, to go home. Survived by his High School Sweetheart Diane; Daughters Margaret (Derek Olson), Melissa, Michelle (Tim) Larson, Meredith (Tom Dombeck), and Beloved Grandsons, Sawyer Larson and Dale Dombeck; Brother, Pat (Dianne) Brickley, Sisters, Kathy (Harold) Katz, Beth (Jon Vukelich) Allen, Jen (Jason) Revels and Brother In-law, Scott Schneider; as well as many other family members and dear friends. Celebration of Life Visitation will be held at David Lee Funeral Home, 1220 Wayzata Blvd E in Wayzata on Tuesday, June 23rd 4-8pm (3-4pm for at risk individuals) social distancing will be practiced. Thom, Gene An angel earned his wings and the world gained a legend. Gene Leo Thom, the man, the myth, the legend, passed away on June 16, 2020 at the age of 84, while holding the hand of Pat, his wife of 62 years. Gene was born August 28, 1935 in Hinckley, MN to Ed and Florence (Brown) Thom, who preceded him in death, along with granddaughter Ava Standal, his sister Helen Olson, brothers Manley, Don, Verne and Gerry, and in-laws Gregory and Gert Sullivan. Gene was dad to many and friend to many more. He made a big impression on every person he met. His sense of humor, his ability to tell jokes and stories, and his love of mischief endeared him to many. Gene graduated from Pine City High School and moved to "The Cities," residing in Blaine for 40 years. On May 10, 1958, Gene married his beloved wife, Patricia Ann Sullivan, at the Church of St. Agnes in St. Paul, MN. Gene was a delivery driver for Burgess Beckwith/Burgess Publishing and the Wallace Carlson Company. No one worked harder than Gene, and no one knew better how to have a good time when the work was done. He kept up with all of his kids and their friends, neighbors, friends, and his large extended family. Gene enjoyed visiting with anyone and everyone. He looked forward to being able to return to Pine City and Hinckley to visit friends and family, to camp on "The Land" or to deer hunt no deer were hurt by Gene on those ventures! We will miss his sense of humor, his quick wit and one-liners, his soft side for kids and animals, and his presence that can never be matched. Gene didn't have money, but he had faith and family, so he was one of the richest men in the world. Gene and Pat raised 14 children. He is survived by all of them: Debbie Stevens (Scott), Anne (Randy King), Jeanine Grimmer (Ray), Bob (Vanetta), Lori Hanowski (Dan), Gerald (Sharon), Michelle, James, Janet Smith (Paul), Jody, Joseph (Sarah), David (Emily), Brenda (Gabe Schlake), Theresa Egan (Robb). Gene is survived by 30 grandchildren: Cecilia Stevens, Bethany Esse, Catherine Ramnarain, Danny Grimmer, Alison McSweeney, Cara Grimmer, Drew Grimmer, Andrew Thom, Kyle Thom, Jenna Thom, Samantha Hanowski, Collin Hanowski, Alexa Hanowski, Christian Hanowski, Gretchen Thom, Isobel McCafferty, Anna Smith de Yoma, Maddie Smith, Emily Smith, Jack Standal, Phoebe Standal, Hunter Thom, Tanner Thom, Hayden Thom, Rowan Thom, Griffin Thom, Harper Thom, Courtney Blake, Morgan Blake and Cooper McCalister. Also six great-grandchildren: Landon Thom, Anthony, Gabriel and Mileena Ramnarain, Nora McSweeney and Gavin Grimmer. Gene is also survived by his sister, Carol King, many dear nieces, nephews and friends, and Bob and Pat Miller and family of Hastings. Gene's legacy is his family and he was proud of every kid, grandkid and great-grandkid he had. Due to COVID-19, a Mass of Christian burial will take place on June 22 with immediate family only in attendance. A larger celebration of Gene's life and legacy will be held at a later date. Gene's family would like to thank the Allina Hospice team, especially Kathy Krekelberg, Julie Werner and Sandy McCracken-Rootes for Miller, Ward Tegland was born December 29, 1941 in Bemidji Minnesota, son of Wesley & Sadie Miller. Ward has two older sisters, Margaret Miller Andrus and Dottie Miller Rietow who grew up near and loved Lake Harriet. Ward graduated from Minnehaha Academy in 1960, served in the army from 1961-1964, spent a year in South Korea, and cherished his army experiences. He met Bernice Best at Hennepin Avenue UMC, were married on September 2, 1967 in Morgan, Minnesota, and in 1969 moved to Richfield where they raised their two sons, Brian and Bradley. Ward's days were filled with truck driving, family, and church activities. Ward and Bernie have many wonderful memories with their two sons, daughter-in-law, and grandchildren. Ward had great faith and loved his family and friends. In 2008 he was diagnosed with Dementia, survived colon cancer in 2016, and moved to Maple Grove Arbor Lakes Senior Living in early 2017. Ward is survived by his wife Bernice, his sons; Brian of Eagan, Bradley and his wife Elissa of Maple Grove, their four grandchildren and his two older sisters Margaret and Dottie. He is truly missed. A memorial service will be planned for the future and any memorials should be sent to The Dementia Society of Minnesota.

Urbanski, Peter Age 75, of Maplewood, MN passed away in the presence of his loving wife Michelle on the early morning of June 8, 2020. Preceded in death by parents George and Sabina Urbanski and sisters Joyce (Cardelli) and Mary Jo (Grebe). Survived by his wife of 52 years Michelle (Cunningham); grateful and loving sons Shawn (Rhonda), Jason (Jennifer), Andrew (Nicole), and Seth; grandchildren Colin, Jodie, Allie, Audrey, Abram, Noah, Jakob and Julia; older brothers Roger (Donna) and Thomas (Joann), and younger sister Susan (Ed) Franzmeier. Born and raised on St. Paul's East Side, Peter attended St. Casmir's Catholic School and graduated from Johnson HS in '63. He studied at the University of Minnesota and received his BA degree from Metropolitan State University. Peter enjoyed a three-decades long career at Medtronic. He received a patent related to manufacture of medical devices, served on the board of directors on the Society of Plastic Engineers Medical Plastics Division, worked with the International Standards Organization in the development of standards for biocompatibility testing. Peter, with the assistance of brothers and brother-in laws, labored many hours to build homes for his family. This drive to provide and his embrace of hard work led Peter to a 10-year involvement with Habitat for Humanity. His interest in trains led him into years of volunteering at a local model railroad museum. Family was always very important to Peter. Always present for his sons, he coached hockey mites through midgets; led canoeing, fishing, camping, and skiing expeditions. He rode shotgun in moving trucks with his sons as they wandered the States wherever their work took them always lending a hand and priceless wisdom to turn houses into homes for their families. The family would like to express their appreciation for the loving care and concern by the staff at Woodbury Estates Senior Living. Deuel, Floyd P. age 84 of Roseville, Minn., passed away at Cherrywood Pointe Roseville with family by his side on June 16. He was preceded in death by his wife Faye and parents Percy and Florence. Floyd is survived by his son Greg (Lyn) of Vadnais Heights; daughter Pam of New York; son Dan (Jill) of Shoreview; grandchildren Gretchen and Brian Deuel, Katie Todd, Jolie and Heidi Deuel; siblings Elaine Freichels; LaDonna Olson; Marian (John) Grow; Helen Sanborn; Marlys Santema; Don (Anita); Rick (Ann); Darla Butler; sisters and brothers in law Iona Heath; Clarice Nitti; Elton Heath; Arthur Dahle; Pinky (Ron) Pendergrass; Carol (Ken) Carling; Jim Spillet and many beloved cousins, nieces and nephews. Floyd was born in 1935 in Greenbush Township, Minn., and grew up on a farm in Foreston. He graduated from Milaca high school in 1953 and served in the National Guard. Floyd started his own masonry business in the 1960s. He took great pride in his work, never cutting corners and earning glowing referrals from many satisfied customers. His craftsmanship and that of his treasured employees can be seen in homes throughout the Twin Cities. Floyd married Faye Heath, the love of his life, in 1957 and they were married until her passing in 2015. As a young couple, they made their home in Roseville where they raised their three children and were active in the community. Floyd was a member of Roseville Lutheran Church for over 40 years where he enjoyed ushering and socializing. He loved sports and volunteered as a coach for his sons' teams, sponsored many local youth teams, and enjoyed playing for Advent Lutheran's and Murphy's softball teams. He was a fixture at his children's, grandchildren's and niece's/nephew's games, where he was quick to make friends and strike up a conversation. His devotion to the Twins, Vikings, North Stars and Wild endured a lifetime of wins and losses. Floyd's greatest joys came in spending time with family - including his very large extended family. From fishing and golfing (1991 hole in one!) to cribbage games and big holiday gatherings, Floyd reveled in the laughter and stories of those he loved most. We are grateful for his loving presence in our lives and will miss him dearly. In the interest of health and safety, a private family burial is planned. As we cannot meet to share stories, Floyd's family greatly appreciates remembrances. Condolences: Rosevillememorialchapel.com Memorial contributions suggested to Como Park Zoo or National Audubon Society to honor Floyd's love of animals, especially his backyard bird friends. two children, Christopher (Gina) and Lauren, daughters from a former marriage, Tonna and Andrea (Bryan), and grandchildren JT and Grace. Also survived by brother Richard (Linda), sister Susan, and nephews David, Jon, Joel, and Michael, and nieces Amy, Jennifer, and Melissa. Bob graduated from the University of Minnesota, Twin Cities Campus, with a degree in Forestry Management following his service as Sergeant in the US Army during the Vietnam War (32nd AADCOM). While he did not pursue his love for forestry professionally, he did enjoy his career in the hospitality industry for many years. He was an avid outdoorsman and loved camping, hiking, downhill skiing, fishing in Canada, and canoe trips within the Boundary Waters. But what he enjoyed most of all was spending time with his family in the city of lakes, at the cabin, and beyond. Bob was known for his kindness, his listening ear, and his ability to bring out the best in everyone he knew. He was an incredibly supportive husband, dad, and friend. He was light hearted and always brought a smile to your face. We will forever look up to him, and keep him close in our hearts as a source of strength and love. Bob's pride and joy was his family and he was our hero. Memorial service and a celebration of Bob's life will be scheduled later this summer. Hansen, Gary Lawrence Died on June 5, 2020 of complications from Alzheimer's and COVID-19. He was 80 years old. Gary was born in Drayton, ND on January 7, 1940 to Bernice (Hammerback) and Lawrence Hansen. They preceded him in death along with his brother, Wayne (Jill), sister, Sandra (Tom) Wilkinson, and stepmother, Amy. He is survived by his wife, Mary Ann (Muggli) Hansen of Minneapolis, MN; children Erik (Lisa) Hansen and grandchildren Courtney and Gabrielle Hansen of Big Lake, MN; Richard (Kristie) Hansen and grandchildren Magnus and Draggon Hansen of San Francisco, CA; Anne-Marie Fischer and grandchildren Hawkon and Holiday Fischer of Minneapolis, MN; Nils (Molly) Hansen and grandchildren Hazel and Audon Hansen of Minneapolis, MN; Catherine Hansen, of Minneapolis, MN; and brother Lawrence (Kym) Hansen of Weott, CA; and many nieces and nephews, friends and relatives. Gary graduated in 1958 from high school in Two Harbors, Minnesota. After high school he entered the U.S. Army for three years, two of them spent in Germany where he flew sail planes. After his service, he lived in Silver Bay, Minnesota working at Reserve Mining Company. In 1963, he began college at St. Cloud State University where he met Mary Ann Muggli. He became an art teacher for 33 years in the St. Cloud School District, #742 in St. Cloud, Minnesota where they made their home for almost 50 years. He loved teaching and producing art, and other creative pursuits which was also passed on to all his children and grandchildren. He drew caricatures at the Holiday Inn, graduations, and various celebrations for many years; and went to art shows where he won prizes for his watercolor paintings. He also worked at Powder Ridge ski area in Kimball, Minnesota for 47 years in many capacities. He was a ski instructor, designed and painted signs, and designed and created Powder Ridge's logo. One summer he helped build up the hill 50 feet higher. In winter he made a glider plane and flew it down the hill. He made many lasting friends working at Powder Ridge (who affectionately called him "Fossil"), and he taught his whole family how to ski. He had many, many interests. He loved Lake Superior where he sailed, fished, and hunted. He enjoyed golf, playing the guitar, and was a loving caregiver for the family's many cats, and they liked to visit him in his art studio in the basement. Above all, he was an incredible artist, able to draw and paint any subject. Mary Ann and Gary were big fans of the Minnesota Twins. They enjoyed going to movies and plays, playing Scrabble, going for rides, attending activities of their children and grandchildren, and observing nature. Gary loved their backyard in St. Cloud where he could watch the birds on the birdfeeders in his private paradise. We will miss him terribly, but he now has peace. We wish to thank the staff at Abbot Northwestern Hospital for the kind and thoughtful care of Gary during his last days. A service and celebration will take place at a future date. Donations can be given to the Paramount Center for the Arts in St. Cloud, Minnesota.

Gaillard, Charles Warren Age 79, of Naples, FL, died Sunday, June 14, 2020. He was born November 5, 1940 in Louisville, KY. Charlie lived a full and accomplished life. After graduating from Atherton High School in Louisville KY in 1958, Charlie attended Dartmouth College, graduating in 1962. He met his future wife, Jane Vanderweil of Cohasset MA, in the Hofbrauhaus in Munich while stationed in Germany as a ROTC tank platoon leader with the Army. The two married on June 24, 1967. Upon returning to the U.S., Charlie earned his MBA from Harvard Business School in 1966 and began his business career with an entry level position in marketing at General Mills in Minneapolis. He held roles of increasing responsibility within the Big G cereal and other divisions until his retirement as President of General Mills more than three decades later. Prior to his retirement, in a defining moment of his life and his career, Charlie was named chief executive of a new joint venture between General Mills and Nestle called Cereal Partners Worldwide (CPW) in 1990. He started CPW with 14 employees and grew it to $1B revenue in less than four years. Charlie and Jane lived in Switzerland during those years and spent many fond weekends traveling Europe together and with family and friends. Charlie had many personal interests and talents. As a lifelong lover of music, Charlie enjoyed playing guitar, singing, and sharing his music with his friends and family. From a raft on the Ohio river, to a 50's rock & roll band at Dartmouth, to many gatherings of friends throughout his life, Charlie's love of music was often a focal point and highlight of time with others. Charlie could often be found playing his music on a sailboat. He learned to sail on Lake Minnetonka MN with Jane in their first years of marriage and as with many things in his life, Charlie progressed rapidly. From small sailboats on Lake Minnetonka he soon led dozens of overnight sailing trips on Lake Superior and the Virgin Islands with family and friends. He ultimately owned his own 46' sailboat "Rocinante" in retirement, which brought many adventuresome and fond sailing memories for Jane and him. Once he retired from sailing, Charlie found a new passion as a part-time cowboy while living in Santa Fe and went from signing on a sailboat to singing by a campfire. This part of the country was perfect for Charlie's love of reading and history. He was constantly learning about local history wherever he, friends and family traveled. With his great memory, he loved to share stories and historical trivia wherever the family found itself. After a short battle with pancreatic cancer, Charlie died at home "in paradise" in Naples FL. He is survived by his wife Jane; son Andrew Blackman Gaillard, daughter-in-law Megan, and their three sons Jack, Henry, and William; son Charles Bradford ("Rusty") Gaillard, his partner Alexandra, and son Teddy; and sister Judith Gaillard Jones and brother-in-law Steavan. He was preceded in death by his parents, Warren Keller Gaillard & Josephine Blackman Gaillard. Memorials may be given to Habitat for Humanity of Collier County in Charlie's name. The family is planning a memorial service for Charlie on November 7 in Naples FL.

Brindley, Judith Isabel Anderson October 19, 1942 - June 11, 2020 Our dearly loved Judy, a true Minnesotan, passed away peacefully surrounded by her family on June 11, 2020 at the age of 77. She was a loving, compassionate, brilliant, intuitive, strong, resilient, and fun person. She shared her passions for language, literature, history, music, the arts, and community with everyone she met. She traveled to many of America's beautiful National Parks, but always had a special place in her heart for Minnesota's seasons, woods, and wildlife. Judy attended Our Lady of Grace Catholic School and graduated in 1960 from Academy of Holy Angels as valedictorian. She received her B.A. in French from Rosary College (now Dominican University) in 1964, and her M.A. in French/Education from Johns Hopkins University in 1965. A life-long teacher, Judy taught high school French and Spanish at Osseo Senior High and St. Louis Park High School, among others. Later in her career, she enjoyed more than a decade at Sylvan Learning Center where she worked to empower struggling students, many from disadvantaged communities. One of her most rewarding experiences was being part of Sylvan in the Schools at Four Winds Elementary School in the Phillips neighborhood of Minneapolis. An athlete and avid sports fan, Judy loved watching football and tennis, sailing on Gull Lake and Lake Minnetonka, and was a local water-skiing legend. She was the first woman to master the water ski jump on Gull Lake, and could do a dock start into her fifties. Many hours were spent correcting her students' papers in front of football games and tennis matches. A huge Roger Federer fan, she was known to record and rewatch Wimbledon championshipsher own version of ESPN Classic. She played basketball in high school when women were only allowed a half court and was ecstatic to support her daughter Chris's basketball career on the full court years later. She was always a strong supporter of her family's sports interests. Music and the arts were critically important to Judy. As a teacher and a parent, she incorporated these passions into her instruction, knowing that they support development and provide solace and joy. She and Eric frequently attended performances of the Minnesota Opera, the SPCO, and the Minnesota Orchestra. Judy was also an historian. Carrying on her father's legacy, she was on the board of the associates of the James Ford Bell Library at the University of Minnesota, supporting the collection of rare books, maps and manuscripts. She was inspired by the writings and lives of Abraham Lincoln and Thomas Jefferson, and fostered that interest in her children and grandchildren. And she was known as the family historian, often telling stories of growing up in Minnesota in an oral tradition that rivaled The Prairie Home Companion in entertainment value and warmed the hearts of everyone within earshot. She was preceded in death by her parents, Thomas Richard Anderson, Sr. and LaJean Anderson. She is survived by her husband of 29 years, Eric; daughters Kate Fennema, Betsy Fennema Bance (Dave), Chris Fennema Notestine (Randy); grandchildren Tim Notestine and Anna Bance; her siblings Jim Anderson (Ginger), Sally Dahlquist (Eric), Jean Lavelle (John), and Tom Anderson, Jr. (Chris); and so many other family and friends. We will hold a Celebration of Life in the future when our world will be safer for travel and hugs, so that we can have the big party she would love and share our stories and love for her. She will be there in spirit. Please send your contact information to e.brindley@mchsi.com if you would like to be informed of future plans. Her love lives on through us. Enjoy the moments and love each other. In her memory, we ask that you consider donations to any of these places that would mean so much to her. Strand, Jens 01/09/1946 ~ 06/15/2020 Jens Alvin Strand, 74, passed away peacefully from complications of Multiple System Atrophy (MSA), a Parkinsonian disorder, at home in Coralville, IA on Monday, June 15, 2020. Jens was born January 9, 1946 in Portland, ND, the son of Robert and Opal Strand. He married Rosalinda "Rose" Masticola in 1969. He graduated from Portland High School and the University of North Dakota with a stint in the US Army interrupting his college years. During that time he and Rose courted and married at Fort Bliss in El Paso, TX. In the spring of 1975 he became both a father and a doctor, graduating from Washington University School of Medicine. Following this, Jens returned to Mayville, ND to serve his hometown as a general practitioner for a year. He completed his medical residency while reentering the US Army, eventually achieving the rank of Major. Jens completed his General Surgery residency at Tripler Army Medical Center of Honolulu, HI in 1981. His career as an Army surgeon took his young family around the globe and allowed them to experience much of Europe and the Pacific Northwest in the 1980s. During this time he also completed fellowship training in Colorectal Surgery, a newer subspecialty for which he was a strong early advocate. Jens loved serving in the Army and frequently expressed a deep gratitude to the service for making so many significant parts of his life possible. In 1987 a yearning for the upper Midwest led Jens and Rose to become civilians and he entered private practice with Multicare Associates at Unity Hospital in Fridley, MN. Remarkably dedicated to his patients, Jens spent the next 28 years serving that community as a surgeon with inspired enthusiasm and razor sharp clinical acumen. The onset of MSA's physical symptoms drove him to voluntary early retirement in 2015. He left behind a monumental contribution to that community's surgical outcomes spanning decades. Since that time he and Rose lived in Iowa City, minutes from the grandchildren he thoroughly enjoyed during his final years. Away from the hospital, Jens was a loving, devoted family man and an avid sports fan. His personal pastimes included a deep love of golf and skiing in Snowmass, CO. The first time he skied with his grandchildren he considered it the successful completion of a 30 year passion project begun in Berchtesgaden Germany, 1981. He was a longtime Vikings season ticket holder and considered himself incredibly lucky to have been a 3rd baseline witness to a Minnesota Twins World Series victory. Jens is survived by his wife: Rose; son: Jens (Deepta); 3 grandchildren: Leela, Jens and Anjali all of Iowa City, IA; mother: Opal; brothers: Ken (Kathy), Bob (Joan), Curtis (Connie), and Mathew (Tanya); and sister: Cynthia (Karl) Andreasen. He was preceded in death by his father, Robert. The family encourages memorial contributions to the Multiple System Atrophy Coalition: <https://www.multiplesystematrophy.org/msa-research/> Visitation: Will be 57 PM on Monday, June 22, 2020 at the Baker Funeral Home Chapel in Mayville, ND and will resume one hour prior to the service at the church. Funeral Service: 10:30 AM Tuesday, June 23, 2020 at the Bruflut Lutheran Church in Portland, ND. Burial: Will be in the Aurdal Cemetery in Portland, ND. Shultz, Robert Richard "Bob" Bob grew up in the heart of NYC and joined the U.S. Air Force at age 19 serving in Korea for 4 years. Following his honorable discharge in Duluth, MN, he resided and worked there for several years. He met Sally Foster of Mpls. on the ski slopes. They married in 1964 in Mpls and lived in Minnetonka and Wayzata. Bob worked his entire career as an electrical engineer. Skiing became a major part of their lives. In addition to skiing every ski area in the Midwest and spending time at their ski condo in Michigan, they skied the Rocky Mountains from Canada to Colorado, Utah and the Tahoe area of the Sierras. Later this lifestyle was shared with their sons Matthew and Jonathan who in turn passed it on to their children. Bob's other interests were boating, sailing, water skiing, swimming, spending time at the cabin on Farm Island Lake, home improvement projects and sharing experiences while helping his sons in Boy Scout Troop 426. Both sons became Eagle Scouts. His family was his main reason for living. After retirement he and Sally enjoyed 20 years in their Florida home with many friends and family spending entire days on the beach of the Gulf of Mexico or in the pool. Bob also enjoyed a

Lampert, Harriet Genevieve 90 passed away June 14, 2020. She was born in Holdingford to Charles and Gertrude Young, the second youngest of seven children. She met George and they married in 1948, and purchased what they called the Beer Joint in Upsala, serving drinks and food to the local community. The two of them moved often after coming to the Minneapolis area and also spent 10 years in Denver. Many weekends were spent dancing to polkas or playing cards with friends. With her dad living to be 110 years old, she helped plan many large family gatherings. She took great pride in the cleanliness of her home, friends joked that you could eat off of the floor and she wore dust mops on her feet. Mom made friends wherever she went, including the cabin at the lake and when she led senior water aerobics at the YMCA. When the grandkids arrived in her life, she loved to make them cookies and always had some ready. She battled her dementia which was diagnosed in 2016. It was during the past year that the disease took control over her life. Harriet received the Sacrament of the Anointing of the Sick from an Archdiocese priest. He said she was smiling while receiving the sacrament. She is no longer suffering and back with George in heaven. She touched the hearts of many and will be missed by all who knew her. Poeschl, Mary R. Of St. Paul, MN. Loving wife, mother and grandmother. On Thursday, June 18th, 2020 Mary passed away peacefully at the age of 84. We know she is at peace being reunited with her parents, Marie and Frank Brost, her sister, Sarah "Sallie" Krenz and her brother, Francis, "Bud" Brost. Mary was born on August, 1st, 1935. She married her husband of 57 years, Richard, on June 2nd, 1963. Mary's family held the most special place in her heart. There was nothing she enjoyed more than spending time with them. She loved shopping, going out for long lunches & dinners (enjoying a whiskey or two) and going to movies. She was always up for a party. Mary's gregarious spirit gained her innumerable friends and acquaintances throughout her life and career as a radiologic technician and instructor for more than 40 years. While Mary will be dearly missed, she has left us with many lasting memories, stories and most importantly, her fierce love for us. Mary is survived by her husband Rick, her children, Nicole and Brad (Stacia), granddaughter Grace, her brother Joe Brost (Cathy), and many beloved nieces, nephews, and cousins. Due to COVID concerns, the family will have a small private service and burial. We very much Ulness, Arthur Thomas "Tom" 82, passed away peacefully June 17 after bravely battling illness for many months. Husband of Gerri for nearly 50 years, Tom was a long-time St. Paul area resident and retired architect. Born and raised in Fargo, Tom was preceded in death by parents Arthur E. and Adele H. Survived by wife Geraldine (Gerri), sister Ann Seymour, and many adoring nieces, nephews, grandnieces, and grand-nephews. Tom was fascinated by our country's varied landscape and architecture, and spent many years traveling with Gerri in their RV - where they met wonderful people from all over the country. Tom's other passions - particularly after retirement - included camping, trout fishing (even making his own flies for nephews and himself), and caring for their dog Crystal. An avid sports enthusiast, Tom was a raucous fan of the Minnesota Vikings, Golden Gophers, and Twins - as well as his alma mater NDSU Bison. His knack for story-telling had an abundance of material. Tom brought laughter and love to many people. No formal funeral or memorial. Instead, donations are encouraged to Our Lady of Peace hospice (2076 St. Anthony Avenue, St. Paul, MN 55104) www.ourladyofpeacemn.org or to a charity of your choice.

Finstad-Good, Joanne 86 of New York City and Ranier, MN on May 21 at her home in New York City. Born on July 22, 1933 at the family's apartment above Finstad Auto-Marine Shop in Ranier, MN to George and Clara Finstad. Her love of Rainy Lake and its history was a natural outcome of growing up with a lake as a front yard. As a child, she watched boats of all sizes and models pull into Ranier for repair or winter storage at George Finstad's Auto-Marine Shop, now listed on the National Register of Historic Places. A 1951 graduate of International Falls High School, Joanne also earned a Master's Degree in Microbiology from the University of Minnesota. In 1972, she and her husband, Robert A. Good, moved from Minneapolis to New York City where he served as Director of Sloan-Kettering Institute for Cancer Research. Joanne is survived by a sister, Connie of New York City. Condolences: www.daviddonehower.com Interment took place at the family plot in Oak Grove Cemetery, Detroit Lakes, MN. A celebration of her life will be held in late July at the Ranier Community Building. David-Doner Funeral Home, Detroit Lakes.

Nelson, Charles F. With profound sadness we announce the passing of Charles F. Nelson (Chuck, Studley or Pop's). Complications of COPD and Congestive Heart Failure finally overcame him at his residence in White Bear Lake on June 11, 2020. He was in his 88th year and lived a wonderful life, all while "doing it his way". He was born in Minneapolis, on January 21st, 1932 to Carl & Ann (Halek) Nelson. He graduated from Patrick Henry high school in 1950 and worked for the telephone company until a back injury required him to retire early. He absolutely loved the outdoors, including hunting and fishing, golfing and especially living on Lake Minnetonka. He was always had a tan. He served his country in the Navy and, for a time, was stationed in Honolulu, Hawaii. He also enjoyed volunteering at PGA golf events and we all remember his "Little Red Corvette" He loved, and was loved by many, and will be

Odland, Phyllis Aileen 94, beloved wife, mother, grandma and great-grandma, died peacefully on June 17, 2020. She was born in Minneapolis, Minnesota, on March 9, 1926, to John and Mabel Peterson. Phyllis graduated from Washburn High School (senior class Vice-President) and from Gustavus Adolphus College with a degree in social work. At Gustavus, she met Marvin Odland when they were seated alphabetically in class. They were married August 23, 1947, raised four children, and enjoyed over 72 years of marriage. After Marvin's graduation from Luther Seminary, Phyllis and Marvin moved to Harvey, North Dakota, to serve at First Lutheran Church. In 1952, they moved to Minot, North Dakota, where they lived until their retirement in 1987. Phyllis was actively involved in the churches they served: teaching Sunday School; singing in church choirs; leading Bible studies; and planning programs. For nearly twenty years, Phyllis enjoyed working for the Ward County Planning Council in Minot. After retiring, they moved to Hot Springs Village, Arkansas, where she was involved in their church, her PEO group, and her quilting club. They later returned to live in Minnesota to be near family and to reconnect with high school friends. Phyl and Marv loved traveling and always remembered their six-week trip to Europe in 1963, a number of wonderful cruise experiences, and the annual family camping trips. Phyllis was preceded in death by her husband, Marvin and daughter, Anne. She is survived by children, David (Susan) Odland, Linda (Jim) Brown, and Mark (Rebecca) Odland; grandchildren, Jeffrey Odland, Erik (Michelle) Odland, Amy (Ryan) Sommers, and Adam (Michelle) Odland; and five great grandchildren, Anders Odland, Eleanor and Clark Sommers, and Clara and Nolan Odland. A special thank you to the staff at Aurora on France Skyview unit in Edina. A gravesite memorial service at Acacia Park Cemetery is pending. In lieu of flowers, memorials can be made to Gustavus Adolphus College, Mount Olivet Lutheran Church in Minneapolis, or Luther Seminary. www.Washburn-McReavy.com Edina Chapel 952-920-3996

Erickson, Roger Allan Earl passed away Fri, June 19, 2020 at Good Samaritan Society- Blackduck, MN at the age of 92. Roger was born February 18, 1928 in Westby, WI to John and Alice (Hagen) Erickson. Roger attended Westby High School where he excelled in all sports, including ski jumping at what is now Snow Flake Ski Jump in Timber Coulee, WI. Because of WWII and a shortage of drivers, Roger began driving at age 14 to haul beer and cottage cheese from La Crosse to Madison until his induction into the US Army upon graduation from High School. After, WWII, Roger was an over-the-road driver until joining Jefferson Lines as a bus driver. He later advanced to management and then the development of Jefferson Tours. He later became part owner of Travel and Tours, Inc. He remained in the travel business until retirement. Due to his love "of the road", he returned to driving with UPS, Ryder, among others. On January 19, 1949, Roger was married to the sweetheart he met on the swing set at school, Barbara Ann Jefson. Together they enjoyed a wonderful 53 01/2 years of marriage until her passing in 2002. Roger was a longtime member of Faith Lilac Way Lutheran Church and the Robbinsdale American Legion. He was known to the neighbors as G'Roger due to his continual tinkering in his garage. With his kind and sociable disposition, everyone he met seemed to become an immediate friend. Throughout his life he remained a sports fan and avid hunter and fisherman. Roger is survived by his sons, Jim (Angie) of Bighorn, WY and Jeff (Roberta) of Northome (Wildwood), MN; and his grandchildren, great grandchildren, nieces, and nephews. He was preceded in death by his wife, Barbara "Bobbi"; his son, Greg; his brothers, Harold, John, and Carl; his sister, Josie; and his parents. To honor his request there will be no memorial service. We ask that memories of Roger as a Dad and friend remain as a comfort to all. Roger always thought long obituaries were bragging, but Dad, your life was something to brag about. Hagen, Barbara Jo A beloved mother, grandmother, aunt, friend and a devoted follower of Christ, Barbara Jo Hagen lived life to its fullest and was a fashion icon with a special love of sparkles. She brightened the lives of everyone around her. She made us all better versions of ourselves. Barbara was born November 8, 1936 in Hopkins, MN. Being the youngest of six you know what they say: "whatever the baby wants, the baby gets" and the daughter of Floy and M.B. "Punchy" Hagen, Mayor of Hopkins, Barbara always knew how to have fun. Anyone who knew her felt her energy and love. Barbara had many memorable, funny and unique moments growing up in Hopkins. She was never short of entertaining stories of her youth and had a tight-knit group of friends with whom she shared a close bond throughout her life. "Barb" was a very loyal friend. She raised four children and was the quintessential mother, always there for them. They are forever grateful for her unconditional love. Her gift to them was being an example of how to show up, continually bettering herself and encouraging her children and grandchildren to do the same. Barbara had real grit; she very rarely gave up. As her license plate stated, "IM410S" she loved tennis. She was fiercely competitive and hated to lose. But then, there was always another match, and revenge was sweet! Just ask her many opponents, often half her age, that fell victim to her on the court. Barb enjoyed dancing, socializing and spending time with her family, especially with a glass of wine. Merlot was her favorite. Barbara passed away peacefully at home on June 13, 2020. We love her and will deeply miss her. She was preceded in death by her parents and four siblings. She is survived by her oldest brother, Richard Hagen; her children: Diana Neal, Gregory (Tracy Schaffzin) Odland, Lynn (John) Waldron, Amy (John) Klaers; her grandchildren to whom she was lovingly known as Nana: Natalie (Brian Hasset) Neal, Ross Neal, Matt Waldron, Josh Waldron, Ian Odland, Scott Odland, Julia Odland, Cooper Klaers, Ella Klaers, Danny Klaers as well as her nieces, nephews and friends. Due to COVID-19, a celebration of her life will be announced at a later date so everyone can safely gather in her honor.

Olson, Duane Norman Age 89, passed away, Saturday, June 13, 2020, while out enjoying his daily walk. He lived at the Northfield Retirement Community, in Northfield, Minnesota. Born in 1931, in Crosby, MN, Duane was the eldest child of Adolf and Marjorie (Velzy) Olson. He attended schools in Houghton, MI, Green Bay, WI, Duluth and Ada, MN (HS 1949), St. Olaf College (BA 1953), and Cornell University, where he earned a Ph.D. in High-Energy Physics in 1960. While at Cornell, Duane met and married Joan Rafaj, and began a partnership that lasted from 1956 until Joan's passing in 2015. Children, Ruth and Eric, were born in Ithaca, NY, before Duane accepted a position at the University of Liverpool (UK). After returning to St. Olaf in 1962 to teach, another daughter, Susanne, completed the family. Duane spent individual years at Argonne National Laboratory, Oxford University, and Oak Ridge National Laboratory. Duane and Joan took a final joint-sabbatical in Durham (UK, 1990-91), with Duane at Newcastle University, and Joan, an archivist, at Durham University. Together, they also served as Field Supervisors for St. Olaf's Global Semester (1983). Duane enjoyed his research, teaching, and leading the family on epic car-camping trips each summer or sabbatical. Duane's love for all things scenic, historic, or cultural, left no lunch-time mountain stream undiscovered, or gothic cathedral unexplored and many life-long friendships were formed along the way. Duane retired from St. Olaf in 1996, remaining active in the Northfield community through St. John's Lutheran Church, delivering Meals on Wheels, and tax assistance at the Senior Center. He and Joan traveled frequently to visit their ever-increasing circle of extended family and friends. Always inquisitive, Duane never relinquished his enjoyment of books, learning, and keeping up with current events. Duane is survived by three children, Ruth Olson of New York City; Eric Olson (Diana Denning), Newburyport, MA; Susanne Olson (James O'Connor), Arlington, MA; and eight grandchildren. He is also survived by his two brothers, Gene M. Olson of Lancaster, PA, and Gerald C. Olson (Susan) of San Tan Valley, AZ, and sister-in-law Mildred Rafaj of Madison, CT. He was predeceased by his wife Joan, his parents, sisters-in-law Nalda Olson, Ruth Goodwin, Susan Rafaj, Ellen Vrudny, Grace Rafaj, and brother-in-law Paul Rafaj. Memorials are preferred to the Northfield Historical Society, the College History Fund at St. Olaf College, the Southern Poverty Law Center, or St. John's Lutheran Church. www.northfieldfuneral.com

Suel, Mark Raymond age 54, of St. Paul, MN, passed away on June 11, 2020. Born and raised in Shakopee, MN, Mark was a man of many talents and interests. He was a natural athlete, excelling at a variety of sports in his youth. An avid outdoorsman, Mark found beauty and peace in nature. From a young age, Mark loved boating, fishing and hunting with family and friends. His dog, Tilly, was a beloved companion on his outdoor adventures. A skilled craftsman with a mechanical mind, Mark built a stunning canoe from scratch, restored bicycles, and was able to tackle any fixit project that crossed his path. Mark earned a degree in public administration from Minnesota State University-Mankato. Mark's passion for politics and lifelong learning led him to William Mitchell College of Law, where he completed his J.D. degree and subsequently passed the Minnesota State Bar Exam. His professional career included plant management and senior level positions within the energy, and mining & aggregates industries. His expertise included environmental and regulatory affairs, permitting and zoning, renewable resources development, and community relations. He had a breathtaking grasp of the English language, was a skilled writer, and loved storytelling and spirited dialogue and debate. Mark was known for his twinkling blue eyes, boyish grin, generosity of spirit, and a propensity for bestowing nicknames on everyone he knew, as a sign of endearment. Mark was preceded in death by his parents, Gert and John Suel. He is Reinhardt, Kali Jane 24, of Chicago, IL and formerly of Plymouth, MN, died unexpectedly on June 15th, 2020. Although only 24 at the time of her death it is apparent that Kali affected and left a lasting impression on many people. Kali loved to travel internationally with Mitch, her boyfriend, and be adventurous which included bungee jumping in Africa, parachuting, paragliding, riding elephants, and even swimming with the sharks. Mitch and their two-year plans were to continue their love of international travel which included Tokyo and ultimately working in Australia. She challenged the entire family to be better people, to think differently, and to live your best life. She loved to debate politics and was quite informed. Her friends describe her as strong-willed, loyal, goofy, supportive, motivated, selfless, caring, and vivacious. She was the Chapter President of Alpha Phi Sorority at the University of MN in 2017 and left her mark on hundreds of women and they in turn left their mark on her. She loved all parts of being an Alpha Phi but supporting causes for women and leadership opportunities were the ones she was most passionate about. She recently joined the BLM protests in Chicago and strove to be more informed of this cause. She was an avid Gopher Fan however photos are surfacing of her in Wisco attire when she visited her friends in Madison. Please know that if they were playing the Gophers she was in all-out Maroon and Gold. After graduating Kali sat for the CPA exams where only 1 in 5 passes on the first try exemplifying her determination to the best she could be. Kali was born in Edina, MN and grew up in Plymouth however her favorite city was Chicago where she worked for Deloitte as an Auditor. Kali's last selfless and generous act was to be an organ donor. We hope they also receive her passion and overall zest for life. She is the second of four children and only daughter to Heather and Ray Reinhardt. Besides her parents, Kali leaves behind her brothers Jacob, Jack, Josh, boyfriend Mitch Felknor, and many other loving family members and friends too numerous to list. We know she is watching over us but challenging us to be better; she was one badass woman and our 1 in a million. At this time services are pending; details will be announced as soon as available. Rozema, Ann H. Passed away at home in Roseville, Minnesota, on June 13, 2020, at the age of 93. She is survived by her sons, Jim Davis (Dana Crick) St. Paul, MN and John Davis (Lorelie) Prior Lake, MN; her aunt Sy Lawther, Kansas City, Missouri, many close cousins, and nephew Richard Busenbark (Sharon),

Granger, Indiana, and their sons John, Aaron, and Adam. She was preceded in death by her sister Norma Busenbark. Ann was born in Alton, Missouri, to Leland and Laura Huddleston. The family moved to K.C. MO, in 1942 where Ann graduated from Paseo High School. She went on to obtain a B.S. degree in mathematics from Kansas State University. She pledged Pi Beta Phi sorority, remaining active in her sorority all of her life. Ann married her college sweetheart, Jim Davis, and had two sons. She was active in K.C. volunteer activities, loved to play tennis, golf, and duplicate bridge, and was happiest entertaining friends and relatives in her home. She taught high school math for 10 years at Sunset Hill, a college preparatory school for girls in Kansas City and loved the time spent with her students. Following the death of her husband she married John Hayward. In 1987 they retired to Islamorada in the Florida Keys. John died there in 1992. Five years later Ann married Ray Rozema, settling in The Landings in Ft. Myers, Florida. Friends encouraged them to spend their summers in Ludington, MI. Those friends, and others in The Landings, became their extended family. Ann was an active member of Ft. Myers Congregational UCC Church, Kiwanis, was on the executive board of her condo Village, and was a vice president of Southwest Florida Alumnae Circle of Pi Beta Phi sorority. She loved playing piano and attending plays and concerts. Ann spent the final two and a half years of her life in Minnesota, near her sons and daughters-in-law. She quickly found a new community of dear friends with whom she continued to play, explore, and dine out as much as possible. After eating her first pronto pup at the state fair and traveling the length of Lake Superior's North Shore Ann earned the right to proudly call herself a Minnesotan. Ann had a warm heart, a big smile, and believed herself fortunate that her life philosophy was to love other people. Burial will be at Forest Hill Cemetery in Kansas City, Missouri.

McCarron, Jacqueline Ann "Jackie" (King) 78, died June 15, 2020 at her home in Pine City. Born in Minneapolis on January 5, 1942, preceded in death by her parents Everette King, Winnifred Brown; and Patricia King. Jackie is survived by her daughters Kim and Christine Wolf, Kathy Howe, Terri (Scott) Berg, Rob McCarron; grandchildren, Jacob Worwa, McKenzie Howe, Max Howe, Leah Berg & Troy Berg; Sister Marlys (Frank) Sularz, brothers Joe and Nick King; nieces & nephew, Linn, Pam, Al & Tracy. She loved card games, the casino, People magazine, and the History channel. She was sassy, funny, opinionated, and sometimes a little dingy giving us all countless reasons to roll our eyes and laugh hysterically with her!! Please join us in celebrating Jackie on Saturday, June 27, 2020 at Olson Funeral Chapel, 115 W. Fourth St, Rush City, MN. Visitation at 10am with a service at 11am.

Elhard, Donald A. age 80, of Brooklyn Park passed away of natural causes June 9, 2020. Don was born in Jud, ND and was the last child born to Albert and Mathilda. He grew up in North Dakota and went to Jamestown High School where he met and married his high school sweetheart Joanne Femrite and had four children; Kathryn, Terena, David, and Lara. He was a wonderful father, hard worker and a great provider. Don started as a railroad worker in North Dakota and later worked at Northland Foremost for many years. As kids, we well remember the ice cream-stocked freezer. As a boy and throughout his life he loved to read novels and faithfully read the newspaper front to back everyday. He leaves behind his son, David Elhard, his wife Michelle, and only grandchildren Annalise, Jacob and Ian Elhard. He also leaves behind his daughter Kathryn. He was preceded in death by daughters Terena and Lara and is survived by siblings Wanda, Della, and Morris. A private Remembrance will be held at a later date. Donny was loved deeply and will be sadly missed. We remember his laugh, sense of humor, and love best of all!

Rischmiller, Miriam C. "Mim" of Amery, WI (formerly Edina, MN) passed away peacefully at the age of 91. She is survived by her son John (Kris) of Chaska, MN and daughter Sue (Steve) Stewart of Amery, WI. In addition, she has four grandchildren and a great-grandchild: Andy & Brittany Stewart and daughter, Zoey, Kelly Stewart, and Erik and Ingrid Rischmiller. Mim graduated from Gustavus Adolphus

Nelson, Elizabeth Acaton The world sadly lost a guardian godmother when Elizabeth Acaton Nelson, of Blaine, Minnesota, died on May 3, 2020. Beth spent the first two-plus decades of her movielike journey in the Philippines. In 1975, she married Jay Ward Nelson, who was stationed as a Marine in her homeland. The couple subsequently put roots down in the Twin Cities. After a long career as a telecommunications assembler, Beth dedicated her remaining 20 years to gardening, reading, and especially giving to others. She was fully bilingual, clever in the kitchen, and sharp with a needle and thread. She was also a closet comedian whose boisterous laughter defied her tiny frame. She will be deeply loved and missed by family and friends on both sides of the Pacific. Those wishing to honor her life can make a donation in her name to the American Diabetes Association.

McCarthy, Patrick K. "Pat" was born in Duluth on August 31, 1955 and died peacefully on June 17, 2020 at home in Eden Prairie, with his family by his side, at the age of 64. Beloved husband, father, brother and friend, Pat was on the football, hockey and wrestling teams at Duluth Cathedral High School. He obtained a bachelor's degree in business from the University of Superior Wis. and then became a claims adjuster for American Family Insurance. In 1980 Pat married his high school sweetheart, Therese Michelizzi. In his younger years he enjoyed hunting, golfing, playing cards and spending time with his friends. Pat touched many lives with his gentle loving spirit and sense of humor. He lived each day to the fullest, always thinking of others and how to make them smile. Most important to Pat was his family and their well-being. Preceded in death by parents Robert Kenneth McCarthy and Ruth Janet (Creeden) McCarthy, McGovern, Patrick Age 82, passed away peacefully at home, with his wife, Mary, holding him. Mary and Pat had been married for 59 years and had 3 wonderful children, PJ (Lisa) McGovern, Jennifer (Reynolds-deceased) Fisher, Heather (Joe) Walker and 6 cherished grandchildren, Katie and Emily McGovern, Chase and Preston (Deena) Fisher, and Hailey and Kasey Walker. Pat was born in Saginaw Michigan on January 14, 1938. He graduated from the University of Michigan in 1961. His career was with Cargill and then was a partner of Business Insurance Brokers, before founding McGovern-Fisher Insurance Agency. Pat was a first class character! Whoever met him, never forgot him ... as he told Mary early in their relationship, "I am a legend in my own time"... and he worked hard to make that true. He had a mischievous spirit and with a sly Irish grin that said it all. He loved saying something to shock people, but always accompanied by that twinkle in his eyes. When he was at the U of M, he put a baby pig on the field during halftime at the Michigan-Wisconsin football game. It is a prank that is still talked about today. He adored his family and always had his heart and generosity open to them ... buy whatever you want, he would say ... one calling him ... Pitter Pat with a Purse. He treasured his friends and was always there for any of them. His golf game was not fine tuned and he took so many Mulligan's during the game that they called them McGovern's. He was a great insurance man, but had no skill for working with his hands ... Changing a lightbulb was challenging and every home repair need was met with a loud call for ... MARY!. After moving to Cottagewood in 2002, he became it's unofficial mayor, because of his happy wave from his front porch on the hill, followed by ... "It's a great day" ... "Good to see you" ... "beautiful family: ... "cute dog" ..."come in". He had many visitors on that porch and they covered many topics in their conversations. People who did not know him stopped to chat. They have said that his warm smile and wave were a hallmark of the neighborhood. The evening that he passed a large double rainbow appeared in the sky ... it was though he was saying ... I am here and all is well. "In life we loved you dearly, in death, we love you still ... in our hearts you hold a special place that on one will ever fill." A Celebration of Pat's life will be held at a later this summer. Memorials referred to Hope For The World.

Gamst, Nicholas Alexander "Nick" Age 50 of St. Paul died June 18, 2020. Nick grew up in St. Paul, and graduated from Woodbury High School in 1988. On September 25, 1993 he would marry JoDee Lehto, and he eventually earned his BA in Economics from the University of Minnesota in 2003. Nick had numerous passions; he started Brutal MMA, a promotion company, and was a top ranked referee in the UFC. He was an avid Minnesota Viking and Minnesota Wild fan, and knew every episode of Frasier. As a scuba diver, Nick travelled the world and explored countless farfetched islands and reefs. Most important, though, was his family. He was most proud of his four boys, or "amazing men", as he would put it. Always a jokester, his amazing sense of humor will be dearly missed. Nick was preceded in death by his mom, Dori; father in law, Joseph Lehto; Grandma Fern; and grandparents Joe (Bernice) Dervie. He is survived by his sons, Pacer Alexander, Shandon Tyler, Xander Paul Joseph, and Roman Gray; loving wife, JoDee Lehto Gamst; parents, Paul (Wendy); mother in law, Darelynn Lehto; siblings, Deanna (Jason), Nicci (Craig), Brian (Single), Sean (It's Complicated), and Joey (Alyssa), as well as numerous loving nieces, nephews, family, and friends. A private family service will be held. In lieu of flowers, memorials preferred. O'Halloran and Murphy 651-702-0302

Weber, Dominick "DJ" It is with deepest sorrow we announce our beloved DJ, age 24, passed away on June 12, 2020. At the time of his death, DJ was hard at work fixing his first car. He never let a lack of transportation slow him down, however, and traveled the Twin Cities on two wheels or two feet to visit friends and family, fueled by Pokmon GO and the music of Chief Keef (please don't Google it if you're over 30). Those visits invariably included DJ charming his host into cooking. Where such a skinny kid put all that food remains one of life's great mysteries. DJ was a sports fanatic. His love/hate relationship with MN sports teams, particularly the Twins and Vikings, was legendary, and produced hi-fives, tears and profanity. He played competitively on many teams. As a young adult, DJ struggled with addiction. Despite the deep pain addiction caused him, it couldn't diminish his caring and generous spirit. He loved his people fiercely, and was loved fiercely in return. We will miss him every moment. His goofy sense of humor, contagious laugh and dazzling smile will live on in our memory. He is survived by his parents

Parrette, Rosemary Walsh "Rosie" died peacefully at her home in Mclean, VA on June 14, 2020, surrounded by her loving family, after bravely battling Parkinson's disease for many years. She is survived by her children Marie Parrette Walker (Carl) of Thurmont, MD; Anne Parrette Rohall-Andrade (Jose) of Mclean, VA; former son-in-law, James Rohall of Montross, VA; Tom Parrette of San Francisco, CA; grandchildren Amani, Robert, Jack, Carleton, Ella, Nora, Conley and Pearl; her precious little sister, Eileen Osterbauer (John); big brother Jerome Walsh (Ann); and numerous beloved nieces and nephews. She was preceded in death by her husband Judge Bernard V. Parrette, Lt Col, USAF; her parents Norine Walsh, ne Conley, and Matthew Walsh; and big brother, Matthew Walsh, Jr. (Ginny). Born August 2, 1931 in Minneapolis, MN, Rosemary was a devoted teacher, lifelong musician, and devout Catholic. She was a graduate of the Academy of Holy Angels in Richfield, MN and the College of St. Catherine (St. Catherine University) in St. Paul, MN, where she earned her B.S. in Primary and Elementary Education. She taught grade school in Ely, MN from 1953 to 1958, and in Edina, MN from 1958 to 1963. In April of 1963, she married Bernard (Bernie) Parrette of St. Paul, MN, and the couple relocated to Washington, DC when Bernie was hired as an attorney for the Kennedy Administration. The couple lived on Capitol Hill during the "Camelot" era of the 1960s, then moved to NW Washington, DC where they made their home and raised their three children. In 1988, they moved to McLean, VA. Rosemary's teaching career spanned almost 50 years. Her last teaching position was at St. Thomas Cathedral School in Arlington, VA. After retirement, she volunteered at St. James Catholic School where her grandchildren attended. An accomplished pianist, she made music and music education an essential part of the learning experience - there was always a piano in her classroom. Later in life, she taught private piano lessons to children. Her gentle, encouraging manner and genuine love of children made her a favorite of all her students. Her extensive knowledge of American history and passion for art, architecture and design shaped her own elegant sense of style, which was greatly admired. Her sense of humor and quiet laughter will be missed! A Mass of Christian Burial will be celebrated at 10:00 am EDT on Thursday, June 25, 2020 at St. James Catholic Church in Falls Church, VA. The Mass will be live-streamed via the St. James Facebook Page at <https://www.facebook.com/StJamesCatholicChurch/>. A private burial will take place at Arlington National Cemetery at a future date. Memorial contributions may be made to Rosie's beloved parish, Saint James Catholic Church or to Saint James Catholic School <https://www.stjamescatholic.org/index>

Minneapolis homicide detectives continued their investigation Saturday into Friday morning's fatal shooting of a man in his 30s.

The man, whose name has not yet been released, died when gunfire erupted about 6:40 a.m. Friday in the 3400 block of S. Elliot Avenue, in the Powderhorn neighborhood, said police spokesman John Elder.

Elder said the victim was taken to a hospital, where he died several hours later. Exactly what led up to the shooting was not clear, and police so far have not released a description of the suspected gunman. No one has been arrested.

Tim Anderson, who lives near the scene, said he was just sitting down for his morning coffee when he heard a loud bang.

Startled, he looked out of his living room window to see a man with gun "aiming down the sidewalk."

Recalling the incident in a phone interview on Friday afternoon, Anderson said the suspect kept firing while moving in a distinct manner - "kind of shuffling."

"When I saw him, he shot probably five more shots down the street, down the sidewalk," Anderson said.

Once the gunfire stopped, the suspect looked around, as if to check if anyone had witnessed the shooting, before ducking into a nearby alley, according to Anderson, who gave a similar account to police. After making sure his wife and three children were safe, Anderson said he ran outside to check on the victim, who was sprawled on the pavement.

"He was unresponsive and [there was] a lot of blood," Anderson recalled.

"When I got to him, there was one other gal from the block who was there with me," he said, adding that the neighbor was already on the phone with 911.

The death continued a surge in shootings in the city. Nearly 70 people have been shot since last month's unrest over the killing of George Floyd by a former Minneapolis officer.

Friday's slaying was the city's 23rd of the year.

"In parts of our society, there appears to be a turmoil of trust and a crisis in civility. There also appears to be a very sweeping, debilitating and destructive narrative of if you are not with me, then you are against me. Sadly, this narrative has found refuge in our communities, our politics, our faiths, the media and, yes, even policing."

While these words aptly describe our current environment, they are part of the commencement address Minneapolis Police Chief Medaria Arradondo delivered at Concordia University, St. Paul, a year ago.

Their pertinence reminds us we are a divided society with differing views on many issues, with race, governance, and policing in the forefront at this moment.

Last year Arradondo said, "There is a tremendous lesson in seeking first to understand, then be understood." If there was ever a time to pause, listen, and learn, it is now.

Arradondo leads the police department known now for the death of George Floyd, in a city now known for the ensuing chaos and change.

The chief favors "servant leadership," a way of thinking observed by leaders who are drawn to first serve, then lead.

He's not alone.

Positioned between St. Paul and Minneapolis, Concordia University is home to a Criminal Justice Leadership program that was addressing headline issues before citizens demanded and elected officials undertook reforms these past few weeks.

Taught by professionals in the field, the program is preparing the next generation of leaders in law enforcement and the broader criminal justice arena, says Janina Cich, professor and department chair.

Cich, who spent nearly two decades working in law enforcement as a civilian and uniformed officer, took her life experiences to the academic arena. She and her colleagues revamped the program to nurture servant leaders with emotional intelligence who aspire to be change agents in their communities.

With a focus on internal and external stakeholders, they study real-life scenarios, analyzing how they would respond to and communicate about situations they might face in their professions. Lessons are transportable to their workplaces.

Several years ago, Cich assembled an executive criminal-justice advisory board composed of community stakeholders. Tasked with identifying skill sets lacking in criminal justice positions, the board concluded communication, ethics, and cultural awareness were critical areas of weakness.

The areas of weakness became a focus of the curriculum, with self-reflection as a foundation.

Students identify the values upon which they were raised; their current values; and their profession's values. They address bias and cultural awareness, looking both inward and outward, assessing the broader impact of decisions, actions, and communication on particular scenarios.

"We're helping students identify how to be creative thinkers and problem solvers and also be strong in their conviction and leadership while attending to the many stakeholders these decisions affect," Cich says.

Because the curriculum includes current difficult topics, students may be addressing them in both their workplaces and in their studies. Some discussion focuses on personal responses and how they impact the individuals in their work.

Scenarios like the George Floyd killing prompt reflection and discussion, such as, "How are the other officers showing up as informal leaders? How are they showing up with humanity and grace? How are they attending to life?"

"It's been a delicate balance in our department," Cich says.

She explains, "We are taking this whole-lens view and trying to figure out how are we showing up, not just as 'I'm a cop and I want control and I want you to listen to what I have to say,' but also, "How can I respond to you in a way that is humane and empathetic and understands you're in a crisis that you can't handle right now, which is why I am here?"

"We're seeing an evolution of officers," Cich says. "We're seeing people retiring out who had a whole different idea of what policing was because the communities back then were different than they are now."

Seeds are being planted. But change is a process.

"As a society, we're talking about reform," she says. "We're seeing that. We can't make it happen overnight. But we can change the system by working collaboratively, by the community working with police and the police working with the community, because we are all one."

In his commencement speech, Arrandondo said, "The most devastating and destructive harm we as adults can inflict upon our children is removing hope from their journey."

Caryn M. Sullivan: Learning about leadership in the St. Paul midway

He was right. We all need hope that communities, families, and organizations - fractured and fearful, weary and resolute - will find their way through the current turmoil.

But, in this unsettling time, when emotions and expectations are on overdrive, we also need steady and thoughtful leadership, delivered through a wide lens, not a narrow one.

Cich is hopeful.

"I think change is happening. That's really what we're pushing for, to be agents of change, not only in our lens view but in our professions. That's why we take a whole system view."

"Our program is not about cops," she says. "We have expanded the conversation to many professions within the criminal justice system, which could be advocates, corrections, probation or anybody that has an influence in working with people. We're in the people business."

"We're making change, even if it's one person at a time," she says. "That's what officers do out on the street. They make change, one person at a time, one crisis at a time. Sometimes to create a movement you just need one person to start."

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 1CLength: 1520 wordsByline: MICHAEL RAND; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: On this Father's Day, many sports figures can be grateful for precious family time during these past few monthsBody

If 2020 were a normal year, Derek Falvey knows exactly where he would have been on Sunday for Father's Day: Target Field.

The Twins would be wrapping up a four-game series with the Yankees, and Falvey, the organization's president of baseball operations, would be putting in a long day at the ballpark.

This is not, of course, a normal year. And Falvey is pretty sure where he will be instead on Sunday: Exploring a Twin Cities park or trail and having a picnic with wife Meghan, son Jack (4) and daughter Brynn (1).

Coronavirus has put a lot of what we take for granted on pause, including major U.S. sports since the middle of March. While it's hard to find silver linings in the midst of a global health pandemic, Falvey is one of several highly visible Minnesota sports figures determined to make the most of another aspect of their lives during this unique, challenging time: being a dad to children still in their formative years.

Players, coaches and sports executives normally wired for the long hours demanded by their hypercompetitive careers have scaled back both intentionally and out of necessity to achieve a better work-life balance - sometimes, quite literally, as their kids suddenly burst into the room during Zoom calls.

The consensus among them: Even as dedicated dads before, they have seen these past few months as an opportunity to grow.

"I think the best way to phrase it is that I'm a more present dad," said Vikings tight end Kyle Rudolph, who along with wife Jordan has twin 3-year-old daughters, Andersyn and Finley, and 1-year-old son Henry. "It's an incredibly unique opportunity to spend the amount of time together that we'll never have again. For my wife and I, for the kids. We'll never be in this same situation again."

Making the most of this time

Former Gophers and NFL receiver Ron Johnson and his wife, Shani Marks Johnson - a former Gophers track and field star who competed in the triple jump at the 2008 Beijing Olympics - pride themselves on having a close family and being involved parents to Kamryn, 9, and Quinn, 5.

They perhaps made the stay-at-home transition as seamless as possible, with Marks Johnson using her skills as a substitute teacher to educate the girls while Johnson toggled between Zoom calls and family time at their Chanhassen home.

The closeness combined with extra time together in recent months has allowed them to help foster the charitable and entrepreneurial spirit of Kamryn, who along with a group of friends has gained nationwide attention for starting Bracelets for Unity and Justice - an endeavor that has raised nearly $100,000 for relief efforts in Minneapolis in the aftermath of George Floyd's death.

"It's been great for our neighborhood and families in our neighborhood to be able to learn and have the ability to come talk to us and strike up a conversation about everything that's been going on," said Johnson, who was out Thursday in Plymouth with Kamryn helping sell the handmade bracelets.

That spirit is echoed by Gersson Rosas, Timberwolves president of basketball operations.

The Wolves' season ended abruptly March 11 when the NBA shut down. It was barely a month after Rosas had made a flurry of trades to reshape the roster, and it was less than a year into his tenure with the organization. But instead of worrying about what was lost, Rosas set about trying to determine what could be gained.

Some of it revolved around new processes to keep the Wolves moving forward. But much of it had to do with what Rosas called "the most rewarding part of this time period": slowing down, putting down stronger roots in Minnesota and getting to see the daily, up-close development of his twin 4-year-olds, Grayson and Giana.

Rosas realized how much time he typically spends on the road when Grayson complained that Dad is always "in his spot" now when he tries to sneak into his parents' bed at night.

"I constantly push our organization and staff - whether we're talking about COVID, the tragedy of George Floyd or anything else - to turn negatives into positives and find silver linings," Rosas said. "If I'm preaching that to our staff, I have to own it at home, too."

He's watched his son get interested in sports and heard his daughter ask questions about his job. Rosas has appreciated how effortlessly his wife, Susana, handles many of the tasks that are now divided more equally.

A survey in the midst of the pandemic of 1,060 parents revealed that nearly half of all dads reported spending more time on housework and taking care of young children than they did previously. Past research also suggests that at least some of that shift in responsibility could become permanent.

"Knowing I have a regular responsibility to help, even with meetings, work, everything going on, you really put into perspective what's valuable," Rosas said. "I'll take this experience as something that changed my relationship with my kids."

DADS BEING DADS

He and Ryan Saunders talk about fatherhood often, with Rosas providing counsel to Saunders - who became a dad last June, right around the time Rosas removed the interim label and hired him as Wolves head coach.

Saunders is on morning duty with his son, Lucas, who just turned 1 and is an early riser like his dad. They go for a walk in the morning, and they play basketball on a newly installed driveway hoop in the evening as Saunders and his wife, Hayley, the managing editor and associate publisher at Artful Living Magazine, juggle their work responsibilities.

Saunders misses coaching, game-planning and the thrill that comes from competition. But he didn't miss some pretty big milestones.

"He's used to having two parents home now," Saunders said. "The fact that I'm getting to spend time with Lucas, being home for his first steps, for his first words, is pretty special."

All you can do is laugh

Richard Pitino's Gophers men's basketball team was in the midst of the Big Ten tournament when play was halted and the season was ultimately canceled.

He went from hoping his team could string enough wins together to grab an NCAA tournament bid to trying to figure out how to communicate with his returning players and recruit in the midst of a pandemic - all while sharing with his wife, Jill, distance learning duties and other new responsibilities for Ava (9), Jack (6) and Zoe (3).

It hasn't all been perfect, but even the imperfections - Pitino's family bought him Father's Day balloons last Sunday, mistakenly thinking that was his big day - make you smile.

Pitino estimates that at least one of his kids has made an impromptu appearance on a video call "75 percent of the time," and that he's found that "whenever I get a phone call, the children just gravitate toward my voice." He jokes that if he has a really important video call, he'll at least make sure all the kids are wearing clothes.

But he also takes his role as a dad seriously.

"If you're lazy as a father, your kids are going to be lazy. If you're not on top of their habits, it's going to affect their personality and development. So you'd better be invested," Pitino said. "We're all they have right now. Their health, their safety, their maturity, all of it is in your hands, your wife's hands. It's been fun, but it's been eye-opening."

Rudolph can relate to the "video bombs." It's been a regular occurrence from his three kids - both during the Vikings' virtual offseason program and as he's started taking online summer classes at Notre Dame.

"'Daddy, why are you in school?' " Rudolph said, imitating his daughters. "They want to walk up and see the professor lecture. Henry would walk up during virtual meetings and just pop in. If it was a regular offseason, I'd be at work all day and not see that. It's fun to see the chaos."

Shortly after spring training was halted, and before everyone became Zoom experts, Falvey recalls being on a video call with executives from every other team in baseball and trying to navigate the mute button and turning his screen off after his son walked into the room and his daughter woke up from a nap.

DADS BEING DADS

"I thought, 'This is a little different,' " Falvey said. "I know I have a lot of balls to juggle from time to time at work, but to have the kids and call going at the same time was something I hadn't expected."

Now it's just the new reality. A Twins season that would be close to half over hasn't even started, and a home run counter that reached an MLB-record 307 last season is stuck on zero Bombas.

There's nothing Falvey can do about that. He could check in with fellow executives (or scroll Twitter, as he often does) to find out the latest on baseball's return-to-play status. He could imagine what a packed Target Field might have looked like this weekend for a huge series against the Yankees.

Or, like so many of his peers in sports, he can find joy in being a dad.

"I try to have balance, but I know our jobs are difficult and we're usually going full speed ahead," Falvey said. "But I feel like I've deepened my relationship with my kids and my wife during the course of this time in a way that I will always appreciate. There's uniqueness and challenges in this time, but that part I wouldn't trade for anything."

HELPING KIDS COPE IN A CHAOTIC WORLD

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 1049 wordsByline: SHANNON PRATHER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Experts offer advice on helping children who are stressed over the pandemic and racial injustice.Body

It's been a rough year for everyone, but especially for kids.

The coronavirus pandemic closed schools, limiting access to trusted teachers and friends, even playgrounds. Financial strain taxed some families as parents lost jobs. Then came George Floyd's death, followed by both peaceful protests and civil unrest, including burning buildings and tear gas.

"It's been hard times," said St. Paul resident Kiarra Story, mom to an 8-year-old daughter, Kiley. "She is feeling everything coming down on her at such a young age."

Health care providers say they have seen a surge in calls with families seeking help for children and teens showing signs of trauma and anxiety. Parents, reporting children's fears manifesting in tantrums, mood swings and separation anxiety, are seeking advice on how to talk with their kids about sensitive and often frightening topics, including disease, death and racial injustice.

"We see kids who are regressing including thumb sucking, bed wetting, hiding and fighting more with their siblings," said Wendy Goodman, executive director of the Ramsey County Children's Mental Health Collaborative, which has fielded hundreds of calls, e-mails and texts from families reaching out for help. "Everyone is asking: What can we do?"

St. Paul mom Aerine Caerwyn said her son and foster son, both 15, were already anxious about the coronavirus, missing school and friends, when Floyd's death after a Minneapolis police officer knelt on his neck led to protests and then unrest near their home. The boys were so worried they packed bags in case they had to leave in a hurry.

She eventually took them to her parents' house in rural Georgia to go fishing and unplug a bit from all the news and chaos.

HELPING KIDS COPE IN A CHAOTIC WORLD

"The feeling is that the world was sort of aggravated and we were really trapped," said Caerwyn, board chairwoman of the Ramsey County Children's Mental Health Collaborative.

Tension and stress

Children and teens were already being diagnosed with more mental health conditions than previous generations before the start of 2020, said Abigail Gewirtz, a child psychologist and professor at the University of Minnesota's Institute of Child Development and the Department of Family Social Science.

"Since 2010, anxiety, depression and suicide have been going up in kids," Gewirtz said. "Add a pandemic and racial injustice, and you see heightened tension and stress."

Another factor fueling this rise in children's and adolescent mental health issues: The average American child is now getting their first cellphone at age 10. That often means parents have less control over what their children see.

"That is what makes parenting so difficult around these very, very scary sensitive issues," said Gewirtz, author of the book "When the World Feels Like a Scary Place: Essential Conversations for Worried Parents and Anxious Kids."

Experts agree there is no single correct formula or course of action for families, who have different values and experiences.

But the biggest mistake parents can make is not engaging their children at all, said Lisa Deputie, a manager at the nonprofit Minnesota Communities Caring for Children/Prevent Child Abuse Minnesota. Deputie is an African-American parent educator who teaches about trauma and adverse childhood experiences.

"We don't want to act like nothing is happening. We want to have those conversations, but we want to have those conversations in the language they understand," Deputie said.

St. Paul mom Jacinta Moss said world events combined with personal tragedy - the death of her mother - have sent her and her two kids, Malachi, 9, and A'Zaynia, 6, reeling. Malachi, who has autism with anxiety and depression, has already had negative interactions with the police at school, so hearing about Floyd's death was traumatizing.

"Our young black men are scared. My son is scared to be outside without my father," Moss said.

To cope, Moss said she has set up a calm space in her St. Paul home. The area resembling a blanket fort in the corner of the living room gives her son and her daughter a quiet place to draw, relax and play on their tablets.

Moss said she and her children have also leaned heavily on her father, who is a minister. Visiting his St. Louis Park home feels like an escape, and taking part in charity works at his church has helped the family to focus on life-affirming activities.

Moss said she's also been able to comfort her son by telling him that the wheels of justice are turning, starting with the arrests of the officers involved.

"Justice is all they want," Moss said.

HELPING KIDS COPE IN A CHAOTIC WORLD

Comfort in routine

Story said she and her daughter watched the video showing George Floyd's death together. They live in St. Paul near the Lake Street bridge, just across the river from the Minneapolis neighborhoods most affected by the unrest.

Story, who is black, said she cried. Then the family took part in peaceful protests.

"I have not tried to shelter her," said Story, noting that her daughter is mixed race. "I want her to see my reality ... If she is curious and wants to know more, I keep going."

At the same time, Story says she is maintaining daily routines, including bedtime, to help her daughter feel secure.

Dr. Andrea Singh, chairwoman of pediatrics at Park Nicollet and co-lead of HealthPartners Children's Health Initiative, said she encourages families to maintain those habits and incorporate physical activity into those routines to lower stress.

"Get up every morning, brush your teeth and change your clothes even if you are not going anywhere," Singh said. "Do your normal bedtime routine at a normal time."

Before a tough conversation, parents need to take some time off to regulate their own emotions and think about the values and messages that they hope to convey. Then, Gewirtz said, they also need to take the time to observe their children's emotions and acknowledge them.

"Kids see the world through the bubble of the parent," she said. "When we get caught up in our emotions from these events - our anger, frustration, anxiety and worry - it's very hard for us to sit and listen to our kids."

There are no easy, quick answers, Gewirtz said, but parents can leave their children with a message of hope.

"There are always things you can do," Gewirtz said. "That is such an important message for your kids."

NO DEALS, ON POLICE REFORM OR OTHERWISE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

In the days since the world saw Minneapolis police kill George Floyd, expectations were high that the death of an unarmed black man would compel decisive action by the Minnesota Legislature.

But a week of emotional hearings and tense behind-the-scenes negotiations on police reform produced nothing more than an impasse between Gov. Tim Walz, the House Democratic majority and Republicans who control the Minnesota Senate.

Lawmakers left St. Paul at sunup Saturday morning without a deal on criminal justice reform, ending a long night of frustration and weeks of hope for finding some common ground.

The DFL governor called it an "embarrassment" for Minnesota and blamed Republicans for setting an "arbitrary" deadline: "I'm really worried the message this sends to all those tens of thousands of protesters who were on the streets, all those people across Minnesota and across the country who expected that this time it was going to be different."

The divisions on display in the final hours of the special session trickled into other parts of the legislative agenda as well, leaving unsettled a tentative deal to distribute $841 million in federal COVID-19 aid to counties and towns across Minnesota. Also left undone: a billion-dollar-plus bonding package to finance public infrastructure projects throughout the state.

Party leaders set no timeline for resuming their work, though another extension of Walz's emergency powers in the middle of July could bring lawmakers back to St. Paul for yet another special session. Walz was noncommittal about whether he might call the Legislature back before then.

Despite increasingly urgent appeals for action from activists and DFL legislators, Republicans suggested that more time was needed to complete the work.

No deals, on police reform or otherwise

"We are weeks and weeks away from the possibility of doing something with criminal justice reform," Senate Majority Paul Gazelka, R-East Gull Lake, said before the Senate adjourned around 6 a.m. "Done doesn't mean we're stopping working," he told reporters late Friday.

Democrats assailed their Republican colleagues for giving up without an agreement on police accountability, an issue that had overtaken a weeklong special session called to review Walz's powers under the pandemic.

"It is unfortunate that the Senate decided that one week was all that we could muster in order to begin to address these issues, because quite frankly they are much bigger than a week," said House Majority Leader Ryan Winkler, DFL-Golden Valley.

Hundreds of protesters who gathered at the Capitol on Friday - the Juneteenth celebration of the end of slavery - demanded passage of the DFL's criminal justice package. It would add more officer training, boost community-led alternatives to policing, and raise the threshold for using deadly force from "apparent" to "imminent" threats to officers and others.

Republicans answered late Friday night with a package of reforms they said matched some of the DFL measures, including raising training standards and requiring officers to intervene if colleagues use excessive force. The two sides also appeared to inch closer to an agreement to change officers' arbitration rights, which many police executives say keep them from dismissing bad cops.

"If they're not interested in this, I don't think personally that they will ever be interested in something we can agree to," Gazelka said of a list of 11 criminal justice changes he said would be Republicans' "final offer."

The Senate's People of Color and Indigenous (POCI) Caucus, which had played a central role in the DFL's reform package, quickly rejected the slate of GOP plans.

"Nothing the Senate Republicans have offered will stop another Black person from being killed," the POCI Caucus said in a statement. "There is no middle ground and there will be no compromise until our Black brothers and sisters receive redemption."

As talks passed the midnight hour - accompanied by an eerie electrical outage in the Capitol - DFL leaders backed away from two key demands: voting rights for felons on probation, and shifting jurisdiction over cases of police deadly force from county attorneys to the state attorney general's office now led by civil rights activist and former congressman Keith Ellison.

However, they countered that GOP senators needed to add other pieces of their plan, including banning "warrior-style" training, allowing cities to impose residency requirements on their police officers, and creating a state community-led public safety office. As the impasse continued, lawmakers remained largely out of sight into the early hours of the morning.

Meanwhile, Gazelka said he thought they had an agreement on federal CARES Act funding that has been idle in state coffers, along with $58 million in additional spending. Democrats had been pushing for far more state spending. House Speaker Melissa Hortman, DFL-Brooklyn Park, said after midnight that they were "pretty darn close" on the federal aid deal.

No deals, on police reform or otherwise

But Republicans accused the DFL of reneging on a CARES Act deal. "I know that the governor was again involved in trying to defeat things for Minnesota. I know that, and that's very disappointing," Gazelka said as he called to adjourn without finishing the federal aid bill.

Some lawmakers held out hope for continued talks in the coming days and weeks. "I hope that this creates a pause for us to go back, reflect a little bit on the need to get the job done for the people of Minnesota," Winkler said.

But with the battle lines seemingly drawn ahead of the November elections, Republicans and Democrats pushed the political blame back and forth as they came up short of a compromise.

Sen. Jeff Hayden, who represents the Minneapolis district where George Floyd was killed, said he will tell his constituents that "there was no meaningful offer from the Senate majority. I'm going to tell them that it doesn't appear that they even care enough to read our proposals. ... We need to start telling the truth. Minnesotans need to know if folks care or not."

Similar debates have been playing out across the nation, with other cities and states taking up changes to their policing standards.

Minnesota's legislative discussions over the past week have extended beyond police reform. Activists and community members demanded lawmakers address racial inequities underlying police killings like Floyd's, and are seeking aid for businesses damaged in the unrest that followed his death.

Lawmakers also came up short of a deal on business aid.

Highlight: Jamie Grant broadened the center's programming beyond Broadway.

Body

Jamie Grant, the charismatic president and CEO of the Ordway Center for the Performing Arts, is stepping down after 4½ years at the helm of St. Paul's flagship arts venue.

A booster of Twin Cities restaurants, nightlife and the Minnesota Wild, he is leaving to take the reins at the McCallum Theatre in Palm Desert, Calif.

"The Coachella Valley/Palm Springs area is a place where I vacation every year and this opportunity was too good to pass up," said Grant, 59. "You don't get to plan when these things happen, but I think my kids will want to come visit in the middle of winter."

Ordway CFO Chris Sagstetter, who has been at the Ordway for 27 years, will serve as interim president and CEO while the board undertakes a national search for a replacement. That process is expected to take six to 12 months, said board chairman Bill Parker.

"We will establish a search committee, select a recruiting firm specializing in the performing arts, and ensure we have a robust, diverse pool of candidates," Parker said.

Grant leaves the Ordway at a time when Twin Cities arts organizations have been battered by the pandemic and unsettled by the civil unrest following the May 25 police killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis.

Nonprofit arts and culture groups rely on income earned at the box office for a significant portion of their budget. The mid-March shutdown of the performing arts sector has meant that they have zero earned income.

The Ordway, which has to postpone Sting's "The Last Ship," laid off 90% of its staff as a result. And like other arts outfits, the Ordway expects to post a deficit.

Ordway CEO leaving for theater job near Palm Springs, Calif.

But the Ordway already has announced a season that starts in December with Disney's "Beauty and the Beast."

"The Ordway is poised for the next great chapter," Grant said, "and I think this is a great opportunity for new leadership to imagine what will be different about the Ordway after the pandemic and after the death of George Floyd."

Grant came to the Ordway during a time of stability, after years of competition for the stage among the resident arts organizations that share the facility: the Minnesota Opera, the St. Paul Chamber Orchestra and the Schubert Club. Grant arrived a year after the Ordway opened its Tim Carl-designed, 1,100-seat concert hall to complement its 1,900-seat music theater where touring Broadway shows land.

During his tenure, Grant built up the number of "Ordway originals" - Broadway-caliber shows produced by the Ordway with Twin Cities and national talent. He also expanded the concert programming to include the likes of Ringo Starr, Gladys Knight and Alice Cooper. And he was able to snag some buzzy titles such as "Six," which sold well and drew a younger audience.

Grant's last day at the Ordway is Aug. 31. "When I was leaving Texas for the Ordway, people made fun of me," said Grant, who ran the Long Center for the Performing Arts in Austin. "They said, 'If you're not going for the weather or for the taxes, what are you going for?' I reminded them that Minnesota, in virtually every category, is one of the best places in the country to live. It's true, unless you're a person of color. That disparity was a surprise to me, but the state, like the country, is still battling that."

COVID-19 RACIAL DISPARITIES COME INTO SHARPER FOCUS - CORRECTION APPENDED

June 21, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

 Correction Appended

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 1373 wordsByline: CHRISTOPHER SNOWBECK; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: New analysis shows a wide gap in death rates.Body

A new analysis shows a wider gap in Minnesota between the rates at which white residents and those in racial and ethnic minority groups have suffered from COVID-19.

For more than a month, state data have shown that black, Asian and Hispanic residents run disproportionate risks related to COVID-19. Numbers released last week by the Minnesota Department of Health better illustrate the problem, state officials say, by adjusting for the age of those who have gotten sick.

The new analysis shows that black Minnesotans have the highest age-adjusted death rate among all racial and ethnic groups at 70 per 100,000 residents. The age-adjusted rate for whites is about 20 deaths per 100,000 people.

Beyond differences in death rates, the report found even larger gaps in the rate at which COVID-19 patients from different groups are being hospitalized or placed in intensive care.

"We know that we have disparities, and it's a real problem," Kris Ehresmann, the director of infectious disease at the Health Department, said Saturday. "But this helped us recognize that it was a greater problem than we had even been reporting."

The disparities have nothing to do with a different biology or disease process, Ehresmann said during a call with reporters last week. "It's the conditions in the community," said Health Commissioner Jan Malcolm.

The state numbers add to a series of reports showing how racial and ethnic minority groups have been hit hard by COVID-19.

COVID-19 racial disparities come into sharper focus - Correction Appended

Last week, the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention published a study looking at care at one large health care system in Atlanta and found that being black was among the factors that raised the chances of being hospitalized for COVID-19. It found that while blacks accounted for 79% of patients hospitalized with the virus, they accounted for just 45% of nonhospitalized patients.

"The independent association between black race and hospitalization in this investigation remained, even when the analysis controlled for other characteristics (including diagnosed underlying conditions)," researchers wrote. That suggests "underlying conditions alone might not account for the higher rate of hospitalization among black persons."

Earlier this month, the New England Journal of Medicine published a study of COVID-19 patients treated at a large health system in Louisiana and found that about 77% of those hospitalized with COVID-19 were black, whereas blacks made up only 31% of the health system's overall patient population.

Worse underlying problems

The medical journal posted a podcast discussion of the study, where Dr. Eric Rubin, the editor-in-chief, said the results suggest black patients were just as likely as others to get good care once they were in the hospital. The problem was that black patients arrived with much more serious health problems, Rubin said, which could represent unequal access to health care.

Higher risk for serious COVID-19 illness continues a theme where social factors ranging from employment status and residential segregation to economic inequality contribute to a number of health problems for African-Americans, said Dr. Michele Andrews, a senior investigator and deputy scientific director at the National Institute on Aging.

"Many African-Americans and other minorities occupy jobs that are classified as essential workers, that do not provide the privilege of working from home," Evans said during the podcast. She added: "Income inequality is a severe problem, and that drives people to decrease their ability to protect themselves from, in this case, the virus."

In Minn., 12 more die

In Minnesota, the Health Department reported Saturday that 12 more people have died of COVID-19, bringing the pandemic's statewide toll to 1,372 deaths.

Residents of long-term care and assisted-living facilities accounted for nine of the 12 newly announced deaths. The state reported its first death involving someone whose residence was described as homeless/sheltered - a category that includes those in shelters, supportive housing and encampments as well as those homeless without a shelter.

COVID-19 is a viral respiratory illness. Those at greatest risk include people 65 and older, residents of long-term care facilities and those with underlying medical conditions. The medical conditions range from lung disease, serious heart conditions and cancer to severe obesity, diabetes and failing kidneys.

Most patients with COVID-19 don't need to be hospitalized. The illness usually causes mild to moderate sickness, and some who are infected don't have symptoms.

The new Health Department report shows that white residents in Minnesota account for more COVID-19 cases, hospital stays and deaths, but their share is lower than their 83% share of the state's population.

To adjust for population, the Health Department calculated rates per 100,000 state residents.

By that basis in late May, whites were dying from COVID-19 at a rate of 13 per 100,000, Ehresmann said, whereas blacks were dying at a rate of 15 per 100,000 people. Whites tend to be older, though, so age adjustment lowered the rates for white residents and increased it for black residents.

"This age-adjusted method allows us to see the full impact of the disparities," Malcolm told reporters Thursday.

The adjustment for age also shows that Asians and Hispanics are being hospitalized for COVID-19 at a higher rate than state officials previously understood.

The new report says that Asians are hospitalized at an age-adjusted rate of 146 per 100,000 while the rate for Hispanics is 247 per 100,000; whites are hospitalized at a rate of 19 per 100,000 people. Asians and Hispanics wind up in ICU units at a higher age-adjusted rate, as well.

Health disparities complex

While social factors lead to health disparities, hospitals are working hard to make sure they aren't reinforced by the care they provide with COVID-19 patients, said Syl Jones, equity and inclusion director at Hennepin Healthcare. Jones works on a committee that helps make sure patients get fair access to advanced treatments.

Health disparities are complex because they're multi-factoral.

"It's really clear that people of color have many more co-morbidities to start with," Jones said. "All of this can be chalked up to systemic racism, in some ways. Genetics and lifestyle choices are also important factors, as well."

The net count for positive test results grew by 436 confirmed cases in the past day, bringing the total to 32,467 cases overall. With 16,815 tests completed, it was one of the state's largest days by testing volume thus far.

Recent downward trends in the number of hospitalized patients continued Saturday, with 324 in the hospital including 161 people in intensive care.

More than 3,700 people have been hospitalized in Minnesota since the state reported its first case in early March.

Numbers released Saturday show health care workers have accounted for 3,348 cases statewide. A total of 28,205 Minnesotans who were infected with the novel coronavirus no longer need to be in isolation, up from 27,709 people at Friday's data release.

Confirmed cases have been reported in 86 of the state's 87 counties, with no cases in Lake of the Woods County in far northern Minnesota.

The Health Department added to its list of congregate care facilities publicly identified with at least one COVID-19 case among residents or staff, upping the total by two to 317 facilities. State officials are releasing names only for facilities with at least 10 cases among residents.

A citywide public art project is ready to blossom in Roseville.

"Roseville in Bloom - 20 in 2020" will feature 20 huge rose statues that have been decorated, illustrated, embellished and otherwise transformed by Twin Cities artists placed throughout the city starting July 1.

Each statue is nearly 7 feet tall and weighs 658 pounds (rose, rose pot and base). The rose blossom is 100 inches in diameter. Artists involved in the project include "Project Runway" alum and fashion designer Christopher Straub and well-known artist Adam Turman.

It's like the Snoopy statues and "Peanuts on Parade" art that was part of summers in St. Paul in the early 2000s, with artist-embellished statues of Snoopy, Charlie Brown, Lucy and Woodstock.

The roses project, which has been in the works for 18 months, wilted a bit because of coronavirus shutdowns and was delayed for a month. But the coronavirus precautions are a good fit for "20 in 2020," said Julie Wearn, CEO of Visit Roseville, which is coordinating the project, with businesses sponsoring the statues.

"It's family-friendly, free, open-air, and allows for social distancing," Wearn said. "COVID forced us to move, but it's going to work out."

There's a map of statue locations - from the Roseville library and Central Park, to Rosedale shopping center, hotels and the John Rose Oval skating center. It will be available at various locations in Roseville and at rosevilleinbloom.com.

Statues will be in place July 1 through Oct. 31 and each will have a QR code on the base that can be downloaded for coupons at Roseville restaurants the businesses.

While working on their creations in early June in a building at the State Fairgrounds, some of the artists talked about their inspiration and designs:

Christopher Straub's theme is "Petals on the Runway." It will be at Rosedale. Fashion designer Straub's statue is covered with illustrations of fashions inspired by roses. (Plans for an accompanying fashion show had to be scrapped because of coronavirus restrictions.) Straub says his piece is just a slice of the message in the overall project. "The storytelling is so apparent in this group of designers, you want to see what's next."

Kristi Abbott's theme is "Paper Rose." It will be at the Hampton Inn. Collage artist Abbott is covering her rose with bits of paper. She has handmade and specialty paper on the rose, which is her first 3D piece. Abbott created a collage for the 2018 Minnesota State Fair commemorative poster. "The thing about working with paper is it's color, pattern and texture and how you can bring them together."

Wendy McCarty's theme is "Flower Power." It will be at TSE, 2027 Rice St. McCarty's art is usually more serious - portraits, still life and landscapes. This whimsical design is inspired by nonprofit TSE, which does workforce training. McCarty grew up in Roseville, where she says puppet shows in the park and a high school art teacher who helped her get into the Minneapolis College of Art and Design come into play in her rose. "Roseville is the reason I'm an artist," she says.

Kao Lee Thao's theme is "Hmong Story Cloth." It will be at the DoubleTree by Hilton. The designs on the statue tell the stories of first-generation Hmong people who came to Minnesota, Thao says. "It was inspired by our journey to America." (And in a link back to the "Peanuts on Parade" statue, Thao was part of a group of artists who created "Peanuts" character statues for St. Paul's sister city in Changsa, China. Thao created Lucy in Hmong dress. Changsa created a pavilion that has been installed in St. Paul's Phalen Park.)

Cora Hays' theme is "The Value of Education" and it will be at Kids in Need Foundation, 2719 Patton Road. Kids in Need collects and donates school supplies. Hays' design draws from her work as a biological illustrator and features books around the base (the titles on the spines are from friends' suggestions of books that were formative in their education). The petals are covered with math equations, galaxies, books, a nod to agriculture, and books that are important to Hays (such as "The Immortal Life of Henrietta Lacks"), and the stem is covered with images of students and teachers.

Daniela Bianchini's theme is "Blossoming Tesserae" at Rosewood Office Plaza, 1711 W. County Road B. Mosaic artist Bianchini's piece is covered with hand-cut glass. The pieces she had to use are smaller than her usual works, she said, because of the curves on the statue. She said she loves working with mosaic because it shimmers at a distance and the detail is revealed up close. Some of her other work in mosaic designs is on concrete garbage cans in downtown St. Paul.

Erin Ward's theme is "Bloom" at North American Banking Co., 2230 Albert St. Ward started working with mosaic about 10 years ago, she says. The dirt in the pot at the base of her rose will be mosaic created with pennies (the bank sent over a special shipment). Ward works mainly with animal and pet portraits in mosaic and says she works in St. Paul and remembers going to see all the Snoopy statues in the first "Peanuts on Parade."

Shakun Maheshwari's "Color & Culture" will be at McCarrons Lake, 1745 Rice St. Maheshwari said she wanted to represent "all the different type people and all the different colors that make (this neighborhood) beautiful." The colors she painted on the base are covered with intricate designs Maheshwari uses in her henna art.

Lydia Anderson's "What Brings You Joy?" will be at Bent Brewstillery, 1744 Terrace Dr. Anderson said her wildly colorful design was originally intended to draw children in a park setting, but any location can use "something happy." Color, clouds and stars cover the rose. "It couldn't be any more busy," said Anderson, who has worked on murals around the Twin Cities and on theater sets. She will be at Boston University this fall studying scenic painting.

It will be at Central Park, 2540 N. Lexington Ave. Turman was trained as a graphic artist, so he says he loves to work with direction. He got his direction from visits to Roseville's Central Park, which covers 225 acres. The park has trails, picnic shelters, playground equipment and entertainment events and there are snippets of the park's attractions covering Turman's colorful work. Look for the park's unique "rocket ship" slide and wildlife. In between work on the rose, Turman created the George Floyd mural that's inspired by the 1989 Spike Lee movie "Do the Right Thing" on the plywood covering the Uptown Theatre in Minneapolis following riots in that neighborhood.

What: "Roseville in Bloom - 20 in 2020," a public art display of artist-designed rose statues. The statues were built by TivoliToo, the Roseville company that created the "Peanuts" characters for the "Peanuts on Parade" in St. Paul in the early 2000s

When: July 1 through Oct. 31

Where: Locations throughout Roseville. You can find a map at rosevilleinbloom.com

Events: A series of events are planned throughout the summer, including a bee-friendly family event, coloring contest at the library and school donation drive.

Eat, drink and more: Grand Ole Creamery will create a limited-edition flavor for Roseville in Bloom that will be sold at its retail shops, including their location at Potluck in Rosedale Center, and Bent Brewstillery will create specialty Roseville in Bloom-themed beverages for October as well as providing their house-made sanitizer for all rose locations.

Contest: There will also be an Instagram photo contest in which people can post their rose images using #rosevilleinbloom.

About the project: Visit Roseville CEO Julie Wearn said the statues fit into the city's "Perfectly Positioned" message, which touts its proximity to Minneapolis and St. Paul. Visit Roseville is funded by local hotel lodging taxes.

Minneapolis police officers responding to separate shootings Friday night were met with angry crowds that impeded them from doing their job, a department spokesman said Saturday.

Around 11:25 p.m. in the 3800 block of Chicago Avenue - near the site where George Floyd was killed by police May 25 - officers responded to a reported shooting. A man had shot himself, and bystanders were administering CPR, according to police.

Officers tried to provide aid upon their arrival but encountered "hostile" crowds that impeded them, police spokesman John Elder said. The man was taken to HCMC, where he died. Elder said it is not clear if the shooting was a suicide or an accident. Police are investigating.

About the same time, officers responded to a separate double shooting at S. 28th Avenue and E. 54th Street. Officers found two adults who had suffered noncritical gunshot wounds.

A man was arrested, a gun was recovered and the two victims were taken to HCMC, police say.

The scene became "chaotic," Elder said, with onlookers refusing commands to stay back. Police could "barely even get an investigation started" and additional officers had to be called in, he said.

Elder said officers are increasingly facing resistance from crowds when arriving at scenes. People are "grabbing ahold of officers and their equipment" and stepping in front of paramedics, he said. Earlier this week, officers were pelted with rocks and bottles as they tried to administer Narcan to someone who had overdosed and was without a pulse, Elder said.

"We continue to see people fail to obey lawful orders to stand back, to stay back while officers are trying to do their job. Having projectiles thrown at officers is not uncommon," Elder said.

FOND MEMORIES OF 'THE UNCLES'

In the middle of the night, as the roaring fire consumed his business, all Don Blyly could do was go home. He couldn't bear to watch it burn. "There goes 46 years of work," he thought.

Uncle Hugo's Science Fiction Bookstore and its twin brother, Uncle Edgar's Mystery Bookstore, were torched early in the morning of May 30, five days after a white Minneapolis police officer knelt on the neck of a black man named George Floyd, who died. The ensuing protests were large, and, for two nights, destructive. Buildings were looted and burned.

Uncle Hugo's, the oldest science fiction bookstore in the country, was reduced to a pile of bricks.

Blyly started the store in 1974 when he was a law student at the University of Minnesota. "I was bored out of my mind with constitutional law and I needed something to keep me sane," he said last week.

Maybe a bookstore? Yes, a bookstore. From idea to execution took two weeks. He found a storefront on 4th Avenue S. that he could rent for $50 a month. Gopher News had a warehouse of books in Minneapolis, where he chose his favorite genre - science fiction and fantasy. They threw in the racks for free.

Blyly named his store after Hugo Gernsback, who started the first science fiction magazine in 1926.

"By the time I finished law school, it was obvious I wouldn't be happy as an attorney, but I did love running a bookstore," he said.

A few years later, he opened a mystery bookstore nearby and named that one for Edgar Allan Poe.

In 1984, both stores moved to 2864 Chicago Av. S. Customers entered the 1915 building that housed Uncle Hugo's and walked through an archway to a separate, newer space that housed Uncle Edgar's.

Authors held readings there, and customers made pilgrimages. With their stuffed shelves, piles stacked on the floor and knowledgeable staff, the Uncles weren't just genre bookstores. They were book lovers' bookstores.

Reopening waits for the insurance companies. "I don't have enough numbers yet to make any decision," Blyly said. "I'm 69 years old and I am developing arthritis in my hands. If I were younger, I would definitely want to rebuild. But I'm not sure how many more years I have available to me."

For now, Blyly is switching to online commerce - as soon as he replaces his incinerated computer. He has bookstore T-shirts and sweatshirts to sell. He also plans to sell books from his own collection, as well as autographed books that authors are donating.

There is a GoFundMe campaign to help him pay off debt and rehire a part-time worker. Money, and memories, are coming in from around the Cities, the country and the world.

Dana O'Gorman, St. Paul Park: In the late '90s, I picked up an unknown staff-recommended book called "Game of Thrones." I devoured it, and then I saw that the author was coming for a book signing. There were not a ton of people at the signing for the relatively unknown author, and he (George RR Martin) was happy to sign my book and chat, as well as hint at where the series would wander. It's definitely my favorite memory.

Eleanor Rosenthal, Minneapolis: I think the first book I purchased from there was Emma Bull's "War for the Oaks," a decade ago. I had this strange subplot in Loring Park and this soul-crushing job downtown, but at least I could walk home, pass Peavey Plaza, turn down Oak Grove Street, and go into my apartment and read my book.

In "War for the Oaks," the main character walks home, has a magical experience in Peavey Plaza, turns down Oak Grove Street to go to her apartment. ...

There were honestly a few moments there where I thought I'd somehow managed to step into a portal fantasy, and Uncle Hugo's definitely seemed like it could make that happen.

Gina Munter, Little Canada: I was in Uncle Edgar's, the mystery store, and was looking for a particular series but couldn't remember the author's name. I told the bookseller it was a series set in a bookstore and the author's name was two female first names. He said, "Oh, you must be looking for Alice Kimberly." Yep, that was it. Amazing!

Beth Kent, London, UK: I was a grad student at the U when I discovered Uncle Hugo's. It was a treasure trove of used sci-fi and fantasy books, which fed my habit quite nicely while still allowing me to buy food.

One of my favorite memories is when our household decided to categorize our books by putting colored sticky dots on the spines. We had an eventual clear-out and sold a few bags of books back to the Uncles, and for months (years) after I would see those sticky dots on books there and occasionally buy them back.

Grace Thomas, Denver: Uncle Hugo's was an important place to me in high school and college. Without it, I don't think I would be a professional writer today. Reading through decades-old sci-fi anthologies, magazines and paperbacks from Uncle Hugo's carried me through a very difficult time in my life, when I was dealing with the onset of my bipolar disorder, struggling to figure out how to live with it. Uncle Hugo's was a calming place, a sanctuary where I could clear my head. I hope it is again one day.

Sofie Netteberg, Little Canada: For a class project I needed to read Octavia Butler's "Parable of the Sower" and realized it right before businesses shut down. My parents recommended Uncle Hugo's. The staff member I spoke to was willing to talk through the different editions in stock, figure out payment over the phone, and hand deliver the book to me outside the store with five bookmarks (that I'm holding on to as "collector's items").

David Gustafson, Hopkins: 1981, my first adult job, front desk clerk at the Radisson South Hotel, working for minimum wage. I always went down to Uncle Hugo's Science Fiction Bookstore - their original location on 4th Av. - and bought one book. Gregg Press had printed a number of Fritz Leiber's books in library-quality hardcover editions, and Hugo's had them all. So each payday, I'd add one more to my tiny shelf of science fiction hardcovers. Got 'em all. And to this day, those 15 books are the cornerstone of my Fritz Leiber library.

Reuben Herfindahl, River Falls, Wis: When I was growing up in the 1980s my favorite show was "Doctor Who." Before every show they would thank the sponsors, and Uncle Hugo's was always one of them. My local bookstore carried maybe 15 sci-fi books in total, so the thought of a bookstore that carried only sci-fi was beyond my wildest dreams.

When I moved to the Cities to go to college in 1993, the first place I went was Uncle Hugo's. It exceeded my wildest expectations. I've been a regular ever since. Still my favorite bookstore on the planet.

Chuck Welch, Sherbrooke, Quebec: I didn't live in the Cities, but would often travel from La Crosse, Wis. No matter if I was there for a game or just to visit, I made time for a visit to Hugo's. I could not walk in the door for a quick minute and I could not walk out with just one book. Just before I moved to Canada a couple of years ago, my gift to myself was a trip to the Cities for one last bookstore visit. I hope that I can someday return and find Uncle Hugo's restored and thriving.

David Rowe, San Jose, Calif.: When I moved to the U in the late 80s, I found Uncle Hugo's / Uncle Edgar's. I would bike over from campus to get my fix of science fiction books. Entering the store crammed full of books and smelling of old books was a haven from the rush of college. Scott Imes and Don would ask what I had read lately that was good and were always ready with a recommendation. Even though I've moved away from the Cities, I visit the Uncles every time I am in town and they are still my go-to for ordering books.

Elaine K. Murray, Minneapolis: It was my mother's bookstore. All the years she worked at Sears across the street she could go there and get her beloved vintage mysteries at a price she could afford. After she retired I would drive her there and buy her books for a Christmas or birthday present.

She has been gone more than five years, but I could still go there, find books from some of her favorite authors, and feel like she was still near me.

Now that's gone forever and I can't seem to stop crying.

Tensions were rising in a late-night debate in the Minnesota Senate last week when Sen. Patricia Torres Ray turned to each member of the People of Color and Indigenous Caucus (aka "POCI") and asked if they'd been consulted on a pending GOP police reform measure.

When each one replied no, the Democrat from Minneapolis turned to the Republican leader of the chamber, Sen. Paul Gazelka: Do "our opinions and the work that we do here, with you, actually matter to you?"

Floyd's death, and the ensuing calls to tackle racial inequities in policing, brought to the surface the Legislature's own institutional challenges with diversity in representation. While the number of people from communities of color serving in the Legislature has grown over the years - to 21 out of 201 members - it's still not representative of the state as a whole. People of color make up 20% of Minnesota's population statewide but only 10% of the Legislature.

Gazelka, who hails from rural East Gull Lake in north-central Minnesota, told Torres Ray he had consulted directly with people from communities of color in her district and others in the "inner city" of Minneapolis and St. Paul. Both cities faced extensive damage from rioting after Floyd's death.

"We went to talk to a dozen or so people from the black community to ask them directly, and I was surprised that they said they hadn't really talked much to their own senators," he said, returning the jibe.

Torres Ray, the first Latina woman to serve in the Senate, fired back: "That is [like] if I said: 'If something happens in rural Minnesota, I will selectively go to some places in rural Minnesota and ask people. I won't consult with the rural members here, because why would I?' "

HOT DISH POLITICS

Twitter lit up with criticism of Gazelka's repeated allusion to neighborhoods in Minneapolis and St. Paul as "inner city," a political dog whistle often used by President Donald Trump. Adding to the friction, Rep. Mohamud Noor, DFL-Minneapolis, one of two Somali-American legislators in the chamber, took offense that members of a House committee degraded the Twin Cities by suggesting that they start an online fundraiser to repair damages caused by riots.

But at the center of the frustration was the feeling within the POCI caucus that they weren't being heard by their mostly white colleagues.

"Don't do things to us unless you talk to us," pleaded Sen. Jeff Hayden, DFL-Minneapolis, who is black. "That's all that we're asking."

On Friday, as DFL and GOP leaders debated deals on policing reforms inside the chambers of a secured Capitol complex, a crowd gathered on the front lawn to commemorate Juneteenth and the end of slavery in the United States.

They had a chant: "Get rid of the worms." White old Republican men.

They don't have enough masks. They don't have enough gowns. They don't have enough help.

But at Open Cities Health Center, they use what they have to help as many as they can.

On a bright Friday morning, Dr. Vanessa Ng stood outside the Midtown St. Paul clinic, watching cars line up on Dunlap Street for drive-up COVID-19 testing.

"It's never-ending," she said, her smile hidden behind a mask and face shield. "But I never have to ask myself why I do this."

Open Cities' network of nonprofit health clinics serves some of the poorest and most vulnerable people in the Twin Cities in the middle of a pandemic, in the middle of an economic collapse, in the middle of neighborhoods that were on fire a few weeks ago. They do it on shoestring budgets, with 15-year-old computers and scavenged personal protective equipment.

"Thank you." Nearly everyone in line takes the time to say thank you to Ng and the other volunteers sweltering in the June heat under stifling layers of protective gear. "Thank you. Thank you so much."

Months ago, when they first started testing, a third or more of the people who came to Open Cities with symptoms tested positive for coronavirus. Now the state is recommending that anyone who's been to a vigil, mass gathering or crowded event during the George Floyd protests should get tested as a precaution.

Most of the people in line will be fine. Just 1% of the first 1,300 protesters tested positive.

That doesn't change the need for masks and gear to protect the people swabbing all those throats and noses.

Every hospital, clinic and doctor's office in the country faced shortages as America's medical supply chain buckled under pandemic demand.

Months into the crisis, each piece of personal protective equipment that comes to Open Cities is a small victory.

Long lines, little gear: Clinics put to the test

Doctors and nurses here have haunted local hardware stores, trying to coax away a few extra dust masks or painter coveralls.

The mask Ng wore came from her cousins in Macau, who scoured local pharmacies for Chinese-made masks and shipped them in bulk care packages to St. Paul.

Open Cities medical director Dr. Cynthia Woods wore a face shield made by the Chippewa Middle School robotics club in North Oaks. The students made PPE on 3-D printers in the school lab and donated 100 of them to Open Cities.

Masks gets reused. Gowns get sprayed down with bleach or alcohol and hung up to dry for another day.

There's a stash of actual N95 masks at the clinic, locked away like treasure. They're saving them for the dental clinic when it reopens from its coronavirus hiatus.

The pandemic forced the clinic to scale back its services, lay off staff and turn to telemedicine. Few services will be riskier than dentistry, which puts dentists, technicians and patients face-to-face in an aerosolized cloud kicked up by the drill.

If they ration the N95 masks just for the dental clinic, Open Cities will need about 2,300 of them to make it through December. At last count, they had 101.

"It's kind of ridiculous we're still scrounging" for basic medical necessities months into the pandemic, Ng said.

But 101 of the good masks are better than none, and Open Cities is used to making the best from less.

The clinic opened in a church basement in 1967 with a volunteer staff determined to offer health care and health education to the Rondo neighborhood in St. Paul. "Of all the forms of inequality," the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. once said, "injustice in health care is the most shocking and inhumane."

They serve the uninsured and underinsured, immigrants and impoverished neighborhoods. They almost had to close their doors this year until a combination of grants, layoffs and steep budget cuts kept the lights on.

So if you have any spare N95 masks, Open Cities could really use them. If you have a source for protective gowns, or face shields, or hand sanitizer, or disinfectant wipes, let them know.

If you have a few hours a week, they could really use some volunteers. Demand for COVID testing was so high that Friday, Open Cities had an orthopedic surgeon doing intake paperwork, an optometrist answering the phones and a psychologist bagging samples.

Our children need to talk and learn about scary stuff going on in our world today, even if the conversation is difficult for adults, whether it's the death of a child or the Earth without humans.

That's the message from award-winning Minnesota writers Kao Kalia Yang and John Coy, who will talk about their new picture books in a virtual conversation this week.

Yang, one of the country's first published Hmong-American writers, honors a Hmong family who lost a child in "The Shared Room." Coy celebrates the 50th anniversary of Earth Day in "If We Were Gone: Imagining the World Without People," a story of good things that will happen to the Earth if humans no longer inhabit it.

"We need authors willing to write hard books with compassion," says Yang, born in a refugee camp in Thailand. She lives on the East Side of St. Paul with her husband, Aaron Hokanson, their 6-year-old daughter and their 4-year-old twin boys.

"I want to prepare my children for all of life, how to sit with sadness as well as happiness and joy," Yang says.

John Coy is struck by how many children are being taken to the Minneapolis memorial for George Floyd, whose death sparked protests around the world.

"Watching kids walk down that street with its powerful list of names of those killed by police, I think parents are having that conversation with their kids," he says. "We all know that kids are able to understand things in different ways than adults assume and it happens at a younger age than some adults wish. Seeing kids go through this COVID crisis with their lives turned upside down, no way we should ever say the best thing is not to talk about that. That makes no sense. The kids are there already."

Kalia Yang's "The Shared Room" (University of Minnesota Press), illustrated with cultural authenticity by Hmong American artist Xee Reiter, tells of how a family comes to terms with the death of a daughter/sister in the depths of winter "in a little house on St. Paul's east side." Only warmth of the fire in the fireplace draws them together in their sorrow. When the parents ask the girl's brother if he wants to move into his sister's room, he cries for the first time, realizing she is never coming back. But as the boy goes to sleep in the bedroom he's calmed by the quiet and comforted by knowing he sees what his sister saw.

Yang wrote "The Shared Room" for the family of Ghia Nah, who was 6 when she drowned three years ago in the Lake Elmo swimming pond.

"I met that little girl many times. She came to my readings from the beginning," Yang recalls. "One evening after a reading at Metro State we took a photo together. She said: 'When I grow up I want to be a writer. Not just any writer, but one like you.' That stayed in my heart. I tried to tell her story tenderly and well so she lives on. All children need to learn to sit comfortably in a place that's hard and dark and survive together. Sometimes the warm fire (that drew the fictional family together) has to be enough."

Yang, newly appointed Edelstein-Keller writer-in-residence at the University of Minnesota, also writes memoir for adults, including "The Song Poet," currently being turned into an opera, and "The Latehomecomer," which was widely praised. Her previous picture book "A Map Into the World" won a 2020 Minnesota Book Award.

Yang acknowledges that "The Shared Room" has elicited powerful responses. "Some love it and others think it's way too sad and depressing," she said calmly. "At this point in my career everybody has a different aesthetic about my work. This book goes beyond aesthetics to the mental health approach to feelings of sadness and loss in our society. We live in a grief-averse society. All the more reason for this book to enter into the world."

Coy, who considers Yang "a treasure" and an "extraordinary writer, thinker and speaker," understands her book because he was a year old when his 2-month-old sister died.

"At that time people believed it was best not to talk to kids. Nobody talked with me about what happened," he recalled. "The absence of talking didn't make it easier, or go away. I admire Kalia for writing a book that provides an opportunity for parents to talk with kids who have gone through something difficult. She is so willing to lead people to discuss these things in a kind of welcoming, inviting way. That's exactly what we need more of in picture books."

When Yang was asked by the Loft to do a webinar about writing for children for hard times, she invited Coy to join her because she admires his work.

Coy lives in Minneapolis with his wife, Fiona McCrae, publisher/director of Minneapolis-based Graywolf Press. A Minnesota Book Award-winner, he writes books for children and young adults, including picture books such as "Two Old Potatoes and Me" and sports-oriented stories with basketball themes like "Hoop Genius."

Interest in the environment began early for Coy. When he was 11 he attended events celebrating the first Earth Day in 1970 and he was strongly affected by Alan Weisman's 2007 book "The World Without Us."

Minnesota writers trust kids to take on difficult topics in new picture books

In "If We Were Gone" (Millbrooke Press) Coy writes in a nonthreatening way about how things would change if humans disappeared: "Pipes would burst/and pavement buckle...The air would become cleaner/with each rainfall..." New York-based illustrator Natalie Capanelli's colorful illustrations show a world at peace where everything thrives without people.

The book was born when Coy was talking with his friend, poet Juliet Patterson, about climate change and what was going to happen to the world. Coy's thought: "Well, the world is going to be here. It's us we need to be worrying about."

When Coy was working on his book he couldn't have known how his vision would be playing out now as people stay indoors because of the virus. News stories tell of smog-free skies around the world. Creatures are swimming in Venice's newly clear canal waters. Lions lounge on quiet roads in Africa, and bears are having a ball in America's national parks.

"It's extraordinary how quickly things can change," Coy marvels. "It's such a reminder of how, when we change our behavior, the Earth responds quickly. If anybody needed evidence, we are getting it regularly right now."

Coy's book has met some of the same criticisms as Yang's in terms of age appropriateness. Some wonder whether kids will be able to handle the idea of humans vanishing.

"I never had a single kid raise that point," says Coy, who spends a lot of time visiting classrooms. "In some ways kids are more able to handle a big idea than adults, who get too specific, asking questions like, 'How would that happen?' To kids it's the idea. Kids have a strong sense of fairness. They don't have such a strong belief that humans are superior to everything else. That openness allows them to consider the possibility of what would happen."

Coy sees our unpredictable times as an opportunity for humans to reset, changing our habits because climate changes are happening now.

"There is something about the idea of exploring the possibility we might not be here that can help us look differently at how we are here, what we do and where we go," he says. "There is no guarantee we are going to stay here doing what we want to do. If you look at what percent of species has gone extinct (since life first appeared on Earth) it's 99.9. What makes us assume we are in that one-tenth of 1 percent that will survive?"

Coy and Yang have written very different books, but they are united in their belief that children's picture books can illuminate hard times with hope.

WHAT: Kao Kalia Yang and John Coy discuss Writing the Hard Books for Hard Times, based on their new children's picture books.

WHEN: 2 p.m. Thursday, June 25, presented by the Loft Literary Center.

ADMISSION/REGISTRATION: Meeting link at loft.org/events/upcoming-events. Suggested $10 admission, but pay what you can or free.

When Xee Reiter got a call from Kalia Yang inviting her to illustrate "The Shared Room," Reiter was amazed at this chance to make her debut in children's books.

Minnesota writers trust kids to take on difficult topics in new picture books

"I can't believe it's been two years since the day Kalia reached out to me," Reiter says. "As an artist you start to lose hope. I thought, 'is this for real?' "

Kalia didn't know of any Hmong illustrators of literary children's books, and she was able to do something about that by reaching out to Reiter. "My personal mission is to open options to facilitate new voices," she says. "I didn't want to be the only Hmong in children's literature. It would be lonely."

Reiter, who grew up in North Carolina, is a perfect partner for Yang. Both women had refugee parents, live on the East Side of St. Paul, and have three children. Reiter and her husband, Nate, are parents of 14- and 13-year-old daughters and a 9-year-old son.

"I was a very quiet kid," Reiter recalls. "I didn't know about (American) society, so I started to discover I could get my voice out and connect by drawing pictures. I make art to tell stories."

After talking about "The Shared Room" in detail, Yang and the editors at University of Minnesota Press gave Reiter complete freedom to bring the Hmong family in Yang's story to life and put them in an authentic setting.

"I didn't go to school for art. I didn't know where to begin and I was a bit nervous," Reiter says of accepting Yang's invitation. "I started by looking at the heart of the book. It's crucial for the artist to pay respects to what's in the pages."

Reiter admits there were times when she had to stop work on the illustrations for a while.

"It was a very personal and lonely journey to be surrounded by my family while I was working on the book sitting in my dining room where there is the most light," she recalls. "I had to step away from it because I got too emotional. It's easy to get lost when you start to empathize with the subject you are illustrating, when you have to fit in their shoes. I have not lost anyone but I know how I would feel if something happened to my kids. I wouldn't know how to deal with it."

It was also important to Reiter that her illustrations "tell a universal story while being true to experience as a Hmong American. I did that with details specifically relatable to Hmong families."

That's why she included pictures of a little stool, an important element in Hmong homes, as well as mismatched furniture and sheets, and a fly swatter hanging on the living room wall.

Now that "The Shared Room" is published, Reiter has received book deal offers from two independent publishers. She's also working on a graphic novel about her grandmother, who was a shaman.

LOST MINNEAPOLIS

I am heartbroken for the Minneapolis we knew in 1959, when we moved there for my husband to join the faculty at the University of Minnesota. In the early 1960s, the state was at the forefront of the civil-rights movement, led by DFL U.S. Sens. Hubert Humphrey and Eugene McCarthy and progressive city and state leaders. My husband, James Lowell Gibbs Jr., one of the first African-Americans appointed to the U faculty, served on the Minneapolis Fair Employment Practice Commission and the State Commission Against Discrimination when there were few complaints of police brutality and blacks were making gains in employment and housing.

Since we moved to California in 1966, the waves of immigrants and refugees (Hmong, Somalis, Latinos) who were first welcomed to the city apparently were never really integrated, perhaps because of their foreign cultures, different languages and religious practices. Social problems surfaced, tensions escalated, and attitudes changed toward these newcomers.

However, we were shocked by the brutal death of George Floyd in the custody of four police officers. It is difficult for me to cope with the betrayal of the progressive legacy of the political leaders of the 1960s who made Minneapolis a model city of tolerance and civility. Whatever happened to Minnesota Nice?

Jewelle Taylor Gibbs, Oakland, Calif.

'HOLY LAND' BRAND

Those were some wholesale responses to controversy

The hasty actions by the Seward Coop, Midtown Global Market and Costco to immediately discontinue selling Holy Land products after seeing social media posted by an employee appear to be a knee-jerk reaction instead of a decision ("Holy Land deli loses business over racist posts," June 6). Without thoughtful consideration and deliberation, these businesses responded like the mobs that exploded on Lake Street two weeks ago. Yes, the employee in question was the daughter of the owner, but she was fired from her position, as was the correct action.

READERS WRITE The progress of the '60s betrayed

Perhaps we should review every social posting of every employee who works at the co-ops and Costco. If we found an employee who tweeted racial insults, should these business immediately be closed? Should we stop shopping there entirely? Or should we rightly expect this employee will be fired? Do we punish the business, the rest of its employees and its suppliers because of one person who works there?

Do we perpetuate a different type of intolerance from our glass houses?

POLICE APPRECIATION

If officers don't feel they have it, they should ask if they've earned it

I read with great interest "Citing lack of support, officers quitting MPD" (June 14). The paragraph that caught my attention was the next to last, which stated that "some officers spoke of feeling underappreciated, and being asked to answer for the actions of one of their colleagues."

I doubt anyone is asking them to answer for the actions of their colleagues. Perhaps they are asking for Minneapolis police officers to stop their union from defending their colleagues' criminal behavior.

Based on my demographics: white, upper-middle-class, over 70 years old, most would expect me to be a strong supporter of the police, and I am. I donate money every year to support the Edina PD. My department has earned the trust and support of its community. Those Minneapolis officers should focus on building that same relationship of trust and support with the city they serve.

Daniel A. Morgan, Edina

POLICE KILLINGS

Omitted in article's counting: Those that are justified

The June 14 article "Despite promised reforms cops kill nearly 1,000 a year" says that experts are "confounded" that the number of people killed by police doesn't vary much year-to-year. One possible explanation is that most of the killings are justified. Training police in de-escalation tactics can help in certain situations, but, if someone is armed and endangering someone else's life, the use of force is justified. That is the case with most of the people killed by police.

The story doesn't bother to mention that only 55 of the 1,003 people killed by police in 2019 were unarmed! That information is readily available on the Washington Post's website on police killings. I cannot understand why an article written by Washington Post reporters would fail to mention this critical piece of information.

The article also says that black people have been shot and killed by police at disproportionate rates. But the real issue is not whether the rates of blacks being killed by police are disproportionate to their proportion of the population, it is whether a significant number of blacks are unjustifiably killed by police. The article provides no information on that; however, since only 55 out of 1,003 people killed by police in 2019 were unarmed, and some of those unarmed people may still have been endangering people's lives, unjustified killings by police would appear relatively uncommon, contrary to what you read in the news.

Reporters need to dig deeper and find out how many potentially unjustified killings by police happen each year, then find out whether it is more common for blacks to be killed by police without justification.

James Brandt, New Brighton

POLICE RECRUITMENT

If you think former MPs, two-year degrees are the problem, show it

The June 14 letters included one by a Woodbury resident who formerly lived in Minneapolis. From his safe suburb, he thinks he has the answers to problems with the MPD, but offers no concrete data in his argument.

In his second of three points, he implies that former military police are "bad" guys, and people with two-year degrees in criminal justice are unsuitable. I am a former military police officer, patrol supervisor and desk sergeant/squad leader. But, I do have a four-year degree in English, a real plus to this letter writer. I keep in touch with my former MP Army buddies, some who are African-American, some who are Puerto Rican. None of us are "bad," bigoted people. I resent the implication that former MPs have become "problem cops."

This letter writer not once suggests that applicants should be required to take a test similar to a Strong-Campbell Interest Inventory. I took the test at the University of Minnesota, and results showed my strongest interest/likelihood of success was in science and medicine. Policing was close to the bottom. Based on the test, I ruled out law enforcement, though I enjoyed serving as an MP in the Army. So, my question to this letter writer would be: How many Minneapolis police officers are former MPs and how many have only a two-year degree? Data please!

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 2CLength: 1120 wordsByline: SID HARTMAN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Gophers looking for more Morgan magic this seasonBody

It has been a while since the most exciting athlete in the state was the quarterback of the Gophers, but that is the case with Tanner Morgan getting ready for his junior campaign coming off an 11-2 record in 2019 and one of the best seasons for a signal caller in school history.

If the Gophers are going to find some way to top one of their best seasons in recent memory, and reach the Big Ten Championship Game for the first time in program history, Morgan will have to be their leader on offense.

At the end of last season, Pro Football Focus named Morgan the seventh-best QB in all of college football - trailing Justin Herbert (Oregon), Tua Tagovailoa and Mac Jones (Alabama), Jalen Hurts (Oklahoma), Justin Fields (Ohio State), Trevor Lawrence (Clemson) and Joe Burrow (Louisiana State).

Burrow was the No. 1 overall selection in the 2020 NFL draft and Lawrence figures to go No. 1 overall in 2021 assuming his stock doesn't take a big hit this season.

And that ranking might have been low for Morgan because at the end of the season he had the No. 4 passing efficiency ranking in the nation, behind only Burrow, Hurts and Fields - three of the four starting QBs in the College Football Playoff.

"It didn't matter the situation, didn't matter the throw type," Pro Football Focus wrote. "Morgan made nearly every throw look easy and took advantage of his extremely talented receivers on the outside as well as anyone else did in 2019."

Incredibly Morgan set single-season school records for passing yards (3,253), touchdown passes (30), completion percentage (66%) and efficiency (178.7).

More important than all of those numbers, though, is that Morgan is 15-4 as a starter.

Experience is huge

SUNDAYS WITH SID

The Gophers quarterback will be working with new offensive coordinator and quarterbacks coach Mike Sanford Jr., who joined the program from Utah State in the offseason.

One big benefit for Morgan and Sanford is that the offense returns nine of 11 starters from a club that ranked No. 4 in the Big Ten in both scoring offense and total offense.

Morgan knows having that many starters back can make a huge difference this season.

"The experience is huge, and our offensive unit and our team has played a lot of football at a high level," Morgan said. "It's very fortunate that that is something that we have and I'm blessed that I have been able to play a decent amount of football. It definitely helps. But again, there's always ways that we can get better.

"So just because we have played football for a while or have the experience doesn't mean we can get complacent. But it definitely helps, it definitely helps the developmental process. Again, we have to continue to strive for perfection knowing we're not going to get there, but ways we can get better, looking forward and not backward."

Mentally prepared

This past week, the NCAA outlined rules for having college football teams start summer activities in July and full practices in August, and almost the entire Gophers squad is back on campus with voluntary workouts getting underway.

Morgan said that one of the benefits to the offseason was that while the team couldn't be together, the coaching staff did a lot of film room work on both the current roster and the Gophers' upcoming opponents.

"I think the first part for me is just continuing to strive for mastery of our offense and mastery of defensive recognition and things like that. And Coach Sanford has done a great job of giving us the tools," Morgan said. "The next step would be to potentially get into game-plan, break down things for our opponents this upcoming fall, as the coaches are way ahead of schedule breaking down our 2020 opponents at the beginning of the season. That is just phenomenal."

Ready to lead

Morgan said he spent a lot of the offseason focused on being a team leader.

"Coach [P.J.] Fleck has done a great job of helping us as leaders be able to apply our culture to our leadership," Morgan said. "He has done a phenomenal job of sending us team meetings in the morning. Those are for optional view, and those are just phenomenal and very inspiring with what we're going through right now. It really helps instill our cultural mind-set, as well."

Despite all the difficulties of dealing with the pandemic, the Gophers football team has been brought closer together this spring after the death of George Floyd, a movement that brought a lot of strong statements and actions from players and coaches alike.

This past week, Fleck and H-back Seth Green became two of the Gophers' 13 representatives on the Big Ten Conference Anti-Hate and Anti-Racism Coalition put together by Commissioner Kevin Warren.

JOTTINGS

· There is no better promoter of the game of golf than Hollis Cavner, the executive director of the 3M Open, so you have to be thrilled that the state of Minnesota and the PGA Tour came together to make sure the event will be held at TPC Twin Cities July 23-26. You can bet Cavner will put on an excellent show, even if it's only for television audiences.

· While the NBA is set to resume in July, Spain's top basketball league started this past week. Former Timberwolves forward Anthony Randolph is playing for Real Madrid and scored 11 points in his first game back. Bojan Dubljevic, a 2013 Wolves draft pick whose NBA rights were traded to Portland last year as part of the Jake Layman deal, is playing for Valencia.

· The Gophers and Richard Pitino getting a commitment from Austin's Both Gach to transfer from Utah was huge, and now the next step is getting Gach eligible to play this fall, because the Big Ten is looking like the toughest conference in the country. ESPN ran a preseason ranking that had Iowa fifth, Wisconsin sixth, Michigan State eighth, Ohio State 20th, Rutgers 22nd and Indiana and Michigan just outside of the Top 25.

· The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel reported that Peter Hedstrom, the father of Wisconsin basketball player Joe Hedstrom of Hopkins, has been recovering from a serious bicycling accident that nearly killed him. Peter, who played basketball at St. Olaf, has returned to work part-time from home.

· The Vikings have a family connection this offseason as offensive lineman Jake Lacina, who played at Cretin-Derham Hall and Augustana, signed as a rookie free agent. Jake's father is Corbin Lacina, a Vikings offensive lineman from 1999 to 2002.

· The Twins' $134 million spent on free agency this past offseason ranked seventh in the major leagues behind the Yankees, Nationals, Angels, White Sox, Reds and Phillies.

TRUMP COMEBACK RALLY FEATURES EMPTY SEATS, STAFF INFECTIONS

TULSA, Okla. (AP) - President Donald Trump launched his comeback rally Saturday by defining the upcoming election as a stark choice between national heritage and left-wing radicalism. But his intended show of political force amid a pandemic featured thousands of empty seats and new coronavirus cases on his own campaign staff.

Trump ignored health warnings to hold his first rally in 110 days - one of the largest indoor gatherings in the world during a coronavirus outbreak that has killed more than 120,000 Americans and put 40 million out of work. The rally was meant to restart his reelection effort less than five months before the president faces voters again.

"The choice in 2020 is very simple," Trump said. "Do you want to bow before the left-wing mob, or do you want to stand up tall and proud as Americans?"

Trump unleashed months of pent-up grievances about the coronavirus, which he dubbed the "Kung flu," a racist term for COVID-19, which originated in China. He also tried to defend his handling of the pandemic, even as cases continue to surge in many states, including Oklahoma.

He complained that robust coronavirus testing was making his record look bad - and suggested the testing effort should slow down.

"Here's the bad part. When you do testing to that extent, you're going to find more cases," he said. "So I said to my people, 'Slow the testing down.' They test and they test."

"Speed up the testing," Trump's Democratic opponent, Joe Biden, tweeted later.

Trump comeback rally features empty seats, staff infections

In the hours before the rally, crowds were significantly lighter than expected, and campaign officials scrapped plans for Trump to address an overflow space outdoors. When Trump thundered that "the silent majority is stronger than ever before," about a third of the seats at his indoor rally were empty.

Trump tried to explain away the crowd size by blaming the media for scaring people and by insisting there were protesters outside who were "doing bad things." But the small crowds of pre-rally demonstrators were largely peaceful, and Tulsa police reported just one arrest Saturday afternoon.

Before the rally, Trump's campaign revealed that six staff members who were helping set up for the event had tested positive for the coronavirus. Campaign communications director Tim Murtaugh said neither the affected staffers nor anyone who was in immediate contact with them would attend the event.

The president raged to aides that the staffers' positive cases had been made public, according to two White House and campaign officials who spoke on condition of anonymity because they weren't authorized to speak publicly about private conversations.

Trump devoted more than 10 minutes of his 105-minute rally - with the crowd laughing along - trying to explain away a pair of odd images from his speech last weekend at West Point, blaming his slippery leather-soled shoes for video of him walking awkwardly down a ramp as he left the podium. And then he declared that he used two hands to drink a cup of water that day because he didn't want to spill water on his tie - and proceeded to this time drink with just one hand.

But Trump also leaned in hard on cultural issues, including the push to tear down statues and rename military bases honoring Confederate generals following nationwide protests about racial injustice.

"The unhinged left-wing mob is trying to vandalize our history, desecrate our monuments, our beautiful monuments," Trump said. "They want to demolish our heritage so they can impose their new repressive regime in its place."

Trump also floated the idea of a one-year prison sentence for anyone convicted of burning an American flag, an act of protest protected by the First Amendment. And he revived his attacks on Minnesota Rep. Ilhan Omar, who emigrated from Somalia as a child, claiming she would want "to make the government of our country just like the country from where she came, Somalia: no government, no safety, no police, no nothing - just anarchy."

"And now she's telling us how to run our country," Trump continued. "No, thank you."

After a three-month break from rallies, Trump spent the evening reviving his greatest hits, including boasts about the pre-pandemic economy and complaints about the media. But his scattershot remarks made no mention of some of the flashpoints roiling the nation, including the abrupt firing of a U.S. attorney in Manhattan, the damaging new book from his former national security adviser or the killing of George Floyd.

Large gatherings in the United States were shut down in March because of the coronavirus. The rally was scheduled over the protests of local health officials as COVID-19 cases spike in many states, while the choice of host city and date - it was originally set for Friday, Juneteenth, in a city where a 1921 racist attack killed as many as 300 people - prompted anger amid a national wave of protests against racial injustice.

But Trump and his advisers forged forward, believing that a return to the rally stage would reenergize the president, who is furious that he has fallen behind Biden in polls, and reassure increasingly anxious Republicans.

But Trump has struggled to land effective attacks against Biden, and his broadsides against the former vice president did not draw nearly the applause as did his digs at his 2016 opponent, Hillary Clinton.

City officials had expected a crowd of 100,000 people or more in downtown Tulsa. Trump's campaign, for its part, declared that it had received over a million ticket requests. The crowd that gathered was far less than that, though the rally, being broadcast on cable, also targeted voters in battleground states such as Pennsylvania, North Carolina and Florida.

The president's campaign tried to point fingers elsewhere over the smaller-than-expected crowds, accusing protesters of blocking access to metal detectors and preventing people from entering the rally. Three Associated Press journalists reporting in Tulsa for several hours leading up to the president's speaking did not see protesters block entry to the area where the rally was held.

The campaign handed out masks and hand sanitizer, but there was no requirement that participants use them and few did. Participants also underwent a temperature check.

"I don't think it's anything worse than the flu," said Brian Bernard, 54, a retired IT worker from Baton Rouge, Louisiana, who sported a Trump 2020 hat. "I haven't caught a cold or a flu in probably 15 years, and if I haven't caught a cold or flu yet, I don't think I'm gonna catch COVID."

Lemire reported from New York. Associated Press writers John Mone and Ellen Knickmeyer in Tulsa, Okla., contributed to this report.

TULSA, Okla. (AP) - Thousands of supporters of President Donald Trump showed up in an indoor arena Saturday night for a rally that some fear could help fuel nascent spikes of coronavirus cases in some places, concerns that were amplified after six staffers helping to set up the event tested positive for the virus.

State and city health department officials were already bracing for a possible surge in COVID-19 cases from large outdoor demonstrations against police brutality held across the country. Now the Trump rally in Tulsa, Oklahoma, shaped up to be the first indoor event of such a massive scale since the coronavirus pandemic took hold and many states issued stay-at-home orders.

More than 120,000 Americans have died from the coronavirus.

During Saturday's rally, Trump told his supporters the United States has tested 25 million people, far more than any other country. He also told the crowd that more testing leads to finding more positive cases.

Trump said that "so I said to my people slow the testing down, please."

Officials said they expected 100,000 people from many states to converge on Tulsa for the rally and other events, but thousands of the BOK Center's 19,000 seats were empty for the rally. Supporters - most without masks - and hundreds of protesters filled streets Saturday around the stadium.

The Trump campaign's communications director, Tim Murtaugh, said in a statement that "quarantine procedures" were immediately initiated and no staff member who tested positive would attend the event. Those who had immediate contact with them would also abstain.

Brian Bernard sported a Trump 2020 hat on Saturday in downtown Tulsa, but no face covering. He said the numbers and media attention on coronavirus are artificially inflated, and that didn't stop him from making a nine-hour drive from his home in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, to attend his second Trump rally.

"I haven't caught a cold or a flu in probably 15 years, and if I haven't caught a cold or flu yet, I don't think I'm gonna catch COVID," said the 54-year-old from Baton Rouge, Louisiana. "I don't think it's anything worse than the flu."

The map of the outbreak in the U.S., and elsewhere, has become a patchwork, with infections falling in some areas and surging in others. In New York, Gov. Andrew Cuomo didn't hold a televised coronavirus briefing for the first time in months Saturday - a sign of progress in the state that was home to the epicenter of the outbreak - though he did convene a conference call to make an announcement about baseball spring training.

Other states are seeing increases, and Nevada and Arizona, for instance, have reported record single-day jumps in new cases in recent days.

In Tulsa, health department officials have said two large indoor gatherings recently contributed to a spike in new cases. They declined to name the events or say how big they were, but the city has seen the largest increase in infections in Oklahoma in recent days. Several bordering states, including Arkansas, have also seen spikes in community spread of the virus in recent weeks.

That is worrying some experts as Tulsa prepares again for Trump's large indoor gathering.

"I think there's no question that indoor events are more risky than outdoor events. But we don't really know how big that difference is. And certainly other aspects, like how tightly packed things are ... will make a big difference," said Justin Lessler, an associate professor of epidemiology at Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health.

Lessler said large events like the rally or the protests have the "potential to be super spreader events," but their potential to drive the pandemic is short-lived.

"The larger factor is what happens when people go home," he said. "If everybody goes home and doesn't respect the social distancing factors and goes out into the community, then they could push the spread."

On its website, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention recommends that people hoping to attend an event take into consideration whether it is outside or inside, noting indoor events are "more risky" because it might be harder to keep a safe distance from other people and because ventilation is poorer than outside.

Tulsa County health officials had urged state officials to postpone the event at the BOK Center because of a recent spike in cases: Oklahoma set a high for new cases last Thursday, with 450, and Tulsa saw 125 new cases Friday. Other health experts are worried that attendees could unknowingly take the virus back to their respective hometowns and states, seeding additional outbreaks. But Oklahoma's Republican Gov. Kevin Stitt said it would be safe.

The Trump campaign acknowledged the risk in a waiver it asked attendees to sign that absolves them of any responsibility if someone should get sick. It was handing out masks and hand sanitizer, but there is no requirement that participants use them and there will be no required social distancing inside. Trump also plans an outdoor event.

Teams of people wearing goggles, masks, gloves and blue gowns are checking temperatures of those heading to the arena on Saturday. Some entering were wearing the free masks as their temperatures were checked, and some took them off afterward.

The rally came a day after the head of the World Health Organization warned that the pandemic is "accelerating." Outbreaks in the Americas were of particular concern, with Brazil surpassing 1 million confirmed infections, second only to the United States.

It also came the same day the National Institutes of Health halted a clinical trial of a Trump-touted malaria drug, hydroxychloroquine, for treating adults hospitalized with coronavirus, saying it found the drug provided no benefit but did not harm patients. Earlier this week, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration revoked authorization to use the drug in treating coronavirus, saying it had the potential for serious side effects.

Meanwhile, health officials are still eyeing the outdoor demonstrations against police brutality sparked by the death of George Floyd at the hands of police in Minneapolis. Those have gathered thousands of people together, in many instances not wearing masks. States and cities have not yet reported large upticks in virus cases since the protests began at the end of May, but it was unclear whether protesters have been seeking tests in large numbers or are self-quarantining.

California health officials have reported so far only a few people attending the demonstrations have tested positive for COVID-19, but identifying all their contacts is proving futile.

States are also preparing for summer vacations, stressing that people must continue to social distance when going to the beach, camping or taking part in other activities. Delaware officials put out the call to high school seniors who participated in traditional senior week events at beaches over the weekend to get tested, after at least three teens tested positive.

SUPREME COURT

Whether you agreed with one or both of the significant rulings made by the U.S. Supreme Court in recent days or not, we all ought to be reminded that the sitting judges are not stooges of the president who appointed them. During their confirmation hearings, opponents of Justices Neil Gorsuch and Brett Kavanaugh howled that they would obligingly rule on cases sympathetic to President Donald Trump's position on the matter.

So much for politicization of the court! While the court has differences in interpretation, we should be thankful that there is still integrity and nonpartisanship in at least one branch of government!

ELDER CARE

Got any more ideas, Housley?

As chair of the Senate Family Care and Aging Committee, state Sen. Karin Housley claims to stand for the elderly and vulnerable, yet she provides no positive or helpful recommendations during this pandemic. Believe me, we would welcome productive ideas. Instead, she reliably criticizes every improvement effort made by the current administration, while conveniently ignoring the fact that it takes only one asymptomatic person to bring the virus into a care facility where it can spread quickly and silently.

I know how hard this pandemic is on families. I lost my father, my last parent, in April. He was 99, and lived in a congregate-care facility. We were both frustrated that we couldn't visit in person during the last six weeks of his life. Our last visit was over Zoom a day before he passed. We could have only 10 people at his funeral.

There are thousands of others who also suffer in this; we are far from alone, and we are all looking for something better. So, Sen. Housley, we would welcome any ideas you have to improve the current situation. But until you have something positive to say, you aren't helping.

Karen Thielman, Woodbury

Tuesday's front-page article on visitor restrictions in long-term care by Chris Serres gave credit to everyone for easing restrictions on outdoor visits except the most important person involved, state Sen. Karin Housley ("State eases visitor restrictions to allow elders to see families," June 16). Sen. Housley has worked passionately and tirelessly for long-term care residents for years now and has been their, and their loved ones', voice in the Minnesota Legislature. She has heard from countless families about how painful this isolation has been for their loved ones. Many have even died alone and afraid because of the restrictions. There can be solutions that are also safe, and she will fight for those.

The one advocate our elderly and disabled in long-term care can count on is Sen. Housley, and I believe it was unfair to everyone not to mention her in that article. Research her record and listen to her passionate speeches on this topic and you will be convinced she is the most important voice for long-term care residents in our state. Please give her the credit she deserves.

POLICE DEPARTMENT

Don't let this moment scar us more

A walk from Minnehaha Avenue to Hennepin Avenue along the deep scar that is now Lake Street brought back disturbing memories of the 12th Street riots that took place when I was young teenager in the Detroit metropolitan area. When it happened, I only understood that people were angry, but as I matured into adulthood I appreciated firsthand the devastating result of the uprising as Detroit was reduced to a shell of its former self. Racism played a large role in what happened to Detroit, but at its core the collapse of that once great city was due to economic disinvestment. White flight by individuals removed many small chunks of property tax revenue, but larger pieces of capital were withheld by investors who took their money elsewhere because of the fear and apprehension that stigmatized the city.

Before its riots, Detroit was already facing challenges that Minneapolis does not confront, but the pandemic represents an existential threat to all major cities. Skyscrapers are filled with empty offices serviced by elevators that can't be fully used until a vaccine is available. Many jobs will never return to the urban core because new methods of doing them remotely have already been discovered. The roles of cities as centers of commerce, business, entertainment and culture are all in question.

Now is not the time to compound likely post-pandemic business disinvestment by promoting poorly labeled and ill-defined proposals to disband the police department. I oppose removing the requirement for a police force from the Minneapolis charter.

Gary Meyer, Minneapolis

Every time we are forced to observe an example of a "bad cop," as we all too often are, and are lectured to not paint all the "good cops" with the same brush, I wonder about these "good cops."

Sgt. Mike Quinn was a good cop, serving the Minneapolis Police Department with distinction from 1975 to 1999 - until he quit because he could no longer stand to watch the daily racism and brutality of his fellow officers. In 2004 (this is not a new problem, folks), Quinn, the son and brother of cops, wrote a book, "Walking with the Devil: The Police Code of Silence," about his experience on the MPD. In this book, Quinn makes a convincing case that, yes, only a small percentage of Minneapolis cops commit horrible acts of racism and brutality, but every cop on the MPD has seen it and looked the other way!

READERS WRITE Not so predictable after all

No one who has watched the callous killing of George Floyd can have much doubt about Derek Chauvin, but what about former officers Tou Thao, J Alexander Kueng and Thomas Lane? Are they "good cops"? What about former officer Mohamed Noor's partner, Matthew Harrity, whose instinct after Noor killed Justine Damond was to protect Noor? What about the dozen Minneapolis cops who refused to cooperate with the investigation? Are they "good cops"?

My sympathies are with those who call for getting rid of the MPD.

John K. Trepp, Minneapolis

While plans by the Minneapolis City Council to dismantle the police force dominate the headlines, shootings in the city are at an at least five-year record pace of 149 so far this year. Nearly half of those shootings occurred in the past three weeks, including nine on a single day ("9 shot in separate incidents, continuing a run of violence," June 18).

I wonder how the community activists and social workers that some council members have suggested could replace the police force would deal with the shooters. Maybe help them understand the social injustices and life deprivations that excuse their violent actions? Or perhaps ask the shooters to sign a petition in support of stronger gun control?

The serious question is whether Minneapolis residents will challenge the lunacy of the current council before the city is lost forever to crime and social chaos.

HOUSING

Rising prices plus a legacy of redlining mean we need to fix this

On Juneteenth, a date celebrated by African-Americans for almost 150 years, I read of the lack of affordable housing in Minneapolis (" 'It's a dogfight' as market tightens, prices rise," June 19). We need to reckon with our history of redlining and denying opportunities to our brothers and sisters of color to build wealth as so many white people have done.

We need our legislators to make affordable housing a key component of their work to dismantle the racist systems that have been built over centuries and continue to shackle our brown and black brothers and sisters.

Even as the Minneapolis Police Department reels in the aftermath of its officers' involvement in the killing of George Floyd, the department has been recruiting a new crop of trainees who will face the same challenge of every rookie: navigating the dramatic difference between what is preached at the academy and what is practiced on the street.

In the Minneapolis Police Academy, cadets are trained to be mindful of their own biases, to treat the public with respect and to use force only when necessary. But then they enter station houses and squad cars with veteran officers who may view policing differently - as an us-versus-them profession with a potential threat on every street corner.

Since Mr. Floyd's death, the process of turning civilians into effective officers on the Minneapolis force has taken on added urgency, and raised questions in the mind of one senior officer of how to tell who might be capable of abusive policing, such as pressing a knee into a suspect's neck, as former Officer Derek Chauvin did on the evening of May 25 as three of his colleagues, two of them rookies, looked on.

"We're just trying to hire some more right now, and I'm just sitting there - 'How do I know which one of these guys is going to be the next Derek Chauvin?" said Cmdr. Charles Adams, a 34-year veteran who recruits new officers and trains them on the necessity of community engagement. "How do you make that determination when their record is clean as heck? We just got to weed out the ones that don't want to buy into the program."

The death of Floyd has led to a national rethinking of police training. Some are urging significant reforms, while others complain that the current system is irredeemably broken, with a long history of policy changes that have failed to stop officers from resorting to violence too often, especially against black residents such as Floyd.

Floyd's killing in police custody made clear the depth of the problem. Chauvin, who had a string of complaints against him for abusive policing, was a training officer assigned to showing new officers the ropes.

Those pushing for fundamental change in policing doubt whether enhanced training alone can overcome an entrenched culture of aggression that they feel is pervasive in the profession. They also question whether the basic requirements for getting a badge and a gun in the United States are sufficient.

It takes more than three years to become a police officer in countries like Finland and Norway, but in some U.S. states someone can complete basic training in as little as 11 weeks. Minneapolis is on the higher end of the scale, requiring more than a year of training before swearing in a new officer.

Most states require fewer minimum training hours to become licensed as a police officer than they do for barbers or cosmetologists. New York state law mandates 1,000 hours of training for massage therapists, compared with around 700 for officers. Hawaii has no minimum requirements for police officers, but manicurists must train for 300 hours.

And while many police departments require additional training, 37 states permit untrained officers to work with full authority for months before attending basic training.

"It's insane that hairstylists need more training than cops in this country," said Randy Shrewsberry, executive director of the Institute for Criminal Justice Training Reform. "We need police officers to be educated like other professionals who are given the authority of life or death or freedom. And that takes far more than increasing training by a couple of hundred hours."

Lawmakers in Congress and state capitals have proposed measures for law enforcement training in de-escalation, use of force and dealing with mental health crises, among other situations.

In Minneapolis, Chauvin was a 19-year veteran whose job included training other officers in the field. Two of the officers he had supervised were only days into the job when they responded to a 911 call accusing Floyd of using a fake $20 bill at a South Minneapolis corner store, a relatively minor offense.

As the two rookies and Chauvin held Floyd face-down in the street, one of the rookies suggested turning Floyd on his side, but Chauvin, the ranking officer at the scene, declined to do so, prosecutors say.

Chauvin, the two rookies and a fourth officer present were all fired and charged with crimes.

"I saw murder," Adams said of the video of Floyd's arrest, adding that it seemed to be a widespread sentiment within the department, even among officers who usually urge a wait-and-see approach when colleagues are accused of wrongdoing.

One frustration, Adams said, was that Chauvin's actions erased strides he believed that the department had made to teach officers to be more accountable to communities like the predominantly black North Side, where he grew up.

Adams leads the department's procedural justice initiatives, which include training officers on how their interactions with residents can shape public perception and affect public safety.

In Minneapolis, looking for police recruits who can resist 'warrior culture'

Implicit bias training, which the department began about eight years ago, includes discussions of the aggressive policing tactics of the 1960s that damaged public trust in law enforcement and a simulated video of an officer talking disrespectfully to a black motorist only to learn later that she was the wife of a high-ranking police officer.

But law enforcement officials and experts say de-escalation training is not enough.

"I don't care how many new policies and laws you pass," said Sue Rahr, a former sheriff who is executive director of the Washington State Criminal Justice Training Commission, which oversees training of all law enforcement officers in the state. "If we don't address the culture, that behavior is not going to change. Period. End of story."

Despite decades of community policing efforts, many of the nation's police academies and 18,000 departments have long emphasized a warrior mentality, with officers trained for battle and equipped with the gear and weapons of modern warfare, she said.

The warrior culture often begins during basic training in academies modeled on military boot camp. Police academies spend around 168 hours training recruits on firearms, self-defense and use of force but only nine hours on conflict management and mediation, according to a Justice Department report.

"If you train cops like soldiers, dress them like soldiers and equip them like soldiers, you can't be surprised that they act like soldiers, and that's exactly what we've done," said Shrewsbury, of the Institute for Criminal Justice Training Reform. The training imbalance, he said, reinforces a "thin blue line" police culture perpetuated in many departments by higher-ups and unions. "There's just this constant reiteration that cops are in constant danger," he said.

Systemic reform efforts are hindered by a lack of any centralized standards for the nation's police departments, nearly half of which employ fewer than 10 officers, according to the Justice Department. Even though many departments provide additional training, those lessons only go so far.

Washington state is widely seen as having some of the country's highest training standards, but the police force in its largest city, Seattle, has been under federal oversight since 2012 after an investigation found that excessive force was routinely used.

"Every police agency has a mission statement, but the culture is what is accepted by leadership on a day-to-day basis," said Sean Hendrickson, an instructor at Washington state's police academy. "That gets backed up by other officers and is extremely deep and very difficult to change."

Becoming a police officer in Minneapolis requires first getting a peace officer license from the state, which entails as many as 1,050 hours of training.

Once recruits obtain their licenses, they have to go through additional training run by the Minneapolis Police Department that includes 19 weeks in the academy. The department has said it does not employ warrior-style training, and the city banned such training outright last year, but the union has offered to pay for officers to receive it from outside vendors.

After completing the academy, new officers spend five months on the streets with a field training officer, who is supposed to teach recruits how to translate what they learned in the academy to real-life situations.

In Minneapolis, looking for police recruits who can resist 'warrior culture'

But that is not always the case. Current and former officers pointed to one of the first things that field training officers often say to new recruits: "Forget everything you learned in the academy."

Chief Medaria Arradondo, who has been on the Minneapolis force since 1989, said he heard it when he was coming out of the academy. That attitude is much less prevalent now, he said, but is still a concern.

"We have to lay that to rest, that old culture," he said. "It's about making sure that there's ongoing training and the training in the academy just doesn't become this subculture of a thing that you learn and you disregard."

A former Minneapolis officer, Andrew Arashiba, said in a lawsuit against the city that during his field training in 2016 and 2017, one of his training officers told him not to activate his body camera at times when it was required unless he had notified other officers first.

The same training officer also once scolded him for not using force against a drunken older man they had encountered, according to the lawsuit. "You missed a free slap," he recalled the training officer telling him.

"They have a culture and an unwritten practice of putting down anyone who opposes excessive use of force," said Peter Nickitas, the lawyer for Arashiba.

Arashiba is Japanese American and is suing for racial and age discrimination after being terminated from the department in October 2017.

The emphasis on officer safety in training can make officers feel as if they will constantly be under attack in the streets, and that can be a barrier to developing meaningful relationships with the communities they serve, said Michael Friestleben, a former Minneapolis police inspector who retired three years ago.

"It was very difficult to get many of our officers to realize that the folks outside the building were not our enemies but actually our friends," Friestleben wrote in a blunt Facebook post last month as the streets of Minneapolis erupted in protest.

When he led the 4th Precinct, on the North Side, Friestleben said he began requiring officers to attend community events. Many complained. "It's not our job," some said. "Everybody hates us here," others said.

In 2015, when demonstrators set up an encampment outside of the 4th Precinct station for 18 days to protest the police killing of Jamar Clark, Friestleben spent hours each day speaking with demonstrators, he said. That elicited snarls from some of his officers.

"Who are you going to choose," he recalled officers asking, "the police or the community?"

The department's inability to rid the force of that attitude has brought the city to this moment of upheaval over policing and racism, Friestleben said.

"Now, today we see the results of not getting to know your community," he wrote on Facebook, "not really serving your community, not caring about your community."

John Eligon reported from Minneapolis and Dan Levin from New York. Kim Barker contributed reporting from Minneapolis and Conor Dougherty from Oakland, Calif. Susan Beachy contributed research.

Gunmen unleashed a torrent of bullets in a crowded block in the heart of Minneapolis' Uptown area early Sunday, killing one person and wounding 11 others in one of the city's most violent shootings in recent memory.

The gunfire sent terrified bar patrons and revelers in the area, newly crowded after weeks of COVID-19 closures, diving for cover, unsure of what was unfolding. Bystanders and police officers rushed to help the wounded and to get people to safety.

One man was killed, police said. Family and friends identified him on social media as Cody C. Pollard, 27, a father of two small children and a talented barber called Cody Loc by friends. The 11 survivors, all adults, were scattered at area hospitals with wounds of varying severity, but all were expected to survive.

Police Chief Medaria Arradondo called the carnage "tragic and senseless" and said the FBI and state agencies will assist his department as it deals with the recent surge in shootings around the city.

"We have seen unfortunately in the past several months an uptick in violent crime in Minneapolis, and we are certainly doing our best to address that," the chief said. "This is going to take more than just the Minneapolis Police Department. The numbers we are seeing are truly ... a public health crisis."

FBI spokesman Kevin Smith confirmed that the FBI is in close communication with Minneapolis police, "assessing what assets we can bring to bear here."

"First, we can bring significant intelligence and investigative tools to this particular shooting, as well as provide additional tools and resources in the coming days and weeks," he said.

Arradondo said police "absolutely do have several leads" on suspects, but no arrests had been announced by Sunday night. He also said the overnight mayhem had no connection to the May 25 death of George Floyd while in police custody, which prompted violent protests in the days that followed.

Mayor Jacob Frey said the fresh violence "only compounds our grief" over Floyd's death.

UPTOWN REELS AFTER GUNFIRE, BLOODSHED

"The lawlessness serves no purpose and it won't be tolerated," he said. "Local residents deserve better."

Frey called the recent shootings "totally a distraction from the work we need on the structural police reforms we need to do."

The violence began at 12:37 a.m. Sunday during a large gathering in the 2900 block of Hennepin Avenue, said police spokesman John Elder. Officers responding to multiple 911 calls found multiple gunshot victims and learned that others had left the scene in private vehicles.

The area, known for its bars and boisterous nightlife, had been bustling the past few nights as several businesses reopened. Hennepin Avenue had been partly blocked off to prevent road racing and to accommodate large crowds.

A Facebook Live video posted by K.G. Wilson, a longtime peace activist, showed the shooting's chaotic aftermath, with bystanders tending to several victims sitting on a curb. The scene was awash in flashing blue and red lights. A police officer and a bystander could be seen carrying a wounded person to a waiting ambulance.

On Sunday, business owners and citizens in the 2900 block of Hennepin Avenue swept up glass from windows shattered by bullets and hosed blood off the sidewalks. A few flower bouquets had been laid at the site of the most intense gunfire, and people came by both to gawk and to pray.

Wilson returned to the area Sunday, still shaken by how close the bullets had come to him.

"I really thought last night I was going to be the victim, that I was going to lose my life," he said as he stood outside Hoban Korean BBQ, where boards covered two windows that had been shot out. "I'm heartbroken by what I saw here last night and what I experienced and what I barely escaped."

Hoban remained closed Sunday, but several other nearby businesses were open. However, several, including Cowboy Slim's, the Uptown Tavern, the Pourhouse and the Fremont Restaurant & Bar, closed early Sunday evening. Foot traffic was light in the area, partly because of rainfall.

Joseph "Smalls" Johnson, manager of Williams Uptown Pub and Peanut Bar, said his bar had a long line out the door when the gunfire erupted. Some customers sheltered in the pub's basement while others left via the back door to avoid Hennepin Avenue.

Business has been bustling the past two weeks, he said, with people delighted to be out with friends again. But it was slow Sunday night, and he said he too was considering closing early.

"I want all of us to be open, but I want us to be safe," he said. "We're not back to normal yet. It's going to be a while."

'Pretty much speechless'

Hours after the shooting Sunday, Alyssa Tyson paced nervously outside HCMC while her 23-year-old daughter, Taija, was inside for treatment after being shot twice. One bullet had ripped through her leg, striking her femur, while another had grazed her arm, according to her mother.

Alyssa Tyson said that her daughter, who works as a personal care assistant, had gone to Uptown with a male companion, who had also been shot, with a bullet passing close to his spine.

UPTOWN REELS AFTER GUNFIRE, BLOODSHED

"The young lady who was with my daughter said it was, like, 80 shots," she said.

She said she was shocked to hear how many people were shot. "I'm just pretty much speechless," she said. "That's a lot of people's lives about to be changed, and for one person, that's no more Christmases, no more birthdays."

Violence up; reasons unclear

The shooting was one of several across the city since Saturday afternoon, continuing a rash of gun violence since the unrest over the police killing of Floyd, with more than 90 people shot in Minneapolis since May 26.

Yet another fatal shooting took place Sunday night in Minneapolis. Officers found a 17-year-old boy suffering from a gunshot wound in the 3000 block of N. Knox Avenue. He was taken to a hospital, where he was pronounced dead. His death marked the city's 25th homicide of the year.

Criminologists have noted similar patterns in other cities - most recently Baltimore, which saw violent crime rise in the wake of a police killing - offering a variety of possible explanations, from eroded confidence in police to officers pulling back on their duties because of the intense public backlash.

Last week, Elder scoffed at the suggestion that officers were showing less initiative. "Our officers are still responding to calls, they are still addressing calls, and the fact that anybody would think that there is a stand-down order or some sort of work stoppage, that is patently false," he said.

He said the surge in shootings coincided with the start of summer.

Sunday's mass shooting was one of the most violent in recent city history. Earlier this month, seven people were shot, one fatally, when a brawl in a north Minneapolis bar escalated into gunfire.

In the city's deadliest mass shooting, a gunman burst into Accent Signage Systems in 2012 and fatally shot six people before turning the gun on himself.

'We saw humanity last night'

On Sunday, Frey praised the police response to the overnight shooting.

"Last night, the first officer was on the scene in three minutes," he said. "He was from the bike rapid response team. Our officers have seen a lot of violence in the last couple of weeks. They are working diligently to serve the public's needs, and I appreciate them."

City Council President Lisa Bender, whose ward includes Uptown, said Minneapolis and "communities all over the country need to be getting all these guns out of our streets."

Bender, one of several council members who called for dismantling the city's Police Department after Floyd's death, said, "This is a reminder that we need to do more proactively to stop this type of violence."

Arradondo praised his officers for "responding very courageously to the sound of shots fired," as well as bystanders who helped the wounded.

UPTOWN REELS AFTER GUNFIRE, BLOODSHED

"We saw officers and we saw community members rushing to aid those victims, to assist them to get to EMS personnel," he said. "I do believe ... we saw humanity last night. And that really and truly inspires me, and it says there is hope here in our city, and it will remain in our city."

A retired police chief witnessed a couple being assaulted in St. Paul, came to their aid and found himself under attack, according to police.

Bob Jacobson, who was a police officer for more than 30 years and director of the New Brighton Department of Public Safety until 2016, was hit in the head from behind with a piece of wooden furniture.

Jacobson and his wife were heading out Friday about 7:10 p.m. when they heard chaos and yelling coming from a neighbor's home in the Como Park area.

They later found out a young man and woman had arrived to pick up a free couch.

"That couple was randomly and brutally assaulted in daylight," Jacobson wrote on Facebook. He said about eight young people demanded their phone and money.

Jacobson continued, "As the old retired cop that I am and as I was trained to do, I intervened, I gave verbal commands, pushed, pulled, and in one instance chased the young men responsible for this vicious attack which included kicks to the head of a victim who had only wanted to pick up a free piece of furniture."

The 20-year-old man who'd come for the couch put up quite the fight, Jacobson said. Paramedics took him the hospital because he had cuts to his head from the assault and needed stitches, according to Sgt. Mike Ernster, a St. Paul police spokesman. The 22-year-old woman with him was evaluated by paramedics at the scene.

Jacobson told paramedics he didn't want to go to the hospital, but they said he needed to when they found out he's 60. He was evaluated and released.

Retired police chief intervenes when couple is randomly attacked in St. Paul; he's also assaulted

Police arrested two males, who are 15 and 17, and two females, who are 14 and 16, Ernster said.

Because of safety concerns, Jacobson's neighbors asked that their exact location not be publicized - they're in the Como Park neighborhood between Lexington Parkway and Snelling Avenue.

In Jacobson's post, he wrote about the current push to reform policing, which has been underway in earnest since George Floyd died in Minneapolis police custody.

"Calls to reform policing are timely," he wrote. "But consideration has to be given that police are needed, they are at times the only thing that stands in the way of a chaos, violence and destruction."

Jacobson also wrote: "Those kids didn't grow up thinking that they wanted to hit an old cop 'upside' the head with a hunk of wood. It went wrong somewhere, and yes, we need more resources to deal with the front-end issues that help bring about crime in our cities. ... While our leaders try to figure this out, a cut in policing will only serve to make this problem more difficult to solve. Our communities will continue to dissolve into some forms of lawlessness without a concerted effort of partnerships between the community and the police. I have witnessed it, I have experienced it, I visited Regions Hospital because of it."

Section: NEWS; Pg. 11ALength: 872 wordsByline: BRUCE PETERSON, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: It's about more than sheer determination // People of color face overpowering challenges in this country.Body

I have great respect for Peter Bell and Mitch Pearlstein and their continual willingness to say what they think. And the message of "Change must be sought from within as well" (June 5) was worthwhile - that it can self-defeating for African-Americans to identify themselves or their community as wholly the victim of external forces.

In 20 years as a Hennepin County judge, I saw many times that it was an attitude of determination and self-reliance that enabled people to overcome backgrounds of poverty, crime, injustice or drug abuse to become inspiring, solid citizens.

But I think Bell and Pearlstein missed the basic problem in writing that progress in reforming racial attitudes has been limited because political and social remedies have de-emphasized "what the black community - or any community - must do to improve its own fate."

They say that reasons for racial disparities are that black young people watch too much television and play too many video games, while black adults commit too many crimes and have too many children outside of marriage.

But pulling yourself up by your bootstraps requires something to stand on, some kind of capital.

Centuries of slavery and Jim Crow oppression deprived black families of the opportunity to accumulate financial capital. The average net worth of white families is 10 times that of black families. Homeownership among whites exceeds blacks by 30 percentage points.

Then there is social capital - the network of people and resources you can call on for help. Both my grandfathers came from Sweden as penniless immigrants who couldn't speak English. But unhindered by racial barriers, they worked incredibly hard and started small businesses. Thus, for five straight years, with a single phone call my father was able to line up for me the summer park maintenance and construction jobs that paid my way through college.

COUNTERPOINT

But the most important kind of capital may be what I call "character capital" - the stable, nurturing family environment that enables a young person to achieve the emotional and cognitive development to restrain impulses, overcome adversity and plan for the future. In other words, it's what it takes to develop the self-confidence and hopefulness needed to pull yourself up by your bootstraps.

But children who grow up amid toxic stress, brains awash in the cortisol that fuels fight or flight, incur actual structural brain changes that promote aggression, risky behavior, drug abuse, even early pregnancies. As our nation painfully processes the death of George Floyd, I have heard many accounts of the harsh and demeaning treatment African-Americans routinely encounter. I am worried most of all about the effect of this on black children.

In his lovely book, "The Nurture Society," psychologist Anthony Biglan of the Oregon Research Institute shows how most of the problems in our society stem from our failure to provide a nurturing environment. Bell and Pearlstein contend that we have expended prodigious sums on reducing racial disparities with limited results. But perhaps we have not spent the money to promote nurturing. Systems that should be supportive, like public assistance, child support and child protection, can be harsh and coercive.

Biglan's book is full of examples of how nurturing works. In one study of poor teenage mothers, about 35% of their children were arrested by age 15. But randomized control trials showed that regular visits by a warm, supportive nurse during the pregnancy and first two years of the baby's life cut that delinquency rate in more than half. And the mothers? Years later they were better off emotionally and even financially.

In what may be the single most impressive prevention science result ever achieved, Baltimore first- and second-grade children were divided into teams to play the fun "Good Behavior Game" (an alternative to coercive methods of classroom discipline) during one year. The results were much calmer classrooms - and as adults the participants were still less likely to be suicidal or addicted to drugs and they committed fewer crimes.

When I first heard about the idea of defunding the Minneapolis Police Department, it would be an understatement to say I was skeptical. Sometimes we just need effective protection. But the more I think about it, the more intrigued I am about how law enforcement might evolve into a more nurturing influence for young black people.

A few years ago, I had a minor traffic accident downtown. Instead of a policeman with a gun and maybe better things to do responding to the scene, immediately coming over to offer help and information was one of the Downtown Improvement District ambassadors in his crisp jacket. What would it be like for black kids to see a few of those around the neighborhood instead of police patrol cars?

So, to my African-American friends and fellow citizens, I say by all means believe in yourselves and what you can do with your bootstraps. But we must all accept the responsibility to help replace the harsh and threatening environment in which many of your children live with a more nurturing community.

At a time when startup accelerators and other entrepreneurial organizations are looking to become more diverse and inclusive, Lunar Startups has a head start.

St. Paul-based Lunar, which launched in 2018 with help from the Knight Foundation and American Public Media, was designed to serve underrepresented entrepreneurs, such as people of color, women or members of the LGBTQ community. Since it was founded Lunar has served 32 companies which have raised a collective $1.3 million in capital and have created 40 full-time jobs, as well as over 100 contractor positions.

Its managing director, Danielle Steer, said it has been fielding a number of calls recently as other accelerators, startups and venture capitalists work to make their community more inclusive in the wake of George Floyd's killing by the Minneapolis Police Department. Lunar is happy to help, Steer said.

What Lunar Startups has learned from running an inclusive accelerator

"We want to be a resource," she said.

From its early days, Lunar realized that creating an inclusive accelerator would mean eschewing the one-size-fits-all model that other similar organizations rely on. That's meant doing a lot of learning on the fly; it also means getting rid of some accelerator standbys.

Many accelerators require founders to pay for the experience with equity, and expect them to quit their jobs to be an entrepreneur full-time. Lunar doesn't expect either of those things because they can act as a barrier to entry for many founders, Steer said. The accelerator also accepts companies from industries beyond tech, though it does expect participants to be able to scale quickly.

Those measures are meant to disrupt the intense disparities in who gets venture capital funding and who doesn't. According to Forbes, only two percent of venture capital funding goes to companies owned by women; less than one percent goes to companies founded by black or Hispanic entrepreneurs.

Lunar can help organizations that are just getting started, but for established organizations that are trying to become more equitable, Steer recommends getting specific.

Identifying barriers to entry to a company is critical, whether that's overhauling the job application process or hiring more diverse leaders so that employees of all backgrounds can feel a little more comfortable. In areas like policy change or hiring, it's good to set tangible goals, Steer said.

If goals aren't specific, it's impossible to know if a company has achieved them or not. Plus, it's pretty easy to tell who's setting the hard goals.

"Our communities are pretty quick to be able to say who's doing lip service to equity versus who's doing the tough and challenging work," Steer said.

Steer also recommends hiring an outside company to help you become more inclusive. Lunar has hosted a few companies that fit that bill like 26 Letters and Imagine | Deliver, both of which combine equity and inclusion consulting with data-driven approaches.

And, of course, you're encouraged to reach out to Lunar Startups directly. But be warned, Steer said: they won't go easy with their suggestions.

"We are not going to be too nice about it. We are really going to challenge and push people," she said.

A man threatened a 53-year-old woman with a knife in St. Paul and when someone told him to stop, he questioned, "Why, she's a (racial epithet)," according to a criminal complaint filed Monday.

The Ramsey County Attorney's Office charged Eric Andrew Nelson, 36, of St. Paul, with second-degree assault motivated by bias.

When a police officer asked Nelson why he threatened a woman, he said, "Because I was mad at Black people. You guys get away with it, why can't I?," according to the complaint.

The woman was standing at Snelling and Selby avenues about 12:30 p.m. Friday when a man approached and said, "Give me money or I'm going to stab you," as he pointed the knife at her, the complaint said.

As an officer spoke with the woman, police received another report about the same suspect: He had walked into the nearby Zait and Za'atar restaurant and asked, "Are there any (racial epithets) in here?" He grabbed money out of the tip jar and, when an employee walked into the area, the suspect said, "OK, you're white," returned the money to the jar and left the business.

The woman who was threatened with the knife identified a man, whom police found walking at Snelling and Lincoln avenues, as the suspect.

In a confrontation with police, Nelson held a knife to his neck and then his chest, and told the officer to shoot him, according to the complaint. An officer convinced him to drop the knife and handcuffed him.

The officer asked him what was going on and Nelson said, "People are harassing my family, like (racial epithets) ... I got into an argument with this woman and a bunch of (racial epithets) jumped me near University and Snelling," according to the complaint.

Man charged with bias-motivated assault told police: 'I was looking for (racial epithets) to kill,' complaint says

Video from Rose Street Patisserie at Snelling and Selby showed Nelson approaching people on the sidewalk with a knife in his hand and pointing it at a woman. The officer asked him what happened at the pastry shop.

Nelson told him, "I was looking for (racial epithets) to kill. I told them I wanted to kill (racial epithets), but they don't care." The officer asked Nelson if the people were Black and he responded, "No, so I left them alone," the complaint said.

Nelson also told the officer he had tried to go to an emergency mental health center, but was turned away.

OFFICERS DISAPPEAR FROM SCHOOLS

June 22, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1227 wordsByline: RYAN FAIRCLOTH; ANTHONY LONETREE; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

If Minneapolis Public Schools students are able to return to their classrooms this fall, the hallways they roam will be free of police for the first time in more than 50 years.

Soon, the same could be said for a growing number of public school districts across the country, which are considering following Minneapolis' lead in kicking officers out of schools after the police killing of George Floyd.

Just as Floyd's death in Minneapolis sparked a nationwide movement against police violence, so, too, has it reignited the debate over the presence of officers in schools. Urban school districts in Portland, Denver and Milwaukee have since cut ties with police departments for school resource officers, or SROs, and districts in other large cities are considering it. It's a striking turnabout for American schools that have shored up their security over the years in response to the threat of school shootings.

"We are seeing a historic moment here," said Peter Demerath, a University of Minnesota professor who studies school culture and improvement. "It is a moment of opportunity to make meaningful change, not only in policing but in ... education as well."

Districts across Minnesota have revisited their contracts with police in recent weeks, but none except Minneapolis and Winona have taken such action. Students and activists across the state are demanding change.

During a school board meeting last week, St. Paul Public Schools Superintendent Joe Gothard said he received more than 1,000 e-mails since Floyd's death, with most people urging the district to remove SROs from schools. The funds, budgeted at up to $775,000 in 2019-20, should instead be spent on student supports, critics say.

In Duluth, a student-led petition calling on the city's school district to end its relationship with police and stop the "school-to-prison pipeline" had garnered more than 900 signatures as of Sunday night.

Officers disappear from schools

"We believe removing the presence of police in our schools will improve the learning environment for all students," Duluth school board student representative Nabiha Imtiaz told members last week.

Critics of school officers have long voiced concern over how they treat students of color, saying their presence criminalizes student behavior. Supporters counter that when school policing is done right, officers serve as mentors and even counselors to students, in addition to a first line of defense in the event of an emergency.

"It's a very active engagement in community-based policing and really connecting with ... what will be the next generation of adults," said Mo Canady, executive director of the National Association of School Resource Officers.

Some districts stick with cops

St. Paul could decide on whether to continue deploying SROs in schools on Tuesday. Unlike in Minneapolis, where a board member accused the police department of a "blatant disregard for black lives," St. Paul school board members offered words of appreciation last week for the district's seven SROs.

The district has worked hard to shift an officer's role from that of enforcer to mentor, and to reduce the number of student arrests. In 2018-19, the last year for which numbers were available, SROs made 41 arrests, down from 180 in 2013-14, but up from five in 2016-17 - the year the district and police set out to consciously avoid putting students into the criminal justice system.

"St. Paul really does things differently," Laura Olson, the district's security and emergency management director, told board members last week. "We are a national leader, by far."

But the killing of Floyd has sparked calls for change and a confronting of systemic racism in the district, feelings aired by some board members last week.

"Inaction will not get us anywhere," Vice Chairwoman Jeanelle Foster said. "It is time for folks to figure out what you value."

In the absence of an alternative plan for life after SROs, Gothard said he liked the idea of having an advisory task force create what that model could look like.

Some of Minnesota's other large districts have elected to continue with SROs in 2020-21 but are taking steps to ensure officers better understand students' needs.

Anoka-Hennepin, the state's largest school district, contracts with multiple suburban police departments. Officers are stationed at five high schools, six middle schools and a special education center. Spokesman Jim Skelly said the district plans to maintain its relationships with local police.

"It seems like the system that's in place is serving both the police departments and the schools well," he said.

Osseo, which budgeted $516,938 for 10 officers from Brooklyn Park and Maple Grove in 2019-20, approved a new three-year contract recently that calls for annual joint program reviews plus training in areas including social-emotional learning and approaches to behavior that emphasize relationships over punitive action.

Officers disappear from schools

In South Washington County, which budgeted about $400,000 for five officers from Cottage Grove and Woodbury, Superintendent Keith Jacobus met recently with the chiefs of both departments and all agreed that SROs are to focus on relationship building and open communication with staff and students, district spokesman Pepe Barton said.

Rochester, which budgeted $334,956 for five city police officers in 2019-20, took to Facebook recently to explain, in part, that SROs do more than provide safety and security, and are trained in counseling and other skills so they can be effective both in school settings and in crises.

"I think the vision ... and the policy of the district will define that role and that relationship with the SRO," said Kirk Schneidawind, executive director of the Minnesota School Boards Association.

Some lament Mpls. decision

Back in Minneapolis, many praised the school board's unanimous decision to cut ties with police.

Nathaniel Genene, student representative to the Minneapolis school board, said during the June 2 meeting that he surveyed more than 1,000 fellow students on the decision. The overwhelming majority supported the district's divestment from Minneapolis police.

But at North High School, students and administrators have lamented the decision. The school's SRO, Charles Adams III, is a fixture and a father figure to many students. He's also the school's football coach.

Last week, around 30 North football players gathered in a garage-style gym for the team's first group workout since March. The fate of Adams weighed on them.

"He's like another father to me. He really cares about us and he shows it a lot," said junior receiver Rio Sanders. "In the school, things happen. He's one that stops things from getting out of hand, not letting it get too far."

Adams remains the coach, but he's still waiting to see what his new policing assignment will be, and whether it conflicts with his coaching duties.

In a recent Facebook post, North High Principal Mauri Friestleben expressed her disappointment with the district's decision. Adams, she said, "stands for what is good within my school, what is good within the police department, and what is good within Minneapolis."

"... It is at times like these that I wish I weren't at the will of nine elected officials who will make a decision for all that will deeply impact our one," Friestleben said.

STATEWIDE BOOK CLUB READS ESSAYS ON RACE

A collection of essays by Minnesota writers of color is the second book in the new statewide book discussion club "One Book, One Minnesota."

"A Good Time for the Truth: Race in Minnesota," edited by Minneapolis poet Sun Yung Shin, contains essays by 16 Minnesota writers who provide perspective on what it is like to live as a Native person or a person of color here.

Beth Burns, president of the Friends of the St. Paul Public Library, noted in an e-mail the importance of that book at this particular time.

The death of a black man, George Floyd, while in police custody, has prompted "a reckoning that we must confront institutional and systemic racism - and that means all of us," she said. "Reading this book in community offers some Minnesotans the opportunity to see their experiences broadly shared and others a chance to educate themselves - and to discover ways to act on their convictions."

The digital edition of the book, which was published by the Minnesota Historical Society Press in 2016, will be available free on Ebooks Minnesota's website until Aug. 23. Physical copies of the book are available at public libraries and also are for sale at local bookstores.

Authors in the book include Taiyon J. Coleman, Heid E. Erdrich, Venessa Fuentes, Shannon Gibney, David Lawrence Grant, Carolyn Holbrook, IBé, Andrea Jenkins, Robert Farid Karimi, JaeRan Kim, Sherry Quan Lee, David Mura, Bao Phi, Rodrigo Sanchez-Chavarria, Diane Wilson, and Kao Kalia Yang.

All Minnesotans will be invited to participate in a statewide virtual discussion with Sun Yung Shin in August.

"One Book, One Minnesota" began in April as a response to the COVID-19 pandemic, as a way to unite people across the state through books and common conversation. More information can be found on the website for the Friends of the St. Paul Public Library.

Protesters filled the courtyard outside Central High School Monday afternoon to demand the removal of police officers from St. Paul Public Schools.

As protesters gathered with signs that read "Defend Black voices" and "Fund counselors and community, not cops," current and former Central students took turns sharing their personal experiences with the school resource officers.

"The adultification of Black children in schools is what puts us in danger," 2017 graduate Saffiyah Aziz Muhammad said. "People who are doing the most adultification of Black children in schools are police officers because they even make us adults in the streets."

Last school year, the St. Paul school district posted seven St. Paul police officers at public high schools in the city, costing the district up to $775,000.

On Tuesday, the school board will vote on whether to negotiate another contract with the St. Paul Police Department.

Minneapolis Public Schools voted unanimously to terminate their contract with the Minneapolis Police Department early this month.

"We're definitely taking the opportunity now," rally organizer and 2019 CHS graduate Miski Omar said. "We saw what MPS did, so we're taking the opportunity now to get SROs out of our schools. It's a hopeful time right now."

The rally was hosted by the Student Engagement and Advancement Board, a team of students who work on initiatives to bring to the elected school board and administration each year, as well as St. Paul coalition Root & Restore.

St. Paul protesters demand removal of police from public high schools

SEAB members first advocated for the removal of police officers from St. Paul public high schools in 2016.

At the end of the rally, protesters formed a caravan and honked their car horns along a route past the houses of three school board members who will vote on the matter Tuesday.

"Last time I checked, this was an institution of learning, not an institution of fear," 2020 CHS graduate Mickies Kiros said. "It's not fair for students to feel like they're not safe. I guarantee they will feel more safe when there are no police officers."

Nelson Cruz took part in a Zoom interview three weeks ago with two producers from ESPN as they recorded content in advance of the ESPY Awards on Sunday night.

The Twins designated hitter was one of five finalists for the Muhammad Ali Sports Humanitarian Award, and had the opportunity to discuss the extensive charity work he does in his native Dominican Republic as well as the United States.

But the sports network threw him a curveball. They informed him that he had won.

Cruz, a six-time All-Star who has hit 401 career home runs, likes curveballs when they are served over a plate. This one, he wasn't ready for.

"I was crying, man," Cruz said. "It was really emotional. It was like an interview and they asked all the questions and they asked me if I won the award, what it would mean. And I said it would be great, it would be special, and with that money it will help out a lot of people in my country and in the States. But if anyone else wins it I will be happy because it would be the right call.

"Then they told me, 'Congratulations you won the award.' I just started crying man; it touched me pretty good."

Dustin Morse, the Twins director of baseball communications, was also on the video conference and confirmed the tears. A few of Cruz's relatives were in the room as well, leading to a big celebration.

The award, named after the late boxing and social icon, is given to an athlete who has had an impact in his or her community through sports while sharing the same principles that Ali did, including confidence, conviction, dedication and respect. The winner of the award receives $100,000 donation to his or her charity.

The other finalists, a group Cruz was very impressed with, will receive $25,000 for their charities of choice.

It includes former Timberwolves All-Star forward Kevin Love, whose history with panic attacks has led him to support mental health management, and won the Arthur Ashe Award for courage. Lynx forward Maya Moore, another finalist, put her basketball career on hold as she fights for criminal justice reform as well as the release of Jonathan Irons, who has served 22 years of a 50-year sentence for burglary and assault. The conviction was overturned in March but is under appeal.

WWE star Titus O'Neil, another finalist, is active in education, health and wellness initiatives in his hometown of Tampa, Fla., and has helped more than 200 student-athletes in the area attend college. And there are twins Devin and Jason McCourty, both defensive backs for the New England Patriots, who have pushed for criminal justice reform for juveniles as well as eliminating disparities in educational funding.

While Cruz waits, and hopes, for the 2020 season to begin, he's been active in his community, donating food and medical supplies to the needy as recently as two weeks ago. His past endeavors include donating a fire truck and building a police station for his hometown of Las Matas De Santa Cruz, in the Dominican Republic. And he dreams of building an education and wellness center for children there. The money that comes with the award could be the start of fulfilling that dream.

"I definitely feel blessed," Cruz said. "Never in my dreams I felt like I was going to win this. I don't think we do it to be recognized. We do it because we feel it is the right thing to do. That is what our heart is telling us to do. It's always nice to be recognized that what you are doing is the right thing.

"Just to be nominated is a great thing but to win it, it just fills your heart of joy and you feel blessed."

The year 2020 has not been kind to the world, as it continues to grapple with COVID-19. And the killing of George Floyd by Minneapolis police has led to outrage and demands for change.

Cruz could not help but to think of what Ali would be doing today.

"Especially these days, with what is going on with the racism and the strife and all the things that are going on right now," Cruz said. "He would have been the first one fighting for the cause. That makes the award even more special."

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 1127 wordsByline: DEE DePASS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Pop-up legal clinic guides business owners hurt by riots through recovery from their losses.Body

Ricardo Hernandez Espinoza thought he was safe after rioters angry over George Floyd's killing burned three adjacent businesses but spared his La Michoacana Purépecha ice cream shop on Lake Street in Minneapolis.

Then came the looters, who at 2 a.m. on May 29 smashed in his shop door and entered. Finding Espinoza inside, they bolted.

Espinoza was still in a quandary. The electricity to his shop was out for a week. Even after the power returned, his landlord's insurance company wouldn't let him reopen his shop. He had 10 freezers of inventory wasting away, 21 workers who still needed their jobs and customers his family depended on.

The insurer "actually wanted me to stay closed and I could not afford that," said Espinoza, who used his life savings as a former printing-press operator to open the shop two years ago.

Needing help fast, Espinoza turned to a legal clinic opened earlier this month by Fredrikson & Byron (F&B) to offer free legal help to businesses damaged by riots along Lake Street, University Avenue, the North Side and elsewhere in the Twin Cities.

F&B's new legal clinic hopes to assist business owners such as Espinoza, who are struggling with insurance claims, tenant/landlord issues, and the loss of buildings, equipment, lease agreements, contracts and tax records destroyed during riots that damaged more than 500 Twin Cities businesses in less than a week.

F&B attorneys Kiel McElveen and Levi Smith, who both live not far from the police's gutted Third Precinct building on Lake Street, said they had to find some way to help their neighbors.

After surveying the damage in their neighborhoods, they reached out to the F&B partners to see what could be done.

"Our neighborhood really felt the riots. Businesses were impacted to a really extreme degree. So, this is a personal thing for us," Smith said. "People have suffered. If you drive down Lake Street you could tell that people are hurting. Our hope is that we can help everyone who needs help and doesn't have the resources to pay for legal help."

Dan Mott, an F&B business attorney, noted that many area businesses don't know what to do. "Their livelihood is gone. They have leases for buildings that were burned to the ground. The property no longer exists," he said.

Near Espinoza's ice cream shop, the Shell gas station across the street, the O'Reilly's Auto Parts store that's kitty corner, and the building next door are all gone, Espinoza said. He feels lucky to have escaped with just a bashed door and thousands of dollars in lost ice cream.

Losses are so extensive in the area that they have spurred toiletry and food-donation drives and now, free legal aid from F&B and a new partnership between Legal Corps and the Volunteer Lawyers Network. The two groups now offer riot victims free legal counseling and construction law services via a hotline (612-752-6687) and the help of hundreds of volunteer lawyers from various Twin Cities firms.

F&B attorneys said they want to be sure insurance firms don't lowball property-damage estimates and that banks work with victims to extend equipment or building loan payments.

"That gives you additional time to get back on your feet so you don't have to go into default on their loan," said Mott, who is taking clients' initial information before referring them to specialists inside the law firm. "Those are things we can help work out."

Pam Wandzel, F&B director of pro bono and community service, said prospective clients learn about the new legal help from F&B's nonprofit partners such as Neighborhood Development Center (NDC), Meda, Lake Street Council, the Northside Economic Opportunity Network and others helping business owners assess the damage, get insurance, retrace burned business documents and hopefully rebuild.

It was the Neighborhood Development Center that referred Espinoza to Wandzel at F&B.

The help came at a critical time, Espinoza said. "Many little businesses don't have the resources for an attorney or don't have insurance or know how to make sure they get a fair settlement. So these guys [from F&B] came in and helped us out a lot."

After the insurer for Espinoza's landlord learned he had an attorney, it let La Michoacana Purépecha reopen. But his inventory loss - thousands of pounds of handmade specialty ice cream and fruit-sicles - hit just as the store was to open a second location in St. Paul.

"I was concerned. But Pam [Wandzel] and her team probably spent 20 hours on my case," reviewing leases, contracts and insurance coverage before helping him fill out a complete insurance claim, Espinoza said. "They made sure that we were good to go."

Days later, eight other weary business owners walked into F&B's pop-up legal clinic inside the Midtown Global Market building.

One property owner needed help finding a structural engineer because his building was badly damaged by fire but his insurer insists it is not a total loss.

Legal aid for dire straits

A business owner with an established hair-braiding service needed help because her insurance company offered a very low settlement. In another case, an immigrant with a thriving restaurant on Lake Street that supported his family for decades suddenly had nothing but ashes. Among the losses: business records needed to solve an issue with the IRS. "It breaks my heart," said Wandzel, who is referring each client to the proper attorney or community-assistance group.

Some clients are traumatized.

Overnight, "your revenue stream is gone whether it's COVID-19 or because your building has been burned down," said F&B's Mott. "If ever there were victims here, these are the folks. They did nothing wrong but happened to be in the wrong place at the wrong time. They are small businesses just trying to support their families with these businesses and they have lost it all."

Given the uncertainty, F&B said it will keep the clinic running for as long as people need help.

"Fredrikson & Byron is a community of dedicated and compassionate lawyers and staff who contribute in concrete ways to assist those in need," said President John Koneck. "We stand together with our neighbors."

Legal help

Clients needing help can reach the legal clinic in three ways.

F&B operates a walk-in clinic inside the Graves Foundation office, across the hall from the Midtown Global Market on Lake Street and Chicago Avenue in Minneapolis.

Attorneys, wearing masks to guard against COVID-19, are meeting with clients on Tuesdays from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. and Thursdays 1 p.m. to 3 p.m. and plan daily sessions from Monday through Thursday during the week of June 29.

Businesses needing help can also call 612-492-8078 to leave a message in English or Spanish that will be returned in a day. Or they can complete an intake form online at legalhelp@fredlaw.com

At St. Joseph's Hospital in downtown St. Paul, doctors colloquially call them "the phone booths," but two private rooms that have been set aside as tele-medicine hubs for patients needing mental health and addiction therapy may represent the next frontier in remote treatment.

Using computer screens and AmWell virtual meeting software, outpatient clients can hold private conferences with psychiatrists, drug counselors and other professionals in a professional hospital environment, without fear of catching coronavirus.

"We realized when COVID hit ... that not all of our patients have the access to be able to use a smartphone or computer, or maybe they don't have a safe place in their home to be able to talk privately," said Dr. Rich Levine, a psychiatrist and family medicine provider who helped launch the effort. "That brought up the idea of a tele-medicine hub, a location where they could go to a private room or have virtual visits with a provider to be able to get care."

A pilot effort at St. Joseph's Hospital has drawn a handful of patients to date, and a third tele-medicine hub will soon debut across the street at Catholic Charities' Opportunity Center, which serves the homeless in downtown St. Paul.

If the effort goes over well with patients and providers, M Health Fairview may expand the tele-medicine hubs to other hospital locations.

"It's a first for our system," Levine said. "I can't speak for other systems, but I have not heard of this anywhere else."

Dr. Allison Holt, chief mental health psychiatrist with M Health Fairview's mental health service line, said the health system scrambled in the first three weeks of the pandemic to make online appointments

Telemedicine from within a hospital or homeless shelter? M Health Fairview says it's underway available as an alternative to face-to-face care. Some clients unable to manage face chat software had to use telephone lines.

The goal was to keep as many mental health patients as possible serviced remotely and have them avoid facilities where they could catch or spread the virus.

As time went on, however, the fear was that stresses around the pandemic, the economy and recent social unrest following the police-involved killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis would trigger a patient tsunami.

That hasn't exactly happened yet, but there's still some evidence that more needs to be done by the mental health community to help mitigate the intense stresses many Americans are feeling.

For M Health Fairview, inpatient mental health admissions remain slightly below pre-pandemic levels, but outpatient mental health visits have increased 14 percent, despite the fact they're largely held online.

If that trend continues, tele-medicine hubs could be an important tool in the toolbox.

"We haven't actually seen this big surge that we expected," Holt said. "It could be that people are just afraid to come in. We are seeing a higher acuity, though."

She added: "It's anecdotal, but the police are reporting more suicide attempts and overdoses. Our physicians are finding we're seeing more relapses on substances. People are so isolated, they don't have the supports as before. We think there's a lot of untreated mental illnesses and addiction."

Levine suspects even if the pandemic subsides enough for in-person counseling to resume, the tele-medicine hubs probably aren't going away.

The prospect of talking to specialists from across the state from a central location cuts down on travel time and missed appointments, important efficiencies at a time when both personal and hospital budgets have been hammered.

"The hope would be this could continue as another avenue to reach more patients, and reach a wider audience for our providers," Levine said. "Yes, we will eventually return to face-to-face, but not all of our care will be face-to-face."

The Minnesota Timberwolves have hired a sports-management firm to select a new jersey patch sponsor for the 2020-2021 season.

The NBA team said in a statement Monday that it is partnering with New York-based Excel Sports Management to find a sponsor to replace Fitbit, whose deal with the Wolves expired this year.

"The NBA jersey patch is one of the most iconic placements in modern marketing, and we know Excel Sports Management will help find a partner for the historic 2020-21 NBA season," said Ryan Tanke, COO of the Minnesota Timberwolves and Lynx.

The NBA began allowing teams to sell a single, 2.5-inch jersey patch starting for the 2017-2018 season. Fitbit was the first company to partner with the Wolves for the space, signing a three-year deal in 2017. (Fitbit is in the process of being acquired by Google.)

BLACK BIRD-WATCHERS DRAW ATTENTION TO RACIAL ISSUES OUTDOORS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

Length: 1213 wordsByline: Terry TangHighlight: Jason Ward fell in love with birds at age 14 when he spotted a peregrine falcon outside the homeless shelter where he was staying with his family.

Body

Jason Ward fell in love with birds at age 14 when he spotted a peregrine falcon outside the homeless shelter where he was staying with his family.

The now 33-year-old Atlanta bird lover parlayed that passion into a YouTube series last year. One of the guests on his first episode of "Birds of North America" was Christian Cooper, a Black bird watcher who was targeted in New York City's Central Park by a white woman after he told her to leash her dog.

A video capturing the encounter showed the woman, Amy Cooper (no relation), retaliate by calling the police and clearly referencing his race to raise the threat level.

Ward, who is Black, said the video, even now, is "jarring" to watch. Butting heads with dog owners is common among birders but he'd never seen it take such a turn.

"Especially knowing Christian and how confident he is, hearing his nervousness and trembling, it shed light on how dangerous that situation could have been," Ward said.

It didn't culminate in any arrests, and Amy Cooper later issued an apology. But it has brought attention to how the great outdoors can be far from great for Black people. Worries about discrimination, racial profiling and even subtle aggression keep some away. Furthermore, those fears can perpetuate the stereotype that hiking, camping and bird watching are "white" activities.

Christian Cooper's encounter, which happened on May 25, the same day as George Floyd's death at the hands of a white Minneapolis police officer, has been cited in nationwide protests against systemic racism and white privilege.

For Black people, the incident was not surprising, said Carolyn Finney, author of "Black Faces, White Spaces: Reimagining the Relationship of African Americans to the Great Outdoors."

"Systemic racism doesn't stop at the park gates," Finney said. "I've backpacked all over the world. ... There are places in this country I would never go on my own. It is my loss. I just don't trust the public."

Birding can take participants to parks, woods and suburban streets. Depending on the setting, Ward said he adjusts his demeanor so he doesn't seem threatening. He makes sure his face isn't covered even if it's cold. He always has his binoculars in plain sight rather than pulling them out of his bag.

"Just simple stuff like that I have to pay attention to that other people might say, 'What? Come on dude! They're just binoculars,'" Ward said. "If someone easily recognizes them as binoculars, it's still a case in which I have to prove that I'm actually looking for birds occasionally."

Mike Parr, president of the American Bird Conservancy, is white but his three sons are half-Black. His youngest, who is 12, has gotten into birding. Cooper's experience is now in the back of his mind.

"We personally haven't come across anything like that, but as a parent, I am concerned about things that could happen to him. Birding isn't all that well understood by people," Parr said.

Keith Russell, 63, an urban conservation program manager for the National Audubon Society's Philadelphia-based chapter, said as a Black person, he has his guard up if he's searching for birds with binoculars near homes. But he's never felt unsafe among fellow birders and hopes Cooper's close call doesn't scare off others.

"I think it's very very important to be clear for anyone who might not understand this and take a superficial view of this. ... It's not dangerous to be a birder if you're a person of color," Russell said. But, he added: "There have been historical problems with access."

He thinks for some Black families, past discrimination and segregation at parks and other recreation sites may have set them on a path away from nature. That lack of connection to the outdoors then continues with the next generation.

"It can take a while to make that internal culture go away. I think it's definitely starting to," Russell said.

The misconception that most Black people aren't outdoorsy may get bolstered by history books. Finney, the author, said too often the history of U.S. conservation centers on white figures like naturalist John Muir. Meanwhile, less attention is paid to the hundreds of Black soldiers who protected national parks after the Civil War.

The same goes for Hispanic communities. Many are unaware that Hispanics have connections with public lands going back generations, said Liz Archuleta, a county board supervisor in Flagstaff, Arizona, and co-founder of Hispanics Enjoying Camping, Hunting and the Outdoors.

"My mother tells stories about how at least twice a month on a Saturday, the entire Hispanic pioneer community of Flagstaff used to get together and go through the forest and have picnics," Archuleta said. "It's foreign to me when people say we have to get Hispanics to enjoy the outdoors more."

The shift in support toward Black Lives Matter after Floyd's death has every corporation and nonprofit re-evaluating how they can elevate Black and brown voices.

Black bird-watchers draw attention to racial issues outdoors

In the bird-watching world, there's already been an effort in recent years to do that. The National Audubon Society, which was established in 1905 to preserve birds and their habitat, has 1.8 million members. Approximately 198,000 identify as people of color.; only 45,000 identify as Black or African American.

"Obviously, that's not reflective of where the U.S. population is," said Rebecca Sanders, senior vice president of the organization's state programs.

The group is trying to recruit more minorities. Staff training now includes ways to intervene if someone is mistreated because of race or another trait. In the last year, they have set up chapters at dozens of colleges, including historically Black ones. They also filled almost half of nearly 100 internships and fellowships with people of diverse backgrounds.

"As our staff and our membership base become more representative, it changes who you are," Sanders said. "Those perspectives make us ask different questions and change some of our decisions."

Environmental organizations are making universal statements that the outdoors belong to everyone but, Finney said, they have to address that it's simply not the same for Black communities.

"The National Park Service and others want to engage diverse communities and often are bringing kids in," Finney said. "How is some Black teenager going to feel about their ability to feel safe and welcome?"

Since Christian Cooper's video, several Black professionals have reached out to Ward via social media to inquire about birding.

"We're definitely getting feedback from a lot of people who are saying 'You know what? I definitely want to get a pair of binoculars now,'" Ward said. "I thought this was boring and for people who didn't look like me."

Body

Minneapolis' police chief says the death of George Floyd was "murder" and that the officer who pressed his knee into Floyd's neck knew what he was doing because he had taken specific training on the dangers of positional asphyxiation.

It appears to be the first time Chief Medaria Arradondo has used the word "murder" to describe the death. Floyd, a Black handcuffed man, died May 25 after Derek Chauvin, a white officer, pressed his knee into his neck for nearly 8 minutes and held it there even after Floyd said he couldn't breathe and stopped moving.

Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and manslaughter. Three other officers - J. Kueng, Tou Thao and Thomas Lane - are charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and manslaughter.

All four officers were fired.

In response to questions and a data request from the Star Tribune, Arradondo issued a statement Monday night saying: "Mr. George Floyd's tragic death was not due to a lack of training - the training was there. Chauvin knew what he was doing."

Arradondo went on to say: "The officers knew what was happening - one intentionally caused it and the others failed to prevent it. This was murder - it wasn't a lack of training."

Attorneys for Chauvin, Thao and Kueng had no comment. A message left for Lane's attorney wasn't immediately returned to The Associated Press.

Arradondo said in his statement, first reported by the Star Tribune and also provided to the AP, that both Chauvin and Thao took training on the dangers of positional asphyxiation in 2014. The training, which covered how to get an arrestee from a prone position into a recovery or seated position, was required after a 2013 settlement with the family of David Cornelius Smith, a handcuffed Black man who died in 2010 after police pinned him face down.

Minneapolis police chief says Floyd's death was 'murder'

Arradondo said the department also changed its policy in June 2014 to explicitly require moving an arrestee from a prone position to a recovery position when the highest degree of restraint is used, and to require continuous monitoring of the person's condition.

He also said trainees continue to discuss the risks of in-custody deaths, and there's "simply no way that any competent officer" would be unaware of the need to move an arrestee so he or she can breathe freely.

Separately, leaders of the Minneapolis police union acknowledged Tuesday that bystander video of the police encounter with Floyd was "horrific" but said they've been denied the chance to look at body camera video that could shed more light on what happened.

The union's president, Lt. Bob Kroll, issued a statement soon after Floyd died cautioning the public not to rush to judgment and saying the union would provide its "full support" to the officers. On Tuesday, he told "CBS This Morning" that he thinks union members are being scapegoated for incompetent department leadership.

Kroll acknowledged that widely seen cellphone video of Floyd's death is "horrific," but that the union was left "blindsided" by being denied the right to review officer body camera video.

"Right now we cannot make an informed decision regarding the other officers that do not appear on camera," he said.

Union director Rich Walker said "any human being" that watches the bystander video knows that Floyd's arrest "should not have ended the way it did." But Walker questioned statements that Floyd didn't resist officers because the union hasn't seen footage of the minutes leading up to what the bystander video showed. LEWIS OPPOSES DEFUNDING POLICE

June 23, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 575 wordsByline: MATT MCKINNEY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Senate candidate renews support for law enforcement at the burned-out Third Precinct police station.Body

Republican U.S. Senate candidate Jason Lewis used the backdrop of the burned-out Third Precinct Minneapolis police station Monday to attack incumbent Sen. Tina Smith and other Democrats who have called for reforms in the wake of the police killing of George Floyd.

Warning that police reform efforts are descending into mob rule, Lewis called for the restoration of public order. He was flanked by about two dozen supporters, including several retired police officials.

"This notion that we're going to defund police departments: Who are you going to call, Dr. Phil?" he asked.

Lewis assailed calls to abolish the police and singled out a statement by Smith in which she said "there is something dangerously wrong about the role police play in society."

Smith's campaign issued a statement Monday afternoon saying she doesn't support abolishing the police.

"It is clear that we need to reimagine policing in a way that emphasizes de-escalation and community engagement. This is how we fulfill the fundamental promise that everyone feels safe in their home, on the streets in their neighborhood, and in their community," Smith said.

Lewis' pro-law enforcement message comes amid a nationwide debate over police and police tactics that's likely to carry into this year's election. Lewis said the conversation has now moved to Washington, D.C. He faulted Smith for not condemning statements by Minneapolis City Council members and others calling for the abolition or defunding of police departments.

Two retired Minneapolis police officers spoke in support of Lewis, as did Freeborn County Sheriff Kurt Freitag and state Rep. Brian Johnson, R-Cambridge. None of the speakers were active Minneapolis police officers or representatives of their union, the Minneapolis Police Federation.

Lewis opposes defunding police

Lewis, a former talk show host, served a single term in the U.S. House from Minnesota's suburban Second Congressional District before he was defeated for re-election in 2018 by Democrat Angie Craig.

The burned-out hulk of the Minneapolis police station served as a pointed reminder of the rioting and unrest that followed Floyd's death on May 25.

Efforts to pass police reform measures in the Minnesota Legislature broke down across party lines last week, with Republicans and Democrats trading blame for their inability to come to any agreements. A reform package proposed by DFL lawmakers would have added more officer training, boosted community-led alternatives to policing and raised the threshold for using deadly force. The Republicans' response would have matched some of the DFL initiatives, including raising training standards and requiring officers to intervene when colleagues use excessive force.

A survey last year showed widespread support for Police Chief Medaria Arradondo's plan to hire hundreds more police officers in Minneapolis. The City Council responded by raising the Police Department's funding in last year's budget from $184.9 million to $193.3 million.

The council also agreed unanimously to ban chokeholds and neck restraints by police officers and mandate officers to try to stop other officers from using improper force.

Despite partisan differences, a group of GOP state lawmakers called Monday for a U.S. Justice Department civil rights investigation into the Minneapolis Police Department. The request is being made by state Sens. Scott Newman, R-Hutchinson, David Senjem, R-Rochester, and Bill Ingebrigtsen, R-Alexandria.

WASHINGTON - Congress is hitting an impasse on policing legislation, as key Senate Democrats on Tuesday opposed a Republican proposal as inadequate, leaving the parties to decide whether to take on the hard job of negotiating a compromise or walk away despite public outcry over the killings of Black Americans.

The standoff threatens to turn the nationwide protests over the deaths of George Floyd, Breonna Taylor and others into another moment that galvanizes the nation but leaves lawmakers unable to act. Common ground is not out of reach. A new Associated Press-NORC Center for Public Affairs Research poll shows almost all Americans support some degree of criminal justice changes.

"This is a profound moment, it is a moral moment," said Sen. Cory Booker, D-N.J., a co-author of the Democrats' proposal. "The call is for us to act."

Yet Congress, as it has so many times before when confronted with crisis - on gun control or immigration changes supported by broad segments of the population - is expected to stall out, for now. Lawmakers are hesitant to make moves upsetting to voters as they campaign for the fall election. And President Donald Trump, facing his own reelection, is an uneven partner with shifting positions on the types of changes he would accept from Capitol Hill.

Ahead of a test vote Wednesday, Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell acknowledged it may fall short. If so, he vowed to try again, hoping to pass legislation before a July 4 holiday recess.

"This is not about them or us," said Sen. Tim Scott, the only Black Republican in the Senate and author of the GOP bill. It's about young people and others, he said, "who are afraid to jog down the street or get in their car and drive."

Congress stalls on policing overhaul, despite public outcry

The GOP's Justice Act would create a national database of police use-of-force incidents, restrict police chokeholds and set up new training procedures and commissions to study race and law enforcement. It is not as sweeping as a Democratic proposal, which mandates many of the changes and would hold police liable to damages in lawsuits. There are similarities on some issues, lawmakers say, but also vast differences.

Senate Democratic leader Chuck Schumer and top Democrats signaled they would oppose the Republican bill as "not salvageable," as they demand negotiations on a new, bipartisan package with more extensive changes to law enforcement tactics and accountability aligned with their own Democratic bill.

The Democrats are being backed by the nation's leading civil rights organizations and the lawyer, Benjamin Crump, representing the families of Floyd and Taylor, two African Americans whose deaths in police interactions sparked worldwide protests over racial bias in policing.

"The Black community is tired of the lip service," Crump said in a statement.

As talks potentially continue, Democrats are trying to force Republicans to the negotiating table to strengthen Democrats' hand. The House is set to approve the Democrats bill later this week. The two bills, the House and Senate versions, would ultimately need to be the same to become law.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi has indicated she is eager to enter talks with the Senate, a signal the door is not closed to compromise. Neither bill goes as far as some activists want with calls to defund the police and shift resources to other community services.

But in a CBS News Radio interview Tuesday, Pelosi said Republicans need to step up with a better bill. "They were trying to get away with murder, actually - the murder of George Floyd."

The comment drew sharp rebuke and calls from Republicans for her to apologize.

"We're ready to make a law, not just make a point," McConnell said as he opened the Senate on Tuesday. He said Americans "deserve better than a partisan stalemate."

During Tuesday's Senate floor debate, Republicans insisted Democrats would have a chance to amend the Senate bill if they allow the debate to begin. But Democrats countered there is no agreement their changes would be up for consideration.

"Now is the time for Congress to pass legislation that will bring real change," said Sen. Kamala Harris, D-Calif., a co-author with Booker and House leaders on the Democratic bill.

Political risks of inaction are high, as the public wants to see policing changes after nearly a month of constant demonstrations nationwide, in cities large and small, forcing a worldwide reckoning over law enforcement and racial injustice.

The NAACP Legal Defense and Fund is urging senators to vote against the GOP package on Wednesday and push for a broader bill.

"In this moment, we cannot support legislation that does not embody a strong accountability framework for police officers and other law enforcement who engage in misconduct as well as needed reforms to policing practices," the organization wrote to senators, according to a letter obtained by AP.

Congress stalls on policing overhaul, despite public outcry

The parties also face some degree of internal divisions within their ranks, with some Democrats likely to support advancing the Senate bill Wednesday, and some Republicans proposing their own law enforcement changes.

For example, Sen. Rand Paul, R-Ky., proposes ending the practice of sending military equipment to local police departments, which is similar to a provision included in the Democrats' bill but not in the Republican package.

And Sen. Mike Braun, R-Ind., wants to limit the immunity protections for officers in lawsuits. The White House has opposed that in the Democratic bill and it's not included in the Republican package.

"Just a few bad apples."

People like me - young black men - have been told this for decades, whenever we are brutalized by the police. And the claim has only been amplified with the death of George Floyd.

But it seems as if the country has finally come to the realization that the public safety system itself is built around systemic racism and oppressive practices. If it took millions of dollars in damages and hundreds and thousands of voices for this realization to come about, where does that leave the role of the police in the modern world?

Time and time again, those "bad apples" have been granted impunity to continue to tarnish the name of the police and taint the trust of the community, especially with black and brown Americans. Derek Chauvin had 18 complaints filed against him before he killed George Floyd, only two of which were closed "with discipline."

What discipline? Suspension? Desk duty? What purpose does discipline have if it doesn't deter future offenses? The prison system has a term for that: recidivism. And those who commit repeat offenses receive harsher punishment. But Derek Chauvin was allowed to not only continue his tenure as a police officer in Minneapolis, but was allowed to commit more offenses, including being involved with at least one other killing of a civilian in 2006.

What does this show us, the people who are supposed to place our trust in the police to "protect and serve?" At this point, it doesn't matter if there are a few "bad apples." While it may only be a small minority of police who commit these heinous acts, the rest of the system is more than willing to sweep their offenses under the rug.

POLICING

The idea that police can act with impunity, and are armed to do so, creates the cycle, which we have seen played out in the past and are seeing play out once more: The police commit a crime, the system covers for the officer, protests erupt, that officer is charged, and things return "to normal."

Notice the one thing that would break the cycle is missing from it: tangible change - change to how policing in the United States is done, so altercations like the ones that killed George Floyd and Philando Castile don't result in tragedy.

I hope, as a black man in the state of Minnesota, and as a U.S. citizen, that real change will come from the tragedy laid before our eyes. I hope, as a 20-year-old, that the rest of my life is lived in peace with the knowledge that the system protects and serves everyone, including those like me.

The noose found hanging in Bubba Wallace's garage stall at Talladega Superspeedway had been there since at least last October, federal authorities said Tuesday in announcing there will be no charges filed in an incident that rocked NASCAR and its only fulltime Black driver.

U.S. Attorney Jay Town and FBI Special Agent in Charge Johnnie Sharp Jr. said an investigation determined "although the noose is now known to have been in garage number 4 in 2019, nobody could have known Mr. Wallace would be assigned to garage number 4 last week."

A crew member for Richard Petty Motorsports discovered the noose Sunday at the Alabama race track. NASCAR was alerted and contacted the FBI, which sent 15 agents to the track to investigate. They determined no federal crime was committed.

The statement said the garage stall was assigned to Wallace last week in advance of the race scheduled for Sunday but held on Monday because of rain. Through video confirmed by NASCAR it was discovered the noose "was in that garage as early as October 2019."

The agencies said the evidence did not support federal charges.

Wallace successfully pushed the stock car series to ban the Confederate flag at its venues less than two weeks ago. There has been criticism of the ban by some longtime fans and security had been stepped up for Wallace, a 26-year-old Alabama native who has worn in the last month a shirt over his firesuit that read "I Can't Breathe." His paint scheme for a race in Virginia was Black Lives Matter.

NASCAR said in a statement that "the FBI report concludes, and photographic evidence confirms, that the garage door pull rope fashioned like a noose had been positioned there since as early as last fall. This was obviously well before the 43 team's arrival and garage assignment."

No charges in NASCAR noose incident involving Black driver Bubba Wallace

The Wood Brothers Racing team said one of its employees informed the team he recalled "seeing a tied handle in the garage pull down rope from last fall," when NASCAR raced at Talladega in October. The team said it immediately alerted NASCAR and assisted the investigation.

The discovery of the noose stunned the stock car series as it is taking an active position in a push for inclusion while distancing itself from its rocky racial history. The series first tried to ban the Confederate flag five years ago but did nothing to enforce the order.

Wallace two weeks ago renewed the call for a ban and NASCAR answered but has yet to detail how it will stop the display. Talladega marked the first race since the coronavirus pandemic that fans were permitted - 5,000 were allowed to purchase tickets - and some upset with the flag ban paraded past the main entrance with the Southern symbol. A banner flew over the speedway Sunday of a Confederate flag that read "Defund NASCAR."

NASCAR announced late Sunday the noose had been discovered and the industry rallied around Wallace. All 39 of his rival drivers and their crews helped push Wallace's car to the front of pit road before the national anthem and stood behind him in solidarity.

Wallace was joined by his team owner, Hall of Famer Richard Petty, who gently placed a hand on Wallace's shoulder as he sobbed. Wallace after the race went to the fencing along the grandstands and greeted supporters.

"The sport is changing," he said.

The shock of a mass shooting in Uptown that left one man dead and 11 other people wounded had barely subsided Monday when multiple shootings elsewhere in the city swelled the number of casualties.

On Monday, the day three separate afternoon shootings on the North Side left nine people injured, Mayor Jacob Frey announced details behind a multiagency effort to quell the bloodshed that has persisted over the past several weeks.

Joining the Minneapolis Police Department will be virtually every law enforcement agency within reach: the Hennepin County Sheriff's Office, Metro Transit police, and federal authorities from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the FBI and the Secret Service, according to the mayor.

"The violence and lawlessness that we've seen the last few days is not acceptable in any form," Frey said. "Residents, businesses and all that choose to be in Minneapolis for any reason deserve to feel safe."

Police Chief Medaria Arradondo declined to reveal how the other agencies will interact with his department, but he said it would include being a visible presence as well as providing intelligence.

Arradondo, the city's first black police chief, made a point to remind the public that many of the gunshot victims "are members of the African-American community ... young men. Their lives are not disposable. This cannot become our new normal."

Police say 111 people have been shot in the four weeks since George Floyd was killed in an encounter with four Minneapolis police officers, setting up widespread civil unrest. Arradondo said he does not believe the Uptown shooting had any connection to Floyd's death.

In the meantime, police spokesman John Elder said "we are making good headway" in the Uptown investigation.

There was no preliminary word on a motive or even how many shooters were involved in sparking the chaos while the area was bustling with activity now that bars and restaurants have loosened customer limitations during the COVID-19 pandemic.

More violence leads to more policing in Mpls.

Monday afternoon saw police at three scenes of gunfire. Shortly after 2:30 p.m., ShotSpotter technology recorded the sound of 41 rounds at N. 16th and Newton avenues, police said. One person went to the hospital in critical condition, while three others came away with noncritical wounds. Then shortly after 4 p.m., four people suffered gunshot wounds in a commercial stretch in the 600 block of W. Broadway. Another person was injured by gunfire just before 7 p.m. at 25th Avenue and 4th Street.

Two people were also stabbed, one fatally, in the 500 block of Nicollet downtown Monday afternoon.

Victim a husband, father

The man killed in this past weekend's mass shooting in Uptown was remembered as a loving husband and father and gifted hairstylist.

Cody Pollard "had a talent no one else could possess," said his brother Troy Pollard, who grew up with Cody in St. Paul.

A night out with a client took Cody Pollard, 27, to Uptown on Saturday, and it was just after midnight when gunfire erupted as the two were leaving Cowboy Slim's for downtown Minneapolis.

Cody was hit and died that same day, leaving behind his wife, Quinesha Adams, 4-year-old son Ocean and baby Khodi, who joined their family early this year.

"His family was everything, and his kids were his prized possessions," Troy Pollard said.

Cody Pollard took to cutting hair while watching his mother tend to the kids in their St. Paul home, Troy said.

"He started off cutting my hair," Troy Pollard recalled. "I was his first test dummy."

By age 15, he was jumping from shop to shop while honing his barber skills despite lacking a license. He kept up his grooming pursuits after moving to Norfolk, Va., as a high school sophomore to attend military school.

He and his wife have been raising their children in the University-Dale area of St. Paul. With his barber license secured, he was working at nearby Wrist Work Barber Lounge, a family-owned shop that hired him about a year ago.

Waiting for a haircut

On Saturday, before Cody Pollard left for Uptown and an evening of low-key socializing, he was supposed to give Troy a haircut.

"The boy had me waiting in his chair to get a cut while he was in Uptown," Troy Pollard said. "He always forgets."

But Troy's fond recollection soon gave way to thoughts of Uptown's mayhem stealing the younger brother he shared clothes with and who had a way of being his mentor.

"He always pushed me to have a plan," he said. "My baby, I loved him so much."

UPTOWN SHOOTING

On Sunday, 12 human beings were shot in Uptown ("Uptown reels after gunfire, bloodshed," front page, June 22).

Given the pace of recent rhetoric from the majority of the Minneapolis City Council members, it's tough for me to keep track: Was it "privileged" of those present to expect to be safe on the city's streets? In Uptown last night, when the first person's body was ripped open by a bullet and the shooters were moving on to their next victims, would the gathered crowd have been best served by a rapid response force of "elders and healers"?

Today, as the one victim lies in the morgue and 11 others lie in area hospitals, their bodies and minds in various states of brokenness, let's say it clearly: The majority of City Council is pushing to dismantle the police, but last night's butchery shows that City Council's emperors have no clothes.

Here in reality, every city resident grieves deeply for George Floyd, knows that transformative reform of the Minneapolis Police Department is essential and long overdue, and is trying to find ways to guarantee safety and opportunity for every person in the city - rights we're all entitled to, but that too many of our neighbors don't experience.

But dismantling the police? As long as shooters keep roaming the neighborhoods of the city where we raise our children, no.

Cam Winton, Minneapolis

To Lisa Bender, Minneapolis City Council president: You were elected to represent the 10th Ward, which includes Uptown. Please inform the public what you are doing, as an elected official, to get "all these guns out of our streets" as you stated. Please inform us as well what you are doing to "more proactively ... stop this type of violence." In the aftermath of a fatal shooting, I would suggest that you skip the platitudes and share specific details of how you plan to make this city's streets safer. In the absence of details, you are merely posturing.

CITY LEADERSHIP

More than one way to show courage

The author of the counterpoint to Norm Coleman's commentary on failed political leadership couldn't hide her agenda ("Coleman's no expert on courage," Opinion Exchange, June 20). She is evidently bitter that Coleman "dismissed" as "radical fringe" a 1991 campaign (in which she participated) on human rights protection for LGBT St. Paulites. This is the sole basis of her contention that Coleman lacks "courage and a sense of moral necessity."

Might it not have taken a bit of both personal and political courage for Coleman to publicly state, "It's time to defund and disband the current elected leadership at Minneapolis City Hall and find people with the courage and conviction to protect all of the people of Minneapolis, all of the time, everywhere in the city"?

And for Coleman to state that "blaming Republicans isn't an option as there isn't an elected Republican in the city as far as the eye can see" while knowing that there would be a progressive political blowback?

Actually, Coleman speaks for Minnesota's silenced majority and their disgust with failed political leadership.

SPECIAL SESSION

Legislature walks off the job early

Gov. Tim Walz stated on the news on Saturday that all Minnesotans should be disappointed that our Legislature went home without finishing their job ("No deals, on police reform or otherwise," front page, June 21).

I am more than disappointed. I am angry. I certainly did not go home when I was working if my work was not done. Our state is in a crisis as were all my patients. (I spent 32 years as an ICU nurse.) What would that have said about me if I just decided that I could go home because it was going-home time? When you are doing important work, you continue until the work is complete or someone stands in for you to continue that work. Lives depend on that.

To the Legislature: Get your rear ends back to the Capitol and finish the work with which you were tasked. No excuses. Just do it. Your state depends on you to do your best work every day, all the time.

TWIN METALS

Actually, we are happy to talk

The Star Tribune Editorial Board published an editorial on June 21 that wrongly stated that Twin Metals Minnesota responded to a request for a statement only by referring the editorial writer to its website

READERS WRITE See why we need the police?

("DNR fumbles decision on mining"). Here is the full statement Twin Metals delivered to the writer at her request on June 19:

Twin Metals Minnesota is committed to developing a 21st-century copper, nickel, cobalt and platinum group metals mine in northeast Minnesota that prioritizes environmental protection and stewardship. The access agreement granted by the Minnesota Department of Natural Resources allows for the collection of surface environmental data on state land. The information gathered through these baseline studies is critical for informing regulatory agencies and the people of Minnesota as the Twin Metals project undergoes the rigorous environmental review process.

"This access agreement notably does not permit any mining activity," said Julie Padilla, Twin Metals Chief Regulatory Officer. "It's essential for regulatory agencies, tribal governments and the public to have access to this data to complete a thorough environmental review. Additionally, this means we have the opportunity to contribute to the local economy through the hiring of trusted contractors to support Twin Metals in gathering this data over the coming months."

At Twin Metals, we take every opportunity we can to communicate with media members and the public on the details of our proposed mine. We are committed to having open and honest conversations with Minnesotans as our project moves forward. The communities in which we operate expect and deserve nothing less.

Kathy Graul, St. Paul

The writer is public relations manager at Twin Metals Minnesota.

As a retiree with mining experience in several different states, I appreciate the conclusion of the June 21 editorial.

However, the editorial contains an error that is as common as it is damaging to the debate. It refers to the copper nickel ore body as being "rich." It states that Antofagasta is "one of several companies aiming to eventually mine the rich deposits of copper, nickel and other precious metals in northeast Minnesota."

It's safe to say that Minnesota no longer has "rich" ore bodies. Admittedly, the Duluth copper nickel complex is huge, but it averages less than 1% mineralization. It will never be competitive on a global scale without subsidies and gutted environmental regulations by the Legislature, Department of Natural Resources and Minnesota Pollution Control Agency.

Our iron mining industry exhausted our rich natural ore and now survives on low-grade taconite operations and the bankruptcy courts. Mining professionals have a saying that "grade is king." There are no kings in Minnesota.

Our existing iron mines and proposed copper mines are unlikely to ever provide a net benefit to the state of Minnesota. According to the Department of Commerce, mining is less than 1% of Minnesota's economy. When you deduct the cost of assets stripped, waters degraded and tribal resources diminished, hard rock mining is a liability to the state of Minnesota.

One month ago, Yohuru Williams was winding down his work as arts and sciences dean at the University of St. Thomas and preparing to lead the liberal arts college at St. John's University in New York.

A nationally-recognized academic and activist in civil rights and racial justice who grew up on the East Coast, Williams said he was looking forward to working in a new community.

But the May 25 death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody changed all that.

"It was very difficult for me to leave after witnessing what we all witnessed in Minneapolis on Memorial Day, and to feel good about leaving this community in a moment where so much of my life's work is in this area," said Williams, who is Black.

In the weeks that followed, Williams and President Julie Sullivan launched a new racial justice initiative at St. Thomas that will keep Williams in the Twin Cities. The initiative will involve research, engagement and partnerships to learn about how to rebuild the community and prevent racism. It also aims to prepare St. Thomas students to lead in those efforts.

"These opportunities don't come along often, and when they do you really have to be poised to think about how you're going to make a difference and better your community as a result," Williams said.

Sullivan and Williams said the Twin Cities has become the epicenter of conversations on racial justice after Floyd, who was Black, died after being held under the knee of a white police officer.

"We had come to a tipping point, and in particular a tipping point in the Twin Cities," Sullivan said. "There's kind of a glaring light shining on the racial injustices that exist right here in our own community, as well as of course across our country and around the globe."

This St. Thomas dean had taken a job in New York. After George Floyd's death, he's staying.

Williams now is a distinguished university chair, professor and the initiative's founding director. Sullivan said his extensive experience on race and civil rights makes him well-prepared for the role.

"His career has always been about impact and the impact of teaching the history of racial disparities, and then getting involved in actions to eliminate them," Sullivan said.

The initiative is in its early stages, with an official start date of July 1. Williams said he will begin by listening closely to community members and deciding what steps to take.

"When you see academic institutions get involved in this work, they show up with all the answers. We don't have the answers. We need to show up and listen," Williams said.

The initiative will involve long-term work, and Sullivan said she envisions it existing at St. Thomas for many years to come.

The work will focus on the Twin Cities, but also beyond, examining and learning from other communities confronting racial inequality.

"Our country has never been a truly racially just society. So we have to build something that's never existed here, and that's hard," Sullivan said. "We have to come together across races to listen to one another and to nurture one another, and then work side-by-side with one another."

Ramsey County Board members lashed out at Sheriff Bob Fletcher during their Tuesday meeting, condemning his leadership, demanding a state investigation into his office and calling for a change in the county charter to make his position an appointed one.

The criticism follows allegations by eight minority employees of the Ramsey County Jail who said they were discriminated against when they were prohibited from interacting with former Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin at the jail last month, according to a complaint filed with the Minnesota Department of Human Rights.

"I support the opportunity for the public to have a say in an appointed versus elected sheriff," said Commissioner Jim McDonough. "I am angered and saddened that with all the good work this county is moving forward on that we spend so much time on the harm the Sheriff is causing in our community. It just sucks the air out of the room."

Fletcher dismissed the comments as political.

"Our elected sheriff's office has a strong, trusting relationship with the community," he said. "What we really need is an elected county manager who represents the needs of Ramsey County's citizens instead of the seven politicians who have confused accountability with control."

Fletcher and the board have had a strained, and at times, acrimonious relationship stretching back to 2009 when Fletcher's Metro Gang Strike Force was probed for aggressive tactics, something McDonough brought up at the meeting.

Ramsey County to research whether it could alter charter to make sheriff's position appointed instead of elected

"Commissioner McDonough is just using this as an excuse to forward his agenda to 'defund the police,'" Fletcher said. "McDonough never misses an opportunity to complain. Sadly, I've never heard him complain about the number one issue of his constituents - the increase in crime."

The board, which has been focused on addressing racial equity through its Transforming Systems Together program, said Fletcher's missteps are undermining their efforts.

"(Racism) truly is the evil that is spoiling a really, really great Ramsey County," said Commissioner Trista MatasCastillo. "As for the sheriff's department, we have seen this over and over and over. ... We need to make sure that we have oversight in many ways."

By state law, all sheriffs in Minnesota are elected. None are appointed other than to fill a temporary vacancy between elections. However, Ramsey County is the only county organized by charter. The county is looking at whether it gives them authority to appoint the sheriff.

In the meantime, the county board called for the state's Department of Human Rights to conduct a broad review of the sheriff's office. It also called for the sheriff's office to create a "trust and accountability" position within the department to report concerns to the deputy county manager.

Fletcher says he welcomes an investigation.

"We are confident any investigation will confirm best practices at the Ramsey County Sheriff's Office," he said.

The county is also considering whether to declare racism a public health crisis as a way to better address inequities. According to the Pew Research Center, a think tank based in Washington D.C., at least 24 state or county municipalities have made the declaration.

"Black and brown bodies are constantly being weathered, due to the stress of racism that causes disease; it causes early death," said Ramsey County Director of Public Health Kathy Hedin. "It doesn't matter the education that I have, the likelihood of me dying from a stroke earlier than a white counterpart with the same education level and the same income is higher because of what I look like. That is a crisis."

Two Minneapolis police officers answered a 911 call about a stabbing on East Lake Street on May 27 and found a chaotic scene as arson, looting and protests raged in the wake of George Floyd's death.

A black man lay on the sidewalk in front of the Cadillac Pawnshop with a gunshot wound to the torso. He was not breathing. A crowd of noisy protesters gathered around, some of them shooting videos with their phones and speculating about what had taken place. While one officer knelt beside the man and performed CPR, the second officer waved off protesters. Soon, more officers arrived as the crowd swelled.

Medical personnel grabbed Calvin "Chuck" Horton Jr., 43, by the arms and legs and loaded him into an ambulance that rushed him to HCMC, where he was declared dead at 9:37 p.m.

Horton's death was the only fatality during the protests and civil unrest that swept through Minneapolis in the aftermath of the May 25 killing of Floyd by police. Three weeks later, very little is known about what actually took place at the pawnshop and whether anyone will be charged with killing Horton.

John Rieple, 59, the owner of Cadillac Pawn at 1538 E. Lake St., was arrested after he shot Horton, claiming he was a looter, according to a police source on the night of his death.

Rieple, of Galesville, Wis., was later released without charges, however. Authorities say the case remains under investigation.

While the Star Tribune generally does not identify people who have not been charged with a crime, it is doing so with Rieple because his identity as the owner of the pawnshop is widely known and because he has been identified in other media writing about Horton's killing.

To date, neither police nor county prosecutors have publicly described Horton as a looter, though they acknowledge that it was one of the theories they are investigating.

A KILLING AMID THE RIOTS

"Sadly, there was one homicide ... where a gentleman was shot and killed outside of a pawnshop," Minneapolis Police Chief Medaria Arradondo said at a recent news conference. The case, he said, remains under investigation.

Meanwhile, Horton's family wants answers.

"Based on what we know, we are very disturbed about the circumstances surrounding Mr. Horton's death," Oliver Nelson, the family's attorney, said in a text message on Friday. "We are exhausting every effort to obtain the information to determine exactly why Mr. Horton was shot and killed. The family deserves to know this information for the sake of closure and for the cause of justice."

Horton, father of seven

Around 100 people attended Horton's funeral Friday in north Minneapolis. He lived in the Twin Cities, but had no permanent address, according to family members. He was unemployed and received Social Security disability payments, they said.

The Hennepin County Medical Examiner's Office has issued a short news release. Horton "died of shotgun wounds of the chest and upper extremities," it said. "Manner of death is homicide and Minneapolis police are investigating." The office has declined further comment, citing the investigation.

Horton leaves behind seven children. Five carloads of family and friends drove up Friday from Little Rock, Ark., where he was born and where his mother lives, to attend his funeral at Estes Funeral Chapel in north Minneapolis.

"I am very heartbroken," Horton's mother, Mae Roberts, said in an interview. "It's just devastating."

She said her son moved to the Twin Cities to live with his father, Calvin Horton Sr.

"He had always been a daddy baby," his father said. "I raised him from a baby to a man."

Horton attended North High School, his father said, but did not graduate. He would later earn his GED, and family members said he would "glow" whenever he had the chance help his kids with their homework.

"He put his kids before the world," said his daughter, Cadaezhah Horton, a student at Inver Hills Community College. "He always talked about his kids, wondering what we were up to."

She remembers fondly how he drove from Little Rock, where he had been living for three years, to Minneapolis so that he could attend her high school graduation.

"It is very tough, and to lose him the way we did is very hard," she said. "Looting or not, he shouldn't die for it."

Court records show Calvin Horton Jr. had a long history of criminal convictions, including for theft, marijuana possession, second-degree assault and driving after his license had been revoked. He also had a domestic assault conviction.

In February, he pleaded guilty to stealing more than $1,000 in merchandise from Target last November. Judge Luis Bartolomei sentenced him to 17 months in prison, but stayed imprisonment for three years while he served probation.

A KILLING AMID THE RIOTS

Horton wasn't perfect, said Mario Chizelle, a cousin. But he was kind, he was caring, and he helped his friends through some of the worst moments of their lives, Chizelle said.

"He was a loving guy, a peaceful guy," Chizelle said. "His heart was as big as this church."

Rieple, meanwhile, has said nothing publicly about the shooting.

When a reporter, identifying himself from the Star Tribune, called Rieple on Thursday at a phone number listed on his pawnshop license, the man who answered hung up. Messages seeking comment were left at Rieple's home in Galesville, 23 miles north of La Crosse, Wis.

Minnesota Secretary of State records show that Rieple incorporated Lincoln Pawn and Jewelry under the business name of Third Financial Corp. at the current address of Cadillac Pawn shop on East Lake Street in 1990. He renamed it Cadillac Pawn and the Gold Mine in 1997. Minneapolis pawnshop licensing records only go back to 2004 when it was listed as Cadillac Pawn. Rieple describes himself in business records as chief executive.

At one time, he owned a pawnshop and a jewelry store in Winona and, in 2002, a business called Mainstream Firearms and Marine, also in Winona. He also once operated a pawnshop in La Crosse.

He and his brother, Tom Rieple, bought and restored an old fishing pier in 2010 just beneath a lock and dam near La Crosse. John Rieple, who doesn't regularly work at the pier, was filling in for his brother in 2013 when a houseboat lost power and was sucked through the dam, capsizing and hurling 11 people overboard.

Rieple was in a pontoon boat when he saw the wreckage and helped pull five people out of the water while rescuers from the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers were able to save the others.

Tom Rieple said he hasn't spoken much with his brother since he was arrested.

"He's up in Minneapolis and I'm down here," he said.

Any criminal charges against Rieple in Horton's death will depend on what prosecutors find happened that night at the pawnshop, said Marshall Tanick, a local attorney who was not involved in the case. Under common law, a person has the right to use lethal force if someone breaks into their home, but that isn't necessarily the case if someone breaks into their store.

Unless the owner or others are in imminent danger of grave bodily harm, they generally have a duty to retreat, though they may use reasonable force to repel an intruder, short of killing the person, Tanick said.

"If the person was looting or caught in the act of looting, [shooting the looter] is not self-defense," he said.

Staff writers Libor Jany and Ryan Faircloth contributed to this report.

"A Breath for George," a collection of songs, interviews and poems that has been showing in outdoor screenings at locations around the Twin Cities since June 14, has added dates to its schedule.

Created by New Dawn Theatre and Minnesota artists, the production features actors, theater-makers, civil rights leaders and educators.

"A Breath for George" is a response and call to action in the wake of the killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis. It was scheduled to run one week at a number of Twin Cities theaters.

Additional screenings include one at 8 p.m. Saturday, June 27, at the Ordway in downtown St. Paul. The event is free and "A Breath for George" is shown on the outside of theater buildings. Audiences can bring lawn chairs and receive an Action Guide pamphlet listing ways to get involved, including support for victims' families, community support, organizations working against police abuse and rebuilding. It also contains protest tips and support resources.

POST-PROTEST VIRUS SURGE NOT SEEN

June 23, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 921 wordsByline: JEREMY OLSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Drop in case numbers a hopeful signBody

A surge in COVID-19 cases following the mass protests and riots over the May 25 police killing of George Floyd has not yet materialized, despite aggressive testing over the past two weeks of people involved in the demonstrations that roiled the Twin Cities.

The Minnesota Department of Health on Monday reported four more deaths and 308 more lab-confirmed cases of COVID-19, an infectious disease caused by a novel coronavirus. That is the lowest number of COVID-19 deaths reported in one day in the pandemic since April 13.

Only 1.5% of tests at four community sites last week of people involved in demonstrations turned up positive for the presence of the virus, suggesting that all of the shouting and crowding didn't result in widespread transmission.

"That is a relief," said Kris Ehresmann, state infectious disease director.

State officials warned that the positive trends could be upset, though, if Minnesotans stop complying with recommendations to wear masks in public and practice social distancing. Arizona and other states in the south were faster than Minnesota in scaling back restrictions on businesses and social mobility, and have seen cases spike upward.

Minnesota health officials are concerned that a declining trend in the median age of COVID-19 cases - now at 40.4 years of age - suggests that more young people are disregarding social distancing and spreading the virus.

Minnesota permitted limited indoor restaurant and bar service as of June 10, along with restricted reopenings of fitness clubs and entertainment venues. Ehresmann said the impact of those changes won't be known for another week or two.

Post-protest virus surge not seen

Contact tracing interviews with people diagnosed with COVID-19 since June 3 found that at least 6.5% had been at restaurants before their infections - though it was unclear if they already had the virus or were infectious during these visits.

An increase in workplace infections is driving down the median age of those sickened as well. The state has been tracking outbreaks in food processing plants in southern Minnesota's Mower County - where there have now been 802 confirmed infections and two deaths.

"We all have to be doing our part to make sure that we are social distancing, wearing masks, all of those things," Ehresmann said. "We certainly don't want to see our cases increase and then have to dial back" on the reopening of business and activities.

The pandemic has caused 1,384 deaths and 33,227 known cases in Minnesota. The state also reported that 332 patients with COVID-19 were hospitalized on Monday, and that 156 required intensive care. The number of hospitalized patients increased by 10 since Sunday, but remains below the peak of 606 patients on May 28.

The latest figures come more than three weeks after some of the heaviest demonstrations over Floyd's death, and more than two weeks after a June 4 memorial event.

Many protesters did not wear masks, raising concerns that they would infect one another while shouting and standing in tight crowds. However, health officials hoped that the virus didn't spread as much outdoors.

Secondary impacts of the prolonged pandemic are beginning to show. The U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention on Monday showed a decline since the start of the pandemic in emergency room visits for heart attacks, strokes and uncontrolled blood sugar.

Ehresmann said these trends reflect people who are no longer going to the ER - perhaps due to fear of COVID-19 exposure - and putting their health at risk.

Childhood immunizations also have declined as people have stayed away from clinics. The number of measles shots in the state in March was 70% below the same period a year earlier. While vaccination levels improved this spring, health officials worried that parents wouldn't seek them this summer because they usually time them with physicals for sports and activities and camps that may have been canceled.

"We could see a resurgence of vaccine-preventable - but still highly contagious - diseases at a time when our public health system is already strained in response to the pandemic," U.S. Sen. Amy Klobuchar, D-Minn., said in a letter sent Monday to the U.S. Secretary for Health and Human Services that called for more education on vaccinations.

Klobuchar on Monday also disclosed that her father - 92-year-old former Star Tribune columnist Jim Klobuchar - has COVID-19. The senator's husband had been hospitalized in March due to COVID-19 as well, but has recovered. Klobuchar said she spoke with her father outside the window to his room in an assisted-living facility and that he is doing OK.

Two of the four deaths reported Monday involved residents of long-term care and assisted-living facilities, bringing the statewide total to 1,095, or nearly eight out of 10 deaths to date. The majority of

'The Hook' goes live again

ARTICLE DCCCLXXXV. 'THE HOOK' GOES LIVE AGAIN

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 23, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 996 wordsByline: CHRIS RIEMENSCHNEIDER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Davina & the Vagabonds jump-started the venue's HookStream virtual series.Body

They live only three blocks from the venue that hosted their first gig in three months on Saturday night. A few weeks earlier, though, bandleaders Davina and Zack Lozier had to rely on TV news helicopter footage to know if the Hook & Ladder was still standing.

"We were following it in real time," Davina recalled just before showtime Saturday. "Whenever we'd get a glimpse of it, we'd say, 'It's still there!' "

Is it ever. The south Minneapolis performance venue - around the corner from the charred remnants of what used to be the Third Precinct police headquarters - rather miraculously survived the riots and destructive rampaging along E. Lake Street and Hiawatha Avenue following George Floyd's tragic death in police custody on May 25.

Now, "The Hook" is ready to breathe new life into its gasping neighborhood - on top of its original, pre-riots goal of helping the Twin Cities music scene survive the coronavirus quarantine.

Over the weekend, the nonprofit venue returned to action with the HookStream, a series of professionally produced, livestreamed fundraiser concerts inaugurated by Southern-baked jazz-rock darlings Davina & the Vagabonds. It was just a nice coincidence that the kickoff band happened to come from the neighborhood.

In fact, the HookStream was supposed to start June 5, but it had to be delayed as the venue's operators cleaned up after fire and water damage and other destruction caused by rioters. The shows even had to be moved into the smaller but more open-air Mission Room because the main Hook & Ladder theater space - in a historic firehouse that executive director Chris Mozena declared "a sturdy old building built to last" - just got its electricity turned back on late last week.

His smile obvious beneath his face mask after Saturday's concert, the Hook's marketing director and co-booker Jesse Brodd seemed content that Davina's crew wound up being the test pilots.

'The Hook' goes live again

"A lot of the people watching online commented that it felt good to have live music back," said Brodd. "It was great to start with a full-blown band like that, with horns and everything."

Was it ever. Davina's music is steeped in the buoyant jazz and R&B of New Orleans, a city that knows a lot about bouncing back from turmoil and tragedy with an extra bounce in its step.

On Saturday, she and the band encoored with "Shake That Thing," a rowdy NOLA standard featuring her husband and trumpeter Zack Lozier on vocals. They opened their set with another oldie carefully chosen by Davina: "When My Sugar Walks Down the Street," popularized by Ella Fitzgerald.

"My music would be nothing without black music," said the bandleader, who pledged to donate her pay for Saturday's performance to two Minneapolis funds, the Association for Black Empowerment and Pimento Jamaican Kitchen's Relief Services.

And yes, it actually was a paying gig. Tickets cost $15 apiece for access to the livestream via Crowdcast.io (look for a rebroadcast Wednesday at 8 p.m.). Nearly 200 of them were sold, which Brodd proudly noted amounted to more than a sold-out show in the Hook's Mission Room.

All of this week's HookStream installments and many others will be webcast for free via the venue's Facebook page and website, including New Primitives on Thursday, the Mae Simpson Band on Friday and Charlie Parr on Saturday. Viewers in those cases will be asked to pony up for "cover" via Venmo tips to the artists and/or donations to the Hook via its website.

Some of the upcoming $8-$10 ticketed performances include GB Leighton (July 9), the Bawdy Down benefit for Black Table Arts (July 10), Frogleg (July 11) and the Belfast Cowboys (July 25).

Once the venue's heavily damaged bathrooms and theater space are operable again - hopefully by fall - it plans to begin selling a limited number of tickets for patrons to enjoy the HookStream performances in person under safe distancing guidelines.

In any case, money from tickets, donations and sponsorships will be divided among the musicians, the venue and the HookStream production team - a six-man crew Saturday that worked four cameras, lights and audio and video mixing boards.

"The point is to bring live music back at the professional level people expect here," Brodd noted.

Viewers of the webcast seemed impressed: "It sounds so good, Hook folks!" Minneapolis musician Annie Enneking wrote in the comments section.

Cleo Swanson posted at show's end, "My husband and I danced in our kitchen to your last song. How fun!"

Davina and the band seemed satisfied with the results, too.

A full-time touring act, she was supposed to perform in Australia, instead of south Minneapolis, last weekend to tout her latest album, "Sugar Drops." Some U.K. gigs and many other shows also had to be canceled this summer due to the coronavirus.

'The Hook' goes live again

In the interim, Davina delivered a variety of livestreamed and home-recorded performances during quarantine that were successful, but, she wryly noted, "They were more on the level of first-year film students."

"There's just no replacing us all being together in a real live music room like this," the bandleader noted, standing outside the venue over speckles of broken glass from when looters broke in during the unrest.

With the ruins of Minnehaha Liquor and numerous other damaged buildings across the street, she added, "it was hard to know what to play and how to act."

"I just decided to do what we do best and hope that helps make things better."

Good plan. That same approach from the Hook & Ladder should also serve its community well in the coming months.

ARTICLE DCCCLXXXVI. TOUGH START FOR NEW HCMC CHIEF

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 23, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1182 wordsByline: ROCHELLE OLSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Jennifer DeCubellis had been CEO of Hennepin Healthcare, the sprawling system that operates the county's flagship trauma hospital and clinics, for two weeks when COVID-19 upended her transition plans.

Then on Memorial Day, George Floyd arrived at HCMC's stabilization room, the stop for patients who need the fastest lifesaving measures available.

Then came the riots, bringing nervous nights as DeCubellis and staff girded for an influx of trauma patients and worried about smoke from fires throughout the city infiltrating the downtown Minneapolis hospital, where patients on ventilators fought for their lives.

"As tired as folks are, as scared as folks are ... the passion that drives people here is incredible," she said of the staff at the hospital and clinics that Hennepin Healthcare oversees.

The new CEO comes through these career-defining challenges committed to the view of HCMC as a leader in the community health, a safety net for the poor but also a leader in teaching, trauma and innovation.

"It's about doing the right thing first and figuring out the policy and funding levers later," DeCubellis said in an online interview from her office. "We're not in it to pad pocketbooks; we're here to get better health outcomes."

DeCubellis, 50, came to HCMC from the county, where she had worked for much of the last decade and stood out for her commitment to public health innovation, her deep knowledge and unflagging work ethic. She was hailed a health care "rock star" at the county, and now she's expected to make Hennepin Healthcare a leading innovator and care provider.

To her, COVID-19 has shown why Hennepin Healthcare must be a leader across the racial and income divide. "If we keep everybody else healthy, we're keeping ourselves healthy," she said.

Tough start for new HCMC chief

Her broad vision helped her land the job. She is not a physician and does not have an MBA. Her background is in special education and she has a master's in psychology, but she's always sought jobs that put her in the center of a challenge.

As a 13-year-old growing up in Deephaven, she taught American Sign Language to children with Down syndrome. In her first job out of the University of Wisconsin-Madison, she taught special education to violent, emotionally disturbed teenagers in Chicago. Her innovative approach landed her in a Chicago Tribune cover story.

At the county, she helped shape Hennepin Health, a separate organization that coordinates medical, mental health and social service needs for those who receive Medicaid benefits. Changes included bringing prescriptions to homeless shelters so that patients wouldn't come to the emergency department for refills and setting up a dental clinic downtown.

At Hennepin Healthcare, a subsidiary of the county, DeCubellis oversees 7,000 employees with an annual budget of $1.1 billion. Hennepin Healthcare includes HCMC and a network of clinics in Minneapolis, Brooklyn Park, Golden Valley, Richfield and St. Anthony. The system includes a large psychiatric program, home care and hospice, plus a research institute, a philanthropic foundation and Hennepin Healthcare Emergency Medical Services.

HCMC is the flagship hospital, which includes Level 1 adult and pediatric trauma centers, a 473-bed academic medical center, a large outpatient clinic and a specialty center.

Funding is always an issue because HCMC's fortunes are tied to state and federal reimbursements. "Every tax dollar counts," DeCubellis said.

Every year, Hennepin County cuts a check to HCMC to cover uncompensated care. It's usually about $28 million. This year, it could be as high as $100 million, depending on reimbursements for COVID-19 patients.

"We're pulling every funding lever we can," DeCubellis said.

County Commissioner Mike Opat has been a longtime booster of DeCubellis. County Board Chairwoman Marion Greene was on the committee that chose her for HCMC.

Her trial by fire shows her talent, Opat said. "There's hope for the institution again," he said. "She has a unique way of bringing a bigger picture focus to the place."

Greene was equally effusive, saying, "With the onset of the pandemic, I thanked my lucky stars that she was the hire. Navigating something as complex as this, we had chosen a CEO who knew who to call and whose calls would be answered."

Even before the pandemic, Hennepin Healthcare was facing challenges.

Former CEO Dr. Jon Pryor left abruptly in early 2019 amid an ethics scandal. The U.S. Food and Drug Administration found HCMC had failed to provide adequate oversight and safeguards on the use of ketamine to calm agitated patients.

Tough start for new HCMC chief

Last June, an emergency doctor at HCMC was forced to end his work for Axon Enterprise Inc., the Taser stun-gun manufacturer. The doctor had been working at least 32 hours a month as a paid consultant to Axon.

In contrast, just last week HCMC's aggressive use of a common steroid, dexamethasone, to treat COVID-19 was validated by a British study. HCMC physicians had been using the drug for severe cases since the start of the pandemic.

While DeCubellis may be the new leader, she directs the spotlight onto the staff both in interviews and in her daily work.

"Our job as leaders is to support the front lines and not just our nurses and docs, but our security staff and our food staff," she said.

Throughout the pandemic, senior leaders have rotated working from home and coming into the office - although DeCubellis admits she likes to walk the halls. She came into her job with what she called a "glorious 90-day plan" to learn about the operation. That was shredded within two weeks because of COVID-19 as the system started closing the doors to the ambulatory clinic and limiting access to essential staff.

What she's seen since, she said, is a staff committed to serving the greater good.

"Their first answer is always, 'What's right for our community?'" she said.

She offered examples.

There's the staffer she met in the psychiatric ward who puts a fresh flower in her visor every day to provide a dose of beauty.

There's the funny-informative video the OB-GYN staff made for worried expectant mothers, promising a "happy birth day" for their babies. "Nobody asked them to do that," she said of the video.

There were the staffers from the Lake Street clinic the morning after the riots, who "instead of going home, they're sweeping up with everybody else," DeCubellis said. "We need to help invest in rebuilding that neighborhood," she added.

In the interview from her office, DeCubellis was relaxed, comforting and ready with answers. Her windowsill was lined with photos of her family, including her husband, Ken, and their three kids, 20-year-old son Quin, 18-year-old daughter Sydney and 12-year son Luca.

One book, "Rebel Talent: Why it Pays to Break the Rules in Work and in Life," was perched alone on a shelf.

When she's not in the office, the family relaxes outdoors or boating on a nearby lake.

"I couldn't be more inspired by the work here so it doesn't feel like you need a getaway," DeCubellis said.

Then when it's time to head to work, DeCubellis said Sydney sends her off with a cheery, "Go do good, Mama."

Chauvin firing is justified, Kroll says

ARTICLE DCCCLXXXVII. CHAUVIN FIRING IS JUSTIFIED, KROLL SAYS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 24, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 949 wordsByline: PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: But police union leader says rank-and-file officers are being scapegoated.Body

The president of the Minneapolis police union said Derek Chauvin's deadly restraint of George Floyd is troubling and substantiates his firing, while he maintained steadfast support for the rank and file.

In his first public comments since Floyd's death on May 25, Lt. Bob Kroll said in a string of media interviews that members of the Minneapolis Police Federation are being unfairly "scapegoated by political leaders in our city and our state, and they have shifted their incompetent leadership, failed leadership onto us and our membership, and it is simply unjust."

However, he acknowledged in an interview aired Tuesday on "CBS This Morning," that Floyd's curbside arrest "does look and sound horrible" on the Facebook video shot by a bystander. It documents the unarmed and handcuffed Floyd repeating "I can't breathe" and begging for his life.

Kroll went further in a follow-up interview with KARE-11, on Tuesday in his criticism of former officer Derek Chauvin, who planted his knee in Floyd's neck, saying the officer's firing was justified because "we've got a pretty good picture of what Chauvin did. It's easy to form judgment there and terminate."

It's a different tone from a letter Kroll wrote to union members days after Floyd's death, in which he expressed support for all four officers involved and said he was working with defense lawyers and labor attorneys to "fight for their jobs. They were terminated without due process."

Kroll was joined by three fellow union leaders for the series of interviews with Twin Cities and national media. They refused to give an interview to the Star Tribune. In a November profile, Kroll said he would no longer talk to the newspaper if it reported his marriage to WCCO-TV reporter and anchor Liz Collin. He said he was concerned it would negatively affect her career.

Video review sought

In the "CBS This Morning" interview, Kroll said the officers' body camera footage could present a fuller picture and that the union has the right to see the still-undisclosed videos.

Chauvin firing is justified, Kroll says

"It may shed some light that we are unaware of," Kroll said in response to questions from anchor Gayle King. "Right now, we cannot make an informed decision regarding the other officers that do not appear on camera."

In a statement Tuesday afternoon, Mayor Jacob Frey's office said the body camera video from when Floyd was restrained cannot be released in the midst of the ongoing investigation. Exceptions include dispelling "widespread rumor or unrest."

In June 2018, Frey released the body camera video from when police fatally shot Thurman Blevins. The difference, said mayor's spokesman Mychal Vlatkovich, is that there was no witness video to Blevins' encounter with police as there was when Floyd was detained.

Kroll has been the object of repeated protests outside union headquarters, and Police Chief Medaria Arradondo said he has had conversations with him about the Floyd case but declined to say whether he asked Kroll to no longer represent more than 800 Minneapolis and park police.

Kroll said in an interview Tuesday with Minnesota Public Radio that as public pressure mounted, he weighed resigning as head of the union, but board members wanted him to stay for the sake of stability.

'Failed exercise in leadership'

Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter for pinning his knee into Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes.

Facing aiding and abetting charges are J. Alexander Kueng and Thomas Lane, who also had their weight on the unarmed and handcuffed Floyd until he become unresponsive and died. A fourth charged officer, Tou Thao, stood by keeping watch over witnesses. All have been fired.

Kroll, a persistent target of criticism, both for his unabashed defense of officers accused of misconduct and because critics believe he represents a bygone era of policing, pushed back during the "CBS This Morning" interview.

"We will be on the right side of history," he said, while acknowledging that what the bystander's video showed happening to Floyd "is horrific."

King questioned Minneapolis Police Federation Vice President Sherral Schmidt, Kroll's designated successor.

"I'm not one that likes to Monday-morning quarterback things," said Schmidt, when asked how the officers on the scene should have handled Floyd. "If I was there, I probably would have put him on his side in a recovery position once he went unconscious."

Another board member, officer Rich Walker, accused news media of feeding the viewpoint that police have it out for black suspects.

"The narrative that is being pushed in the media is that white police officers are out on these streets just to kill black men, and this is absolutely farthest from the truth," said Walker, who is black.

"We are not defending the actions of Mr. Chauvin. What happened to Mr. Floyd is a tragedy. [But] police officers are not out here just randomly hunting black people to kill them. That's just terrible."

Chauvin firing is justified, Kroll says

Along those same lines, Kroll said that "issues certainly need to be addressed. And we are willing to work through that as we have done in year after year. ... There are racial issues. Is it systemic racism? Not in my opinion."

The four officers are having their legal defense paid for the by the Minnesota Police and Peace Officers Association (MPPOA), whose top official pointed out on "CBS This Morning" that the public has yet to hear all the facts about the cases against the men his group is defending.

However, MPPOA Executive Director Brian Peters went on to address Chauvin's actions during Floyd's arrest, saying, "He betrayed the badge. And there's no excuse for it."

Chauvin's attorney, Eric Nelson, declined to respond to Peters' comment.

With so much rage from officials and community members directed at Lt. Bob Kroll, he had considered whether he should step down as president of the Minneapolis police union.

He discussed it with the Minneapolis police chief, the Minneapolis Police Federation board and officers.

"I thought if it might help calm the situation in Minneapolis, if that would do it, I would consider it," Kroll said Tuesday. "And the feedback that I got back from our membership and our board was exactly the opposite - that it would just fuel more fire and (rioters) would take it as a victory, much like taking the 3rd Precinct empowered them to ... destroy South Minneapolis."

Kroll and other Minneapolis police union leaders spoke out publicly Tuesday - it was the first time since George Floyd died after officers pinned him to the ground, while he was handcuffed, on May 25.

Kroll said they all agree a bystander's video of what happened to Floyd was "absolutely horrific."

"Very tough to watch," he said. "Does not reflect our department."

In the aftermath, four officers - who were fired - were criminally charged in Floyd's death; the Minnesota Department of Human Rights past decade of racial practices; and Minneapolis City Council members announced they would begin the process of ending the police department.

In a 30-minute interview on Tuesday with the Pioneer Press, Kroll and Minneapolis police union leaders discussed declining morale among officers, what they see as a path forward, and that they don't see systemic racism in law enforcement.

WHY DID THEY DECIDE TO TALK NOW?

Minneapolis police union president in wake of George Floyd: He considered stepping down, but officers told him to stay

Brian Peters, executive director of the Minnesota Police and Peace Officers Association, said they spoke out Tuesday because they wanted to shut "down the false narratives." The association represents 10,400 officers in the state and Peters said those rank-and-file cops have become scapegoats.

"Leadership really needs to turn and look in the mirror," he said. "At the state level, at the city level nobody's doing that right now."

Officer morale has been devastated, said officer Rich Walker Sr., a director of the Minneapolis Police Federation. Some officers who were close to retirement decided to leave early and others resigned because "they feel our city's not going to support us," he said.

Kroll said he think it's unfair and misdirected that city leaders have focused their attention on the police union and him. Protesters also gathered outside WCCO-TV, where Kroll's wife, Liz Collin, is an anchor and reporter.

"It's despicable behavior the things that they're saying to her," Kroll said.

Monique Cullars-Doty, an organizer with Black Lives Matter Twin Cities Metro, views Kroll as blaming the administration, but she said, "really, the whole police system is unjust."

"There's a lot of history ... and Bob Kroll cannot remove himself from that history, he cannot blame or try to make himself and the police federation victims," she said.

BURNING OF THE 3rd PRECINCT

Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey, who pleaded for calm during rioting, approved the decision to abandon the city's 3rd Precinct station on the night of May 28, surrendering it to people who set fire to the building,

That morning, officers who worked in the precinct were told to collect their belongings "because they were going to give it up," Kroll said Tuesday.

Frey said in a Tuesday statement: "I'm not interested in Kroll's arm-chair quarterbacking. However, I will note that the governor has repeatedly stated no city could have handled a crisis of this magnitude without support from other jurisdictions, and the full mobilization of the Minnesota National Guard opened a wide-ranging investigation into the Minneapolis Police Department's the Associated Press reported was necessary."

Walker, who worked in the 3rd Precinct, said Tuesday, "I don't believe I've ever felt the sense of loss of faith in our city leaders when I was rushing to empty my locker out. I never thought that we would get to this point that our leaders would quit on us."

WHY DID KROLL BRING UP FLOYD'S CRIMINAL HISTORY?

In an earlier two-page letter to Minneapolis Police Federation members, Kroll wrote, "What is not being told is the violent criminal history of George Floyd. The media will not air this."

Kroll's letter came to light on June 1 when former Minneapolis Police Chief Janeé Harteau tweeted it and wrote, "A disgrace to the badge!"

- Janeé Harteau (@ChiefHarteau) June 1, 2020

Kroll said Tuesday that he put out the letter hastily after they were working long hours.

"It was a collection of thoughts and relaying what we as a federation board had been doing," he said. "It was intended to improve member morale and it was not well thought out. There were things in there that I shouldn't have included and it certainly was not to be shared to the media. It's not our job to research the criminal history or share that and we didn't do that."

SYSTEMIC RACISM IN LAW ENFORCEMENT?

Discussions about systemic racism have been front and center in Floyd's death - he was Black and officer Derek Chauvin, who knelt on his neck for more than 7 minutes, is white.

Walker, who is also vice president of the National Black Police Association's Minnesota chapter, said Tuesday that it's his opinion that there's not systemic racism in law enforcement.

"I believe it's a punchline used right now to divide us," he said. "It's very divisive and it needs to stop. I believe we have progress in our city that people are failing to recognize. We have a Black attorney general. Our city council has a lot of minorities on it. Our chief is Black. I'm the first ever elected Black union leader in my department. You don't hear that."

And anywhere that there is systemic racism, Walker added, "We need to find it, we need to corner it and we need to fight it together."

DO POLICE UNIONS PROTECT BAD OFFICERS?

Among a host of police accountability bills proposed during the special session of the Legislature, which , was a bill that would have changed arbitration procedures for police officers.

Frey and other mayors expressed frustration that officers who are fired for misconduct can .

Sgt. Sherral Schmidt, Minneapolis Police Federation vice president, said Tuesday that they don't take every case of discipline or termination to an arbitrator.

"There are cases that we agree with the administration on and we agree that we're not going to grieve those cases," Schmidt said.

"Chauvin's one of them," Kroll added.

A PATH FORWARD?

Minneapolis Police Chief Medaria Arradondo announced earlier this month that he would withdraw from police union contract negotiations ended in a stalemate early Saturday get their jobs back through the arbitration process.

Is there a way forward, past the strife between Minneapolis' leadership and the police federation?

Minneapolis police union president in wake of George Floyd: He considered stepping down, but officers told him to stay

"I'll tell you the exact opposite way is to pull away from the table," said Sgt. Anna Hedberg, a police union director. "It's very disheartening because up to May 24, we had a great working relationship with the front office."

After Floyd died, Hedberg said, "The narrative changed to, 'We have systemic racism.' It caught a lot of officers off guard because now our own chief and our own city officials are painting us with a broad stroke."

Schmidt said they're not opposed to ideas about reform or changes, but they don't agree with bills being quickly passed at the Legislature.

"We need to have thoughtful conversations about what this looks like and do it right the first time," she said.

A white Minnesota state senator and former sheriff downplayed racism and police violence in a news conference Tuesday on the topic of police reform - and promptly drew criticism from an African-American senator.

At one point during the news conference, Sen. Bill Ingebrigtsen, R-Alexandria, seemed to suggest an equivalence of black-on-white racism from black suspects toward white officers.

"As far as racism, I just, I think it's just a sidebar here is what it is, and I'm sorry to say that," said Ingebrigtsen, who sits on the Senate's judiciary and public safety committee and served as Douglas County sheriff for 16 years. "You're not gonna wanna hear that. I want somebody to be treated exactly the same as somebody who's whatever color. There shouldn't be any color involved here.

"In fact, I guess I could say that I happen to be very close to an officer that responded to a Grand Forks incident that happened two nights after the George Floyd incident where a black man was being evicted out of the house and killed a white cop. I guess that's part of the job. It's a horrible part of the job. I didn't see a whole lot in the media about that. Not a lot. So, is there racism? Probably so. Maybe it's all over the place."

The suspect in that killing, Salamah Pendleton, 41, of Grand Forks, N.D., has a history of run-ins with, and even violence toward, police officers, but there doesn't appear to be any public information suggesting race was a factor; police were serving an eviction order when he opened fire. Pendleton is black; the officer he's charged with killing, Cody Holte, is white.

State Sen. Jeff Hayden, DFL-Minneapolis, took issue with Ingebrigtsen's words.

MN senator says 'racism is just a sidebar' in Minneapolis police scrutiny. Black senator: That's 'insulting.'

"It is insulting to suggest that racism is a sidebar to the pattern of police violence from the MPD against black and brown communities," said Hayden, the Senate's assistant minority leader. "Structural racism is a central issue in need of investigating, and our colleagues in the Senate majority would know this if they would make any effort to engage with members of the People of Color and Indigenous Caucus on criminal justice and policing reforms."

The stated point of Tuesday's news conference was for Senate Republicans to announce they've asked the U.S. Department of Justice to begin a thorough investigation into the Minneapolis Police Department.

Normally, the type of "pattern-or-practice" probe they've called for would be done by the DOJ's Civil Rights Division "to reform serious patterns and practices of excessive force, biased policing and other unconstitutional practices by law enforcement." In other words, the same issues that many Democrats - including Hayden - as well as police critics, Black Lives Matter causes and others have been asking for.

Republican senators have faced criticism from Democrats for not agreeing to as many changes to state policing laws as Democrats want. At the news conference, which also included Sens. Dave Senjem, R-Rochester, and Scott Newman, R-Hutchinson, they seemed to be trying to position themselves as hardly obstructionist in the matter, but as also seeking to probe the issue, which came to the fore of the state and the nation in the wake of the death of George Floyd on Memorial Day.

However, that message was immediately a bit confused when the very announcement of the news conference said the federal probe should look at "specifically, the department's response to the riots that followed George Floyd's death." At the news conference, the senators suggested at least part of the focus should be on the Minneapolis City Council and Mayor Jacob Frey and their posture toward the police department, from Frey's proposed funding for new officers to the city council's recent shift in favor of dismantling the entire department.

Ingebrigtsen downplayed the notion of racism at several points in the news conference.

The first time the question was posed, he said this: "As far as the racism in Minneapolis, I don't know exactly the numbers ... but I think the police shootings that result in death nationwide are less than one and one half percent by police officers, period. ... Most of the crime that you do see is race-on-race. In other words, black-on-black and white-on-white."

Gov. Tim Walz earlier this month directed the Minnesota Department of Human Rights to perform exactly the type of probe that the Republican senators have asked the feds to do. The senators said that investigation couldn't be trusted because Human Rights Commissioner Rebecca Lucero has already said systemic racism exists in the department.

Trump says 'learn from history' instead of removing statues

WASHINGTON - As America grapples with racism in its past, President Donald Trump lined up squarely Tuesday with those who argue that the pendulum has swung too far in favor of removing statues and other symbols of that flawed history, saying mistakes will be repeated if not learned from and understood.

Trump's campaign also sees the divide over this latest cultural flash point as a way to boost the president's standing, which has suffered during his handling of the coronavirus outbreak and the protests over racial injustice that followed George Floyd's death in Minneapolis.

After weeks spent demanding "law and order" in response to the protests sparked by Floyd's death by police, Trump began to draw a line in the sand.

He promised executive action to protect monuments after some statues of Confederates and other historical figures with checkered life stories were angrily brought down from parks and other places of public prominence.

Trump said he wants the maximum punishment available under federal law - up to a decade in prison - for those who destroy or tamper with statues on public property that commemorate anyone who served in the U.S. military. He said the executive order would "reinforce" existing law.

"We are looking at long-term jail sentences for these vandals and these hoodlums and these anarchists and agitators," Trump said, referring to protesters who have vented their anger over racial injustice by toppling statues of figures tied to America's racist history.

He spoke out after an attempt Monday night to bring down a Lafayette Park statue of Andrew Jackson, one of Trump's favorite presidents, was foiled by police in the park across from the White House. Trump called it a "sneak attack" on the statue of Jackson, who owned slaves and was ruthless in his treatment of Native Americans.

Trump says 'learn from history' instead of removing statues

"We should learn from the history," he told Fox News in a taped interview broadcast Tuesday. "And if you don't understand your history, you will go back to it again."

Trump's campaign sees the attempts to remove statues as a potential presidential lifeline. The campaign argues that liberals are dramatically overreaching by embracing calls to "defund the police" and remove statues of American icons taught in history books.

At his Tuesday address in Phoenix to a gathering of Students for Trump, the president sought to tie the "radical left" to efforts to demolish monuments, while praising police for thwarting the Monday night attempt to topple the Jackson monument.

"If you give power to people that demolish monuments and attack churches and seize city streets and set fire to buildings, then nothing is sacred," Trump said. "And no one is safe."

Trump's prior defense of Confederate statues and military bases named after such figures amounted to a political risk in the current climate. But aides now believe the president has found an unexpected new attack line against Democrats as the effort to remove symbols has spread in some places to include the likes of Presidents Ulysses S. Grant, Jackson and George Washington.

Though all three figures were flawed individuals, Trump's campaign believes he can use them to wage a culture war and position the president as the defender of a way of life that is threatened by demographic change and generational shifts in views on issues from marriage to racial justice.

Calls to overhaul policing and confront lingering racial inequality may be bipartisan, but Trump's reelection team believes the most aggressive steps being pushed by some Democrats will turn off centrists and energize the president's base -- many of whom share his avowed commitment to safeguard symbols of the nation's past. A White House official and a campaign aide outlined the president's thinking speaking on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the matter publicly.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell on Tuesday cast the "lawlessness" of the attacks on statues as a cultural phenomenon among "far-left radicals" in need of a history lesson.

"Our founding fathers are being roped to the ground like they were Saddam Hussein," McConnell said, referring to Iraq's former authoritarian leader. Iraqis celebrated the end of Hussein's government by toppling a statue of Hussein in Baghdad in April 2003.

McConnell, R-Ky., criticized protesters for doing the same to statues of Washington and Thomas Jefferson. And he marveled at efforts to take down statues of Grant, the "general who crushed the Confederacy, the president who used federal force to fight the Klan. They, too, have been placed on the historical hit list for this new Red Guard that nobody elected."

Sen. Tim Scott of South Carolina, the chamber's only Black Republican, also decried the toppling of statues but said celebrating "all of our history would be crazy."

"I'm not going to celebrate all of our history because all of it shouldn't be celebrated," Scott told Fox News on Tuesday. "But we should remember it."

Trump says 'learn from history' instead of removing statues

Visitors to the Lafayette Square area Tuesday also panned the statue removal effort.

Wenola Wade, a white resident of the District of Columbia, said she's frustrated that "we're not far enough along" in dealing with systemic racism but added that "we can't take down every single statue. That's stupid."

"To me, that takes away from what the real message is," said Wade, 75, who was walking near Lafayette Square around midday hoping to see some of the protesters' posters.

Daryl Colter, an African American who lives in a Maryland suburb, brought his 5-year-old daughter to a street near the White House that the city has renamed as Black Lives Matter Plaza as an educational moment.

He said he wants leaders from the government and the protest movement to get together and have discussions about the Jackson statue and others, but "you can't just go around taking it into your own hands and just tear something down."

"Defacing, tearing it down, it's going against the cause," Colter said.

American University history professor Alan Kraut said he and some of his colleagues have used the statues as teaching tools but that a more appropriate question amid the renewed scrutiny is whether their physical destruction makes society better.

"Do you enrich society and social opportunity and social justice by tearing down these statues or is this just a feel-good moment?" Kraut asked.

The White House declined comment on when Trump would issue the executive order.

Blasts rang out as Keion Franklin pulled up to a red light in north Minneapolis on Monday. He thought at first that he heard firecrackers, but he quickly realized they were bullets when he saw nearby pedestrians begin to scatter. Franklin ducked, honked the horn and raced around the corner.

The shots kept coming - he thought he heard at least 30 - and struck four people, including a man Franklin knew from working with youth at Farview Park.

Still wearing a neon vest from his job at a cement company, Franklin watched in wary disbelief as police sealed off the stretch of Lyndale Avenue north of W. Broadway. He had been thinking about crime, the roles police play and the meaning of racial justice more than ever since the May 25 killing of George Floyd under the knee of a Minneapolis cop and the "defund police" movement that followed.

Now those forces had converged in the latest of a spate of shootings on the North Side, as city leaders scrambled to call in outside law enforcement to help stop the violence.

"I know on one side of the city, it looks beautiful for defunding to happen," Franklin said from the parking lot of Merwin Liquors as investigators marked shell casings that fell inches from where his car had driven. "But here on this side of the city, I'm scared if you defund the police ... Is it going to turn into World War III over here?"

Surveying the block, Steven Belton, president and CEO of the Urban League Twin Cities, noted a "significant, dramatic uptick" in violent crime since June 7, when nine Minneapolis City Council members publicly pledged support for defunding police.

Belton called the move irresponsible, even as he supports transforming the department. He said those council members had not consulted with people who have a stake in the black community, particularly those on the North Side.

ON THE NORTH SIDE, NO PUSH TO 'DEFUND'

Violent people "have used that sound bite - 'defund the police' - as an indication that there is no consequence, that there is no policing, and [concluded] that they are free to do whatever they want to do," Belton said.

'I needed to get up'

A month ago, Franklin was watching TV with his 15 year-old son, Jaydin, when they saw the news of Floyd's death.

Not again, he thought.

From the start, the 37-year-old Franklin saw himself in Floyd. They were both black fathers who moved here from the South - Franklin from Arkansas, Floyd from Texas. Franklin had faced racial profiling and tense encounters with cops.

He hadn't joined past protests against police brutality. But a friend who participated in demonstrations over Michael Brown's 2014 killing by police in Ferguson, Mo., stressed the importance of being at "ground zero." Franklin demonstrated for seven days straight and paid homage to Floyd where he died on 38th Street and Chicago Avenue.

"I realized, instead of sitting here being voiceless, I needed to get up," Franklin said.

In the wake of riots and looting that followed Floyd's death, residents joined together on the South Side to patrol their own streets. Franklin was convinced that a smaller police presence could work in part of the city. But he wasn't sure about north Minneapolis, where he served as a football coach to 10-to 14-year-old boys at Farview Park.

Last October, Franklin and fellow coach Clinton Scott were leading their team through stretching and conditioning drills when two men were shot in a drive-by near the north side of the park. The same month, the parent of a player punched them during a dispute at a game, and they said police were slow to respond.

The men unsuccessfully advocated for more park police patrols in the area.

"I'm tired of being put in these situations where we don't have police on the field," Scott said.

Like Franklin, he was frustrated by a perceived mismatch of public safety officers to community needs.

"Either the police are over-policing or in the next minute they're just nowhere to be found," Scott said.

Outrage over Floyd's killing spurred Franklin to volunteer with ISAI AH, a faith-based coalition fighting for racial and economic justice. He went with Scott to North Commons Park for a discussion on public safety that ISAI AH co-hosted on June 14 for black residents.

Wearing a T-shirt that said, "Get your knee off our neck," Franklin hung back in the shade as speakers voiced their frustrations with law enforcement. He listened as organizer Brian Fullman said that Police Chief Medaria Arradondo is a good man, but he's part of a system that must go.

"There's a culture inside of the Minneapolis Police Department, and to extract the culture, you've got to strip it down to its bare bones," Fullman said.

ON THE NORTH SIDE, NO PUSH TO 'DEFUND'

Franklin believed that working with youth through the park system could make a real difference in breaking the cycle of violence, but he doubted that community involvement in north Minneapolis was widespread enough to offset the elimination of the police department, as some activists have promoted.

A rash of shootings

Early Sunday morning, a fusillade of gunfire tore through Uptown, injuring 11 people.

Afterward, police said 113 people had been shot in Minneapolis since Floyd's death.

The violence carried into Monday, when a 2:30 p.m. shooting near the southwest corner of North Commons sent one person to the hospital in critical condition and wounded three others.

Ninety minutes later and a mile to the east, Franklin was driving south on Lyndale when he heard the gunshots that caused him to seek cover. He later learned that his acquaintance from Farview Park took a bullet in the ankle.

Arradondo briefly visited the corner as a crowd gathered.

"Y'all don't need to be here right now," Franklin told some of the boys he knew from Farview Park. "Because if they get to shooting again, y'all will be in the midst."

Franklin said with his extended family in Arkansas, he's on his own in Minnesota. He worries not just for the future of his three sons, including a 4-year-old and 1-year-old, but also for the boys he coaches.

Franklin was conflicted over the best solution to the city's violence. But he believes much would improve if officers policed communities where they live. Just 8% of Minneapolis police officers live in the city. He thinks a lot of North Side kids are over-policed for petty violations, which make it harder for them to find work or to feel safe when police respond to more serious crimes.

"It's like a no-win situation in some cases for our youth because they don't know who to trust and who to look to for safety besides people in the streets," Franklin said.

'The murder station'

The intersection Franklin drove through when the shots broke is marked by a Winner Gas Station that has been the site of so much crime that the locals call it "the murder station."

For several hours after the shooting, people came by to ask what happened. Franklin lamented that it almost seemed like the day's entertainment. He explained the shooting to one woman passing by and told her about the attack near North Commons, too.

"Tonight is going to be crazy," he predicted.

An hour after Franklin left the scene, someone was wounded by gunfire a half-mile north.

POLICE CHIEF SAYS 'THIS WAS MURDER'

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 730 wordsByline: JENNIFER BJORHUS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Two officers were trained on preventing suffocation.Body

Derek Chauvin and Tou Thao - two of the officers involved in killing George Floyd May 25 - both took department training on preventing suffocation in people being restrained face down, the Minneapolis Police Department confirmed.

In one of his most forceful comments yet on Floyd's killing, Minneapolis Police Chief Medaria Arradondo issued a statement Monday night, saying, "Chauvin knew what he was doing."

"Mr. George Floyd's tragic death was not due to a lack of training - the training was there," he said. "This was murder - it wasn't a lack of training. This is why I took swift action regarding the involved officers' employment with MPD," Arradondo said.

While a number of public officials in Minnesota, including Gov. Tim Walz, have started calling Floyd's killing a murder, it appears to be the first such public statement by the police chief. Department of Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington called Floyd's death "murder" on May 29, just hours before Chauvin was charged with third-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter.

Arradondo released his statement late Monday in response to public records requests for specific training records after questions were raised about whether the Minneapolis Police Department ever fulfilled a promise in a 2013 settlement to require all sworn officers to undergo training on the dangers of positional asphyxia.

Arradondo said that the MPD "went beyond the requirements" of the settlement. It not only provided the training, he said, but changed its policies in 2014 to "explicitly require moving an arrestee from a prone position to a recovery position when the maximal restraint technique is used and require continuous monitoring of an arrestee's condition."

Police chief says 'This was murder'

He went on to say that the MPD continues to emphasize training on the tactics: "There is simply no way that any competent officer in MPD would be unaware of the need to get an arrestee into a recovery position so that he or she can breathe freely."

Chauvin's lawyer, Eric Nelson, is not commenting on the case.

The 2013 settlement stemmed from a lawsuit filed by the family of David Cornelius Smith, a black man who died in 2010 after police pinned him face down, while handcuffed, on the floor of the downtown YMCA in Minneapolis. The city paid the family $3 million to settle the claims.

Earlier this month, Smith's sister Angela Smith and a family lawyer made an impassioned plea to the city's civilian Police Conduct Oversight Commission to find out whether the training the family won as part of its settlement was ever conducted.

In an interview, Jeff Storms, a lawyer who represented the Smith family in its lawsuit, said he wants to verify the chief's claim.

"The statement that was released by the chief does not satisfy our concerns and we will continue to do our due diligence to ensure that the settlement agreement was complied with," he said.

In a WCCO television interview Tuesday, Lt. Bob Kroll, the head of the Minneapolis Police union representing rank-and-file officers, said he did not disagree with Arradondo's statement.

"From what we've seen there, it's very tough to refute that," Kroll said in the interview. "But that's for the criminal justice system to decide."

Afsheen Foroozan, chairman of the Police Conduct Oversight Commission, could not immediately be reached for comment. Commission member Abigail Cerra said she couldn't speak for the commission, but added that as a lawyer she was "stunned" by the statement.

"As a prosecutor I would jump on that, calling Rondo as a witness and having Rondo testify about the training that was provided, how often it was provided, testifying as to which officers attended the training," Cerra said.

Cerra, who, along with the Star Tribune filed public records requests for the training data, said she still hasn't received a response from the MPD and wants to see the records.

"It's taken three weeks to get an answer about was this training requirement met," she said.

Marshall Tanick, a defense attorney who has represented law enforcement personnel, said he was "flabbergasted" by Arradondo's statement.

"It could significantly prejudice his right to a fair trial," Tanick said of Chauvin. "I'm fairly sure that the defense team will raise this comment in conjunction with other comments made by public officials to seek dismissal of the charges or at least a change of venue."

READERS WRITE PROTECT AND SERVE WHOM?

THE POLICE

In his recent opinion piece, Elijah Todd-Walden poignantly asks, "What does this show us, the people who are supposed to place our trust in the police to 'protect and serve'?" (" 'Bad apple' theory is of little comfort to me," June 22). Todd-Walden's question comes in light of the impunity systemically granted to officers like Derek Chauvin, who had 18 complaints filed against him before George Floyd's death. The question could also well be asked in the wake of increasing gun violence in Minneapolis. On a recent night in Uptown, when police were prepared for trouble and present all night, 12 people were shot. At the end of the night, one of the victims had died and still no shooters were in custody. And we are supposed to place our trust in the Minneapolis Police Department to "protect and serve"?

It is time to amend the city charter. It's clear that we are not dealing with "just a few bad apples" but a decadeslong lack of public accountability and oversight. What this latest shooting tragedy shows us is that more policing does not stop crime or gun violence. The Minneapolis Police Department has not made our neighborhoods demonstrably safer at the same time as it has funneled crucial resources away from real solutions to public safety crises like homelessness and opioid addiction. As Minneapolis residents, we have a chance now to demand a vote and create together the kind of city Todd-Walden hopes for.

Craig Simenson, Minneapolis

We're writing to support the police in St. Paul and Minneapolis and not to underfund or abolish them. But changes need to be made, of which we think the following may be helpful. There ought to be continuing education for officers, along with semiannual performance reviews - more frequent if a complaint is made. When an officer's review shows poor performance, he/she should be required to attend a mandated re-education program or even face dismissal from the department. Finally, there should be annual recognition of officers who have made significant achievements in service to the community. There could be more opportunities for police to be involved in the community they serve.

Police departments, well-run and trusted, are windows through which the city is viewed. A high regard for the police is a genuine value to the Twin Cities.

David and Karen Conradi-Jones, Shoreview

I'm white, middle-class and old. I've experienced police in seven states where I've lived in the last 55 years, most either for traffic stops or as a witness to someone else's interaction, or on rare occasions when assistance from a police officer would have been helpful. From my perspective, I have to admit that when an officer is actually helpful or useful, it is a surprise. Generally, like the old man in "Catch 22," when I've heard the equivalent of "Help! Police!" it has meant that someone is being abused in some way by the police.

Anyone familiar with produce in a barrel knows that the rot in bad apples doesn't take long to infect most of the barrel's contents.

BUS LINES

Improve transit, lessen poverty

What to do about glaring differences in opportunity for our black, brown and indigenous citizens? A good first step would be to listen to the people most impacted. A second would be to focus on actions that are proven to work. A third would be to help our children.

Six elected officials of color at the city, county and state level are asking for better transit for their constituents ("Transportation access creates real change," Opinion Exchange, June 19). Specifically, they are asking for funding of three bus rapid transit lines that serve low-income and minority neighborhoods.

A large and careful study ranked factors that predicted whether children growing up in poverty would become successful adults. No. 1 was decreasing the time parents spend commuting to work. Fewer hours on the bus means more time for nurturing, helping with homework and fostering habits that lead to success.

Bus rapid transit is a fast and relatively inexpensive way for people to get where they need to go. Fares are paid before the bus arrives. Stops are spaced out. Platforms are elevated so there is less waiting for passengers with strollers or wheelchairs to board. Two lines are already operating in the metro area and functioning well.

Progress on the bonding bill at the Legislature has been slow because of rural/urban and conservative/liberal differences. Building out the B, D and E lines for $75 million is an investment that politicians who advocate for small government and personal responsibility should recognize as a deal.

HOMELESSNESS

Camping in the park won't fix this

The affirmative vote by the Minneapolis Park and Recreation Board to allow the homeless to camp in any city park they choose is a dangerously irresponsible decision ("Minneapolis park leaders to homeless: You can stay," June 19). This decision jeopardizes public safety and does nothing to help those in need. It is my opinion the city needs to find and repurpose facilities to rehabilitate the homeless who are able and to care for those who are not. If the governor thinks it appropriate to spend millions of taxpayer dollars on a facility to store dead people, perhaps the same consideration may be afforded the living.

It appears city and state government is either indifferent or incapable of finding a long-term solution. It seems obvious that a turn to the private sector is necessary. I believe that with adequate funding, an organization such as Mary Jo Copeland's could provide the solution. The cost may seem unaffordable in the short term; however, continued inaction and the costs of the board's decision to the city will be incalculably greater.

I understand that on the surface this may not look to be our biggest issue. But this is one more issue that impacts the health and safety of Minneapolis residents, and this list is beginning to look insurmountable. Police conduct, riots and Park Board approval of repurposing our public parks all impact the health and safety of the residents of this city.

We need solutions that go to the root of the issue rather than what appears to be simply applying Band-Aids and kicking the problems down the road. Please create some long-term solutions.

PRESS FREEDOM

Don't undermine the essential

I want to compliment the Star Tribune on a very poignant and timely editorial on June 22 ("Free press attacked in the Philippines"). Even more reference should have been made to constant attacks on the free press in America by our president.

There is good reason why freedom of the press is guaranteed in the very first amendment to our Constitution. The founders understood democracy is dependent on an informed citizenry.

A constant harangue by President Donald Trump about reporting and inquiring press as fake news, enemies of the people, purveyors of misinformation undermines the most fundamental freedom in our society.

Philippine President Rodrigo Duterte and Trump both have a right to disagree with what the press reports. But constantly undermining, suppressing and demeaning something so essential to democracy is dangerous. How many times has the free press saved our form of government in a little over 200 hundred years? The Teapot Dome scandal and Watergate are only a couple of important examples.

Thank God for the First Amendment!

RAMSEY COUNTY BOARD 'APPALLED, ANGERED' BY OFFICERS' SEGREGATION

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 24, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 742 wordsByline: KIM HYATT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Ramsey County commissioners rebuked jail leadership Tuesday for barring correctional officers of color from guarding Derek Chauvin and said they welcomed an external investigation of the sheriff's department amid charges of discrimination.

Chauvin, a former Minneapolis police officer, was booked at the county jail May 29 after he was charged with third-degree murder and manslaughter in the death of George Floyd.

All officers of color at the county jail were ordered to a separate floor and prohibited from any contact with Chauvin because a supervisor said their race would be a potential "liability" around Chauvin, according to a copy of racial discrimination charges filed Friday on behalf of eight officers.

Toni Carter, the Ramsey County Board chairwoman, said the allegations "are of high concern."

"We are appalled and angered that several Ramsey County employees of color were allegedly prevented from performing their professional responsibilities," Carter said, reading from a written statement during Tuesday's board meeting. "We stand united in apologizing to the employees involved, and also in commending them for speaking up to demand the professional respect and human dignity they are due."

Jail Superintendent Steve Lydon has since been demoted. The Department of Human Rights is expected to launch a racism probe into the county jail. The state agency is also investigating the Minneapolis Police Department following Floyd's death.

Commissioner Jim McDonough said Sheriff Bob Fletcher lacks accountability and perpetuates racism and cronyism in the department.

He and other commissioners welcomed an external investigation into the department since Fletcher is unwilling to work together with commissioners, McDonough said.

Ramsey County Board 'appalled, angered' by officers' segregation

In April, Fletcher rehired two former employees McDonough said the county worked hard to fire. One officer was accused of falsifying time sheets while the other received ongoing racist, sexist and pornographic messages on his work e-mail.

McDonough questioned the election process for sheriffs and whether that's the best way to address public safety. Other commissioners agreed with taking a deeper look at structural changes, and whether appointing a sheriff is a better approach.

"There is this pattern of abuse of power," McDonough said. "I am angered and saddened that with all the good work this county is moving forward on, that we spend so much time on the harm the sheriff is causing in our community. It just sucks the air out of the room."

Commissioner Trista MatasCastillo said while she was "shocked" by the news report over the weekend about the discrimination charges, she noted examples in Fletcher's "failure of leadership" over and over again. Commissioner Nicole Joy Frethem said there is no excuse for discrimination.

"Every supervisor should know that you cannot change someone's work duties or work assignments solely based on that person's race," she said. "That is civil and human rights 101."

Carter announced a set of actions to uphold commitment to racial equity by requesting the Human Rights Department conduct a broad investigation that may include other aspects of Ramsey County to address past missteps.

The board is also requesting the sheriff immediately use a vacant position to create a "trust and accountability officer" who will report to the deputy county manager within the Safety and Justice Service Team. The position would also work closely with the county's chief compliance and ethics officer.

Carter said to bring "more significant structural change" the board will be evaluating the home rule charter and pertinent legislation to identify the appropriate process for the community in whether the sheriff should be elected or appointed. She said this re-evaluation is intended to provide more transparent, accountable and equitable public safety services across Ramsey County.

Fletcher in a statement Tuesday night said he supports the external investigation, but would not comment on whether his department would create a new trust and accountability officer position.

"We are confident any investigation will confirm best practices at the Ramsey County Sheriff's Office," Fletcher said.

"Our elected Sheriff's Office has a strong, trusting relationship with the community. What we really need is an elected county manager who represents the needs of Ramsey County's citizens instead of the seven politicians who have confused accountability with control."

TWIN CITIES PRIDE 2020: VIRTUAL, SOCIALLY-DISTANCED AND POLITICALLY CHARGED

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 24, 2020 Wednesday

Length: 951 wordsByline: Isabel Saavedra-WeisHighlight: While the traditional Loring Park festival and Sunday parade are canceled, organizers are trying to find ways to keep people engaged.

Body

Typically this time each year hundreds of thousands of people would flock to the Twin Cities for the annual Pride Festival raising awareness, spirits and money.

But the deadly coronavirus pandemic has forced organizers to halt this year's festivities. And protests of racial disparities and the police treatment of Black people after the death of George Floyd has added to the cause of many pride organizers.

"We do not feel a celebratory Pride Parade is appropriate at this time and the inclusivity of all community members will be the focus of our events moving forward," read a Facebook message from the festival's organizers upon the canceling of a virtual parade.

While the traditional Loring Park festival and Sunday parade are canceled, organizers are trying to find ways to keep people engaged. Many efforts have been moved online. A few events like brunches at local hangouts are back - but with smaller crowds socially distanced to halt the virus' spread. And a march is being planned calling for social justice.

Pride weekend has attracted about 400,000 people in past years. But gatherings that size present a safety risks during the pandemic, so the Twin Cities Pride committee canceled its in-person events. The impact could be devastating for the organization.

Without revenue from concert tickets, food and drink vendors, and parade fees, Twin Cities Pride is looking at a major economic loss. Most years, they raise about $1,000,000 during pride weekend events. They hope to raise at least $200,000 to ensure there will be a festival in 2021.

SASHAY SIX FEET AWAY

This time last year, Harry Mason was busy performing in different shows at Pride events across the Twin Cities with the LGBTQ party organizers Flip Phone. But with many bars and clubs closed this year, Mason, who goes by the drag name Sasha Cassadine, had to get creative.

Twin Cities Pride 2020: virtual, socially-distanced and politically charged

For the past few months, Mason has been hosting Flip Phone's virtual drag shows from a laptop in his living room. He even painted one of his walls to use as a green screen.

"I try to bring the same energy I would bring if you were watching me at brunch," he said. "The only difference is, I'm in my boxers and my house shoes."

Mason will be back to hosting in full costume in front of a live crowd this weekend for Pride brunches at Union Rooftop and Crave in downtown Minneapolis.

Under social distancing guidelines, drag queens will not be able to dance with audience members, and patrons will be asked to tip electronically.

"But we can have bigger costumes, and a lot more space to dance and twirl," Mason said.

The death of George Floyd while being arrested by Minneapolis police has sparked conversations about race and equity across the nation, including in the LGBTQ community. As a drag show host, Mason says he plans to talk about current events.

"I want to make sure everything is moving in the right direction," he said. "Pride this year is about using our platform to push our agenda for equality."

PRIDE GOES ONLINE

Those who long for the outdoor festival marketplace in Loring Park during pride weekend can log onto Twin Cities Pride's virtual marketplace on June 27-28 to support and connect with local vendors.

But those waiting for annual parade celebration are out of luck.

At first organizers created the Ashley Rukes LGBTQ+ Virtual Pride Parade and it was scheduled to air on June 28. But organizers later put off the virtual parade so as not to distract attention from the ongoing social justice movement.

The Pride movement started when the LGBTQ community stood up to police brutality, organizers note. "We stand in solidarity with the Black Lives Matter movement, and we must take action in the fight against racism in our communities," they posted online.

The board members also posted a list of ways Twin Cities Pride is working toward more inclusivity and representation within the organization. Actions included reorganizing board member leadership, implementing more inclusive recruitment, and establishing an alliance with the Black Lives Matter movement.

"We felt it was the right time to show the community that we're listening," said board member Felix Foster.

RECLAIMING PRIDE

Twin Cities Pride 2020: virtual, socially-distanced and politically charged

With no parade or festival, there will be a "Taking Back Pride" march, coordinated by more than a dozen social justice organizations in Minnesota. They plan to assemble in Loring Park on June 28 and protest against police brutality and injustices affecting Black and transgender community members.

Mason, who plans to attend the "Taking Back Pride" march, is glad to see the local LGBTQ community grapple with racial injustice. Since moving to Minnesota from Tennessee, he's experienced his share of racial bias while working as a black drag queen. Drag queens of color often get paid lower rates or forced into worse time slots, he says.

Although Pride 2020 does not have the same celebratory feeling as past years, this Pride is about healing, Mason said.

"The band-aid needed to be snatched off of a very old wound," Mason said. "We have to sort through the local inequalities together before we can throw an actual Pride again."

ST. PAUL ELIMINATES COPS FROM SCHOOLS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 461 wordsByline: ANTHONY LONETREE; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Action followed a similar move in Minneapolis.Body

St. Paul Public Schools on Tuesday night became the latest in a growing number of urban school districts to remove police officers from its schools.

The school board voted 5-1 to cease talks with the city's Police Department to continue deploying seven school resource officers (SROs). As with other districts, the move was spurred by the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis.

"Change is not going to happen absent a push," said Board Member Steve Marchese, who presented the proposal. It calls for district leaders to develop an interim school safety plan for board discussion in August.

As such, the move to cut ties with police and to come up with a new plan to keep students and staff safe mirrored action taken by the Minneapolis school board this month. There, the action came eight days after Floyd's death, and with a harder edge by portraying Minneapolis police as having a "blatant disregard for black lives."

Portland, Denver and Milwaukee school districts also have severed ties with their police departments. Chicago schools are set to take up the issue on Wednesday.

Tuesday's action came the day after more than 125 students and supporters rallied at St. Paul's Central High around the message "SROs Have Got To Go." Students and alumni spoke of how the $775,000 budgeted for SROs in 2019-20 could be better spent on teachers of color and other staff members who could support students.

"This is an institution of learning, not an institution of fear, and it's not fair for students to feel like they're not safe," said Mickies Kiros, who is Ethiopian and graduated from Central this year.

Videos posted by the group Root & Restore St. Paul, a rally co-sponsor, showed people honking car horns near the homes of Marchese and colleague Jessica Kopp in efforts to win their support.

St. Paul eliminates cops from schools

On Tuesday, Marchese referenced the incident as having startled his dog and some of his neighbors.

He took the opportunity to send a message, too, that it was one thing to protest, and another to stick around for the "real work," and that people should be prepared to pitch in as the district reimagines its safety and security plans.

Board Member Chauntyll Allen, a Black Lives Matter organizer, said the vote was a long time coming.

"I think our students are going to be safer. They're going to feel safer," she said. "Our focus needs to be on student achievement."

The St. Paul district and Police Department worked hard in recent years to make the SROs a more positive presence in the schools, and a Minnesota student survey this year revealed strong support among a majority of St. Paul respondents.

The district had planned to conduct a survey of its own about the officers this year, but it was derailed by the pandemic, spokesman Kevin Burns said.

Du Nord Craft Spirits is raffling off an opportunity to join a virtual cocktail party with former Sen. Al Franken and comedian Sarah Silverman.

Participants can enter to win by donating to the Du Nord Craft Spirits Riot Recovery Fund GoFundMe page. The winner will join former U.S. Sen. Franken, D-Minn., Silverman and Du Nord founder Chris Montana in a half-hour Zoom cocktail party.

Du Nord co-owners Shanelle and Chris Montana established the Riot Recovery Fund for Black and brown-owned small businesses that were damaged in the unrest following the death of George Floyd.

"George Floyd's murder was profoundly tragic and laid bare the disparities that are the legacy of a long history of systemic racism," Franken said in a press release. "Sarah and I were looking for a way to help, and we connected with Chris, who has not just started raising money for these business owners, [but] on top of that has been feeding 400 people a day with his food pantry. Oh, and also, Chris is funny."

The death toll in Minnesota from COVID-19 reached 1,397 on Wednesday, with an additional five deaths.

Another 304 confirmed infections were reported, increasing Minnesota's total number of coronavirus cases to 33,763, according to Minnesota Department of Health data updated Wednesday morning. The actual number of cases is likely much higher as the data only represents those who have been tested for the virus, state officials say.

Wednesday's additional deaths are one of the lowest daily counts in the past two months. The state hit a 10-week low on Monday, with just four deaths.

Of the state's total deaths, 1,102 were long-term care or assisted living center residents.

Despite large gatherings and protests surrounding the murder of George Floyd and police brutality, cases, deaths and hospitalizations from the virus have been on the decline.

Earlier this month, the MDH set up several community testing centers for those who had participated in protests. While the positivity rate at these sites has been low so far, officials said there are concerning racial disparities for those who tested positive for the virus.

Individuals who were Black, Asian or Latino had significantly higher positivity rates than whites. State officials said these disparities are more likely caused by systemic racism than by biology. The MDH needs to do more outreach in these communities and ensure that they have proper access to testing, state officials said.

Additionally, while cases and deaths are trending downward statewide, state officials said the Mankato area has seen a recent uptick in positive cases among young adults in their 20's. The MDH interviewed those who tested positive and found that many of them had been going to bars and restaurants.

State officials urge those who are young to still take proper precautions when going out in public. Even though young people have a lower risk for complications, they can still spread it to vulnerable members of the population.

HOW ARE PATIENTS DOING? There were 29,707 patients Wednesday that no longer need to be isolated as they have recovered enough. This is an increase from 29,399 yesterday. As a native Minnesotan, I was heartbroken to see what happened in my hometown. Today, I live in McLean, Virginia, just one stoplight away from the District where peaceful American protesters were violently swept with force, gas, and rubber bullets from the doors of a president's house which they own. As both a former Marine and a former civilian Pentagon lawyer, I am also extremely concerned about the increasingly dangerous suggestions of using military forces domestically against U.S. citizens.

I grew up in the Twin Cities, went to college there, went to law school there, worked in banking, and in business there for many years; and also have two teenage sons in the area. Almost universally, friends, family, and former Twin Cities business colleagues I talk to are 100% supportive of the peaceful protesters and are heartbroken by George Floyd's death at the hands of Minneapolis police officers. I am noticing a level of questioning in our society that I have never seen in many of those friends, former colleagues and business partners. Of course we all condemn the destruction of property and vandalism, but most of the people I speak to here of all races strongly support the daylight protests and are saying things like "we've seen this happen over and over again" and "we need to get rid of racist cops and cops with long complaint sheets" who are not suitable for police work.

I served under both General James Mattis and General John Kelly during major combat operations in Iraq in 2003. I was lucky to have watched them both closely and to observe what real leadership looks like: They always put their troops' needs first, they ate last in chow halls, they slept in the same conditions as all of us on that entire deployment, they wore the same outdated equipment, they told the truth about the situation on the ground, and they made it clear that no matter the political debate; we had a responsibility to serve the Constitution and to protect each other. I can attest that neither is the type to mince words - particularly when they almost simultaneously voiced concerns during the protests about how the White House is mismanaging the military and making threats to American citizens across the entire nation.

Andrew Borene: We white people need to take on aspects of this struggle as our own

Mattis, President Trump's own former Secretary of Defense, said: "I swore an oath to support and defend the Constitution. Never did I dream that troops taking that same oath would be ordered under any circumstance to violate the constitutional rights of their fellow citizens - much less to provide a bizarre photo-op for the elected commander-in-chief, with military leadership standing alongside."

Then the leader who became Trump's former Chief of Staff, John Kelly, agreed with Mattis, saying, "I think we need to look harder at who we elect," adding "We should look at people that are running for office and put them through the filter: What is their character like? What are their ethics?"

This situation demands action.

It's been said in so many ways by so many real leaders that "the only thing required for evil to succeed is for good people to do nothing." Yet, here we are as another generation of good Americans, faced with a dilemma about what we do next. Will our current American generation fail to act, as those before us have done since the end of the civil war and a failed reconstruction effort to integrate former slaves as full equals? Or will we take action to join with Americans of every color, creed, and national origin who demand equal treatment for all under the law?

Many of us whites may have an unspoken concern that we cannot or need not lead on any needed changes from "our side" - that it's up to Black people and other members of minority groups to solve a 400-year legacy of chattel slavery, systemic oppression, segregation, cultural stereotypes, and mass incarceration.

Nothing could be further from the truth. We created this system - honesty demands that we admit that - and we need to work with all our non-white fellow citizens to reform it.

We whites must also take on aspects of this struggle as our own, to do otherwise is to ignore domestic tragedy once again, at the expense of lives like George Floyd's. We all need to band together to change the system and truly make economic opportunity, justice, and policing work equally for people of all colors.

One right thing, shown by proven American leaders like Mattis and Kelly, is to lead by example in words and in actions, or what the Marines call "ductus exemplo." The next right thing to do, as George Floyd's brother Terrence has said, is to vote.

Andrew Borene of McLean, Virginia, is a Minnesota native. A former CEO, he was named a top Twin Cities business leader in 2013. He was an associate deputy general counsel at the Pentagon. He also served in Iraq as a U.S. Marine officer under then-General Mattis and then-General Kelly in the First Marine Division.

Responding to George Floyd's call out to his mother with his last breaths before he died in Minneapolis police custody last month, dozens of Black women are running for federal, state and city offices in Minnesota this year.

More than 40 African-American women have "heard his cry and responded with their collective political power," Anika Bowie, vice president of the Minneapolis NAACP and an adviser to the organization Black Women Rising, said in a statement this week. Many of them are challenging incumbents in the Aug. 11 primary elections.

"This year's primary will change the political discourse on the impacts of racism in Minnesota's democracy," Bowie said.

Black Women Rising's founder, Alberder Gillespie, is one of four candidates challenging long-time U.S. Rep. Betty McCollum in the 4th Congressional District DFL primary. The district includes St. Paul. For years, she has trained and coached other DFL candidates, many of them white.

But when it comes to Black women running themselves, she told the Star Tribune she's heard it all: "It's not our time. We shouldn't do that. We would love it, but ... There's not a system that's supportive of us. The idea that they can represent me, but I can't represent them."

No Black woman has ever been elected to the Minnesota State Senate. This year, four are running, all in DFL primaries.

Laverne McCartney Knighton is running against DFL Sen. Sandy Pappas, a 36-year legislative veteran from St. Paul.

More than 40 Black women running for political office in MN this year

"Me for Senate, are you crazy?" Knighton told the Star Tribune she asked herself. "[But] it's weighed on me in ways I didn't even know it would, and I ask myself every day, what are you doing? What are you getting ready to do?"

According to the Star Tribune, Bowie adds: "We don't have time for folks to figure it out anymore. We don't have time for elected officials, no matter what side of the aisle you are on, to finally pass policy that treats members of the Black community with dignity."

Marquita Stephens is taking on Senate Minority Leader Susan Kent of Woodbury in the District 53 DFL primary.

Her reason? "To have him (Floyd) holler for his mother at that point, you know you had to respond," she told the Star Tribune. "If something would happen to them, I'm putting on my shoes and I'm going. That's what a mom does."

Other Black women running for the Senate are Aarica Coleman of Maple Grove, who is one of two DFLers seeking the party's nomination to challenge Republican Sen. Warren Limmer, who chairs the public safety committee, and Zina Alston-Fizer of Plymouth, who's in a two-candidate DFL primary for an open District 44 seat.

Four other Black women are running for Minnesota House seats in St. Paul and Minneapolis.

Gillespie said Black Women Rising recruited most of the women to run because of their leadership skills, history of community service and or political engagement and their interest in creating policy.

Starting Friday, Minnesota residents can vote early in person or by mail for the Aug. 11 primary elections.

Everyone has heard that "George Floyd has changed the world." I wonder if that will be true over time. I'm old enough to have lived through the Civil Rights Movement in the 1960s. Many of us were optimistic then that we were on the road to real change. Racial integration was both encouraged and even forced on many fronts. That didn't solve racism. Over time we just reverted back again. When Obama was elected there seemed to be new hope, but then we elected a racist president.

So here we are experiencing protests and riots all over again. I don't think elections and tougher laws, while helpful, will change our society. The Emancipation Proclamation didn't end discrimination.

Laws alone can't force change in people's hearts. Time alone, hasn't changed them either.

I think the real answer is trust. We have to become comfortable with each other. When we understand how much we are alike, we can then embrace our differences in a positive way. When we do, we can trust each other. When we do, we can change the world.

John Mannillo, St. Paul

My mother is losing weight and has lost her sparky personality. She has Alzheimer's and lives in an assisted living facility.

There is no life there. Even if they have no Covid-19 cases, my mother is dying of social isolation. What could be worse for someone who was promised comfort care and has an advance directive than to be kept alive with almost absolutely no comfort from her family who she loves the most?

This is unacceptable. Where is the compassion for our elderly? Why do the protesters get free tests but our elderly only get a promise of more Covid-19 patients to be put into their homes?

Community-based coronavirus testing at four sites in St. Paul and Minneapolis following demonstrations protesting the death of George Floyd has revealed stark racial disparities in who is contracting COVID-19.

People of color accounted for about 40 percent of those who were tested, but they represented 90 percent of the positive test results, state health officials said Wednesday. White residents tested positive 0.2 percent of the time while Black residents were positive 1.3 percent, Asians 5 percent and Latinos 7.4 percent.

Nearly 13,000 people have been tested at the four community sites over the past few weeks. Not all test results have been returned, but positivity rates have generally been at or below the statewide seven-day average positivity rate of 3.3 percent.

Kris Ehresmann, director of the infectious disease division for the Minnesota Department of Health, said there was no known biological reason that some racial groups were more likely to contract the coronavirus than others.

The disparities are most likely caused by differences in exposure risks in their daily lives, she said. Essentially, Minnesotans of color have jobs and living conditions that make them more likely to come into contact with the coronavirus.

"These data reinforce concerns we have expressed before about the uneven nature of COVID as it relates to people of color," Ehresmann said. "Not because of any biological issue. Rather, due to differences in things like underlying health conditions and job-related exposure risk."

State health officials are working to address those disparities in several ways, including by making testing more easily available in communities of color, Ehresmann said.

Minnesotans of color at higher risk for coronavirus because of their jobs, other factors

Statewide coronavirus statistics by race and ethnicity also show stark disparities. Consider:

Blacks account for about 7 percent of all Minnesotans and 21 percent of coronavirus cases. About 5.5 percent of Minnesotans are Latino, but 23 percent of coronavirus cases are among Latinos. Asians make up 5 percent of the state population and 7.5 percent of coronavirus infections. Minnesota is 80 percent white, and 38 percent of coronavirus cases are among white residents. The race and ethnicity of about 17 percent of cases are unknown or missing.

Minnesota's coronavirus outbreak continued to show some semblance of stability Wednesday with five more deaths and 304 new cases reported by the state Department of Health.

The state's death toll has reached 1,397, and there are 33,763 laboratory-confirmed cases statewide. Every county except Lake of the Woods has at least one confirmed case.

Those whose deaths were reported Wednesday ranged in age from their 50s to their 90s. Two of the five were residents of long-term care facilities.

Since the outbreak began, the median age of those who have been diagnosed with the coronavirus is about 39 years old. The median age of those who've died is 83.

There are 29,707 patients who have recovered enough they no longer need to be isolated. There are 340 hospitalized and 160 in critical condition.

Ehresmann also expressed concern Wednesday for the growing number of new infections among people in their 20s in the Mankato area in south central Minnesota. Many of those who have tested positive recently reported visiting several bars before contracting the coronavirus.

A number of those newly infected young people worked in child care or health care, Ehresmann said. She emphasized the need for people to wear masks and social distance whenever possibly while out in public.

"The impact may be less for these age groups, but it has the potential to have secondary transmission to other parts of the community and individuals who may be at greater risk," she said.

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - Voters rebuffed President Donald Trump and nominated two Republicans he opposed to House seats from North Carolina and Kentucky on Tuesday. Calls in higher-profile races in Kentucky and New York faced days of delay as swamped officials count mountains of mail-in ballots.

In western North Carolina, GOP voters picked 24-year-old investor Madison Cawthorn, who uses a wheelchair following an accident, over Trump-backed real estate agent Lynda Bennett. The runoff was for the seat vacated by GOP Rep. Mark Meadows, who resigned to become Trump's chief of staff and joined his new boss in backing Bennett.

Kentucky Republican Rep. Thomas Massie, a libertarian-minded maverick who often clashes with GOP leaders, was renominated for a sixth House term. Trump savaged Massie in March as a "disaster for America" who should be ejected from the party after he forced lawmakers to return to Washington during a pandemic to vote on a huge economic relief package.

Cawthorn, who will meet the constitutionally mandated minimum age of 25 when the next Congress convenes, has said he's a Trump supporter, and Massie is strongly conservative. Still, their victories were an embarrassment to a president whose own reelection campaign has teetered recently.

As states ease voting by mail because of the coronavirus pandemic, a deluge of mail-in ballots and glacially slow counting procedures made delays inevitable. That torturous wait seemed a preview of November, when more states will embrace mail-in voting and officials warn that uncertainty over who is the next president could linger for days.

Kentucky usually has 2% of its returns come from mail ballots. This year officials expect that figure to exceed 50%, and over 400,000 mail ballots were returned by Sunday.

2 Republicans opposed by Trump win in Kentucky, N. Carolina

New York officials expect the vast majority of votes to be mail ballots this year, compared to their typical 5% share. Counties have until eight days after Election Day to count and release the results of mail ballots, with 1.7 million requested by voters.

In the day's marquee contests, two young African American candidates with campaigns energized by nationwide protests for racial justice were challenging white Democratic establishment favorites for the party's nominations.

First-term state legislator Charles Booker was hoping a late surge would carry him past former Marine fighter pilot Amy McGrath for the Democratic Senate nomination from Kentucky. And in New York, political newcomer Jamaal Bowman was seeking to derail House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Eliot Engel's bid for a 17th term.

In Kentucky, many counties including Jefferson, the state's largest, faced piles of mail-in ballots and reported no results. The Associated Press doesn't expect to call the McGrath-Booker race until June 30, when Kentucky plans to release additional tallies.

Even so, Booker and supporters gathered in Louisville chanted 'from the 'hood to the holler,' the slogan he hoped would help build a coalition of urban Blacks and rural whites.

"We have the opportunity to transform history," Booker said.

The AP was also delaying its call in New York's Engel-Bowman race, pending additional vote tallies.

In other contests, Majority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky easily won the Republican nomination for a seventh Senate term and will be favored in November against McGrath or Booker.

Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez, D-N.Y., won renomination, cementing her rise from obscurity to progressive icon status when she ousted Democratic Rep. Joe Crowley, on track to become speaker, from the New York City district.

In Virginia, retired Army Col. Daniel Gade won the GOP Senate nomination but seems certain to lose to Democratic Sen. Mark Warner in November. Republican Scott Taylor will face Democratic Rep. Elaine Luria in a rematch between two Navy veterans in a Virginia Beach district from which she toppled him in 2018.

And Cameron Webb, a health policy researcher, won the Democratic nomination for a central Virginia House district. GOP Rep. Denver Riggleman lost his party's nomination, fueling Democrats' hopes that Webb, an African American, can capture the seat.

Voters endured 90-minute waits in Kentucky's second-largest city, Lexington, and social media posts showed long lines in New York's Westchester County deep into the evening. Yet overall, the day's problems seemed less widespread than in recent elections in Georgia and Nevada, where some people stood in line for hours.

In Louisville, voting advocates complained that an unknown number of people stayed home because of difficulty traveling to the city's single polling place - the Kentucky Exposition Center.

"In my neighborhood, most people don't have cars," said voter Michael Baker. "It's not fair for them to have one site."

2 Republicans opposed by Trump win in Kentucky, N. Carolina

A judge kept the polling place open an extra half hour after about 175 people, some of whom pounded on the building's doors, demanded to vote. Louisville, the state's biggest city, has 600,000 residents.

In the big New York and Kentucky contests, Democrats were watching whether nationwide protests sparked by last month's killing of George Floyd by Minneapolis police would translate to a decisive turnout by African American and progressive voters.

Kentucky's McGrath has a military resume, centrist views and fundraising abilities that helped her win support from Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., to oppose McConnell.

Booker's campaign caught fire after he attended recent protests against the March police killing of 26-year-old Breonna Taylor in her Louisville home. That helped him win support from progressive Sen. Bernie Sanders, I-Vt., and the state's two largest newspapers.

In one measure of McGrath's financial advantage, she has spent $16 million in ads compared to Booker's $2 million, according to Advertising Analytics, which studies campaign advertising.

In New York, Engel is supported by Democratic stars like Hillary Clinton, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and the Congressional Black Caucus, plus major labor unions. He's one of Congress' most liberal members.

Bowman, an educator, has drawn strength from anti-racism protests and his accusations that Engel has grown aloof from his diverse district in parts of the Bronx and Westchester. Bowman has been helped by progressive groups and lawmakers like Sanders.

ARTICLE CMIV. COUNTY PANEL DECLARES RACISM A PUBLIC HEALTH CRISIS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 24, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 2BLength: 600 wordsByline: DAVID CHANEN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Full board also voted to keep nine of 41 libraries closed until 2021.Body

After lengthy debate, Hennepin County commissioners passed a resolution Tuesday declaring racism a public health crisis.

The action was introduced by Angela Conley and Irene Fernando, the first commissioners of color to serve on the board. The measure, introduced at a committee meeting, passed by a 4-0 vote, with two commissioners abstaining. It will be put up for a final board vote Tuesday.

Commissioners Mike Opat and Jeff Johnson wanted the final vote delayed because they had questions about the resolution's impact and 10 directives attached to it.

Among the directives:

- Acknowledge that the county's current public health fact sheets present a clear picture of health disparity along lines of race/ethnicity.
- Recognize that the disparity is significant and has direct impacts from birth to death to the individual, as well as to their family and community members.
- Develop a consistent methodology for data collection, reporting and analysis related to race/ethnicity for future public health data fact sheets and assessment of internal policies and procedures.

Although Conley acknowledged the county has built a foundation to reduce racial disparities, she said there is much evidence from national and county sources to show racism's negative impact on the health and development of children and adults who are black, Indigenous and of color.

"As the largest county in the state, Hennepin bares the brunt of racial disparity," she said. "Minneapolis ranks as one of the worst places for people of color to live. We need to name structural racism as the root cause of our work to eliminate disparity."

County panel declares racism a public health crisis

No matter the topic discussed at board meetings - whether it be infectious disease, housing, income or criminal justice - racial disparity factors into it, Conley said. Although there are fewer blacks in the county than whites, blacks have been disproportionately affected by COVID-19, she said.

Board Chairwoman Marion Greene and Commissioner Debbie Goettel supported the resolution, with Greene saying that racism was a pandemic before COVID-19 hit. Opat said he appreciated the detailed resolution but received it Friday and didn't have enough time to raise questions. He also questioned the fiscal impact of the action.

While expressing concerns about the resolution, Johnson said it's a sensitive issue and comes at a difficult time, given the police killing of George Floyd last month. If he were to vote against the measure, people will call him a racist, he said.

"The county has already done a lot of work on reducing disparity," Johnson said. "I want to know what the resolution will allow us to do that we aren't already or able to do."

Conley said it helps the county focus on disparity. She added that anyone who didn't support the measure wasn't racist in her mind.

"We just have to be honest about this issue," she said.

In other action, the board voted to keep nine of the county's 41 libraries closed until next year because of COVID-19. The libraries are East Lake, Linden Hills, Pierre Bottineau and Roosevelt in Minneapolis, and those in Golden Valley, Long Lake, Minnetonka, Osseo and St. Bonifacius. Some libraries have been offering curbside service for a few weeks. No timeline was given as to when the other libraries will open or in what capacity.

The board also approved $12.5 million in federal funding for several COVID-19 related programs, including summer youth programs, food security, small business grants and the reopening of service centers.

Commissioners also passed the bylaws and charter for the county's Race Equity Advisory Council.

Farmers who operate small and mid-size farms that produce fruits and vegetables are sitting on crops that are ready to harvest, but have nowhere to sell them as farmers markets, schools, corporate cafeterias and restaurants are closed.

Meanwhile, hunger is rising. Second Harvest Heartland said Wednesday it projects 735,000 Minnesotans will need food assistance by this fall.

The Local Emergency Assistance Farmer Fund is trying to connect the two. Leaff is a collaborative of farmers, hunger relief organizations and food distribution services that is buying produce at market value to donate to area food shelves and organizations providing prepared meals.

The fund's pilot phase is using $50,000 of seed money to support 20 farmers by purchasing up to $2,500 worth of produce. Leaff will also help farmers who haven't harvested and packed for wholesale by assisting in harvesting, packing, grading and washing their products.

Fund connects minority farmers to charities serving the hungry

Farmers are eligible to apply for the pilot program if their farm is within 200 miles of the Twin Cities, gross farm sales are under $100,000 and farm income is at least 25% of their household income.

Some farmers have found alternative routes to sell their products, such as starting online stores, but Black and indigenous farmers face challenges in accessing Minnesota's agricultural industry due to systemic racist practices in wealth and land distribution, Leaff says.

"Leaff provides resources and support to Black, indigenous, people of color farmers to ensure Covid-19 does not create additional barriers to success and provides connections to new wholesale markets and technology for longer-term sustainability," according to Leaff's executive summary. "We are committed to providing purchased produce to organizations supporting those facing hunger and food insecurity, whether it's people impacted by Covid-19, communities rebuilding from protests following the murder of George Floyd, or communities that have been oppressed throughout our state's history."

Leaff consists of representatives from The Good Acre, Mill City Farmers Market, Lakewinds Food Co-op, the Latino Economic Development Center, The Food Group, Hmong American Partnership and the Minnesota Department of Agriculture.

The organization is requesting $200,000 from the Bush Foundation's Community Innovation Fund to support the project from July through December.

M.Z. Salo, Inver Grove Heights

While musing about the coronavirus and the complacency shown by far too many people, I suddenly imagined a modern, abbreviated version of the famous soliloquy that opens Act 3, Scene 1 of Shakespeare's "Hamlet", in which the Danish prince contemplates death and bemoans the pain and unfairness of life:

"To mask or not to mask, that is the question: Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer The spittle and spray of uncovered coughs and sneezes, Or to take safety measures against a terrible pandemic And by ignoring it, to fall ill, to die. This is yet another heartache and natural shock That flesh is heir to. Perchance to dream - of a cure."

I recently watched highlights of Donald Trump's commencement speech earlier this month at West Point. As I watched and listened to him addressing over 1,000 of America's best and brightest young military women and men, I couldn't help but think of the irony of the event.

The cadets at West Point, much like their contemporaries at the Naval Academy, the Air Force Academy and the Coast Guard Academy, all have made a commitment to honesty, integrity, loyalty and empathy and concern for their fellow man. Those values are the basic principles our military professes and they help form the framework it operates within. To have a commencement speaker like Donald Trump, an individual who has made a habit of lying to the public at an alarming rate, a man who demands loyalty from his subordinates but rarely returns it unless it benefits him, and a man who several times did his best to successfully avoid serving his country during the Vietnam War, seems like a poor choice to say the very least.

As president, Donald Trump may hold the title Commander in Chief, but it's too bad those young graduates didn't have the opportunity to salute a man worthy of their accomplishments.

Predictive modeling that guided Minnesota's initial response to COVID-19 is being "recalibrated" with the latest pandemic data and will offer new forecasts about the spread of the infectious disease.

While growth in COVID-19 cases, hospitalizations and deaths has eased in Minnesota, state health economist Stefan Gildemeister said Tuesday that modeling on the downside of the initial pandemic wave can help prepare the state long-term. Updated COVID-19 forecasts by researchers at the University of Minnesota and Minnesota Department of Health should be released by mid-July.

"There is a need for modeling and we will continue to carry it forward," Gildemeister said. "This epidemic will last until the virus has traveled through enough of the population (that we develop) natural immunity, or we gain immunity through a vaccine."

The pandemic has caused 33,469 lab-confirmed cases of COVID-19 and 1,393 deaths in the state, but case growth has leveled off - with the health department reporting 245 cases and nine deaths on Tuesday. Hospitalizations have increased since Sunday - with 339 patients being hospitalized for COVID-19 on Tuesday, and 158 needing intensive care - but that is below the peak of 606 hospitalizations on May 28.

Updated modeling will try to assess the timing of any second wave of COVID-19 cases as state restrictions ease and social distancing compliance diminishes, and whether it will exhaust the state's hospital resources, Gildemeister said. A delayed second peak in the winter could be problematic as it coincides with the start of the influenza season.

"As more people mix, the more the virus will be passed on to other individuals," Gildemeister said. "Some people will get very sick. Some people will die. The question is, when shall we expect that?"

Minnesotans are moving about more as Gov. Tim Walz has gradually repealed restrictions designed to reduce the spread of the virus.

Minnesota to update its COVID-19 modeling

A statewide stay-at-home order ended on May 18; retail shopping, church services and outdoor dining resumed on June 1; and indoor restaurants, fitness clubs and entertainment venues reopened at limited capacities on June 10.

Highway traffic volumes that were 70% below normal in mid-April in the Twin Cities were just 25% below normal on June 16. And June 6 was the first day in months when there was more "unpredictable travel" in the Twin Cities - meaning more people were taking short trips and running multiple errands.

Other models have already predicted more cases due to the relaxation of restrictions. The Institute for Health Metrics and Evaluation in Washington state predicts 3,191 COVID-19 deaths in Minnesota by Oct. 1.

Minnesota is one of 23 states currently rated by the COVID Exit Strategy website as "making progress" or "trending better" due to slower growth in COVID-19 cases.

State health officials have reported progress in reducing outbreaks among the most vulnerable populations in long-term care facilities and assisted living facilities - where increased diagnostic testing has sought to identify infections before they spread.

The majority of COVID-19 deaths in Minnesota - 1,101 - still involve residents of these facilities, though. Risks of severe COVID-19 appear highest among the elderly and people with underlying health conditions such as diabetes, asthma and diseases of the lungs, kidneys and heart.

A recent uptick in cases in younger people is raising concerns, especially as people return to restaurants and public gatherings, said state infectious disease director Kris Ehresmann. "With reports from our own staff of crowded venues with lots of people not wearing masks, we will likely see more cases," she said.

Some of that increase is due to workplace outbreaks, including at food-processing plants in Mower County that have contributed to 813 lab-confirmed COVID-19 cases and two deaths there.

Younger people also were involved in protests following the May 25 police killing of George Floyd, and health officials worried that the mass gatherings would spread the virus as well.

However, less than 2% of tests of people involved in the demonstrations have turned up positive for the virus, which Ehresmann said is "very encouraging."

Gildemeister said the updated modeling will benefit from the latest information about the outbreak in Minnesota. Earlier versions were more reliant on the origins of the pandemic in China and its spread to Europe.

Modeling in Minnesota has been politically controversial, with Republicans questioning the high death counts of initial models and questioning whether they pushed Walz to prolong an economically crippling stay-at-home order. Nearly 800,000 unemployment insurance claims have been filed since the start of the pandemic.

The latest state models predicted that Minnesota would see 1,441 deaths from COVID-19 by the end of May and a peak of cases on June 29, under a scenario by which its stay-at-home order ended on May 18. The actual death count at the end of the month was 1,050.

Minnesota to update its COVID-19 modeling

Gildemeister said the latest data on the pandemic in Minnesota will increase the precision of modeling, though he stressed that it was designed to assess how social policies would reduce deaths and cases - not to predict precise COVID-19 counts.

Faisal Demaag built Chicago Furniture Warehouse from scratch. When he opened the business back in 1997 on Chicago Avenue in Minneapolis, he was the salesman, the delivery man and the assemblyman. And he vividly recalls offering customers a discount for helping him unload their new furniture - the only assistance he received those first few years.

That hard work is ash and rubble now. Chicago Furniture Warehouse, located at 2941 Chicago Ave., burned to the ground early morning May 30, five days after the killing of George Floyd.

"I spent day and night; I worked sometimes seven days a week," he said. "And all my efforts, all my dreams, it's just gone in one night."

He'll need around $4 million to construct a building similar to the one he just lost, according to a recent estimate, he said. He's hoping that between his insurance, a GoFundMe page and perhaps some help from the government, he'll be able to get back on his feet. He wants to avoid applying for a personal loan to pay for rebuilding if he can, although Demaag did receive a PPP loan. He did not comment on how much he received.

Demaag was at home when his security system wailed and the owner of a nearby business called him to let him know his building was burning. The store was looted and vandalized the two prior nights. The fire appears to have been set intentionally, but he is unsure by whom.

His business was more than just a source of income for Demaag. Chicago Furniture Warehouse was the place Lake Street's immigrant community could find affordable furniture. It was a rite of passage for recent immigrants to buy their first American furniture there, he said. An immigrant himself, originally from Ethiopia, Demaag felt Lake Street was like a new home. His customers and employees are like a family.

"I don't want to be displaced and I don't want to go anywhere else. I've been in that location, I've been in that area close to thirty years," said Demaag. "That's my livelihood. That's where I belong."

Though the going has been rough through COVID-19, he didn't lay off or furlough any of his employees. Even now, they're all still on board.

"I always tell them, 'If we go down, all of us will go down together,'" he said.

The GoFundMe page has raised around \$31,600 of its \$150,000 goal, but it seems to have stalled out, he said. His insurer, American Family Insurance, is still determining how much of the damage it'll cover, he said.

Though he is optimistic he'll eventually rebuild, it'll take a mammoth effort and a great deal of time. For now, Demaag is trying to stay positive in the wake of a nightmare.

"What happened those days and nights, I don't think I can forget about for the rest of my life," he said. "I didn't just lose my business. I can't even describe it.

"Unless this happens to you, you won't understand it."

Rebuilding riot-damaged corridors may have to proceed without state help, but there's hope

As estimated damages have reached $500 million and counting, the Lake Street, West Broadway Avenue and University Avenue corridors in Minneapolis and St. Paul will likely take years to rebuild following riots in late May.

State lawmakers did not agree to an aid package for the businesses damaged or destroyed by the civil unrest following the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody. The House passed a $300 million package and the Senate proposed a $200 million package, and both were going to tap into federal CARES (Coronavirus Aid, Relief, and Economic Security) Act dollars. However, lawmakers and Gov. Tim Walz couldn't come up with a compromise on any major legislation before adjourning their special session late last week.

Minneapolis Regional Chamber of Commerce CEO Jonathan Weinhagen is optimistic that if the Legislature comes back in July for another special session, there will be money for rebuilding.

Rebuilding riot-damaged corridors may have to proceed without state help, but there's hope

"I still have a high level of confidence that they're going to get something done for the cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul to respond to the destruction that took place," Weinhagen said. "I'm pretty consistently hearing from leadership and members of the delegations that there's a shared commitment to put a package together."

But Weinhagen, who is also co-chair of Mayor Jacob Frey's Minneapolis Forward: Community Now Coalition that is tasked with supporting the rebuilding of Lake and Broadway, acknowledged that there's a sense of immediacy. Owners of destroyed buildings may be tempted to take their insurance payout and sell their land, displacing small businesses who were tenants.

"The other thing that we're dealing with right now is land speculators who are coming in and starting to assess the opportunity to acquire property," he said. "We are working with the city and the county to try to figure out how to ensure we don't see mass gentrification with outside groups coming in buying the property and developing it."

Worries of gentrification have reached elected officials. Marion Greene, chairwoman of the Hennepin County Board, said she will bring forward a resolution authorizing the county to invest in land-banking commercial and residential properties impacted by the civil unrest. She hopes it will be a multimillion dollar contribution of seed money that would leverage public, private and philanthropic funds.

"The goal of this land-banking proposal is to preserve community ownership and buy time for the creation of community plans and development proposals for communities that are under a lot of stress right now, and a lot of pressure to act quickly," she said at a board meeting this week.

Minneapolis-based nonprofit Land Bank Twin Cities also has been assessing damage to the corridors. Vice President and Senior Program Manager Eddie Landenberger said his organization is trying to raise money so that it might be able to step in to buy land and hold it for a local group to eventually purchase.

"Our primary role is to provide site control and time for people to pull their sources together," he said.

Weinhagen said there might be a silver lining to what happened on Lake, Broadway and University. The economy could be in store for a long recession and rebuilding these corridors could be a boost to Minneapolis.

"What happened to our city is really horrible, but there's an opportunity at hand to potentially invest half a billion or a billion dollars headed into a recession and coming off of a global pandemic," he said. "Many of the other regions, our peer cities and markets across the country, are dealing with the same economic environment, but without the opportunity to see an infusion of capital into their city."

Several days after George Floyd's death, a group of strangers gathered on a grassy patch at 41st Street and Minnehaha Avenue S. in Minneapolis. The spot was equidistant from two sites marked by devastating loss: one where the 46-year-old black man was killed by police, the other the epicenter of widespread rioting.

More than 50 people spread out on the grass at a social distance. But for a moment, they were connected as they hummed in unison, directed by the event's co-host, Jamil Stamschror-Lott.

The humming lasted only a minute and was muffled by passing traffic. But at a time when big issues are weighing on so many minds, such a small act of unity and hope seemed to help.

Just two days earlier, Jamil and his wife, Sara, two self-professed "out of the box" therapists, had decided to help assuage the city's collective grief by hosting a series of free community healing sessions. Their aim with the weekly events is to bring people together to share their perspectives and listen to one another, while incorporating exercises to calm the body and mind.

At the session, Jamil described how the burning buildings and chaos surrounding the protests were, in some ways, a physical manifestation of the way racial injustice and lack of recognition feels to the black community. "Now you're seeing the external reality of what's been going on internally," he said.

Floyd's death and the subsequent unrest triggered those who have endured a lifetime of racism and jolted white people to confront their racial privilege. The events spurred something of a collective mental health crisis for the Twin Cities: a mix of rage, sadness, frustration and guilt.

Jamil and Sara began to realize how much communal pain Floyd's death had inflicted as they met with private therapy clients.

"There are so many people hurting - we have to reach further," Sara recalled telling Jamil. "We thought, 'Let's bring people together and validate people's feelings and affirm our neighbors of color,' " she said. "Let's try to build a bridge."

A shared mission

Jamil's career in mental health is rooted in his personal experience. He spent most of his childhood in the Twin Cities, raised by a single mother. As an African-American male who would grow to reach 6 feet 7, Jamil often felt like an "alien" among his peers. As one of the few black kids in his Advanced Placement classes, he struggled with impostor syndrome and feeling isolated.

"It was like the black kids didn't really accept you, the white kids didn't accept you, and all the other ethnic groups had their own pockets, so I often ended up feeling alone," he said.

Jamil's interactions with African-American men mostly hinged on his height, and those hoping to catapult him to the NBA often seemed to look at the youngster more as a dollar sign than a person.

"There was always a black male to do coaching for sports," Jamil said. "But there wasn't a black male to coach you through, 'What do you do when you're interested in a girl?' 'What do you do when you're reaching puberty?' 'How do you tie your tie?,' all the basic day-to-day life things that matter way more than sports."

So Jamil set out to become the mentor he'd always desired, focusing on underprivileged youths, "trying to reach that kid that can't fit in."

He's played that role with the Big Brothers Big Sisters program, as a youth probation officer and with Community Ambassadors Initiative, which works in partnership with the St. Paul Police Department to defuse tensions and reduce juvenile arrests.

After working in the St. Paul Public Schools, Jamil earned a master's degree to better understand the roots of behavior issues. He passed his social worker licensing exam the day after Philando Castile died; instead of celebrating his achievement, he took to the streets with the ambassadors.

Sara grew up on a farm near Wabasha, Minn., where she learned to milk cows, butcher deer and immersed herself in choir, band, dance and theater. "I dressed my own way and went to the beat of my own drummer," she recalled.

But family relationships were challenging. After her parents divorced when she was very young, Sara started seeing a school-based therapist, which led her to provide mental health services to adolescents and young adults at Minneapolis schools, a teen-focused clinic, and in-home and residential treatment settings.

Jamil and Sara first met while training for their careers, in a class on aggression replacement techniques. Three years later, Jamil spotted Sara at the Roseville Target store, said hello and asked if she remembered him. Sara thought he looked familiar but couldn't quite place him. Was he one of the players from the semipro Minnesota Ripknees basketball team, where she'd been on the dance team a few years back?

"He said, 'What, because I'm tall and black I have to be a basketball player?' And I was so mortified," Sara recalled.

In fact, Jamil had played Division 1 basketball at Marquette University and on one of their early dates, she watched one of his games with a local men's league. "I don't know the rules of basketball," Sara admitted. "I am not an athlete. I am an artist through and through. But he slam-dunked the ball so many times that I was like, 'Whoa!' "

In contrast to college professors and classmates who Jamil felt were more focused on his athletic role than his academic one, the artsy therapist was refreshingly ignorant of the team's impressive reputation.

"When he told me he played basketball at Marquette, I was like, 'What's Marquette?' " she said.

"That's when I knew she was the one," Jamil joked.

A creative, communal approach

The couple now have a 2-year-old daughter, Zola, and a 2-year-old therapy practice, called Creative Kuponya (the Swahili word for "healing"), with a nontraditional approach.

During sessions, Sara expands on talk therapy, including movement, music and art, sometimes walking with her clients, shooting hoops, doing yoga or painting. "I try to meet people where they're at," she said.

Though the couple lost their office space near Lake Street and Hiawatha Avenue in the May 29 fires, they are working to expand their reach. Aside from the healing sessions, they're raising funds to provide free individual and family therapy sessions to people of color in need.

While community healing might seem unconventional, it's actually an age-old tradition deeply rooted in Indigenous cultures, said Mary Jo Kreitzer, director of the Center for Spirituality & Healing at the University of Minnesota. The practice of connecting with other community members to deal with trauma and loss is now used for everything from coping with cancer and widowhood to repairing harm through restorative justice.

"There's a real benefit to being in a group and being able to share experiences and tap into one's own wisdom but also tap into the wisdom of others," Kreitzer said. "Sharing pain and sharing loss is a way to work through pain and loss."

Suzanne Koeplinger, who supports healers from within communities of color as the director of the Catalyst Initiative at the Minneapolis Foundation, said the Western-based medical model isn't good at understanding the damage that toxic stress inflicts on communities, not just individuals.

While clinical mental health care is absolutely vital and necessary, she said, it's important to offer other options for those who face taboos surrounding therapy, mistrust the medical system or don't have insurance.

"Communal healing needs to take place because in many cases, particularly in brown and black communities, and indigenous communities, the trauma is communal," she said. "Now, especially, the need for healing in community goes deep."

'We see you ... '

Creative Kuponya's first healing session drew a majority white, but racially mixed crowd.

Salve for the city

Sara asked the group to begin by resting their bare feet or palms on the grass to connect their bodies to the Earth. Then she led a vision exercise. Jamil followed by asking the question: "What have you been doing to get through these days?"

People of color were asked to speak first. A middle-age man said he had been reflecting on his experience as a 3-year-old, when his family participated in the Poor People's March on Washington, organized by the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. In addition to his memories of barking dogs and the smell of tear gas, he said he also felt a profound sense of hope.

Another speaker said she has been doing social justice work for a decade, but living it her whole life: "This is my skin, and this is what life has blessed me with," she said. She noted how black women are conditioned to "give, give, give" and said she was trying to care for herself, too, so she could better help her community.

After the mic was offered to white allies, a woman who said she lived a few blocks from the 38th and Chicago protest site told of how she's been listening to the sound of people rising up. "I can hear the chanting, I can hear the music, I can hear the power," she said.

When the woman finished, Jamil led the group in a response he'd used to affirm each speaker.

"We see you. We appreciate you. And we love you."

They were simple words, not said nearly enough. And they held even more power voiced by a group.

Even as the list of Twin Cities restaurant closures grows during the ongoing coronavirus pandemic, a few chefs and restaurateurs are seizing an opportunity to launch new businesses.

News that The Tavern Grill restaurant brand would expand to a sixth location in Apple Valley as soon as late summer broke late last week. Then came word Wednesday that the former Blackbird Café in Minneapolis would soon be home to Petite Leon, a new restaurant from chef Jorge Guzman, who was a James Beard Award finalist in 2017 while running Brewers Table inside Surly Brewing Co.'s Minneapolis brewery and taproom complex.

One advantage restaurateurs have in opening now, during an especially dark period for the restaurant industry, is they at least know what they're getting into. They can design a restaurant for pandemic-era dining, rather than adjusting operations to meet the state's evolving health and safety guidelines.

Scattered openings buck a gloomy trend in the Twin Cities restaurant scene

"Yes, there's a pandemic. Yes, it's going to be difficult," Guzman said. "We'll do the best that we can smartly. Eventually Covid will go away or there will be a vaccine, hopefully sooner than later."

Tim Cary of Minneapolis-based Hemisphere Restaurant Group, which owns and operates the Tavern Grill restaurants, said he had long targeted a south metro location and "strategically kept looking at sites," even as his existing restaurant portfolio struggled in the pandemic. When Apple Valley's Vivo Kitchen closed in May, "we quickly, very quickly, pounced on it," Cary said.

"This [pandemic] will create winners and losers, as well as opportunities," he said.

Their stories run counter to the doom and gloom enveloping much of the hospitality industry, which even as it slowly reopens must labor under strict social distancing protocols. Meant to limit the potential spread of Covid-19, they also limit the number of guests restaurants and bars can have in their dining rooms or on their patios, cutting into potential revenues.

The outlook for restaurants is so dire that chef and television host Andrew Zimmern has repeatedly referred to the pandemic as a potential "extinction event" for the industry. Zimmern is a cofounder of the Independent Restaurant Coalition, which has warned that 85% of the country's independent restaurants could close by the end of the year without direct federal aid beyond the Paycheck Protection Program loans already made available to small businesses.

The first pandemic-related restaurant closures were still two months away when Blackbird Café closed in January. The 3800 Nicollet Ave. S. restaurant space is owned by Lander Group, a Minneapolis-based developer led by founder Michael Lander.

Asked if he was surprised to find a new tenant for the former Blackbird Café space in the middle of a pandemic, Lander replied, "Yeah, I think I have to be honest about that." But he added that he has always viewed the corner building - host to one in a cluster of restaurants at the 38th Street and Nicollet Avenue intersection - as a prime location.

Guzman said he and chef Benjamin Rients, a partner in Petite Leon, began scouting restaurant spaces before the pandemic hit with full force in March.

"Every restaurateur always has four or five concepts they're working on. You find a space and maybe one of them fits. That's what happened here," Guzman said.

Guzman is talking with peers in the restaurant industry about how they're dealing with the pandemic, lessons he can bake into his new concept.

"We don't have the unfortunate responsibility of having to put anyone on furlough. ... We'll be able to hire for exactly what we need depending on where the pandemic is at," he said. "I would rather be opening (a new restaurant) right now than have a restaurant that has to reopen."

From Cary's perspective, the outlook for restaurants is rosier in the Twin Cities suburbs, where four of his five Tavern Grills are located, than in the urban core. If an opportunity arose to open another Tavern Grill in the west metro, there's a good chance he'd take it, Cary said.

Meanwhile, Hemisphere Restaurant Group's downtown Minneapolis locations remain shuttered. They include Atlas Grill & Clubroom, Good to Go and Sphere Bar + Restaurant.

Scattered openings buck a gloomy trend in the Twin Cities restaurant scene

Its Mission American Kitchen restaurant in the IDS Center closed permanently in March.

"I think everybody downtown has question marks, whether it be skyway or a street level. Downtown is definitely a question mark," he said, elaborating that one of the big questions in his mind is when downtown office workers will return after months of widespread telecommuting.

Cary said the unrest that followed the murder of George Floyd may also linger in the imaginations of diners weighing a trip to downtown Minneapolis.

"They're fighting more than just the Covid. They're fighting other issues down there," he said.

St. Paul Public Schools no longer will pay the city of St. Paul to post police officers in seven of its high schools.

The school board voted 5-1 on Tuesday to stop contract negotiations with the city and develop a new safety plan.

Board member Chauntyll Allen said the move was a long time coming.

"Our focus needs to be on student achievement," she said, "and in order for all of our students to achieve, they need to be free from trauma."

School and police officials have worked together in recent years to turn school resource officers into student-friendly mentors, downplaying their law enforcement roles. They no longer arrest students for minor crimes, and their use of handcuffs or chemical irritants is increasingly rare.

Still, board members have debated whether armed officers belong in their schools at all.

Board member Zuki Ellis said she personally likes the seven officers, but "what I fundamentally believe has not changed" - that police officers don't belong in schools. She's frustrated district staff haven't presented an alternative to the program.

FLOYD'S DEATH

The May 25 death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody gave new life to the discussion.

The Minneapolis and Winona, Minn., school districts and several across the country have cut ties with their local police departments since Floyd's killing.

St. Paul school officials have received over 1,000 emails on the subject, most of them urging an end to the program.

St. Paul school board removes police officers from high schools on 5-1 vote

"Some may worry that we need SROs to help prevent random acts of violence in schools," St. Paul College philosophy instructor Jason Swartwood wrote. "But this ignores the other options we have for pro-actively addressing and preventing violence (adequate mental health support, community and social services, etc.) that do not have such a damaging and disproportionate effect on students who are poor, Black, Indigenous or persons of color."

The Student Engagement and Advancement Board, a group of students appointed to advise the school board, recently renewed its call for the program's end and held a rally Monday calling for the officers' removal.

PRINCIPAL SUPPORT

However, a state survey last year asked 369 St. Paul high school juniors whether it was a "good idea" to have a police officer at their school, and 96 percent said it was.

Principals from the seven high schools also support the program.

"The SRO partnerships in our high schools are vital tools in our collective efforts to be more just and equitable schools," the principals wrote in a joint letter.

"Simply walking away and excluding important members of our community will do harm to our students and neighborhoods, and will saddle our teachers and staff with even more responsibility beyond their already daunting task of educating our city's young people in very difficult times." Board member John Brodrick cast the lone vote Tuesday in favor of school resource officers. He said the police have made changes to match the district's expectations for their role.

"We're different than other towns, and we have had a cadre of SRO officers that, for the most part, I think, we've been satisfied with," he said.

"I'm very, very concerned that if we sever this contract, we are going to jeopardize ... safety and relationships. And I hope that we do not regret this decision."

The board will discuss next steps in August.

St. Paul Police Chief Todd Axtell said in a statement Tuesday night that he's disappointed with the vote:

"SROs are selected based on officers who possess the guardian mentality. They are mentors and friends of students and teachers alike. They also provide safety and security for some of our most vulnerable populations. Even though our officers will not be present in our schools, we will do everything possible to support and protect our students and teachers."

Highlight: New data project a Great Depression-level surge in hunger by September

Body

Minnesota's hunger crisis is expected to worsen this summer and fall, as the number of residents in need of food help surges to levels not seen since the Great Depression.

The new projections released Wednesday by Second Harvest Heartland are the first to show the length of a growing need in the state driven by a deepening economic downturn brought on by the COVID-19 pandemic.

"We are going to see unprecedented need and really need unlike anything we've seen since the Great Depression," said Allison O'Toole, CEO of Second Harvest in Brooklyn Park, one of seven food banks that supply Minnesota food shelves. "We've been training all summer long for this steep climb."

The crisis has already strained Minnesota's 350 food shelves, with many seeing double or triple the normal levels of visitors since March, including an uptick in first-time users.

The new numbers from Second Harvest and consulting firm McKinsey & Co. predict the need for food assistance will peak in September to 735,000 Minnesotans who are "food insecure," or don't have consistent access to enough food. That's 13% of the state's population and 130,000 more people than after the 2008 recession.

"We have a strong emergency food system in Minnesota," said Colleen Moriarty, who heads the statewide advocacy group

Hunger Solutions. "I think, all working together, we can meet the challenge."

Minnesota's unemployment rate rose to 9.9% last month, the highest level ever recorded since the state began tracking it in the 1970s. But the $600 a week that unemployed workers are receiving from the federal CARES Act ends July 31, so food shelves are bracing for an uptick in requests.

'The worst is still ahead of us'

The new data account for that loss of $600 in federal aid and assume unemployment will peak in Minnesota at 18% this summer, with the hunger crisis continuing until the end of 2021 and the increased need costing the emergency food network $21 million.

"People are seeing the reopening and presuming the crisis is ending," said David Fiocco of McKinsey, who is also on the board of Second Harvest. "The worst is still ahead of us."

So far, experts say public and private funding is keeping pace with rising costs. This summer, $11 million in extra federal aid is going to the state's food assistance programs while another $9 million in state aid already went to food shelves and food banks as part of a $330 million emergency package.

"Safe access to healthy food is important to all of us, but particularly in times of crisis," Jodi Harpstead, commissioner of the Department of Human Services, said in a statement.

Second Harvest has raised more than $11 million to cover the $17.3 million it says it needs to meet a 70% increase in food from July to December. Hunger Solutions launched a relief fund that's raised $112,000 so far for food shelves, especially those in Minneapolis and St. Paul responding after grocery stores were destroyed in riots following George Floyd's death at the hands of Minneapolis police.

Churches, schools and even restaurants, distilleries, art galleries and theaters have become emergency pop-up grocery stores.

"[The] community is very innovative and people want to feed their neighbors," said Sophia Lenarz-Coy, executive director of the Food Group, a New Hope-based food bank.

But even if unemployment decreases as businesses reopen, Lenarz-Coy says people are likely returning to low-paying jobs. She worries that Minnesota's hunger relief system - which expanded dramatically after the 2008 recession and hasn't contracted since then - still can't sustain the extra need long term on its own. Broader policy changes are needed, she said - from better paying jobs to state and federal assistance.

"We definitely have not seen the height of the influx," she said. "The rebuild will be slow and long."

Starting new efforts

Before COVID-19, 1 in 11 Minnesotans struggled to afford food. By August, it's expected to hit 1 in 8 residents. (To locate a food shelf or see if you qualify for food stamps, also known as the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program or SNAP, go to hungersolutions.org or call 1-888-711-1151.)

The new data, which Second Harvest Heartland will update quarterly, will help nonprofits prepare for the fall peak and press for funding from donors and the government, O'Toole said. In the pandemic, Second Harvest has expanded pop-up grocery stores and traveling farmers markets and started Minnesota Central Kitchen - a collaboration with restaurants and chefs across the metro to make meals for people in need.

"We are innovating every single minute," O'Toole said.

Rural needs

On Tuesday, hundreds of people showed up at an event center parking lot in Sleepy Eye, two hours southwest of the metro, lining up in cars to pick up three boxes of produce, meat and dairy products.

'The worst is still ahead of us'

The hunger crisis isn't just an urban issue; in fact, two-thirds of Second Harvest's large distributions are outside the metro. Pat Pearson, the nonprofit's hunger programs manager, said food shelves in rural Minnesota are struggling with a drop in volunteers, especially retirees who are more vulnerable to complications of the coronavirus.

To assist with expenses such as more storage space, temporary staff and transportation, Second Harvest is giving about $500,000 in grants to food shelves and has waived its fees to deliver food since March. The nonprofit is also pushing out a marketing campaign to destigmatize using food shelves, especially since so many people are seeking help for the first time.

In Rochester, Virginia Merritt hears of residents watering down their milk or skipping meals to make ends meet.

"These are families who, before furloughs and layoffs, were making it," said Merritt, who leads Channel One Regional Food Bank, which distributes food to 55 food shelves and 125 meal programs in southeastern Minnesota. "They [now] find themselves in need."

The food bank has expanded its mobile pantries in rural areas, many of which don't have grocery stores nearby, and partnered with counties to have social workers deliver food to seniors in need.

"I think everywhere is hurting in different ways," she said of the rural-urban impact of hunger. "We're going to be in this new normal for a while."

(AP) - Wisconsin's governor activated the National Guard on Wednesday to protect state properties after a night of violence that included the toppling of two statues outside the state Capitol, one of which commemorated an abolitionist Civil War hero.Body

MADISON, Wis. - Wisconsin's governor activated the National Guard on Wednesday to protect state properties after a night of violence that included the toppling of two statues outside the state Capitol, one of which commemorated an abolitionist Civil War hero.

Protesters also attacked a state senator, threw a Molotov cocktail into a government building and attempted to break into the Capitol Tuesday night, only to be repelled by pepper spray from police stationed inside. The violence broke out as a group of 200 to 300 people protested the arrest of a Black man who shouted at restaurant customers through a megaphone while carrying a baseball bat.

On Wednesday night, about 40 people gathered peacefully outside the county jail where the man was being held, calling for his release. A crowd of about 100 people congregated outside the Capitol, where one of the statues used to stand, as Madison police watched. There was no sign of the National Guard.

Gov. Tony Evers, who toured the damage from Tuesday night and said the violence was in "stark contrast" to earlier peaceful protests, said he was activating the National Guard "to make sure people can exercise their First Amendment rights while ensuring the safety of members of the public and state buildings and infrastructure."

"If your goal was to advance social justice and policing reforms in the state of Wisconsin and making sure systemic racism is a thing of the past, you failed," Evers said of the protesters on WTMJ-AM.

Republican state lawmakers and others faulted Evers and Madison's Democratic mayor for not moving more quickly on Tuesday to quell the violence.

"The mob has become very bold," said Madison Alderman Paul Skidmore. "They see they can get away with a little, and they inch forward more and more. (Downtown Madison) is a battle zone right now, and I fear for my city."

Wisconsin governor activates National Guard after violence

The violence unfolded in a city long known as a liberal bastion with a long history of protest, dating back to student demonstrations on the University of Wisconsin campus in the 1960s. About 100,000 people protested in 2011 over then-Gov. Scott Walker's anti-union proposals.

It also exposed simmering anger over the 2015 shooting by police of a 19-year-old Black man by an officer who remains on the force. That shooting has been referenced by protesters in recent weeks.

The violence started Tuesday after Madison police arrested a protester who came to a restaurant across the street from the Capitol with a bat on his shoulder. Video released by Madison police shows the man, Devonere Johnson, talking through a megaphone while walking around the restaurant's outdoor patio and inside, saying he's "disturbing" the restaurant and talking about God and the police before walking out.

On another video released by police, as many as five officers can be seen taking Johnson to the sidewalk and carrying him to a police squad car after he resisted arrest.

Police said on Tuesday night a group of 200 to 300 people broke windows in multiple buildings, threw a Molotov cocktail into the city-county building, brought down the statues on the Capitol grounds, broke glass at a state office building and smashed windows and lights at the Capitol.

Democratic state Sen. Tim Carpenter was assaulted after taking a cellphone video of protesters.

"Punched/kicked in the head, neck, ribs," Carpenter tweeted around 4 a.m. "Innocent people are going to get killed."

One of the statues toppled, decapitated and dragged into a lake about a half-mile away was of Civil War Col. Hans Christian Heg. He was an anti-slavery activist and leader of an anti-slave catcher militia in Wisconsin who fought for the Union and died from injuries suffered during the Battle of Chickamauga.

The base of the Heg statue was defaced with graffiti Wednesday morning that read "Fire Matt Kenny," a reference to a white Madison police officer who shot and killed 19-year-old Tony Robinson, a Black man, in 2015. Kenny said Robinson had attacked him. Dane County District Attorney Ismael Ozanne, who is Black, cleared Kenny of any criminal wrongdoing and he remains a Madison officer.

The other statue taken down represents Wisconsin's motto "Forward." The statue was first installed 125 years ago but replaced with a bronze replica in 1998. It sat prominently outside the Capitol, facing the University of Wisconsin campus and State Street, an avenue lined with bars, restaurants and small businesses. That corridor has been the target of much of the vandalism since the death of George Floyd on May 25 in Minneapolis after a white police officer used his knee to pin the handcuffed Black man's neck.

The destruction followed similar unrest nationwide following Floyd's death, but in other cities statues of Confederate soldiers and other symbols of slavery were destroyed.

Protester Micah Le said the two statues paint a picture of Wisconsin as a racially progressive state even though slavery has continued in the form of a corrections system built around incarcerating Blacks.

"The fall of the statues is a huge gain for the movement, though I think that liberal and conservative media outlets will try to represent last night as senseless violence rather than the strategic political move it really was," Le wrote.

Wisconsin governor activates National Guard after violence

Republicans called on Evers and Madison's Democratic mayor to do more to protect the Capitol. Republican Assembly Speaker Robin Vos branded the protesters as "thugs." Republican U.S. Rep. Tom Tiffany, who until last month had served in the state Legislature, called on Evers to resign. Evers called that a "ridiculous statement."

"Why doesn't he resign?" Evers said on WTMJ.

Madison Mayor Satya Rhodes-Conway said later Wednesday that city leaders and law enforcement were working "on a number of fronts" to keep any additional protests calm.

"I am not in that room, I do not micromanage our law enforcement response," she said. "There has been broad agreement among law enforcement that deescalation and protecting people is the top concern."

Lt. Gov. Mandela Barnes, the first Black person to hold that office, condemned the violence in a tweet but said "far right provocateurs" had "fanned the flames of hate."

Robert Bowhan owns August, a clothing store that was looted during the first night of protests following Floyd's death. Bowhan, who is white, has boarded up his windows like many other merchants. He said he didn't know what to expect in the coming days.

"Everyone is probably a little frustrated. (Merchants) feel they don't have support from cops," Bowhan said. "They feel threatened and feel like their livelihoods are in jeopardy and they don't trust the government. This just scratches the surface of what our Black friends and colleagues go through on a daily basis." Funding for a key Minneapolis Police Department accountability initiative after the death of George Floyd has fallen through, officials confirmed Thursday, meaning potential delays as the city scrambles to find another source for the money.

Police Chief Medaria Arradondo announced June 10 the department would contract with Benchmark Analytics, a Chicago company, to use its data-driven system to identify problematic behavior by officers so supervisors could take corrective action. Developed by the University of Chicago, it's more advanced than similar systems used by many other departments across the country, as well as a system that Minneapolis tried in 2009 that never really got off the ground.

The nonprofit Minneapolis Foundation was to fund the project for the first year, but CEO R.T. Rybak - a founding member of the Benchmark Analytics board and a former Minneapolis mayor - confirmed Thursday that the foundation has dropped its involvement.

Rybak, who left the Benchmark board last December, said the foundation got involved because Arradondo wanted to move quickly. But he said they backed away "when there began to be some drama around Benchmark." He said the foundation wanted to avoid any harm to its broader work against racial injustice and in support of criminal justice reform, which predates Floyd's death.

Some activists had sharply criticized Rybak. Civil rights attorney Nekima Levy Armstrong and Michelle Gross of Communities United Against Police Brutality accused him at a news conference this week of failing to stop police brutality when he was mayor from 2002-2013. Armstrong, Gross and other activists - most of whom support the so-called dismantling of the department - said they didn't trust him or the foundation on police accountability issues.

Funding for key Minneapolis police initiative falls through

Gross denounced Rybak and the foundation as "a washed up former mayor who never did a damn thing about police accountability and a rich foundation who has no expertise and no credibility on this question." She called his former membership on the company's board "pretty cozy" and expressed skepticism that the project would ever get off the ground, given that previous efforts had failed. She also questioned why the city wasn't putting the work out for bids.

"It's important not to have any distractions because our role has been and is now more important than ever," Rybak said. Police spokesman John Elder said the department is trying to find alternative funding. He referred questions about where the money might come from to Mayor Jacob Frey, who said the city prefers "external partners" and said "I believe that we will get there."

Frey said if the city doesn't find other funders, it will see if the program can be done with existing money. It's not clear how much money the city needs. Benchmark Analytics CEO Ron Huberman said his company does not publicly discuss what it charges.

Nashville's department, about 1 1/2 times the size of the Minneapolis department, signed a five-year deal with Benchmark in 2018 worth around $455,000.

Huberman said the system combines a department's own data with analytical technology developed by University of Chicago researchers to flag officers who might need coaching, training or other interventions before discipline is warranted. It usually takes three to nine months to implement, he said, and would likely be closer to nine months in Minneapolis due to the size of the department.

Huberman said he didn't have enough information on the officer charged with killing Floyd, Derek Chauvin, to know if the system would have flagged him.

"Rarely does an officer engage in one super-problematic event," Huberman said in an interview. "You almost never see that. When officers are engaged in problematic conduct, it is almost always a pattern of problematic conduct that occurs. Because of that, it becomes a very predictable thing."

Despite wave of violence, 'defund' effort continues

ARTICLE CMXVI. DESPITE WAVE OF VIOLENCE, 'DEFUND' EFFORT CONTINUES

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1029 wordsByline: LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

An influential bloc of Minneapolis City Council members is pressing ahead with plans to dismantle the police department as a monthlong eruption of gunfire sent tremors through some neighborhoods.

Council President Lisa Bender said crime typically spikes in the summer and that the COVID-19 pandemic and the unrest following George Floyd's death have added to the stress in the community.

"We still have a police department today," she said. "Its funding has not changed from three weeks ago."

Pressure is mounting on City Council members to clarify who would respond to reports of violent crime if they accede to calls to defund the police department.

At a community meeting in the city's Jordan neighborhood Tuesday, Sondra Samuels told a small group of police officers that she wants to see changes in the department in the aftermath of Floyd's killing. She doesn't want a "blue code of silence." She wants racism to end.

But, Samuels also told them, "We want to get rid of that. We do not want to get rid of you."

It has been more than two weeks since nine City Council members gathered in Powderhorn Park to declare that they would begin the process of "ending" the Minneapolis Police Department. There has never been one clear, detailed description of what that would mean. Various council members and community activists have used the terms "defund," "dismantle," and "abolish" in different ways.

In the weeks since that statement, many of the discussions in City Hall have focused on the possibility of boosting investments in violence prevention programs and even sending mental health professionals or social workers to some types of calls.

But with gunshots erupting in their neighborhoods - and at least 113 people injured or killed in shootings since Floyd's death on May 25 - some residents are asking urgent new questions about the council's plans, or calling on them to back off the idea of defunding police altogether.

Despite wave of violence, 'defund' effort continues

Steven Belton, president and CEO of the Urban League Twin Cities, said he believes the public commitment to disband the police department has emboldened criminals and sparked a new wave of violence.

Absent any detailed proposals so far, some council members have floated ideas about what that defunding or dismantling might look like.

Five council members - Bender, Jeremiah Ellison, Alondra Cano, Cam Gordon and Steve Fletcher - are working to change city charter language that sets a minimum size requirement for the department. The department had 892 sworn officers and 175 non-sworn employees as of June 1.

One draft - its details being discussed privately - contemplates a larger public safety department that would still have some licensed officers.

But any change to the city charter would need to be approved by the council and the Charter Commission, and then put before voters.

Fletcher said he thinks the city will need to maintain some trained, licensed, armed employees to respond to violent calls in progress, such as active shooter situations. But he noted that in many instances, officers often arrive at a scene after the violence has ended.

"It's so much more common that we're showing up [and] the person has already left who has committed the crime," he said. "We're in problem-solving mode. We're in investigation mode. We're in logistical management mode, and those are things that we don't need necessarily armed officers to be doing."

Gordon said city officials need to determine which calls for service truly require a police response. "Whatever we come up with, we're going to have to look at what are the essential services the Minneapolis Police Department is providing," he said.

Council Member Andrew Johnson, who participated in the Powderhorn Park announcement, said there will still be a need for armed law enforcement. "But the question is, what's the appropriate amount, and what's the best way to respond to different types of crimes?" Johnson said.

He said armed officers might not be necessary for responding to car crashes or loud music calls. Council Member Jeremy Schroeder said he wants to ensure that there is a "swift response with appropriately trained people" in situations where there is an imminent threat. But he hopes that future efforts will put more emphasis on helping communities cope with trauma after crimes occur, or investigating their root causes.

The police union, Republicans and many Democrats outside the city have raised concerns about the "abolish" mantra and the recent flurry of shootings. Some official city statements also have described the recent uptick as "alarming." But Bender pushed back against the idea that council members' calls to defund the police department are contributing to the violence.

Bender acknowledged that some city residents say some officers might be pulling back in response to council members' criticism.

Minneapolis police Lt. Mark Montgomery told people at the Jordan meeting that his North Side officers feel "battered" but are continuing to respond to 911 calls. He denied that there was any work slowdown.

Despite wave of violence, 'defund' effort continues

Other council members say that the recent wave of violence in the city confirms their belief in reforms that transform - but do not eliminate - police.

"What I want as a result of these shootings [is] the gunman arrested and put in jail. And only a licensed peace officer can do that," said Council Member Linea Palmisano, who didn't join the pledge to end the police department.

City Council Member Andrea Jenkins said police should still respond to calls and do their job to "serve and protect" the community. But the city should focus on creating more schools, housing and other services that prevent people from pursuing crime or turning to violence, Jenkins said.

Council Member Lisa Goodman also refrained from the pledge.

"There needs to be transformational change in how we view public safety in the city," she said. "On the flip side, to be clear, I do not believe that social workers or other community activists, I don't believe it's reasonable for them to be asked to respond to 911 calls on domestic abuse or other very volatile situations."

Length: 1039 wordsByline: Will Weissert, Marc LevyHighlight: As President Donald Trump visited a Wisconsin shipyard to emphasize job growth and reviving an economy hammered by the coronavirus, Joe Biden spent Thursday in Pennsylvania warning "there are no miracles coming" to help the nation beat back the still deadly pandemic.Body

LANCASTER, Pa. - As President Donald Trump visited a Wisconsin shipyard to emphasize job growth and reviving an economy hammered by the coronavirus, Joe Biden spent Thursday in Pennsylvania warning "there are no miracles coming" to help the nation beat back the still deadly pandemic.

"Amazingly, he hasn't grasped the most basic fact of this crisis: To fix the economy we have to get control over the virus," the presumptive Democratic presidential nominee said of Trump while speaking at a community center in Lancaster. "He's like a child who can't believe this has happened to him. His whining and self-pity. This pandemic didn't happen to him. It happened to all of us."

Much of the nation remaining home for months has largely prevented the two presidential candidates from holding dueling appearances in pivotal battleground states. On Thursday, it gave them an opportunity to show off their contrasting styles on a virus outbreak that has killed more than 120,000 Americans.

Biden has spent weeks arguing that the pandemic remains a clear and present danger that Trump is trying to wish away amid a desire to speed an economic recovery. The president counters that the country doesn't have to choose between its health and improving the economy.

"There are no miracles coming," Biden said. "We're going to have to step up as Americans, all of us, and do the simple things and the hard things to keep our families safe and reopen our economy and to eventually put this pandemic behind us - and without responsible leadership coming out of the White House."

The former vice president spent much of Thursday defending the Obama administration's signature health care law and decrying what he said was a White House-led effort to dismantle it via a court challenge. It was part of a larger Democratic effort to refocus the 2020 election on health care, an issue that helped the party retake the House last cycle and one it hopes will resonate with even more voters amid the pandemic.

Dueling Trump and Biden events offer contrasting virus responses

Narrow 2016 victories in Wisconsin and Pennsylvania were vital in sending Trump to the White House. That he would build his travel around trying to do that again - and that Biden would respond with trips meant to flip the states back to Democratic - wouldn't usually be a surprise with the presidential election now less than five months away. But the coronavirus has upended normal travel since March.

After long focusing on staging virtual rallies and other online appearances from his Delaware home, Biden has in recent weeks begun making frequent trips to Pennsylvania, allowing him to target a swing state without venturing far. Lancaster is about an hour and 15 minutes by car from Biden's house, and yet it is the farthest he's traveled lately, aside from a trip to Houston to meet with the family of George Floyd, whose death in police custody sparked protests around the nation.

Trump, by contrast, staged a rally in Tulsa, Oklahoma, last weekend and spoke at a megachurch in Arizona on Tuesday. On Thursday, he visited Marinette in rural Wisconsin for a private tour of a shipyard and to participate in a town hall to be broadcast by Fox News Channel from an airport in Green Bay. Vice President Mike Pence also hit another key state, Ohio.

Biden's team has organized small events and enforce social distancing while its members and its candidate wear masks. Trump has refused to wear a mask in public, and his campaign says Biden is using that cautious approach to hide the fact that he can't draw large, enthusiastic crowds.

Biden noted that while he took off a black face mask to give his speech, "I wear it everywhere I go."

"I know as Americans it's not something we're used to," he said. "But it matters."

Biden indeed wore his mask earlier, as he met in an outdoor courtyard with three mothers and two children who told of benefiting from the health care law. Beyond the police cordon, a group of Trump supporters could be heard chanting "four more years" and "USA."

In his subsequent speech, Biden spoke behind a placard proclaiming "Protect and Build on the Affordable Care Act" and promised to promote expanding health insurance to more Americans. He scoffed at Trump's suggestion during last weekend's rally that he'd asked officials to slow down testing for the coronavirus because doing more of it was leading to more people testing positive.

"He thinks finding out that more Americans are sick will make him look bad. And that's what he's worried about," Biden said. "He's worried about looking bad."

Polls in Wisconsin and Pennsylvania show Biden ahead of Trump, but nearly every poll had Trump trailing in 2016 before his base came together in the final weeks of the campaign to secure his victory.

Trump's event wasn't open to the public but featured hundreds of people inside the shipyard who will be required to wear masks - even though Trump won't be. He was promoting a contract won in April by Fincantieri Marinette Marine to build as many as 10 Navy frigates. The company employs about 2,500 people now, and the deal could add 1,000 jobs. It's the first new major shipbuilding program for the Navy in more than a decade.

Dueling Trump and Biden events offer contrasting virus responses

Arriving in Wisconsin, Trump acknowledged the power of incumbency, tweeting, "Launching big new ship contract!" Video on Twitter showed protesters just outside the airport, chanting "Hands up, don't shoot," and "I can't breathe." Meanwhile, an event page created by Fox News said attendees of the town hall event were required to wear a face covering.

Biden has also broken with Trump by spending weeks denouncing institutional racism and police brutality, siding with protesters around the country. Pence drove home that contrast on Thursday, participating in a police roll call during his stop in Youngstown, Ohio.

The vice president declared that promoting the rights of African Americans did not have to come at the expense of police rights. "We're showing we don't have to make that choice," Pence said.

Pieces of plywood used to protect businesses during riots after the death of George Floyd may soon protect people living with homelessness.

Settled, a nonprofit organization working to end homelessness, is asking business owners to donate the sheets of plywood so they can be used to build tiny houses - known as "Sacred Settlements" - on church-owned land.

"This is an opportunity for us to turn something that ... is no longer being used into something extremely valuable - snug, comfortable homes to protect our unhoused population, which is even more fragile in these uncertain times," Settled co-founder Gabrielle Clowdus said in a prepared statement.

In January, Forest Lake Lutheran voted to partner to explore placing a Sacred Settlement on its 7.8-acre property. Those plans have yet to be approved by the Forest Lake City Council.

To donate plywood or other building materials to Settled, call 512-788-0344.

As defunding police is debated locally and across the country, St. Paul Police Chief Todd Axtell said Thursday the first thing that comes to his mind when the topic comes up are the city's more than 300,000 residents and its crime victims.

"I wonder what they would think about that," Axtell told St. Paul City Council members.

He pointed out that violent crime has increased in St. Paul and also said he has been working to reform the department since he became chief four years ago.

"While some law enforcement agencies around the country have been building policy in the last four weeks in the wake of the tragic murder of George Floyd (in Minneapolis police custody), your police department has been immersed in that work for the past four years," Axtell said during the virtual meeting. During the meeting he responded to questions council members sent him in advance and also to follow-up inquiries they posed to him.

Two of seven St. Paul City Council members have stated they support abolishing the police. One, Mitra Jalali, told Axtell on Thursday she appreciated him bringing up the question of defunding the police.

"I think that it's important to not conflate law enforcement with crime prevention because people who are experiencing crimes are not only experiencing disproportionate amounts of crimes due to a whole host of factors of under-investment in areas of their lives, but are also at higher risk of experiencing violence at the hands of law enforcement," Jalali said. "... This can't just stop at a reform conversation. We do have to talk about how to create community safety, and as a city our violence prevention dollars are going to things that aren't preventing violence."

City Council President Amy Brendmoen asked Axtell whether the period of civil unrest had skewed the overall crime trends upward. Axtell told her that with the exception of a couple of crime categories, crime had already been up in St. Paul this year.

St. Paul police reforms were underway for years when George Floyd died in Minneapolis, Axtell tells council

"Since the tragic Floyd incident, crime and shots-fired and people injured by gunfire continues to go up ... as well," Axtell said.

There have been 16 homicides in St. Paul this year; there were 12 through the end of June 2019. Axtell also said this year, compared to the same period last year:

Reports of shots fired are up 130 percent (there have been 928 reported). Robberies are up 30 percent (297 reported). Aggravated assaults are up 24 percent (421 reported).

During the past couple of weeks, there have been two instances of groups of officers being fired upon - one in Frogtown and the other on the East Side, Axtell said.

St. Paul police continue to work with federal law enforcement agencies to go after people "with razor-sharp precision" who are illegally carrying guns and pulling the triggers "indiscriminately" to settle disputes that often are about perceived acts of disrespect, Axtell said.

City Council member Jane Prince said when she was door knocking on the East Side last fall, during a time when there was a spike in homicides, people were not supportive of reductions to the police department.

"When we are talking about potential cuts to our police department, we really do need to speak to the people who live in areas where they are victimized at much higher rates than other parts of the city," Prince said.

After peaceful protests in Minneapolis and St. Paul, there were several days of looting and arson in both cities. More than 300 buildings and businesses in St. Paul - many on University Avenue - were damaged and destroyed by vandalism and fire, according to the city. St. Paul officials estimate the damage at more than $73 million.

Jalali asked Axtell during about department policies regarding officers using chemicals and projectiles on people.

She said there was a video that showed a young person approach an officer standing next to what appeared to be a St. Paul police squad.

"The officer appears to mace them or spray them with some kind of pepper spray or chemical and they all run away ... and so when it looks like our officers are escalating interactions with protesters who aren't actually doing anything, it exacerbates the trust problems that we're all talking about," she said, asking Axtell what steps the department is taking to "be accountable where our policies weren't followed."

Axtell said the department has clear policies and he doesn't believe that officers overall went "further than it needed to."

Officers had rocks and bottles thrown at them as they tried to prevent more buildings from being burned, said Axtell, adding that it was "the most violence I've seen in a riot in my history on this department, 31 years."

Axtell also said, "If there were mistakes made, I'd like people to bring those mistakes to me."

St. Paul police reforms were underway for years when George Floyd died in Minneapolis, Axtell tells council

Since Axtell became chief in 2016, he said the department "began a transformation from a police department that was mostly white, mostly male ... to a police department that is more transparent, more compassionate and more connected to our community, and that journey will continue."

City Council member Rebecca Noecker recently held a virtual town hall with two legislators and said she heard that "so many of the people of color in my ward just feel like the kind of interaction that they have with our officers is fundamentally different because of who they are." She said a mother told her that her 11-year-old son, who is a person of color, had a gun pulled on him by police twice.

Axtell has said he wants the department to be transparent and has released annual data about traffic stops that includes racial demographics, but Noecker asked if there were other ways "of measuring whether our officers are being fair and using the same kind of response no matter who they're responding to."

Officers continue to get training in implicit bias each year, which is more than the state mandates, and they work to ensure "our response to calls and our citizens are based on behavior and not the color of their skin," Axtell said.

Axtell highlighted changes he's overseen, among them:

Incorporating community recommendations when rewriting K-9 and use-of-force policies. Civil litigation involving St. Paul police has decreased since 2016, with the exception of the record-setting \$2 million settlement to Frank Baker, who was unarmed and not the suspect police were looking for when he was injured by a K-9 and an officer. Last year marked the lowest civil payouts related to the police department - $24,000 - on record. Increasing diversity in the department by 30 percent among officers and civilians. Being the first department in the state to ban "warrior training" in favor of guardian and crisis intervention training. Forming a Community Outreach and Stabilization Unit that pairs officers with licensed clinical social workers for some mental health calls.

Axtell said claims that people have made about the St. Paul police department being the deadliest are untrue. Officers have fatally shot four people in the four years that Axtell has been chief, and he said several other cities of comparable size have higher numbers.

"All incidents are tragic, but St. Paul certainly does not warrant this label," he said. The United States must be the only nation in the world that names military posts after traitors. The police killing of George Floyd has brought renewed attention to this absurd practice, in which U.S. Army and Army National Guard installations across the South bear the names of secessionist generals, most of them West Pointers, who fought to uphold slavery during the Civil War.

The moment to end this practice has arrived. The Army should take the opportunity to end this offensive tradition and ensure the namesakes of Army installations express the courage, fidelity and moral awareness that Americans expect of their soldiers.

Here are our nominations for replacement honorees for 10 Army posts that currently bear the names of dishonorable Confederate generals. Our criteria are simple: no one living and no generals.

Naming Army posts after very senior officers suggests a correlation between rank and military merit. From personal experience, we know that no such relationship exists. Besides, plenty of other posts - Forts Meade, Drum and Leonard Wood, for example - carry the names of generals who, whatever their limitations, at least fought on the right side.

Far better to honor those who while serving modeled virtues that can inspire current and future soldiers.

Civil War - Col. Robert Gould Shaw

Born of a prominent abolitionist family, Shaw organized, trained and led the 54th Massachusetts Infantry, among the very first African American regiments in the Union Army. At age 25, Shaw was killed on July 18, 1863, leading his regiment's assault on Battery Wagner, at Charleston, S.C. Fort Hood, Texas, currently designated for a Confederate general, should be renamed Fort Shaw.

Bacevich, Sjursen: At 10 Army posts, replace the traitors' names with those of these heroes

Post-Civil War - Lt. Henry Flipper

Born into slavery in Georgia, Flipper was the first African American to graduate from the U.S. Military Academy. At West Point, he endured vile hazing at the hands of his fellow cadets. Commissioned in 1877, he served honorably with the 10th U.S. Cavalry, the Buffalo Soldiers, until dismissed from the Army in 1882 on trumped up charges. In 1999, a presidential pardon cleared Flipper's name, which should grace Fort Gordon, in his home state.

Awarded the Medal of Honor for combat actions in France in 1918, including leading an attack on a German machine gun emplacement. York represents the ideal of the citizen soldier serving his country in time of need. Fort Benning, Ga., should be renamed Fort York.

World War II, Pacific - Maj. Josephine Nesbit

Nesbit joined the Army Nurse Corps in 1918 during the influenza pandemic and served until 1946. Stationed in the Philippines in 1941, she was captured after the fall of Bataan and spent the remainder of the war faithfully administering to her fellow POWs. Fort Lee, Va., currently named in honor of the slaveholding Robert E. Lee, should be renamed Fort Nesbit.

World War II, Europe - Lt. Daniel Inouye

In 1943, when the Army dropped its ban on Japanese Americans serving, Inouye immediately volunteered and joined the famed all-Nisei 442nd Regimental Combat Team. After earning a battlefield commission, he sustained several wounds and ultimately received the Medal of Honor. He subsequently served his native Hawaii in the Senate for more than 40 years. The Army should rename Fort Polk, La., Fort Daniel Inouye.

World War II, Army Air Forces - Capt. George McGovern

Piloting a B-24 Liberator bomber, McGovern flew 35 combat missions, earning the Distinguished Flying Cross among other decorations. After the war, he served his home state of South Dakota in the House of Representatives and the Senate, and courageously opposed the folly of the Vietnam War. Louisiana's Camp Beauregard, whose name now venerates the officer who fired the first shots at Fort Sumter in 1861, should become Camp McGovern.

Enlisting at age 16, Pena served in World War II and then Korea, where he earned the Medal of Honor posthumously after single-handedly holding off the enemy so his unit could safely retreat. Fort Pena is the better title for a Virginia post currently named for the traitor A.P. Hill.

Bacevich, Sjursen: At 10 Army posts, replace the traitors' names with those of these heroes

Vietnam - Chief Warrant Officer Hugh Thompson

While serving in Vietnam in 1968 as an Army aviator, Thompson landed his helicopter between Vietnamese villagers and U.S. troops to put an end to the My Lai massacre of some 350 civilians. Fort Rucker, Ala., home of U.S. Army Aviation, should be renamed Fort Thompson in his memory.

Post-9/11 - Staff Sgt. Justin Gallegos

In 2009, with his unit outnumbered six-to-one, Gallegos gallantly defended an Afghanistan outpost. This first-generation Mexican American held a critical position until exhausting his ammunition. Killed exposing himself to retrieve a wounded comrade, he received the Distinguished Service Cross posthumously. Gallegos is an appropriate namesake for Fort Pickett, Va., to replace the rebel general known for his foolish charge at Gettysburg.

A valiant Chiricahua Apache warrior, Geronimo resisted U.S. government efforts to deprive Indians of their freedom in the late 1800s. During World War II, U.S. Army paratroopers shouted, "Geronimo!" when exiting their aircraft. It is thus fitting to rename Fort Bragg, N.C., home of the airborne, Fort Geronimo.

Members of Congress can act quickly when appropriating trillions in corporate bailouts in a time of economic crisis. They should demonstrate similar alacrity in expunging Confederate names from Army installations. President Trump predictably opposes any such action. Our elected representatives and senators should disregard his intransigence and pass the necessary legislation by a veto-proof majority.

The Army has a lot of signs to repaint.

Andrew Bacevich and Danny Sjursen each graduated from West Point and subsequently taught U.S. history there. Bacevich is a Vietnam veteran. Sjursen served in Iraq and Afghanistan. They wrote this piece for the Los Angeles Times.

This moment in America wasn't created by the horror of one man's murder alone but by a legacy of oppression. Nevertheless, the killing of George Floyd, and labor of protesters, has opened a window: We are no longer talking about police reform. We're rethinking the meaning and role of policing itself.

It's an opportunity, I believe, that should be joined by people from across the political spectrum.

I once saw why.

A few years ago, I was honored to be called for jury service in Ramsey County, and to end up as foreman of a six-person jury in a drunk-driving trial. The defendant, a white man in his late 20s, had been to a wedding of a fraternity buddy when he was pulled over in St. Paul for suspected intoxication. His claim: His girlfriend had been driving. The officer asserted that he identified the man driving before he turned his lights on, and that the two party-goers quickly exited the SUV and made up the story before he could turn a corner and pull up behind the stopped vehicle.

My jury was diverse, as it should be: a suburban family man, white and slightly younger than me; an older white businessman who spoke of having been a Reagan delegate in the 1980s; a retired white woman; an older African American woman, a social worker by profession; and a younger black man, a car mechanic.

We found one important thing in common. In deliberations, each told their distrust of the lead police officer. Assessing the facts, all jurors discounted the veteran officer's confidence in his powers of recognition and perception. They gave little weight to the corroborating witness of a second officer. They were downright suspicious of the gaps in the video record produced by a "mistake" when the officer turned the car's camera on. A deliberate and corrupt practice, many agreed.

Patrick Schmidt: Let's build law and order. We start by rethinking policing

The jurors shared the reasons for their skepticism. To the life experiences aired by my African American colleagues, even the older Republican spoke of a distrust born of his son's treatment in a drug case.

We had no love for the defendant's character, and despite our agreement that he probably had been the driver, our deliberations didn't last more than an hour. Acquitted.

I left satisfied at having done my civic duty but was still unsettled. This defendant concerned me. He smirked. He might drink and drive again. None of us wanted that. But we couldn't trust the source of the evidence against him. Leaving the Ramsey County courthouse that day, I knew that the cops on the beat had lost the faith of even some of the more conservative citizens.

Despite the obvious divisions today, we begin with shared interests. Indeed, as noted by Yale Law Professor James Forman, Jr. in his book, "Locking Up Our Own" (2018), many black policymakers and judges supported the war on crime that began in the 1970s, as they searched for ways to stop communities from being torn apart by drugs and murder. Tragically, that war's terrible effect was to militarize policing and drive mass incarceration. It is clearer than ever that we have criminalized too much and looked to police as the answer to too many problems. That will change and must change.

Freedom flourishes in peaceful communities. But those demanding "law and order" commonly forget the "law" part. The rule of law isn't a simple concept, but it certainly doesn't mean "rules ruthlessly enforced" or "whatever it takes."

When police battle and repress their community, they lose the trust of the people they serve, and order always remains a mirage. Law isn't made better by making law enforcement harsher, more physical, less forgiving. That kind of policing destroys trust and undermines the law itself. We require just laws, enforced equitably, humanely, and decently.

We have tried many reforms - body cameras, police review boards, de-escalation training - only for researchers to find little meaningful effect. My jury displayed one unintended consequence, too: that we can't assume an innocent explanation for the failure of police to turn on their cameras, which according to studies happens as much as 20% of the time.

Minor reforms attempting to restrain excessive force haven't displaced the adversarial philosophy that has already driven the United States to the world's highest incarceration rate. Just as important, the rear-view mirror on the past half century shows that the militarization of policing and overuse of criminal law has also produced pervasive targeting of communities of color over misdemeanor offenses. The loss of trust, I found with my jury, is even deeper than I thought.

At this crossroads, then, the real "law and order" agenda isn't more, but less: a smaller, more specialized role for law enforcement expertise.

America won't find consensus around a slogan like "Defund the Police," but we can take a fresh look at the question, when do we need policing? Police can't be the answer, or even the first response, to situations that have their roots in mental health or income inequality. And the slow road to rebuilding trust will come in approaches that grow in partnership with communities rather than against them.

So long as the partisan divide in the United States remains a culture war, the national conversation about law enforcement will stop short. But unless we embrace this opportunity, we won't have justice and we won't have peace - and no amount of policing will bring order either.

ATLANTA - Three white men have been indicted on murder charges in the killing of Ahmaud Arbery, a Black man fatally shot while running in a neighborhood near Georgia's coast.

Prosecutor Joyette Holmes announced Wednesday that a grand jury has indicted Travis McMichael, Greg McMichael and William "Roddie" Bryan Jr. on charges including malice and felony murder in Arbery's death.

"This is another positive step, another great step for finding justice for Ahmaud, for finding justice for this family and the community beyond," Holmes said at a news conference outside the Glynn County courthouse in Brunswick that was streamed online by news outlets.

Arbery's death has often been invoked during protests against racial injustice that have broken out across the nation since George Floyd's death last month under a white Minneapolis police officer's knee. Arbery's death also fueled a renewed push for a state hate crimes law in Georgia, which state lawmakers passed on Tuesday.

Lawyers for the McMichaels have cautioned against a rush to judgment and have said the full story will come out in court. A lawyer for Bryan has maintained that his client was merely a witness.

Arbery was slain Feb. 23 when the Greg and Travis McMichael, a father and son, armed themselves and pursued the 25-year-old Black man running in their neighborhood. Greg McMichael told police he suspected Arbery was a burglar and that Arbery attacked his son before being shot. Arbery's family has said he was out for a jog.

Bryan lives in the same subdivision, just outside the port city of Brunswick. Bryan said he saw the McMichaels driving by and joined the chase, a Georgia Bureau of Investigation agent Richard Dial testified earlier this month at a probable cause hearing.

3 men indicted on murder charges in killing of Ahmaud Arbery

It wasn't until May 7 - two days after Bryan's cellphone video leaked online and stirred a national outcry - that the McMichaels were arrested. Bryan was arrested on May 22, and an arrest warrant said he tried "to confine and detain" Arbery without legal authority by "utilizing his vehicle on multiple occasions" before Arbery was shot.

Bryan told investigators that Travis McMichael cursed and said a racist slur as he stood over Arbery, moments after he fatally shot him, Dial testified.

The Georgia Bureau of Investigation took over the case after the video surfaced. The state attorney general appointed Holmes, who's the district attorney in Cobb County near Atlanta, to prosecute after the local district attorney recused herself because Greg McMichael had worked for her - and two other outside prosecutors also stepped aside.

In addition to malice murder and felony murder charges, the McMichaels and Bryan each are charged with two counts of aggravated assault and one count each of false imprisonment and criminal attempt to commit false imprisonment.

Under Georgia law, a felony murder charge means that a death occurred during the commission of an underlying felony and doesn't require intent to kill. Malice murder requires "malice aforethought, either express or implied." Any murder conviction in Georgia carries a minimum sentence of life in prison, either with or without the possibility of parole.

Court functions in Georgia have been severely limited in recent months because of a statewide judicial emergency declared by the chief justice of the state Supreme Court in response to the coronavirus pandemic. Holmes said they were able to call in a grand jury that had been impaneled prior to the judicial emergency.

Attorneys for Arbery's mother and father issued statements applauding the indictment and stressing their desire to see the three men convicted and sentenced for his death.

Bob Rubin, a lawyer for Travis McMichael, 34, said in an email that prosecutors choose the facts they want to present to a grand jury when seeking an indictment. The defense team has found other facts "that are an integral part of the case," he wrote.

"To this indictment, Travis McMichael will plead not guilty, and we look forward to presenting all of the facts regarding this tragic death in a court of law," Rubin wrote.

Attorney Kevin Gough, who represents Bryan, 50, spoke to reporters at the county courthouse right after Holmes announced the indictment.

"We welcome the action of the grand jury today,' Gough said. "While we disagree with it, it's an important step in the process to moving this case closer to the speedy trial that Roddie has demanded."

He said his client has committed no crime and has cooperated with law enforcement officers from the beginning.

Lawyers for Greg McMichael, 64, did not immediately respond to an email seeking comment Wednesday afternoon.

Even if Gov. Brian Kemp signs the state hate crimes legislation passed this week, it couldn't be applied retroactively to this case, Holmes told reporters. The U.S. Department of Justice has said it's assessing whether federal hate crimes charges are appropriate. [No mask, pay a fine? ALBERT LEA, MINN. - Hannah Goodemann recalls learning that her city was named for a man with a divisive past during a school field trip to the Freeborn County Historical Museum.

But Goodemann and other longtime residents of this city of 18,000 people say that Albert Lea's allegiance to the slaveholding South is seldom mentioned.

Lea was a Tennessean who served as a Confederate lieutenant colonel several decades after he surveyed parts of what became southern Minnesota for the U.S. Army in 1835. There's a bust of him at the county museum, but he's buried 900 miles away, down Interstate 35, in Corsicana, Texas.

"I think it would be interesting to open up that dialogue and see what other people in the community think," said Goodemann, 22, a bartender and community activist.

A bipartisan group of lawmakers in Washington, D.C., is trying to remove names of Confederate generals from military bases, and rebel statues are tumbling from Texas to Virginia. After George Floyd's killing in Minneapolis police custody, some racial justice advocates say such symbols glorify the forces that fought to preserve slavery.

Yet the debate about the place of Confederate names in 21st-century America has largely bypassed Albert Lea, far from the places where slavery helped drive the Civil War.

"I don't know that really as a community we've talked about Albert Lea. ... I would venture to guess that most people in town don't even know," said Mayor Vern Rasmussen Jr.

Rasmussen grew up in southern Minnesota but said he didn't hear much about Albert Lea's Confederate ties until 2015, when a volunteer firefighter flew a Confederate flag on the back of a Hartland, Minn., fire truck during an Independence Day parade in Albert Lea.

A legacy going south?

The incident spurred controversy at a time when South Carolina officials were looking to remove the Confederate flag at their statehouse after a white supremacist's shooting of nine black churchgoers in Charleston.

Rasmussen said one of the City Council's goals is to improve outreach and inclusiveness with the community, adding that "the most important thing for us to do is to continue to work on our race relations." If Albert Lea doesn't welcome everyone, he said, it won't grow.

The city is 91% white, 14% Hispanic or Latino (including some whites), 3% Asian, and 2% black, and the school system is rapidly growing even more racially diverse.

"The name itself, I don't think in our community has any negative or positive connotation," said Rasmussen. "It's really just a name. ... I think [changing it] is a lot of money and time spent, and I'm not sure it would benefit us as much as it would to try to build a receptive community to everyone."

Melissa Schmidt, 41, said she agrees with the mayor. Lea's Confederate service, she said, "had nothing to do with what he did in Albert Lea at the time."

An uncomfortable past

Lea was born in 1808 in Knoxville, Tenn., and graduated from the U.S. Military Academy at West Point. He served as a lieutenant in the First Regiment of the U.S. Dragoons at Fort Des Moines and was assigned in 1835 to a topographical expedition of Michigan Territory, spanning what became northern Iowa and southern Minnesota.

He helped map the region and published a pamphlet the following year that was credited with drawing waves of settlers to the brand-new Wisconsin Territory and also gave Iowa its name. French cartographer Joseph Nicollet later renamed Fox Lake after Lea, and the town that sprang up around the lake in the 1850s took on the name, too.

Lea went on to a wide-ranging career, including a stint as acting secretary of war under President Millard Fillmore. He was living in Texas when the Civil War broke out in 1861 and joined the Confederate army, even though his son, Edward, was a Union naval officer. In 1863, Lea saw Edward die after Confederate soldiers attacked the boat where he was chief officer near Galveston, Texas.

By 1874, with Minnesota a solidly Union state and the wounds of the Civil War still fresh, some Albert Lea residents were making an effort to change the city's name. They were opposed by a group that protested vigorously in the Freeborn County Standard that a change would lead to postal confusion and force Albert Lea to build its reputation under a new name.

Lea, they wrote, was only "a subordinate officer of the government at the time of the expedition, possessed of a keen appreciation of his position." They praised the town's historical origins and how Lea had dwelled enthusiastically in his writings on the area's beauty: "Must it be set aside because Mr. Lea, unfortunately, lived in the South when the war broke out?"

The name stayed. After the war, Lea opened a bookstore in Galveston and served as city engineer. The Standard trumpeted his visit to Albert Lea in 1879, stating his Confederate ties matter-of-factly: "On the breaking out of the rebellion [he] offered his services to the confederacy, which were accepted. He served the rebel cause in various capacities."

A legacy going south?

While in town, Lea delivered an address before 3,500 people at the annual reunion of the Old Settlers of Freeborn County, but he made no mention of the Civil War. He died in 1891.

'History is history'

A week after Floyd's death, Goodemann organized a rally in Albert Lea demanding justice that drew at least 200 people outside the county courthouse. She said she received some backlash afterward, with messages accusing her of being anti-cop and associated with anti-fascist activists.

Lisa Hanson, 55, said she didn't think Albert Lea's Confederate past "is necessarily something that anyone is real proud of," but doesn't represent the community she loves.

"Albert Lea does not represent this Confederate soldier," said Hanson, owner of the Interchange Wine and Coffee Bistro. "Yes, it was named after him, but I think in no do we see ourselves ... as following in his footsteps."

Shawn Biggins, a 30-year-old customer at the Interchange, said he couldn't see why it would be a problem to rename the city. "But I think a lot of people around here wouldn't take too kindly to that," he said; it's a conservative area and "seem[s] to not like change very much."

At the Conger Meat Market downtown, behind-the-counter employee Tammy Eggum, 58, voiced dismay at efforts to remove Confederate names from military bases. She said her son is in the military and did his basic training in Georgia at Fort Benning, named for a Confederate general.

History must be preserved good and bad, she said, and that includes keeping Albert Lea's name.

"History is history - it should stay where it is," she said.

"History can be ugly," agreed customer Julie Sorenson, 54, a school district worker. But eliminating Confederate names and statues, she said, "doesn't erase it."

A group of seasoned Twin Cities startup veterans with backgrounds in fundraising, investing, marketing, mentorship and more have teamed up to launch a new venture capital firm called Bread and Butter Ventures.

The firm's founders are Brett Brohl, Mary Grove and Stephanie Rich. Brohl is the managing director of the St. Paul-based Techstars Farm to Fork ag-tech accelerator. Rich is Farm to Fork's entrepreneur in residence and the founder of local tech news site Starting Up North. The site officially ceased operations Thursday morning so Rich could focus her efforts on Bread and Butter.

Bread and Butter Ventures brings together local startup veterans

"I'm beyond thrilled by the opportunity," Rich told Minne Inno. "I've had so much fun working with Brett and Mary. I'm excited to build this with them. I think we can do something special."

Grove is a former Google executive. Around two years ago, she moved to Minnesota to become a partner in Revolution and make investments from the firm's Rise of the Rest Seed Fund. During her time with Revolution, Grove led 25 investments for the firm in a number of sectors but developed a special interest in health care and enterprise SaaS software.

Grove said she is grateful for her time working with Rise of the Rest, especially because it helped her realize that she loved working with early-stage founders.

"As I contemplated my next chapter, it made sense to go all-in on the ecosystem here," she said. "Minnesota is something I'm deeply convicted in. By working here, we have the opportunity to re-galvanize more resources and bring the best of Minnesota to the world and the best of the world to Minnesota."

Bread and Butter is the evolution of The Syndicate Fund, a venture capital group founded by Brohl around four years ago.

"It wasn't that we needed to change, but that we had an opportunity," he said. "The three of us have very different backgrounds and we all look at deals differently. By bringing us all together, we can do more and improve our results."

The Syndicate Fund was about halfway through its second fund when it converted to Bread and Butter Ventures. Despite the change, Brohl said the firm first is prepared to continue investing out of this fund immediately. All Syndicate Fund portfolio companies will also be brought over to Bread and Butter.

Bread and Butter's name is a nod to its location. Minnesota has been known by some as the "Bread and Butter" state since the early 20th century. The firm's founders say that it also reflects their investing philosophy.

"This means food, enterprise SaaS and health care - some of Minnesota's strengths," Grove said. "But more than that, we want to focus on how we feed each other and how we take care of each other. That's our focus."

Bread and Butter will be investing in businesses both in Minnesota and across the globe.

Founders of color have historically been overlooked and underfunded in the world of venture capital. It's a problem that has plagued the industry for years, but discussions of inequality have been recently renewed in the aftermath of George Floyd's death.

Bread and Butter's founders say that this issue has been at the front of their minds and they're developing specific initiatives to combat this issue.

"We fundamentally believe that good investment strategy includes diversity," Rich said. "It's incredibly important. Anyone that's including it as an afterthought isn't doing it right."

"Diversity is not about charity," Brohl added. "Our job as a fund is to invest in the best founders and provide returns. Everything out there says diverse portfolios out-perform those that aren't diverse. So diversity is an integral part of this fund."

Bread and Butter Ventures brings together local startup veterans

Brohl and Grove will be general partners at Bread and Butter while Rich will serve as head of platform. In this role, Rich will focus on the firm's activities outside of investment, including ways to build the ecosystem and support entrepreneurs.

"We're doing a lot of discovery right now," Rich said. "We're looking at these companies, learning where they are and what they need. What are good and bad practices? After that, we'll be able to share more about longer-term strategies."

For now, Bread and Butter knows that it wants to commit to certain actions around transparency. The firm will publish data about its investments, recruit diverse speakers and provide hands-on training to help portfolio companies build inclusive teams.

Founders also say that any panel they participate in must be diverse, and if it's not, they'll help it change. In time, it also plans to bring on limited partners from diverse backgrounds.

Bread and Butter is wasting no time in putting its investment power to work. Just a few hours after making its official debut, the firm was already hearing pitches from founders.

"We want entrepreneurs to find us, reach us and get time with us," Grove said. "We want to be very accessible to the community. That's how we want to differentiate ourselves."

"We want to go in and have an impact," Brohl added. "That's our goal. We want to be the best venture capital firm out there."

ARTICLE CMXXV. CIVIL UNREST RECOVERY BILL DIES IN SPECIAL SESSION

Finance and Commerce

FINANCE & COMMERCESection: NEWSLength: 683 wordsByline: Kevin FeatherlyBody

One casualty of the failed 2020 special session is legislation that would have provided financial help to scorched neighborhoods damaged by the unrest following George Floyd' death.

The bill, House File 132 from Rep. Mohamud Noor, DFL-Minneapolis, passed the House by a 74-53 vote on June 19.

However, it had no Senate companion and the upper chamber never took it up before breaking for an overnight recess, just before 11 p.m. on June 19. That pause was interrupted just long enough to reconvene at dawn for the 35-32 Senate vote that effectively ended the special session.

The Noor bill, dubbed the Providing Resources, Opportunity and Maximizing Investments in Striving Entrepreneurs (PROMISE) Act aimed to help rebuild the approximately 1,500 businesses that were damaged or destroyed in arson fires that plagued Lake Street, University Avenue and Broadway after Floyd's death in police custody.

"Members, this is what we need to do," Noor said during House floor debate on June 19. "This is what the communities are asking for during this difficult time. "

Among its features, the economic recovery omnibus package included a $167.6 million appropriation from the state's general fund in fiscal year 2020, to launch a "civil unrest immediate relief program. "

That money included two $17.5 million grants to the cities of Minneapolis and St Paul. Of that, $5 million was intended for Minneapolis to acquire and hold property, either directly or through another entity, in the Lake Street business corridor.

Another $5 million was dedicated for similar use in damaged areas of St. Paul. In both cases, the money was meant to help the cities "prevent displacement, retain existing businesses and maintain the character of the community. "

In total, the bill would have provided about $300 million in aid over the 2020-21 biennium.

Among its provisions, it created a "special master panel" to sort out compensation claims for damages. It formed a nine-member Metropolitan Area Redevelopment Corporation board to oversee planning and award grants. The same redevelopment corporation also was given authority to levy a special 0.125% sales tax on the seven-county metro area.

The PROMISE Act bill had rent-control provisions for affected areas and required the state Commerce Department to help business owners handle property, liability and casualty insurance claims.

It also had “limited eminent domain” provisions and would have provided a tax break on construction materials to business owners attempting to rebuild.

A successful amendment from Rep. Aisha Gomez, DFL-Minneapolis, established a Civil Unrest Investigatory Commission. It would have functioned like a local version of the national Kerner Commission, which investigated what were then called the nation’s “race riots” of 1968.

That Gomez commission would have held public hearings, investigated leads and issued a public report on the “actions, choices, orders and responses by all local governments, police and military authorities and elected officials who were crucial to the government's response to the civil unrest. ”

“The use of force against peaceful protesters, press, medics, residents on their porch and community protecting themselves in the absence of a response from the government are very much in the scope of the commission,” Gomez said on Twitter following the floor debate.

Like all special session bills that failed to reach the governor’s desk, any attempt to pass the Noor bill in a future special session would have to begin from scratch.

It is widely expected that Gov. Tim Walz will trigger another automatic special session when he extends his peacetime emergency authority by another month in mid-July.

Noor on Friday called his bill a “comprehensive economic recovery plan. ” While neither he nor any of the lawmakers who helped write the bill condone the burning and looting of neighborhoods, Noor said, neither should the despair caused by the civil disorder be ignored.

“This is what I call a labor of love,” Noor said of his bill. “This is what I call community. ”

ARTICLE CMXXVI. CLUSTER IN STATE TIED TO DRINKING IN BARS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 25, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1136 wordsByline: JEREMY OLSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

A cluster of COVID-19 cases tied to young adults drinking at southern Minnesota bars has raised concerns for state health officials, though it's unclear whether the infections will cause more hospitalizations and deaths.

While young adults are less likely to suffer severe cases, they could be the catalysts for a second wave of COVID-19 in Minnesota and the spreading of the disease to people at greater risk, said Kris Ehresmann, state infectious disease director.

"As people are out, you know, enjoying a bit of freedom that we have now, [we want to make sure] that they're cognizant of the fact that they could be a risk factor for someone else," Ehresmann said. "Even though they may not be at risk for complications, they can still get COVID just as easily as anyone else and as a result they can spread it to others inadvertently."

Some of the roughly 100 young adults infected during visits to bars June 12 and 13 - the first weekend they reopened - work in child care. Others work in health care facilities and with people at greater risk of severe complications from COVID-19.

The Minnesota Department of Health reported five more deaths Wednesday, bringing the total for the pandemic to 1,397 - with 1,102 occurring in long-term care facilities.

The state also reported a total of 33,763 lab-confirmed cases of COVID-19, and a slight uptick this week in hospitalizations - with 340 people admitted due to their infections and 160 needing intensive care.

Daily case growth has ebbed in Minnesota this month, with the 304 cases reported Wednesday well below the peak of 847 reported May 23.

This occurred despite the limited reopening in June of restaurants, bars, fitness centers, salons and entertainment venues, and the mass protests and riots following the police killing of George Floyd, actions that could have spread the virus.

Cluster in state tied to drinking in bars

Blue Earth County is among the counties affected by transmission in bars of the novel coronavirus that causes COVID-19.

Activity nearly doubled there from 142 COVID-19 cases and zero deaths at the start of this month to 265 cases and two deaths as of Wednesday.

Free testing at four community sites in Minneapolis and St. Paul ended Wednesday, with partial results showing a negligible impact from protest activities on COVID-19 case growth. Roughly 1.5% of 7,706 tests from the first two weeks at these sites were positive for the virus.

Disparity in spread

The results did reveal a disparity in the spread of the virus, though.

The positivity rate for white people at these test sites was .2%, compared to 1.3% among black people, 5% among Asians, and 7.4% among Latinos.

Minorities only made up 40% of the tests but 90% of the positive cases at these sites. Ehresmann said minorities more often work in jobs that don't present work-from-home options, increasing infection risks.

"We need to make sure we are making testing available to our populations of color and Indigenous populations," Ehresmann said.

The recent influx of younger people with COVID-19 might not lead to more deaths, unless those people spread the virus to others at greater risk.

Minnesotans 70 and older make up 12% of known cases and 82% of deaths, whereas Minnesotans 40 and younger make up 66% of known cases but 2% of deaths.

A report on Wednesday from the CDC highlighted how young people spread the virus, noting infections of 60 of 183 students from the University of Texas who were tested for COVID-19 after spring break travel to Cabo San Lucas in Mexico.

One-fifth of the students who tested positive had no symptoms, which is a concern because it means they were potentially spreading the virus without knowing it.

Meanwhile, the Institute for Health Metrics and Evaluation (IHME) on Wednesday reduced its COVID-19 estimate for Minnesota from 3,191 deaths to 1,797 by Oct. 1.

The reduction occurred because growth in cases and deaths slowed more than expected in the past week, said Dr. Theo Vos, a professor of health metrics science at IHME in Washington state. "That of course is a good thing, and bucks the pattern that we unfortunately see in quite a few other states in the South and West."

The lack of a surge in cases due to the Floyd protests in Minneapolis and St. Paul supports the theory that people are at less risk of exposure to the virus when outdoors.

Health officials worried despite the lower risks of outdoor transmission because the protesters had been singing and chanting while packed together, and gasping and coughing when tear gas was used to disperse crowds.

Cluster in state tied to drinking in bars

The lack of a significant uptick in cases related to the protests was surprising to Dr. Bill Roberts, a professor of family medicine at the University of Minnesota, but will help inform understanding about transmission risks and environmental differences.

"The safest position is outdoors along with a good breeze, and the least safe is a small room packed with people with someone who is breathing the disease on you," he said. "In between, there's got to be a tipping point where it's safer to be than not to be. I think we'll start to learn that over time.

Safer outside

The lower outdoor risk partly informs the latest decision by Gov. Tim Walz and state health authorities to permit more outdoor youth sports activities.

State guidance allowed full practices and scrimmages starting Wednesday, and games against opponents from other communities in two weeks. Indoor sports can resume July 1.

Ehresmann said wind and outdoor airflow can diffuse the virus, reducing exposure risks.

A study last week in the Journal of Infectious Diseases also found that sunlight could make a difference.

It simulated the decay of aerosolized droplets carrying the virus and found it would take six minutes under summer sun, 19 minutes under fall/winter sunshine levels, and 125 minutes without sunlight.

Ehresmann said she hoped people would consider this protective benefit when congregating this summer, and that bars could steer crowds outdoors when possible.

People should also take precautions such as wearing masks and practicing social distancing, she added.

"I realize it's difficult to consume adult beverages wearing a mask," she said, "but please then social distance and make sure you that you are cognizant of the risk of COVID transmission in a group setting."

FREE SPEECH, VANDALISM - AND CROSSING THE LINE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 25, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 839 wordsByline: PATRICK CONDON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The toppling of a statue of Christopher Columbus at the State Capitol, one in a spate of attacks on historic monuments around the nation, has prompted state officials to revisit their policies on public art even as they investigate the activists involved in the incident in St. Paul.

"I understand First Amendment rights, but there's a line there and when you cross it you're held criminally responsible," Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington said Wednesday.

State investigators continue to try to determine who, beyond the American Indian Movement (AIM) official leading the protest, was involved in actually pulling down the statue two weeks ago. The investigation will then be turned over to the Ramsey County Attorney's Office for possible charges.

Mike Forcia, the AIM Twin Cities chairman and leader of the protest group at the statue site the day it was toppled, said Wednesday that he is still expecting to face criminal charges for what happened. "I'll accept it fully, whatever it is, 100 percent," Forcia said. "Whatever has happened to me is of little consequence compared to the conversation the state needs to have about this."

Forcia's attorney, Jack Rice, said he hopes authorities are open to a resolution that would allow those who pulled down the statue to explain their reasons in a public forum.

But while officials prepare potential criminal charges, the state government board that manages statues and art on the Capitol grounds meets Thursday to initiate a discussion about the public monuments it displays.

The AIM protesters pulled down the nearly 90-year-old statue on June 10, citing long-standing grievances with the 15th-century Genoese explorer and early colonizer of the Americas. It was one of many statues on public grounds felled by protesters in the nationwide reckoning over institutional racism that followed the May 25 killing of George Floyd by Minneapolis police officers.

The statue is now being held in an "undisclosed location," according to Paul Mandell, the executive secretary of the Capitol Area Architectural and Planning Board (CAAPB). He said it would stay there while state leaders work on a new, more defined process for removing statues that offend modern sensibilities.

It's a debate likely to echo around the country, as protesters target more and more statues for removal or defacement. In some cases, even the likenesses of historical figures like Ulysses S. Grant who supported the abolition of slavery have been pulled down.

The Minnesota architectural board has responsibility for the statues and art displayed around state government's St. Paul campus. It is chaired by Lt. Gov. Peggy Flanagan. A member of the White Earth Band of Ojibwe, Flanagan said she was not sorry to see the statue fall.

In addition to discussions toward creating a petition process for removing statues, Mandell said Thursday's meeting would include a more comprehensive discussion of what art gets displayed in and around the Capitol.

Under current law, Mandell said, anyone could request the removal of a statue, but there's no clear criteria for the board to evaluate such requests. The board never received a formal request to remove the Columbus statue before its toppling, he said. "There were a number of years where it would be hit with red paint, a water balloon full of red paint, on Columbus Day," Mandell said.

Native Americans have long taken issue with the now-discredited idea that Columbus "discovered" America. His critics also point to ample historical evidence that he enslaved native residents upon arriving in the West Indies in the 1490s, and employed violence and brutality to quell local uprisings.

Gov. Tim Walz said after the statue fell that he sympathized with the protesters' motives but that there would be consequences for the civil disobedience.

The statue, erected in 1931, was commissioned by and paid for by a group that called itself Italian-Americans of Minnesota, Mandell said.

"It was in reaction to the anti-Italian attitudes in America at that time," Mandell said. "They picked the most famous Italian they could to show that Italians had contributed to America. This was a different time, and views of Columbus were very different."

The Italian-Americans of Minnesota continued for decades to raise funds for the upkeep and maintenance of the statue, which is standard for statuary on the statehouse grounds.

The group later renamed itself the Columbus Memorial Society. It formally dissolved only three years ago, said Kurt Vento, a long-standing member and brother of the late St. Paul congressman Bruce Vento.

"If they want to prosecute those people, that's up to them," Vento said. At least a few people contacted him to say they were upset at what happened to the statue, he said.

"I'm not an apologist for the things Columbus did. A great injustice was done to the American Indians," Vento said. "I would say the Italian-Americans have a great deal of compassion for the American Indians, and we respect them as our brothers and sisters."

LEGISLATURE STILL HAS A LONG TO-DO LIST

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 25, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 12A

Length: 543 words

Highlight: Federal aid, bonding and policing remain on the list at the State Capitol.

Body

Days have passed since negotiations broke down last weekend at the Minnesota Legislature and, regrettably, not much has changed. The Senate and House failed to reach agreement on bills before the Senate adjourned and there is, as yet, no set date for another special session.

And yet the work - important work and lots of it - remains undone.

Most pressing is how to dispense $841 million in federal aid to local governments across the state hit hard by the pandemic. For some, the health toll has been heavy, but even those without high case rates have suffered from the economic impact of months of closure and quarantine.

They should wait no longer. Gov. Tim Walz is set to use his emergency powers to distribute that money, a move the Star Tribune Editorial Board supports. The Legislature originally had a bipartisan agreement on distributing the money based on population. Talks broke down over whether to set aside some funds for future hot spots - an eminently sensible proposal, but there are additional funds that can cover that. Had they taken just a little more time, legislators might have worked through their differences and passed a bill to be signed. They did not, and so have forfeited the right to criticize the unilateral action Walz must take to move those funds out.

Hennepin and Ramsey counties got their funding separately. It is the rest of the state that finds itself waiting and waiting for money long since allocated by Washington but still in limbo.

That still leaves some big issues the Legislature should tackle. There's need for a substantial bonding bill to counteract the pandemic-induced recession. Low interest rates and worthy projects abound, and it is the single best economic jump-starter at the state's disposal.

But dwarfing that in importance is the need for law enforcement reforms in the aftermath of George Floyd's death at the hands of police.

In an earlier interview with an editorial writer, Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka said that in talking to residents in Minneapolis, "I don't think I had one who wanted to get rid of police entirely. They wanted to know police were doing their job well."

Legislature still has a long to-do list

Star Tribune reporter Maya Rao encountered a similar sentiment in the wake of gunfire on Minneapolis' North Side. "I know on one side of the city, it looks beautiful for defunding to happen," she was told by Keion Franklin as investigators marked shell casings that fell inches from where his car had driven. "But here on this side of the city, I'm scared if you defund the police ... is it going to turn into World War III over here?"

There can be at once a recognized need for law enforcement and an insistence on ending overly aggressive tactics that jeopardize - and sometimes end - people's lives, as the Editorial Board wrote Sunday. It is not often you get a police chief characterizing an officer-involved death as "murder," as Minneapolis Chief Medario Arradondo described the Floyd case this week, saying the officers who made the arrest did not lack training.

That makes it all the more imperative that legislators return to negotiations to work through their differences, to hear public testimony that challenges their thinking, and to emerge - however long it takes - with the policing reforms that are needed.

With hot dogs, cold beer and an emerald green field sparkling under the June sunshine, the only thing missing at CHS Field is the team.

As the St. Paul Saints plan to start their 2020 season in Sioux Falls, S.D., their Lowertown home has been left vacant. But the gates aren't staying locked. The stadium is now open for lunch.

The Pop-Up Cafe at CHS Field is serving stadium staples such as burgers and cheese curds, daily from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. Tables are set 6 feet apart on the Broadway Street concourse overlooking the field.

"It's summertime. It's outside. You should be at a ballpark," said Joni Larson, who lives in the neighborhood and snacked on free popcorn while waiting for a burger.

The pop-up comes as many venues look for new avenues to attract customers amid the pandemic.

"Obviously, with the season on hold due to the COVID crisis, we began to take a look at what summer might look like with no games," said Saints general manager Derek Sharrer. Patio dining was the first idea.

"It's great to see the gates open, to see people sitting at tables laughing and smiling, as if they're at a Saint's game," Sharrer said.

Changes at Lyn-Lake

After sitting dormant since last September, the restaurant that kick-started the urban renaissance at Lyndale Avenue and Lake Street in Minneapolis 38 years ago is back in business.

It's Greek To Me has quietly reopened its doors, with a slightly altered name - it's now It's Greek To Me Taverna E Parea (626 W. Lake St., itsgreektomempls.com).

It was a no-brainer that the ownership - which includes some of the original team - would retain the restaurant's well-known name.

New meaning to ballpark pop-up

"We wanted to pay homage to that name, because it's been there for so long, and it's such a pillar of the community," said Erik Johnson, a longtime It's Greek to Me employee who is now a co-owner.

The opening did not go as planned. It was originally scheduled for April, but the coronavirus pandemic intervened. With a limited staff, the kitchen started serving takeout in early May.

A planned June 1 opening of the restaurant's appealing off-the-sidewalk patio was sidelined after the protests that followed the death of George Floyd. The restaurant's windows were boarded up, and the kitchen turned to making gyro sandwiches to feed volunteers cleaning up the neighborhood.

Finally, the plywood came down, and the patio and dining room quietly reopened. "It's nice to get back to a sense of normalcy, whatever that is," Johnson said.

The restaurant is serving lunch and dinner, Tuesday through Sunday.

An anchor at the same intersection since 1999, the Herkimer Pub & Brewery is ending its run.

The neighborhood brewpub, home to shuffleboard and corn hole leagues, had its last day of service June 24.

THE CORONAVIRUS

A recent article in the Star Tribune reported on the findings of a large British study that found a significant benefit to using dexamethasone, a corticosteroid, in patients with severe COVID-19 ("HCMC's bullish use of steroid backed," front page, June 17). A focus of the article and the accompanying headline was that at Hennepin County Medical Center, we have given corticosteroid therapy to the majority of our critically ill COVID patients, as have many other medical centers in the U.S., Europe and China.

While the recent data from the United Kingdom does suggest there might be some benefit to this approach, it is important to put this in perspective. Corticosteroids are by no means a magic bullet for COVID-19. Many of the patients we have treated have progressed to irreversible respiratory failure, including several who were relatively young and previously healthy. At this time there is no therapy that will reliably reverse severe COVID pneumonia.

We are aware of the recent rapid increase in COVID hospitalizations in a number of states that recently relaxed their policies on social distancing and fervently hope that this does not happen in Minnesota. Until an effective vaccine becomes available, it is important that all Minnesotans continue to follow the recommended guidelines regarding use of masks, social distancing and hand hygiene to lessen the degree of community spread of this sometimes-lethal virus.

James Leatherman, Heidi Erickson and Robert Shapiro, Minneapolis

The writers are doctors at Hennepin County Medical Center.

...

To anyone over age 2 who doesn't want to wear a mask in indoor public spaces for "medical reasons": To my knowledge - as a family physician with more than 40 years of experience - there are two main reasons for true medical difficulty wearing a mask:

1. Severe heart or lung disease. People in this category are at such high risk from COVID-19 that except for visits to the emergency room, they should probably stay home, have their groceries and medications delivered and see their outpatient health care providers virtually. It's tough, but the risk of going out, with or without a mask, is probably too high for you.

2. Severe anxiety or claustrophobia. That is truly a problem, but with therapy, some patients have been able to desensitize themselves to the point of being able to wear a mask at least for short times to do the things they really want to do. Wearing a cloth mask for a little while to go out is a whole lot easier than wearing an oxygen mask or being on a ventilator 24/7 for days or weeks if you are one of the unlucky ones who gets severe COVID-19.

For the rest of you, get over yourselves and wear your masks! It may be mildly annoying, but you, your neighbors and your community will be safer for it. Thank you.

MAIL-IN VOTING

This means disenfranchisement

The right to vote is a fundamental right in our democracy. I am a proud Minnesotan, but I live overseas for my job. I have voted in every election and have always received a ballot by e-mail and mailed it back through the postal system. But life has changed. I just filled out my ballot for the August elections only to discover that Costa Rica currently has very little mail service from the U.S. because of the coronavirus. The U.S. Postal Service says service is suspended to 106 other countries as well. This effectively disenfranchises millions of Americans who live abroad, who may not be able to receive and/or send ballots. In 2016, 15,907 Minnesotans voted from abroad, of whom 4,318 were military and 11,589 were civilians.

Approximately 3 million U.S. voters live abroad. Twenty-five states offer the option to some voters to submit ballots by e-mail, with a web portal or via an app. Minnesota does not. It is time for Minnesota to offer this service for its citizens living abroad. Once the system is established, it could become available for other Minnesotans who prefer to vote online. Our right to vote must never be compromised.

POLICE

Let's ask some deeper questions

In a letter published June 23, a reader made the case that police are needed to keep us safe from shootings, such as the one that occurred in the Uptown area Sunday, when 11 people were shot ("See why we need the police?"). No doubt about it!

But I'm thinking that a bigger question deserves our attention: Why are there people in our community who feel the need or right to terrorize a gathering - feeling that it's not only OK, but that they are proud of it? Where does such anger and disregard for life come from? For that matter, it's the same question we should be asking about George Floyd's killing - what triggers such behavior? Could the answer to that question be found by an examination of their childhoods?

Research about adverse childhood experiences tells us that the consequences of abuse and neglect are with us, in some fashion, for the rest of our lives. Did this violent, murderous and sadistic behavior stem from living in a violent home and/or community? Were these people bullied, sexually abused, emotionally and/or physically neglected by an addicted or mentally ill parent? These are examples of childhood trauma that are very damaging, but not uncommon. There are others, of course.

Getting at the root of these deadly behaviors needs to be our priority as we move forward to finding ways to keep our citizens safe rather than waiting until it becomes necessary for the police to intervene.

Carol Koepp, Edina

I continue to be puzzled by the logical gap represented by those who point to current acts of violence as evidence that we need the police. Last I checked, Minneapolis does currently have a Police Department, under whose watch people have been shot and people have felt unsafe. Every call that I've seen to defund, dismantle and/or abolish the police has focused clearly and thoughtfully on improving public safety for the community, and demanding more public safety than the MPD has proved capable of delivering.

I understand that clinging to the status quo makes it easier for some Minnesotans to retain the illusion of safety and security, but I would hope that any compassionate Minnesotan would be willing to trade in that illusion for an actual increase in public safety. I would note that I have not yet seen any reports of arrests made in any of these recent shootings.

Continually pointing out the violent acts that are happening while the MPD is supposedly keeping people safe is not the unassailable evidence of police efficacy that many seem to think it is.

Julia Iwaszek, St. Paul

STATUES

Watch what you call 'troubling'

The American Museum of Natural History in New York proposed that the city take down the statue of Teddy Roosevelt that stands in front of the museum, and the city agrees. In the museum's explanation of the statue on its website, it says it finds Roosevelt's "troubling views on race" problematic.

Really? Roosevelt was the first president to invite a black person, Booker T. Washington, to dinner at the White House, and he did it knowing he would be harshly criticized given the attitudes of the time. I would recommend to the museum's administrator the book "Guest of Honor: Booker T. Washington, Theodore Roosevelt, and the White House Dinner That Shocked a Nation" by Deborah Davis.

WASHINGTON (AP) - The House approved a far-reaching police overhaul from Democrats on Thursday, a vote heavy with emotion and symbolism as a divided Congress struggles to address the global outcry over the deaths of George Floyd and other Black Americans.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi gathered with members of the Congressional Black Caucus on the Capitol steps, challenging opponents not to allow the deaths to have been in vain or the outpouring of public support for changes to go unmatched. But the collapse of a Senate Republican bill leaves final legislation in doubt.

"Exactly one month ago, George Floyd spoke his final words - 'I can't breathe' - and changed the course of history," Pelosi said.

She said the Senate faces a choice "to honor George Floyd's life or to do nothing."

The George Floyd Justice in Policing Act is perhaps the most ambitious set of proposed changes to police procedures and accountability in decades. Backed by the nation's leading civil rights groups, it aims to match the moment of demonstrations that filled streets across the nation. It has almost zero chance of becoming law.

On the eve of the vote, President Donald Trump's administration said he would veto the bill. And Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell has also said it would not pass the Republican-held chamber.

After the GOP policing bill stalled this week, blocked by Democrats, Trump shrugged.

"If nothing happens with it, it's one of those things," Trump said. "We have different philosophies."

House passes sweeping police overhaul after Floyd's death

Congress is now at a familiar impasse despite protests outside their door and polling that shows Americans overwhelmingly want changes after the deaths of Floyd, Breonna Taylor and others in interactions with law enforcement. The two parties are instead appealing to voters ahead of the fall election, which will determine control of the House, Senate and White House.

"We hear you. We see you. We are you," said Rep. Hakeem Jeffries, D-N.Y., during the debate.

It has been a month since Floyd's May 25 death sparked a global reckoning over police tactics and racial injustice. Since then, funeral services were held for Rayshard Brooks, a Black man shot and killed by police in Atlanta. Thursday is also what would have been the 18th birthday of Tamir Rice, a Black boy killed in Ohio in 2014.

Lawmakers who have been working from home during the COVID-19 crisis were summoned to the Capitol for an emotional, hours-long debate. Dozens voted by proxy under new pandemic rules.

During the day, several Democratic lawmakers read the names of those killed, shared experiences of racial bias and echoed support of Black Lives Matter activists.

Rep. Karen Bass, D-Calif., the chairwoman of the Congressional Black Caucus, said hundreds of thousands of people "in every state in the union" are marching in the streets to make sure Floyd "will not be just another Black man dead at the hands of the police."

Republican lawmakers countered the bill goes too far and failed to include GOP input. "All lives matter," said Rep. Debbie Lesko, R-Ariz. New York Rep. Pete King said it's time to stand with law enforcement, the "men and women in blue." House GOP leader Kevin McCarthy decried the "mob" of demonstrators.

At one point Rep. Barry Loudermilk, R-Ga., stood up to say he just didn't understand what was happening in the country - from Floyd's death to the protests that followed. Several Black Democratic lawmakers rose to encourage him to pick up a U.S. history book or watch some of the many films now streaming about the Black experience in America.

Later, Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., noting the legacy of Emmett Till, asked others to "walk in my shoes."

In the stalemate over the policing overhaul, the parties are settled into their political zones, almost ensuring no legislation will become law. While there may be shared outrage over Floyd's death, the lawmakers remain far apart on the broader debate over racial bias in policing and other institutions. The 236-181 House vote was largely on party lines. Three Republicans joined Democrats in favor of passage and no Democrats were opposed.

Both bills share common elements that could be grounds for a compromise. Central to both would be the creation of a national database of use-of-force incidents, which is viewed as a way to provide transparency on officers' records if they transfer from one agency to another. The bills would restrict police chokeholds and set up new training procedures, including beefing up the use of body cameras.

The Democratic bill goes much further, mandating many of those changes, while also revising the federal statute for police misconduct and holding officers personally liable for damages in lawsuits. It also would halt the practice of sending military equipment to local law enforcement agencies.

House passes sweeping police overhaul after Floyd's death

Neither bill goes as far as some activists want with calls to defund the police and shift resources to other community services.

Sen. Tim Scott of South Carolina, the only Black Republican senator, who drafted the GOP package, said the bill is now "closer to the trash can than it's ever been."

"I'm frustrated," he said on Fox News Channel.

Scott insisted he was open to amending his bill with changes proposed by Democrats. But Democrats doubted McConnell would allow a thorough debate, and instead blocked the GOP bill.

Senate Democrats believe Senate Republicans will face mounting public pressure to open negotiations and act. But ahead of the November election, that appears uncertain.

NANCY PELOSI PUSHES SENATE WITH HOUSE PASSAGE OF GEORGE FLOYD BILL

WASHINGTON - Passage of the House Democrats' far-reaching police overhaul bill returned attention to the Senate on Friday, as the divided Congress struggles to address the global outcry over the killings of George Floyd and other Black Americans.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi signaled she's willing to negotiate if the Senate is able to approve its own bill. But she said Democrats have no interest in engaging with Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell on the Republican-only package, which collapsed this week after Senate Democrats blocked it from debate.

"The Senate has to do better," Pelosi said.

The House approved the George Floyd Justice in Policing Act late Thursday in a vote heavy with emotion and symbolism. It was one month to the day after Floyd's death, which sparked a national reconsideration of policing tactics and racial injustice.

The legislative package from Democrats is perhaps the most ambitious set of proposed changes to police procedures and accountability in decades. Backed by the nation's leading civil rights groups, it aims to match the moment of demonstrations that filled streets across the nation. It has almost zero chance of becoming law.

President Donald Trump's administration said he would veto the bill. McConnell has said the bill would not pass the Republican-held chamber.

Thursday was also what would have been the 18th birthday of Tamir Rice, a Black boy killed by police in Ohio in 2014. In New York, prosecutors this week filed criminal charges against an officer who put a Black man in what they said was a banned chokehold.

Even though the proposals from Congress share common ground, they diverge widely. One main difference is that several of the changes proposed by Republicans - such as restrictions on police use of chokeholds, which are already prohibited in many jurisdictions - are banned by Democrats.

Pelosi said she's all for bringing ideas to the table, but "if one person is saying chokeholds and the other is saying no chokeholds, it's very hard to compromise."

Law enforcement organizations and some of the nation's leading business groups, including the influential Business Roundtable of leading CEOs, are encouraging Congress to keep working toward a solution. But that seems unlikely, with lawmakers' positions hardening and the parties settled in for a political standoff ahead of campaign season and elections.

Big fireworks? You're not hearing things

July 4th is still more than a week away. But in neighborhoods across Minneapolis, fireworks have been going off all month - with raucous, illicit displays often stretching into the early morning hours, night after night.

Residents of cities across the country have been reporting unusual amounts of fireworks. From New York City to Denver to Los Angeles, many say the evenings filled with brightly colored explosions seem to have started earlier than in past summers.

For Jeanne Torma, fireworks have been a nightly occurrence since May, primarily to the west of her home in the Near North neighborhood. She said she is hearing thunderous booms, not little fizzles.

"They're huge, a lot of them are pretty big and a lot of the time they go off one after the other," Torma said. "It just feels like it's very different this summer."

Only three types of fireworks are legal in Minnesota: sparklers, cones and tubes that emit sparks, and novelties like party poppers or snakes. Anything that flies or explodes is not permitted, according to the State Fire Marshal's website.

There were 291 fireworks complaints reported to Minneapolis 311 in the first three weeks of June - a 30-fold increase over the same period last year - with the bulk of the reports coming from south Minneapolis and the North Side, according to data compiled by the city. Before March 2019, 311 did not specifically track fireworks complaints.

Neighbors have taken to Twitter, Reddit and Nextdoor to vent their frustrations about the noise that often continues well into the morning, without regard for disrupted sleep, pets or those with PTSD. Numerous social media users have floated theories that the nightly barrages are related to the unrest following the killing of George Floyd - nationwide coordinated psychological attacks by police, white supremacists or antifa activists. However, little evidence has surfaced to support claims of any organized effort.

Regardless of the source of the firecrackers, just about everyone agrees this is not normal.

Big fireworks? You're not hearing things

"It is truly unusual for our neighborhood," said Janine Munson. A resident of St. Anthony West in northeast Minneapolis, Munson has heard loud fireworks nightly since Juneteenth, the June 19 celebration of the end of slavery. "This has really disrupted the peace," she said.

Minneapolis Police Department spokesman John Elder said police prioritize fireworks calls that threaten life or property. He noted that the fireworks are widespread outside the city limits, too, in both suburban and rural areas.

"This is not just a Minneapolis thing," he said.

Explaining the recent spike in activity may not require a conspiracy. Fireworks retailers are reporting increased sales compared with previous years, said Julie Heckman, executive director of the American Pyrotechnics Association, an industry trade group.

"Memorial Day, kind of the beginning of summer, is where we saw an uptick in sales. It's just gone gangbusters since then," Heckman said. "We see that continuing right through the Fourth of July."

In Prescott, Wis., less than an hour from downtown Minneapolis, business is booming at Victory Fireworks. Late Tuesday afternoon, store manager Tanner DeGross said he had a line of customers.

"We are seemingly busier than normal," DeGross said. "About twice as busy as what I've planned for. ... We saw absolute madness going around in here."

DeGross said he thinks the uptick in sales is probably due to cancellations of graduation and July 4th celebrations due to the COVID-19 pandemic.

"People [are] sitting at home bored, looking to blow off steam," he said. "So, literally blowing off steam."

Wisconsin requires buyers to purchase a $3 permit, which allows them to possess and transport a wide array of fireworks. Still, many remain illegal to use outside of designated areas without a separate permit issued by a local official - though enforcement is often lax.

About 90% of Victory's customer base comes from Minnesota, DeGross estimated.

Heckman said she can't be sure why fireworks are flying off the shelves, but she agreed COVID-19 is probably a big part of it.

"People have been locked down for 3½ months with nothing to do," she said. "The weather got nice and people are looking for some form of entertainment."

Fireworks were unusually prevalent last weekend in Downtown West - an area where such spectacles aren't typical, said resident Michelle Schulp.

"It was prolonged and very bad on Saturday night," Schulp said, adding that she was kept up until around 4 a.m. Sunday. "Everywhere in the summer some people light off some fireworks; it's just normal. But this was extremely loud, extremely large and went on in intervals over the span of four hours."

In the morning, Schulp walked over to the parking lot next door and found tubes for launching mortars, a powerful type of artillery shell firework.

Big fireworks? You're not hearing things

"These were big and loud, similar to the kind of stuff you'd see on the Fourth of July, professionally," Schulp said.

It is unlikely the displays seen in videos from cities nationwide are pro-quality fireworks, Heckman said.

"I believe that in some of the cities where we're seeing this, it is consumer firework aerial devices which will burst just under 200 feet in the air," Heckman said. "They're a mini-version of what the professionals use."

Whoever is to blame, Munson hopes her St. Anthony West neighborhood will soon return to normal. She and her husband are avid gardeners and typically spend summer nights outside chatting,

"We really are unable to focus on anything other than the noise it is creating," Munson said of the firecrackers. Their blind basset hound Cleopatra is not fazed by the sounds, she said. But Molly, the dog they lost in November, would be having a tough time.

"She was always stressed by that noise," Munson said.

CHICAGO - Mekhi James, just 3 years old, is beyond the reach of your virtue signaling and your politics now.

That little boy slipped into Chicago's never-ending river of violence as have thousands before him, a river that numbs the city even as it washes the names of the dead from common memory.

The toddler was killed in Chicago's street-gang wars, one of more than 100 people shot over the weekend in the city, with 12 of those shot younger than 18. Included among the dead were two boys coming home after getting candy at a neighborhood store, a 13-year-old girl and Mekhi James.

The spike in violence in Chicago and other Democratic Party-controlled big cities, from New York to Los Angeles, is a function of street gangs, drug wars and politics. The elected social justice warriors demand little or no bail for the violent offenders who are released back onto the streets. Broken public school systems serve power interests, not the poor. Tax policy kills business and job opportunities in troubled neighborhoods.

In urban America, Democrats have no competition. And all that matters to the political class is counting the votes.

Carried away in that river of violence, Mekhi James slips past your public anguish and your hand-wringing about why "something" isn't done.

He's indifferent to your "hate has no home here" signs now. He's immune to your good intentions and tweets about that Minneapolis police murder of George Floyd.

The river takes him beyond your self-indulgent sentimentality that mourns the baby's death but allows for the continuation of policy that wreaks havoc upon the poor, election year after election year.

John Kass: What matters more? Children like 3-year-old Mekhi James or big city politics?

"A line was crossed," said a broken-hearted Rev. Ira Acree of Greater St. John Bible Church on Chicago's West Side to a gathering of angry and distressed mourners from the neighborhood. "This 3-year-old baby lost his life. ... We say Black lives matter, but we're here to say Black baby lives matter more."

Of course they should matter. But do they really matter?

Chicago is a street gang war zone over corners and drug sales. Not all the dead are from the street gang wars. But many are, and we don't dare admit it. Because if we did, we might realize that in Chicago, the violence is out of control.

If we really cared about these victims and their memories, we'd have the decency to call what happened to them by its real name: gang wars.

But instead we call it "gun violence." Why use antiseptic weasel words? Blaming a gun makes things a lot easier on the politicians, and on their wealthy liberal suburban supporters with the "hate has no home here" signs on their front lawns.

There are many guns in the suburbs and in rural areas. But people there aren't slaughtering one another.

The reason there is violence in some Black neighborhoods is the drug trade. And Black street gangs aren't the ones bringing drugs up from Mexico. The importing is handled by the Mexican drug cartels, which have made Chicago a hub.

So, do we really care about Black babies like Mekhi James?

If he hadn't been shot by an assassin's bullet police say was meant for his father, chances are he'd have been ready for kindergarten in a few years and might have attended the Chicago Public Schools.

Woke world journalism and politics are full of anger over institutional racism. But aren't the broken urban public school systems themselves institutionally racist? Yes. And they've had decades to prove it.

Public school systems are political systems. The one in Chicago really doesn't serve the poor as much as other interests.

Like the Chicago Teachers Union, which brings votes and angry demonstrators on demand; and school bureaucrats who historically are Democratic political patronage functionaries; and politically connected vendors who sell goods and services to the schools.

This iron triangle of interests is served first. They fight any effort that threatens their monopoly and gives minority families an alternative, particularly charter schools and school voucher programs. And minority families and students? They're the political cash cows of the system. But they're served last, by design.

If Mekhi James lived longer, he might have played on Chicago streets where violent and repeat gun offenders are often arrested but released back onto those same streets, often with little or no bail, to prey on and in their neighborhoods. Democrat social justice warriors are quite proud of this, including Cook County State's Attorney Kim Foxx, her patron, Cook County Board President Toni Preckwinkle, and Cook County Chief Judge Tim Evans.

I've written about this several times, from a column about a robber who slammed a young teacher to the ground in Chicago's Lincoln Park for her cellphone and only had to post $100 bail, to a convicted felon arrested with a gun. His bail included electronic home monitoring. He was later arrested while driving; his electronic home monitoring device was plugged into a portable power pack, allowing him to roll through the city, freely.

In Cook County, the political class allows electronic home monitoring to be used for those arrested for murder, attempted murder, kidnapping, unlawful use of a weapon by a felon and rape.

"There are too many violent offenders not in jail, or on electronic home monitoring, which no one is really monitoring," said Chicago police Superintendent David Brown. "We need violent felons to stay in jail longer."

But they don't. The politics won't allow it.

David Lee Roth has changed his name.

The former Van Halen front man now wants to be called "David L. Roth" or "El Roth."

The change was inspired by the current movement in the music industry to disown words having to do with the slavery that existed in the South - which comes in response to the Black Lives Matter protests that rose up after the death of George Floyd.

Roth made the announcement via social media, posting a piece of artwork he'd created, showing a giant frog by a tiny human, with the following text about the name change:

"David 'Lee' Roth changes name! Diamond Dave, following Lady Antebellum's (now 'Lady A') example, will be dropping the 'Lee' from now on. He wants us all to call him 'David L. Roth' or simply 'El Roth.'"

And he ends the message, for some reason, with: "Bannana (sic) fana-fo-fana."

LAYERS OF CRISES STRAIN MPLS.

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 986 wordsByline: LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: A month after Floyd's death, calls for change meet complicationsBody

One month after George Floyd was killed by Minneapolis police, the city finds itself deep in a debate over racial inequities as leaders look to both remake law enforcement and respond to a new outbreak of violence on the streets.

Adding to the strain is a massive blow to city finances driven by the coronavirus pandemic, raising questions of whether resources will be available to mount the kind of large-scale change many in the city have envisioned.

Since Floyd's death, a generations-long debate about how to run the Minneapolis Police Department has flared anew. But as city leaders turn from one crisis to the next, it's less than certain whether concrete, transformative change can be delivered - particularly for the very people of color, especially black residents, who have felt the brunt of recent emergencies.

"It's going to be a culture clash and it remains to be seen who is going to come out on top," said Michelle Gross, local president of Communities United Against Police Brutality. The chief goal, she said, should be "to cleanse ourselves of racism."

The Minneapolis Police Department has been documented to use force disproportionately on black residents. The fiery riots following Floyd's death were focused in neighborhoods known for vibrant immigrant communities. While full demographic breakdowns aren't yet available, many of the shootings currently plaguing the city are happening in areas where people of color live. And state health officials say black and Hispanic Minnesotans have been infected with coronavirus at disproportionately high rates, mirroring the national trend.

"We, as city employees, are daily keeping the priorities of those communities, not just in our minds, but in our hearts," City Coordinator Mark Ruff said at a wide-ranging news conference on Thursday, the one-month anniversary of Floyd's death.

Layers of crises strain Mpls.

Efforts to reform the Minneapolis Police Department long predate Floyd's death. Department leaders offered additional training. They tried, with mixed success, to diversify its force.

The Minnesota Department of Human Rights is investigating the Minneapolis Police Department in the wake of Floyd's death. The city and state negotiated a deal to ban officers from using chokeholds and neck restraints, to strengthen requirements to intervene in excessive force cases and increase transparency in some police discipline cases.

Additional terms will likely be hashed out in court in the coming weeks, and the city will submit to the state a list of laws that it believes impede its reform attempts.

Some police reform activists worry about whether the state will act. The Legislature left a special session this weekend without approving measures to increase training and change arbitration, among other proposals.

While the state investigation proceeds, City Council members are debating how to change the department.

Nine City Council members vowed earlier this month to "begin the process of ending" the Minneapolis Police Department. On Friday, they are scheduled to consider a measure that would not eliminate police but place them under the umbrella of a larger Community Safety and Violence Prevention Department. The measure would ultimately need approval from voters.

Many cities that have reduced police forces have also increased funding for social services and violence prevention programs. But the coronavirus pandemic left the city with a shortfall of about $165 million.

Current violence prevention efforts have struggled to keep up with a surge in shootings that left more than 100 people injured since Floyd's death.

Sasha Cotton, director of the city's Office of Violence Prevention, said there are plans for emergency meetings with some community groups and increased efforts to meet with gunshot victims who come into Level One trauma centers.

Cotton says she believes several factors are contributing to the violence. Some of it appears retaliatory, she said. She noted that some lost jobs during the pandemic and unrest, and they "are feeling a deep level of desperation," and that others were released from jail or prison "at an expedited rate" due to both crises.

"We really do feel like ... this is a perfect storm," she said.

While the city copes with the crises, it's seeking help from the state and federal governments - both to cover its own costs and help local business owners who struggled first with pandemic-related closures and then with destruction during the unrest.

The city is still tallying the damage inflicted after Floyd's death. As of Thursday, it knew of more than 1,000 storefronts that had been damaged. Of those, 53 buildings were destroyed.

Many were located along Lake Street, known for its immigrant-owned businesses. Though not the epicenter of the riots, West Broadway, the site of some recent shootings, also saw a string of businesses looted or damaged.

Layers of crises strain Mpls.

City officials are working with the state and Hennepin County to seek disaster declarations. One would ask the Federal Emergency Management Agency for assistance repairing public infrastructure and another would open up a small loan pool for businesses.

Decisions about federal aid to help with riot recovery have been inconsistent in the past. To bolster their case, city officials are asking business owners to report their losses, particularly ones that are not covered fully by insurance.

As they move forward, city officials have promised to include communities of color in the recovery - and to push their counterparts at the state level for changes in laws, in hopes of decreasing disparities in both policing and other aspects of life.

"I can't speak for what's in the legislators' minds," said Velma Korbek, director of Minneapolis' Department of Civil Rights, when asked about the prospects for police reforms. "But I can tell you that the moment is now, and I think we all understand the urgency to make the changes demanded by the community."

Adding fresh insult to already shaky police-community relations in the Twin Cities, a Ramsey County jail administrator discriminated against his own corrections officers in handling prisoner Derek Chauvin - the former Minneapolis cop accused of killing George Floyd.

Chauvin was booked at the county jail on May 29, the same day he was charged with third-degree murder and manslaughter in Floyd's death. When Chauvin arrived, all officers of color were told to report to other floors and were barred from guarding or having any other contact with Chauvin. A supervisor told one of them that, because of their race, they would be a potential "liability" around the white cop.

As a result, eight Ramsey County officers of color filed racial discrimination charges. In an apt comparison, one said that female officers would not be barred from guarding male prisoners accused of assaulting their wives. Nor would a white deputy be told he couldn't do his job with a black prisoner accused of killing a white person.

It made matters worse that a Ramsey County Sheriff's Department spokesman first denied that the segregation ever happened - then later retracted that denial. In admitting to making the discriminatory call, jail Superintendent Steve Lydon told superiors that he made the decision to "protect and support" minority employees by shielding them from Chauvin. Lydon has since been demoted.

But reasonable people can't help but question that explanation: Was taking the black officers off the floor where Chauvin was held really for their benefit, or was it a racially motivated blunder intended to comfort the white former cop who has been charged with killing Floyd?

Ramsey County commissioners said they were "angered and appalled" by what happened to the officers of color and apologized. Board members also commended the officers for speaking up.

The discrimination charges are expected to trigger a state Human Rights Department investigation of the Ramsey County Sheriff's Department. That examination, along with a similar state probe of the Minneapolis Police Department in the wake of Floyd's death, should help determine exactly how deep racially biased practices run in both law enforcement agencies - and eventually lead to effective reforms.

CASEY APPRECIATES SUPPORT, AWAITS CHANGE

Dwane Casey is one of three black men who have coached the Timberwolves.

He owns the third-best winning percentage of the 13 Wolves head coaches in franchise history.

From 2005 to '07, he lived in downtown Minneapolis. Now coaching the Pistons, Casey was at his home in Detroit when he first saw video of Derek Chauvin kneeling on the neck of George Floyd.

"I knew it was going to be something big," Casey said in a phone conversation this week. "It was a public lynching. Even with the camera rolling, he had a look on his face that made my stomach turn. I think that's why you see the uproar around the country, the look on his face as he kept his knee on George Floyd's neck, as three other cops stood around watching with no remorse that they had this human being on the ground, dying.

"I felt that clip right there was the beginning of the changes going on right now. If you had any decency at all as a human being, that hurt you to the middle of your soul."

Casey, 63, coached the Wolves from 2005 until Kevin McHale fired him in 2007. McHale replaced him with Randy Wittman when the Wolves were 20-20. Wittman finished his two-season stint with a .266 winning percentage.

McHale should not have fired Casey, who until this season made the playoffs in his previous six coaching seasons with Toronto and Detroit. That is a sporting injustice. Casey preferred to speak to American injustices, and how his league has reacted to the latest unjust killings of people of color in our country.

"I felt for Minneapolis," he said. "Not the police, but the people."

Casey is lending his voice to the chorus. So have other black NBA head coaches, such as Doc Rivers.

What is different about the NBA is that so many white head coaches have done more than shake their heads about the killing of Floyd. San Antonio Spurs coach Gregg Popovich, Golden State Warriors coach

Casey appreciates support, awaits change

Steve Kerr, Utah Jazz coach Quin Snyder and Timberwolves coach Ryan Saunders have taken stands against police brutality and systemic racism.

In a perfect world, black coaches wouldn't need the support of white coaches, but Casey believes they make a difference.

"We have a commissioner, Adam Silver, who allows us and encourages us to speak our minds," said Casey, the 2018 NBA Coach of the Year. "I'm so proud of my colleagues. I love that Steve and Gregg and Quin have stepped up. I love what Ryan has said. I really wonder what Flip [Saunders] would think about what's going on in Minneapolis.

"Doc said it last year. If black coaches complain, then we're just angry black men. Even though we have the right to speak out, it carries a lot more weight when white coaches say it. I hope the ones who are not speaking up take a stand and step up and do so. We are supposed to be leaders of men."

Casey was a gracious and approachable presence in Minneapolis. "Living there for two years and meeting the good people there, I know what happened doesn't represent the majority of the people in that city," he said. "I did meet a lot of great white people, and Somalis, and African-Americans. I do know that the city is a melting pot.

"You wouldn't imagine that what happened would happen in Minneapolis. The population did not reflect that attitude. Maybe the police department, but not the population."

The Kentucky native expressed guarded optimism about his league, and his country.

"I'm hopeful because I see so many different races and backgrounds and religions on the protest front speaking out," said Casey, whose Pistons will not be part of the NBA restart next month. "Growing up in the South, starting school during segregation and being a part of forced integration, I've seen the good and the bad in the South.

"The good thing about this time is that I see people who want to change, people fighting to change the way the police treat African-Americans. Yes, these things give me hope."

The Minneapolis City Council on Friday unanimously advanced a proposal to change the city charter to allow the police department to be dismantled, following widespread criticism of law enforcement over the killing of George Floyd.

The 12-0 vote is just the first step in a process that faces significant bureaucratic obstacles to make the November ballot, where the city's voters would have the final say. It also comes amid a spate of recent shootings in Minnesota's largest city that have heightened many citizens' concerns about talk of dismantling the department.

The proposed amendment, which would replace the police department with a new "Department of Community Safety and Violence Prevention" that has yet to be fully defined, next goes to a policy committee and to the city's Charter Commission for a formal review, at which point citizens and city officials can weigh in.

"I hope that the Charter Commission will recognize the moment that we are in and take our offer of support, however we can provide it, to expedite this process so that voters have a chance to have their voices heard on this important question and this important moment in our city's history," Council President Lisa Bender said before the vote.

The Minneapolis force has come under heavy pressure since Floyd, a Black man in handcuffs, died May 25 after a police officer pressed his knee on Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes. Activists have long accused the department of being unable to change a racist and brutal culture, and earlier this month, a majority of the council proclaimed support for dismantling the department.

Jeremiah Ellison, a member of the council, said after the vote that the charter is one of three major barriers to "transformative public safety," along with the city's police union and the Minnesota Legislature. The charter - which requires the city to have a police department of a certain size - is the one thing the city council has a say over, he said.

According to draft language posted online, the new department "will have responsibility for public safety services prioritizing a holistic, public health-oriented approach."

The amendment goes on to say the director of the new agency would have "non-law-enforcement experience in community safety services, including but not limited to public health and/or restorative justice approaches." It also provides for a division of licensed peace officers who would answer to the department's director.

Council member Phillipe Cunningham said they're committed to a year-long community process to determine how the new agency would work. "We are not starting from scratch. We are not starting with a completely blank slate," he said, pointing to changes meant to prevent violence at other law enforcement agencies across the country.

Ten years from now, Council member Steve Fletcher predicted, everybody will be looking to emulate the Minneapolis model.

"The path that we're going to chart will steal the best ideas from everywhere and combine them in away that is uniquely appropriate to our city," he said.

The board of the city's police union called the move "irresponsible" without a clear plan for what comes next.

"Politicians are good at making promises, but not at following through on them, and voters should be wary of any promises that delivered by the City Council about how they will figure it out when and if the charter amendment passes," it said in a statement.

Some activists against police brutality were displeased, too. The Twin Cities Coalition for Justice for Jamar, named for a black man who died in a 2015 confrontation with police, said the amendment would leave power in the hands of the council and mayor's office, which it said have already failed. The coalition wants the department under community control via a new elected civilian council with the power to hire, fire and prosecute officers.

Civil rights attorney Nekima Levy Armstrong, a sharp critic of the department, said the move is premature and counterproductive to building trust with the Black community amid the current uptick in crime.

"There are a lot of people in the African American community who are anxious, who are fearful, who are concerned about the irresponsibility of the Minneapolis City Council and the failure to articulate a clear plan of action on what to expect, and they want an opportunity to weigh in on that," Armstrong said.

Council members who support the change wanted to seize on a groundswell of support for significant policing changes following Floyd's death. If they don't get the charter change on the November ballot, their next chance won't come until November 2021, they say. The measure faces some time pressure to be finalized and clear a potential mayoral veto in time to make this fall's ballot.

Mayor Jacob Frey, who opposes abolishing the department, said he's concerned by the draft amendment.

Plan advances to allow dismantling Minneapolis Police Dept.

Frey said when something goes wrong now, the chief and the mayor are accountable. Under the new plan, which would have the council appoint a director of the new agency, accountability would be spread among 14 people. Frey, who has said he supports deep structural changes in the existing department, questioned whether policing practices would vary based on ward or other factors.

Suad Mire, 30, a receptionist at a mental health clinic, said she's "very torn" between supporting dismantling the police and whether reforming the existing department should be the path toward significant change. Mire said she wants to see an end to police brutality but doesn't know if a society can function without law enforcement. She fears a reduced presence by officers citywide may lead to an increase in violence.

"I just feel like they should be better trained, have new officers and their training should be at least a little longer ... and if a police officer that lives deep down in the suburbs, if they're going to work in the city then they should know the surroundings and the civilians that are from that city and protect them," she said. "But I'm not sure about dismantling them."

Hearings into unrest to begin July 1

ARTICLE CMXLI. HEARINGS INTO UNREST TO BEGIN JULY 1

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 26, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 573 wordsByline: TOREY VAN OOT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: State Senate GOP's inquiry comes amid rising partisan tensions.Body

Minnesota Senate Republicans on Thursday announced plans to hold oversight hearings on the state and local response to unrest and rioting that rocked the Twin Cities in the days following George Floyd's death.

Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka said the hearings, set to begin July 1, will focus on the looting and fires that damaged or destroyed more than 1,000 structures across the Twin Cities, including Minneapolis' Third Police Precinct.

The events leading up to the June 10 toppling of a Christopher Columbus statue on the State Capitol grounds will also be subject to review.

"This wasn't just about bricks and mortar. People's lives were at risk and crowds were unchecked," the East Gull Lake Republican said. "Who was responsible for allowing the risk to the public?"

The plan drew backlash from legislative Democrats, who accused Republicans of prioritizing the oversight hearings over addressing racial disparities and police reform. A spokeswoman for the Senate DFL Caucus said members were not consulted about the committee's creation.

"I am deeply disturbed by Senate Republicans' complete lack of urgency to protect the black lives that are at risk of being killed at the hands of police officers," said Sen. Jeff Hayden, a Minneapolis Democrat who represents the neighborhood where Floyd was killed. "After we saw the murder of George Floyd, the entire state and nation spoke out. They still aren't listening to the demands for change within our criminal justice system."

The announcement and response follows escalating partisan tensions over calls to address concerns about police brutality and structural racism, brought to the forefront by Floyd's killing by police.

Hearings into unrest to begin July 1

Efforts to reach agreement on law enforcement accountability measures and economic relief for damaged Twin Cities businesses during a special session collapsed early Saturday, after the Senate moved to adjourn amid a stalemate with Gov. Tim Walz and the DFL-led House.

Democrats blasted GOP legislators for not going far enough in their proposals and ending the special session prematurely. Republicans, including President Donald Trump, have increased attacks on Democratic leaders' proposals and handling of the protests and riots.

Gazelka revived those criticisms Thursday, saying constituents in his rural Minnesota district are alarmed by what they see as "mob lawlessness" by those who pulled down the statue and "very concerned Minneapolis and St. Paul will then be asked to be bailed out by the entire state."

He said the goal of the oversight committee is to "document and ask the questions" about what happened and why before memories fade.

The panel will not investigate circumstances surrounding Floyd's death or issues within the Minneapolis Police Department, matters Gazelka said could be left to state and law enforcement officials.

Democrats countered that overhaul of the criminal justice system should come first.

"There will be time to address the civil unrest that occurred in the days following George Floyd's senseless killing, but the work to enact transformative, systemic changes within law enforcement is urgent," members of the People of Color and Indigenous Caucus said in a statement. "Black, Indigenous, and communities of color can't wait any longer for change."

The oversight panel will be chaired by GOP Sen. Scott Newman, a transportation committee chair from the central Minnesota city of Hutchinson.

ARTICLE CMLXII. HOPE OUTLASTS FIRE AT DU NORD CRAFT SPIRITS

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

June 26, 2020 Friday

Length: 963 wordsByline: Iain CarlosBody

The sting of stun grenades and tear gas is still fresh for Chris Montana, owner of Du Nord Craft Spirits, one of the few Black-owned microdistilleries in the United States.

He spent the better part of May 27 - two days after the killing of George Floyd - handing out water and hand sanitizer to protestors, hoping to do his part advocating for change in a reeling city. Most of what he saw that day was a beautiful display of community building, he said, so he was sad to have it end in deafening, choking explosions.

As the protests intensified the next day, some of Montana's employees posted "Black-owned" signs on the frontside of Du Nord, located near Minneapolis Police Department's Third Precinct. The signs would see Du Nord spared from the destruction many other businesses faced that Wednesday night.

Sometime between 1 and 2 a.m. on May 30, however, Du Nord's warehouse was looted and set on fire, triggering the sprinkler system and collapsing the ceiling. Montana estimates he sustained $100,000 in damage that morning. Only the backside of his business saw looting. The frontside remains intact, with the "Black-owned" signs keeping vigil.

While Montana grieves his losses, he still sees the protests as something bigger.

"All this stuff is just stuff," Montana said. "If, at the end of the day, this changes things and moves the needle, then all this stuff can be rebuilt."

That rebuilding will be a tall task in the wake of city-shaking protests and a pandemic. Luckily for fans of Du Nord, tall tasks haven't stopped Montana before.

When he realized he wasn't enjoying life as a lawyer and that Minneapolis had a shortage of distilleries, Montana decided he'd trade litigation for craft booze.

So Montana left his law firm - and the paycheck and stability it offered - to open Du Nord in 2013 with the help of his wife, Shanelle.

"I think my wife was kind of wondering 'Why did I suffer through law school with this guy and he finally starts making money and now he wants to do this thing that promises to make him none?' " Montana said.

Though Black-owned microdistilleries are a rarity - Du Nord was the first Black-owned microdistillery in the country - Montana didn't get into the business to be a trailblazer.

"I started Du Nord because I wanted to make good booze and share it with people," Montana said. "It was two years down the line that I found out I was an island by myself."

He remembers walking into an American Craft Spirits Convention in 2015. There were around 1,000 people there and that he was the only person of color.

It wasn't the first time he felt like an outsider.

"My experience growing up in Minnesota, I was usually the one who didn't fit in, I was usually the one person of color in the room and I know what it is like to not properly fit in.

"I think when you come from a background where most things don't look like you and if you grow up Black in this country, at least at my age, nothing looks like you. I think it makes you much more sensitive to anyone else who's on the margins of our society. I wanted Du Nord to be a friendly place for everybody."

Montana also wanted to diversify the industry. He became president of the American Craft Spirits Association and served for two and a half years.

He led the organization with skill and sincerity, said ACSA CEO Margie Lehrman. "Chris is the kindest, most thoughtful, genuine person one could meet. I can't tell you how many times he flew at his own expense to come to Washington to serve our alcoholic beverage community on Capitol Hill."

From the beginning of his tenure, Montana worked diligently to make the distilling community more inclusive, and that effort has changed the field for the better, Lehrman said.

Hope outlasts fire at Du Nord Craft Spirits

Perhaps it's this mission, aside from the quality booze, that has helped Du Nord grow. This year, Du Nord's brand had grown enough that its spirits were selling outside of Minnesota, making their way to North Dakota, California and Louisiana. And then Covid-19 struck.

Even before Gov. Tim Walz ordered bars shut in March to fight the pandemic, Du Nord saw a sharp decline in business, and Montana was afraid that without revenue from his cocktail room or demand for his spirits that Du Nord wouldn't survive. He knew there was a massive demand for hand sanitizer, and if he could figure out how to produce it, there was a chance Du Nord would live on.

"It was kind of make the transition or die, and when you think about it in those terms, nothing's too hard," Montana said.

Not only did Du Nord survive, it did twice as much business producing hand sanitizer than spirits, and it hired seven more employees. It was making enough hand sanitizer to donate to essential workers and child care centers.

During the riots in late May, that all went up in flames. Literally.

Yet, so much of what Du Nord is survived the fires. And while the setbacks he has faced might spur the typical business owner to at least take a moment to withdraw and sulk, Montana hasn't missed a beat. On June 7, he turned his warehouse on 32nd Street and Snelling Avenue into a foodbank, and he has raised nearly $500,000 for the distillery's recovery efforts, according to a Star Tribune article.

"Chris gives us all hope because of the way he has responded to such adversity," Lehrman said. "His head is not only held high, it's held high to help others."

So Du Nord burned, but it seems something more important didn't: hope.

"I wish it didn't have to happen this way, but it hasn't happened any other way," Montana said. "Maybe this is what has to happen in order for things to change. I've got three kids. If that's the price I gotta pay for them to grow up in a more fair world, then bring it on."

FINANCE & COMMERCESection: NEWSLength: 1349 wordsByline: Brian JohnsonBody

For Minneapolis attorney Erin Mathern, real estate is a family tradition.

Mathern, a shareholder at the Winthrop & Weinstinelaw firm, started out in the family real estate development business in the 1990s before getting her law degree at William Mitchell College of Law.

From 1997 to 2008, Mathern managed the development division of Mendota Homes Inc., where she oversaw everything from strategic development planning and land acquisitions to drafting of sales and leasing contracts, according to her LinkedIn page.

In her current job, Mathern works with real estate development clients with a particular focus on affordable housing. She advises clients on matters related to financing, the entitlement process, and more. Mathern also serves as the board chair of the Minnesota Housing Partnership, a nonprofit organization dedicated to expanding access to affordable housing through research, public policy and more.

In the following interview, Mathern talks about her real estate background and the state of affordable housing amid the COVID-19 pandemic and the civil unrest. The interview has been edited for length and clarity.

Q: You have a background in real estate on the business side, as well as on the legal side. Talk about your journey.

A: My dad [John Mathern] has been a real estate developer for longer than I have been alive. And so I was sort of born into this family that had a lot of entrepreneurial aspirations. And my dad was in the Army during Vietnam. He grew up as the son of a cabinet maker in South Dakota, and he was an entrepreneurial, capable guy. And he got into the real estate market in the Twin Cities, in the late '70s, and has been doing it since then. He did some of the first tax credit projects using the low housing tax credit in in Minnesota. And then his business sort of evolved from there to single family construction, for-sale construction.

I went to work for him full-time in 1997. We started growing our business and I found out that I really liked it. And I got a lot of a lot of latitude to do things. I was going to city council meetings to talk about projects when I had no business doing that. I mean, sort of trial by fire, but it was a really great experience.

We thought the prudent thing would be for the second generation to bring something to the table and so I went to law school. I graduated from law school in 2003 and then stayed with the company until 2008. So that was the height of the financial crisis.

I reluctantly went to work for another law firm in town and found that I really, really liked it. So I learned to practice law there. And then I got recruited to come over to Winthrop eight years ago and to do this affordable housing and highly structured finance and tax credit work.

Q: You wrote in an article that affordable housing “faces harsh realities and unprecedented challenges in the COVID-19 world.” Can you expand on that?

A: I think the bottom line is that we already have an incredible lack of affordable housing. This is true in Minnesota, this is true nationally. And it seems like every year they get worse. And even though we are building affordable housing, we're just not doing it quickly enough to address the need.

One of the things is that incomes just haven't kept up with rent. We live in an economy where people don't have the same kind of job stability that they maybe had 20 years ago or 30 years ago. And COVID-19 will and is just amplifying all of those things. So a family who perhaps didn't qualify for 60% AMI [Area Median Income] housing last year, probably will or may this year.

We have to think of different ways to build more housing and a lot of that has to do with resources. There's no way to think about an affordable housing transaction without some kind of additional assistance. Bottom line, if you want to charge people less for rent, you have to figure out a way to still pay your mortgage. And it costs the same to build an affordable building as it does a market rate building. So you have fixed costs, and you have fixed rent, and you've got to figure out how to fill the gap in the middle.

The resources that we have for affordable housing are already oversubscribed. It's not like there's just one or two projects that don't get funded with bonds. It's like there are 10 projects that don't get funded with bonds -- projects that are otherwise ready to go. And Minnesota Housing Finance Agency and other governmental agencies just have really limited resources.

It's not like there is a lack of desire to build affordable housing. I am not seeing my affordable housing clients concerned about the market. They are literally ready to go. But it's a resource question.

Q: What other challenges are affordable housing developers facing?

A: There are always zoning and entitlement challenges. Many communities welcome [affordable housing] and provide resources and support, but there are communities that don't, too. And so we have developer clients that are sort of fighting those battles to be able to bring affordable housing to the suburbs and the exurbs. And COVID has really amplified that as well. Holding construction costs even for three months or six months is getting more and more challenging.

And I think George Floyd's murder has really elevated the acknowledgement in our community of things like systemic racism [and] the very homogenous nature of development. The Twin Cities development community is small and affordable development is even smaller. And a lot of that has to do with the fact that it's complex and you need you need resources, right? You need capital. And so there are some very interesting conversations happening now about, how can we not only address systemic racism from a landlord tenant-relations perspective, but also from a development and ownership perspective? How can we broaden the developer pool so that we have more people that are capable of doing this work? And let's try to create a system where the developers are reflective of the community.

Q: What do you see in the in the near-term future for affordable housing? Where do we go from here?

A: March and April were scary, right? I think everyone sort of took a pause. The whole industry was sort of pausing, from we can't get an inspection because literally we don't know how to get an inspector to the site to I don't know if I can commit to $50 million in new apartments with retail on the first floor.

But the fundamentals are still, in my opinion, really strong. Interest rates are low, lenders are lending. And investors have not significantly cut their pricing. We've seen a little variability in equity pricing for affordable housing, but not significant. All of that, to me says that the foundation is strong.

I think those who are making investments are looking to the recovery and beyond, as opposed to thinking about, where are we going to be in three months? It's more like, where are we going to be in a year? That is not as true in the purely market rate, multifamily area, but I do think in affordable housing that's true. And so I think we're going to be doing the same thing, but in a slightly different way.

So I hope that we are continuing to develop and continuing to increase the number of units in Minnesota that we vitally need, but I hope that we're doing it with a lens toward justice. I hope that that is the takeaway. I see more of that than I probably ever have in working in this industry for as long as I have, and that that is heartening.

But one of the other challenges is just that we have a Legislature that didn't do anything for housing either in their regular session or their special session. There was also a proposal that the governor made earlier year for $250 million in housing infrastructure bonds for affordable housing. And at one point, we thought that there was agreement on $100 million and it died. We hope very much that will come back in another special session, but all of this is so time-sensitive that I think the community generally is pretty disappointed that nothing got done.

Delta Dental CEO Rodney Young aims 'flash philanthropy' at Twin Cities recovery

Rodney Young is in his eighth year as CEO of Delta Dental of Minnesota. One of the nation's largest oral health insurers, Delta Dental of Minnesota has 4.1 million members and annual revenue of $1.2 billion. He's also chairman of Delta Dental Plans Association, a group that all together provides insurance for almost 80 million people.

The company is now raising tens of thousands of dollars to address immediate needs created by destruction in the wake of the killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody as part of its "flash philanthropy" strategy. Delta Dental has agreed to match the amount of funding raised by employees. The money will go to organizations like the Hamline Midway Coalition, Lake Street Council and Greater Twin Cities United Way.

Young recently talked with the Business Journal about philanthropy and how his employees spent Juneteenth. The following interview has been edited for length and clarity.

Explain the principle behind flash philanthropy.

It probably goes back about four or five years. Our offices are in downtown Minneapolis and there's a building, literally a baseball's throw away, that's People Serving People, which is a homeless shelter. One day, one of our account managers happened to walk by and just stick their head in and had some discussions around what they needed. It turned out they needed two things: diapers and books. If you're homeless, it's hard to become potty trained. And so they went through a gigantic amount of diapers, something like 16,000 diapers a month. And so we as an organization said we're going to help, and we developed the Delta Dental diaper drive. I challenged our organization to go out and buy as many diapers as they could. We gave ourselves five days to get it done. We wound up getting like 38,000 - some gigantic number. We coined it flash philanthropy because I had the idea from seeing flash mobs.

Your most recent project is raising money to help areas affected by arson and looting rebuild, right?

We did a kind of hybrid now as a result of the tragic death of Mr. Floyd and the outcome that's happening across the cities. We just identified several organizations that are helping in the communities that were damaged from burning. This time, obviously, we can't go and deliver anything because we're socially distanced, so we challenged our company to provide money for those organizations.

Now that we're a month out from when George Floyd was killed, what are your perspectives on the way the business world has changed?

From our company perspective, we're very active. In fact, as part of the recognition of Juneteenth, I asked our organization to take at least an hour of the day that they were going to have off to study and learn, to inform themselves not only about Juneteenth but also just look at some of the challenges and some of the inequities that are happening around our society. And then we asked them to post on our company intranet. I was very impressed and taken by the amount of reading and studying that went on. And then the conversations that happened - some of the posts were related to parents now talking to their young kids about some of the injustices that George Floyd's death revealed, some talking to their college students about the injustices that we are focused on. One person even talked about a conversation with their aging parent that related back to the 1960s, when things were happening regarding civil rights. So from a Delta Dental perspective, the interest is alive and well.

What about outside Delta Dental?

I know many of my fellow CEO peers are more than active and more than engaged and committed to making a difference. Some of the same things that are happening within our walls are happening in other places also. I'm sensing that the energy is still there. I'm sensing that the commitments are real.

What sort of responsibility do you feel as a corporate leader in this moment? I think about how history will talk about the people who were in Minneapolis in the summer of 2020. Do you feel that pressure?

I feel a significant responsibility, I guess that's the word I would use, not only as the captain of Delta Dental but also as a person of color. I want to make sure that I'm doing all I can to make sure that a light is properly focused on the challenges and that I'm making sure there are resources available throughout our company that will help bring some fairness to what we're addressing. And my hope from there is we do our part. We make sure internally our team members are educated and in-the-know, and encourage them to have conversations with their family and friends. We'll be one of what I believe will be many corporations and companies around the state that will shine a light. You mention 2020. We're going to have a smudge on the Twin Cities for the rest of time. Yet I believe if what's happening inside Delta Dental is any indication of what's happening elsewhere, I think in a few years we're going to show some significant improvements, and Minneapolis will get back on the map as a place you want to be in.

I can't help but think, as they say, "There are decades where nothing happens and there are weeks where decades happen."

That's exactly right, and that's why I'm excited. We had become numb to George Floyd-like incidents happening because they were happening so often, and they were happening elsewhere. Yet this one feels different, and I believe it was the graphic video that have been burned in the memories and on the minds of those who saw it. It really means that George Floyd's death wasn't in vain. It means we're paying attention. As a business leader, I need to do all I can and have my senior team members do all they can to address this. For me, the past few weeks have been rewarding because our team has responded. I'm having conversations and interactions that I never would have had before.

Body

A month after a Minneapolis police officer knelt on George Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes, resulting in his death, Republican leaders in the Minnesota Senate announced they would hold hearings on the riots and the resulting damage in Minneapolis and St. Paul.

The move follows a special session aimed in part at rewriting Minnesota's policing laws to prevent deadly force encounters and ensure accountability for officers. The Senate adjourned early Saturday before lawmakers could come to agreements on the efforts, as well as a deal on a bonding bill and how to allocate $841 million in federal COVID-19 aid funding to local governments.

Gov. Tim Walz on Thursday approved a plan for COVID-19 aid that mirrored a bipartisan plan crafted during the session.

Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, R-East Gull Lake, said Thursday that senators need to evaluate the decisions that played out that allowed for more than a thousand businesses to be looted or burned in the metro area. They also want to know about the toppling of a Christopher Columbus statue at the Capitol.

"I think the public demands answers, and that's why we want to hold these hearings, and also if we wait too long, we begin to forget what happened," Gazelka said.

Democrats in the Senate said the move to investigate the civil unrest rather than hold additional hearings on proposals to change policing was discouraging. Members of the People of Color and Indigenous Caucus said the police accountability bills should be a top priority.

"I am deeply disturbed by Senate Republicans' complete lack of urgency to protect the Black lives that are at risk of being killed at the hands of police officers," Senate Assistant Minority Leader Jeff Hayden, D-Minneapolis, said. "After we saw the murder of George Floyd, the entire state and nation spoke out. They still aren't listening to the demands for change within our criminal justice system."

Republicans call for answers about Twin Cities looting, fires that followed George Floyd's death

Details about the composition of the hearings or issues set to be covered weren't immediately clear. Gazelka said it was important that senators quickly move forward with their questions of state and local leaders who led response efforts.

"We all witnessed the destruction of businesses, some in broad daylight, with no police response, and the question was, who decided the looters would be allowed to do that?" Gazelka said. "We all heard the pleading of the public for anyone to tell them what the plan was ... as well, who was in charge? Those are some of the questions we want."

The panel is set to convene for its first hearing next week.

Meanwhile, the Capitol Area Architectural and Planning Board wasn't planning to address the Columbus statue toppling directly during its Thursday meeting, but the conversation inevitably went in that direction as board members discussed how to address art and images of historical figures who committed racist acts.

Board member and state Sen. Carla Nelson, R-Rochester, said taking down memorials entirely would be erasing history. She said the memorials could be made into a "teachable moment" that includes an examination of a figure's racist actions.

But board member and historian Kate Beane of the Flandreau Santee Dakota and Muskogee Creek tribes said a statue of Columbus on Capitol grounds is comparable for Indigenous peoples to a statue of Adolf Hitler being displayed.

"Do we put on a plaque to reinterpret that?" Beane asked.

The Columbus statue sustained $154,000 of damage when it was pulled down and is being stored in a state building in the metro. The Minnesota Bureau of Criminal Apprehension is investigating the incident, and the Ramsey County Attorney will have jurisdiction over its prosecution. The maximum felony penalties would be 10 years in prison and $10,000 in fines. Charges have not yet been pressed.

At Thursday's meeting, Lt. Gov. Peggy Flanagan said the board will be delegating two task forces: The first will work to establish a process and policy for memorial removals or changes, with opportunity for Minnesotans to engage. The second will create what Flanagan called a "vision of what the Capitol should be," based on how Minnesotans do or don't see themselves represented in their Capitol.

The thousands of colorful bouquets placed on the street where George Floyd died are shriveled and faded now, but no one dares to move them.

Even as they wither, they are a powerful tribute to the black man who died beneath the knee of a white Minneapolis police officer at the corner of 38th Street and Chicago Avenue on May 25.

One month after Floyd's shocking death was captured on a video that sparked protests around the globe, hundreds of people still come daily to the spot where he pleaded for his life to say a prayer, drop a flower or two and pay homage to a man and a movement.

The rise of something more lasting can be seen in the intersection where freshly planted flowers grow in a makeshift garden. A raised-fist sculpture rises from the center.

"I'm 63 years old and I'm a breast cancer survivor, so the countdown is on," said Marlana Buchette, who came from Indianapolis to visit the memorial that stretches along E. 38th Street and the newly renamed George Floyd Avenue outside the neighborhood grocery store.

She grew up in a Chicago suburb during the civil rights movement. Despite that movement, she and her family ran headlong into inequality and injustice.

There were neighborhoods and schools that were off-limits to a black family.

"You don't know how it feels to be African-American and be discriminated against," Buchette said.

It was the sideways glances from white people that her father got when he drove his Lincoln Continental or the look of suspicion she gets when she shops in certain stores.

"This is the 21st century. Why is this still happening?" she said.

But the video of a white officer kneeling on a man who pleaded he couldn't breathe opened people's eyes, Buchette said.

HIS 'LIFE WAS GIVEN TO WAKE US UP'

"We've been marching for decades because all we want is to be treated equally," she said.

So on a Thursday summer afternoon, she brought her two granddaughters and a great-granddaughter to see the memorial to a man that sparked a beginning of another growing movement. "They can see our lives do matter," Buchette said.

They can see it on Floyd's face in the mural on the side of Cup Foods, the large portrait on the other side of the grocery store, the curbside vegetable garden planted in his honor and all the painted messages on the pavement that reflect rage, revolt and cries for equality.

Naomi Campbell came Thursday to visit the intersection yet again.

The 62-year-old woman, who grew up in Memphis, has been part of the struggle for equality for a long time.

And once again, she lamented, a black man has died at the hands of police. "I'm still angry. I'm still hurt," Campbell said.

But she also felt a loving spirit at an intersection where people gather. "He's still speaking to us," she said.

A serene quiet settled over the memorial on the warm summer afternoon, punctuated only by a rooster's crowing from a nearby backyard.

"I'm not a religious guy, but I feel a higher power here," said Steven Henderson of St. Paul.

Looking out across the street, he said he saw hope, because the people who come to the site "are from all walks of life and all hues."

People who would never think to speak to one another are talking, he said.

"I feel the change in here," he said, putting his hand over his heart.

"We all have something in common now - humanity."

There's a feeling of solidarity for people like Whitney Mason, a former longtime Minneapolis resident who now lives in Colorado.

She came to visit with her husband and two daughters. She wanted them to see firsthand that "there are people who aren't OK with what happened here."

Nearby, Ann Christianson of Golden Valley was making her third visit to the memorial. She placed a bunch of roses of different colors at the site.

"I did that today because I'm hearing voices finally across a wide spectrum of people who are seeing these injustices," she said. "Floyd's life was given to wake us up."

The cellphone video of a man taking his last breath was too startling for the world to ignore, said Bill Mackins of Apple Valley.

"You see the truth."

Growing up in north Minneapolis, he saw injustice firsthand.

HIS 'LIFE WAS GIVEN TO WAKE US UP'

And yet, he can't help but be proud to be a black man from Minnesota.

"It's the place where black people came to thrive. They come for a better life," he said.

Minneapolis was tarnished by Floyd's killing, and yet it's also a place that marks the genesis of change, Mackins said.

On Thursday, he was compelled to make his first visit to the memorial.

"This is the spot that people will remember for a long time," he said.

"This is the place where the world is going to change."

CHANGE

In this day and age of sales pitches, it's easy to ignore a knock at the door, but the person pounding on my door wasn't in the mood for being ignored.

It was a knock of authority that rattled walls and windows.

When I opened the door, I was relieved to see that it wasn't the police tactical squad, but it was a diminutive gentleman in a suit and tie who introduced himself as Shep Harris, mayor of Golden Valley. The product he was pitching was an apology for the ordeal that I endured 50 years ago at the hands of the Golden Valley police.

Way back at that time, I must have driven a valley too far. Mayor Harris wasn't born yet when I took the police to federal court for civil rights violations. The all-white jury decided that the police were wrong, and Mayor Harris took it upon himself to come over and surprise me by saying he was sorry for their misdeeds.

The hourlong amicable sit-down chat was part of the ripple effect of healing from the George Floyd killing.

I accepted the mayor's apology, and Floyd would be happy to know that his death is starting to roll the rusty, creaky and stubborn wheels of change.

Oliver Lyle, Golden Valley

Recommending that errant police are required to "attend a mandated re-education program," as recent letter writers suggested, has merit; however, it is very unlikely to change an officer's behavior on the street. In fact, Minneapolis Police Chief Medaria Arradondo said, "Mr. George Floyd's tragic death was not due to a lack of training - the training was there." ("Police chief says 'This was murder,' " front page, June 24.) Classroom education provides knowledge of what is proper behavior, but research has proven that it has little impact on the attitudes that drive behavior; it shows that new experiences are needed to change attitudes.

READERS WRITE It's been a long time coming

Because only about 8% of Minneapolis police officers live within the city limits, they have little opportunity to personally know their constituents, to see them as unique individuals. In the recent special session, some recommended that Minneapolis police be required to live within the city limits.

This is untenable on multiple grounds. One, forcing someone to sell their home and move will breed resentment against their new neighbors, much like forced busing did in Boston decades ago. Two, unless specified, the officer could live in a part of the city outside their precinct, negating the intended objective of knowing their community. Instead of pursuing a required change of residence, I recommend that police who don't live in the precinct where they are assigned perform a certain number of hours of community service in that precinct each month. These can be negotiated and perhaps be included as part of the standard shift hours officers perform each month.

The goal is to get police officers immersed in their precinct's community, not in the classroom. This should change their attitudes toward those they are assigned to serve, as they work with those people in a nonconfrontational activity. This will be much more effective than hours in a classroom, which will have little, if any, effect in how police perceive those they are hired to serve.

Phil Anderson, Burnsville

SICK LEAVE

Rule ensures better treatment for us

The notion that the upcoming sick leave rule hurts jobs is just more anti-employee propaganda by a business industry that complains bitterly any time it is forced to provide reasonable accommodations to its employees ("Sick leave rule hurts jobs," Opinion Exchange, June 22). For too long, wealthy business owners have controlled the narrative that anything that helps their employees live a better life is bad for business, things like rules against bullying or sexual harassment or in this instance, paid time off when an employee is sick.

These employee mandates are necessary for a very good reason: the unwillingness of employers to provide a humane working environment for their employees. Instead of the employer vs. employee dynamic, the commentary writer complains the focus should be on growing jobs and healthy individuals and families. However, it is not the employees who have for generations skewed the priorities away from paying a living wage and providing paid time off for rank-and-file workers; rather, it is the business owners themselves who have devalued their workers, paying them pitifully low wages while providing lavish salaries and perks to senior management. If business owners don't want mandates forced on them, then it is up to them to treat their employees better.

As a member of the working class, I am glad that government is on the side of the working man and woman, especially since it is clear that American business most decidedly is not.

Donald Voge, Robbinsdale

STATUES

History, as always, is complicated

READERS WRITE It's been a long time coming

A recent letter writer is correct that Theodore Roosevelt - whose statue in New York City outside the American Museum of Natural History is set to be removed - was the first president to invite a black person, in this case Booker T. Washington, to dinner at the White House ("Watch what you call 'troubling,' " June 25). But there's more to the story, as I learned from the new book "The Black Cabinet" by Jill Watts.

When white politicians later heard about the dinner and complained, the White House put out the story that it wasn't a dinner but just an "informal, impromptu working lunch, writes Watts. Black leaders called on the president to correct the record, but he refused.

Beyond the lunch vs. dinner flap, Watts points out, "Roosevelt's overall record on race was far from progressive." Among other examples, she notes that he refused to send federal troops to protect black residents of Atlanta from violent white mobs in 1906. Later, he blamed African-American "criminality" for the violence there and elsewhere and made excuses for those who committed lynchings (whether he ever used the phrase "very fine people on both sides," I can't say).

What is that old saying about those who cannot remember the past?

Anne Hamre, Roseville

BUS RAPID TRANSIT

A faster way to transit equity?

I question how current transit planning of the D and E bus rapid transit lines leads to equitable outcomes ("Transportation access creates real change," Opinion Exchange, June 19). Under the current planning paradigm, routes would run from downtown to suburban park-and-rides.

To back up a bit, Minneapolis consists of two types of neighborhoods: legacy streetcar neighborhoods and postwar neighborhoods. Streetcar neighborhoods are lined with duplexes, fourplexes, small apartments and small businesses while the latter are largely single-family homes. Line D south of E. 50th Street and Line E south of W. 36th Street are where neighborhoods transition to largely single-family homes until the lines terminate at suburban park-and-rides.

Would equitable outcomes be more quickly achieved by a broader focus on streetcar neighborhoods over the next three years? This could include lines along Nicollet Avenue, Central Avenue or Broadway Avenue. Then later, if warranted, the D and E Lines could be extended to the suburban park-and-rides.

I don't know the answer. However, this seems to be a good question to ask leaders of these neighborhoods.

AXTELL TELLS COUNCIL REFORM IS UNDERWAY

A month to the day after George Floyd's killing by a Minneapolis police officer, St. Paul Police Chief Todd Axtell told city leaders that many of the public safety reforms that people across the country are calling for are already in place in Minnesota's capital city.

"We support the idea of police reform, and in fact, we have been engaged in it for the past four years," Axtell told City Council members during a remote meeting Thursday.

Calling his officers the best in the country, Axtell outlined changes that have been made since he became chief in 2016 - including increasing the diversity of the department, rewriting the use-of-force policy, banning "warrior training" and establishing a mental health unit - while also pushing back on the idea of defunding or dismantling the department at a time when violent crime is on the rise.

Axtell said he would like officers to have the time to both respond to emergency calls and to get out of their squad cars and build relationships with the community; ideally, he said, new officers would spend six months in the community engagement unit after graduating from the police academy.

But that would require resources the department doesn't have, Axtell said. To follow the frequently cited police reform model of Camden, N.J., St. Paul would need 1,600 officers and a $280 million budget, he said. The department's $126 million 2020 budget provided for a sworn force of 630.

The chief's presentation came as the council stares down a projected multimillion-dollar deficit in 2020 and a lean budget year in 2021.

Most council members on Thursday expressed support for the department, but there were also questions about racial profiling by officers and the department's response to the recent civil unrest in the wake of Floyd's killing, particularly from City Council members Mitra Jalali and Nelsie Yang, who have publicly said they support abolishing police.

Axtell tells council reform is underway

"Most of the people in power don't have to fear for their life or the life of someone they love while we wait for all these reforms to take place," Jalali said.

Axtell defended St. Paul officers and their response to the unrest. He also said St. Paul has unfairly been dubbed one of the nation's deadliest police departments, noting that there have been four police-involved deaths since he took office in 2016, compared with five in Minneapolis, 14 in Orlando and 24 in St. Louis.

Obviously all incidents are tragic, but St. Paul certainly does not warrant this label," Axtell said.

When Council Member Chris Tolbert asked Axtell what reforms he would still like to see, the chief pointed to the arbitration process, which is governed by state law.

Shortly after becoming chief, Axtell fired an officer who kicked an innocent bystander three times while a police dog dragged the bystander in circles; an arbitrator later ruled that the officer should be allowed back on the force. Last summer, Axtell fired five officers for failing to intervene while a former officer beat a man with a baton; so far, arbitrators have upheld two of those firings, he said.

Axtell said Thursday that he would like to see a new arbitration process that would allow the department to appeal overturned firings in court.

The Minnesota music scene has always been more about the live show than the recorded album. Six months into the year, and three months into a quarantine that would make even a Tay "Chocolate Rain" Zonday comeback gig a welcome event, the local music community is carrying on almost exclusively without concerts - and still doing mighty fine. Here's our midyear roundup of local albums in a year like no other.

Blood $moke Body, 'Lovesick Animal Online'

The scrappy young hip-hop duo formerly known as Nazeem and Spencer Joles (son of Star Tribune photographers David Joles and Liz Flores) did a lot of growing up musically and emotionally between their 2017 debut and this album under a new moniker. It still sounds like they're having a ton of mischievous fun on this surprisingly radio-friendly and catchy nine-song set. They added melodic guitar to Post Malone-y tracks such as "Black Velvet" and "Brain on Drugs" but still rip through the rhymes in "As We Fall Into Place" and a couple other edgier highlights.

Capricorn One, 'Capricorn One'

If you aren't hip to the back story of this psyche-rock masterpiece, you'll probably still find it an intoxicating blend of whirring guitars, magic-carpet-ride organs and throbbing rhythms. It's all the more remarkable and powerful knowing it was the last project by Polara frontman and Minneapolis producer Ed Ackerson before his death from cancer last October. He played all the instruments himself and clearly had a blast blasting away. The joy and strength in these tracks are as audible as they are transmissible.

Chris Castino, 'Brazil'

What the Wu? The singer/guitarist from Minnesota's best-loved jam band the Big Wu steps out with his first solo album but doesn't step up with a lengthy electric guitar solo until Track 5, "Someway." It's a telling trait of a decidedly un-jammy but still richly layered, soulful, mellow-cool LP with a local all-star cast including Nicholas David, Jill Mikelson and JT Bates. Airy standouts such as "Chinese Whispers" and "Ms. Missme" are thickened with Band/CSNY-esque vocals, campfire-warm arrangements of piano, organ and pedal-steel parts and an overall Americana-beautiful vibe that's as in line with Jeff Tweedy as Jerry Garcia.

Longshot, 'I'm Saying'

Perennially one of the Twin Cities' most underrated rappers, the Chicago transplant can also now be billed as one of its most immediate. He recorded and posted this swiftly paced, tight, six-song EP all within two weeks of George Floyd's death, riffing on years' worth of racial injustice in both his hometowns. They say freedom ain't free," he bellows in the opening title track, "Well how about you lower the price and please stop killing these black kids tonight?" Producer Omen's ominous beats match the all-black cover art as Longshot provides what amounts to an opening shot in a pivotal battle.

Molly Maher, 'Follow'

Sounding like a hybrid of Los Lobos' "Kiko," a desert-coated Ry Cooder LP and, well, Molly Maher, this inspired and intricately produced collection from a fixture of the Twin Cities scene - largely billed as an Americana musician up until now - pulls heavily from south of the U.S. border. The title and songs such as "Someday Somebody" reflect her self-inventing journeys into Mexico and elsewhere. But the real story here is about Maher not being tied down by musical genres or any other boundaries.

Sarah Morris, 'All Mine'

Having a beautiful voice and picture-frame-worthy family doesn't limit this Kerrville Folk Award-winning Twin Cities singer-songwriter to only singing about lovely things. Some of the best tracks on this personally themed, variously alt-twangy and blues-rocky record - featuring her well-jelled live band the Sometimes Guys to great effect - are messy and even a bit manic, from the smoldering, wildfire-metaphoric "Mendocino" to the trouble-seeking rouser "Stir Me Up."

Ondara, 'Folk N' Roll, Vol. 1: Tales of Isolation'

The Kenya-born, Minneapolis-schooled folk-rocker previously known as Jay Smart and JS Ondara was "pulled out of the market" - to use the title of this album's opening track - just as his career was flourishing via a Grammy nomination and arena tour with the Lumineers. That whiplash-inducing halt thrust him back into a home studio with a rush of songs inspired by the COVID-19 quarantine. Tracks like "Mr. Landlord" and "Ballad of Nana Doline" are raw, urgent and anxious, as suited to the times as they are to Ondara's dramatic and increasingly fascinating voice.

Dua Saleh, 'Rosetta'

The second EP by the uncategorizable St. Paul poet-turned-rapper - who's now more of a singer - expands their already boundless sound even further. Opening track "Cat Scratch" echoes the haunting, subterranean vibe of Saleh's debut EP, "Nur." From there, though, the music roams wildly between the almost Interpol-like rocker "Umbrellar," the slow-booming R&B jam "Smut" and the Massive Attack-throbbing "Hellbound," the latter being just wow-inducing. Tying it all together are Saleh's lyrics that dare you to defy expectations, just like the EP's namesake Sister Rosetta Tharpe.

The Stress of Her Regard, 'The Stress of Her Regard'

Best local albums of the year (so far)

Local musicheads still confused about Irish-born brothers Ciaran and Criostoir Daly dropping the name of their prior band Idle Hands don't have to overthink their first SOHR full-length (lovingly produced by the aforementioned Ed Ackerson). The blissfully fuzzed-out guitar and snarling pop vocals in opening track "Callipygian" sets a familiar tone that will immediately draw in fans of '90s-'00s Britrockers like Pulp, Blur and the Libertines. Ciaran's thoughtful, afraid-of-Americans lyricism in songs like "Meds" and "Wall and Broad" also add greatly to the pull.

Turn Turn Turn, 'Can't Go Back'

Honeydogs leader Adam Levy not only found well-matched singing partners when he formed this trio in late 2018 with fellow folk-rock tunesmiths Savannah Smith and Barb Brynstad, he found a level of comfort and harmony (both kinds!) that shines through in their warm, ear-wormy, fiercely accessible debut. Songs like Levy's rollicking title track and Brynstad's "Norwegian Wood"-spun "Wide Open Place" speak to modern times. However, there's a classic, sunbaked '70s vibe throughout that gives the record a timeless, almost escapist mass appeal.

A pair of Cub Foods stores damaged in the unrest that struck Minneapolis earlier this month will be rebuilt by the end of the year, the grocery chain said Friday. But as a shorter-term fix, it's also opening temporary locations in those neighborhoods that will be open within weeks.

Cub, which is owned by Providence-based United Natural Foods Inc., is partnering with franchisee Jerry's Enterprises Inc. of Edina to add temporary structures in the parking lots of its Lake Street and Broadway Avenue stores. Both stores were badly damaged in the riots that followed the death of George Floyd during an arrest by Minneapolis police officers.

Other grocery stores were also shut down by the violence, and though retailers like Target Corp. and Aldi have also promised to return, the aftermath has left many neighborhood residents without easy access to fresh food.

Cub Foods will add temporary stores as it rebuilds from riots

"The community needs its neighborhood grocer to be there providing access to essential food and grocery items," said Cub CEO Mike Stigers in a statement. "Cub has been an integral part of this state's landscape for over 50 years and we are fully committed to these communities, reopening our stores, and being a part of these great neighborhoods once again."

The temporary stores will be about 13,000 square feet in size - just a fraction of the size of a typical Cub, which can be 70,000 square feet or so - but will include selections from all areas of a standard store, including produce, meat and dairy items. The sites will also include pharmacies and can serve as pickup sites for online orders.

The Lake Street location is expected to be open by July 8, and the Broadway shop later in July. Cub is also offering free, dedicated bus service between its Lake and Broadway sites and full-service Cub stores elsewhere in the area.

Cub's owner, UNFI, said earlier this month that the company expects to spin off the retailer into a "freestanding entity" within nine months to a year.

Providence, Rhode Island-based UNFI has planned to sell off Cub since acquiring the brand with its 2018 purchase of Minnesota-based Supervalu Inc. UNFI is a distribution-focused business and never intended to keep a retail unit.

But Cub's strong performance during the pandemic, combined with a slowdown in mergers and acquisitions, means UNFI will hold off for up to two years. In the meantime, UNFI will hit pause on any the sale of Cub real estate and begin to separate Cub from the rest of its business, though UNFI would still own the chain.

The Cub Foods stores on Lake Street and Broadway Avenue, both damaged in the violence that followed the killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody, will be rebuilt by the end of the year.

But starting July 8 on Lake Street and later in the month on Broadway, temporary structures in the parking lots will sell fresh produce, meat, dairy and dry goods, Cub Foods and franchisee Jerry's Foods were to announce on Friday. They also will include pharmacies.

"The thought all along was to rebuild," said Mike Stigers, chief executive of Cub. "We were never going to abandon our communities."

Both stores closed on May 28, three days after Floyd's death.

Stigers also confirmed that owner United Natural Foods Inc. (UNFI) plans to spin off the Cub and Shoppers supermarket chains into a stand-alone unit.

COVID-19 pandemic complicated plans to sell the two chains.

UNFI officials said in a conference call earlier this month that the company would not sell the chains for two years.

Because of the plan to sell the chain, some had speculated that Rhode Island-based UNFI might not rebuild the Minneapolis stores.

Stigers, though, said Thursday that UNFI "wants Cub to be the best it can be" to make it an attractive asset for potential buyers.

"In fiscal 2021-2022 we'll have remodels and potential new sites," said Stigers, although he wouldn't say how many new stores. He said he expects four to six locations to be remodeled per year.

Cub's Mpls. stores to be rebuilt; UNFI will spin 2 chains into 1 unit

"With the spinoff we can separate from UNFI systems and technology. With less dependency, we'll be doing more on our own as a stand-alone in the future," said Stigers.

The transition could take up to a year, he said.

UNFI executives made clear when they purchased Supervalu for $2.9 billion in 2018 that the company prefers to focus on the wholesale side of the business over retail.

Sales at the Cub stores have stayed strong after the sale and especially since the pandemic spread in the United States.

Cub still maintains the No. 1 market share in the Twin Cities, and its market share has even started to rebound in the last year as Hy-Vee, Aldi, Target and Costco nip at its heels, according to Nielsen.

"We're pleased with the cash being generated by Cub and happy to have the flexibility to sell Cub's owned real estate at a more advantageous time," said UNFI Chief Financial Officer John Howard during a conference call this month.

Cub operates 78 stores in Minnesota and one in Illinois. Shoppers has 24 stores mostly in the Washington, D.C., area.

Renovations on the Lake Street store should be completed by the end of the year. The Broadway store will likely reopen by early October, Stigers said.

The temporary structures will be 13,000 square feet, significantly smaller than the permanent structures, will be heated or cooled depending on the weather and will include a service desk. Curbside pickup will be available as well.

To help residents facing a food desert with stores such as Cub, Target and Aldi still closed after extensive damage, Cub will launch free, dedicated bus service at each location starting on Friday. Social distancing precautions will be taken.

At the 2850 S. 26th Av. location (just off Lake Street), buses will pick up shoppers and take them to the Quarry store at 1540 New Brighton Blvd.

Buses at the Broadway location will take customers to the Crystal store at 5301 N. 36th Av. Hours are from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m.

The Aldi store in the former Rainbow Foods on 26th Avenue will reopen in September, a company spokesperson said.

Section: NEWS; Pg. 8ALength: 550 wordsHighlight: Minneapolis, St. Paul ended their SRO programs without clear alternatives.Body

St. Paul Public Schools (SPPS) and the Minneapolis School District have ended contracts with their respective police departments. In response to community pressure following the Memorial Day death of George Floyd while in police custody, two of Minnesota's largest districts will no longer have officers in their schools.

The moves are shortsighted. For the most part, school resource officers (SROs) have proved to be tremendous assets to students and school staffs.

SRO opponents argue that having cops in schools is more harmful than helpful - especially for students of color who may fear being mistreated or arrested for minor disciplinary issues that should be handled by school staff. The presence of officers, they say, creates a hostile school environment.

In both Minneapolis and St. Paul, school officials received hundreds of e-mails and other contacts urging them to remove cops from schools. During a recent St. Paul anti-SRO protest, students and alumni spoke of how the $775,000 budgeted for school cops in 2019-20 could be better spent on teachers of color and support staff.

Treatment of students by armed, in-school officers is an understandable concern, given the wider problems with police that have fueled mostly peaceful protests and some violent rioting in the Twin Cities and across the nation. Police departments must change and root out the subculture of officers who have caused so much race-based discrimination, injury and even death.

There have been a few incidents in schools in which individual cops have inappropriately used force or other unnecessarily harsh tactics with kids. In some cases, there wasn't a clear understanding of the proper role of an SRO. Some officers were not well-trained or didn't have the temperament to develop relationships with teenagers.

Well-trained SROs can be good mentors, counselors and coaches. Those positive interactions can help shape students' lifetime views of officers as true public servants, not militaristic occupying forces.

Districts may regret booting school cops

In fact, in a 2017 survey, Minneapolis principals and the majority of students and staff urged the district to keep the SRO program. And in St. Paul, a 2019 student survey showed that more than 90% of 11th-graders wanted SROs in their buildings. That same state poll showed that more than 94% of students statewide believed having SROs in schools was a good idea.

Before the decision to drop SROs, principals from St. Paul's seven high schools wrote a letter of support that called the officers "vital tools in our collective efforts to be more just and equitable schools." St. Paul schools had been seeing positive results from efforts to improve student-SRO interactions. Cops were dressed in light-blue polo shirts and were trained to find ways to keep students out of the juvenile justice system. By using diversion programs, arrest totals dropped from 56 in 2015-16 to five in 2016-17.

School officials in Minneapolis and St. Paul have said they'll have alternative school safety plans in place before students are back in the classroom. It likely would have been more reassuring to many students and families in the two districts who supported having officers in the schools - and to the Star Tribune Editorial Board - if details of those plans had been developed before the SRO programs were scrapped.

If it weren't for the COVID-19 outbreak, the Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport would likely be swamped with summer travelers itching to fly out of town for the July 4th holiday.

But the global coronavirus pandemic and its economic fallout have devastated air travel in the Twin Cities and beyond. As departures from the airport likely inch up in July, airport officials launched a big push Thursday to reassure skittish passengers that they can travel and remain healthy.

The Travel Confidently program means restrooms and high-touch areas of the airport will be cleaned more often, with both terminals' public areas undergoing electrostatic disinfectant fogging every night.

The Metropolitan Airports Commission (MAC), which owns and operates the airport, is also "strongly" recommending that travelers wear face coverings or masks, and adopt strict social distancing practices in the terminals, shops and restaurants.

More than 50 hand sanitizer stations have been installed in public spaces, along with 130 shield guards at ticket counters, gate desks and podiums, security checkpoints and information booths. Airport officials also encourage travelers to pre-book their parking space, limiting touches on keypads and credit card readers.

"We're expecting an increase in traffic in July," said MAC Chief Executive Officer Brian Ryks. "Whether our passengers return to the skies next month or later in the year, they will experience a very different airport" in terms of the safety elements put in place.

During the early throes of the coronavirus in April - typically a busy month for travel because of spring break vacations - passenger levels at the airport plunged by 95%.

The airport's July travel forecast shows more routes returning to the airport and average daily departures inching up to 233 flights - an increase over 138 daily departures in June but far below the 554 flights that departed daily last July.

Reassuring skittish air travelers

"There's no question that travel is slowly recovering," said Kyle Potter, editor of Thrifty Traveler, a Minnesota-based travel and flight deal website. "The question now is whether that's sustainable when you look past August and September."

Ben Humphrey, vice president of operations at the airport for Delta Air Lines, said at a news conference Thursday almost all of the flights booked from the airport are heading to domestic destinations.

Delta, the airport's dominant carrier, has initiated its own safety program to clean aircraft and its gate areas. Planes are generally booked up to 60% capacity to keep middle seats open, Humphrey said.

Likewise, the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) has installed plastic shielding, promoted social distancing in checkpoint lines, and initiated frequent cleaning of commonly touched areas.

"Airports and airlines alike have realized that concerns for safety are stopping people from traveling. Before, it was ticket price," Potter said. "Safety is the name of the game right now."

Total travel spending is expected to decline by 45% this year, according to the U.S. Travel Association, a Washington, D.C.-based nonprofit group. The total number of domestic trips by U.S. residents has decreased by 30% to 1.6 billion travelers, the lowest dip since the 1991 recession.

International travel is especially uncertain, as European Union countries contemplate a ban of U.S. travelers.

Since the virus took hold in the U.S. last March, several international carriers have suspended operations at the Minneapolis-St. Paul airport, including Aer Lingus, KLM, Condor, Air Canada, Air France and Icelandair. Spirit Airlines has resumed service and Jet Blue will be back July 1, according to MAC officials.

Passenger traffic at both terminals Thursday morning was sparse, and there were no lines at TSA checkpoints.

Ethan Blomquist had just arrived on a flight from Detroit to attend a bachelor party in the Twin Cities. It was the first time he'd flown since COVID-19 hit. "It was about what I expected, people were wearing masks and there was a lot of hand sanitizer," Blomquist said.

Bonnie Dighton, who flew from Sacramento to visit her grandchildren in Rogers, said she was more concerned about the unrest following the May 25 police killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis.

"We know what to do about COVID," Dighton said.

These last months have been a stressful and difficult time in the history of our country. I say that with some experience behind me. I'm 101 years old.

I was born during the 1918 influenza pandemic. My grandparents were born slaves. My parents were sharecroppers in Alabama before moving to Chicago when I was 3 years old. I fought Nazis in Europe during World War II, and I organized the Chicago delegation to Martin Luther King Jr.'s 1963 March on Washington as the civil rights movement took wings.

The murder of George Floyd was shocking in its cruelty, but the circumstances were all too familiar. I'm so proud of the millions of young people across the country, who (many for the first time) marched in protest and dedicated themselves to advancing the project of social and racial justice. In a way, this moment is a passing of the torch to a new generation of activists, all wanting to take action, to make a difference.

So, I have some advice for the new generation of activists for equality. In addition to organizing, voting, demonstrating and rattling the gates of power, we must not neglect a quieter action that is an important part of making our voice is heard - being counted in the 2020 U.S. census.

Most understand the importance of voting, although too few actually exercise this important right. But I don't get the sense that everyone understands how important being counted is to the cause of equal rights and racial justice. It's important because the data collected from the census is used to distribute billions of dollars in federal economic resources. It's important because census data is used to define districts of elected representatives.

But beyond all that, it's important because you matter, your presence in our society matters and you should be officially recorded for all time.

Timuel Black: Advice to young activists from a 101-year-old historian: The 2020 census matters

I recently had the opportunity to see the official ledger of my family from the 1930 U.S. census when I was just 11. It was moving to see each of my family members listed next to each other.

The census was once used as a tool to uphold racial discrimination policies. Now, census data helps fight racial injustice by comparing representations in the population as a whole to representations in jobs, education and financial opportunities. This is key to finding out where civil rights laws are not being followed and enforced.

But even though the census data is an important tool, it is still undercounting African Americans in each census - including by more than 800,000 undercounts in the 2010 census. It is estimated that black children were undercounted by 7% in the previous census 10 years ago, twice the rate of white children.

As someone who has seen both the pain and the progress in the struggle for equal justice, I implore everyone to fill out the 2020 census at www.my2020census.gov. It's not some bureaucratic form. It's part of history - the history of you and the history of our nation.

You deserve to be counted. You need to be counted. Take action today to make sure you are counted.

YWCA St. Paul is beginning a 21-Day Racial Equity and Social Justice Challenge to provide resources for learning more about the issues.

Participants will begin receiving emails on Monday through July 24. In the daily email, participants will receive curated articles, podcasts, activities, and more.

YWCA St. Paul has served its community since the 1910s. The organization follows the slogan "eliminating racism, empowering women and promoting peace, justice, freedom and dignity for all."

The point of the challenge is, in the aftermath of George Floyd's death, to "help participants discover how racial inequity and social injustice impact a community, while connecting to others and identifying ways to dismantle racism and other forms of discrimination," according to YWCA officials.

Virtual activities will include an online candle vigil, an expert panel discussing the Black-lived Experience and anti-Blackness, and a "Community Conversation" designed to engage the St. Paul community.

"We believe that this 21-day email series will get people thinking - and hopefully acting - differently simply by taking just 10 minutes a day to learn more about racial equity and social justice," Teresa Morrow, YWCA-St. Paul spokesperson said. "There's no pressure. No test at the end."

Content for the challenge was shared by the YWCA Cleveland, which has already issued the challenge and has several thousand participants.

"With the grief, anger and despair suffusing our community, YWCA St. Paul is pleased to offer this resource to our community, and we encourage people all across the state to participate and examine how racism and bias impact their lives and their communities, and how they can contribute to meaningful change." explained Gaye Adams Massey, YWCA St. Paul CEO.

Registration for the Challenge is now open at: ywcastpaul.org/racial-equity-challenge/. The YWCA St. Paul will also be hosting several community events in the coming weeks, including a community conversation where participants can discuss opportunities for change here in Minnesota. Participants can find more information on their website, www.ywcastpaul.org.

Request for pretrial video coverage denied

A Hennepin County judge on Friday rejected an unusual request to allow cameras in the courtroom filed by attorneys representing four former Minneapolis officers charged in the Memorial Day killing of George Floyd.

Hennepin County District Judge Peter Cahill noted that Minnesota court rules require both the defense and prosecution to agree in order to allow cameras at pretrial hearings. Prosecutors objected to the defense's motion, he wrote in his order denying camera access. "Given that this is a case that has already received substantial pretrial media coverage, the Court finds that audio or video coverage of the pretrial hearings in this case would not only violate [Minnesota court rules], but would risk tainting a potential Hennepin County jury pool," Cahill wrote.

Attorneys representing Derek Chauvin, J. Alexander Kueng, Thomas Lane and Tou Thao filed a motion late Thursday, which was made public Friday, granting permission to record both pretrial and trial proceedings regardless of objections from the prosecution.

"The Defendants argue that this relief is necessary to provide the Defendants with a fair trial in light of the State's and other governmental actors multiple inappropriate comments and to assure an open hearing in light of the ongoing pandemic," wrote Kueng's attorney, Thomas Plunkett, who filed the motion on behalf of the other defendants.

Cahill's order said camera access at trial will be addressed at a later date.

The Hennepin County Attorney's Office deferred comment to Attorney General Keith Ellison's office, which is leading the prosecution.

Ellison said he supports a public trial but warned that cameras would cause more problems in the Floyd case.

Request for pretrial video coverage denied

"Cameras could alter the way the lawyers present evidence," he said in a written statement. "Cameras in the courtroom could subject the participants in the trial to heightened media scrutiny and thereby be distracting to conducting the trial."

The chances of "creating more sensation than understanding" was "very high," Ellison said.

Several local media outlets, including the Star Tribune, and national outlets such as the New York Times and Court TV have filed requests with the court to record the pretrial proceedings.

The four officers are due in court Monday for their second appearance on charges ranging from second-degree murder to aiding and abetting murder.

Plunkett argued that it is necessary to record and broadcast the proceedings because state and local officials, including Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington, Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey and Minneapolis Police Chief Medaria Arradondo, have publicly criticized the former officers' actions.

He also said "unethical 'leaks' " of information about the cases have compromised objectivity about the cases.

"Specifically, this relief is necessary to blunt the effects of the increasing and repeated media attacks from the various officials who have breached their duty to the community," said Plunkett's motion. "These State comments have crescendoed to an extraordinary volume this week with the Chief pronouncing that '[w]hat happened to Mr. Floyd was murder.' The State's conduct has made a fair and unbiased trial extremely unlikely and the Defendants seek video and audio coverage to let a cleansing light shine on these proceedings. Doing otherwise allows these public officials to geld the Constitution."

Lane's attorney, Earl Gray, said in an interview Friday that Ellison and Arradondo have overstepped their bounds.

"The most unethical statements were made by Ellison saying they're guilty of murder and the police chief going on national TV and saying that," Gray said. "They know better. It seems like everybody wants these guys convicted before trial."

Ellison has said in interviews that he's confident jurors will convict the former officers. Arradondo spoke about the case on the TV show "60 Minutes" and issued a written statement Monday saying, "I agree with Attorney General Ellison: what happened to Mr. Floyd was murder.

Plunkett and Chauvin's attorney, Eric Nelson, declined to comment. Thao's attorney, Robert Paule, did not return messages seeking comment.

Plunkett cited the constitutional right to a fair and public trial in arguing for cameras in the courtroom. He noted that the COVID-19 pandemic has restricted courtroom access, and that broadcasting the proceedings would assure the right to a public trial.

The state courts have taken several measures to prevent COVID-19 infections at its facilities, including limiting the number of media personnel and public allowed into a courtroom.

Defense attorney Robert Richman, who is not involved in the cases, said camera access could help the defense attorneys present another narrative about Floyd's death, which was recorded by a bystander and seen around the world.

Request for pretrial video coverage denied

"Given the weight of negative publicity that has already sort of shaped public perception, I think that it is important for the defense to start to make their defense known so that they don't have quite as much of an uphill battle when they start out on the first day of trial," Richman said. "It's something of a high-risk strategy, because typically publicity does not work well for the defense, but in a case like this it's not clear to me there's anything to lose."

Cameras have been allowed at sentencings after a conviction per a judge's discretion.

While media outlets can request camera access at any court hearing, it's unheard of in Minnesota for a judge to approve such requests for pretrial hearings in criminal cases, or for trial.

"Anything that happens in the courtroom is accurate," Gray said. "We're not afraid of that. It's pretrial prejudicial publicity, like the chief's statement, [that concerns us]."

Ben Crump, an attorney representing Floyd's survivors, told the Star Tribune that the Floyd family was informed this week that a trial in the case will be scheduled for March 8, with a hearing on pretrial motions on Sept. 11.

The trial schedule could be made official at a Monday court hearing in Hennepin County, though trial schedules often get delayed. State prosecutors are expected to seek to try all four former officers charged in the case in one trial, a move one or more of the defense attorneys might oppose.

The tentative trial schedule was shared during a private meeting Tuesday in Texas between the family and Ellison and U.S. Attorney Erica MacDonald. Ellison's office is leading the state's criminal prosecution in conjunction with the Hennepin County Attorney's Office, while MacDonald's office is conducting a federal civil rights probe.

Crump said the meeting gave the family "a great sense of comfort knowing that they are going to zealously prosecute this case" and that it was a "priority for them to make sure they get justice for George Floyd's family and also for the community, so the community can have faith in the system."

The family would like to see Chauvin charged with the more serious crime of first-degree murder. Ellison outlined the burden of proving that charge to the family but said he would not rule out new charges if the evidence warrants them.

Crump said MacDonald compared the federal probe to the case of Walter Scott, a South Carolina black man killed in 2015 by a white police officer who fired on him as he ran away. A state court jury acquitted the officer, but federal prosecutors later won a conviction and he was sentenced in 2017 to 20 years in prison.

A spokeswoman acknowledged that MacDonald requested the private meeting with Floyd's family and that she had "discussed the process and procedure the federal civil rights investigation." The investigation is ongoing and remains a "top priority" for the U.S. Attorney's Office and the Civil Rights Division of the U.S. Justice Department, the spokeswoman said.

We all know "White Lives Matter." The question is, "Do Black Lives Matter?" The challenge for people who are white is to look deeper.

Consider what it means each day for a person of color to drive a car, ride a bus, enter a classroom, shop in a store, apply for a loan, be a minority in the workplace, jog through a neighborhood, relax in a park, have a child misbehave, ask for help. How would it feel to be watched, avoided, scrutinized, pre-judged and demeaned, over and over again? The slogan, "Black Lives Matter" is not asking for special treatment or status. It is asking for JUSTICE FOR ALL, for white and other than white. It is thoughtful consideration about a contentious situation, possibly tragic, that may be falsely or inaccurately reported or understood. What is truth? What is right?

Do Black lives matter? There is fear, trauma, humiliation, hopelessness and battered confidence behind this appeal by people of color to challenge thinking. It's a call to awareness, an effort to share the reality of those whose primary identity by white people comes from the color of their skin. It is being denied benefits, home mortgages, equitable income, equal education and job training. It is being called to account for the actions of others just because of common skin color. (What if people who are white were denied a home loan or a job because of their skin color? Or be judged based on the actions of all other white people?) People of color are not "they," but rather "we." Neighbors, churches, families, reach out to those among you who are struggling today. Show you care.

One would think that, if the Twins were really concerned about these comments, they would have taken steps to remedy the situation long before now; specifically, they could have opted not to place the statue at Target Field when it was built. This just appears to be another organization disingenuously attempting to make itself appear to be caring and altruistic.

If you are going to use an "economics" column for political opinions at least get the facts right. Ed Lotterman's June 21 column, "Immigration returns to the spotlight," seems to suggest that the main reason a comprehensive immigration-reform bill was not passed five years ago and which stands in the way today is the Senate's rule regarding a filibuster.

Just to review, the Comprehensive Immigration Reform Act (CIRA, S. 2611) was introduced in the Senate by Arlen Specter on April 7, 2006, and co-sponsored by Chuck Hagel, Mel Martinez, John McCain, Ted Kennedy, Lindsey Graham and Sam Brownback. It was passed on May 25, 2006, by a vote of 62-36. A parallel House Bill, (H.R. 4437) dealt with the immigration issue with different provisions. The fact that the two houses were not able to reach an agreement to go to a conference committee was the main reason that defeated both bills.

Both parties have their own reasons and constituencies that make this issue difficult. However, you are right, it should be back in the spotlight.

POLICE REFORM

In response to the city charter amendment regarding police reform, I have some concern that this amendment does not identify key areas that would successfully lay a foundation in the charter to create the kind of change Minneapolitans deserve ("Push to 'end' Minneapolis Police Department could keep officers," StarTribune.com, June 26).

One item that should be addressed is specific language outlining that police officers should reside within Minneapolis and, more specifically, in the precincts in which they will be serving. This is a very important part of creating a community-oriented police department and should be explicitly defined in the charter, emphasizing the commitment to a community-led police department.

In addition, citizens have a right to know exactly how many police officers Minneapolis is required to have at a minimum and what percentage of property tax revenue can be levied to fund a police department (even if it is not called a police department). This language belongs in the city charter as a check on the City Council's authority. By removing this language, the council is hampering a robust debate on what can be expected out of police reforms, how the Police Department is funded and ultimately who is accountable.

In a fair and transparent process, Minneapolitans deserve to know in more substantive detail how the City Council is planning to fundamentally alter our Police Department. These details begin with the city charter amendment, and Minneapolitans should demand a more detailed amendment proposal that expressly addresses these concerns.

There have been really intelligent opinion pieces and letters lately on Minneapolis issues, but please let's not lose focus. We must stop the unjustified killing of our citizens by our police. Let's do that first.

Decades ago, the great Bayard Rustin wrote: "We must everywhere be part of the cry for civilian review boards, not in the naive belief that they are a panacea but in the conviction that police conduct is not the exclusive responsibility of commissioners and politicians. Police must be answerable to the citizenry they presumably protect, and if they have been educated to any other concept of their role, now is the time to educate them."

In an MPR interview on June 23, Minneapolis Police Sgt. Anna Hedberg said the proposal for a ballot measure this fall to amend the city charter to allow for the dismantling of the MPD is why officers are quitting the department.

"So if we don't have the support to do the basic police work - finding the guns and getting them off the street - it's going to continue," Hedberg said.

I am sure Minneapolis residents support "finding the guns and getting them off the street." What people will not support is George Floyd being killed for passing a counterfeit $20 bill. For Sgt. Hedberg to conflate police capacity to get guns off the street with the protests and "defund" repercussions of Floyd's killing is completely disingenuous. When former officer Derek Chauvin knelt on Floyd he was not "finding guns and getting them off the street."

I am not in favor of "defunding" the police, but if individual officers cannot differentiate the conduct required for guns vs. counterfeit bills, I welcome their departure.

Gary Maher, Minneapolis

To say I'm disappointed in the City Council is an understatement. The members who continue to speak about defunding, dismantling, etc., the Police Department are reckless and self-centered. They refuse to heed the pleas of many of the communities who have been ravaged by the recent gunfire and killing. There might well be an increase of crime in the summer, but in the 30-plus years I've lived on the North Side, I've never experienced as much violence in such a short period of time, and I lived here during the crack years!

I don't know anyone who wants the MPD to remain as it is; however, I also know very few who wish to abolish it altogether. To make vague statements to that effect without a specific plan to deal with violent crime is to give those who perpetrate the violence an all-clear. We who live in these neighborhoods see it, hear it and try to band together to keep each other safe during this failure in leadership. The current state of this city and its council is unacceptable.

The best people to protect Minneapolis residents from police brutality and misconduct are Minneapolis residents themselves. The Minneapolis police have drained the morale value and public trust of Minneapolis residents by turning their cheeks when we need them and overpolicing our communities when not needed. As a coach, I experienced underpolicing when a drive-by shooting happened very close to our football field, with children still there, and no one was there to help us. I've also experienced overpolicing when I was pulled over for a traffic violation with multiple officers arriving on scene. In both cases, I felt enraged and heartbroken to see young children and myself traumatized from an event in a community that we consider a safe haven.

I think we need a new vision of community safety that is not the MPD. Let's have Minneapolis residents decide what that should look like and how we should invest the $193 million that annually funds the MPD. Community-controlled programs would empower Minneapolis residents to do what we would do best if we had the right resources: protect and take care of ourselves.

Keion Franklin, Minneapolis

Thank you for publishing the commentary by Leah Entenmann on June 18 ("Alternatives to replace police already exist," Opinion Exchange). I would be interested to hear Entenmann walk us through a reality in which we have societal laws but nobody to enforce them (police), and no consequences for their violation (prison - depending on the gravity of the case). I would be interested in hearing her logistical framework, as well as current or historical references that would buttress her argument for a police-free society. Using preindustrial societies as a reference is less helpful than a modern democratic state that is running, and even thriving, using her model.

Perhaps Entenmann can present her case in a more convincing fashion, but I am skeptical. More worryingly, I am not certain that she feels it necessary to do so. We have ample examples of intellectual charlatanism given to us by our current president, but the radical left also happily operates within a "post-truth" universe. Minneapolis City Council Lisa Bender describes reliable policing as a "privilege," as if our relinquishing certain liberties in exchange for order and security is not one of the fundamental premises of government.

Make no mistake: We have areas in need of profound change within our policing, as well as within our approach to race and equity. But our solutions - our activism - need to be animated by ideas that are cogent and well-articulated. The fanciful logic of Entenmann is certainly not this, nor is the chaotic message coming from the thought vacuum within Minneapolis City Hall.

ARTICLE CMLX. MPLS. FAST-TRACKS POLICING PLAN

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 27, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1078 wordsByline: LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Frey says basic questions remain unansweredBody

Less than three weeks after they promised to begin work on "ending" the Minneapolis Police Department, some City Council members pushed forward a new vision for law enforcement Friday that could still include officers on the streets.

The council voted unanimously to advance a proposal that would create a new Department of Community Safety and Violence Prevention. Within that, the city could create a division that includes "licensed peace officers," though it would not be required to do so.

It's unclear how many, if any, officers would continue to be employed by the city if the proposal passes.

Council Member Cam Gordon said it's consistent with the pledge from council members to fundamentally alter local policing in the wake of George Floyd's killing by Minneapolis officers.

"Those things that we called the police department are gone," Gordon said. "Certainly, there is a provision in here that would allow this council or future councils to maintain a Division of Law Enforcement Services, but I think what we need to do is have that possibility there and talk to people about what the future should look like."

Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey said he's seen little clarity on basic questions: whether there would still be a police department and if so, whether Medaria Arradondo, the city's first black chief, would continue to lead it.

"We need precision," Frey said, "and the precision of the solutions must match the precision of the harm that was initially inflicted."

The city would need to change its charter to implement its proposal, which requires a citywide vote. Council members are using an unconventional, expedited process as they seek to get the measure on the November ballot.

Mpls. fast-tracks policing plan

The Minneapolis charter says the city must have a police department and City Council must "fund a police force of at least 0.0017 employees per resident, and provide for those employees' compensation."

Based on the latest census data, that amounts to roughly 730 police employees. The department had 892 sworn officers and 175 non-sworn employees at the start of June.

The proposed new agency would be led by someone with "non-law enforcement experience in community safety services, including but not limited to public health and/or restorative justice approaches."

In normal times, charter amendments have been aired over many months. The council would consider whether to send the matter to the Charter Commission, which would give a recommendation, after which the council would vote on whether to send the proposal to the ballot.

Frey would also need to approve or veto sending it to voters; he said Friday he's not yet sure which he'd do.

But, with an Aug. 21 deadline for submitting items to the ballot this year, the city is moving forward on a rare, expedited schedule that will include just one public hearing.

Neither the city clerk nor the city attorney's office could cite a previous instance where a charter amendment moved through this type of expedited process.

Despite the unanimous vote, a small number of council members said they were not endorsing the proposal but thought voters should have a say on the matter.

Frey said the council is going too fast, noting a resolution that he and the council approved earlier this month that promised a "yearlong process of community engagement."

"Despite that promise, despite that promise to listen to black and brown communities, centering them at the very middle of the conversation, we're presupposing an outcome right now and plowing ahead with a dramatic shift of the structure of the new department," Frey said.

Council Member Jeremiah Ellison, who helped write the charter amendment, defended the process. He noted that Floyd was not killed "on our ideal, maybe, bureaucratic schedule" and that the city needs to quickly address community concerns.

"It would be disingenuous for us to engage with the public about what a new public safety system should look like knowing full well that we can't implement those things because of the charter," he said.

The charter amendment was written by Ellison, Gordon and Council Members Alondra Cano and Steve Fletcher and Council President Lisa Bender.

"Decades of police reform efforts have proved that the Minneapolis Police Department cannot be reformed and will never be accountable for its actions," the group said in a joint statement earlier this month.

On Friday, multiple groups in Minneapolis criticized the proposal. Black Visions Collective, which helped organize a recent event in Powderhorn Park that called for the end of MPD and drew multiple council members, described the amendment as a "historic win" and crucial first step.

But Kandace Montgomery, the group's executive director, also raised concerns that it still allows for law enforcement to play a key role.

"We are very concerned that the Council didn't ensure that the new department won't be led by current or former law enforcement officers," Montgomery said in a statement. "We know that police will be fighting hard to influence this process, and we need our city leaders to do everything they can to make sure they don't hijack our new safety infrastructure from the beginning."

The board of the Police Officers Federation of Minneapolis, the union that represents city officers, said in a statement that the amendment is too vague and "fails to clarify questions about what replaces the police department, how it will work, and what actual steps will be done to address and prevent crime."

Council Vice President Andrea Jenkins said she believes voters should have a chance to weigh in on the proposal, but she also cautioned that work needs to be done.

"The issues of the police department, the issues of all of the institutions in our society is, really, foundationally, underlying racism," Jenkins said. "And, until we really address racism, nothing is going to change. We're going to have a new name of the new public safety measure, with the same underlying, racist foundations that has been involved in the formulation of this country forever."

HOW THE COUNCIL MOVED FORWARD

What's proposed: Creation of a Department of Community Safety and Violence Prevention that could include a Division of Law Enforcement Services with an unspecified number of police officers.

What's next: First the city would need to change its charter, which requires a citywide vote. Council members want to get the measure on the November ballot, which would require Mayor Jacob Frey's approval.

PARIS - French cosmetics giant L'Oreal said Saturday that it will remove words like "whitening" from its skin care products, a move that comes amid global protests against racism sparked by the death of George Floyd in the United States.

The company said in a statement Saturday that it "has decided to remove the words white/whitening, fair/fairness, light/lightening from all its skin evening products."

L'Oreal's decision follows a similar move by Anglo-Dutch firm Unilever on Thursday. It is among a number of companies that have been the target of criticism in the wake of Floyd's death following his arrest in Minneapolis.

Earlier this month, L'Oreal tweeted that that it "stands in solidarity with the Black community and against injustice of any kind. ... Speaking out is worth it." The post drew a negative reaction from people who see the company's business model and advertising as focused on white consumers.

English model Munroe Bergdorf notably accused the beauty brand of hypocrisy for having fired her three years ago. Bergdorf was sacked as L'Oreal UK's first openly transgender model in 2017 for decrying "the racial violence of white people." The St. Paul school board voted 5-1 the other day to end the contract they had with the St. Paul Police Department to have a school resource officer in each of the district's seven high schools. The principals of the schools want the SROs. And in a state survey last year, 369 St. Paul high school juniors were asked if police in the schools was a good idea and 96 percent said yes.

One of the board members, Chauntyll Allen, who had a big load of virtue to signal, said, "Our focus needs to be on student achievement, and in order for all our students to achieve, they need to be free from trauma."

A school board member apparently believes that the presence of a police officer can be traumatizing to a child. Isn't that tantamount to telling a child to be afraid of the police? Is that how you want your child to be taught?

In Minneapolis, despite increasing reports of shots fired - 1,600 shots fired in 30 days - efforts continue to defund the police department and replace it with something, they just don't know what yet. It might be that the city council wants to add personnel to what will be called something, they just don't know yet.

A good two weeks after the Columbus statue came down at the state Capitol, we learn that no consequences have been experienced by any of the protesters. The case is still under investigation. I don't know what they are investigating. The whole act was caught on film. You could even say that it was staged to be filmed.

Gov. Tim Walz promised there would be consequences. Maybe.

The mob that tore down statues at the Capitol in Madison, Wis., the other night did not know what they were destroying. One of the statues that came down was of Civil War Col. Hans Christian Heg. He was an anti-slavery activist and leader of an anti-slave-catcher militia in Wisconsin. He fought for the Union and died of injuries suffered during the Battle of Chickamauga.

Soucheray: What is going on? Does anybody know?

The other statue that ended up face down in the street was "Forward," representing the state's motto. "Forward" was the 1893 work of sculptress Jean Pond Miner, from Menasha, Wis. "Forward" is an allegory of devotion and progress, qualities Miner felt Wisconsin embodied. "Forward" had her right hand lifted while her left hand clutched the American flag to her chest.

Back to Walz. Does the governor have a plan in place to protect the statues and monuments at the Minnesota state Capitol, Leif Erickson and Floyd B. Olson and Knute Nelson and the rest? It becomes clearer by the day that the statues coming down across the country have nothing to do with police behavior or Black Lives Matter. In other words, Gov., you aren't safe because you have Johnsons and Nelsons. The people destroying this country don't care.

With relief it can be noted that state Attorney General Keith Ellison, hitting the nail on the head for what concerns us most, has filed a lawsuit against Big Oil. Ellison and rest of us couldn't live for one day without the products that result from petroleum, but Ellison said Big Oil has lied to us or something and he wants to get them for climate change. Attorney General, have you given up your car?

And in St. Paul, Mayor Melvin Carter has announced a new director of Public Works. Wilder Foundation executive Sean Kershaw gets the job.

"Sean Kershaw's career demonstrates a longstanding commitment to supporting prosperity for everyone in our community," Carter said. "His background in economic development, engagement, and equity, will ensure we continue making vital infrastructure investments for our residents and businesses."

OK then.

Given all of the above, my answer is no, I have no idea what's going on, either. Four bars are linked to youth virus surge

Outbreaks centered on four bars in Minneapolis and Mankato have contributed to a surge in COVID-19 cases in young adults, which state health officials warned could undermine months of planning and recent progress in managing the pandemic.

Roughly 100 people suffered COVID-19 infections related to crowding over the June 12-14 weekend at Rounders Sports Bar & Grill and the 507 in Mankato, while more than 30 cases have been identified among people who went to Cowboy Jack's near Target Field and the Kollege Klub in Dinkytown between June 14 and June 21.

While growth of COVID-19 is inevitable until a vaccine is found for the novel coronavirus that causes it, preventable clusters could cause an escalation that could exhaust the state's medical resources and leave vulnerable people at risk, said Kris Ehresmann, state infectious disease director.

"When you have 56 cases associated with one location from one weekend, that is not managing the rate of growth," said Ehresmann, imploring businesses and individuals to take precautions "so that even as we open up, we are not putting ourselves in a position to overwhelm the system we worked so hard to strengthen."

Social media images from some of the four bars showed tight crowds and disregard for the social distancing requirements that the state imposed when it permitted a limited reopening of indoor bar and dining facilities on June 10. Ehresmann said she is consulting with health inspectors on how to compel them to comply. Anyone at the bars during those time frames should be watching for respiratory symptoms, she added.

Minnesota hasn't fared as poorly in June as mostly Southern states that are seeing upticks both in diagnosed cases of COVID-19 and also in hospitalizations for people with severe diseases.

'Trending poorly'

Four bars are linked to youth virus surge

Minnesota on Friday reported 335 hospitalizations of COVID-19 patients, including 157 who needed intensive care, which is well below the peak of 606 on May 28 that had some metro hospitals opening up emergency surge bed capacity.

However, the COVID Exit Strategy website downgraded both Minnesota and Wisconsin to "trending poorly" this week amid the pandemic - largely due to growth in cases among young adults.

The number of lab-confirmed cases in Minnesota has increased 37% - from 25,208 on June 1 to 34,616 as of Friday - but has increased 51% among people aged 20 to 29 and 61% among children and teenagers. And 20-somethings overtook people in their 30s for the first time this week as the age group in Minnesota with the most cases.

The uptick associated with crowded locations prompted the Minnesota Medical Association, representing doctors, to call for the mandatory use of masks in public rather than just voluntary encouragement.

Following a peak of COVID-19 cases and hospitalizations in late May, case growth ebbed in Minnesota, and health officials hoped that would continue following the reopening of businesses and social activities in June, said Dr. Keith Stelter, association president.

"That has not happened," he said. "So I think at this time we have to come back to say, 'If we're going to have the economy open, then we're going to need to take other personal protective measures to prevent the spread.' Masking is the best way to do that."

The 7,045 cases among people in their 20s now represent 20% of all cases confirmed through diagnostic testing in Minnesota. (The total case number includes 30,008 people who have recovered to the point they are no longer considered infection risks.)

More infections in the young adult population might not result in more severe outcomes - only two of 1,411 total deaths in the pandemic have involved people younger than 30 in Minnesota. But state health officials worry that mobile young adults can spread the novel coronavirus to others who are vulnerable.

Risk particularly increases with age. Minnesotans 70 and older make up 12% of known cases in the state but 81% of COVID-19-related deaths.

The U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention updated risk guidance on Thursday, adding obesity as a major cause of severe COVID-19 cases along with heart conditions, kidney disease, diabetes and other conditions.

Adherence to social distancing in the spring bought hospitals time to prepare with more beds and protective equipment, and now it can buy time for life-saving vaccine development, said Dr. Mark Sannes, a HealthPartners infectious disease specialist.

"We still have a vulnerable population and at some point that group is either going to have to be exposed or be vaccinated," he said. "I think we would prefer the latter."

Preventable spread of the infectious disease has other consequences. Ehresmann said some of the COVID-19 cases associated with bars in Mankato involved workers at child-care facilities, which are now having to take actions that will disrupt the lives of children and families.

"It's a sad example of how COVID works," she said.

Four bars are linked to youth virus surge

Low rate after protests

Protests following the May 25 police killing of George Floyd do not appear to have contributed as much as feared to the rise in cases among young adults.

Health officials worried about heightened risks of the virus spreading among people singing and shouting - and even gasping and coughing when tear gas was used to disperse crowds. On the other hand, outdoor air has proved an effective deterrent to virus transmission.

Free testing clinics in Minneapolis and St. Paul found a relatively low rate of infections - roughly 1.5% of the more than 7,700 demonstrators and others tested at these sites over the prior two weeks.

Testing was recommended for anyone involved in the protests, whether they had respiratory symptoms or not. In the case of the bar patrons, Ehresmann said they most likely had symptoms as they weren't part of any mass screening recommendation and had sought out testing on their own.

Detected cases of COVID-19 via testing are the tip of the iceberg. CDC officials on Thursday estimated that every one lab-confirmed case represented 10 cases. Most infections result in mild or no symptoms, but people with mild infections are risks for spreading the virus to others.

If the CDC estimate is accurate, that means as many as 500,000 Minnesotans have already been infected - with many suffering mild or no symptoms but nonetheless carrying the virus and potentially spreading it to others. At the same time, that would mean that 90% of the population remains vulnerable and that the state has a long way to go, said Jan Malcolm, state health commissioner.

Some of the uptick in young adult cases might be due to increased COVID-19 testing, but the bar outbreaks show this is a new and growing problem as well, she added.

"A small percentage of our population has been exposed so far," Malcolm said. "That means the great majority of Minnesotans remain vulnerable to infection."

Laura Tahja Johnson of Brooklyn Park was driving her second-grader Niko home from She Rock She Rock music camp years ago when suddenly a little voice piped up from the back seat.

" 'Mom, do you wanna know what we did today? We ripped up stereotypes,' " Johnson recalled Niko saying. "They literally ripped up magazines of female stereotypes and talked about that sort of empowerment. That's when I knew that this camp was definitely a good thing."

Niko and twin sister Ellie Johnson, who both just completed eighth grade, will return to She Rock camp this summer - the seventh consecutive year for Niko, sixth for Ellie - with a major twist. The sessions will be virtual due to COVID-19, and the focus will be on studio technology instead of rocking out on guitars, drums and other analog instruments.

"Technology has come a long way in recent years; I'm excited that this is an option," camp co-founder Jenny Case said. "The cool thing is [campers] can collaborate live [via computer] and they can be put in a band together."

Case started She Rock She Rock in 2007 because she was trying to put together an all-female band and just wasn't having much luck with her ads in the alternative weekly newspaper City Pages.

Now in its 14th year, the camp serves girls, trans and nonbinary youth, ages 9 to 18.

This summer, there will be four sessions of "Girls Rock 'n' Roll Retreat: Studio Edition," starting July 13. Experience isn't necessary but a computer is. (The camp has a few loaner laptops as well as scholarships. For information: sherocksherock.com).

Case, bassist for the long-lived Twin Cities rock band the Flamin' Oh's, had been stressing out this year over how to approach camp. But after giving guitar lessons via Zoom from her St. Louis Park home during the early part of the pandemic, she is convinced that a similar approach will work.

MINNSPIRATIONS

"We'll try our best," Case said. "It's not going to be perfect, but it's going to be rock 'n' roll."

That's one of the points that she and her staff emphasize to campers. "One of our rules at camp is you're not allowed to apologize for making a mistake," she said. "You have to say 'I rock.' "

Besides going virtual, Case and company have made other changes this year, including trimming each day to five hours, but the activities will be similar to past incarnations: studying rock history, doing punk-rock aerobics, creating band logos, learning studio technology (instead of playing actual instruments), writing songs, forming a band, listening to guest speakers, discussing gender identity and examining social justice.

Case thinks learning the studio aspect is important because fewer than 5% of professional recording engineers and producers are "non-men."

"The kids need to see themselves reflected in the people they are looking up to," she said. "When they hear a song, do they think about all the stuff that goes on behind the scenes and who is in charge of doing that?"

Niko Johnson, 14, a guitarist-singer-songwriter, is amped about this year's approach.

"I'm trying to produce my own album this year," Niko said. "This will be helpful for me to learn music production and mixing and stuff."

In the aftermath of the George Floyd killing in Minneapolis, social justice will be a prominent component of the camp.

"We do a lot of workshops on activism, media literacy, racism, self-defense, stuff along those lines," Case said. "When we started, we were very music focused, and we've evolved over the years. The social justice piece has always been important, but it got really, really important in the last few weeks. It's in the forefront of everybody's mind. I think the kids are going to have a lot to say this summer."

For Ellie Johnson, 14, the activism aspect of She Rock is very appealing.

"That's one of the big parts of camp, learning what's going on in the world," she said, "and how you can try to help your community."

For Niko, attending She Rock has been life defining.

"If it weren't for doing this camp, I probably wouldn't have figured out my own gender identity," Niko said.

The twins' mother said the camp has been a pivotal experience for her children.

"They've become more confident as musicians, more confident in their songwriting abilities. They've been doing open mic nights [at various venues], and we've done livestreamed concerts from our house," said Johnson, a musician and artistic director of Anoka's Lyric Arts theater whose musician husband discovered She Rock online.

"She Rock She Rock takes them seriously as musicians and as young people, which is really important," Johnson said. "The other piece is how they've grown as people. To have that confidence in themselves as people in their middle-school years has been a truly amazing thing to watch."

Highlight: Some St. Paul businesses that won lottery for COVID-19 grants fell victim to looters

Body

Angie and Ted Vig's St. Paul guitar shop had been closed for two months when the grant check came from the city - a $7,500 sigh of relief that meant they could pay rent while they made plans to reopen amid COVID-19.

Then, weeks later, as the unrest following George Floyd's May 25 killing by Minneapolis police spread to St. Paul, looters broke into their Snelling Avenue store, trashing the tiny shop and stealing instruments and equipment valued at $40,000.

Vig Guitars is among several businesses that were randomly chosen to get emergency cash assistance through the St. Paul Bridge Fund, only to see their stores damaged or destroyed weeks later, according to data analyzed by the Star Tribune. The data, obtained through a public records request, provides a first look at how the $4.1 million Bridge Fund was spent, as some recipients scramble to file insurance claims and launch crowdsourcing efforts to rebuild.

Nearly 250 buildings in St. Paul were damaged during the civil unrest at the end of May, according to data analyzed by the Star Tribune. Four were destroyed by fire, including two, Bolé Ethiopian Cuisine and Sports Dome, that received Bridge Fund checks just weeks before.

"Almost a lifetime in there, just gone overnight," said Won Kim, who owned Sports Dome and ran an apparel business there with his family for more than 20 years.

Kim said he hasn't spent the $7,500 Bridge Fund grant yet, and he is working on getting insurance money. He's not sure whether he'll rebuild or sell the land and move on.

In an interview, Deputy Mayor Jaime Tincher said that, as rebuilding begins, the city wants to work with community members to ensure that vacant parcels aren't snapped up by real estate developers who have no stake in the city and its neighborhoods.

Some got lucky, then riots hit

City leaders made an unsuccessful appeal to the state for recovery help during the special legislative session and continue to meet weekly with their legislative delegation and U.S. Rep. Betty McCollum's office, Tincher said. City officials are considering an array of tools, including tax increment financing, to help keep businesses afloat, she said. They're also encouraging St. Paul residents to shop local.

"The thing that would be most helpful is just the access to capital," Tincher said. "That would really allow us to take the time to work with the community to say, what is our plan for what the future of this space looks like, and what opportunities could we take advantage of?"

St. Paul has its own financial concerns - city officials are projecting a multimillion-dollar 2020 deficit due to COVID-19. The city's Housing and Redevelopment Authority spent $3.25 million on the Bridge Fund, which was combined with $865,000 in philanthropic dollars. Grants were available to low-income families and small businesses that lost income as a result of COVID-19.

Of more than 1,700 St. Paul businesses that applied for Bridge Fund grants, 380 received them, according to the city. Recipients, chosen at random, ranged from restaurants and nail salons to auto shops and gyms, data show.

Some business that are part of larger chains, including Dunn Brothers, Jamba Juice and Dunkin' Donuts, also were awarded grants. Tincher said grants were available to small, local businesses that pay franchise fees but don't have access to corporate capital.

After receiving grants, businesses that were damaged during the unrest are now searching for other ways to rebuild what they've lost. Little Saigon Supermarket on University Avenue was able to reopen despite some property damage, but it has lost some business because customers from outside St. Paul are afraid to come into the city and shop there, said Kim Nguyen, whose family owns the business.

Many business owners have turned to the crowdsourcing platform GoFundMe, with varying results. Vig Guitars raised more than $20,000, then encouraged donors to redirect their support elsewhere. As of Thursday, Sports Dome had raised about $3,500 between two GoFundMe pages. Bolé surpassed its $100,000 goal within days.

There's still a long way to go, said Solomon Hailie, who owns Bolé with his wife and used the Bridge Fund grant to pay their employees.

As renters of their space - where they had just expanded and were on the cusp of opening a fast food spot - insurance will offer little help, Hailie said. The restaurant's future at the corner of University Avenue and Syndicate Street is uncertain.

"Building the restaurant back, or the business back, needs more help than just a GoFundMe," he said. "We want to get back to the city, and hopefully the city will be there to support us."

The unprecedented double quaking of America's suspect foundations - a worldwide pandemic and worldwide anger over the death of George Floyd at the knee of a Minneapolis cop - has increased the volume of what we've been hearing for decades as sports reporters.

Sports are not that important. We work in the "toy department" of any newsgathering operation.

Long ago, this was heard as a simple observation made by Ray Fitzgerald, an exceptional Boston Globe sports columnist who died in 1982:

"Sports are important because people are there."

This now requires an update, as we crawl forward in this age of pandemic and many sports events are returning with empty venues - without people, meaning:

"Sports are important because athletes are there."

And with minuscule crowds and few TV ratings, you are permitted to become more intrigued by the resolute than the truly gifted. I had a one-man think session on such athletes recently and arrived at this question:

How resolute was a football player required to be to show up every week and do battle for the Minnesota Crookston Golden Eagles?

The Division II Northern Sun Intercollegiate Conference changed its bylaws late last fall to make way for St. Cloud State to get rid of football. The official announcement was made Dec. 11 that the Huskies and Crookston were dropping football immediately.

The reality was St. Cloud went because it had an anti-football top administration, and Crookston went in as an act of administrative mercy. The 2019 season ended at 0-11 once again, including back-to-back losses vs. powers Minnesota State Mankato and Minnesota Duluth by a combined 144-0.

Time is right to salute the resolute in sports

Yet, there were Golden Eagles seniors who showed up weekly to put up their best fight, to dream of repeating the glory of Sept. 22, 2018: a 29-22 victory at Minot [N.D.] State.

One senior was Joe Warner from St. Louis Park. He was a defensive tackle on all-NSIC North's second team, the only Golden Eagle on the top 44. Another was Will Cross, a linebacker from Turtle Lake, Wis., and all-North honorable mention.

Warner played offensive line in junior college at Rochester Community and Technical College. He was a starter as a freshman when Rochester went to a national title game in 2015, sat out in 2016 and returned in 2017.

"I reached out to all the NSIC teams," Warner said. "I still was completing my associate's degree and that scared off schools. Crookston and Wayne State in Nebraska were the only two that were interested. Crookston gave me the financial help I needed to attend school.

"They also said, 'We think you have the mobility and size for nose tackle.' I was skeptical, but the coaches were right. I enjoyed playing defense."

Even the double-teams while trying to stop outstanding running backs such as MSU Mankato's Nate Gunn?

"We would get together as a D-line before the game and agree, 'We can only control what we can control; we're going to give our best effort today,' " Warner said.

Warner was working a summer job in Crookston last Aug. 1 when he received the worst call of his life. His mother, Yolanda Warner-Orina, had died unexpectedly at 46.

"She was the most important person I had in my life," Warner said.

Warner returned to Crookston for football practice a few days after his mom's funeral. "I couldn't keep my thoughts together, even on the field," he said. "Luckily, I had Will Cross behind me saying, 'No, Joe, you're here.' He saved me. "

Warner looks like a football player. Cross looks like an undersized player from Division 7 in Wisconsin, which is what he was at tiny Turtle Lake. He went to Crookston's spring camp, then sprained an ankle playing pickup basketball, missed the other NSIC camps and accepted Crookston as his one chance to play Division II.

"I saw some outstanding athletes come in there, and when things didn't go smooth, they didn't want to play anymore," Cross said. "I wasn't going to leave. I wanted to see it get turned around.

"I believed that was possible. You have to believe in football. It's a tough game that gets tougher without full effort."

Cross was granted a sixth year of eligibility, through a medical redshirt, and is now at Lindenwood, a Division II school outside St. Louis. He was a redshirt when Crookston defeated Minot in 2015; then the Golden Eagles went 1-43 in his four seasons as a player.

"You'll always have that win at Minot in 2018 as a Crookston player," a reporter said.

Time is right to salute the resolute in sports

Cross paused and said: "Actually, no. That's the year I was hurt in the season opener. I wasn't on the field that afternoon. I'm anxious to play in my first college victory this fall."

That, folks, is resolute.

MINNEAPOLIS - There were two Black men at the scene of the police killing in Minneapolis last month that roiled the nation. One, George Floyd, was sprawled on the asphalt, with a white officer's knee on his neck. The other Black man, Alex Kueng, was a rookie police officer who held his back as Floyd struggled to breathe.

Floyd, whose name has been painted on murals and scrawled on protest signs, has been laid to rest. Kueng, who faces charges of aiding and abetting in Floyd's death, is out on bail, hounded at the supermarket by strangers and denounced by some family members.

Long before Kueng was arrested, he had wrestled with the issue of police abuse of Black people, joining the force in part to help protect people close to him from police aggression. He argued that diversity could force change in a Police Department long accused of racism.

He had seen one sibling arrested and treated poorly, in his view, by sheriff's deputies. He had found himself defending his decision to join the police force, saying he thought it was the best way to fix a broken system. He had clashed with friends over whether public demonstrations could actually make things better.

"He said, 'Don't you think that that needs to be done from the inside?'" his mother, Joni Kueng, recalled him saying after he watched protesters block a highway years ago. "That's part of the reason why he wanted to become a police officer - and a Black police officer on top of it - is to bridge that gap in the community, change the narrative between the officers and the Black community."

As hundreds of thousands of people demonstrated against the police after Floyd's killing on May 25, Kueng became part of a national debate over police violence toward Black people, a symbol of the very sort of policing he had long said he wanted to stop.

Black officer who detained George Floyd had pledged to fix police

Derek Chauvin, the officer who placed his knee on Floyd's neck for more than eight minutes, has been most widely associated with the case. He faces charges of second-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter; Kueng and two other former officers were charged with aiding and abetting the killing. At 26, Kueng was the youngest and least experienced officer at the scene, on only his third shift as a full officer.

The arrest of Kueng, whose mother is white and whose father was from Nigeria, has brought anguish to his friends and family. "It's a gut punch," Joni Kueng said. "Here you are, you've raised this child, you know who he is inside and out. We're such a racially diverse family. To be wrapped up in a racially motivated incident like this is just unfathomable."

Two of Alex Kueng's siblings, Taylor and Radiance, both of whom are African American, called for the arrests of all four officers, including their brother. They joined protests in Minneapolis. In a Facebook Live video, Taylor Kueng, 21, appeared with the head of the local NAACP to speak of the injustice that befell Floyd, acknowledging being related to Alex Kueng but never mentioning his name.

Alex Kueng's sister Radiance posted a video of Floyd's final minutes on Facebook. "Just broke my heart," she wrote. In an interview, she said that as a Black man, her brother should have intervened. She said she planned to change her last name in part because she did not want to be associated with her brother's actions.

"I don't care if it was his third day at work or not," she said. "He knows right from wrong."

Through his life, Alex Kueng straddled two worlds, Black and white.

Kueng, whose full name is J. Alexander Kueng (pronounced "king"), was raised by his mother, whom he lived with until last year. His father was absent.

As a child, Kueng sometimes asked for siblings. Joni Kueng, who lived in the Shingle Creek neighborhood in north Minneapolis, signed up with an African American adoption agency.

When Alex was 5, Joni Kueng brought home a baby boy who had been abandoned at a hospital. Alex soon asked for a sister; Radiance arrived when he was 11. Taylor and a younger brother came in 2009, when Alex was about 16.

Radiance Kueng, 21, said their adoptive mother did not talk about race. "Race was not really a topic in our household, unfortunately," she said. "For her adopting as many Black kids as she did - I didn't get that conversation from her. I feel like that should have been a conversation that was had." Growing up, Alex Kueng and his family made repeated trips to Haiti, helping at an orphanage. Alex Kueng and his siblings took a break from school to volunteer there after the earthquake in 2010.

Joni Kueng, 56, likes to say that the Kuengs are a family of doers, not talkers.

"I had to stay out of the race conversations because I was the minority in the household," Joni Kueng said in her first interview since her son's arrest. She said that race was not an issue with her, but that she was conflicted. "It didn't really matter, but it does matter to them because they are African American. And so they had to be able to have an outlet to tell their stories and their experience as well, especially having a white mom."

Black officer who detained George Floyd had pledged to fix police

Joni Kueng taught math at the schools her children went to, where the student body was often mostly Hmong, African American and Latino. Classmates described Alex Kueng as friends with everyone, a master of juggling a soccer ball and a defender against bullies. Photos portray him with a sly smile.

Darrow Jones said he first met Alex Kueng on the playground when he was 6. Jones was trying to finish his multiplication homework. Alex Kueng helped Jones and then invited him into a game of tag.

When Jones' mother died in 2008, Joni Kueng took him in for as long as a month at a time.

By high school, Alex Kueng had found soccer, and soon that was all he wanted to do. He became captain of the soccer team; he wanted to turn pro. The quote next to his senior yearbook picture proclaimed, "We ignore failures and strive for success."

Alex Kueng went to Monroe College in New Rochelle, New York, to play soccer and study business. But after surgery on both knees, soccer proved impossible. Alex Kueng quit. Back in Minneapolis, he enrolled in technical college and supported himself catching shoplifters at Macy's.

About that time, he started talking about joining the police, Joni Kueng recalled. She said she was nervous, for his safety and also because of the troubled relationship between the Minneapolis police and residents.

Given his background, Alex Kueng thought he had the ability to bridge the gap between white and Black worlds, Jones said. He often did not see the same level of racism that friends felt. Jones, who is Black, recalled a road trip a few years ago to Utah with Alex Kueng, a white friend and Alex Kueng's girlfriend, who is Hmong. Jones said he had to explain to Alex Kueng why people were staring at the group.

"Once we got to Utah, we walked into a store, and literally everybody's eyes were on us," recalled Jones, whose skin is darker than Alex Kueng's. "I said, 'Alex, that's because you're walking in here with a Black person. The reason they're staring at us is because you're here with me.'"

By February 2019, Alex Kueng had made up his mind: He signed up as a police cadet. Only a few months later, his sibling Taylor, a longtime supporter of Black Lives Matter who had volunteered as a counselor at a Black heritage camp and as a mentor to at-risk Black youths, had a confrontation with law enforcement.

Taylor Kueng and a friend saw local sheriff's deputies questioning two men in a downtown Minneapolis shopping district about drinking in public. They intervened. Taylor Kueng used a cellphone to record video of the deputies putting the friend, in a striped summer dress, on the ground. "You're hurting me!" the friend shouted.

As the confrontation continued, a deputy turned to Taylor Kueng and said, "Put your hands behind your back." "For what?" Taylor Kueng asked several times. "Because," said the deputy, threatening to use his Taser.

Taylor Kueng called home. Alex Kueng and their mother rushed to get bail and then to the jail. "Don't worry, I got you," Alex Kueng told his sibling, hugging Taylor, their mother recalled.

Alex Kueng reminded his sibling that those were sheriff's deputies, not the city force he was joining, and criticized their behavior, his mother recalled.

Black officer who detained George Floyd had pledged to fix police

After Taylor Kueng's video went public, the city dropped the misdemeanor charges of disorderly conduct and obstructing the legal process. The sheriff's office announced an official review of the arrests, which resulted in no discipline.

Alex Kueng's choice to become a police officer caused a rift in his friendship with Jones.

"It was very clear where we stood on that," said Jones, a Black Lives Matter supporter who protested on the streets after the deaths of Jamar Clark and Philando Castile at the hands of police. "Our fundamental disagreement around law enforcement is not that I believe cops are bad people. I just believe that the system needs to be completely wiped out and replaced. It's the difference between reform and rebuilding."

After Alex Kueng became a cadet, Jones went from seeing Alex Kueng twice a month to maybe three times a year. He said he did not even tell Alex Kueng when the police pursued him for nothing and then let him go.

In December, Alex Kueng graduated from the police academy. For most of his field training, Chauvin, with 19 years on the job, was his training officer.

At one point, Alex Kueng, upset, called his mother. He said he had done something during training that bothered a supervising officer, who reamed him out. Joni Kueng did not know if that supervisor was Chauvin.

Chauvin also extended Alex Kueng's training period. He felt Alex Kueng was meeting too often with a fellow police trainee, Thomas Lane, when responding to calls, rather than handling the calls on his own, Joni Kueng said.

But on May 22, Alex Kueng officially became one of about 80 Black officers on a police force of almost 900. In recent years, the department, not as racially diverse as the city's population, has tried to increase the number of officers of color, with limited success.

That evening, other officers held a small party at the Third Precinct station to celebrate Alex Kueng's promotion. The next evening, he worked his first full shift as an officer, inside the station. On that Sunday, he worked the 4 p.m. to 2 a.m. patrol shift, his first on the streets.

On May 25, Alex Kueng's third day on the job, Alex Kueng and Lane, now partnered up despite both being freshly minted rookies, were the first officers to answer a call of a counterfeit $20 bill being passed at a corner store. They found Floyd in a car outside.

After they failed to get Floyd into the back of a squad car, Chauvin and Tou Thao, another officer, showed up.

As Chauvin jammed his knee into the back of Floyd's neck, Alex Kueng held down Floyd's back, according to a probable cause statement filed by prosecutors.

Chauvin kept his knee there as Floyd repeated "I can't breathe" and "mama" and "please." Through the passing minutes, Alex Kueng did nothing to intervene, prosecutors say. After Floyd stopped moving, Alex Kueng checked Floyd's pulse. "I couldn't find one," Alex Kueng told the other officers. Critics of the police said the fact that none of the junior officers stopped Chauvin showed that the system itself needed to be overhauled.

Black officer who detained George Floyd had pledged to fix police

"How do you as an individual think that you're going to be able to change that system, especially when you're going in at a low level?" said Michelle Gross, president of Communities United Against Police Brutality in Minneapolis. "You're not going to feel OK to say, 'Stop, senior officer.' The culture is such, that that kind of intervening would be greatly discouraged."

All four officers have been fired. All four face 40 years in prison. Alex Kueng, who was released on bail on June 19, declined through his lawyer to be interviewed. He is set to appear in court Monday.

A day after Floyd's death, Jones learned that Alex Kueng was one of the officers who had been present. Around midnight, Jones called Alex Kueng. They talked for 40 minutes - about what, Jones would not say - and they cried.

"I'm feeling a lot of sadness and a lot of disappointment," Jones said. "A lot of us believe he should have stepped in and should have done something."

He added: "It's really hard. Because I do have those feelings and I won't say I don't. But though I feel sad about what's occurred, he still has my unwavering support. Because we grew up together, and I love him."

Jones said he had gone to the protests but could not bring himself to join in.

FALSE INFO OPENS DOOR TO FOREIGN MEDDLERS

According to one fake social media account, Minnesota Attorney General Keith Ellison was plotting with antifa, and busloads of paid protesters were coming to destroy Minneapolis. Another bogus tweet claimed George Floyd's death was staged to promote the breakdown of society.

Meanwhile, readers of state-run media in Russia, China and Iran were fed a steady stream of news stories that carried histrionic headlines such as, "AMERICA IN CHAOS."

The May 25 killing of George Floyd by Minneapolis police sparked a torrent of disinformation at home and intense coverage by state-sponsored media abroad seeking to undermine U.S. credibility. Federal law enforcement officials and researchers across the country found no evidence of foreign meddling in the immediate aftermath of Floyd's death. But last week, several U.S. senators warned that foreign actors were using the ensuing unrest to sow discord.

Russian operatives have deployed such tactics in recent years, but much of the early disinformation surrounding Floyd's killing seems to have originated in America. Foreign actors have seemed content to simply highlight existing unrest in Minnesota and elsewhere.

Taken together, the fake domestic reports and increased scrutiny by foreign sources add to a tinderbox of instability during an election year that intelligence officials had already warned would be rife with attempts both inside and out to sow division.

"The more unrest there is and the more potential for violence there is - that's in the interest for actors who want the U.S. to be as unstable as possible," said David Malet, an American University professor.

According to a U.S. Department of Homeland Security bulletin obtained last month by publicintelligence.net, federal law enforcement and intelligence authorities were aware of "covert proxies and social media accounts" working in lockstep with foreign adversaries' state-controlled media to paint the U.S. in a negative light. Law enforcement monitoring the unrest feared that the campaign could spill over into violence.

"Russian influence actors, in particular, have a history of using online tools to covertly amplify content concerning protest activity in the United States, including rhetoric that may seek to incite violence at such events," the bulletin read.

Former Special Counsel Robert Mueller concluded last year that Russian actors waged a "sweeping and systematic" campaign to amplify sociopolitical discord in the United States in the run-up to the 2016 election. Race issues were a weapon of choice for Russians seeking to disrupt American society: A U.S. Senate intelligence committee found that black Americans were targeted by Russian troll campaigns more than any other group. The troll groups reportedly created scores of Facebook events between 2015 and 2017, at times drawing followers of opposing movements to the same locations in hopes of stoking violent clashes.

During the first protests over Floyd's death last month, what the U.S. government calls "malign actors" focused on amplifying criticism of the U.S. and calling out its hypocritical approach to cracking down on protesters here while promoting protest movements like the Arab Spring abroad.

According to reports from the Alliance for Securing Democracy, a bipartisan national security advocacy group, Russian emphasis on incidents related to racism and police brutality in the U.S. date back to the Soviet era.

Emerson Brooking, a resident fellow at the Digital Forensic Research Lab of the Atlantic Council and co-author of "LikeWar: The Weaponization of Social Media," said it is still too early to tell whether foreign agents interfered during the Floyd protests, though, he added, "it is pretty clear that they didn't play a pivotal role" at the beginning.

"The fact is, it's not the Russians or the Chinese that killed George Floyd," Brooking said. "This was a spontaneous mass movement."

But Brooking said the protests that started in Minneapolis were still "rife with disinformation and misinformation," with many reports assigning blame for violence and property damage to "antifa" protesters. "Antifa" is short for anti-fascist, a largely unstructured movement of far-left groups that confront white supremacists and neo-Nazis. The reports caused President Donald Trump to announce that he would declare antifa a designated terrorist organization - a legal designation that does not apply to the movement.

U.S. Attorney General William Barr on June 4 said federal authorities had "evidence that antifa and other similar extremist groups, as well as actors of a variety of different political persuasions, have been involved in instigating and participating in the violent activities."

Barr also acknowledged that foreign actors were "playing all sides to exacerbate the violence."

FBI agents in Minneapolis, however, have not linked any of the destruction from the protests to antifa or organized extremist groups. None of the dozen federal arson and rioting cases charged so far in Minnesota describe links to antifa or other groups. Neither have any of the dozens of other federal cases documented nationwide at this point.

Bret Schafer, a media and disinformation fellow at the Alliance for Securing Democracy, which closely tracks state-backed foreign media online, mused that foreign actors may not necessarily need to do much to undermine faith in American democracy this year. Trump has already cast doubts on the validity of the 2020 election results, and American society remains fraught with division.

"We could get to a point where they see us right on the brink and just needing a two-finger push to go over the cliff," Schafer said.

On Friday, Minnesota U.S. Sens. Amy Klobuchar and Tina Smith joined 13 other Democratic senators in a letter urging federal intelligence and law enforcement leaders to do more to safeguard the 2020 election from an expected rise in foreign interference.

The senators disclosed that the U.S. Department of Homeland Security had warned June 9 that it was seeing disinformation campaigns beginning to take advantage of unrest over racism and inequality. Foreign adversaries, the senators wrote, were "using it to further sow discord among the American people." Though they provided no examples, the letter included a footnote to an ABC News report on a recent federal bulletin to law enforcement.

A tweet last month falsely alleging that Ellison was "coordinating" with antifa protesters revealed how disinformation, regardless of source, can seep into real-world discourse.

The tweet included a two-year-old image of Ellison holding a book about anti-fascists. It was posted by a since-deleted account that used the name of a CBS News reporter who died nearly 20 years ago. A Facebook page belonging to a woman who often amplifies QAnon conspiracy theories to thousands of followers also shared a screenshot of the tweet moments after it went live. That post now carries a disclaimer from the social media giant that the post contained false information assessed by "independent fact-checkers."

Two days after the original tweet, Ellison stood before reporters to announce that he would now be leading the prosecution of the fired officers involved in Floyd's death. As Ellison and other state officials prepared to leave the news conference, one reporter flagged Ellison for a question.

"Attorney General, is it possible for you to please address a picture that has gone somewhat viral on social media with you holding a book that some consider somewhat controversial as you're taking a lead role in this case...?"

"It means nothing," Ellison said. "It's just a complete diversion."

Four former Minneapolis police officers charged in the May 25 killing of George Floyd face unprecedented issues as their cases proceed toward trial: Their actions were captured on a lengthy video; they each have a stake in the outcomes, and several bystanders witnessed the death.

Derek Chauvin, who knelt on Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes, and his three former colleagues - J Alexander Kueng, Thomas Lane and Tou Thao, who assisted in his arrest - are scheduled to make their second court appearance Monday afternoon on charges ranging from second-degree murder to aiding and abetting murder.

Veteran defense attorneys say the prosecution's case against Chauvin is strong, while a series of unique circumstances pose challenges to both prosecutors and defense attorneys at the center of a case that has captured worldwide attention.

"There are cases you can never win; this very well may be one of them," said defense attorney Joe Friedberg, who has handled about 100 murder cases.

Chauvin is charged with one count each of second-degree unintentional murder, third-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter. His attorney, Eric Nelson, declined to comment on the case. The other three are charged with aiding and abetting murder and manslaughter.

The Floyd case differs in key ways from the last three times an officer was tried in Minnesota for killing a civilian. Floyd's killing lasted nearly eight minutes instead of the "split-second" decisions that previous officers faced, providing their attorneys an argument that they were justified in using deadly force.

By contrast, Floyd warned the officers of his own impending death after repeatedly telling them he couldn't breathe. Bystanders also repeatedly warned the officers and begged them to relent.

Cases in Floyd's death have little precedent

The fact that all three officers who assisted Chauvin in arresting Floyd were also charged could cause a crack in the "blue wall of silence" that has seemingly protected some officers previously accused of crimes.

"Ultimately the duty of every witness is to tell the truth, but the reality is human beings remember things differently, and the reality is all human beings have biases," said Ramsey County Attorney John Choi, whose office tried two of the last three officers charged with killing civilians. "I think there's enormous pressure on the police witness to be helpful to the partner accused of a crime, and that's a product of the police culture that we have."

When Washington County Deputy Brian Krook was tried three months ago in the fatal shooting of a suicidal man, prosecutors told jurors his colleague, Deputy Joshua Ramirez, was the epitome of good police work.

Ramirez peacefully negotiated for about 35 minutes with Benjamin Evans, who had a gun but did not threaten first responders before Krook shot at Evans without warning.

But when Ramirez testified, he said that perhaps he had negotiated with Evans for too long, implying that he should have taken deadly action himself.

"How long were you willing to wait for [Evans] to put the gun down? asked prosecutor Thomas Hatch, an assistant Ramsey County attorney who tried the case so Washington County could avoid a conflict of interest.

"I don't know," Ramirez said. "Maybe I waited too long."

Hatch pressed Ramirez, asking whether Evans' actions caused him to consider shooting him.

"Yes," Ramirez replied. He acknowledged that he had previously said no to the same question before the grand jury that indicted Krook on second-degree manslaughter charges.

Krook was acquitted in mid-March.

During former Minneapolis officer Mohamed Noor's trial last year in the 2017 fatal shooting of Justine Ruszcyk Damond, Hennepin County prosecutors openly challenged the credibility of several Minneapolis police officers, as well as investigators from the Minnesota Bureau of Criminal Apprehension, implying that they colluded to obscure or create evidence.

Noor was convicted and is appealing the case.

With all three of his former colleagues facing potential prison time, Chauvin likely won't have the same support network, said some prominent lawyers.

"One of the factors of any witness is that they will testify in a manner that is consistent with their self-interest," said lawyer Don Lewis, who helped Choi's office charge former officer Jeronimo Yanez in the 2016 killing of Philando Castile. "Officer Chauvin isn't going to have much support from his colleagues available."

Cases in Floyd's death have little precedent

At their first appearances earlier this month, attorneys for Lane and Kueng - Earl Gray and Thomas Plunkett, respectively - blamed Chauvin for Floyd's death. The attorneys argued that their clients were rookies who relied on Chauvin, a 19-year veteran and training officer, for guidance at the scene.

Gray said he'll soon file a motion to dismiss the charges against Lane, noting that Lane twice asked Chauvin if they should roll Floyd onto his side to help him breathe; he was rebuffed.

"I don't anticipate trying Mr. Lane's case with Mr. Chauvin," Gray said.

Friedberg was skeptical a judge would dismiss the charges against Lane but said Gray had a strong defense should the case go to trial.

"The things the young man [Lane] said out loud, the relationship between Chauvin and the young man, and it's clear that young man had no intent for Floyd to die because he did CPR" on Floyd, Friedberg said. "That's going to be a huge issue."

However, some said, a savvy Chauvin defense could turn the tables.

He could direct the blame at Lane, who was holding down Floyd's leg as Floyd lay stomach-down in the street, and Kueng, who was holding onto Floyd's back, said lawyer Robert Richman.

"It seems that keeping someone ... in a prone position on your stomach and having pressure placed on your back causes respiratory difficulties," Richman said, postulating that perhaps "it was the other two officers holding him down that caused the breathing difficulties," rather than Chauvin kneeling on the side of Floyd's neck.

Prosecutors also could face challenges trying to prove the four former officers shared the same intent, along with trying to navigate complications raised by two slightly competing autopsy reports.

The Hennepin County Medical Examiner's Office found that Floyd died when his heart stopped while he was being restrained, noting that the presence of fentanyl intoxication and recent methamphetamine use were "other significant conditions."

Attorneys for Floyd's family criticized that report and commissioned an independent autopsy that concluded Floyd died of asphyxia.

Friedberg found an argument for the defense in those autopsies.

"I would take the position that [Floyd] had started to die before Chauvin put his knee on his neck," he said.

"He had taken some deadly drugs," Friedberg noted, citing the fentanyl that killed Prince and many others in recent years. "Make your argument a scientific argument instead of an emotional argument or state-of-mind argument."

WASHINGTON - President Donald Trump on Sunday tweeted approvingly of a video showing one of his supporters chanting "white power," a racist slogan associated with white supremacists. He later deleted the tweet and the White House said the president had not heard "the one statement" on the video.

The video appeared to have been taken at The Villages, a Florida retirement community, and showed dueling demonstrations between Trump supporters and opponents.

"Thank you to the great people of The Villages," Trump tweeted. Moments into the video clip he shared, a man driving a golf cart displaying pro-Trump signs and flags shouts "white power." The video also shows anti-Trump protesters shouting "Nazi," "racist," and profanities at the Trump backers.

Trump's tweet remained online for about 90 minutes.

"There's no question" that Trump should not have retweeted the video and "he should just take it down," Sen. Tim Scott, R-S.C., told CNN's "State of the Union." Scott is the only Black Republican in the Senate.

"I think it's indefensible," he added.

Shortly afterward, Trump deleted the tweet that shared the video. White House spokesman Judd Deere said in a statement that "President Trump is a big fan of The Villages. He did not hear the one statement made on the video. What he did see was tremendous enthusiasm from his many supporters."

The White House did not respond when asked whether Trump condemned the supporter's comment.

Joe Biden, the presumptive Democratic presidential nominee, condemned Trump. "We're in a battle for the soul of the nation - and the President has picked a side. But make no mistake: it's a battle we will win," the former vice president tweeted.

Trump tweets video with 'white power' chant, then deletes it

Trump's decision to highlight a video featuring a racist slogan comes amid a national reckoning over race following the deaths of George Floyd and other Black Americans. Floyd, a Black Minneapolis man, died after a white police officer pressed his knee into his neck for several minutes.

Protests against police brutality and bias in law enforcement have occurred across the country following Floyd's death. There also has also been a push to remove Confederate monuments and to rename military bases that honor figures who fought in the Civil War against the Union. Trump has opposed these efforts.

Trump has been directing his reelection message at the same group of disaffected, largely white voters who backed him four years ago. In doing so, he has stoked racial divisions in the country at a time when tensions are already high. He also has played into anti-immigrant anxieties by falsely claiming that people who have settled in this country commit crimes at greater rates than those who were born in the U.S.

Trump's tenure in office has appeared to have emboldened white supremacist and nationalist groups, some of whom have embraced his presidency. In 2017, Trump responded to clashes in Charlottesville, Virginia, between white nationalists and counter-protesters by saying there were "very fine people on both sides."

Sherrilyn Ifill, president and director-counsel of the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund told CBS' "Face the Nation" that "This really is not about the president taking it down. This is about the judgment of the president in putting it up."

She added, "It's about what the president believes and it's time for this country to really face that."

Section: HOMES; Pg. 2HLength: 777 wordsByline: KELLY KLEIN, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Landlord bans Black Lives Matter sign in windowBody

Q: I'm a teacher and live in a large apartment complex in Minneapolis. Recently I have been told I cannot post a Black Lives Matter sign in my window since our community handbook prohibits political signs. My lease refers to the handbook but doesn't address this matter directly. I do not believe Black Lives Matter is political. I do not have a copy of the handbook and haven't received one in many years - I've lived here for 13 years. I have posted political signs without punishment in the past. What should I do?

A: I, and many others, think it's fine to hang a Black Lives Matter sign in your window, but your landlord or others in your community may not agree. Most landlords prohibit any and all signs because they are afraid that they will cause problems among tenants. Unfortunately, you can only assert your First Amendment rights when a governmental entity is restricting them. Your First Amendment right to freedom of speech does not cover private property owned by your landlord or a corporation. So, you have a right that is guaranteed by the Constitution to attend a protest and hold up signs such as Black Lives Matter on public property. However, once you sign a lease and are renting from a private owner or corporation, you are bound by the language in your lease. You do have rights as a tenant within your apartment and the common spaces used throughout your building. But your landlord can restrict signage, political or not, by a clause in your lease and also through a handbook. Even though you've lived there 13 years, if your current lease mentions a handbook, and the handbook states that no signs are allowed on the lawn or in windows, then you are most likely bound by those terms.

You mentioned that you have put a political sign in your window before, and that your landlord allowed it. What's different now, or did you just put it up and the landlord never told you to remove it? Typically the lease language says no signage, but when tenants put signs up, it's generally allowed. When they are told to remove a sign, they do so usually because their lease refers to a handbook that doesn't allow signage. It may be that the landlord failed to enforce this rule against you and other tenants in the past. Most leases have a nonwaiver clause, stating that the landlord does not waive the right to enforce the lease if they have failed to do so in the past. If your lease doesn't have such a clause, then you may have a defense against any adverse action by your landlord in relation to the sign.

RENTING AND THE LAW

You didn't say who told you that you couldn't have the sign in your window. If it was the caretaker, and not the landlord or owner, you should talk to your landlord and request that you be allowed to put your Black Lives Matter sign in your window, since you've been allowed to put up signs in the past. Social media can be a powerful tool that you could use to raise awareness about your landlord's refusal to allow a Black Lives Matter sign. You should be cautious, though, because the landlord may not renew your lease. You could also negotiate with your landlord to allow you to put up your sign, saying that you will take it down if other tenants complain.

Rent increase?

Q: I live in an apartment in White Bear Lake. I just renewed my lease for one year, through June 30, 2021. The manager told me that the owner of the building is maintaining the same rent rate as last year because of the coronavirus but that the rent may get raised later this year if the economy improves. I was under the impression that if I had a signed lease, then my rent was set for the duration of the lease and cannot be raised. Who is correct - me or the manager?

A: While it was thoughtful of your landlord to keep the rent at the same rate, the owner or manager cannot raise the rent while your lease is still running, even if the economic outlook improves. Your rent cannot be raised until your lease expires unless the language in your lease allows for an increase and it's clearly pointed out. It sounds to me like you just renewed your lease for another year under the same terms. However, you should check your lease regarding your rent amount and make sure that you didn't agree to it being raised while your lease is still running.

MONTEVIDEO, MINN. - When the Rev. Jeff Fitzkappes is preaching about social justice in this western Minnesota city, he knows when he's pushing the limits.

There's one church member who will start "sliding down in her pew" when things get uncomfortable, Fitzkappes said: "I've kind of used her as a barometer."

Fitzkappes may see more sliding parishioners in the days to come. As the state - indeed, the world - grapples with the issues raised by the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police, this small-town Lutheran minister is challenging his largely white community to take responsibility for the ingrained societal racism that has left so many people of color in Minnesota worse off than white citizens.

It's a message that can be a tough sell in the state's rural areas, Fitzkappes and others said. While individual racism may be frowned upon, many people in the state's overwhelmingly white areas haven't really considered how they've benefited from generations of membership in the state's dominant culture.

In this prairie town of 5,100 where the Chippewa River joins the Minnesota, some 130 miles west of the Twin Cities, 90% of the residents are white, and many families have lived here for generations. That can make racism a hard topic to tackle, Fitzkappes said, drinking coffee in an outdoor courtyard at the Java River Coffee Shop downtown, where the reviving main street is dotted with Mexican restaurants and ethnic grocery stores.

"If you jump out and shame people, it just shuts down conversation," he said. "It's a balance."

'I made my own way'

Rural Minnesotans pride themselves on hard work as the solution to all problems and sometimes can't understand why others struggle, said Reed Olson, a Beltrami County commissioner who was on the losing side of a vote earlier this year that banned refugee resettlement in the county.

In rural Minnesota, racism can be taboo conversation

"I think people are so set on the 'I made my own way' narrative," Olson said. "And never mind that I'm a third-generation business owner, and that my grandfather was able to get a loan at a time when a black man or a Native American wouldn't have been able to."

Racist views have cropped up repeatedly in rural areas since Floyd's death sparked widespread protests, riots and public soul-searching. The mayor of Blackduck, Minn., resigned after posting an inflammatory meme on Facebook; he said it was misunderstood. A teacher in Brainerd resigned after a similar social media incident.

And in Stockholm, Wis., a tourist town just across the Mississippi River from Lake City, Minn., a popular pie shop was the scene of an ugly racial incident earlier this month.

A 16-year-old biracial girl working at Stockholm Pie and General Store was told by a group of customers that they "wouldn't eat at a table she touched," according to store manager Abigail Halvorson, or patronize a place that hired "your kind."

The store took to Facebook to speak out about the incident.

"No young person should have to deal with this," the post read. "Sadly, it's not an isolated experience for her and others.

"If you believe the way those folks do. Do. Not. Set. Foot. Here. You are not welcome."

'I just felt the hostility'

Many rural Minnesotans would be quick to disavow those views, said Julie Tesch, who lives in rural Waseca County and is president and CEO of the Center for Rural Policy and Development.

"At least in this area, when people think of racism, they think of the KKK," she said. "And they think, 'No, I have black friends, I work with Latinos.' When we're talking about systemic racism, it's very different. I don't think we understand the words."

An example of systemic racism, Tesch said, is when white residents assume that people of color living in the area must be there because they have a family member in the federal women's correctional facility in Waseca.

"Why wouldn't they be here because they have a job, why wouldn't they be here because they want to live in a nice community?" she said. "The stereotype is, you can't be an African-American and want to be here because you want a low cost of living and good schools."

Statewide, Minnesota's population of 5.3 million is about 80% white, according to census figures. But in many rural areas, the white population is 90% or more.

Samuel Myers Jr., a professor at the University of Minnesota's Humphrey School of Public Affairs, remembers watching his daughter compete in high school swim meets in rural Minnesota.

"We would go into a restaurant and it was scary for me," said Myers, who is black. "I made a point to wear a coat and tie, to make sure I looked OK. I just felt the hostility."

Another obstacle, Myers and others said, is the state's cultural inclination to avoid confrontation and shy away from discussing difficult topics.

In rural Minnesota, racism can be taboo conversation

"We don't talk about race. And if you don't talk about race, there can't be racism," Myers said, adding that it's not just rural white Minnesotans who avoid the issue.

The violent protests in some cities, accompanied by looting and property destruction, have given rural Minnesotans another reason to shrug off talk of institutional racism. Olson recounted a recent conversation he had with some Beltrami County residents.

"One said, 'I was listening to them, and then they took down a statue of George Washington, and that's a bridge too far,'" Olson said. He replied, "You're not talking about your neighbors. You're talking about a small group of people on the other end of the continent and using them to characterize the whole."

'No room for such evil'

Fitzkappes became pastor at Trinity Lutheran in Montevideo three years ago and immediately started preaching about social justice to his congregation of about 130 members. He consciously uses the language of Lutheran confession, stressing the importance of acknowledging wrongdoing, both as individuals and as a society.

"People don't like confrontation. They're ashamed," he said. "But I don't think I could do otherwise." The Evangelical Lutheran Church in America and its leadership are wholly behind his approach, he said, "but individual congregations and members are much more conservative."

Earlier this month, Fitzkappes made an impassioned plea in his regular pastoral newsletter.

"We need to talk about something that's real hard and that most of us try to avoid," he wrote. "You and I swim in a sea of white privilege in the United States that has been constructed and maintained through violence against persons of color. It has existed since our nation began and it continues today.

"There is no room in our Christian faith for participation in such evil."

Some of his parishioners have been angered by his emphasis on social justice, Fitzkappes said. He's had people shout at him, and some have left the church. Others are supportive.

"His message highlights it is just as important that these conversations happen in rural communities as in larger urban communities," said Deb Hinde, a member of the congregation. "Before this past month, we may have ignored these questions, believing they didn't apply to us.

"We are beginning to educate ourselves more, and we are learning there is a distinction between not being racist and the concept of being anti-racist.

John Skoglund, owner of the Talking Waters Brewing Co. downtown, hopes those conversations continue in the community.

"I think it's opened up some eyes," he said. "I hope it has."

But, he added, "A lot of it is, 'That's those people in the big city. That's why I live here.' "

While the charging of former Minneapolis Police officer Derek Chauvin for the death of George Floyd under the felony-murder doctrine has been applauded by many, it has also drawn criticism. Unfortunately, when it comes to disenfranchised men of color, prosecutors have used this charging mechanism for decades without scrutiny or hesitation. Among the many systemic problems George Floyd's killing should expose are the inequities of the Minnesota felony-murder doctrine as it is most frequently applied: against men of color.

The top count brought against Mr. Chauvin is felony-murder. That is not a designation that the murder is a felony-level offense - all murders are felonies under Minnesota statute. Instead, this refers to an old English common law rule providing that if a defendant commits an underlying felony and that felony causes a death, his intent to commit the underlying felony can substitute for his intent to commit the murder.

Common law has developed several limitations to the felony-murder doctrine, but the rules are different in every state. Most states recognize a "merger" limitation that bars felony-murder prosecutions when the underlying felony is assault. In these states, felony-murder applies only to crimes like arson and burglary that do not involve physical assault but still lead to a victim's death. In Minnesota, however, assault may serve as the underlying felony.

Absent the merger limitation, Minnesota law empowers prosecutors to use felony-murder in ways that exacerbate well-known racial disparities.

Sometimes it is used to obtain a murder conviction against a person of color when the facts would not otherwise support one. Frequently, it is charged as a lesser-included count to intentional murder, giving the jury a way to compromise and still convict for murder. Most troubling, it is often used merely as a tool

Greg Egan: Minnesota needs to change its 'felony-murder' doctrine. Racial inequities are one reason in plea negotiations to dissuade a defendant from going to trial given the risk of 40 years in prison if he declines to plead guilty to a lesser count.

Regardless of prosecutors' motivations in bringing a felony-murder charge, there has been little outcry against the charging scheme when it is weaponized against defendants of color, who I have represented for nearly 15 years as a Ramsey County public defender.

Troublingly, often in felony-murder prosecutions, the facts and intellectual charging schemes prosecutors rely on are more of a stretch than here, where Mr. Chauvin is filmed slowly kneading the life out of Mr. Floyd. My clients of color have faced felony-murder charges merely for flashing a pistol in their waistband that someone else grabbed and killed a bystander with, or for laying a rifle across their lap that accidentally went off and killed a friend walking up the front steps.

I am also an adjunct law professor. In 2018, I wrote what was at that time an obscure academic article for the Mitchell Hamline Law Review on the felony-murder doctrine. No one heeded my call to rethink the law - no one until now, when a white police officer, whose conduct is far more egregious, is at the center of the controversy.

Suddenly, now Harvard professors are citing my article and joining the chorus of others in the academic community calling for change.

Tragic as the events surrounding George Floyd's death are, the momentous calls for reform are heartening. Reform in policing is not enough, however, to protect Mr. Floyd's community and honor his memory. Poising the system to finally punish police officers who kill is not enough either. We need to talk about how to equitably prosecute the white peace officer and the young black man who does not enjoy his privilege.

I have called upon policy makers, in particular the Minnesota Supreme Court, to adopt a merger limitation to the felony-murder doctrine. This would prevent all felony-murder charges that rely on assault as the underlying felony. That is because I disagree with how prosecutors have applied the doctrine against my disenfranchised clients of color.

It is easy to praise Attorney General Keith Ellison for bringing tough charges against Mr. Chauvin. I believe Mr. Chauvin should face harsh consequences, and I agree in spirit with what Mr. Ellison is trying to do. I certainly did not write my law review article to protect him or other officers who abuse their authority. I do, however, believe that the law, imperfect as it is, must be equitably applied. That is the cornerstone of our democracy and what sets our country and our state apart from other places in this world where the law is less certain, less reliable, less just.

But the law now is deeply flawed, and applying it against Mr. Chauvin will not undo the decades of hurt the felony-murder charging practices have inflicted on communities of color, particularly young black men. More likely, it will only make things worse.

The Supreme Court of Minnesota or the state Legislature should seize this moment to see the larger picture, re-evaluate the inequities of Minnesota's felony-murder doctrine, and adopt a merger limitation - not to protect men who look like Mr. Chauvin, but to protect men who look like Mr. Floyd.

BUSINESSES CONFRONT INGRAINED HIRING BIASES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 1138 wordsByline: JACKIE CROSBY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: George Floyd's death and its aftermath has become a moment of workplace reckoning.Body

Lisa Bryant has a master's degree in communications and a résumé full of experience. But after getting laid off during the 2008 recession, she struggled to land a full-time job with the pay and benefits that matched her skills.

"I sent out résumés, I'd go through multiple interviews and think: Yes! I have this job," she said. "But it just didn't happen."

Something more subtle and insidious may have been at play for Bryant - racial bias.

"I'm a woman of color in a predominantly white field," Bryant said, who is black. "There were times when I walked in the room and things changed. Maybe, because my name is Lisa Bryant, I wasn't who they expected. Once I sense that, I start fumbling my words and everything goes downhill."

Despite decades of training programs and talk of diversifying the workforce, study after study shows that efforts to reduce racial bias have failed to meaningfully change the status quo.

With national and international protests sparked by the killing of George Floyd by Minneapolis police a month ago, businesses of all sizes are re-examining the persistent presence of systemic racism.

In a survey of 150 companies released last week by the global hiring firm Challenger, Gray & Christmas, Inc., 85% of human resource managers said they had discussed Floyd's death with their teams. Nearly 60% had scheduled ongoing discussions of race.

"Leadership seems to understand the importance of recruiting diverse candidates, but do not view executing on this as a problem in their talent pipelines," Andrew Challenger, senior vice president of Challenger, Gray & Christmas, said of his firm's findings. "They seem to ignore the hiring biases in place that are impacting recruiting diverse candidates."

It's a scenario Shawn Lewis has seen play out as a former workforce manager at the Urban League Twin Cities and in decades of working with organizations on economic and social equity.

"Our system is closed and people don't want to talk about it," Lewis said. "People hire people who reflect their values, reflect their culture, who they understand and are comfortable with. Usually it's people who look like them."

Lewis, who also is black, has known Bryant since college. He saw her determination as she juggled several consulting jobs with small nonprofits, picked up freelance writing jobs and resorted to getting part-time work as a Walmart cashier and a call center worker to pay the bills.

When he heard about a well-paying job at a company whose leader had been talking for years about hiring more people of color, he urged that executive to talk to Bryant.

"I look at my own career path and I always had an advocate," Lewis said. "If you don't have that advocate you're lost. You're out there looking for a job and it's a shot in dark."

Facing hard truth

The executive Lewis introduced to Bryant, Mike Harley, for 24 years has led Environmental Initiative, a Minneapolis-based firm that works with businesses and government on environmental issues. A few years ago, Harley said the 22-person company had what he called "a moment of reckoning."

"We had to confront this reality that communities of color - Native Americans, African-Americans, Hispanics - suffer a disproportionate share of pollution and the health impacts," he said. "How is it that the people most impacted by the focus of our work are not represented inside organizations that are advocating for the change?"

Harley described the disconnection as an existential problem for what has been a "white-led movement" of environmentalists.

"What it is that results in a mostly white staff, with rooms full of mostly white people - mostly men, mostly older, mostly college educated, mostly urban?" he asked.

Harley made a deliberate effort to expand his network, get to know people of color. That's when he met Lewis, who is an environmental justice consultant.

"I'll be honest," Harley said. "He and other leaders were quite critical of an organization that professed to be concerned with equity, yet still was lagging in a staff that reflects the kind of racial and cultural diversity we need to be impactful."

In response to such criticism, Harley took a hard look at the words his organization used in job postings and saw shortcomings.

"The language we use makes a lot of sense to us. It comes from a particular profile in society, mostly white, generally with a particular education and work path," he said. "It's not so much that we don't hire people of color - they don't apply. They look at it and say 'It's not for me.' "

Harley's sense is that for lasting change to occur, white business executives and policymakers must lead the way.

Businesses confront ingrained hiring biases

When Lewis heard that Environmental Initiative was looking for a new communications manager this spring, he told Harley about Bryant. "She may not have all the things you want, but get to know her so that when it's time to make a hire, you're not coming in cold," Lewis recalls telling Harley.

Bryant and Harley met. And two weeks ago, Bryant started the job, becoming for now the firm's only black employee.

"It's a position outside my area of focus," she said. "But through the link with Shawn, we realized it's a good fit."

Harley said it's not lost on him that it took someone like Lewis to explain that just because Bryant didn't check all the boxes of a traditional hire - she had no experience in environmental work - that she was worth interviewing.

"She didn't see our job posting randomly and respond," Harley said. "It was put in front of her by someone whom she trusted. And her résumé was put in front of us by someone we trusted."

Change takes time

As business leaders take time to assess unconscious biases in their hiring practices and workplace culture, he cautions that it may take time to make lasting change.

"For us, it took patience to try to understand what about our organization creates barriers and to deeply examine what might be producing these hiring patterns," he said. "Especially now, in the wake of the killing of George Floyd, there's an urgency to make change now. But sincerely getting at deep culture - that's long work."

Lewis said business leaders and recruiters have to think about racial bias whenever hiring decisions are made.

"It has to be conscious, because good people are otherwise going to be denied and locked out," he said. "There may be gaps in experience that shouldn't be held against people."

Bryant said the long job search taught her about the value of networking.

"I always thought, I can sell myself, I've shown I know how to get the job done for these organizations, and this is going to get me a job" she said. "What I wasn't doing, was connecting with the right people. I wasn't in [professional organizations] and networking. I think you do need to have a connection, someone who can make the link for you."

Length: 1718 words

Byline: CHIP SCOGGINS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

The list of names published with this column shows readers the power structures at the top of Minnesota's largest sports organizations. It took Minneapolis becoming the epicenter of a national awakening on race for me to examine that list in a different context, to pay attention to whom I was looking at, which is embarrassing to admit.

In April, our sports section published organizational flowcharts for the professional sports franchises in the Twin Cities and the Gophers athletic department. I already knew most of it. As I scanned it then, I saw names and job titles of key decision-makers. I didn't see race. It wasn't at the forefront of my thought process.

A lot has changed since then.

The world has changed.

The Twin Cities has changed.

That list must change.

What I see now is a dearth of diversity in leadership for those seven sports organizations. No head coaches of color. Only one person of color among executives in the highest positions. Only a handful in other executive roles. A largely homogeneous portrait of top executives and sports-focused leadership positions in sports that have a high percentage of athletes who are minorities.

This is the time to change that. Especially here, of all places here, the starting point to what feels like a global revolution.

Those organizations need to prioritize diversity in their hiring not just because a spotlight now is shining brightly but because it's the right thing to do.

This isn't a case of casting stones. My sports department employs five white columnists and a team of reporters and editors that is mostly white to chronicle athletes with different perspectives and backgrounds.

To those in power positions: Be bold

Conversations about workplace diversity have taken place inside organizations for years, but the timing now brings more urgency to act.

Our local sports entities already are leading the way with an exemplary response to the killing of George Floyd. They have donated millions of dollars to confront systemic racism and social injustices. They have reconsidered their histories, created scholarships in Floyd's name, started new programs to support kids, and committed financial and human resources to make sure the message and intensity of this moment in history do not wane.

I have no doubt those organizations are unified in their resolve to effect change. More steps, ones that change and add to the faces of leadership in Minnesota sports, are necessary.

The Vikings have been pioneers among sports franchises in investing in minority leadership. In 1992, the organization made Dennis Green the second black head coach in modern NFL history. Former Chief Operating Officer Kevin Warren was the highest-ranking black executive on the business side of an NFL team before being named Big Ten commissioner last June.

Teams like the Vikings that have lost diversity in leadership need to reinvest. Other organizations need to take a deep look at who they want to be. Leadership needs to reflect different viewpoints and experiences. Teams bring athletes and employees of so many different backgrounds and beliefs together, and these people need to see the same in their bosses.

The University of Iowa football program was exposed recently when former black players came forward to say they felt mistreated and marginalized during their careers. In response, longtime coach Kirk Ferentz admitted to having a "blind spot." An honest but alarming answer.

The annual Racial and Gender Report Card authored by Richard Lapchick monitors hiring trends in sports. In the recently released report for 2019, every major pro league and NCAA college program received at least a B letter grade in racial hiring practices. A few of those grades dropped - most notably the NFL's - when only factoring head coaches and general managers.

Lapchick's executive summary mentioned Floyd's death and noted that "the importance of measuring where we are in terms of race in sport became even more critical."

"It is paramount that professional leagues and college sport increase diverse and inclusive hiring practices when hiring league employees, front office and team professionals, and university administrators alike," the report states.

If billionaire sports owners truly want diversity in their leadership teams, they can make it happen. They set the agenda for how their organizations look and operate. It comes down to being intentional and committed to hiring diverse leaders.

One idea: Create new jobs. Organizations do that all the time when they identify talented people they want to hire. Every team has expanded its leadership group in recent years, for positions it valued.

A good example: The Timberwolves created a new position of vice president of community engagement in 2017 in order to hire former Gophers standout John Thomas, who has been a valuable and visible presence in conversations about social justice since Floyd's killing.

To those in power positions: Be bold

The Wolves have been progressive in hiring different ethnicities in executive roles, including President of Basketball Operations Gersson Rosas, a Colombia native and the only Latino to hold his title in the NBA.

Gophers athletic director Mark Coyle inherited an almost exclusively white team of top administrators and head coaches when hired, with only two people of color currently in those positions.

Coyle announced a four-year diversity and inclusion plan that expires in 2023, and now is the right time to put that plan into practice. He has a vacant senior administrator position. This is a big opportunity. Hire a person of color to help oversee community outreach and the department's day-to-day operation.

One recent conversation opened my eyes. Protests were raging after Floyd's death when I called legendary Minneapolis high school basketball coach Larry McKenzie. He was emotional and worried about his players. He had scheduled a Zoom call with the entire team. I asked what he planned to tell them.

Education, he said. Focus on that so that someday they can have "an entry into the rooms where decisions are made."

He doesn't just want his players to get a job someday. His aim: change-makers, representation, leaders with strong voices. This is too important, right now, for this not to be a priority in Minnesota.

81 POSITIONS, EIGHT PEOPLE OF COLOR

The powerful group of owners, executives and head coaches who call the shots across Minnesota sports is nearly all white. The Star Tribune compiled a list of the top positions at the highest levels of the state's sports: pro and NCAA Division I. Of the 81 positions on this list, eight are held by people of color.

A majority of the athletes in five of these seven organizations - the Lynx, Vikings, Timberwolves, Twins and United - are people of color. Three of those organizations - the Lynx, Vikings and Twins - have no racial diversity at the highest levels of leadership.

The Star Tribune focused on the organizations' top executives and sports-focused leaders, such as general managers and head coaches, for this analysis.

TWINS

- Jim Pohlada, chairman of the board
- Dave St. Peter, president and chief executive

STAR TRIBUNE TOP WORK PLACES 2020

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 28, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPECIAL; Pg. 23Length: 1732 wordsByline: CATHERINE ROBERTS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: LEADERSHIP // Turning crisis into opportunity // Top Workplaces special-award winners explain how leadership sets the tone amid new challenges.Body

One10 developed a Work Your Way program five years ago that allows employees to set their own schedules and workspace - whether it's the office, home or a coffee shop.

"Our commitment to trust, respect and fairness allowed us to develop this program that was not only equitable for all employees but leads to highly effective business outcomes," said Bob Miller, CEO of the brand marketing firm with a workforce of 179.

So when COVID-19 took hold in the U.S. in March and states including Minnesota enacted stay-at-home orders, One10 had already conquered one obstacle that many other companies faced. That allowed its leaders to focus on the economic disruptions that the pandemic caused.

The pandemic put company officials across the state and nation into crisis-management mode as the theme of the year turned from growth to uncertainty, testing leadership across the board. The death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody on Memorial Day added another layer of uncertainty as a national conversation on equity has emerged.

The upper hand that Top Workplaces winners might have in a crisis-management situation is that they have a culture that values communication and employee innovation, according to this year's employee surveys.

That culture is fundamental to building a business that can be innovative and growth-driven, said Mary Grove, a Minnesota venture capitalist and keynote speaker for the Star Tribune Top Workplaces event on June 24. Grove spent 15 years at Google, six of them as a leader of its entrepreneurship program.

The disruption caused by the pandemic - and the more recent push for racial justice after the death of George Floyd - is a chance to enhance a company's workplace culture, basing it on innovation from the ground up and data-driven tracking.

Teamwork and communication have been harder than ever as companies have switched to telecommuting, but "muscle memory is strong and the lessons can be used to build a new structure as offices reopen, Grove said.

Many leaders among Top Workplaces' special-award winners also see this as a window of opportunity to improve both themselves as managers and their workplaces.

"If you don't already, show your human side with employees. Crisis situations are stressful and may result in difficult business decisions," said Miller, whose company ranked 41st among midsize businesses on the Top Workplaces list. "Continue to make employees feel valued and appreciated as you remind them you are doing the best you can with their well-being at the center."

Listening to others

Jerry Baack, CEO of Bridgewater Bank and winner of one of this year's leadership awards, said that during a crisis, it is essential to have a vision for your organization and be transparent about what the goals are, prioritize action steps, clearly assign responsibilities and always reward success.

A positive attitude also is important, even though tough business decisions or conversations might be ahead, he said.

Now more than ever, he said, it is important for an organization to let everyone have a voice, said Baack, whose bank ranked 29th on the list of midsize businesses.

"I am just one voice in this organization, and I am also human. I am a white male in a leadership role, so I will be honest when I say I have a lot to learn," he said. "I am one person, and not an expert when it comes to pandemics or race relations. I like to think my leadership style of people-first means I am taking this time to listen to others."

Through these talks, and with the communication skills learned during the pandemic and economic downturn, companies can inform a culture of both inclusion and innovation.

"Fundamentally that boils down to two things: trust and transparency," Grove said. Companies must trust employees and give them the power to try new things that may fail.

"If it doesn't work, make a course correction," she said.

The key is doing what must be done in the crisis, communicating in a straightforward way, and then finding opportunities for the future in what may seem a morass.

"COVID-19 and the equity discussions around George Floyd are opportunities to do better and be better. Instead of focusing on the negativity, let's look for opportunities to be better leaders, better partners, better parents, better co-workers and just better people overall," said Evan Francen, CEO of FRSecure and winner of the leadership award for small businesses. "Let's hope we don't waste these opportunities to effect real and positive change."

An organization needs to be responsive to employees' needs, for example in crisis times making sure they have the support structure both at work and at home to be the best worker they can be, Francen said.

That care comes first, but not at the expense of taking a hard financial look at the business as well, he said. A company needs to check how much cash is on hand and then come up with a plan for stability in the short term. It also needs to assess if it can deliver what was promised to clients. For the long term, brand equity is important as is an assessment of whether the market for products will change.

Francen believes his servant-leadership style of managing, based on his religious beliefs, has helped him do the hard work while keeping his staff and customers front of mind.

Values front and center

Paul Blom, CEO of Right at Home, which is this year's "Doers" award winner, said a servant-leadership philosophy also has helped him navigate COVID-19, especially since the home-care agency's employees were deemed essential workers.

His employees counted on him and his team to provide the most accurate information about the virus and how to protect themselves from it. Blom said procuring personal protective equipment from the beginning was key to his employees' trust, as well as "overcommunicating" the most recent updates.

The unrest following George Floyd's death added more immediate issues for Right at Home, because some of its caregivers and clients lived in the area around Lake Street, the epicenter of looting and violence in the week after Floyd's death.

Making sure that access was safe, transportation was solid and employees and clients had what they needed are key in a situation like that, he and other leaders said.

In a crisis, an organization's values move to the front and center, said Sean Chuah, regional director of operations for Panda Restaurant Group, winner of the special award for "Clued-In Senior Management."

Panda's philosophy nationally is "people first," and that translates to putting both employees and customers at the forefront of decisions. Relying on that was a clear direction for Panda during both the Great Recession and the pandemic, Chuah said.

"I learned that regardless of the situation, always focus on the fundamentals of our business," he said.

Some of Panda's locations shut down because of stay-at-home orders meant to stem the spread of the coronavirus. Panda did not furlough anyone, and in regions where restaurants stayed open, the company invested $25 million for enhanced pay and benefits and safety measures at the restaurants.

"During times of crisis, leading with care is essential to ensure people's well-being," Chuah said.

People first

Retail consultant J.L. Buchanan, which won the "New Ideas" special award, has been a "results-only environment" for more than 10 years, said interim CEO Lana Jones. That means the company evaluates employees on what they do, not where they are, which helped when its employees had to start working from home and changing the way they interacted with clients.

"Put your people first and trust them," she said. At the same time, an organization in a crisis needs to reduce as much fear and anxiety as possible through good communication and a strong mission.

In that vein, as a business adjusts to the reality of any downturn, it needs to avoid "ready-fire-aim," meaning it needs to make sure that short-term adjustments aren't detrimental to long-term goals, Jones said.

"Be transparent, collaborative and caring. People are smart, intuitive, and know what is happening in times of crisis," she said. "Bring them into the discussions and decisions as much as possible. Even if they are personally impacted, and may certainly not like the outcome, they will understand how you got there."

J.D. Harris, CEO of information technology firm Ascent Solutions, winner of the "Values" special award, also stressed that a company cannot undercommunicate during times of crisis.

"The biggest lesson I learned from the Great Recession that I've leveraged now is that we need to be very planful for all scenarios, good and bad, growth or otherwise," he said. "However, we also need to make decisions based on what we know today - not on speculation for the future. So far, that has served me and Ascent well and helped us to not over-rotate one way or another."

If you plan for both positive and negative scenarios, a firm has room to make sound decisions in a crisis, to "breathe and make a plan" instead of panic, Harris said. Those decisions must be based in stark facts, and leadership must continue to push people toward their specific goals.

"We underestimate too often how intelligent and motivated our teams are," said Harris, who adheres to data-driven evaluation.

A crisis, if managed in people-centered ways, can bring out the best in employees to lead a company forward, said Bridgewater Bank's Baack.

And as companies evaluate future workplace policies, employees and leaders alike will know they can speak honestly about what works best for them.

"I have learned that I was not meant to work from home," Baack said. "While I love my kids and my wife, I really like my office and the energy of our team. I'm counting down the days to the opening of our new corporate center on Excelsior Boulevard in St. Louis Park and getting our team back together under one roof."

MINNEAPOLIS GUN VIOLENCE ADDS TO CRISES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 28, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1571 wordsByline: LIBOR JANY; LIZ SAWYER; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The wail of sirens starts long before nightfall.

Gunfire erupted in broad daylight next to a north Minneapolis park as dozens of kids played last Monday, injuring four people. Barely 90 minutes later, bullets tore through four more victims at a notorious intersection along West Broadway, apparently in retaliation for the earlier shooting. All told, 10 were wounded in four separate shootings that day - all before the sun went down.

The bloodshed came one day after gunmen unleashed more than 70 rounds on a crowded Uptown street, continuing a spate of violence that has killed eight and injured at least 118 people since Memorial Day.

Officials blame the grim trend on the coronavirus pandemic, shattered public trust following the killing of George Floyd and the reluctance of some Minneapolis officers to take initiative amid intense scrutiny. But the violent surge is also becoming a political litmus test for the Minneapolis City Council, a majority of which continues to call for defunding the police.

Some council members and activists see the focus on crime stats as a way to stoke public fears and distract from the issue of police reform, while law enforcement supporters contend the recent scourge only reinforces the need for effective policing.

"We're not going to move in any way that makes people less safe," Council Member Jeremiah Ellison told frustrated Jordan neighborhood residents at a meeting to address the violence.

Ellison, among the most vocal proponents of dismantling the city's police force, assured constituents that "resources and tools they have at their disposal" would not be stripped from officers until an alternative, robust public safety strategy can take their place. Another North Side council member, Phillippe Cunningham, says he helped orchestrate an emergency meeting of gang leaders to address the ongoing violence.

Minneapolis gun violence adds to crises

So far this year, ShotSpotter activations and 911 calls about gunshots in Minneapolis have more than doubled from a year ago, according to a Star Tribune analysis of police data. Out of 3,218 such shots-fired calls this year, nearly half have been filed since George Floyd was killed on May 25.

Through Tuesday, 190 people had been shot across Minneapolis. That's up 47% from this time last year and significantly higher than the five-year average for the same time span, according to MPD data.

In one case that underscores how entrenched the problem is, authorities say a 17-year-old boy who was shot in the leg last week has been wounded in three shootings over the past month and a half.

The surge in gun violence is not confined to Minneapolis. In St. Paul, reported firearm discharges have more than doubled when compared to this time last year. The first two weeks of June were particularly violent, as shots-fired calls quintupled from 2019.

Thirty-one people in the capital city have been shot in the last month alone - a third of the year's overall victim count. Homicides are already on track to surpass 2019's all-time high in shooting deaths.

"My fear is that this is just the beginning," said Steven Belton, president of the Twin Cities Urban League, while visiting the scene of a quadruple shooting near Merwin's Liquors in north Minneapolis. "Parents are overwhelmed," he said, likening the financial and emotional toll of COVID-19 to a "pressure cooker." "People are unemployed, stressed out because of that ... looking for a way to release it."

Thurman Barnes, assistant director of the New Jersey Center on Gun Violence Research, a think tank based out of Rutgers University, said the ripple effects from Floyd's death may have contributed to increasing violence in Minneapolis, much as it did in Baltimore after the in-custody death of Freddie Gray in 2015. Floyd's case, he pointed out, followed the deaths of Breonna Taylor and Ahmaud Arbery in Kentucky and Georgia, respectively, two other widely publicized killings of African-Americans.

"There is sometimes a sense of lawlessness" that comes after high-profile killings that is steeped in distrust of police, said Barnes, who's an associate professor in the university's department of public health. "Now we're supposed to trust the police to protect and serve, we're supposed to abide by the law?"

Minneapolis police chief of staff Art Knight said he understood the public outrage over police brutality and Floyd's death but slammed city leaders for turning a blind eye to "the violence in this community."

"It's pretty sad," Knight said. "When cops do something wrong, we're going to hold them accountable, but you can't have 111 people shot, man, that's crazy."

Law enforcement officials say feuding street gangs are largely to blame for the chaos. Those individuals aren't beholden to shuttered businesses and schools, or affected by Gov. Tim Walz's peacetime emergency order.

"What they do is personal and it's driven by social media," said Ramsey County undersheriff Mike Martin, who serves as president of the Minnesota chapter of the Midwest Gang Investigators Association. "They're still driving around selling dope on the street, but now they can wear face masks and not look out of place."

Some youths appear emboldened by the ability to conceal their identities in public, Martin said, posting videos online flaunting cash and drugs, "laughing like it's a game of cops and robbers."

Minneapolis gun violence adds to crises

Investigators are still sorting out what led to recent shootings, but the working theory is that most were the result of ongoing gang feuds - between north Minneapolis gangs, but also street crews from St. Paul. For instance, officials suspect that members of the High End-affiliated gang were involved in Sunday's mass shooting in Uptown, in which officials say that at least half of the 11 victims were from St. Paul.

The following day, someone opened fire on a group of Low End gang members gathered at a makeshift memorial next to North Commons Park, while dozens of children were playing nearby. About an hour and a half later, a shootout left four people injured at the Winner gas station, a known High End hangout whose reputation for violence has earned it the grim nickname, "the Murder Station." Detectives are exploring the possibility that that shooting was in retaliation for the earlier attack.

Historically, violent crime tends to escalate around this time of the year, not only because schools are out and the warmer weather is drawing more people outside, but because so many gang death anniversaries fall during these months. The dates are emblazoned in the minds of every patrol officer working the streets, since vigils meant to honor those dead and gone sometimes attract further violence.

As a result, police have stepped up enforcement in neighborhoods that have traditionally had the highest rates of violent crime, with help from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and the Hennepin County Sheriff's office. Mayor Jacob Frey also called on the FBI and Secret Service to step in.

But not all diversion methods require police intervention, advocates say.

Sasha Cotton, who runs Minneapolis' Office of Violence Prevention, said that non-law enforcement strategies have proved successful in stopping gang retaliations, singling out hospital-based intervention programs and so-called "violence interrupters" - former gang members who have retained the respect of youths and still have an ear to the street, allowing them to step in and help defuse disagreements before they escalate into gunfire. She also pointed to the civilian patrols that sprang up during the civil unrest that followed Floyd's death.

"Even with a small investment, we're able to do really significant work," Cotton said in a Zoom panel discussion with Cities United, a national organization dedicated to ending violence among African-American men. "We saw them redirect things, like potential carjackings and drug distribution and gang violence, in the way that police never would be able to."

One of the strategies already in place in Minneapolis is Group Violence Intervention (GVI), an offshoot of the well-regarded Ceasefire program used in other cities to fight gang violence.

In Ramsey County, officials are pursuing a similar approach after years of debate, recently applying for a $180,000 federal grant to implement their own version of GVI. A coalition of black community organizations in St. Paul submitted a separate grant application to fund similar initiatives. It's unclear how many projects will be bankrolled and when a decision will be made.

If the city's application is approved, the grant would fund a dedicated violence prevention coordinator, like Cotton in Minneapolis.

"It's great, but I worry we're putting all of our eggs in that basket," said Ramsey County Attorney John Choi. "We can't have a summer like we had last year."

Responding to the uprising after the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis and the COVID-19 pandemic, 50 of Minnesota's most prolific and well-known artists and writers raise their voices in a new anthology, "A Moment of Silence."

Excerpts from the anthology will be released online on Wednesday, July 1, at blackmnvoices.com. Access is free and open to the public, but donations to contributing artists are requested.

Curated and edited by actor, director and playwright Sha Cage, it is presented by the Playwrights' Center and Tru Ruts, an organization that produces and elevates BIPOC art and narratives in the Twin Cities. (BIPOC means Black, indigenous, people of color.) The project's partners are Harry Waters Jr., Marlon James, Danez Smith and the Red Eye Collaboration.

"The anthology shines a light on a rich Minnesota literary community of leaders, activists, politicians, mothers, scholars, youth, and elders who speak truth and resilience at a time when it is needed most," says Cage. "Daily our existence as Black bodies in White space is threatened. Daily we lift up our joy, our truths and our voices as an act of resistance."

Contributors to "A Moment of Silence" are artistic directors, playwrights, performance artists, storytellers, musicians, rappers, actors and authors writing across genres, styles, cultural identities and generations. Among them are Toki Wright, Northando Zulu, Alexis Pate, Stacey Rose, Sagirah Shahid, Marlon James, Chaka Mkali, Douglas Kearney, Valerie Ddeus, Harrison Rivers, Sarah White, Carlyle Brown and others.

Included in Cage's production team are Otis Ramsey-Zoe, Sonitha Tep, Adja Gildersleeve, Regina Williams, and E.G. Bailey.

FLOODED WITH $6.2M IN DONATIONS, LAKE STREET COUNCIL TWEAKS POLICIES TO MANAGE DISBURSEMENT

When the Lake Street Council raised about 10 times more in a few weeks than it normally receives in a year to help rebuild riot-torn businesses, the nonprofit had a problem.

After unrest following the police killing of George Floyd ripped apart broad swaths of Lake Street, the Lake Street Council, which assists businesses in the corridor, raised more than $6.2 million to assist the rebuilding efforts.

But the small 501c3 didn't have the staff or infrastructure to handle doling out that much money. And since the council had pledged that 100% of the donations would go directly towards damaged or destroyed businesses, it wasn't entirely clear that the organization could use some of it on additional staffing and related expenses to handle the workload.

Accounting standards for nonprofits state that funds raised from campaigns need to be applied for the described purpose. So, council executives reached out to some of its largest donors for permission to use a portion of their donations for in-house expenses, which they agreed to, and the nonprofit changed its campaign language to note that it may use some funds for personnel.

"At the beginning of the campaign, our website stated that 100% of funds would go to rebuilding Lake Street, including business grants, which we believed included the costs of implementing the grant program," said Allison Sharkey, the council's executive director. "We were then advised that in order to be very clear and correct, we needed to clarify our language as it pertained to further donations. We also checked with some of our major donors to ensure they were in agreement with the proposed uses of funds."

The $6.2 million it raised was roughly ten times more than the $613,000 in revenue LSC reported in the most recent reporting period. LSC also had a payroll of roughly $250,000 for five people, according to its most recent 990 tax filing.

Since clarifying how funds can be used, LSC has hired four contractors to help with processing grant applications and related functions and is looking for a few more.

The first round of applications opened June 18, and LSC has received dozens of applications so far, Sharkey said.

While initial phases of rebuilding Lake Street are underway, Sharkey predicted it'll be a long process.

"It's going to take at least five years to rebuild Lake Street," she said. "We're sure there's probably hundreds of millions of dollars of need."

At least one other local nonprofit has experienced similar issues with an influx of cash. The Minnesota Freedom Fund, a bail fund that earlier this month only had one full-time employee, has raised more than $30 million alone since George Floyd's death on May 25.

Highlight: Wellington Management committed to rebuilding apartment development destroyed in riots

Body

Flames that engulfed a six-story apartment building under construction in south Minneapolis in the days following the death of George Floyd in police custody on May 25 were so hot they cracked and warped the precast concrete panels at the base of the building. Even the concrete footings beneath that parking level were damaged.

"We have to start over," said developer David Wellington, as he surveyed the wreckage of the building in the days following the riots.

He and his father, Steve, spent more than five years planning Midtown Corner, a 189-unit apartment building with rents below market rate that is part of a multiphase redevelopment project in the area, and he will spend nearly the next two years rebuilding it.

The building was among more than 1,500 structures in the Twin Cities that were destroyed or damaged during the riots in late May. While Midtown Corner sustained some of the worst - and most expensive - damage, it is one of the first to get rebuilt. Wellington and other property owners in the city are still assessing the damage and negotiating with insurance companies, if they had coverage, and it is still too soon to tell how many buildings will get eventually be rebuilt.

"At this point many property owners are just trying to figure out things and trying to get a sense of what they're working with,"

said Elena Gaarder, president of the Metropolitan Consortium of Community Developers and a longtime resident of that part of south Minneapolis. "Reanimating that space and reimagining that corridor is going to take a long time."

Wellington's St. Paul-based company has been one of the most prolific locally based developers in the Twin Cities. The company owns and manages more than 100 commercial buildings in the metro, including a half-dozen properties in the Lake and Hiawatha corridor, which was the epicenter of the unrest.

'we believe strongly in ... that community'

He said bids and estimates are still rolling in, but at this point the company estimates that several buildings owned by the company sustained well over $30 million in combined damages during several nights of rioting and unrest, and he is committed to rebuilding all of them. Midtown Corner accounted for about half of that total.

In the days following the protests, as the fires still smoldered, Wellington said there was no doubt in his mind that they would try to rebuild. The decision wasn't theirs alone. There were investors, insurance companies and others who were all part of the decisionmaking process. And the company had already made significant investments in the area over the past several years, so pulling out was never a priority.

"Many of our buildings didn't burn down," said Wellington. "We believe strongly in that area and that community, so we're just trying to find a way to recommit ourselves to building it [the community] back."

Wellington said that only hours after Floyd's murder, it was clear that tensions were rising and the Midtown Corner building, which was just a few months from completion, was vulnerable.

"I knew the energy was building from the rightful anger and frustration and sadness and pain [of the community]," he said.

Crews had recently finished assembling the upper five floors of the building, a mostly wood-framed structure that atop a street-level concrete base with one level of underground parking. Though the structure was complete, the building lacked windows and was unoccupied at night. And the building, which was just a few blocks from the Minneapolis Police Third Precinct station at 3000 S. Minnehaha Av., was just a week or two from having a fire suppression system installed.

Wellington feared that if the building caught fire, little could be done to prevent its spread to neighboring structures, including a fully occupied apartment building.

On the second day of protests, as the fires and looting worsened, Wellington and a construction crew spent the day trying to secure the site. He deployed a team of security guards with hand-held fire extinguishers to patrol the building, and warned city officials and the fire department that the building was a "tinderbox that could burn up quickly," he said.

When it was clear the situation was out of control, Wellington ordered the security guards to abandon the building. Wellington, who lives not far from the area and could hear the sirens and see the smoke, sat in his car with his father watching the building burn.

"It's hard to comprehend the impact that specific moment has on the next several years of our life," he said. "But the fundamental feeling we all have is deep sadness for what happened to George Floyd."

Wellington spent the next two nights in the area trying to monitor the condition of the buildings. At the Hi-Lake Shopping Center, fire broke out several times and burned for days. Other holdings in the area including Blue Line Flats, a 135-unit apartment building for low-income renters, were slightly vandalized, but survived intact. With power out and thick smoke filling the air, Wellington and his staff loaded residents of Lake Street Station, a 64-unit apartment building for low-income seniors the company developed in 2015, into their cars and evacuated them to a hotel in Roseville for several days.

"The lack of a police presence was making everyone very concerned, especially for those vulnerable seniors," he said.

'we believe strongly in ... that community'

By the morning after the fire started, photos of the fully engulfed Midtown Corner building had become a visual symbol of unrest in the city and Wellington was at the site surveying the damage.

The building was insured, but Wellington laments the delay in delivering much-needed rental housing for low-income renters. More than three dozen of the units were for very low-income residents, the rest of the 189 units would be made available at below market-rate rents.

"There is a deep housing shortage and this was a big loss to our community," said Allison Sharkey, executive director of the Lake Street Council. In addition to the damage at Midtown Corner, 35 families lost housing in other buildings damaged by fire in south Minneapolis, she said.

"It is very important to replace the homes and units that have been lost," she said.

Gaarder, who is part of the We Love Lake Street Fund Oversight Committee, which is organized by the Lake Street Council, has already raised more than $7 million to help businesses in the area rebuild. She said that immediately after the protests property owners were being contacted by out-of-the area investors who want to buy parcels for future redevelopment, so it's relief that Midtown Corner will get rebuilt and remain in the hands of local ownership.

Wellington, who has done several income-restricted rental projects throughout the Twin Cities on difficult-to-redevelop sites, says Midtown Corner will get rebuilt as originally planned, but he worries about the rest of the community. He's concerned that so many of the businesses that once occupied Lake Street won't get rebuilt, and that higher rents in new buildings will displace many of the businesses that have helped stabilize the neighborhood over the past several years.

"Our commitment to that neighborhood has been forged over several decades, but this isn't about us," he said. "The pain that's reverberating throughout the community is very real and very deep."

Early voting for Minnesota's Aug. 11 primary kicked off Friday. The state could see a jump in people voting by mail or at early polling locations over the next month and a half, as residents attempt to avoid Election Day crowds during the coronavirus pandemic.

The national spotlight has been on primary battles elsewhere, including Kentucky, where Democrats picked their challenger to compete with Senate Republican Majority Leader Mitch McConnell. And in New York, Democrats aimed to send Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez back to Congress along with newcomer and fellow progressive Jamaal Bowman.

Minnesota also has contested primary races, from Congress to the state Legislature. Here are some of the heated battles.

Contested primary races

U.S. Rep. Ilhan Omar will face off with Antone Melton-Meaux. A Federal Election Commission report of ActBlue donations showed Melton-Meaux raised $1.5 million in May. Omar, a prolific fundraiser whose campaign finance reports show a big cash advantage over Melton-Meaux, responded with a tweet saying, "When you push power, power pushes back."

In the divided Minnesota Legislature, there are interparty battles across the state. Democrats have a significant majority in the House, and Republicans hold the majority in the Senate by a smaller margin.

Democrats are dueling to occupy spots left open by retiring House members, including Laurie Halverson, of Eagan, and Ben Lien, of Moorhead. Incumbent DFL representatives also face challengers in the heart of the Twin Cities.

Rep. Ray Dehn, who represents parts of downtown and north Minneapolis, lost the DFL endorsement to attorney Esther Agbaje. Another lawyer, Athena Hollins, is opposing Rep. John Lesch, whose district includes St. Paul's North End and Payne-Phalen neighborhoods.

HOT DISH POLITICS

House Republicans have a rematch between former Rep. Bob Loonan and Erik Mortenson for a Shakopee-area seat. Mortenson beat the incumbent Loonan in the last primary but lost to DFL Rep. Brad Tabke.

Two Republicans - Marianne Stebbins, of Mound, and Andrew Myers, of Minnetonka Beach - are vying to take on Democratic Rep. Kelly Morrison, who represents many communities around Lake Minnetonka.

In the Senate, GOP Sen. Scott Jensen is retiring, leaving open the seat in the western suburbs that includes part of Chaska, Waconia, Watertown and Norwood Young America. Two Republicans and two Democrats are competing for the job.

Two incumbent Senate Democrats lost the party's endorsement to insurgents. Sen. Erik Simonson, who represents most of Duluth, will face off with endorsed attorney Jen McEwen.

And DFL-backed challenger Omar Fateh is attempting to unseat Sen. Jeff Hayden, who represents the south Minneapolis district where George Floyd was killed. Hayden has been at the forefront of the recent push for police accountability at the Capitol.

METRO TRANSIT MULLS POST-PANDEMIC ROUTE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 28, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 864 wordsByline: JANET MOORE; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Safety and the changing demands of ridership are among topics to be addressed.Body

For John McManus, a cutback in transit service because of the coronavirus is a minor inconvenience.

The St. Paul tech worker relies on the Green Line for his daily commute, but light-rail and bus service hours have been pared amid the COVID-19 outbreak. With limited hours, "if you miss a train, you're kind of screwed, you have to wait longer for the next one," McManus recently said with a shrug.

But Metro Transit officials are wondering how public transportation in the Twin Cities will recover once the coronavirus threat eases. And, as commuters grow accustomed to working from home and heightened cleanliness, will demand for transit service forever change?

"We're expecting a gradual return of ridership as the governor's directives soften and as the workforce gradually returns," said Metro Transit General Manager Wes Kooistra.

Longer term, "we'll have to show [people] transit is safe," Kooistra added. "We can do all the talking we want, but this has definitely heightened people's concerns."

When the outbreak took hold in the spring, the number of people taking public transportation plunged in the Twin Cities and beyond.

As of June 19, overall ridership was down 69% - with demand for bus service declining 62%, light rail 80% and Northstar commuter rail 98%. The bright spot appears to be a slight uptick recently in demand for local bus service, Kooistra said at a recent Metropolitan Council meeting.

As the contagion spread, Metro Transit cut service hours, stepped up cleaning on buses, trains and stations, limited the number of passengers on buses, and restricted trips to those deemed essential, such as job commutes and forays to the grocery store or medical appointments.

METRO TRANSIT MULLS POST-PANDEMIC ROUTE

More recently, Metro Transit began testing employees' temperatures. So far, 41 employees have tested positive for COVID-19, but no deaths have been reported.

Sneeze guards are being installed to protect drivers on buses that don't have permanent barriers protecting them. This will allow onboard fare collection again, a practice that was suspended with mandatory rear-door boarding. It's unclear how much fare revenue has plunged since March, but Metro Transit has described the decline as precipitous.

To help weather the challenges, Metro Transit received $214 million from the federal CARES Act to keep operating, part of a $25 billion bailout nationally. It's unclear whether more federal money is forthcoming.

In addition, the unrest following the death of George Floyd prompted Metro Transit to suspend service for up to a week to "protect riders and operators."

The Floyd-related protests, concentrated in the transit corridors of Lake Street and University Avenue, resulted in damage to nearly 100 bus shelters. It will cost about $1.9 million to repair them, an effort that began in earnest last week.

The pandemic and civil unrest come at a time when Metro Transit's operations had already attracted increased scrutiny among state lawmakers alarmed at increasing levels of serious crime on the Green and Blue light-rail lines. But as the contagion took hold, measures at the Capitol to improve passenger safety fizzled.

Now, an enduring challenge for transit systems will be attracting skittish riders back to the fold.

"People are fearful, for good reason," said Paul Skoutelas, president and CEO of the American Public Transportation Association. "Transit has been an industry hit hard by people's reluctance to use the systems, much like restaurants, movie theaters and professional sports" stadiums.

"Until there's a vaccine, people will be very wary," Skoutelas said. "We're taking every precaution for cleanliness, but [passengers] have to do their part by wearing masks and social distancing."

"We are still looking for a scientific study that indicates transit is unsafe," said Mary Morse Marti, executive director of Move Minneapolis. In cities with greater density, "you're not hearing reports that transit is unsafe. So the future of transit really depends on getting answers from sources of legitimate science."

Another unknown for transit systems is whether telecommuting is here to stay. A recent survey among 825 Metro Transit users found 58% are now working from home. Regarding safety, about half said they were neutral or unlikely to ride transit without access to a COVID-19 vaccine.

"We know the transit marketplace will change," Kooistra said. "We do expect employers to introduce workplace changes, like staggering work schedules and continuing teleworking."

But, as Amity Foster of the Twin Cities Transit Riders Union, which represents passengers, points out: "Our transit system isn't just for getting to work and back."

The wholesale disruption to transit is an opportune time to rethink how broader transportation systems work in a way that better serves customers, said Alice Grossman, senior policy analyst at the Eno Center for Transportation in Washington, D.C. That includes integrating bikes, walking, and more bus lanes to improve mobility.

Grossman notes that transit ridership has been declining for years - and that's been the case at Metro Transit, too.

"This is something we needed to solve anyway," she said.

POHLADS WEATHER STORMS TO SIT SOLIDLY IN CHARGE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 1CLength: 701 wordsByline: JIM SOUHAN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Among many vocal Twins fans, the name Pohlads long ago became synonymous with cheapness. As the team prepares for a long-delayed Opening Day, this is a good time to ask whether the Pohlads deserve their reputation.

Let's remove feelings and rely on facts.

Carl Pohlads bought the team in 1984 for $36 million. The team is now worth more than $1 billion, and his son Jim is the acting owner.

Jim's brothers, Bill and Bob, are members of the four-person executive board, along with CEO Dave St. Peter.

Carl earned a Purple Heart for wounds suffered in World War II. He built his early fortune in part by foreclosing on farms.

He installed Andy MacPhail as general manager of the Twins in 1985. MacPhail hired Tom Kelly to be his manager. In 1987 and 1991, the Twins won the only two major professional championships for men's teams in modern Minnesota history. Carl deserves full credit for the hires that made that happen.

In the early '90s, baseball began to change, and large-market teams like the Yankees began outspending small-market teams like the Twins by a vast margin. MacPhail, identifying the beginning of this trend, left the Twins for the Cubs after the 1994 season.

Pohlads did not increase spending to match the Yankees, and once the Twins' farm system began to struggle, the team fielded losing teams from 1993 through 2000. In a few of those years, Pohlads stripped the payroll to save money while Terry Ryan, MacPhail's replacement, relied on prospects.

The plan eventually worked when a group of young players headed by Torii Hunter and Cristian Guzman took the Twins to a division title and the ALCS in 2002 and the Twins dominated the AL Central for a decade.

Pohlads weather storms to sit solidly in charge

Pohlad sabotaged the family name by volunteering the Twins for contraction before the 2001 season, meaning baseball would eliminate the franchise and, it was believed, pay Pohlad an exit bonus.

Pohlad also tried sleight of hand while positioning the Twins for a new ballpark, inventing a potential purchaser in North Carolina and offering a donation to a new ballpark that turned out to be a loan.

Pohlad died on Jan. 5, 2009, and Jim Pohlad became the primary decisionmaking owner.

After another playoff appearance in 2010, the Twins began disappointing a new wave of fans who would grow angry that the Pohlads received taxpayer assistance to build Target Field but refused to compete with big-money teams for free agents.

Fact check: The Twins never promised to outspend the Yankees.

The Twins went into decline after Justin Morneau's career-altering concussion and Joe Mauer's ailments left the team without superstar production.

In fall 2016, the Twins replaced Ryan, who had returned for a second stint at GM, with Derek Falvey and Thad Levine. The team made the playoffs in 2017 and won the division while winning 101 games in 2019.

A year after signing Nelson Cruz as a free agent, the Twins signed star third baseman Josh Donaldson, giving them one of the best rosters in franchise history entering the 2020 season.

This summer, as other teams laid off workers, the Twins did not. In the wake of George Floyd's killing, the Twins donated $25 million to aid social justice and removed the statue of racist former owner Calvin Griffith.

The Pohlads have also spent their own money on Target Field updates and upgrades without asking for additional public funding.

Could the Pohlads spend more on payroll? Perhaps. Instead, they follow a formula typical throughout the industry and spend a certain percentage of revenue on player salaries.

Having watched owners across all sports operate for decades, my view is this:

Minnesota could have it a lot worse. The current Pohlads have helped keep Target Field among the best venues in sports, built a powerhouse front office and analytics department, supported charities integral to Minnesota and built a talented roster.

Unless baseball adopts a salary cap, the Twins will always be outspent by teams that generate more revenue. If that is your only measure of ownership, you will always be disappointed. If you judge the Pohlads on effective decisionmaking, they're on a pretty good run right now.

RENAMING THINGS

I have to disagree with D.J. Tice about Fort Bragg and other military installations that are named for Confederate generals ("With malice toward all, with charity for none," column, June 21). I do not approve of destroying statues, but as a matter of recognizing history, they should be removed from public places and moved to the Smithsonian or perhaps a local museum.

Gen. Braxton Bragg, in particular, is regarded as one of the worst of the Confederate generals. Perhaps we can keep Tice happy by forgiving and forgetting. Very well, I can forgive Gen. Bragg, and in the interest of forgetting him, let's rename Fort Bragg. Suppose, as Tice suggests, we choose a superbly accomplished military leader and field tactician who opposed the U.S. in war, such as Erwin Rommel, the German "Desert Fox." Fort Rommel. Bad idea? Yup, I think so too.

David M. Perlman, New Hope

...

Tice rightfully worries about a world that inverts Lincoln's heartfelt wish of malice toward none and charity for all. Yet, his commentary on the Dakota War of 1862 airbrushes the malice in the U.S. policy of starving innocent natives by withholding compensation for their treaty lands.

And, Tice's American exceptionalism is showing. At 655,000 dead, "one of humanity's bloodiest civil wars" (our own) pales before the body count of dozens of wars we've engineered abroad, a CIA specialty for 70 years. Consider Indonesia in 1965, from Vincent Bevins' book, "The Jakarta Method:"

"CIA analysts ... prepared lists with the names of thousands of communists and suspected communists, and handed them over to the Army, so that these people could be murdered and 'checked off' the list [I]t is estimated that between five hundred thousand and one million people were slaughtered [T]his was at least the third time in history that US officials had supplied lists of communists and alleged communists to allies, so that they could round them up and kill them. The first was in Guatemala in 1954, the second was in Iraq in 1963."

READERS WRITE Forgive and forget, especially forget

Toppling statues and renaming forts are distractions. Unilaterally nixing the JPCOA with Iran and reimposing economic sanctions that will kill Iranian children is malice personified.

No surprise that America got a loser like Trump, who has prospered by abrogating contracts with an impunity born of economic power.

And, no surprise that unrelenting U.S. malice has failed to beget much charity.

William Beyer, St. Louis Park

It is reasonable to point out that the naming of federal military installations for Confederate generals was a gesture at sectional reconciliation. There is something to be said for that, in the aftermath of a catastrophic Civil War.

However, historians have nearly universally concluded that this strategy also required throwing the victims of racism under the bus. The cost of white reconciliation was to downplay slavery as a cause of the war, and to overlook the overthrow of Reconstruction's brief attempt to grant the freedpeople equal rights. Northern veterans understood this, and many of the generation that defeated the rebellion bristled at this national backsliding. Reconciliation after a war is a good thing, but perhaps not at the expense of forgetting why that war was fought.

Tice also bristles at the talk about naming military installations after losers. That is another reasonable point, the Confederates certainly fought hard and with skill for their cause, demeaning their sacrifice seems ungracious. But several of the Confederate generals honored by major military installations were, like Bragg, inept. John Bell Hood lost Atlanta through costly counterattacks against a much larger army, then ruined half his army during the catastrophic Nashville offensive. He, too, retired in disgrace.

The Civil War was lost in the then-west, and it is truly strange to name bases for incompetent Confederate generals, however brave or committed.

Unless the nation is honoring them for their role in Confederate defeat. If that is the intent, it makes sense.

Michael W. Fitzgerald, Northfield

The writer is a professor of history at St. Olaf College.

...

I agree with the tweet (to which Tice referred) by retired Minnesota Supreme Court Justice Alan Page regarding military bases named after loser confederate generals. My suggestion for Fort Bragg would be Fort McCain. A real American hero.

RACIAL EQUITY

Some things have changed and others haven't, but there's hope

Bravo, Lori Sturdevant! Her column regarding the fight for racial equity ("Why did the spark catch here, now?" Opinion Exchange, June 21) was a gift.

She explores the history of changes in racial diversity in Minnesota. In 1960, people of color comprised 1.2% of the population, grew in size to 6% by 1990, and are estimated at 20.4% today. Sadly, the racial gaps in household income, educational attainment, homeownership and life expectancy for nonwhites has not changed.

Now, after the inhumane death of George Floyd, the presence of the large group of the millennial generation, together with the boomer generation, is making urgent demands for remedies to injustice.

I am grateful for Sturdevant's article, her wise use of information provided by state demographers, and her clarity in writing.

May the young adults prevail! Hopefully, they stand with and on the shoulders of other generations of Americans/Minnesotans who care.

Judith Dahill, Minnetonka

...

I live in Minneapolis. In the early evenings, I can often be found on my front stoop, watching the world go by. On a recent evening, I saw four young teen boys riding their bikes. Laughing and talking as they pedaled. Two were black and two were white. All four clearly friends. Then a father rode past with two children speaking a language I didn't recognize. Moments later a mother with a stroller and a child on a scooter speaking Spanish. I found it as a sprout of optimism, all from my front door.

COVID-19

Young people, perhaps it should go like this: no mask, no inheritance

Thank you, Steve Sack, for another timely COVID-19 cartoon ("Don't tread on me" vs. "Don't spread on me," June 21). Also, thank you, Lee Schafer, for your intelligent column "The Spartan argument for wearing a face mask" (June 18).

I can relate to both.

On June 18, my sister, age 78, and I, age 72, drove to Albany, Minn., for a five-mile hike on the Lake Wobegon Trail. We donned masks because so many people were using the trail and because we are older adults at greater risk for COVID-19.

After walking about a mile, we encountered a bicyclist, age 30 or so, who mocked us for wearing masks. "You'd better not go to the Albany bank or they'll think it's a hold-up," he yelled. He and his bicycling buddy thought this was so humorous.

According to the June 18 weekly COVID-19 report from the Minnesota Department of Health, 263 of 1,542 Minnesotans (17%) in the 70-79 age group who contracted the virus died from it. For older age groups, the statistics are even more grim: 459 deaths from 1,465 COVID-19 cases (31%) in the 80-89 age group, 349 of 803 (43%) in the 90-99 age group, and 26 of 45 (58%) in the 100-plus age group.

READERS WRITE Forgive and forget, especially forget

When we wear masks, we at least give ourselves and others near us a fighting chance against the virus. In fact, hypothetical models used in an Arizona State study in April concluded that with nearly universal (80%) adoption of "moderately effective" masks, 17 to 45% of COVID-19 deaths over two months could have been prevented in New York and 24 to 65% of deaths over the same period in Washington state.

So why wouldn't all of us be amenable to wearing masks? I can only conclude that a great percentage of people do not care if older people die from this disease. Could it be that the anti-mask crowd wants us to die in order to inherit money sooner rather than later?

If so, I suggest that we older people specify in our wills that family members who do not wear masks in risky settings (stores, large public gatherings) be removed from inheritance. If no heirs wear masks, let's bury our money in our caskets or have it cremated with us.

STAR TRIBUNE TOP WORK PLACES 2020

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 28, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPECIAL; Pg. 4Length: 1080 wordsByline: CATHERINE ROBERTS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Embracing the 'spirit of innovation' // Minnesota's Top Workplaces have had a head start in reacting to a crisis.Body

This year will be remembered as one of disruption, uncertainty and possibly ingenuity.

Companies that were able figured out how to make a telecommuting model work after states asked businesses to help slow the spread of COVID-19. Manufacturers have had to prioritize worker safety and pivot to new lines of business to stay open.

Now, as they start to think about opening offices again, or their longtime customers start placing more orders, they have a chance to redefine their workplaces and what they value in their staffs.

The national conversation on equity that started after George Floyd died in Minneapolis police custody is another opening for meaningful change.

"So much Minnesota innovation has changed the world," said venture capitalist Mary Grove, the keynote speaker for this year's Star Tribune Top Workplaces virtual event. "There's no reason why we can't continue to lead around the future of the workplace."

The companies that make up the Star Tribune's Top Workplaces have had a head start building a culture that cultivates communication and employee engagement, according to Philadelphia-based Energage, which partnered with the Star Tribune on the project for the 11th year.

"In times of great change, it is more important than ever to maintain a connection among employees," said Energage CEO Eric Rubino. "When you give your employees a voice, you come together to navigate challenges and shape your path forward based on real-time insights into what works best for your organization."

The Top Workplaces process is based on a scientific survey of employees who rate their workplace culture and is done in more than 40 markets each year.

Any company in Minnesota with more than 50 employees can be nominated. The company then agrees to participate in the Energage survey and is ranked based on national benchmarks.

This year, 2,926 employers were invited and 333 agreed to have their employees take the survey. Those surveyed employ 148,516 people in Minnesota.

The top 150 companies were ranked based on the surveys and their size. An additional 103 companies were recognized for exceeding national benchmarks.

The 24-question survey gathered information on several broad issues relating to workplace culture: company alignment, coaching, connection, engagement, leadership, performance and basics like pay and benefits.

The survey showed that feeling a connection to employers is the most important theme explored.

Minnesota employers again scored higher than the national average on every measure except benefits. Compared to other markets, Minnesota employees felt their company had "clued-in employees" 6% more and "clued-in management" 7.3% more often.

One of the cultural elements measured is appreciation, and there is not a definition for it on the survey, said Energage founder Doug Claffey.

"We don't tell an employee how they should gauge their feelings about it, he said. "They use their own definition, and even more, employees know it when they feel it. And they can also readily distinguish between what's authentic and what's simply lip service."

As people transition back to workplaces, Claffey said, companies must consider employees' emotions and individual roadblocks to coming back to the office.

If someone fears coming back because of COVID-19, or has child-care issues because school is not fully in session or extra responsibilities taking care of parents, these situations must be considered if productivity and engagement is to continue, he said.

"This is the new reality," Claffey said. "Be deliberate. Be thoughtful. Make your employees feel like they're part of the planning process and that their input matters."

In other words, clear and more open communication is more important now than ever, he said.

That includes making sure the senior leadership team is on the same page about the company's business plan through the crisis.

They also must be deliberate about gauging employees' concerns and making sure they know exactly what is expected of them and what is coming.

Clued-in" leadership is about upward feedback and employees feeling heard, Claffey said.

If employers struggle in this area, workers find it harder to connect with the organization, he said.

"And when leaders really aren't clued in to what's happening, they're missing valuable insight from those closest to the customer: their employees," he said.

To be successful, all managers must keep communicating throughout the company hierarchy. Company town halls on Zoom or similar platforms can be effective to communicate key messages and hear direct feedback.

Demonstrating this connection really makes the difference between an average workplace and a great one, Claffey said.

If that spirit of open communication can be applied to all areas, that's where the culture can improve, Grove said.

"I'm of the opinion that as we're coming out of deep pain, [a spirit] of innovation can take place as we move forward," she said.

STAR TRIBUNE TOP WORK PLACES 2020

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 28, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPECIAL; Pg. 11Length: 1370 wordsByline: DEE DePASS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: MIDSIZE COMPANIES // How to keep the hive buzzing // Top firms work harder to keep employees at home engaged, with fun and community service.Body

Solution Design Group (SDG) has worked hard to keep its recipe for employee engagement varied even as it moved online when COVID-19 moved into Minnesota.

Since most business moved to telecommuting in March, the Golden Valley software company has hosted virtual book clubs, learning presentations, poker night and whiskey tasting to maintain the fun.

The 189-employee firm uses computer tools like Slack to hold employee trivia contests, share family coloring pages and games to "uplift each other," said SDG marketing manager Alex Haider.

"It is hard being away from each other - but doughnut drops [on porches] and virtual lunches have certainly helped," she said. "Team SDG is excited to get back to seeing each other in person, but we feel comforted by each other when we cannot. We are proud of how the SDG community has pivoted."

Like many other companies, SDG, which ranked No. 3 on the Star Tribune's list of midsize Top Workplaces, feels that reaching out to employees remains a top value made harder by the lack of in-person interaction. The stay-at-home orders ended the water fountain chats, conversations over coffee and social events that normally inject the fun into how we earn a living.

Despite the shift, some midsize Minnesota companies - such as Glacial Ridge Health System (1), homebuilder and mortgage firm Tradition Companies (2), Kraus-Anderson (18) and Panda Restaurant Group (4) were notable for their creativity and for designing workplaces that breathed levity into otherwise solemn times.

Creating fun and employee experiences matters to SDG, Haider said. For example, the employee-owned business has three "employee cabins" in Brainerd where workers chosen by lottery can stay and unwind.

"We are very focused on what is best for our employees and that means adding an element of fun and adding things to their life outside of work," Haider said.

The firm with $34 million in sales epitomizes the lengths some employers will go to to keep the work family charged and happy.

The Society for Human Resource Management (SHRM) said they see more employers hosting Zoom meetings in costume, designating a "Wear your favorite concert T-shirt" day and giving staff prizes for the best Zoom virtual backdrop.

"Right now, with so much illness, violence and pain, it's even more difficult to focus on 'fun,'" said SHRM Knowledge Center manager Liz Petersen. "During the pandemic, employers will need to be a little more creative in their engagement and team building activities to accommodate remote workers and social distancing. Keep your team sharing and connecting on a personal level."

Kraus-Anderson Construction boasts a "Buzz Squad" of workers who raise honeybees and a pollinator garden on its downtown Minneapolis rooftop.

In 2018, it also opened a garden patio on the fifth floor so workers could do yoga and pollinate fun. The 20-member Buzz Squad won a blue ribbon at the State Fair last year for its honey. The company sells the honey for charity and teaches other businesses downtown how to raise honeybees on roofs.

"Our people get super excited about the bees," said human resource director Diane Toll.

Project coordinator and head beekeeper Brendan Ward still chuckles when he talks about the time two years ago when Kraus moved its cranes from the hotel it was building next door just so Ward could lift giant flower planters up to the new rooftop bee garden.

"I love Kraus-Anderson," Ward said. The company helps workers know there's more to the job "than just having a hammer in your hand or sitting at a desk."

Deemed "essential," Kraus-Anderson is still building and renovating during the pandemic - projects such as the Edina Community Center and Valley View Middle School. But with job site social distancing and at-home workers, it also relies on Zoom happy hours and company executives who phone every home worker.

The pandemic "does really present some challenges to keep that [fun] kind of culture going," said Kraus-Anderson Construction President Al Gerhardt. "We are a group that believes in handshakes and hugs and having fun. Now that you can't have the close contact any longer [you have to] get innovative" and adopt technology to keep those workers virtually connected.

It's also important to continue work in the community, Toll said.

Kraus-Anderson is holding toiletry drives for those affected by the riots that followed the Memorial Day killing of George Floyd by police. Workers will don masks and resume feeding people who are homeless at the nearby House of Charity and jam to music while packing food for overseas relief missions.

"We give back to the communities. It's an important feature of what we do. It's one of the reasons why I have stayed here as long as I have," said Toll, who has worked for the company for 22 years.

Tradition Companies also held a supply drive for those in need after the riots and looting in late May and early June. The company set up teams, bought $3,000 worth of toiletries and asked 330 employees from its various Minnesota offices to donate even more.

This month, workers donated a semi-truck worth of supplies.

"It was a pretty special moment when I saw everyone pulling up with supplies," said Tradition Mortgage President Erik Hendrikson, who drove the truck to the donation site in Minneapolis.

Since the stay-at-home orders, the homebuilding firm has energized telecommuting team members with lighthearted virtual "state of the union" addresses and video montages featuring employees' home offices, pets and best COVID-19 song playlists featuring 1980s favorites.

"We are trying to do our best," Hendrickson said. "A big concern is trying to keep people's sense of a common bond while a big chunk of our staff is working from home. It's been a little bit challenging, but man, we have been able to get a lot of fun things done."

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 28, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 2CLength: 1116 wordsByline: SID HARTMAN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Coyle putting safety first as athletes gather at the UBody

The University of Minnesota has started the big process of having players return to campus for voluntary workouts, and athletic director Mark Coyle said in an interview over e-mail last week that the school is taking every precaution to make sure student-athletes are safe and cared for while also getting back to athletics and academics.

"The health and wellness of our student-athletes, coaches and staff will always be our top priority," Coyle said. "Our staff has spent the past several weeks preparing for our student-athletes to return to campus and has worked diligently to provide them with the safest environment possible. Our decision to bring students back to campus is supported by medical experts and leadership at the NCAA, Big Ten and on campus.

"Right now, we have our football student-athletes back and will soon have members of our soccer, volleyball and basketball teams on campus as well."

Optimistic for fall

The list of athletic and medical experts the Gophers have to draw on is large because the University of Minnesota has such a well-respected academic roster and such a great relationship with the Big Ten.

Coyle said the ability to use that advice makes him believe that fall sports will be happening on campus.

"I am optimistic that we will be playing fall sports," he said. "Our return-to-campus plan was led by Executive Associate Athletics Director Julie Manning, Senior Associate Athletics Director Joi Thomas and Medical Director Dr. Bradley Nelson," Coyle said. "It contained input from Dr. Brian Hainline, who is the NCAA's chief medical officer, as well as from the Big Ten Infectious Disease Committee, which is composed of 14 outstanding medical professionals - including Dr. Nelson - who have advised the Big Ten Conference and its athletic directors.

"Our plan also closely mirrors those being worked on by professional leagues, as we are fortunate to have the expertise of medical staff who are also advising professional teams. We also received consultation from Jill DeBoer, who is the deputy director of the University's Center for Infectious Disease Research and Policy, and have worked with Dr. Alison Galdys, who is an assistant professor in the Division of Infectious Diseases and International Medicine here on campus."

Revenue streams key

Coyle said that his stance hasn't changed when it comes to the very real possibility that sports may have to be cut from the athletic department if revenue keeps falling.

He said that's a big reason why getting revenue sports back is huge for not just the Gophers but every other college athletic department. On top of that Coyle said the university has planned for every kind of financial scenario going forward.

"Our revenue-generating sports are extremely important to us, but our focus remains competing in every sport we sponsor this year," he said. "There are still a lot of unknowns with regards to capacity at home games this year and how that will affect us, but we will be able to get through it. Our staff has mapped out multiple scenarios and has been preparing for each one.

"Several members of our executive staff and head coaches have taken voluntary pay reductions and our teams have been responsible in reducing their budgets as well."

Coyle did say that the athletic department continues to get a great deal of support from University of Minnesota President Joan Gabel and Big Ten Commissioner Kevin Warren. And there's no doubt the Big Ten Network will continue to be a huge part of the financial strength of the athletic department.

When it comes to getting back on campus and working with athletes, Coyle said, "I wish everyone was back yesterday."

Honor to work on coalition

In a time when teams aren't able to be together there's no doubt that the Gophers found a way to grow closer as they dealt with the shutdown from the coronavirus and the civic protests around the death of George Floyd.

Coyle wrote about having several Gophers players and staff members being named to the Big Ten Anti-Hate and Anti-Racism Coalition.

"It's an honor for myself and some of our head coaches, staff members and student-athletes to serve on this newly formed coalition," he said. "Commissioner Warren visited our campus a few weeks before everything was halted and detailed his three core student-athletes tenets, which were mental health, financial literacy and voter registration. When he formed the Big Ten Anti-Hate and Anti-Racism Coalition, he spoke passionately about racism in our country and the different ways to change it. He mentioned that the most fundamental way was to make sure that people exercise their right to vote.

"This is an important initiative on our campus as well, not just for our student-athletes, but for all our students under the leadership of President Gabel."

JOTTINGS

- WCHA Men's Commissioner Bill Robertson reports that the conference is looking to add three teams for the 2021-22 season, including St. Thomas. The conference is dealing with the planned departure of Bemidji State, Bowling Green, Ferris State, Lake Superior State, Michigan State, Minnesota State Mankato and Northern Michigan. The conference is also looking at Simon Fraser University in Vancouver, Lindenwood University in St. Louis, Arizona State and Long Island University.
- Vikings offensive coordinator Gary Kubiak on his impressions of second-year tight end Irv Smith Jr.: "Very impressed. That was a great pick by [General Manager] Rick Spielman. Irv was a young player coming out, very young, and the biggest thing for me is I just see so much upside watching Irv come into camp. We asked him to do a lot. I made him learn the F-position, hammers position, as well as high tight-end position. You watched throughout the course of the season, we called on Irv more and more. I think there's a big, big upside here."
- One player to keep an eye on as MLB prepares to start up again is former Twins second baseman Brian Dozier, who signed a minor league deal with the Padres. With a shortened season, it may give a veteran like Dozier a much better chance of making the big-league club.
- The Twins' free-agent list in 2021: catcher Alex Avila, utility players Marwin Gonzalez and Ehire Adrianza, designated hitter Nelson Cruz and pitchers Jake Odorizzi, Homer Bailey, Rich Hill, Jhoulys Chacin, Tyler Clippard and Trevor May.
- Coach Richard Pitino and the Gophers have offered a scholarship to guard Skyy Clark, one of the top college basketball prospects in the country for the Class of 2022. Clark's father is Kenny Clark, a wide receiver with the Vikings from 2002 to '04, appearing in one game.

PRIDE SHARES ITS MOMENT WITH BLACK LIVES MATTER

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 29, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 7ALength: 427 wordsByline: KIM HYATT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Pride intersected with Black Lives Matter on Sunday as hundreds marched to Minneapolis' Loring Park on a weekend typically reserved for the annual gay pride festival.

Twin Cities Pride said because of the coronavirus it would be shifting to virtual events and supporting social justice groups marching for Black Lives Matter.

The Taking Back Pride march made its way through downtown Sunday demanding justice for George Floyd while calling for community control of the police and raising awareness of the violence against black transgender women. At least 16 transgender or gender nonconforming people were killed this year, according to the Human Rights Campaign, which said it's an underreported crime.

Signage and speakers at Taking Back Pride all echoed "Black Trans Lives Matter" and noted that the 1969 Stonewall riots were led by black and brown transgender women in response to police brutality, and that remains at the core of protests 51 years later.

"Change is not made quietly. ... You can't dismantle one 'ism' without taking them all down. And that's what today recognizes," said Kiara Stapleton, a black, nonbinary 30-year-old. "Until this is for everybody, it stands for no one."

Stapleton said Black Lives Matter has been protesting police presence at Twin Cities Pride for years. As the movement has grown, that awareness and call for action have spread. Twin Cities Pride shared at the start of pride month that "we have joined the chorus of community voices to strongly call on the City of Minneapolis to suspend the current requirement for event planners and organizers to contract with off-duty Minneapolis Police Department officers for security at large events."

Police were not present at Sunday's gathering in Loring Park, where DejaJoelle led the crowd through a series of stretches, dances and breathing exercises. The artistic director of BLAQ, a local dance company, said it's all about "healing the body through informed movement." She said while Floyd is no longer able to take a breath, "We can breathe and we're going to practice it. Everything starts with the breath."

Pride shares its moment with Black Lives Matter

The crowd listened to a slate of speakers and live musical performances, including Mikko Blaze, an Afro-Latinx transgender singer who is the 2018 World Karaoke Champion. Though this year's Pride didn't have a parade, Blaze said he welcomed the change because it meant less corporate involvement. He said this year took on a greater meaning and importance standing up for black lives.

"This is what Pride originally was: a protest," Blaze said.

MINNEAPOLIS POLICE GET STRICTER RULES FOR BODY CAMERAS

Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey and Police Chief Medaria Arradondo on Sunday announced tighter rules for reviewing officers' body cameras that they say will provide more transparency and accountability.

They're the latest moves the city is taking toward police reform amid calls for sweeping changes to law enforcement after George Floyd died in police custody on May 25.

On Sunday, Frey and Arradondo called the changes the "first of what will be a series of new public safety policy reforms."

The previous policy allowed officers to review body camera footage before writing an initial report about an incident involving use of force. The new rules require that report to be written first.

Police said it's designed to better capture officers' perceptions at the time the officer acted.

The policy now aligns with rules for civilians, who are not allowed to review body camera footage before talking with police.

"In instances when an officer faces charges and a potential conviction, a clear understanding of what the officer perceived is an essential factor," Frey said, adding that the change will help ensure that investigators, attorneys and jurors receive a transparent account of how an officer remembers the incident.

The policies also clarify time requirements for reports and provide more clarity to supervisors about immediate on-scene communications. Officers involved in the incident and those who saw it will be asked to file their reports "as soon as practical."

Officers will also be restricted from talking to anyone at the scene about the incident, except for the incident commander and the lead investigator. They will no longer be allowed to talk to a union representative at the scene.

Minneapolis police get stricter rules for body cameras

The new policies, which take effect on Tuesday, come amid renewed scrutiny of the Minneapolis Police Department and efforts to dismantle it following the death of Floyd, a handcuffed black man who died after a white police officer pressed his knee on Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes.

Former Minneapolis officer Derek Chauvin has been charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and manslaughter in Floyd's death. Three other officers were charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and manslaughter.

Police spokesman John Elder said he was told that all four officers had their body cameras on, which is department policy, but it's not clear if any of them have seen the footage.

Lt. Bob Kroll, the head of the Minneapolis police union, said last week that he had not seen video from the incident. Earl Gray, attorney for former officer Thomas Lane, said he has seen his client's body camera video.

The city would need to change its charter to implement the proposal, which requires a citywide vote. Council members are using an unconventional, expedited process as they seek to get the measure on the November ballot.

Frey said last week that the council is moving too fast and noted that a resolution that he and the council approved earlier promised a "yearlong process of community engagement."

Earlier this month, the state of Minnesota launched a civil rights investigation of the Police Department's policies and practices. Since then, the city announced it was withdrawing from labor negotiations with the police union.

Through a deal negotiated between the city and the state, the city also banned chokeholds and neck restraints and bolstered intervention requirements for officers who see a colleague using improper force.

The four former Minneapolis police officers charged in the death of George Floyd are in court Monday for a hearing that could deal with bail amounts and other issues.

It's the second pretrial hearing for the men, who were fired after Floyd's May 25 death. Derek Chauvin, 44, is charged with second-degree murder and other counts, while Thomas Lane, 37, J. Kueng, 26, and Tou Thao, 34, are charged with aiding and abetting Chauvin.

Floyd died after Chauvin, a white police officer, pressed his knee against the handcuffed 46-year-old Black man's neck for nearly eight minutes. The officers were responding to a call about a man trying to pass a counterfeit $20 bill at a nearby store.

The defendants have not entered pleas. Chauvin's attorney has not commented publicly on the charges, while Lane's and Kueng's attorneys have sought to minimize their clients' roles and deflect blame to the more senior Chauvin in Floyd's death, which sparked protests around the world against police brutality.

Among the issues that could be addressed during Monday's hearings in Minneapolis are motions to reduce bail. Chauvin remains in custody, with his bail set at $1 million with a list of common conditions. Thao's conditional bail was set at $750,000. Lane and Kueng are free on bond. Also unresolved is whether the four will be tried together or separately.

Hennepin County District Judge Peter Cahill is presiding over the case. He ruled Friday that there will be no video or audio coverage of any pretrial proceedings. Defense attorneys asked to allow such coverage, but prosecutors objected. The judge did not rule on whether to allow cameras for the trial itself, which in Minnesota usually requires the consent of all parties.

Kueng's attorney, Tom Plunkett, filed a motion Sunday on behalf of all four defendants asking the judge to reconsider. He asserted that prosecutors and other officials forfeited their right to object to cameras in the courtroom by making public comments that went as far as "saying the defendants are guilty of murder." He said allowing electronic coverage of pretrial proceedings would actually make it easier to impanel a fair jury by helping to "educate the public that there may be more to the cases than what has been told to them by the state."

The charges against Chauvin are unintentional second-degree murder, third-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter. Second-degree murder carries a maximum penalty of 40 years in prison, third-degree murder carries up to 25 years and manslaughter up to 10.

The other three former officers are charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter. Those charges are legally tantamount to the counts against Chauvin and carry the same penalties. Body

A judge on Monday warned that he's likely to move the trials of four former police officers charged in George Floyd's death out of Minneapolis if public officials, attorneys and family members don't stop speaking out about the case.

Hennepin County Judge Peter Cahill stopped short of issuing a gag order against attorneys on both sides, but he said he likely will if public statements continue that make it hard to find an impartial jury. Cahill said that would also make him likely to grant a change-of-venue motion if one is filed, as he anticipates.

"The court is not going to be happy about hearing comments on these three areas: merits, evidence and guilt or innocence," Cahill said.

It was the second pretrial hearing for the officers, who were fired after Floyd's May 25 death. Derek Chauvin, 44, is charged with second-degree murder and other counts, while Thomas Lane, 37, J. Kueng, 26, and Tou Thao, 34, are charged with aiding and abetting Chauvin.

Floyd died after Chauvin, a white police officer, pressed his knee against the handcuffed 46-year-old Black man's neck for nearly eight minutes. The officers were responding to a call about a man trying to pass a counterfeit $20 bill at a nearby store. Floyd's death sparked protests around the world.

Thao's attorney, Robert Paule, cited remarks from a variety of public officials saying they thought the officers were guilty, including President Donald Trump, Attorney General Keith Ellison and Mayor Jacob Frey.

Police Chief Medaria Arradondo has called Floyd's death "murder" and said Chauvin knew what he was doing because of his training. Gov. Tim Walz and Frey have also called it murder.

Judge warns he may move George Floyd trials if statements about case don't stop

Cahill asked Assistant Attorney General Matthew Frank to use his influence to keep public officials silent, warning that if they continue to discuss it publicly, he likely would "have to pull (the trials) out of Hennepin County and they need to be aware of that." But he also made it clear that he wants defense attorneys and Floyd family members to stay out of the press, too.

Cahill set a March 8 trial date for the former officers if they are tried together, though he said he expects motions to be filed to separate their trials. If they're tried separately, those still in custody - currently Chauvin and Thao - would most likely go first. The next court date is Sept. 11.

The defendants have not entered pleas. Chauvin's attorney has not commented publicly on the charges, while Lane's and Kueng's attorneys have sought to minimize their clients' roles and deflect blame to the more senior Chauvin in Floyd's death. Kueng's attorney said in a court filing Monday that he intends to plead not guilty and that he will argue it was self-defense, a reasonable use of force and an authorized use of force.

Chauvin remains in custody on $1 million bail and Thao is being held on $750,000 bail. Lane and Kueng are free on bond.

Cahill rejected a defense request to reconsider his earlier decision to prohibit cameras in the courtroom during pretrial proceedings. Defense attorneys asked for the cameras, saying it would help balance what the public has heard about the case, but prosecutors objected. The judge has not ruled on whether to allow cameras for the trial itself, but has said he is open to it.

The charges against Chauvin are unintentional second-degree murder, third-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter. Second-degree murder carries a maximum penalty of 40 years in prison, third-degree murder carries up to 25 years and manslaughter up to 10.

The other three former officers are charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter. Those charges are legally tantamount to the counts against Chauvin and carry the same penalties.

After the hearings, Selwyn Jones, Floyd's uncle, said he found it "totally hideous" that Lane and Kueng made bail, while "my nephew will never have a chance to be free ever again. ... I'm not mad at anybody, I just think we need to fix the system. Racism needs to go, police brutality definitely needs to go, and we need to find some kind of equality and care for each other."

A surge in 'buy black'

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 959 wordsByline: NICOLE NORFLEET; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Black-owned businesses' consumer influx brings revenue - and challenges - for business owners.Body

Gigi Berry is not one to mince her words. For three years, she has designed and sold colorful and snarky enamel pins emblazoned with messages of the Minneapolis sound, Simpsons references, gay pride declarations and the occasional pop-music lyric.

But her most recent creation, though simple in design, might be her most outspoken yet - a black glitter background in the shape of Minnesota with "Black Lives Matter" in raised gold lettering.

Berry, who is black, has seen a surge in demand for her pins in the month since the killing of George Floyd, a black man whose death while in police custody has led to the firing and charging of four Minneapolis police officers and global demonstrations on racial equality.

Other Twin Cities black retailers also say their sales have soared as race-conscious consumers have rushed to show support for black-owned businesses through the "Buy Black" movement.

But while black retailers have voiced their gratitude, some are having trouble keeping up with demand, especially as their businesses recover from disruptions because of coronavirus shutdowns. Some also wonder how they should respond to possibly fleeting consumer interest spurred by tragedy.

"It's the most traffic I've had since the beginning of [the pandemic]," said Berry, whose physical store has been closed since mid-March because of the threat of the coronavirus pushing her to an online business.

"It sucks that it had to be because of this."

Gigi's Flair Emporium is in the same south Minneapolis area of Powderhorn where Floyd was pinned down for nearly eight minutes before he died. Currently, she has close to 900 orders to fulfill as she awaits shipments from her overseas manufacturer, which has been delayed because of the spread of the coronavirus.

A surge in 'buy black'

Normally, Berry ships about 100 pins herself a week. Now, her pins are available for pre-order as she works to keep up with demand.

Earlier this month, Berry decided to create two types of Black Lives Matter pins as customers were asking for them and she wanted to give local acknowledgment to the movement.

Berry is donating 20% of sales of another pin that says "Home of the Revolution" to the Black Visions Collective, a Minnesota-based organization whose vision through collaboration is "to expand the power of black people across the Twin Cities metro area and Minnesota."

Still, despite her efforts to help, Berry said she had mixed feelings of disgust and guilt about how interest spiked due to Floyd's death.

"It's not lost on me that I only got these sales because of the murder," she said.

It has been challenging for her to keep up with all the orders, but she said she's grateful because it's her only source of income.

Alfonso "Fonzie" Mayfield, owner of Twin Cities-based Allure Cigars, has seen on social media that there has been more support of black-owned businesses with homegrown lists of minority retailers being shared.

"There's this call for justice and also there's this call for we have to keep our dollars in our black community," he said.

This June has been the best month he has seen in sales since he started the company in 2018, Mayfield said. The cigar business is a hard industry to break into because customers have fierce brand loyalty to the cigars they smoke, Mayfield said.

It's also not very diverse, he said.

"You go into cigar lounges and you don't feel welcomed," Mayfield said. "Oftentimes, I wasn't taken seriously. It's not filled with us [black people]."

Mayfield, who originally just rolled cigars himself, added other cigar rollers earlier this year to help with production. The move has helped the company keep up with new sales.

Houston White, owner of barbershop and apparel store H. White Men's Room, said his online store has really taken off in recent weeks, particularly the sale of his "Black Excellence" merchandise.

"I believe it can be sustained," White said. "It's up to our black-owned businesses to be ready for this spike in demand. I believe that it can. Will it? I guess we will see."

A recent survey of minority-owned and other disadvantaged businesses by the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis found that those businesses had been negatively hurt by COVID-19 like others but a bit more severely. More than 55% of minority-owned businesses said that if the current economic conditions continued, they would go out of business in the next six months.

National research has also shown that minority business owners are less likely to have a banking relationship, limiting their access to capital.

A surge in 'buy black'

Anna Schmiel, community engagement coordinator for Northside Economic Opportunity Network (NEON), said that many of the small, minority-owned businesses that her organization serves have been concentrating more on getting COVID relief business loans and grants than self-promotion. Many small businesses also are not set up to handle sudden influxes of sales, with many not having robust online platforms.

"A lot of these businesses haven't been able to structure the proper way for that money to be funneled into their businesses," she said.

NEON, in coordination with the West Broadway Business and Area Coalition, still plans to host later this year Black Friday on Broadway, a multiday shopping event encouraging people to buy from black-owned businesses.

Last year, the city for the first time hosted the Minneapolis Black Business Week and plans hold the event again this year with dates to be announced soon.

Berry, who said she was recently rejected for a Small Business Administration loan, said she hopes consumer interest in black-owned businesses remains strong for the long-term.

"I just really hope that they keep this same energy," she said. "We add a lot of culture to Minnesota as a whole."

A liquor store was one of the first buildings touched by the rage of a crowd that had watched a white police officer press his knee into George Floyd's neck until he died.

Looters hit Minnehaha Lake Wine & Spirits twice the first night of protests as Steve Krause, the owner, watched by surveillance camera from his home across town.

Two nights later the store burned down. Flames flung the red marquee onto a pile of mangled metal in what used to be the basement.

Krause plans to rebuild what is now a third-generation business, but "there are bigger issues in society," he said from the sidewalk on E. Lake Street, a place still ringing with the echoes of Floyd's death and the public's furious response. He gestured at the hole in the ground that was his store.

"If this is a sacrifice to accomplish a greater good, so be it," Krause said.

At the epicenter of the riots that happened a month ago, a reckoning is underway. Dozens of buildings burned within a quarter-mile of the corner of Lake and Minnehaha, and people there are wrestling with whether the eruption of lawlessness served a purpose.

Starting the long journey to rebuild, they're veering from grief to hope and reconciling how the destruction of their businesses brought the world's attention to George Floyd's death and the cause of racial injustice.

The wreckage that started at the Third Police Precinct spread as far as north Minneapolis and South St. Paul, causing an estimated $500 million in damage.

Hundreds of business and property owners, many of them immigrants, remain angry the city and state did not protect them. A manufacturer whose plant burned near the Third Precinct station said he will not rebuild in Minneapolis.

'Where are the police?'

AT EPICENTER OF RIOTS, A PAINFUL RECKONING

Bao Huang, owner of Hop Wong near the corner of Lake and Chicago, slept in the Chinese takeout restaurant with a gun through the four nights of riots, but he couldn't prevent a fire next door from damaging it. "Where's the police? Where's the city? Every year I pay taxes. Where are the police?" Huang said.

From south Minneapolis, protests spread across the world. Support for Black Lives Matter among white Americans grew to a majority overnight, polls show. Sweeping reform is on the agenda across the nation. Even the NFL apologized, indirectly, to Colin Kaepernick.

'The whole world is looking'

On May 28 - the night the Third Precinct police station and the liquor store and many other buildings burned - Ruhel Islam cooked food for protesters and offered bottled water in front of his restaurant, Gandhi Mahal, down the block and around a corner from the police station.

Medics set up a spot to treat injured protesters in a community space adjacent to the restaurant.

Later that night, someone set a fire that consumed Gandhi Mahal. The next morning, Islam's response went viral: "Let my building burn," he said. "Justice needs to be served."

Islam was a student demonstrator in Bangladesh in 1990 when a mass uprising toppled a military ruler. Those protests were not always peaceful. Dozens died, and students and other demonstrators clashed with police repeatedly before the president resigned.

It took Islam time after moving to Minneapolis to learn "what has happened with our black brothers and sisters," he said. Careful to emphasize that he does not condone violence, Islam said, "Our buildings have burned. Why should we blame the protesters for this? We should blame our decisionmakers for this. It's been hundreds of years. All these years, nobody has listened."

He drives from his home on the southeast side of town in his minivan to the site of the restaurant most days, checking on the community center and the cherry tree just down the street. He is trying to find a kitchen so he can resume cooking food for takeout, maybe a spot on Franklin Avenue.

Someone, Islam doesn't know who, put a sign up on the fence around the rubble of his restaurant that says "Special thanks to Gandhi Mahal." He plans to rebuild on the same block, though he estimates it will take three or four years.

"Minnesota is ground zero for change, for revolution, for the movement," Islam said. "The whole world is looking at Minneapolis. We have to lead by example."

'An opportunity to destroy'

Across the street from Gandhi Mahal, the bathroom in the Wilson Law Group building became the "port-a-potty" of the riot, said David Wilson, who owns the building.

Somebody smashed the glass door off of Minnehaha Avenue and spray-painted the word "RestRoom" on the wall in blue with an arrow down the hall. Eventually someone tore out the toilet, flooding the bathroom.

AT EPICENTER OF RIOTS, A PAINFUL RECKONING

Wilson walked through after the riots to check circuit breakers and meet insurance adjusters, with whom he anticipated a fight. The carpet was scattered with broken glass. Someone had tried to remove computer servers from the basement.

As an immigration lawyer, Wilson battles the U.S. government in courtrooms and said he knows how "rights can slide off the table quickly."

But he watched the protests spin out of control and saw flames crawl along a power line between his building and the liquor store before it melted and fell. For him, the distinction between protesting and rioting is clear.

"Demonstrating your commitment to change and demanding it from leadership is important, and the First Amendment is sacred," Wilson said. "The moment though that people are just using it as an opportunity to destroy, no conscience, no regard for what they're doing? No. No, the First Amendment doesn't protect that."

'We will rebuild'

When people broke into the post office and drove postal vans around next door, Kelly Drummer and her daughter watched from a window.

"Then we saw gas cans, and after they smashed all the vans they drove some back in there and started them on fire," said Drummer, president of the American Indian nonprofit Migizi. "It just got scarier and scarier."

She left around 2 a.m. and returned at dawn to find the roof of Migizi on fire. She learned last week the building is a total loss, and the insurance coverage isn't enough to rebuild the structure and replace destroyed equipment. The next move is uncertain.

"We will rebuild, but we just don't know where or what that looks like yet," said Drummer, who said she was "paralyzed" for the first couple of weeks after the riots.

She doesn't think her building was targeted but was a random victim of the chaos that ensued when law enforcement vacated the area that Thursday night. And she said she understands the rage on the streets.

"When you have thousands of people feeling that same anger, I don't blame anyone for what happened," Drummer said. "I do think that sometimes it takes destruction in order to rebuild. I really do believe that."

Dozens of GoFundMe sites have been set up for businesses damaged in the riots, and hundreds of thousands of dollars have poured in for shops and restaurants near the Third Precinct station.

'I'm here for change'

Lamberto Vergara, a native of Mexico who grew up in Brooklyn and moved to the Twin Cities 18 years ago, owns LV's Barbershop, across the street from Gandhi Mahal.

His business didn't burn down, but rioters smashed one of his windows, and Islam said one of his employees pulled a flaming projectile from the barbershop before anything caught on fire.

Weeks after the riot, the place was stripped and Vergara showed two men with clipboards a room in the back.

AT EPICENTER OF RIOTS, A PAINFUL RECKONING

"All of this was definitely necessary to make change," he said, and "seeing the whole community come together afterwards, seeing all the love from people," has been heartening. He plans to reopen and wants to eventually open a second shop, probably in northeast Minneapolis.

"I stand with the community," Vergara said. "If you don't shake the hornet's nest, everything will stay the same. I'm here for change."

Krause watched the looting in his store from his home in southwest Minneapolis through surveillance cameras until someone stole the cameras and DVR that first night.

"Even then I couldn't have anticipated what would occur two nights later," Krause said.

A former lawyer who took over the liquor store from his father when he got sick in the late 1980s, Krause now runs the business with his son. He plans to rebuild bigger than before, with a few units of affordable housing above it.

He said his insurance coverage will be adequate. Now he's waiting for a demolition permit from the city. He needs a survey of the property, which burned in the fire, and learned he has to pay property taxes for the year before he can get a permit to clear the rubble.

Once he gets the site cleared and filled, he'll plant grass, try to navigate the affordable housing regulatory landscape and come up with a building plan.

"I'm looking for energy to rebuild and turn a bad experience for our community, and for me personally, into something positive," Krause said. "I have to put my head down and get to work."

Section: NEWS; Pg. 11ALength: 937 wordsByline: ILHAN OMAR, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Minnesota can lead in social transformation // The time to stand is now, and here's my plan.Body

Our city, and our nation, are at a crossroads.

For years, we have marched, protested and advocated to end police brutality. In 2015, a 24-year-old black man, Jamar Clark, was shot in the head and died after a confrontation with two white Minneapolis police officers responding to a reported assault. In 2016, Philando Castile, a 29-year-old black man, was fatally shot by a police officer in a Twin Cities suburb while Castile's partner and her 4-year-old daughter looked on.

But this moment feels different. In the wake of George Floyd's murder, people across the country and around the globe are standing in solidarity with the protesters in Minneapolis. The message and movement of "Black Lives Matter" has at long last gained the acceptance they long deserved.

Will we have the moral courage to pursue justice and secure meaningful change or will we maintain the status quo?

For too long, people who live and work in Minneapolis - particularly black and other marginalized communities - have faced violence at the hands of police. Despite attempts at accountability and reform, the department continues to fail the city - as was laid bare with George Floyd's murder and the department's actions since his killing.

What's more, the Police Department in Minneapolis doesn't succeed at its core functions - solving the most serious crimes and caring for victims. In Minneapolis, half of all homicides are left unsolved. The department is notorious for their lack of concern for victims of rape, as rapes go unsolved and rape kits are quite literally destroyed.

We have a rare opportunity to reimagine a public safety system that prioritizes everyone in the community. A new system will allow officers to do the work that is needed - and employ the skills needed - to solve our most serious crimes and address the most dangerous situations that our communities can face, while allowing the city to prioritize community investment. Most problems arising from substance use disorders, mental health diagnoses and poverty require medical professionals and social workers - not criminal enforcement or armed officers. Investing more in health care, education and housing is public safety.

We know this can work. Cities like Camden, N.J., have disbanded their police departments and as a collective they built a system that made all of them safe. It worked. Six years after the department was disbanded, homicides were down 63% in Camden and crime is at its lowest level in decades. This is one of many examples that can be used as inspiration for our city. Ultimately, what we decide to do in Minneapolis is for our community to decide.

But true systems change cannot be done locally alone. It will require the full effort of the federal government. We must start by acknowledging the problem. I, along with U.S. Reps. Ayanna Pressley, Barbara Lee and Congressional Black Caucus Leader Karen Bass have introduced a House resolution recognizing that the systemic targeting of and use of deadly and brutal force against people of color has deep historical roots. Thanks to the advocacy of people across the country, we already have the majority of our caucus's support and hope to see it go to the floor in the coming weeks.

Not only was I proud to cosponsor and co-lead a bill in last week's package led by the Congressional Black Caucus, but I announced a package of four forthcoming bills to address the grave inequities plaguing our country.

First, we are working to establish an independent federal agency with the authority to investigate all nationwide incidents of deaths occurring in police custody, officer-involved shootings and uses of force that result in severe bodily injury. This agency will be responsible for conducting unbiased, independent investigations and issuing determinations of responsibility and recommendations on adjudication in each case.

Second, we have watched as police have used excessive force against nonviolent protesters, indiscriminately deploying pepper spray, tear gas, batons and rubber bullets. The bill I put forward will allow any officer who kills or causes bodily harm to a civilian during the response to a protest to be charged with a federal crime. We must ensure that the constitutional right to protest is duly protected, not threatened or stifled.

Next, instead of leading our country with integrity and decency in this tumultuous time, the president has threatened to invoke the Insurrection Act to deploy active military members to intervene in protests. Along with Reps. Mark Pocan, Pramila Jayapal and Veronica Escobar, I introduced legislation that amends the Insurrection Act, curtailing the president's ability to deploy the military domestically without congressional consent and prevents domestic agencies from conducting surveillance on protesters.

Last, Minneapolis's economy has been ravaged. We have a moral responsibility to help our communities heal economically. I am working with the Minnesota delegation to create an Emergency Relief Fund specifically for communities trying to rebuild after social and civil rights crises - and ensure that those funds go to Minneapolis. It is imperative we lift up our community rather than continue the cycle of neglect or gentrification of these vibrant neighborhoods.

These are just the first steps. The people of Minneapolis and the whole country are loudly demanding justice. Let us not allow our calls for justice continue to echo unanswered. This is our chance to dismantle the systems of oppression that exist in our society and build a just world.

Two of the three founders of Minneapolis' One Fermentary & Taproom left the brewery since Friday, though the watering hole says it will continue on.

Head brewer and co-owner Ramsey Louder announced on Friday that he would leave the business, The Growler reports. Louder is the first Black man to co-own a brewery in Minneapolis, and had hoped that the brewery would serve as a bulwark of diversity and inclusion in the Twin Cities. From his statement, it's clear Louder felt One fell short of its stated goals.

"I've realized that my vision and values differ from those of ownership of One. I want to be in a space that can proclaim that Black Lives Matter," he said in a statement.

One Fermentary co-founders to depart, say taproom didn't do enough to promote inclusivity

Update: In an email, majority owner Sally Schmidt said Louder's resignation as head brewer is effective Aug. 10.

Later that day, fellow co-founder Joseph Alton stepped down in solidarity. In a letter published the next day, Alton said that Louder had drafted a company statement in response to the killing of George Floyd that was edited by the majority owner, who is white, and that while One Fermentary was often portrayed as a Black-owned business, Louder's ownership stake was only 5%, according to a city document.

Read Alton's full statement here.

The remaining founder is Sally Schmidt, who owns 95% of the taproom, according to that document. She's committed to keeping One open.

"Our goal was - and remains - to create a venue where people of all ethnicities, gender identities, abilities and ages could be comfortable, whether they are guests or members of our team," the company said on its Twitter feed.

Schmidt told the Growler that One would donate proceeds from a future beer to the West Broadway Business and Area Coalition.

Correction:

The original story incorrectly stated when Ramsey Louder would leave the business and was unclear about how many owners there are. Those points have been clarified.

The Cargill Foundation has announced it will give $4 million to Minneapolis Public Schools and AchieveMPLS over the next three years.

The grants will support initiatives meant to promote science, technology, engineering and mathematics, or STEM, in the schools through programs like STEM for All and Girls in Engineering, Math and Science. The grants also support career and college centers at 11 high schools in Minneapolis.

"Through partnerships with organizations like Minneapolis Public Schools and AchieveMpls, The Cargill Foundation is dedicated to creating a strong educational bedrock for low income youth of color in our Twin Cities headquarters community," Michelle Grogg, executive director of the Cargill Foundation, said in a statement. "Increasing access to STEM education and college and career readiness is one key step to closing the opportunity gap for our low income children of color."

Cargill Foundation gives $4 million to Minneapolis schools

Cargill is also contributing $50,000 to the MPS Student Support Fund, a new fund designed to support the overall health of students. It provides support for things like counseling, school safety and community projects. The fund was created by AchieveMPLS in response to the killing of George Floyd by the Minneapolis Police Department and in response to the unrest that followed.

"AchieveMpls is honored to facilitate this collaboration and will use this generous support to ensure that each and every student has the guidance and resources they need to access high-demand, living-wage careers," AchieveMPLS president and CEO Danielle Grant said in a statement.

The Cargill Foundation is Minneapolis Public Schools largest funder, and has provided the school system with over $20 million in philanthropy over the last decade.

MOORE'S CAMPAIGN WORTHY OF THE ESPY

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 1CLength: 653 wordsByline: JIM SOUHAN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

A dearth of games has left the sports world with a dearth of topical debates. Arguing about who will be the next pro to test positive is not quite as fun as arguing about the competition for Twins' rotation.

Minnesota is, though, at the center of one debate worth having, even if it is a debate with no real loser sparked by a television network construct.

The 2020 ESPY Awards ceremony, created by ESPN, was held last weekend and felt like a product of our times.

The show was hosted remotely, and by a black man and two gay female athletes who are proven social justice warriors and who wore shirts reading "Black Lives Matter."

ESPN wisely and graciously decided to dedicate its 2020 awards to extraordinary acts of activism and humanitarianism.

The show became a testament not only to the willingness and ability of athletes and influential companies such as ESPN to be about more than sports, but also to the sizable hearts of so many Twin Cities athletes.

Former Timberwolves star Kevin Love received the Arthur Ashe Courage Award for his attempts to destigmatize depression and other mental health issues.

Mesabi Range college running back Taquarius Wair, who lost the fingers on his left hand during a fire when he was 4, received the Jimmy V Award for perseverance.

Love, Twins slugger Nelson Cruz and Lynx star Maya Moore were finalists for the Muhammad Ali Sports Humanitarian Award.

As is the case with most highly coveted awards, the runners-up are all deserving.

Cruz was given the award, and he is deserving, having done so much good in the Dominican Republic and his summer home of the United States.

Moore's campaign worthy of the ESPY

Here's where we could have a debate more meaningful than "How much money should Dalvin Cook be paid?"

I would argue that Moore was even more deserving of the award than Cruz.

They are both admirable athletes. Cruz was the key figure, and perhaps the key player, on a Twins team that jumped from 78 to 101 victories in one season. He anchored a lineup that set a big-league record for home runs.

He mentored Miguel Sano, who performed like a most valuable player in the second half of the season and perhaps saved his career.

He taught a still-young team about professionalism and grace. And while the award highlighted Cruz's good works in the Dominican Republic, he also routinely spent his free time in the Twin Cities doing good.

How does Cruz compare to Moore in terms of charitable work and social activism?

This is where the debate truly begins.

I don't know that anybody compares with Moore.

Moore ranks as one of the best high school and college basketball players ever. As the WNBA's No. 1 pick in 2011, she helped a Lynx franchise that had never won a playoff series win the WNBA title as a rookie.

In her first seven seasons as a pro, she helped the Lynx win four titles, reach two other WNBA Finals and reach one other conference finals.

She was on her way to becoming one of the winningest athletes in American sports history, and may have positioned herself as one of the greatest players in WNBA history.

Then she quit. In her prime. Not to try out another sport or to avoid scrutiny, but to dedicate herself full-time to criminal justice reform.

She and her team helped Jonathan Irons get what she believes is a wrongful conviction overturned. The Missouri attorney general is appealing the decision. Irons spent 23 years of a 50-year sentence behind bars, in maximum security, despite what Moore, a native of Jefferson City, Mo., believes was a lack of tangible evidence.

Moore faced off with a judicial and for-profit penal system weighted against people of color. She fought the law and, against all odds, she won.

Cruz is a wonderful human being deserving of many awards and accolades.

When it came to the foremost award at the 2020 ESPYs, nobody should have finished ahead of the great and good Maya Moore.

Highlight: At least one thing is clear. We are running out of statues. We need a few new ones.

Body

Satire is a dangerous business, especially during our cultural revolution, with angry Jacobins beating up politicians, tearing down statues and terrifying corporate and political establishments in a great, leftist show of force.

It will never end, will it? Or maybe it just ends with heads.

At the rate they're going, the Jacobins won't be satisfied with heads of stone. They'll demand the real thing, with hair and teeth.

But I won't provoke them when they're all lathered up. And my friends know I'm afraid of satire.

I believe in the Importance of Being Earnest.

As most Americans know, the recent round of statue smashing started with the protests of the police murder of George Floyd. But this isn't about George Floyd anymore, is it? We're way past George Floyd now.

Corporate, political and other institutional leaders are desperate to be thought of as woke too. A few of them might be thinking about throwing the mob a few sacrificial underlings, and then climb the chaos like a ladder.

At least one thing is clear.

We are running out of statues. We need a few new ones.

So today, I ask (nay, demand) that the National Endowment for the Arts build a great new statue:

Marie Therese Louise of Savoy, Princesse de Lamballe.

John Kass: Today's cultural revolution needs a new statue. She's French, but ...

Marie de Lamballe was a French noble. But she was also quite liberal. She believed in the French Revolution and its slogans. She was wealthy, but unlike other nobles, she was quite sympathetic to the revolutionary ethos.

Today she'd most likely be honored at the Kennedy Center and donate to several museums. CNN might give her a show where she'd take poor people to fine restaurants, and nod with concern as they confessed their hopes and dreams.

If there's one in Washington who'd admire a statue of Marie de Lamballe, it would be House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, the Democrat from near statue-less San Francisco. Pelosi, wealthy, powerful and liberal herself, is busy trying to climb that ladder of chaos.

Her Democrats squabble with Republicans over how best to honor George Floyd with dueling bills on police procedure. Perhaps frustrated, Pelosi accused the Republicans of murdering Floyd.

"So far they're trying to get away with murder, actually," Pelosi said. "The murder of George Floyd."

In another age perhaps, she'd be denounced as dangerously insane. But Pelosi clearly understands our times. Climb the ladder, Nancy.

Lamballe was fashionable, educated, publicly virtuous and compassionate. She was something of a subversive intellectual, or at least she hung around with intellectuals, providing them tasty wine and sweetmeats.

She was a daughter of the French Enlightenment. And so, Lamballe was highly enlightened. Today you might say she was woke.

But she just wasn't woke enough.

A fine statue of Marie de Lamballe near the Washington Monument (or whatever we'll call that next year when Washington's name is finally erased from history) would be more than just another boring stone human for tourist families to ignore.

A statue of Marie de Lamballe might provide clarity, something needed now.

And I hope they build it soon.

Early on, as the Floyd protests intensified, the Jacobins were content with smashing statues of Confederate leaders and calling them racists. But soon they began to destroy statues of abolitionists and others who fought for the Union to free the slaves.

Some think they're a crazy mob. But I think they know what they're doing. They're erasing history and telling the rest of us to shut up and like it. Most Republicans shut up. The Democrats have little to say. And Joe Biden stays in his basement eating pudding. He doesn't say much.

A statue of President Ulysses S. Grant was torn down. He won the Civil War and sent Sherman to burn Atlanta and break the South. President Teddy Roosevelt, a progressive, is also being removed from the American Museum of Natural History in New York. And too many others to count.

This is where the Ministry of Truth expects me to tell you about "peaceful" protests. So, please ignore the next paragraph about the beating of a Wisconsin state senator the other night. And he's a Democrat.

John Kass: Today's cultural revolution needs a new statue. She's French, but ...

"I don't know what happened," Democratic state Sen. Tim Carpenter told the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel after he was assaulted for taking photos of protesters. "... All I did was stop and take a picture. And the next thing I'm getting five-six punches, getting kicked in the head."

As he rolled on the ground, getting kicked, I bet he was glad he wasn't a Republican.

But what of the Princesse de Lamballe?

Let's just say that she supported the ideals of the French Revolution until she saw what actually happens in a revolution. Her trial lasted about five minutes. She expressed her support for the revolution but would not denounce the queen.

They took her outside. They didn't even use a guillotine. Later her head was paraded on a pike before the queen's window to the joy of the revolutionaries.

All I ask is that her head be left on. And that on the base of the statue, this from a writer who we won't be allowed to mention. George Orwell was his name, but please, put down that face cage with the rat:

"Every record has been destroyed or falsified, every book rewritten, every picture has been repainted, every statue and street building has been renamed, every date has been altered. And the process is continuing day by day and minute by minute. History has stopped. Nothing exists except an endless present in which the Party is always right."

The president of the African American Leadership Council told St. Paul school board members who voted to remove school resource officers from the schools they will have "blood" on their hands if a child or teacher is hurt or killed.

Tyrone Terrill, who wrote a Sunday night email to board members in partnership with the St. Paul Black Interdenominational Ministerial Alliance, said the board was acting "on emotions and not facts."

The school board voted 5-1 last Tuesday to no longer pay the city of St. Paul to post police officers in seven high schools and to instead develop a new safety plan.

St. Paul school board members previously debated whether officers belong in the schools and the May 25 death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody sparked the discussion again.

"Once again SPPS has made it clear that you do not care about Black families as it is our Black children who are failing in all of your schools," Terrill wrote in the email. "If you were as dedicated to get rid of poor performing superintendents, principals and teachers, who year after year fail to educate our Black children as you were to getting rid of SROs in our schools our Black children might have a chance to at least get a marginal education."

Terrill said he had not received a response as of early Monday evening. He also sent the email to Superintendent Joe Gothard. District spokesman Kevin Burns said Gothard did not have a comment on Monday.

African-American leader: St. Paul board members who voted to remove SROs will have 'blood' on hands if there's school violence

Since the board's vote last week, the district has "already started work on a safety plan for our district" and it's due to be presented at the board's August meeting, Burns said.

At the time of the vote, St. Paul school officials had received over 1,000 emails on the subject, most of them urging an end to the program.

Between the vote and early Monday night, 15 messages were sent to the school board's general email address - eight expressed disappointment and anger at the decision, four agreed with the board and thanked them for the decision and three wondered about the plans moving forward, according to Burns. The number doesn't include messages that were sent to individual board members' email addresses.

Terrill directed his email to the board members who voted to not continue the contract, which had the St. Paul district paying up to $775,000 this school year. Board members Chauntyll Allen, Zuki Ellis, Jeanelle Foster, Jessica Kopp and Steve Marchese could not be reached for comment Monday.

About 80 percent of the people shot in St. Paul this year have been Black, according to police, which Terrill said prompted him to write in his email "there is a 75% chance that the student that will be hurt or killed in a SPPS school or event will be Black student, so as I said earlier in this email the 'BLOOD' will be on your hands."

Terrill said Monday he prays it doesn't happen, but he added, "there's guns in the parking lots, there's and there's guns that are one call away. A deterrent was always one or two squads parked out there and now you remove that."

Ricky Thompson, 55, doesn't have many fond memories of growing up on Chicago's South Side. But one sweet memory that stuck with him was the taste of the butter cookies served in his school cafeteria.

Those "lunchroom" cookies have become legend in Chicago. Made with just four ingredients - flour, butter, sugar and vanilla extract - they were a staple of school menus in the 1960s and 1970s. Since that time, many have tried and failed to reproduce that light buttery crunch that made kids like Thompson look forward to lunch.

After a lot of trial and error, Thompson was able to recreate the cookie he remembered. For the past seven years he's been hauling a cart around Minneapolis, peddling his "Butter Cookies For Days" to barber shops, gas stations and mom and pop stores for $3 a box.

Recently, he hit the big time. Mike Graham, the Hy-Vee grocery store manager in Robbinsdale, tasted the cookies and decided to take a chance on Thompson.

"It's a really well-known product in the neighborhood," Graham said. "We gave it a shot and it was a hit."

Now other Hy-Vee stores are calling and Thompson, who currently makes about 5,000 cookies a week by hand in a church commercial kitchen, is working to move his company to the next level.

"I've got big ideas once I get in the door," he said. "I have big dreams for this cookie."

CHICAGO'S POVERTY TRAP

Thompson was the second oldest of 11 children. Raised by a single mother, he had to drop out of school to care for his nine brothers and one sister while his mom worked.

Determined to make a better life for himself, this Twin Cities man found a sweet path out of poverty

"I missed most of my school life," he said. "I learned from others by watching and listening."

He was always on the lookout for a get-rich-quick scheme that would help him get out of poverty and into a life that could feel more stable and secure. He pumped gas, looked into selling real estate and even sold bottled water.

From those experiences, he learned three things: There's no such thing as a get-rich-quick scheme; selling drugs is a strong lure to someone struggling to put food on the table; and he was a really good salesman.

After a few failures, he took the lure and got caught selling marijuana. He spent a year and a half in prison. When he got out, he promised himself no matter how tough times were, he would not fall for that lure again.

MINNESOTA, LAND OF OPPORTUNITY

But he felt stuck, trapped and tired of not being able to see his dreams come true. He finally realized the only way up was out. He would need to leave his neighborhood and start fresh somewhere else, so he moved to Minneapolis.

"When I came here, it was unbelievable to me," he said. "Man, there's no abandoned buildings. There's no poverty like Chicago. This is opportunity!"

He worked several temp jobs but eventually came back to his first dream of wanting to work for himself. But what could he do?

Every time he visited Chicago, he brought back packages of the lunchroom butter cookies with him. This gave him an idea. He would figure out how to make them himself and introduce his favorite cookie to Minnesota.

TRIAL, ERROR AND SUCCESS

For seven months he toiled in the kitchen making butter cookies, experimenting with different recipes. For seven months, his friends told him the cookies still weren't right. He was about to give up when he realized he'd been making them with eggs, which were not part of the original recipe. That fixed the flavor, but it would take a bit more experimenting to get the texture right.

His ingredient label reads: "Flour, sugar, butter, vanilla flavor and a pinch of goodness." Whatever the pinch of goodness is, it did the trick.

"My fiancée said, 'This is it!' She said, 'What did you do?' I said, 'I started measuring.' She said, 'Keep doing it.' "

So he did, and everywhere he went, people who remembered the taste from their childhood praised him for figuring out the secret to "the best cookies in the world."

He put together a cart and went from business to business in Minneapolis along Broadway and Lyndale avenues. People called him "The Cookie Man" and liked his friendly style.

"He's got a customer base like you would not believe," said his friend, Douglas Britt. "He connects with people like I have never seen. They feel like they're part of the family."

Determined to make a better life for himself, this Twin Cities man found a sweet path out of poverty

His cookies are in several stores around Minneapolis and can be found at Sunrise Grocery on University Avenue in St. Paul.

As his business grew, he moved it out of his home in Brooklyn Park and rented Gethsemane Lutheran Church's commercial kitchen in Minneapolis. He works six days a week - three 12-hour days baking and three days selling.

He's suffered a few setbacks. As he was beginning to accumulate some savings, he says he attracted the eye of a "silent partner" who stole his money and disappeared.

GOD, BIG DREAMS AND HARD WORK

Thompson is hoping the deal with Hy-Vee will allow him to expand and experiment with other products. He'd also love to have his own bakery shop one day.

One of his first commercial customers was Cup Foods, the Minneapolis grocery store that George Floyd died in front of while in police custody. He said some pressured him to pull his cookies from the mom and pop store after the incident, but he refused.

"They gave me my first break," he said. "I'm so disappointed with everything that happened down there. But those people have never done anything to me. That has nothing to do with my cookies."

Southern Soul Food entrepreneur hopes to sell Northerners on batter-fried corn on the cob Get a taste \(make that a sip\) of the MN State Fair with sales of its cups Photos: India's lockdown spurs new gardeners in Nagaland Photos: NYC's restaurants get creative for street eating A honey of an art installation on side of St. Paul chocolate shop After the riots, he stayed up all night making cookies for the Gethsemane church staff who were distributing food to North siders.

His advice to young people? "Put God in your life and know that things are going to get better. Pray about it and know that you can do anything you want if you put your mind to it. I wanted to give up so many times. Just keep moving on ... and know that it can happen."

STATUES

A June 26 letter writer, at the conclusion of her letter about history and statues, asks, "What is that old saying about those who cannot remember the past?" ("History, as always, is complicated.")

An updated response is, "Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to retweet it."

Mary McLeod, St. Paul

...

In regard to a letter writer's comments about the Roosevelt statue at the American Museum of Natural History in New York, I don't believe he sees the whole picture as it relates to the scene in the statue ("Watch what you call 'troubling,' " June 25). The statue depicts Theodore Roosevelt leading subjugated people out of the bleak future afforded them in American society - when it was our society that put them there in the first place.

My personal preference would be to show the subjugated people in front, leading Roosevelt and his horse out of ignorance from the past.

James Kujawa, Brooklyn Park

PRESIDENTIAL PARDONS

The law applies to presidents, too. Biden would be able to show it.

The commentary by Robert Moilanen on whether Joe Biden should or should not pardon President Donald Trump if Biden gets elected was the most irresponsible article I have read in a while, even more so coming from an attorney ("Biden should reconsider promise not to pardon Trump," June 24). After laying out a compelling reason why Trump should be prosecuted, Moilanen then falls on the tired reasoning behind Gerald Ford's pardon of Richard Nixon. If a president has flagrantly abused his office and broken laws that compromise the security of this country, not pardoning is not a move for revenge but a move toward justice.

Pardoning presidents instantly puts them not just above the law but completely outside of it. It tells an outgoing president that he got away with it, and it leaves a very clear message to future presidents that they, too, can side step the law, especially if they have a compliant Congress willing to overlook even willful lawlessness.

If justice is to be applied evenly and meaningfully, it is most important that it starts with the president. If the law fails to do its job, it eventually ripples through the whole system of justice and by its nature the very government charged with upholding those laws - which brings us to Attorney General William Barr, who has literally become the president's single largest enabler. If the president is a crook, how does giving him a pardon heal the nation, much less assure the blessings of liberty for ourselves and our posterity?

HOUSING

Density does help solve this problem

Before we listen to Fritz Knaak, a lawyer in North Oaks, lecture us about affordable housing, let's get the facts ("Yes, the Twin Cities are harmfully segregated," Opinion Exchange, June 26). His belief that we can have "more affordable single-family construction in the suburbs and exurbs" leaves out the additional cost to tax- and ratepayers of infrastructure and municipal services, never fully covered by development fees and often subsidized by those living in denser areas, where costs are lower.

A 2013 study showed that compact development, on average, costs 38% less in infrastructure installation, 10% less in service delivery and generates 10 times more tax revenue per acre than single-family suburban development. Knaak is also disingenuous in claiming that rising real estate values in Minneapolis limit less-expensive housing choices. Zoning does that, with height restrictions, minimum lot and unit sizes, and parking requirements that Minneapolis has led in changing or eliminating.

The "cult of densification" that Knaak attributes to the Metropolitan Council is really a concern for equitable development and a diversity of housing options, something Knaak claims to want.

Thomas Fisher, St. Paul

The commentary by Cathy ten Broeke, et al., certainly let us know that many important people with the title of "commissioner" are on the job, asking for more taxpayer dollars to deal with what they call the "unprecedented situation with homeless encampments ("All policy levers must be used to meet needs," Opinion Exchange, June 25). Oh, wait, there was the Wall of Forgotten Natives encampment before this. And many others for years.

What is unprecedented is that housed people, serving as the true and honest advocates for homeless persons (unpaid, by the way), are holding ten Broeke and her enablers in public office to account.

That destroys the classic narrative used by this bunch: "The public does not care." She and the rest have gotten away with their high-paid jobs and clueless approach because they could count on the isolation of the powerless people they claim to care about.

READERS WRITE Don't know much about history

Did these commissioners think that unsheltered people just ceased to exist? How did these experts fail to know that encampments have existed and been growing for years?

Over time, and after analyzing the failure of the 10-year plan to end homelessness, one pattern I pinpointed was the excuses they use for their incompetence: the tornadoes that hit north Minneapolis, the Great Recession, COVID-19.

And their continued request for more money, which they waste, is their main solution. But, they have not been held accountable for how the money is spent.

The recent commentary states more money is needed for outreach workers. Truly a bridge to nowhere - outreach workers faced with no resources to connect people with. And an ad for the Walz administration is also tucked into the commentary.

Until these incompetent and overpaid commissioners and their army of sycophants are removed from the debacle they have largely created, all the money we have will not address homelessness.

Margaret Hastings, Minneapolis

THE TWINS

Time for baseball to step up on race

It's been a tough year for baseball fans, but another great year for Minnesota Twins fans. Since George Floyd's death, the Twins have listened to baseball fans who didn't see themselves among the "good, hard working white people" Calvin Griffith's Twins came to play for in 1961. These fans include the black Minnesotans that Griffith certainly didn't come to play for, by Nick Coleman's account from 1978.

But when, exactly, did the Twins start to reach out and actively cultivate a black fan base? Recent actions and commitments are admirable, but what do black baseball fans think? Were the '87 and '91 teams their World Champions, too?

A smiling white Minnie and a smiling white Paul still shake hands over center field, raising the question: Are these finally Minnesota's Twins?

Rod Carew urged us to learn from history, and the Pohlad statue at the ballpark appears to promise continued leadership, transparency and commitment to honor the public resources invested in the franchise.

So let's go big and expect big things from the Minnesota Twins and our sportswriters. How have players past and present experienced discrimination within Twins baseball and the MLB? Where else has structural racism influenced the business and the game of baseball? Let's ask the players and the fans, but especially those who've been left out of the game.

Length: 992 wordsByline: Rubén RosarioHighlight: Current staff at Sunset Memorial did not know when the whites-only clause was removed.Body

Ninety one years ago this month, E.R. Kullberg, a Twin Cities area commercial artist, paid $180 for six plots at Sunset Memorial Park in northeast Minneapolis.

He had no problems signing the contract deed, which contained the following clause, one found in far too many public cemeteries across the nation at that time:

"The Purchaser further covenants and agrees that said property above described shall be used only for the internment or burial of deceased persons of the Caucasian race..."

Kullberg, who had purchased the plots for himself, his wife, two young daughters and their future husbands, was cremated in 1968.

"He was a racist," recalled Mitch Carmody, a local artist and grief-and-loss motivational speaker who now lives in Prescott, Wis.

Carmody's mother, one of Kullberg's daughters, inherited both the unused plots as well as her father's views on Black people and other minorities.

Although he described his late mother as very loving, Carmody and his handful of older siblings grew up on Grey Cloud Island Township hearing the N-word and other slurs whenever the conversation turned to race relations. Racially offensive language was used at the dinner table and casually attached to food items like black licorice and Brazil nuts.

A defining moment for him came when he was 16 - a year after his father died and he had befriended co-workers of color at the old St. Paul Hilton where he worked as a dishwasher - when he asked his mother why she continued to espouse racist vernacular.

Her response?

"She said the best thing for America is to have every n..... swim back to Africa with a Jew under each arm," he recalled. "My life changed after she said that. How awful. Hers did not. She died a racist."

Rosario: Talk about burying the past ...

Carmody, and his oldest sister, who is now the legal heir to the unused plots, made it a point to break the generational cycle of racist views and language with their own children.

But what to do with the plots, which they inherited after their mother died in 1999, followed by their stepfather a year ago?

Brother and sister have no plans to use the plots. They could sell them, which, based on one online site, can fetch $1,500 or more each at the 98-year-old, 130-acre cemetery. They could also leave them for their kids.

But Carmody and his sister, who did not want to be identified, came up with an idea Carmody describes as poetic justice - donate the burial sites to a family of color in need.

"I am just so sad being privy to such casual social injustice and bigotry in my life ..." Carmody explained in an email. "I have to make a stand. ... I can no longer be complicit by my silence. This has to change."

His sister, who said she was not close to her mother but still took care of the woman during her last year of life after she contracted lung cancer, feels the same way.

"Reading those documents - holy cow - I knew that the world was like that in the 1920s but you don't like to see them thrown in your face in 2020," she said.

The siblings plan to donate the plots to the Brooks Funeral Home in St. Paul - the oldest Black-owned funeral home in the state.

Margaret Brooks, co-owner of the 79-year-old funeral home along with her husband, George, broke into tears when I informed her of the donation gesture and the reasons why.

"Oh my Lord, this is unbelievable," Brooks said between sobs. "This is such a blessing."

Carmody's sister hopes word about the donation "will encourage others to celebrate the momentum of the current response to George Floyd's death."

Current staff at Sunset Memorial did not know when the whites-only clause was removed.

But it was still in effect in 1958 - four years after the noted Brown vs. Board of Education Supreme Court decision and a decade after President Harry S. Truman signed an executive order to integrate the military.

The Sunset Park Memorial Association moved to enforce the clause on a contract deed signed by a married couple three years earlier. The husband, David Erickson was Caucasian but his wife, Ramona, was Native American. When she informed the cemetery in 1958 of her heritage, the association informed her that she could not be buried at the cemetery and that they could only refund her $198 of the $360 the couple had paid for the two plots.

The couple sued in court. A Hennepin County judge ruled in favor of the couple, declaring that a 1953 state law prohibiting racial or religious discrimination in real estate transfers voided the clause. In 1961 the state Supreme Court affirmed the decision in a written opinion that included an excerpt from a California judge involved in a similar case years earlier.

Rosario: Talk about burying the past ...

"I cannot believe that a man's mortal remains will disintegrate any less peaceably because of the close proximity of the body of a member of another race, and in that inevitable disintegration I am sure that the pigmentation of the skin cannot long endure," wrote judge Timothy Dooling.

"If life does not do so, the universal fellowship of death should teach humility," he added. "The good people who insist on the racial segregation of what is mortal in man may be shocked to learn when their own lives end that God has reserved no racially exclusive position for them in the hereafter."

David Erickson died in 1972. Ramona died in 1984 at age 83. Both are buried at Sunset Memorial.

"My sister and our whole family agree this is what we need to do, and are overwhelmingly delighted for this opportunity to help our community heal and grow," Carmody wrote, adding: "to do our part and stand up for the egregious wrongs perpetrated on people of color in our community and in our country."

ARTICLE MIII. COPS STOPPING COPS: RULES, BUT NO TRAINING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 30, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1106 wordsByline: RANDY FURST; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The police killing of George Floyd a month ago is prompting new scrutiny of the three officers who failed to intervene before the handcuffed suspect lost consciousness and died as he was pinned to the pavement by a veteran officer.

"You watch this scene and ask yourself, why do they stand by?" said Chuck Wexler, executive director of the Police Executive Research Forum in Washington, D.C., and national authority on police practices. "When is it going to change so that intervening is considered doing the right thing?"

Several experts in police psychology and behavior, including some top police officials, say Floyd's death is indicative of a larger problem: a tendency of officers to not question and intervene when another officer - particularly a senior officer - uses excessive force.

"When you intervene, you have the ability to potentially save a life or a career," Shaun Ferguson, superintendent of the New Orleans Police Department, wrote in a staff memo.

Training officers how and when to intervene, while mandatory in New Orleans and being developed by other law enforcement agencies nationwide, is not done in Minneapolis.

Erik Misselt, interim executive director of the Minnesota Peace Officer Standards and Training (POST) board, which does initial training of officers and issues licenses, said he's unaware of any law enforcement peer intervention training in the state.

"We don't have anything in the state of Minnesota that is that specific," Misselt said, although there is training on how officers can keep themselves in check. The board will review programs to consider possible changes, he said.

During last week's special session, the Legislature stalemated on proposals for police reform, including a requirement for officers to intercede. None of the bills would have required training officers when and how to intervene to stop misconduct.

Cops stopping cops: Rules, but no training

For nearly eight minutes, Officer Derek Chauvin knelt on Floyd's neck. Floyd's death led to murder charges against Chauvin, plus aiding and abetting murder charges against the three officers who assisted in the arrest.

Experts in police psychology and behavior, including some top police officials, say Floyd's death was preventable.

"All of this could have been avoided if one or two of his fellow officers intervened," Ferguson wrote in his staff memo.

Chauvin was a training officer for two of the rookie officers who were charged with aiding and abetting murder: J Alexander Kueng and Thomas Lane.

Al Berryman, former president of the Minneapolis Police Federation and a retired sergeant, said officers were not trained on how to intervene in such situations. A new officer assigned to a trainer would be reluctant to intervene because the trainer could write him up, he said. "It could affect your probation."

Before Floyd's death, the Minneapolis Police Department had a rule stating that officers had a duty "to either stop or attempt to stop another sworn employee when force is being inappropriately applied or is no longer required."

On June 16, Minneapolis Police Chief Medaria Arradondo revised the rule in an e-mail sent to police supervisors.

"Regardless of tenure or rank," the e-mail says, "any sworn employee who observes another employee use any prohibited force, or inappropriate or unreasonable force (including applying force when it is no longer required), must attempt to safely intervene by verbal and physical means. Employees who attempt to safely intervene shall not be subject to discipline to the same severity as if they themselves engaged in the prohibited, inappropriate or unreasonable use of force."

The penalty for failing to intervene ranges from coaching and a disciplinary letter to termination. The POST Board will vote July 23 on a stronger policy establishing a duty to intervene.

Former Hennepin County Sheriff Rich Stanek, now a consultant, says an intervention policy is insufficient. "A policy must be followed up with training that is scenario-based," he said.

Few departments in the United States train officers on how to intervene in such situations, though the number is growing in the wake of Floyd's death. There's been a surge of interest in the New Orleans Police training program known as EPIC, which stands for Ethical Policing is Courageous.

"The 'duty to intervene' law has been there for a long time," said Jonathan Aronie, federally appointed monitor of the New Orleans police. "It is one thing to say there is a duty to intervene. EPIC teaches you how."

Since the introduction of EPIC, incidents of deadly force and the firing of police weapons were down significantly, according to a 2019 report on the agency. Complaints from the public also fell.

Aronie's firm helped underwrite creation this month of the Active Bystandardship for Law Enforcement Project at Georgetown University to train officers in how to intervene. About 100 law enforcement agencies, some of them large, have asked to be part of the training, Aronie said.

Baltimore, Philadelphia and Boston are among the cities whose police departments have announced plans to adopt an EPIC-like program.

The state of Washington plans to begin such intervention training for all officers, says Sue Rahr, executive director of the Washington State Criminal Justice Training Commission.

"Just making a rule is not enough to compel people to follow it," Rahr said. "What we are seeing across the nation is not a failure of rules and laws, it's a failure of culture," she said. "If you have a new recruit who observes a training officer is doing something wrong, that recruit needs to know that he'll be supported by intervening." In New Orleans, officers get an annual eight-hour class that includes role playing, and other classes as well. Deputy Chief Paul Noel said that if someone with a lower rank sees him do something wrong, he expects that officer to tell him to stop.

"It's a contract we have with each other," Noel said. "Part of the training is for officers to learn is that good teamwork doesn't mean going along with whatever your fellow officer does, but to intervene when the officer does something unethical, unnecessary," he said.

John Locke, a retired Minneapolis police sergeant, trained officers in Minneapolis for 25 years. He said when a young officer is on probation, his task is to observe and ask questions.

Locke noted that Thomas Lane, one of the officers who assisted with Floyd's arrest, had twice suggested that they roll Floyd onto his side so that he could breathe.

Chauvin refused.

So what was Lane supposed to do, throw Chauvin off and roll him over anyway? Locke asked.

"It doesn't happen," he said.

Police trial could be moved, judge warns

ARTICLE MIV. POLICE TRIAL COULD BE MOVED, JUDGE WARNS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

June 30, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1178 wordsByline: CHAO XIONG; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Public officials' speaking out could force venue changeBody

Comments made by public officials and others about the May 25 killing of George Floyd and the former Minneapolis police officers charged in his death threaten to move court proceedings outside of Hennepin County, a judge warned Monday.

At an omnibus hearing Monday afternoon, several of the defense attorneys representing the former officers - Derek Chauvin, J. Alexander Kueng, Thomas Lane and Tou Thao - criticized city, county and state officials for expressing opinions they believe have tainted their clients' constitutional right to a fair trial.

"I'm fighting the battle with one hand" because of the public statements, said Thao's attorney, Robert Paule, adding that he planned to file a motion for a change of venue.

Hennepin County District Judge Peter Cahill agreed that public commentary on the case has reached inappropriate levels, specifically noting that people aligned with the prosecution are pushing it toward a change of venue.

"It's in everyone's best interest" that no public statements about the case be made, Cahill said, noting that they've come from family, friends and law enforcement officials. "What they're doing is endangering the right to a fair trial. They need to understand that."

Persuading the court to move a trial outside of the county in which the alleged crime occurred is typically difficult, and it's unusual for a judge to so strongly rebuke public officials and others, including Floyd's supporters, for influencing court proceedings.

The issue dominated the hearings, which took place separately for each defendant and also touched on future court dates, the amount of evidence in the case and whether cameras should be allowed at the trial scheduled for March 8, 2021.

Police trial could be moved, judge warns

Dozens of media personnel from across the world gathered outside the Hennepin County Public Safety Facility as two of the former officers - Kueng and Lane - arrived through a skyway entrance that connected directly to the building. The two have posted bond or bail and are out of custody.

Floyd's aunt Angela Harrelson and uncle Selwyn Jones also attended the hearings.

"My nephew was a good dude," Jones said. "He had problems, everyone has problems, everybody's got a story, but his story shouldn't have ended on the streets of Minneapolis, Minnesota, by four people."

Harrelson said the trial should be held in Hennepin County.

"What's the purpose of moving it?" she asked. "Honestly, I mean the whole world knows about it, and I'm like, well, where are you going to go? ... You can move to Africa; they knew about it. ... All that's going to do is make it inconvenient for the family to get there."

Chauvin, who is charged with second-degree unintentional murder, third-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter, appeared via remote TV from the state prison at Oak Park Heights where he is being held on $1.25 million bail.

The other three are charged with aiding and abetting murder and manslaughter.

Chauvin had no supporters in the downtown Minneapolis courtroom where his attorney, Eric Nelson, and co-defendants appeared in person.

Chauvin planted his knee on Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes as Floyd, who was handcuffed and lying stomach-down in the street, repeatedly said he couldn't breathe and warned that he was going to die while the four officers arrested him for allegedly using a fake $20 bill.

Nelson told the judge he would seek a gag order if public commentary about the case continues to escalate.

While Nelson did not name anyone, Minneapolis Police Chief Medaria Arradondo, Department of Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington and Gov. Tim Walz have all called Floyd's death a "murder," among other remarks about the case. Attorney General Keith Ellison, whose office is leading the prosecution with assistance from the Hennepin County Attorney's Office, has said he is confident a jury will convict the former officers.

Paule later called out those public officials by title, along with Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey, Hennepin County Attorney Mike Freeman, President Donald Trump and attorneys for Floyd's family for speaking about the case.

"There are others involved in this case who do not respect the court and do not respect my client's right to a fair trial," Paule said, adding that some people are using the media to further their self-interest.

Cahill asked both defense attorneys and Assistant Attorney General Matthew Frank, who is leading the prosecution, to tamp down on public commentary from people they have "control" or "influence" over.

Frank said prosecutors are just as interested in a fair trial and are "acutely" aware of the publicity issues. He told the court his office has done its best to relay the concerns to public officials.

Police trial could be moved, judge warns

"Legally, we don't have control over them," Frank said. "I can tell the court we are doing what we can to avoid these problems as well. Your comments will be shared with those individuals as much as we can."

Kueng's attorney, Thomas Plunkett, briefly addressed a motion filed last week by all four defendants, and a new response he filed Monday, to allow cameras at all pretrial and trial proceedings to ensure a fair and public trial in light of the public commentary. The prosecution had objected to the motion, and Cahill ruled last week that no cameras would be allowed at pretrial hearings. Cahill said Monday his stance had not changed in reaction to Plunkett's newest arguments.

Moving the trial outside Hennepin County would be a more appropriate remedy to address publicity than recording and broadcasting the proceedings, Cahill told Plunkett.

However, the judge said he would address camera access at trial later and urged both sides to file their opinions on the matter.

Jones and Harrelson, Floyd's uncle and aunt, said they approve of recording and broadcasting the court proceedings and trial.

"I think the more media we have on this case the more resolve we'll get, because I don't know literally what we're missing here, since 2 to 3 billion people have seen the video of him literally murdered," Jones said.

Cahill hasn't decided whether the four cases will be tried together, and asked both sides to file their opinions on the issue.

Lane's attorney, Earl Gray, told Cahill he planned to file a motion for a hearing to argue that evidence was insufficient to charge his client and that the case should be dismissed.

Gray and Plunkett have previously blamed Chauvin, a 19-year veteran on the police force, for killing Floyd.

Lane was working his fourth day and Kueng his third shift as full-time officers, and the rookies were following Chauvin's lead, they argued. Lane also asked Chauvin twice about rolling Floyd on his side but was rebuffed, according to Gray and court documents.

The matter and other motions are expected to be addressed at the next hearing for all four defendants on Sept. 11.

Attorneys said that while "voluminous" evidence continues to be produced in the case, more than 8,000 items have already been presented, including about 750 audio and video files and thousands of pages of cellphone data analysis.

Mpls. has paid $63,000 to private security firms for 3 council members

Body

The city of Minneapolis has paid two private security firms $63,000 over the last three weeks to protect three City Council members amid tensions over George Floyd's death and efforts to end the Police Department.

While the city has not named the council members - saying their identities weren't public information - the Star Tribune has confirmed they are Council Vice President Andrea Jenkins and Council Members Alondra Cano and Phillipe Cunningham.

"This security service is intended to be temporary and bridge to other security measures implemented by council members themselves," city spokeswoman Sarah McKenzie said Monday.

McKenzie said the city has spent $63,000 over the past three weeks for security service for three council members. She said contracts for less than $175,000 typically do not need public approval from council, and they do not expect these expenses to surpass that threshold.

The security is coming from two companies: Aegis and Belcom. McKenzie said the companies provide licensed, armed security officers.

The council members have been under increasing scrutiny since they and some of their colleagues gathered in Powderhorn Park earlier this month and promised to begin the process of ending the Minneapolis Police Department. The plans were vague at that point, heightening tensions between people who wanted to dismantle the department and those who feared the repercussions of a city without a traditional police force.

On Friday, the City Council voted unanimously to advance a proposal that would eliminate from the city charter - essentially its constitution - the requirement to maintain and fund the department. In its place, the city would be required to have a department of community safety and violence prevention, which could employ "licensed peace officers" but wouldn't be required to do so. That would ultimately need approval from voters.

Mpls. has paid $63,000 to private security firms for 3 council members

Asked whether the Minneapolis Police Department had any reports of threats against council members, department spokesman John Elder said he didn't have any information he could share. In Minnesota, public officials who make reports to police can ask that their name be redacted, which would prohibit the department from confirming whether those reports exist.

"The Minneapolis Police Department takes threats seriously and [they] will/would be vigorously investigated," Elder said in an e-mail.

Cunningham, in a Twitter thread, compared the security that council members are receiving to coverage provided regularly to the mayor.

The city has provided security to the mayor dating back decades.

That security is provided through the Minneapolis Police Department. An officer, who also serves as a driver, accompanies the mayor at most public events. At least two officers rotate on that schedule. During large public events, they might work simultaneously.

It was not immediately clear how the cost of the mayor's security compares to the cost of the private security being offered to council members. Elder said MPD did not receive requests for security for council members.

Jenkins declined to comment about the private security, saying she feared the story would jeopardize the safety of her, Cano and Cunningham.

"A story about that really makes it even more necessary to have security," she said.

Cano said she was tied up Monday in meetings about the homeless encampment in Powderhorn Park, and Cunningham did not respond to a message.

Cunningham previously tweeted that he had "received numerous death threats since I was campaigning for either being transgender or outspoken about police accountability and systems change."

He wrote that he did not feel comfortable providing more detail. "Security was offered to me by the City, and I accepted it because I need to keep my family safe from the very real threats against me. ... I believe any reasonable person would have accepted help like I did. It's unfortunate my family's safety has been exploited for a news talking point."

University of Minnesota student body President Jael Kerandi could not initially bring herself to watch the graphic video depicting the police killing of George Floyd. Instead, she sprang into action in the hours after his death late last month, writing a letter to university President Joan Gabel demanding the school immediately cut ties with the Minneapolis Police Department.

"It was very important that students understood that black lives mattered to the University of Minnesota," said Kerandi, the school's first African-American student body president. "Students just don't feel comfortable with the police on campus."

Gabel responded within 24 hours, announcing the university would no longer contract with Minneapolis police for large events such as football games and would limit collaboration to "joint patrols and investigations."

The uprising against police brutality had taken root at Minnesota's flagship university - and has since spread to colleges across the state and country. Students at the University of Iowa, Ohio State and Northwestern are calling on their schools to cut ties with city police departments. At Harvard and Yale University, student protesters also have demanded their campus police departments be abolished.

Similar pushes are unfolding in Minnesota as student leaders urge their schools to re-evaluate their approaches to public safety.

"I think that young people know there is a very important role for them to play to push us forward," said Charles H.F. Davis III, an assistant professor at the University of Southern California who studies racism and campus climate. "They have some of the most radical imaginations about what is possible for a world that we would like to live in."

Students of color lead police push

Josh Bronson, director of training for the International Association of Campus Law Enforcement Administrators, said he believes a change in police culture is needed after the death of Floyd.

But while campuses could benefit from a public-safety response team that includes mental health and social workers, Bronson said, police should still be involved in keeping the peace.

"To cut ties [with police] ... I understand it but I don't know that that's necessarily the solution either," Bronson said. "I think it's about being strategic."

Rethinking campus safety

Student leaders in the Minnesota State system of public universities and community colleges were quick to demand change after Floyd's death.

The student association LeadMN, which represents 165,000 community and technical college students, called on system Chancellor Devinder Malhotra to review and re-envision Minnesota State's law enforcement programs and teaching methods. Malhotra followed through, announcing the formation of a work group to do just that.

Students were surprised to learn the four officers charged in Floyd's death attended a Minnesota State college; the state college system educates approximately 80% of Minnesota police officers through its 22 professional peace officer education programs.

Oballa Oballa, president of LeadMN, said he told Malhotra the system "can't be silent anymore" on the issue of police violence. "If we see something and we don't come up with a solution, that thing will repeat," said Oballa, an Ethiopia native and student at Riverland Community College in Austin, Minn.

Students United, which represents students at Minnesota State's seven universities, released its own list of demands for Malhotra and university presidents. Campus public safety offices should be redesigned with a focus on compassion, equity and harm reduction, the group wrote in its letter to system leaders. And all system institutions should consider severing ties with city and county police that "enable harm and violence," they wrote.

As a black man, Students United state chairman Ola Abimbola said he has always felt the need to look over his shoulder. He's been pulled over by police for "all kinds of reasons," he said, and often worried he would be stopped on his trips to and from the campus library.

College students, many of whom are already struggling with issues such as food insecurity, should not have to worry about racial profiling or excessive force at the hands of law enforcement, Abimbola said.

"Our students deserve a healthy, safe and inclusive environment that is devoid of excessive policing, discrimination, racism," said Abimbola, who recently graduated from Southwest Minnesota State University.

Back at the University of Minnesota, Kerandi and other students have shifted their scrutiny to the campus police department.

They want the school to establish an advisory board of students and community members to review the University of Minnesota Police Department's budget and complaints.

Students of color lead police push

'We have to reimagine'

Kerandi said she would like to see some of the department's funding diverted to mental health resources and other student support services.

"We have to reimagine if we need police officers that are armed on our campus," she said.

The university's police department has 53 sworn officers who carry firearms while on duty, according to a school spokeswoman. The department's budget in fiscal year 2020 was just north of $11 million.

Not everyone believes campus police deserve such scrutiny. University of Minnesota senior Alyssa Rinelli said she's had "nothing but great experiences" with campus police.

At times, Rinelli said she has felt unsafe walking home from campus at night. Earlier this month, there were four robberies near campus, one of which was at gunpoint. It is comforting to know that campus police are just a quick call away, she said.

"I've definitely felt safer with their presence being there on campus," Rinelli said.

MOUNT RUSHMORE

There is a big difference between memorializing four of America's most famous presidents who are carved into the Black Hills of South Dakota and the hatred represented by clichéd sculptures to traitors erected after the Civil War across the South, with the explicit purpose of enshrining Jim Crow and perpetuating terrorism against black people ("Trump's Rushmore visit sparks outcry," front page, June 26).

Rather than fulminating about tearing down the Mount Rushmore memorial, we should all instead fully fund the completion of the Crazy Horse monument nearby. It is a powerful statement that all Native Americans should support.

Both can and should exist side by side.

Bruce Downing, St. Cloud, Minn.

Having lived in Rapid City, S.D., for a few years, I've visited Mount Rushmore many times. The visitor center contains a complete history of its construction from start to finish. The important thing to note about Mount Rushmore is how the federal government funded most of it. Not far from Mount Rushmore is the Crazy Horse Memorial, another sculpture in granite - a sculpture of a great Native American leader who died to help protect his people against an invasion the federal government promised they would never allow ... but did. It's not finished and no federal funds have ever been spent to finish it.

In this time where we are questioning statues and monuments, we should also question why those monuments like the Crazy Horse Memorial sit unfinished. When the president visits Mount Rushmore to see white leaders, he should also visit the Crazy Horse Memorial to see a Native American leader, a leader who gave his last full measure to protect his people from injustice. Hopefully he'll learn about how the federal government broke a treaty (still upheld by the Supreme Court to this day), stole their land and enabled the mass murder of men, women and children that followed.

Norm Hickel, Prior Lake

I find the article about the Lakota interesting, describing how their land was stolen from them.

Some of them state that Mount Rushmore is nothing more a depiction of the white men who stole their land, and therefore the monument should be taken down.

How far do you go back in trying to change history? The Lakota gained that land from other tribes. Do those tribes have the right to erase any symbolic features of the Lakota Nation? Who did those tribes defeat for their land? Do we go back hundreds of years, a thousand years? The history of man relates to acquiring land from someone else.

Bill Bunce, White Bear Lake

MINNEAPOLIS CITY COUNCIL

What happened to social workers?

Isn't it rich ($63,000 over the past three weeks, and counting) that three Minneapolis City Council members are using private security after receiving death threats? Are they showing their privilege by employing security at taxpayer expense? I sure hope this private security is composed of counselors and psychologists and not gun-toting former cops now working as private security.

If the security being hired is armed, it would be the height of hubris and hypocrisy.

Thomas M. Sullivan, Edina

The Minneapolis City Council is generating a lot more heat than light with its proposal to eliminate the Police Department. Rather than initiating the needed conversations about how to enhance safety for all our citizens, the council's idea delays real action until after the November elections. Then, if the city charter proposal is adopted, we will have succeeded in rearranging the deck chairs on the Titanic but won't be any closer to implementing solutions.

Certainly, we could consider doing away with the department if the police union is unwilling to explore changes to the policing process. But we've hardly given them a chance to respond to criticisms, much less to display intransigence.

Enough posturing! Let's put the community's anger to work by initiating conversations between all the stakeholders: activists, police, local government, social workers, mental health specialists, etc. We need improvements that can be implemented quickly, not distant organizational reshuffling.

W. Perry Benson, Minneapolis

It would be hard to be more wrong than Joseph W. Anthony in his counterpoint ("Yes, Minneapolis government is dysfunctional," June 26): "I have lived in Minneapolis for 46 years. During that time what has the City Council done to clean up Block E and Hennepin Avenue? Nothing. ... Witness the absence of any meaningful restaurant or entertainment venues on Hennepin Avenue."

READERS WRITE Answer granite with granite

The last 46 years is exactly when the City Council moved heaven and earth in numerous efforts to "clean up" Hennepin Avenue, particularly buying and renovating historic theaters, and steering the redevelopment of both City Center and Block E (the latter involved moving the Shubert Theater, the heaviest such move ever on rubber wheels). Over that time, the city even changed Hennepin from two-way to one-way and back again.

I don't like everything the city has done on Hennepin - City Center and Block E are ho-hum at best, and I wish they'd lined the street with metal trees as proposed in a city-sponsored redesign plan - but you can't say the Minneapolis City Council has done nothing.

GOVERNMENT

Set aside partisan bickering, please

Making America better - "great" is down the road; "great again" is absurd - requires a government that works. Ours does not.

At local, state and national levels, American government is stuck. Partisan gridlock has party members opposing one another in a knee-jerk fashion, often before partisans know the issue at hand. If we cannot elect representatives who focus on the common good rather than party loyalty or crass self-interest, we will continue down the road to becoming a failed city/state/nation.

The police killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis sparked not only local but national and international demonstrations calling for dismantling institutional racism, yet our own state government functions (or should we say dysfunctions?) on rigid party-line voting that yields nothing.

Minnesota government failing to pass meaningful legislation to address systemic racism is an embarrassment. This is the major moral issue of our time, and we are at its center. Our advice to legislators: Put party loyalty aside and do the right thing. Now.

COVID-19

A shallow care for virus responders

It was only weeks ago that nearly every news source showed people openly praising our health care workers and first responders for their courageous fight to treat victims of the coronavirus, often at the risk of their own physical and mental health. So now, when many states begin to open up and allow people to gather in restaurants, bars and other public places, many seem to forget to follow a few simple guidelines to prevent a second wave of the pandemic. This selfish act says very loudly and clearly that their support for health care workers was shallow and that they really don't care too much about health care workers and first responders being inundated with more cases than previously seen.

This virus will not go away until everyone does their part and/or we have a vaccine. Until then, we need to take care of health care workers and first responders by preventing the spread of COVID-19. Some people are inconvenienced by masks and social distancing, but that inconvenience is nothing compared to that experienced by those who treat the victims.

A St. Paul nonprofit that helps artists in need has been overwhelmed by requests for help during the pandemic and will temporarily halt giving out money until it can recalibrate.

Most years, the Springboard for the Arts' personal emergency relief fund has a $10,000 budget. The organization has distributed more than $1 million to fund applicants the past three months alone.

The number of artists that have applied for $500 in aid has topped 2,000. With most art events and performances canceled due to the coronavirus, many artists are unemployed and are struggling to pay their rent or buy groceries.

To keep up with the high demand for financial relief, Springboard for the Arts relied heavily on foundation and individual donations. On June 24, the organization's personal emergency relief fund ran out of money.

While incoming applications are currently paused, Springboard for the Arts' organizers hope to relaunch the fund in August.

"We closed applications this week, but we already have about 300 applications that we don't have the funds for," said Laura Zabel, executive director of Springboard for the Arts.

FUNDING CHANGE THROUGH ART

Springboard for the Arts will also pause its community emergency relief fund for the month of July.

Like the personal relief fund, the program granted artists up to $500, but the money must be spent on an art project that addressed a community issue. In the past, the fund has supported local artists as they create projects addressing gun violence, changing immigration policies and homelessness.

Springboard for the Arts coronavirus fund pauses after topping $1 million in aid

The relief fund is overwhelmed by applicants hoping to create art in response to the coronavirus pandemic or the death of George Floyd.

Briauna Williams, an independent artist from Robbinsdale, was able to get the $500 payment before the fund closed. She used the Community Emergency Relief Fund last year to create a piece that illustrated her experience as a Black woman in Minnesota for a showcase at Phoenix Theater.

This time, she plans to use the money to fund a sidewalk chalk art project that involves kids.

"I think it's crucial to get kids out and involved in art right now, because the anxiety of the news they hear from TV or adults or out their window is affecting them." she said.

ARTIST ON THE FRONTLINES

Giving artists the funds to respond to local emergencies is a no-brainer for Amelia Brown, board chair of Springboard for the Arts.

After Hurricane Katrina, Brown spent two years in New Orleans as a volunteer director. While she was there, she saw first hand how artists were able to use art to help make rebuilding and recovery efforts more accessible to everyone, Brown said.

Brown now owns the Minnesota-based consultation service Emergency Arts. She advises artists on how to best impact their community with their work, and advocates for the inclusion of artists in emergency response practices in Minnesota.

"For me, there's no disconnect between art and emergency response," Brown said. "The disconnection I see is between art and standard emergency response practices."

Policy-makers often don't take enough risks when it comes to implementing creative solutions, says Brown. That's where artists come in.

"The creative process artists have is not only for making murals on buildings," Brown said. "The same skills, talents, and community connections they have can be applied in a boardroom."

Right now, the nation is facing two large crises: the coronavirus pandemic, and systemic racism. Artists are already working on the frontlines, says Brown.

"So many artists are transforming our city right now," she said. "We need the infrastructure to support them."

As Springboard for the Arts plans for the future, executive director Zabel knows the emergency relief fund is not a long-term solution.

"$500 doesn't fix the whole problem," Zabel said. "Our organization also wants to be involved in long-term changes that would make our emergency fund less necessary."

Those changes include a more accessible health care system, and better support for small-business owners, Zabel says.

Steven Ortiz Jr. sent a big paragraph to the Gophers' 2021 recruiting class group chat after George Floyd's killing in police custody.

"Love you guys all so much. I can't wait to ride with you guys," it read. "Don't let this George Floyd incident reflect on you guys staying committed. Because it happens pretty much everywhere."

Ortiz then shared an incident that happened in his native Arizona within days of Floyd's May 25 death, a situation where a black DoorDash driver had a gun pulled on him while making a delivery. The other 15 members of the Gophers' 2021 class - from Nebraska, Illinois, Ohio, Georgia, Indiana, Texas, Florida and Minnesota - could probably all share similar tragic, scary stories.

This class, though, seems to have already bonded together - with the Gophers and each other. And Floyd's killing, along with the vast protesting and rioting that followed, hasn't seemed to shake their commitment.

Gophers coach P.J. Fleck has excelled at recruiting during the coronavirus pandemic despite a moratorium on in-person visits through Aug. 31. Eleven recruits have committed to the program since those restrictions started, the majority without ever visiting campus or the state, including Ortiz.

One, Indiana defensive end Austin Booker, even committed five days after Floyd's death, during the unrest's peak.

Booker chose the Gophers after several virtual visits and conversations with current players, other recruits, Fleck and new defensive line coach Chad Wilt, who originally recruited him at Cincinnati.

Booker said even though Floyd's death happened just a few days before he officially committed, it didn't make him second-guess his decision.

"They just felt like the school I was most comfortable with," Booker said. "Day in, day out just talking with them on the phone."

Fleck, who could not be reached to comment about his approach, shared how his team's culture kept everyone together through the upheaval in the Twin Cities, Booker said.

Meanwhile, other programs showed signs of fracture. For example, a Florida State player called out coach Mike Norvell for lying about reaching out to each player to discuss Floyd's death, something for which Norvell later apologized.

Fleck held off on a public statement for a week after Floyd died, instead taking that time to speak with all of his players, including the recruits. He also organized a group video chat with all the prospects and their parents.

"He was pretty much just telling us that ... we're safe and that our voices should be heard," Ortiz said. "... He was just telling all of us, 'Hey, guys, I don't want this to affect you guys coming here.' "

After Fleck talked to the 2021 class, Ortiz asked a friend who'd committed to another Division I program if that coaching staff had done similarly. His friend told him he hadn't heard anything yet. Ortiz said Fleck making talking to the recruits a priority spoke volumes to him.

That quality is what makes Fleck such a strong recruiter, according to college football recruiting analyst Tom Lemming. The Gophers' 2021 class ranks 15th nationally and fifth in the Big Ten, per 247Sports.com, with four four-star prospects. Lemming said that while it's still early, this could be the Gophers' best class in 40 years.

At a recent event Lemming held in Chicago with 50 top underclass players in the area, almost all of them listed Minnesota on their questionnaires as a potential team, he said, a change from previous years. That's likely a product of the momentum the Gophers built in Fleck's third season in 2019, where the Gophers went 11-2 and finished No. 10 in the country.

A global pandemic hasn't seemed to derail that. And Lemming doesn't foresee the recent events in the Twin Cities disrupting it either.

"Nothing affects anything," Lemming said. "... See even now, they're still recruiting great, Minnesota. So they've got nothing to do with the police force. The ballplayers know once they visit the campus, the university's got its own police force, and it's a little bit different.

"If you've got good salesmen, which is what Minnesota has, it's not going to affect them much at all."

Two players have decommitted from the Gophers since Floyd's death. Sam Jackson, a high school quarterback from Illinois whom the Gophers planned to use at a different position, switched to Purdue. Texas defensive end D'Marion Alexander reopened his recruiting, citing in his social media statement "recent situations" forcing him to re-evaluate what's best for him. Alexander could not be reached for comment.

There's still five-plus months left to fill out the rest of the 2021 class, which is also time for players to potentially change their minds and diminish what could be a defining class for the Gophers. But Booker said what happened to Floyd shouldn't change recruits' view of the program or Minneapolis.

"I feel like if they really liked Minnesota that much, then there won't be a problem," Booker said. "But if they asked me about it, then I would just reassure how Fleck knows how to keep his culture together at Minnesota. So there's no problems, and all the players are safe and on the front lines helping out."

FIVE NOTABLE PLAYERS IN THE GOPHERS' 2021 CLASS

Athan Kaliakmanis, QB, Antioch, Ill.

Four-star committed to the Gophers more than a year ago. His brother Dino is a wide receiver in this class, too.

Steven Ortiz Jr., CB, Goodyear, Ariz.

Another four-star, he committed to the Gophers sight unseen despite offers from programs such as Penn State and Oregon.

Mar'Keise Irving, RB, Country Club Hills, Ill.

The No. 15 running back in the nation, per 247Sports.com, and another four-star recruit.

Highlight: Group that signed Thielen relishes its forward focus.

After his first NFL season, when he'd carved out a spot on the Vikings' practice squad, Adam Thielen heard from Luke Inveiss, a defensive back he met a few years earlier when both were on a recruiting visit to Minnesota State Mankato.

Inveiss had finished his playing career at St. John's and recently landed a job with the Institute for Athletes, a modestly sized agency in Minneapolis. He let Thielen know the company could be a good fit for him; Thielen, unsure what his future would hold while playing for a new coaching staff, agreed.

"I needed somebody that could really help me if I get cut, or if I'm looking for a job, or looking for things off the field," Thielen said. "It was great timing, and just kind of a small-world thing."

In the six years since, Thielen and IFA grew together, the receiver turning a starting spot into two Pro Bowls and the agency landing Alabama first-round pick Jonathan Allen before the 2017 draft.

When Thielen grew out of his first multiyear deal with the Vikings, IFA founder Blake Baratz negotiated a four-year, $64.8 million extension that makes him the 10th-highest-paid receiver in the league.

IFA, one of the Twin Cities' only sports agencies, has built a football beachhead in Minnesota. Such clients as C.J. Ham, Ifeadi Odenigbo and Stephen Weatherly pushed into bigger roles with the Vikings, and Gophers products such as Blake Cashman and Tyler Johnson signed with the agency before getting drafted this spring.

Johnson, Baratz said, "reached out to us," and added, "That wouldn't have happened five years ago."

Like its roster of gumptious clients, the firm has evolved in its own right, launching a creative marketing division that has worked with such local companies as Caribou Coffee and Sleep Number. Baratz turned part of IFA's building on First Avenue into a social club with roughly 150 members. After his brother-in-law Mike Zweigbaum came on as CEO, the company launched Wisdom Gaming Group, an e-sports marketing company that streams roughly 55 hours of content a week.

To some extent, IFA has taken on the persona of Baratz, a Hopkins native who looked at many NFL agent stereotypes with a raised eyebrow and sought to diversify his business with revenue streams less fickle than ones tied to a player's success.

"It's not like I'm sitting there saying, 'If I'm not a sports agent, then my life has no purpose,' " said Baratz, 40. "Quite the opposite. I think a lot of people get into this business and there's a high level of stress - they feel the pressure to sign players and bring in revenue. That leads to agents selling a dream and doing the wrong thing, and you have players signing with agents for the wrong reasons. Ultimately, that's a house of cards that's going to come crashing down."

Moving beyond football

Baratz graduated from the University of Wisconsin with a desire to work in sports, but at the time, he said, "I didn't really know what an agent did."

He quickly found it would take years of recruiting and developing clients before enough of them would earn lucrative deals as veterans to make a startup agency profitable.

Once players like Thielen, Allen and veteran defensive end Adrian Clayborn started to put IFA on sturdier financial footing in the past three years, the company began to think about what it could do next.

As Baratz and Inveiss found themselves doing plenty of work on sports marketing plans for other companies, they realized they'd be better off doing it themselves. They put together a roster of contractors, wooed Vikings safety Harrison Smith as a client for marketing services and leveraged their status in the Twin Cities into promotion work for local companies. They now have about 20 full-time employees.

Baratz opened Brick x Mortar, the social club in IFA's brownstone building on First Avenue, for people who'd aged out of the downtown bar scene but found traditional country clubs too stuffy.

Zweigbaum, 47, arrived eager for a new challenge after selling a scrap metal recycling company in Wisconsin he'd run for 24 years. He'd been jolted by how much more interested his three sons were in watching an online gaming competition than they were in a Vikings game. He wondered if he could turn his own lifelong hobby - "I had Pong when it came out," he said - into a successful business.

With longtime digital marketing strategist T.J. McLeod, Zweigbaum leads Wisdom Gaming Group, which now has 16 full-time employees and a team of roughly 70 contractors to produce marketing content for gamers.

Wisdom committed $18,000 to north Minneapolis communities this month after acquiring a professional Rocket League team; held a watch party for the League of Legends World Championship in November; and had planned to stage a Minnesota high school championship tournament at the Mall of America in March until COVID-19 forced its cancellation.

The company is also building a series of e-sports shows for streaming services like Twitch, YouTube, Facebook or Mixer, while working to raise millions in capital.

"We don't just do one guy livestreaming," Zweigbaum said. "All of our streams are based either on friendly competition, guides on how to succeed in the game or getting high-level influencers and aggregating their audiences to watch them interact with each other."

Local players find a home

Of the 16 IFA clients currently on NFL rosters, five - Ham, Thielen, Cashman, Johnson and Steelers center J.C. Hassenauer - are from Minnesota.

"It's Minnesota," he said. "At the end of the day, if you're in the sports world, it's a pretty small community. At the very least, you hope you can take care of your own. If you can't build a reputation here, it's hard to convince the kid in Alabama or Washington you're the best choice."

Thielen is now the Vikings' third longest-tenured player and one of their most visible. IFA helped him and his wife, Caitlin, start their own foundation and become partners at ETS Performance training centers with Ryan Englebert, Thielen's longtime trainer.

"IFA is doing stuff they don't have to do, that's not necessarily contracted or I'm technically paying for," Thielen said. "They're doing stuff outside of what is obligated of them."

The local connection has helped Vikings players like Ham and Thielen make contacts in their own communities. When Thielen launched his foundation at the U of M Masonic Children's Hospital two years ago, Inveiss and Baratz made the short drive from their offices to help put on the event. Inveiss donned a mask on June 5 to help Thielen distribute groceries to Lake Street residents affected by the fires and looting that shuttered business after the killing of George Floyd.

"We're more well-connected here, and I think it's a little bit of a snowball," Inveiss said. "People that are from here and are really good people are who we're looking to work with."

For Thielen, it turned out to be a chance he's glad he took.

"It's a relationship you look back on and you're like, 'Man, I'm glad God kind of put us together,'" Thielen said. "I don't know where I'd be, or what would be different, but I know my wife and I wouldn't be where we are without their help."

Authorities have identified the man who was shot to death in north Minneapolis.

Antonio D. Taylor, 25, of Fridley, was shot multiple times in the 4100 block of N. Aldrich Avenue on June 23, the Hennepin County Medical Examiner's Office said Sunday.

Officers responded to the scene after a ShotSpotter activation and other reports of shots fired, police said.

Police spokesman John Elder said when officers arrived on scene, they learned that Taylor had been transported in a private vehicle to North Memorial Health Hospital in Robbinsdale, where he died that evening.

No arrests have been announced in connection with Taylor's death.

The shooting is part of a surge of violence since Memorial Day that has killed eight people and injured at least 118 others through Saturday.

Officials are attributing the sharp rise to the COVID-19 pandemic, eroded public trust after the police killing of George Floyd and the reluctance of some Minneapolis officers to take initiative amid intense scrutiny.

While the jubilant crowds and large gatherings were missing from this year's Pride celebrations, the rainbows and glitter have moved to digital spaces, private parties or socially distant celebrations.

The popular Twin Cities Pride weekend was canceled amid the COVID-19 pandemic, and other events like drag brunches or parties were called off or held at reduced capacity. For some younger lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender folks, the lost Pride Month events meant fewer opportunities to gather and make connections.

During a typical year, Samuel Doten, chair of the Stonewall DFL community caucus, would have participated in the big Pride parade. Instead, Doten hosted a few friends in his back parking lot.

"Most years, I would have a gathering of maybe a dozen people," Doten said.

The cancellation of so many events has left some in the LGBT community feeling particularly isolated, said Doten, 26, who works at Reclaim in St. Paul, an organization that provides mental health care to LGBT youth.

"Social distancing in general, and social isolation, falls so much harder on those who rely on community support, especially queer and trans youth," Doten said. "Pride is a huge opportunity to come together in community, to meet other people and just to be comfortable."

With the lost celebrations, an early end to the school year and a very strange summer ahead, young people are bound to be feeling the impact, Doten said,

This year would have marked Northeastern University student Ro Van Sloun's second Pride celebration since coming out. Last year, the 19-year-old from Minneapolis was able to march in the parade as a part of the Twin Cities Planned Parenthood teen council.

"There's just so much validation," Van Sloun said. "It's one thing to be spending time with your friends who are all queer and supportive but it's another thing to have absolute strangers applauding and cheering for you."

Leaving college, where many LGBT people can freely exist, and abruptly returning home due to the pandemic has been particularly difficult, Van Sloun said.

"To have parents that might not understand your identity or might not support it even, and having no one else to interact with besides people who don't use your name or don't use your pronouns ... it can be damaging," Van Sloun said.

Former Minnesota state Rep. Erin Maye Quade, the first LGBT candidate to be endorsed by a major state party in Minnesota, has heard similar concerns from youth in her work with advocacy groups OutFront Minnesota and Gender Justice. Maye Quade said she recently spoke with a middle schooler in rural Minnesota who is too young to get involved in many events.

"He's 12, he can't drive to Pride, he can't show up for George Floyd," she said. "There is that isolation that happens, especially for younger folks who live outside the cities or are immunocompromised."

Maye Quade noted that after the police killing of Floyd last month in Minneapolis there has been a particular focus on uplifting LGBT black and brown people during this Pride Month.

"Especially this year, people are thinking about our history," she said. "The first Pride was not a parade, it was a riot. It was a riot specifically to fight against police violence."

In recent years, many in the LGBT community have criticized Pride for being too corporate. With the cancellation of Twin Cities Pride, some saw this year's Taking Back Pride march, held on Sunday, as a return to its roots.

"For many people this Pride has been radicalizing, because they've been reminded that it's not just rainbows and butterflies and having fun at a festival," Doten said.

St. Paul rock band timisarocker celebrated Pride with all their typical costumes and flair - virtually. Fronted by lead singer Tim Dooley, a 26-year-old black gay artist, the band put together a "Live from Quarantine" show on Facebook to commemorate Pride 2020.

Though he and the band have been unable to gather, they wanted to create an experience that was as close to live as possible.

"We wanted to release it and have people celebrate Pride with us as much as they can, while they're stuck at home," Dooley said.

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 650 wordsByline: DEE DePASS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Three buildings will add nearly 340 units to help ease Minneapolis' housing shortage.Body

Lupe Development Partners plans to begin construction in August on the second phase of its mixed-income campus near the Uptown intersection of Lyndale Avenue and Lake Street, company officials announced Monday after receiving approvals from the Minneapolis City Council.

The campus will include three mixed- and affordable-housing projects along Lake Street, near where rioters in late May damaged many buildings in the Whittier neighborhood.

The City Council's approval jump-starts the second and third phases of the campus project, company officials said.

The first part of the project - Lake Street Dwelling at 410 W. Lake St. - is already under construction and will have 111 affordably priced units at a cost of $26 million when it opens in October, said Steve Minn, vice president and chief financial manager of Minneapolis-based Lupe Development Partners. That structure was damaged by an incendiary device during the rioting last month.

Luckily, the device hit a concrete slab and didn't burn down the building, Minn said. "These were very nervous nights for me and my team. Nobody slept that weekend."

The Lake Street Dwelling building remained secured with staff and sustained broken glass, but lumber and flammables had been removed from the building, so damage was minimal, Minn said.

On Friday, the City Council approved the $32 million second phase of the project. Now a loan for the new "Lago" building at 500 W. Lake St. will be finalized Tuesday and an existing auto-repair business on the site is scheduled to be torn down in August. Construction on the seven-story site starts a month later and is expected to take 16 months to build 132 apartments and 1,700 square feet of commercial space.

The Lago will rent studios, one- and two-bedroom units, as well as townhouses priced at market rates - between $1,250 to $2,600 a month. The price points were chosen with the hopes of attracting entry-level renters who work nearby, officials said. Common amenities will include a green roof, a bicycle maintenance and repair room, a fitness facility, a business center and community rooms.

The Metropolitan Council and the state issued about $464,000 in combined grants to assist with site development and environmental and utility work for the phase two site, Minn said.

The third phase of the project will offer 95 affordable housing units at 550 W. Lake Street. Construction there won't begin until next year, officials said. Its project cost is estimated at $28 million.

Taken together, about 61% of the campus will offer affordable-housing options and shared amenities at affordable price points, Minn said.

The need for affordable-housing options is urgent given the exploding homeless crisis in Minneapolis and the destruction of the nearly complete Wellington Management project farther east on Lake Street, which was destroyed by fire after the June 25 police killing of George Floyd. The Wellington project's nearly 190 affordable units were to open later this year. Now, project managers are starting anew.

"With the recent devastation along Lake Street, continued investment in this neighborhood is critical. These projects fill a critical need for high-quality housing and amenities without the luxury price tag," Minn said. With the City Council approvals, "We are excited to continue the momentum for our mixed-income campus at Lyn-Lake. ... Transit options on Lake Street are only getting better, and we will be in proximity to the many jobs and employers in the area."

In separate real estate industry news, CBRE announced that it has sold Reuter Walton Development's 118-unit Grove apartment building on Snelling and St. Clair avenues in St. Paul to Continental Properties Co. The $30 million building was completed in October and is about 70% occupied.

About 4,500 square feet of retail space remains unoccupied, a CBRE official said.

'Moonshot' hit; Walz still wary

Gov. Tim Walz lauded Minnesota on Monday for reaching its "moonshot" testing goal to closely track the spread of COVID-19, but he warned that everything from mask-wearing in public to social distancing in bars will be needed to see the state through this pandemic.

While Minnesota isn't seeing the rapid growth in COVID-19 occurring right now in other states, Walz said he is concerned because of the recent outbreaks related to crowded bars and the gatherings over the upcoming holiday weekend that could spread the coronavirus that causes the infectious disease.

"We're going to have to learn to live with and manage COVID-19 for quite some time," he said.

The personal and economic sacrifices Minnesotans made over the past four months to prepare the state for COVID-19 cannot be undermined by a lack of compliance now, Walz said, and he is considering requiring face masks given the increasing evidence that they work - as well as sanctions if bars fail to protect customers by keeping them spread out so they don't infect one another.

"At some point in time, the carrot turns to the stick to stop this thing," said Walz, who encouraged bar owners to follow social distancing rules and customers to help by spreading out and wearing masks.

Cases traced back to virus transmission in bars - since they were allowed to reopen at limited capacities June 10 - have now reached 200 in Mankato and 100 in Minneapolis, said Jan Malcolm, state health commissioner.

Crowding in indoor bars is a "proven recipe for spread" of the virus, she said. "It's up to all of us, our collective individual decisions, whether we are able to achieve these goals of managing the epidemic, the pandemic, which is here and will be here for a long time."

Reaching a testing capacity of 20,000 per day was a key step in the strategy. Minnesota had barely conducted 2,000 tests per day - due largely to global shortages in collection supplies and chemicals - when Walz announced his "moonshot" goal on April 22.

'Moonshot' hit; Walz still wary

A $36 million partnership with the University of Minnesota and Mayo Clinic helped the state reach that goal, which has allowed for the state's universal testing of staff and residents at long-term care facilities with outbreaks and the free testing of people involved in the protests after the killing of George Floyd.

The capacity also allowed the Minnesota Department of Health to expand its guidelines last week to allow people to seek testing even if they don't have respiratory symptoms if they believe they have been exposed to the virus. Initially, shortages required that testing be used only on symptomatic patients, health care workers and long-term care residents at greater risk of severe COVID-19 due to their ages or underlying health conditions.

The state also will be directing testing resources to areas with flare-ups of COVID-19 cases, including free testing announced Monday in response to a rising case count in Madelia and Watonwan County.

The state on Monday reported a total of 35,861 known cases and 1,435 deaths related to COVID-19 - including 1,129 deaths of residents of long-term care or assisted-living facilities.

Daily case counts had been falling since late May but recently started to rise, particularly among young adults. People younger than 29 now make up 31% of all known COVID-19 cases, but only two in that age range have died. People 70 and older account for 11% of known cases but 81% of the state's COVID-19 deaths.

More than half the states in the country had been rated as "trending better" or "making progress" by the COVID Exit Strategy website until late May, when the relaxation of state restrictions on businesses and social interactions was followed by an increase in cases. Now, 36 states, including Minnesota and Wisconsin, are rated as "trending poorly."

The hopeful news in Minnesota is that hospitalizations have reached their lowest levels in two months. The state on Monday reported that 278 patients with COVID-19 were hospitalized - including 140 who needed intensive care.

Comparative websites place Minnesota in the top 10 or 15 on per capita measures of diagnostic testing, though the state was partly helped on that front when it switched its official count from the total number of people tested to the total number of tests performed. Many people have had more than one COVID-19 test, and Minnesota health officials said many other states were reporting their numbers by tests rather than individuals.

Malcolm said the rising number of tests is good news, but so is the low rate of about 4.4% of tests turning up positive for COVID-19. A high test count and a low positive rate is the goal, she said.

The U and Mayo Clinic have been heavily involved in the development of serological antibody tests, which examine blood serum to detect when people have recovered.

One sampling of antibody test results in health care workers and some Twin Cities residents showed that 4 to 5% had previously been infected, said Dr. Timothy Schacker, the U medical school's vice dean for research. Serological testing could help determine the actual spread of the virus given that the majority of infections produce little or no symptoms.

The U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention last week estimated that every one positive diagnostic test actually represented another 10 people who had been infected but did not know it.

'Moonshot' hit; Walz still wary

Malcolm said it is possible that 10% of the state's population has already been infected.

Malcolm encouraged holiday revelers to gather outside, given the growing research that the coronavirus transmission is less likely outdoors.

Young adults might not be as worried about COVID-19, but they can quickly spread the virus to others, she said. More than 9 in 10 COVID-19 deaths in Minnesota have involved the elderly or people with underlying health problems such as obesity, diabetes, asthma and diseases of the heart, lungs, kidneys and immune system.

Malcolm said she hoped bars would comply with social distancing guidelines to help reduce the spread of the virus, but that her department does have punitive authority if bar-related cases continue to rise.

"We have preferred to take an educational approach first," she said, "but we are taking it very seriously, seeing numbers like this."

Floyd civil suit has champion in Crump

ARTICLE MXVI. FLOYD CIVIL SUIT HAS CHAMPION IN CRUMP

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

Ben Crump, the Florida attorney representing George Floyd's survivors, calls himself the "African-American family emergency plan."

"Because when you think about it, who are you going to call when the police kill your family?" Crump said by phone last week from a hotel room in Milwaukee, where he had just arrived to demand body camera footage from another deadly police encounter. "You're not going to call the police."

Crump has won more than 200 police brutality suits and represents the families of Breonna Taylor and Ahmaud Arbery in addition to Floyd's. A fixture on television news interviews, Crump rose to international fame for filing successful lawsuits on behalf of Trayvon Martin's and Michael Brown's families.

He is also at once a spokesman for the families and a shoulder to lean on in their most traumatic hour. Since taking the Floyd family's case, Crump joined them at the south Minneapolis memorial site where Floyd died in police custody, at several vigils, and at a U.S. House hearing on policing reform and inequality.

Now, as the family awaits the criminal prosecution of the four fired Minneapolis police officers charged in Floyd's death - Derek Chauvin, J. Alexander Kueng, Thomas Lane and Tou Thao - Crump is also preparing a federal civil rights lawsuit that legal experts say could dwarf the record $20 million payout for the 2017 death of Justine Ruszczyk Damond.

Often - such as in the cases of Martin and Brown, whose shooters were either not charged or were acquitted - civil judgments won by Crump can represent their survivors' only courtroom victory.

"The criminal prosecution of police in cases of them killing and brutalizing minorities in America is abysmal," Crump said. "So often it happens that unfortunately people have kind of accepted that police have gotten away with killing black people as the norm. We can't accept that. We have to use every strategy possible to try to say, 'This is not America. All Americans deserve equal justice.' "

Floyd civil suit has champion in Crump

On Monday, Hennepin County Judge Peter Cahill set a March 8 date for a trial expected to garner intense international interest. Though he did not name Crump, Cahill warned that further pretrial public commentary by elected officials and others could lead him to move the trial outside of Hennepin County over concerns that the officers would not get a fair trial there.

Defense attorneys for the four former officers declined to comment for this article. Robert Paule, Thao's attorney, argued in court Monday that the steady stream of opinions on the case had imperiled his client's constitutional right to a fair trial.

"I'm fighting the battle with one hand," Paule said, referring to the public statements.

Yet for Crump, the fight for justice is one that must be waged both in the court of law and public opinion. In both arenas, the May 25 video depicting Floyd's final moments has been at the center. It also sparked ongoing international unrest over racism and police brutality.

"To see a documentary of a man being murdered is still shocking and even more shocking when that documentary of his murder is being narrated by the person being murdered," Crump said.

Crump and Floyd's family were key to the appointment of Minnesota Attorney General Keith Ellison to lead the state's prosecution of the officers. Crump said that earlier news conferences by Hennepin County Attorney Mike Freeman fueled their demands, notably one in which Freeman alluded to mitigating factors in the case, such as Floyd's health and drug use. He said the family believes in Ellison, however, "because Keith has a record of being a champion of civil rights and equal justice in America."

"I don't think we could have gotten a better prosecutor to prosecute this case anywhere else in America than Keith Ellison," Crump said.

The family would like to see Chauvin charged with the more serious crime of first-degree murder. Ellison outlined the burden of proving that charge in a private meeting with family last week, but said he would not rule out new charges if the evidence warrants them.

Crump has assembled a 10-person legal team in the Floyd case, including lawyers from Chicago and Minneapolis, such as Jeffrey Storms, whose résumé includes a $3 million settlement in a deadly 2010 Minneapolis police encounter. Crump says he has always earned at least some payment for his clients, and he pockets about a third of all settlement money or monetary judgments.

"It was readily apparent to me that Mr. Crump deeply believes in the work he does and recognizes the significance of this moment," Storms said. "In my opinion, you could not expend the constant time and energy that Mr. Crump expends on these important cases unless you're driven by a higher sense of purpose and a genuine love and empathy for other human beings."

A lawsuit against the former officers involved or Minneapolis could match or eclipse the award to the family of Damond, who was killed by former Minneapolis officer Mohamed Noor. Noor is serving 12½ years in prison after becoming the only Minnesota officer convicted in the death of a civilian last year.

"It's always a calculus of public opinion and the skill of the lawyers involved," said Bob Bennett, who represented Damond's family. "They certainly have the case qualities you would want to have for bringing a successful civil rights action and for negotiating that type and quality of a settlement."

MADISON, Wis. - Public health officials are closing indoor service at bars in Madison as the Fourth of July weekend approaches and as the number of reported coronavirus cases accelerate, many involving young people in Wisconsin's largest college community.

The order from Public Health Madison & Dane County effective Thursday allows bars that have patios to keep them open and it limits the number of people who may eat inside restaurants to 25% capacity, the Journal Sentinel reported.

Since June 13, 614 people have tested positive for coronavirus and half of them were between the ages of 18 and 29.

"For the past week, Dane County has seen a sustained, high number of cases. After consultation with our contact tracing team, gatherings and visits to bars and restaurants continue to be implicated in interviews with cases," Janel Heinrich, the agency's director said in a statement.

Bar owners are weighing a legal challenge.

Tavern League of Wisconsin lobbyist Scott Stenger said public health officials are unfairly punishing bar owners and not taking into account what role recent protests over police brutality may have in the surge.

"To make out bars to be a scapegoat of an increase when you've had historic protests for three weeks straight - it seems a bit irresponsible to not factor that in," Stenger said.

The National Bureau of Economic Research released a paper last week that found little evidence that police brutality protests across the country caused a significant increase in infections.

Health officials close indoor service at bars in Madison, Wis.

The paper said if the protests had driven a surge in cases the increase would have become apparent within two weeks, but that didn't happen in many cities with the largest protests, including New York, Chicago, Minneapolis and Washington, D.C. The protests began the night after George Floyd died in Minneapolis police custody on May 25. The paper has not been published by a peer-reviewed journal.

Republican U.S. Sen. Ron Johnson has said that it makes sense to limit bars.

"I do think that we need to continue to concentrate on those businesses that represent uncontrolled spread (of coronavirus)," Johnson said Friday. "And here I'm thinking, tightly packed bars - I know that hurts people to hear me say that, here in Wisconsin; that might be something we need to control" given that the virus can spread through the air and because cases have been increasing in the past few days.

Wisconsin has seen 29,199 reported cases of COVID-19, the disease caused by the coronavirus, and 786 deaths as of Wednesday, according to state health officials. The state had 6,110 active cases as of Monday, with 835 in Dane County. The number of infections is thought to be far higher because many people have not been tested, and studies suggest people can be infected with the virus without feeling sick.

The Republican-controlled Minnesota Senate opened hearings Wednesday on the unrest that rocked the state after the death of George Floyd, focusing on the destruction rather than the underlying issues of racism and policing on which Democrats have concentrated.

The hearings will help Republicans frame up issues for the fall election campaign, tapping into outrage felt by many Minnesota residents over the unrest, and with an eye toward their base. The GOP is trying to defend its three-seat Senate majority, while Democrats hope to take over the chamber by capturing Republican-held suburban districts that Democratic Gov. Tim Walz won in 2018.

The topic for the first of five or six joint hearings planned by the Senate transportation and judiciary committees was the destruction of small businesses during the unrest in Minneapolis and St. Paul. Around 1,500 businesses were damaged, including many that were burned or looted before police, backed by the Minnesota National Guard, restored order.

"They're not about police reform and they are not about defunding or reorganizing a police department," said GOP Sen. Scott Newman, of Hutchinson, who chairs the transportation committee. Policing issues are the subject of other proceedings and legislation, he said, so his committee is focusing instead on the thefts, vandalism and arson. "I view those as being very, very serious criminal activity. Arson, for instance, is one of the most serious crimes that is on our books."

But Democratic Sen. Scott Dibble, of Minneapolis, expressed skepticism.

"I hope we're not here on a curated, nonobjective one-sided effort to create a political narrative that assigns blame and has as its focus the elections in November," he said.

Senate Republicans open hearings focusing on unrest that followed George Floyd's death

The most emotional testimony came from Jim Stage, owner of Lloyd's Pharmacy in St. Paul, which was gutted by fire and was a target of widespread theft. He told how firefighters had to flatten the shell of the Snelling Avenue drugstore because it was unsafe.

"It was devastating to me," said Stage, who has owned the store since 2014 and plans to reopen at another site next week. "We have 37 employees. We service probably 7,500 to 8,000 patients out of that little store," he said as he choked up, and showed a photo of his family standing at the now-empty lot. "It's hard for me to look at."

A special legislative session last month ended in acrimony with no deal on a package of police accountability measures despite the worldwide uproar over Floyd, who died May 25 after Derek Chauvin, a white Minneapolis police officer, pressed his knee against the handcuffed Black man's neck for nearly eight minutes.

While Senate Republicans said their plan would have made meaningful improvements to policing in Minnesota, leaders of the House Democratic majority and the bicameral People of Color and Indigenous Caucus said it didn't go nearly far enough. Those issues are expected to come up again if Walz calls another special session this month, as he's required to do if he extends the emergency powers that he has used to deal with the coronavirus pandemic.

Democratic Sen. Jeff Hayden, of Minneapolis, a member of the POCI Caucus, said Republicans are miscalculating if they think their constituents don't care about police accountability. He said he's been hearing from moderate to conservative Democrats from GOP-held suburban districts who want to a more equitable state.

"They certainly don't like the idea of being in a state that is now known for Derek Chauvin murdering George Floyd instead of the Land of 10,000 Lakes," Hayden said.

House Democrats called their own hearing for Wednesday evening focused on police accountability.

Tanner Morgan had an impressive 2019 season as the quarterback at the University of Minnesota, leading the Gophers to an 11-2 record and a win over Auburn in the Outback Bowl. Against Purdue, he completed 21 of 22 passes, setting a Big Ten record. Morgan, a junior, chatted with the Pioneer Press about his experiences in Minnesota and playing for Coach P.J. Fleck.

Coach is what he is. He is very real and very energetic. People think it's fake but it's not. It's real. It's 100 percent real.

He wants to be there for you. It's very appealing. You immediately recognize his energy that he applies to every part of his life and the program's life. As a recruit and a player, it's awesome to see that. It's very real. You're going to become a better person in every area of your life because of him. I love him to death.

There have been a lot of very elite quarterbacks at the University of Minnesota. When you think about it, if being the best quarterback in school history is the main goal, you're going to get lost in what's important - and that's winning games every Saturday. At the end of the day, you can't be the best if you don't win.

That's part of being a great quarterback, being the guy that when things get tough people can look to you.

I don't think you can just keep your nose to the football grindstone with the things going on in our country right now, with the protests and killings of George Floyd and Breonna Taylor. You take a stand that things need to happen and stand up for Black Lives Matter. I've heard stories from teammates and friends. Being with them is important at this time. You can't sit back and say everything is OK, because it's not. We need change in this country. You can't just sit on the sidelines anymore.

I'm excited about the upcoming season. We're not going to sit here and worry about things we can't control. We have some restrictions (due to Covid-19). The university is putting our safety first.

Gophers QB Tanner Morgan is all in for P.J. Fleck, Kirk Cousins and Skyline Chili

It's not really about me. It's about the people around us, our team and how good we can be as a unit. In the Purdue game, there was one incomplection. There could have been plenty of incomplections, but teammates made plays. It's just not just about me. It's about the people around me.

Of course, the NFL is a goal and a dream. As a kid, you always have a dream of playing at the highest level. But I can't get there thinking about myself first. I have to think about the team and what's best for the team. You have to win games to get there.

My major was Human Resource Development. I finished it up this May. I'm starting grad school in the fall in sports management. We'll see about a doctorate.

It's my full intention to be here at the University of Minnesota through my senior season. I'm not worried about the season after this one.

If I could travel in time, I'd probably time travel to the Crucifixion. Seeing first hand what Jesus did to save my life and everybody's life would really put things in perspective. Obviously, it'd be very hard to watch. It's probably the most important day in the Christian faith. That or the Resurrection.

My parents raised me well. My parents, Coach Fleck and my grandparents as well have had the biggest impact on my life.

If I never got deep into football, I'd probably be playing baseball. I'm a big sports guy.

My favorite team as a kid was the Bengals. I was 20 minutes from Cincinnati. There were good years with Carson Palmer, Chad Johnson and T.J. Houshmandzadeh, but we just never got over the playoff hump.

Now I love watching the Vikings. I'm a big fan of Kirk Cousins. I think some people give him hate he doesn't deserve. More importantly, I love what he does off the field.

I always loved watching Drew Brees play. He's not the tallest guy but the command he's had on the field has been awesome.

Growing up, I ate Toaster Strudel for breakfast. That was my favorite.

I don't know if I have a favorite movie. It changes. A classic is "Friday Night Lights." I'm more of a TV show guy. I like "The Office," "Parks and Recreation" and "Friends."

"Friends" is probably my favorite.

Best comedy movie: "The Other Guys." I think that's hilarious. Anything with Will Ferrell.

Whenever I go home (to Kentucky), the first thing I eat is Skyline Chili. Big fan. Can't get enough of it when I'm back.

People say I care too much or work too hard. If I could change one thing about myself, it would be that I live in the moment more. Athletically, I think I do that.

Gophers QB Tanner Morgan is all in for P.J. Fleck, Kirk Cousins and Skyline Chili

A dumb thing I did as a kid: We lived in a neighborhood and I had a bunch of friends. We had a pond a few blocks over and we'd go fishing. One time, we kept all the fish, blue gills, and put them in buckets under the trampoline in my yard. A few days later, my mom smelled it. She said, "Tanner, what did you do?" I forgot about the fish. Obviously, I thought they'd live. I thought I'd have a bunch of pet blue gills. I was probably six or seven.

I want to be remembered as, first and foremost, a servant of Christ. And secondly, a person who was a leader who did things for others and helped the community out and wasn't doing things just for himself. I don't care what people say about me as a football player when I'm dead. It's what I did in my life away from football that matters.

WASHINGTON - President Donald Trump seems to rarely leave a thought unspoken.

Of late, though, it is increasingly clear there are things Trump won't say - and they are tied to the most important issues of his presidency.

Among them:

Knock it off, Russia. Wear a mask, Americans. Systemic racism must end.

None of the above are particularly bold or controversial messages.

Modern American presidents of both parties have often sounded off against Russian aggression. They have amplified the advice of medical experts in public health emergencies like the coronavirus. They have used the bully pulpit of the presidency to ask Americans to summon their better angels in confronting racism.

But such words do not come easily to Trump - and his silence emboldens those who reject these messages and contributes to the cascading crises that now engulf the White House and have put his reelection in peril.

"People now require a serious man with a serious message and don't feel like they have it," says Calvin Jillson, a presidential historian at Southern Methodist University.

For his part, Trump has responded to the chaos surrounding the coronavirus pandemic, the unrest over racial injustice and more recent questions about his stance toward Russia by insisting that the "silent majority" of Americans are with him. There are surely those who endorse his sentiments and trust his instincts as Trump plays to his most loyal base supporters.

But revelations this week that the president has long known about allegations that Russia secretly offered bounties to Taliban-linked militants for killing American troops in Afghanistan represent a fresh source of tumult for Trump when he can least afford it.

On Wednesday, Trump again declined to fault Russia, dismissing the bounty story as "Fake News."

The president's tendency to go easy on Russia in his public pronouncements has long been a source of dismay and puzzlement to many in Washington and beyond, perhaps most notably that jaw-dropping moment at a 2018 summit in Helsinki when he sided with Vladimir Putin over U.S. intelligence agencies on the question of whether Russia had interfered in the 2016 U.S. elections.

Now, legislators, diplomats and others are openly questioning why Trump is refusing to speak out clearly against Russian aggression given the latest explosive allegations.

Democratic Rep. Adam Schiff, chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, found it "inexplicable, in light of these very public allegations, that the president hasn't come before the country and assured the American people that he will get to the bottom of whether Russians are putting a bounty on the heads of American troops."

The White House stresses that the bounty allegations are unverified. And the president can fairly point to a series of administration actions over the last three years to punish Russia for malign behavior. But Trump's own words - and lack thereof at key moments - have sent a far more conciliatory message to Moscow.

Trump in recent months has been angling to welcome Russia back into the Group of Seven industrialized nations, which gave Putin the boot after Moscow seized control of Crimea in 2014. And this week, rather than address the substance of the bounty allegations, Trump chose to harangue the media for what he calls fabrications designed to "make Republicans look bad."

Kathleen Hall Jamieson, director of the Annenberg Public Policy Center at the University of Pennsylvania, thinks Trump's aversion to talking about Russia stems in part from his sensitivity about whether Moscow's interference in the 2016 election helped get him elected.

"He seems to think when Russia is raised, automatically it means someone is going to use it to say that they elected him," she said.

As for face masks, Trump has bluntly said they're not for him and that other people can make their own choices. He refuses to wear one in public and has speculated that some people wear masks to show they don't like him. He's urged people to follow local guidelines, but his own campaign as flouted them.

It all undercuts health officials' efforts to promote use of a critical weapon in stopping the spread of the coronavirus.

Republican Sen. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee on Tuesday urged Trump to wear a mask even occasionally, predicting the president's millions of admirers "would follow his lead."

With virus cases now surging in Sun Belt states and reported U.S. deaths from the virus nearing 130,000, GOP officials are increasingly speaking out about the importance of masks.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell says there should "no stigma" to wearing one. Utah Gov. Gary Herbert urged Trump and Vice President Mike Pence to issue a national call to wear them.

Those are words that, to many, should have been easy ones for the president to utter long ago.

But Trump shows no signs of budging - no matter that his allies see them as the only way to avoid another economic shutdown, an even worse wave of cases and a GOP election rout. "LONE WARRIOR," he tweeted on Tuesday.

Lawrence Gostin, a public health expert at Georgetown University, said Trump's failure to promote mask usage is having devastating consequences in the U.S.

"I have become increasingly convinced if there is one thing that has separated countries that have done well and those that have done really poorly, it's inconsistent messaging where you've lost the confidence of the population," Gostin said.

The coronavirus surge has played out alongside the national reckoning over racial injustice triggered by the death of George Floyd and other Black Americans killed by police. Trump has offered little balm to those confronting the pain of racism.

Jamieson suspects Trump avoids talking about racism because he thinks it "signals that you are sympathetic to the left."

And so Trump has come down squarely on the side of "law and order," been quick to defend law enforcement and painted protesters with a broad brush that blurs the distinction between peaceful demonstrators and those doing violence.

Trump has failed to acknowledge systemic racism and suggests instead that there are a few "bad apples" among the police who need to be culled. As for his plan to combat racism, he calls an economic rebound "the greatest thing that can happen for race relations."

Talk of a big presidential speech to the nation on how the country can come to terms with its racial problems have fallen by the wayside, the White House well aware that such an address would not likely come off well.

Trump has "an inability to perform that critical role as president, as spokesman for the nation in good times or bad but most critically in difficult times," says Jillson.

The combination of the virus, the racial unrest and economic upheaval, Jillson says, has got Trump supporters reevaluating their past inclination to be mildly amused by the chaos he sows and left them asking: "Am I still entertained? Am I still comfortable? Am I still willing to take the uncertainty?"

Two Twin Cities men were arrested Monday in separate St. Paul arson cases stemming from the unrest that followed the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police a month ago.

Matthew Scott White, 31, of Minneapolis is accused of setting a fire on May 28 that destroyed the Enterprise Rent-A-Car on University Avenue with the help of his sister and her juvenile son, according to a criminal complaint filed last week in U.S. District Court. He faces one count each of arson and conspiracy to commit arson.

White's sister was charged earlier this month with conspiracy to commit arson.

Mohamed Hussein Abdi, 19, of Maplewood is accused of setting a fire on May 28 that damaged the cafeteria of Gordon Parks High School on University Avenue, according to a news release issued by the U.S. Attorney's office in Minnesota. He faces one count of arson.

Both men made their first appearances in court Tuesday in St. Paul.

Enterprise and Gordon Parks High were among dozens of St. Paul buildings - mostly along University Avenue - damaged in the rioting that began in South Minneapolis after Floyd died.

Footage captured by Enterprise's security cameras on the night of the fires shows White first entering the building with his nephew at 8:44 p.m. while his sister waited outside, according to the criminal complaint against White.

The pair briefly exited the building before returning to the back office area - where investigators with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives determined the fire started - for about five minutes, the complaint says.

When they exited the building for the last time at 8:49 p.m., flames were visible in the reflection of the front window.

A witness told ATF investigators that, as White walked out of the building, he said something to the effect of "back up because it's going up," according to the complaint. Another witness told investigators that White threw objects onto the fire after it was started.

Just across the street that same night, security cameras inside Gordon Parks High at University and Griggs Street captured Abdi and another person setting fire to the school's cafeteria, according to the news release from the U.S. Attorney's office.

The footage showed Abdi reaching through a broken glass to pour a clear liquid onto the cafeteria floor, before entering the cafeteria and pouring more of the liquid into a trash can and igniting the trash can, the news release said.

The footage then showed Abdi and the other person running from the building as flames and black smoke "erupt from the trash can," according to the news release.

There is little evidence that the protests that erupted after George Floyd's death caused a significant increase in U.S. coronavirus infections, according to public health experts.

If the protests had driven an explosion in cases, experts say, the jumps would have started to become apparent within two weeks - and perhaps as early as five days. But that didn't happen in many cities with the largest protests, including New York, Chicago, Minneapolis, and Washington, D.C.

In what's considered the first systematic look at the question, a team of economists determined that only one of 13 cities involved in the earliest wave of protests after Memorial Day had an increase that would fit the pattern.

It was Phoenix, where experts say cases and hospitalizations surged after a decision by Gov. Doug Ducey to end Arizona's stay-at-home order on May 15 and eased restrictions on businesses. Arizona residents who were cooped up for six weeks flooded Phoenix-area bar districts, ignoring social distancing guidelines.

In many cities, the protests actually seemed to lead to a net increase in social distancing, as more people who did not protest decided to stay off the streets, said that study's lead author, Dhaval Dave of Bentley University.

"The large-scale protests can impact both the behavior of the protesters and the behavior of the non-protesters," said Dave. The paper was released last week by the National Bureau of Economic Research, but has not been published by a peer-reviewed journal.

Experts see little evidence that George Floyd protests spread coronavirus in U.S.

Drawing from data compiled by Johns Hopkins University, the Associated Press reviewed trends in daily reported cases in 22 U.S. cities with protests. It found post-protest increases in several cities - including Houston and Madison, Wis. - where experts say other factors were more likely the main drivers.

Health officials are still investigating case surges in different states, and more data may come in. But experts believe that if the protests did have a big impact on cases, stronger signs would be apparent now.

Floyd was killed on May 25 by a Minneapolis police officer who used his knee to pin Floyd's neck to the ground. The killing of a Black man at the hands of a white officer touched off protests around the United States. Coincidentally, some states had begun to lift social distancing restrictions in late May.

Dave and his colleagues counted protests over three weeks in 281 cities with populations of at least 100,000. Most had protests lasting more than three days, and many had protests that had at least 1,000 participants.

It's not clear how many protesters participated, let alone how many of them wore masks or got tested after. That may have varied from place to place.

Houston is among a number of Texas cities that have recently seen steep increases in cases and hospitalizations. Dr. Umair Shah, executive director of the county health department, believes it was likely some cases could be traced to the protests.

"We just don't know how much," he said.

But it's hard to measure the protests' precise impact for a number of reasons, Shah and others said. Earlier business reopenings and more willingness to shrug off social distancing guidelines started the trend in the Houston area, Shah said.

Another factor: Many people don't get tested unless they feel symptoms. Many protesters were young adults, who generally are less likely to get severe illness, and therefore may not have gotten tested, experts said.

And some who do get tested may still not answer all the questions they are asked by outbreak investigators.

"I know of three people who told us 'Yes, I was at a protest.' That doesn't mean there was not another 25 or more who did attend a protest and just did not share that with us," said Dr. Mysheika Roberts, the public health commissioner for the city of Columbus, Ohio.

That city has seen increased cases in the last month, but health officials say they can't attribute it to any particular reason other than people socializing and returning to normal activities without wearing masks or taking other precautions. So far, protests don't seem to be a real factor.

"Most of the protests, at least in my jurisdiction, were outside," and the virus does not spread as well outside, Roberts said. "And I would say 50 percent of those at the protests were wearing a face mask."

A relative of George Floyd said now is the time for police in his little South Dakota town of Gettysburg to remove an image from their logo that he feels belongs on the trash heap of history - the Confederate flag.

Selwyn Jones, as one of a handful of black residents in the prairie town named for the tide-turning battle of the Civil War, promises to make his voice heard when the City Council on Monday takes up the fate of the logo bearing the signature symbol that Southern troops flew in their mission to preserve slavery.

Jones, 54, whose late sister is Floyd's mother, made his vow Monday as he drove back to South Dakota from Minneapolis, where he sat in the hearing for the four fired Minneapolis police officers charged in Floyd's May 25 death.

" 'Bill, we really have the Confederate flag on our police uniforms?' " Jones recalled saying three weeks ago in a phone call to Mayor William Wuttke on the same day he attended his nephew's funeral in Houston. "Man, that's got to go."

Jones said the mayor responded with, " 'We'll see about it.' ... That's what a white guy in control and power says. We'll see about it. ... Whatever."

On Tuesday, Wuttke told the Star Tribune that the Police Department is "working on something different," but it's happening against his wishes, the will of most everyone in town of roughly 1,200 and is being pushed by outsiders.

"We're not wanting the liberals and the press telling us we have to change it," he said. "People here do not feel it's racism.

"It's so ridiculous; 99% of the people don't have any idea [that the Confederate flag is on the insignia]. It's just something that's there. I've had more local people in favor of it than against it."

Two days after speaking with the mayor, Jones wrote a message on Facebook to his community, where he and his wife are raising two children and where he runs a motel, expressing confidence that the two-person police force's insignia will be changed.

Confederate flag in S.D. must go, Floyd uncle says

"I know my neighbors will listen in order to understand the history of hurt that African-Americans and other people of color have experienced," wrote Jones, who moved to Gettysburg three years ago. "I am also sure that the flag issue in Gettysburg will be resolved because the killing of my nephew George Floyd is offensive to all lovers of freedom."

The insignia as currently designed has been on the police vehicle, uniforms and elsewhere on department property since 2009. It is composed of equally sized American and Confederate flags, with a cannon below where the flags' poles cross.

Wuttke, who's been involved in local politics for more than 20 years, said the council was presented two redesign options by the police chief at the time, Gayle Kludt.

Quite simply, Wuttke said, "She was asked which one you like, and she chose that one."

The 21st-century battle of Gettysburg in the town about 350 miles straight west of Minneapolis comes as disputes across the country flare up over the display of the Confederate flag and monuments named for prominent figures in American history who supported slavery, pushed Native Americans off their land or espoused racist viewpoints.

Police Chief Dave Mogard could not be reached for comment, but at a special council session called on June 12, he said a redesign is needed to the patch he has worn on his uniform since joining the department in 2018.

"I am not against the current patch, but I am not for the current patch," Mogard said. "My opinion is this: Would you put the Confederate flag on your business or your home? If you are not willing to put the Confederate flag on your business or your home, then why is it being forced upon our agency?"

In 2015, city leaders firmly defended the insignia amid debate over the Confederate flag after the deadly shooting in South Carolina at a historically black church by a racist infatuated with the Civil War South.

"This patch has no racist intentions," a Facebook posting by the city read at the time. "It is meant to be another way that we, as a city, represent our heritage. ... The Chief of Police, Bill Wainman, the Mayor, Bill Wuttke, and the City Council have no intentions of changing the police patch."

The insignia's designer, Scott Barksdale, backed up the city's argument and explained the crossed Confederate and American flags are meant to show how Civil War survivors came together in South Dakota and "put the past behind them."

The Gettysburg on the prairie was settled in 1883 by veterans on both sides of the Civil War among others and named for the battle "to honor their fallen comrades and to acknowledge those men who had survived," according to the city's website.

The historical rationale behind the insignia's design isn't flying with a newfound friend of Jones, 19-year-old South Dakotan Caitlin Kroemer. She has collected more than 4,000 signatures on change.org in the campaign to rid the Confederate flag from the police emblem.

"South Dakota did not exist until 24 years AFTER the Civil War," her petition reads. "The confederacy was a blatantly racist organization that is not a fundamental part of our state's history. ... This heritage is not ours, it has no place here."

Confederate flag in S.D. must go, Floyd uncle says

Kroemer, a political science major at the University of South Dakota, said she and Jones have been in touch about how to approach the council next week, and "he's encouraged me to keep going."

With the cause of justice for his nephew as inspiration, Jones reflected for a moment about his nephew, who he and other relatives knew by his middle name, Perry.

"What are the chances of me being Perry Floyd's uncle, then what's the chance of Perry Floyd's uncle living in a town with that flag on the uniform?"

The U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives asked again for the public's assistance Wednesday in identifying people who set fire to properties in the Twin Cities during the civil unrest that followed the death of George Floyd.

More than 150 fire scenes have been investigated by the ATF, along with other local, state and federal agencies, since early June. So far, 13 people have been arrested on arson-related charges.

The public aided in identifying six of the 13 individuals who were arrested, and the ATF has offered about $100,000 in rewards to incentivize people with information to come forward.

The largest reward, doubled to $20,000 last week, was offered for information leading to the arrest of a couple suspected of setting several St. Paul businesses on fire. They fled Minnesota a few weeks ago and are now sought by the U.S. Marshals as fugitives.

The ATF has offered $5,000 rewards for information relating to 15 different suspects, and has begun paying out some of the rewards based on the information's value to the investigation.

The most recent arrests happened Monday night. Mohamed Hussein Abdi, of Maplewood, was charged with arson at Gordon Parks High School in St. Paul and Matthew Scott White, of Minneapolis, is accused of setting a fire that destroyed the Enterprise Rent-A-Car on University Avenue.

Among surveillance photos released by the ATF have been four suspects in an arson at Springboard for the Arts in St. Paul. Photos from other cases can be viewed on the ATF's website.

The ATF is asking anyone who can identify or provide the whereabouts about suspects in any of the cases to email ATFTips@atf.gov or go to . People can also call 888-283-8477.

Federal authorities continue to ask for help IDing suspects connected to Twin Cities arsons

Information can be submitted anonymously, but those seeking reward compensation should include their contact information with the tip. Rewards are given for information that leads to the successful identification, arrest and conviction of a suspect.

Authorities are also asking the public for any photos or video taken of rioting in the Twin Cities in late May after the Memorial Day death of Floyd in Minneapolis police custody, specifically of individuals starting fires or adding accelerants to fires.

The protesters who have been occupying America's streets are rightly outraged over the killings of George Floyd, Breonna Taylor and so many others, and the chronic brutality those deaths exemplify. Their anger also reflects another malaise: the disparate impact of the coronavirus crisis on the country's Black population.

As the pandemic spreads, it is killing and impoverishing Black people at outsized rates. This is partly because generations of discrimination have left them disproportionately vulnerable and facing a terrible choice: Put their lives on the line by going to work, or lose their livelihoods.

Even before the pandemic arrived, almost one in two Black people were in such precarious financial straits that they either couldn't pay their monthly bills or would fall short if faced with a sudden $400 expense, according to the latest data from the Federal Reserve. The net worth of the typical Black family stood at just one tenth that of the typical White family, a gap that has hardly budged over the past three decades.

Imagine having no medical insurance, living in a house with many more people than rooms, in a community with inadequate public services, toxic pollution and little nutritious food within shopping distance. And then confronting COVID-19.

These underlying injustices have long demanded action. Now, they are rendering American society dangerously fragile at a time when unity is badly needed.

How did race become a risk factor, so closely associated with people's standard of living and susceptibility to a deadly pandemic? The process has by no means been natural or inevitable.

For Black Americans, 250 years of slavery were only the beginning. From emancipation through the mid-1900s, untold numbers in southern states were lynched, robbed of their land and property, or arrested, convicted and sold into forced labor - a precursor of the mass incarceration that still destroys so many Black lives. Those who fled north in the two Great Migrations of the 20th Century found themselves excluded from the government housing subsidies that created the White middle class and many of today's suburban communities - to the point where one Detroit developer actually built a half-mile-long concrete wall to keep out a neighboring Black community. Instead, they were crowded into segregated neighborhoods, deprived of public investment and subjected to myriad forms of financial predation, including the land contracts of the 1950s and 1960s, the subprime mortgages of the early 2000s and the payday lenders, tax preparers and auto dealers of today.

Once a certain group of people has been set up to fail - once concentrated disadvantage associates them with zip codes, education, health, wealth and other characteristics - discrimination becomes pervasive and automatic. "Colorblind" policies exclude them, police profile them, employers shun them, credit algorithms reject them, all but ensuring a perpetual state of insecurity.

The coronavirus has made that insecurity even more deadly. National data are incomplete, so nationwide generalizations are difficult. That said, analyses by county and age group, and in specific cities, suggest that the disease is hitting Black people much harder. Black Medicare beneficiaries, for example, have been hospitalized at a rate almost four times that of White beneficiaries, according to the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services. New York City, which as of mid-June accounted for almost a fifth of recorded U.S. COVID-19 deaths, reports that Black and Latino residents are perishing at age-adjusted rates at least twice that of their White counterparts. Similar trends have emerged in Chicago and Los Angeles.

Black workers' roles in the job market have rendered them particularly exposed - part of what Dr. Anthony Fauci, the country's top infectious disease expert, has called a "double whammy" of underlying health conditions and work-related hazards. They occupy an outsized share (more than 15%) of high-risk "front-line" jobs such as bus drivers, grocery-store cashiers and home health aides. They're also less likely to be able to work from home, more likely to rely on public transportation and more likely to be employed in hard-hit service industries such as hotels, restaurants and retail stores.

At the same time, many Black Americans have been among the last to benefit from federal aid - if they benefited at all. The Internal Revenue Service distributed relief checks of $1,200 per adult and $500 per child, but struggled to track down millions of people who earn too little to file a tax return, or who lack bank accounts - groups that are both disproportionately Black.

More broadly, the pandemic is deepening the disparities that have made disadvantaged communities vulnerable. Local businesses may never recover, particularly given how hard it has been for them to access Paycheck Protection Program funds. The shift to online school is setting back kids who lack the equipment and space they need to study. And people who had no formal work to begin with are falling even further into poverty.

What to do? Let's begin with the simple things, aimed at alleviating the immediate distress of the people most in need.

A temporary expansion of federal food stamp benefits, for example, would be an excellent way to reach those whom the Cares Act has missed, including the unbanked and the deeply poor. Emergency rental assistance could help people stay in their homes after eviction moratoriums end. More federal funds could help state and local governments reduce backlogs of people applying for emergency benefits.

It's essential that people be able to access medical care, stay away from work when they're sick, quarantine safely and care for their loved ones. To that end, Congress should design relief funds in a way that encourages states to expand coverage for COVID-19 related medical expenses under Medicaid. It should extend paid sick and family leave to the tens of millions of U.S. workers still not fully covered, in part by applying that requirement to companies employing more than 500 people. And state and local governments, with federal support, should provide space in dormitories or hotels for people who need a temporary place to self-quarantine or escape an infected household.

Immediate aid alone, though, won't address the original malaise: the deep inequities that divide the nation by race. That will require a much more fundamental reckoning, and a much more ambitious effort to rectify historical injustices.

First come basic rights and freedoms.

The government should commit itself to gathering and publishing the data needed to recognize discrimination wherever it arises, including in credit, employment, procurement, suffrage, arrests and convictions. It should also reorient and redouble its efforts to defend civil rights: for example, by reforming the criminal justice system, eliminating disenfranchisement through voter-ID laws and roll purging, enforcing rules designed to end exclusionary neighborhood zoning rules, and requiring implicit bias training wherever its authority extends.

Second, we need to reverse the damage done.

America undermines its own prosperity by shunting people of color into dead ends of concentrated disadvantage. A well-coordinated remedy for this could start with a large federal investment aimed at turning around the country's most disadvantaged communities, using programs that have proven effective in improving health, education, public safety and employment - and gathering more evidence that will allow government spending across the country to be directed toward what works. Examples include increasing access to free Pre-K, expanding training and apprenticeships, providing incentives for lead abatement, and upgrading infrastructure to improve resilience and quality of life. Such initiatives should coincide with broader reforms, such as making affordable health care available to all and a quality public college education effectively free for the lowest-income students.

Third, we should knock down the obstacles that lock in wealth disparities.

From generation to generation, it's hard to get ahead if you lack the resources to weather a small shock, let alone to provide a boost or a backstop for your children. Yet a combination of federal policy and more subtle discrimination have excluded many people of color from the two main vehicles of wealth creation: homeownership and entrepreneurship.

Here, too, there's no single fix. Building more low-income housing for purchase will increase supply and reduce prices. Connecting the unbanked with free or fairly priced accounts, and updating credit-scoring models, will make more people eligible for loans. Enforcing fair-lending laws and supporting Community Development Financial Institutions, which focus on underserved communities, can ensure that people get the credit they qualify for. Providing down-payment assistance, and allowing federal housing vouchers to be used for mortgage payments, can help people build equity. And providing entrepreneurs with targeted microloans, mentorship networks and effective one-stop shops to help access credit, navigate bureaucracy and bid for government contracts can help them to start and grow businesses.

The crucial elements of this effort must be persistence and care, an overarching determination to identify and expand the measures that demonstrably help. The benefits should flow broadly - to Black Americans, to all people who find themselves on the wrong end of discrimination and, ultimately, to the entire country, by allowing more Americans to realize their full potential.

No doubt, the pursuit of such an agenda will be a monumental national undertaking. Yet if this crisis has demonstrated anything positive, it is that Congress is capable of agreeing on unprecedented measures, and mustering trillions of dollars, when facing the abyss. The profound divisions in American society are even more threatening than the pandemic that has exacerbated them. They deserve to be taken no less seriously.

After creating a prototype of a warranty app, Upsie Founder and CEO Clarence Bethea began setting up meetings with large insurance companies to share his idea.

At the first meeting, the insurance executives addressed all of their questions and comments to Bethea's White investor.

Minneapolis' entrepreneurs of color face unique challenges in raising venture capital

"I was the founder and CEO but to them I was invisible," said Bethea, who is Black. "When I began seeking funding, I encountered the same brick walls. I was a guy from the hood, with a non-traditional Silicon Valley story, and people judged me from the narrow lens of their experiences."

Raising capital is one of the most difficult challenges for any early-stage company. But for people of color, it is even more challenging. Vast inequities have existed in the space for years.

The death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police has prompted protests and calls for reform around the country. And amid these discussions of prejudice and inequality, venture capital is in the spotlight.

Only 1% of venture capital dollars went to Black startup founders in 2018, according to a study from the Silicon Valley Bank and others. The same year, the number of Black decision-makers in venture capital dropped to 1% - representing seven Black people at the 102 largest venture capital firms in the U.S.

Over the past month, venture capital firms of all sizes have made public promises to find better ways to support Black founders. For some, this means openly sharing their investment statistics. Others decided to meet exclusively with Black founders for the month of June.

Bethea said he's encouraged by those in the venture capital community that are willing to step up and take steps toward diversity and inclusion in real, quantifiable ways.

He recently worked with local tech organization BETA to help leaders recruit founders for their summer cohort. Until recently, this decision had been made almost entirely by White men. Bethea is also helping BETA find candidates to fill an open position on its board.

"Until the time comes when minority entrepreneurs are given the opportunity to obtain funding for startup growth, we will not have full economic freedom in this country," Bethea said.

Despite a challenging road, Bethea has continued to grow Upsie. In 2017, the company was one of 10 companies accepted to participate in the Target+Techstars Retail Accelerator. After that, the company raised $1.7 million.

Then last year, Upsie secured $5 million from a group of investors that included Minneapolis-based Matchstick Ventures and St. Paul-based The Syndicate Fund.

The growing tech company now employs about a dozen people and recently moved into a new office in St. Paul.

"I learned not to allow anyone to marginalize me or my dreams," Bethea said. "I didn't check the traditional boxes and never would, but I believed in what I was doing, and kept pushing and telling my story until I broke through."

We Sparkle CEO Michelle Maryns has spent the past several months trying to help more than 100 businesses stay afloat while trying to raise capital for her own company.

We Sparkle builds tools to help small businesses increase sales and invest in their communities. Its first product is a smart bot that helps business owners with administration and marketing tasks. We Sparkle

Minneapolis' entrepreneurs of color face unique challenges in raising venture capital offers its services to anyone that wants them, but places special focus on helping minority-owned businesses.

"When the pandemic hit, so many of our customers had to shut down," Maryns said. "And they're just starting to open back up."

One of the groups hit hardest was the Minnesota Healing Justice Network, a group of more than 100 doulas, midwives, nurses, therapists and other health professionals. Maryns said We Sparkle "went into crisis mode" helping the Healing Justice Network, one of its largest customers.

"There's been a lot of learning," she said. "I think it's helped everyone become more resilient in the future."

Currently, WeSparkle's 118 customers all identify as women or persons of color. While many of these businesses have taken a hit as a result of the Covid-19 pandemic, some are starting to experience fresh support as part of the "Buy Black" movement. The Star Tribune reports that many Black-owned businesses have seen a surge in demand in the month following George Floyd's death.

With the economy beginning to open back up, Maryns is redirecting her attention to raise capital for We Sparkle.

"There have been a lot of studies done about minority and women-owned businesses having better returns for VCs," Maryns said. "People are starting to recognize that. Unprompted, I had a potential investor mention that in a meeting."

We Sparkle recently received just under $25,000 in the form of a Launch Minnesota Innovation grant. The company is actively seeking an individual or organization to match the grant and begin discussions with VCs and angel investors to lead a seed round.

"I've talked a lot with more traditional VCs so far and I feel really hopeful that the tide is turning," Maryns said.

Dionne Gumbs is familiar with the struggle of raising venture capital. After spending more than a decade in finance, she partnered with a friend from college (a White woman) to create a startup that helped women manage financial resources.

"We were well connected and well networked and we still faced polite smiles and meetings that led to nowhere," she said. "Whereas many founders of color have traditionally focused on businesses in areas that VCs claim to not understand, we were right in the middle of the growing financial-technology hub of New York."

Gumbs and her co-founder were armed with MBAs from Ivy League colleges, impressive resumes and a thorough business plan, but at the time it wasn't enough.

"Thankfully, things are changing," Gumbs said.

Gumbs founded GenEQTY in 2018. The fintech company offers a digital banking platform that manages all aspects of business for women-owned and minority-owned companies.

Minneapolis' entrepreneurs of color face unique challenges in raising venture capital

"My most successful clients would often share how unnecessarily difficult their journey was in accessing capital and resources," Gumbs said. "They didn't feel our current institutions were for them. It makes sense because they were not the original architects."

GenEQTY hopes make the system work for those typically overlooked by traditional financial institutions. Despite her passion and strong financial background, she found it difficult to gain interest or traction in the Twin Cities when she moved here several years ago.

"I was told there was a very tight community of investors and hopefully our paths would cross one day," Gumbs said.

Not wanting to wait for an invitation, she looked to the coasts to raise money. Fundraising for anyone is nerve-racking, but as a Black woman, Gumbs said, it's even more daunting.

"The list of direct insults is long, and the list of snide, indirect comments is even longer," she said. "You don't look like the people you're pitching to and the smiles, coffee chats, dinners and drinks that result in nothing can be enough to make you want to quit."

Just before the arrival of the Covid-19 pandemic, Gumbs had received the necessary capital commitments to launch her business. But investors decided to pull back due to the economic uncertainty caused by the virus. Still, she is pushing forward with GenEQTY.

"You have to keep going - keep learning from each meeting, get coaching, be organized, be diligent, be relentless," Gumbs said. "Many founders of color like me have had a life of doing more with less. So we press on."

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 530 wordsByline: STEPHEN MONTEMAYOR; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: At least 14 federal criminal cases have been filed in unrest over Floyd's death.Body

Federal authorities charged two more people - both from within the Twin Cities metropolitan area - in connection with separate arsons during last month's unrest over George Floyd's killing.

Mohamed Hussein Abdi, 19, of Maplewood, and Matthew Scott White, 31, of Minneapolis, each made first appearances Tuesday in federal court, bringing the total of federal arson and rioting charges since Floyd's death to at least 14.

According to a federal criminal complaint, Abdi and one other person were captured on surveillance video setting fire to Gordon Parks High School in St. Paul on May 28 - three days after the police killing of Floyd in south Minneapolis. The complaint says that Abdi was seen pouring clear liquid on the school's cafeteria floor and into a trash can before starting a fire using a "liquid-soaked garment."

White appeared in a separate case two weeks after his sister - Jessica Lynn White - was arrested in connection with a May 28 blaze that destroyed a St. Paul Enterprise Rent-A-Car location. Each faces charges of conspiracy to commit arson.

Paul Applebaum, an attorney representing White, said Tuesday that White maintained his innocence. Applebaum said he has not received all of the evidence in the case, but acknowledged that the growing number of federal arson charges related to last month's civil unrest posed a unique legal argument.

"Political upheaval and mass demonstrations and things like that versus your garden variety arson case where someone wants to get rid of a money-losing restaurant," Applebaum said. "That obviously lends a dynamic to it that is something that we're going to hope to exploit in a courtroom setting because people have very strong feelings about what happened."

An attorney for Abdi could not be determined Tuesday.

According to a federal criminal complaint, the two White siblings and Jessica White's juvenile son were captured on surveillance cameras inside and outside the Enterprise building in the moments before and after it began burning. The three also lingered to watch the building burn after a crowd gathered outside.

2 more charged in fires amid riot

The complaint described witnesses coming forward after the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) offered a $5,000 reward for information on the three people behind the Enterprise fire and issued a news release earlier in June showing surveillance photos of three suspects. The ATF got tips identifying Jessica White and her son that same day; Jessica White was arrested June 16.

Last week, according to the complaint, a witness to the fire identified Matthew White and said that he was on supervised release from federal prison and living in the Longfellow neighborhood in Minneapolis. Court records show that White was sentenced to time served and supervised release for bank fraud earlier this year.

White is next scheduled to appear in court Thursday for a detention hearing.

In another case Tuesday, Dylan Shakespeare Robinson, a 22-year-old Brainerd man charged with arson in the Third Precinct fire, made his first appearance in a Minnesota federal courtroom after being arrested in and extradited from Colorado in June.

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 512 wordsByline: RANDY FURST; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Federal judge mentions Floyd, Castile and Brown in declining to dismiss the civil case.Body

U.S. District Judge Donovan Frank has rejected a motion to dismiss a lawsuit against a Rochester police officer who allegedly walked onto a black homeowner's property looking for a barking dog, referred to the homeowner's race, and joked about shooting him.

Frank referred in his order to the May 25 killing of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police, writing that the Rochester officer's comments were at worst "outright racist" or at best racial stereotypes.

Jason Hively, an attorney for police officer Samuel Higgins, said in an e-mail that Higgins had been disciplined for his comments. But Hively said he was confident the suit ultimately will be dismissed.

Rochester residents Michael Vernio and Kelli Gendron sued Higgins alleging that he violated their Fourth Amendment rights by entering their backyard to investigate a neighbor's complaint about barking dogs.

According to Frank, Higgins went to the backyard where Gendron was sitting. Vernio, who is black, joined them and questioned Higgins' right to walk onto their property. He said the neighbors should have talked to him rather than call police.

Higgins, who was wearing a body camera, suggested they did so because Vernio "is a very loud, boisterous black man."

Frank wrote that Vernio responded that Higgins was a "white man with a gun and I'm afraid," to which Higgins replied, "and you haven't been shot yet."

Vernio gestured to Gendron and said, "I've got a witness, that's why," Frank wrote. He noted that Vernio then laughed.

"I'm just playing," said Higgins. He then returned to his police car and left.

Vernio and Gendron allege that Higgins violated their Fourth Amendment right by conducting an "unreasonable search." They seek unspecified damages for mental and emotional pain they say they suffered as a result of the incident.

Frank ruled that more information must be gathered to determine if Higgins had the right to walk onto the property.

As to Higgins' racial remarks, the judge wrote he could not "remain silent." He noted the fatal police shootings of two black men: Michael Brown in Ferguson, Mo., in 2014, and Philando Castile in Falcon Heights in 2016.

"A comment - even joking - that infers that an African-American man is fortunate to not have been shot 'yet' by a police officer would be problematic," Frank wrote. "Such a comment ignores the historic context of law enforcement actions against African-Americans."

Attorney Joshua Newville, who represents the Rochester couple, declined to comment or to make the couple available for an interview.

Hively said that while Higgins' comments are not related to the issue of whether he entered a private area, they were inappropriate.

"The Department conducted an investigation into this incident and concluded the officer violated its professional code of conduct policy which states officers are required to treat all members of the public with courtesy and respect. Based on his 18 years of service and no disciplinary record, he was disciplined and given a written reprimand," Hively said.

ARTICLE MXXIX. SMALL FIRMS TAKE BIGGEST HIT, FED FINDS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 1, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 500 wordsByline: KAVITA KUMAR; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Regional economist finds "catastrophic" financial declines in Minnesota, nearby states.Body

The pandemic has dealt a particularly big blow to smaller businesses, to women and minority-owned businesses, and to sectors such as entertainment, lodging and retail.

Those are some of the findings of a May survey of nearly 1,100 businesses across Minnesota and in neighboring states conducted by the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis.

"The main takeaway is that COVID effects have been very wide and very deep and negative, but there's also variation across those groups," Ron Wirtz, regional outreach director, said during a webinar Tuesday on the effect of the pandemic on the Minnesota economy.

He noted that many of the traditional measures of the economy, such as gross domestic product and monthly unemployment numbers, have a lag to them of anywhere from a month to six months and have not been able to keep up with the fast-changing nature of the COVID economy.

"During this time of really volatile labor markets, we're in a spot where we are trying to feel in the dark a little bit for what's happening," he said.

To help fill in the gaps, the Minneapolis Fed has been ramping up its surveying and outreach to businesses across the Upper Midwest to get a better pulse of the situation. While the surveys are not a scientific sample, they provide a good snapshot of the economy.

The May survey showed, for example, that larger firms have fared better than smaller ones. About 70% of sole proprietor businesses had their revenue cut in half, or worse, compared to 25% of larger firms.

"Now 25% is still a dramatic number," Wirtz said. "If you don't know anything else, that's a catastrophic number for the economy. But unfortunately, the smaller firms have seen even more negative impacts."

Women- and minority-owned businesses, which tend to be smaller and in harder-hit sectors such as food and retail, also saw steeper revenue declines compared to their counterparts.

Small firms take biggest hit, Fed finds

Data from the Minnesota Department of Employment and Economic Development show that job losses during the pandemic have disproportionately hurt women and people of color. These kinds of disparities, unfortunately, are not unusual, Wirtz said.

"We've seen these patterns in the past," he said. "I feel like maybe we're finally ready now to look at the data honestly since the murder of George Floyd and the social unrest in Minneapolis. Maybe now we're ready to stop accepting the fact that there are lopsided and racist distributional effects when the economy falters."

In addition to its stepped-up survey work, the Minneapolis Fed has also created a dashboard on its website that shows how the pandemic is affecting the economy. It includes changes in restaurant dining volume from Open Table, auto-traffic volume from the Minnesota Department of Transportation, and travel numbers from the Transportation Security Administration.

"What we're trying to do is get better data that helps us to track not what happened last month or two months ago, but what happened last week or even yesterday," he said.

Speed bumps added to slow traffic near Floyd memorial

Over the past month, thousands of people have flocked to a memorial in the south Minneapolis intersection where George Floyd died.

The constant flow of visitors is wearing on residents who live near 38th Street and S. Chicago Avenue. They are contacting city officials with complaints about parking, increased traffic and speeding drivers cutting through the neighborhood to get around the intersection that has been closed since May 25, when Floyd died while being detained by Minneapolis police.

"Neighborhood residents have called, sent text messages, DMs [direct messages] and e-mails, it's been a burden," said Minneapolis City Council Vice President Andrea Jenkins, who represents the ward where the colorful memorial is located. "There are such tremendous problems near the site."

To address residents' concerns, the Minneapolis Public Works Department is installing temporary speed humps on side streets and alleys adjacent to the memorial.

"This is unique," said Steve Mosing, traffic operations engineer for the city. "There's the memorial and it's drawing traffic, and with the closure you have traffic trying to make connections around it. We hope this deters drivers to stay on the arterial system and use detours that are in place."

Arterial streets are main thoroughfares with a higher traffic capacity than neighborhood streets. With 38th and Chicago closed, the city is directing north-south traffic from Chicago to use Park, Portland and Bloomington avenues. Drivers making east-west movements on 38th Street have been detoured to 42nd Street.

Crews are putting in speed humps made from compacted gravel on the 3700 block of Columbus Avenue and the 3800 blocks of 10th and Elliot avenues. The humps, a foot or two high, are similar to those the city uses to cover plastic pipes placed along streets to provide temporary water service while water mains are repaired. Two humps will be placed on each block, Mosing said.

Speed bumps added to slow traffic near Floyd memorial

"The best results to slow traffic is to put them in pairs," Mosing said.

Flat plastic speed bumps, similar to those seen in parking lots, will be bolted to the pavement in alleys behind 10th and Elliot avenues. Signs warning drivers of the speed bumps will be posted, Mosing said.

The city will monitor the traffic and determine if more humps might be needed in the area. The humps will be removed around November.

"We hope this resolves the issue of speed and traffic volume," he said.

By EMILY WAGSTER PETTUS

JACKSON, Miss. (AP) - With a stroke of the governor's pen, Mississippi is retiring the last state flag in the U.S. with the Confederate battle emblem - a symbol that's widely condemned as racist.

Republican Gov. Tate Reeves signed the historic bill Tuesday at the Governor's Mansion, immediately removing official status for the 126-year-old banner that has been a source of division for generations.

"This is not a political moment to me but a solemn occasion to lead our Mississippi family to come together, to be reconciled and to move on," Reeves said on live TV just before the signing. "We are a resilient people defined by our hospitality. We are a people of great faith. Now, more than ever, we must lean on that faith, put our divisions behind us, and unite for a greater good."

Mississippi has faced increasing pressure to change its flag since protests against racial injustice have focused attention on Confederate symbols in recent weeks.

A broad coalition of legislators on Sunday passed the landmark legislation to change the flag, capping a weekend of emotional debate and decades of effort by Black lawmakers and others who see the rebel emblem as a symbol of hatred.

Among the small group of dignitaries witnessing the bill signing were Reuben Anderson, who was the first African American justice on the Mississippi Supreme Court, serving from 1985 to 1991; Willie Simmons, a current state Transportation Commissioner who is the first African American elected to that job; and Reena Evers-Everette, daughter of civil rights icons Medgar and Myrlie Evers.

Medgar Evers, a Mississippi NAACP leader, was assassinated in the family's driveway in 1963. Myrlie Evers was national chairwoman of the NAACP in the mid-1990s and is still living.

With a pen stroke, Mississippi drops Confederate-themed flag

"That Confederate symbol is not who Mississippi is now. It's not what it was in 1894, either, inclusive of all Mississippians," Evers-Everette said after the ceremony. "But now we're going to a place of total inclusion and unity with our hearts along with our thoughts and in our actions."

Reeves used several pens to sign the bill. As he completed the process, a cheer could be heard from people outside the Governor's Mansion who were watching the livestream broadcast on their phones. Reeves handed the pens to lawmakers and others who had worked on the issue.

The Confederate battle emblem has a red field topped by a blue X with 13 white stars. White supremacist legislators put it on the upper-left corner of the Mississippi flag in 1894, as white people were squelching political power that African Americans had gained after the Civil War.

Critics have said for generations that it's wrong for a state where 38% of the people are Black to have a flag marked by the Confederacy, particularly since the Ku Klux Klan and other hate groups have used the symbol to promote racist agendas.

Mississippi voters chose to keep the flag in a 2001 statewide election, with supporters saying they saw it as a symbol of Southern heritage. But since then, a growing number of cities and all the state's public universities have abandoned it.

Several Black legislators, and a few white ones, kept pushing for years to change it. After a white gunman who had posed with the Confederate flag killed Black worshipers at a South Carolina church in 2015, Mississippi's Republican speaker of the House, Philip Gunn, said his religious faith compelled him to say that Mississippi must purge the symbol from its flag.

The issue was still broadly considered too volatile for legislators to touch, until the police custody death of an African American man in Minneapolis, George Floyd, set off weeks of sustained protests against racial injustice, followed by calls to take down Confederate symbols.

A groundswell of young activists, college athletes and leaders from business, religion, education and sports called on Mississippi to make this change, finally providing the momentum for legislators to vote.

Before the bill signing Tuesday, state employees raised and lowered several of the flags on a pole outside the Capitol. The secretary of state's office sells flags for $20 each, and a spokeswoman said there has been a recent increase in requests.

During recent news conferences, Reeves refused to say whether he thought the Confederate-themed flag properly represents present-day Mississippi, sticking to a position he ran on last year, when he promised that if the flag design was going to be reconsidered, it would be done in another statewide election.

Now, a commission will design a new flag that cannot include the Confederate symbol and must have the words "In God We Trust." Voters will be asked to approve it in the Nov. 3 election. If they reject it, the commission will draft a different design using the same guidelines, to be sent to voters later.

Reeves said before signing over the flag's demise, "We are all Mississippians and we must all come together. What better way to do that than include 'In God We Trust' on our new state banner."

He added: "The people of Mississippi, black and white, and young and old, can be proud of a banner that puts our faith front and center. We can unite under it. We can move forward - together."

Highlight: Body camera video shows Antonio Arnelo Smith handing his driver's license to a Black police officer and answering questions cooperatively before a white officer walks up behind him, wraps him in a bear hug and slams him face-first to the ground.

Body

SAVANNAH, Ga. - Body camera video shows Antonio Arnelo Smith handing his driver's license to a Black police officer and answering questions cooperatively before a white officer walks up behind him, wraps him in a bear hug and slams him face-first to the ground.

"Oh my God, you broke my wrist!" the 46-year-old Black man screams as two more white Valdosta officers arrive, holding him down and handcuffing him following the takedown. One eventually tells Smith he's being arrested on an outstanding warrant, and is immediately corrected by the first officer: They've got the wrong man.

Clutching his wrist and whimpering, Smith was let go without charges after the violent encounter on Feb. 8 in Valdosta, Georgia, near the Florida state line.

Now he's suing all four officers, as well as Valdosta's police chief, mayor and others, saying police used excessive force and violated his civil rights.

"When you see that video, you can't help but say this is a travesty," said Nathaniel Haugabrook, one of Smith's attorneys. "Nobody should be done that way."

The federal lawsuit comes during a national outcry over police brutality against people of color, sparked by the killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis. Haugabrook said police stopped Smith for questioning after a drug store employee reported him for panhandling outside.

"Obviously it has some racial tones to it," Haugabrook said Thursday.

Smith's encounter with police went largely unnoticed for more than four months, until he filed suit June 19. The city of Valdosta issued a statement three days after that, saying police are conducting an internal investigation and that Smith never filed a complaint.

'You broke my wrist!' Georgia police sued for taking down wrong man

City officials also released one of the four body camera recordings - that of the officer who grabbed Smith, which doesn't show the takedown because the camera is pressed to Smith's back. Valdosta officials didn't release body camera videos with a clearer view until after the Valdosta Daily Times published one received from Smith's attorneys.

The city's statement said police responding to a report that a man was harassing customers and asking for money outside the drug store simultaneously found two suspects nearby who fit the description. Officers questioning one of them learned he had an outstanding arrest warrant. The other was Smith.

The city's statement says that an officer, identified in the lawsuit as Sgt. Billy Wheeler, approached Smith mistakenly believing he was the wanted man, and "advised him to place his hands behind his back." Smith "began to resist by pulling his arms forward and tensing his body," prompting Wheeler to take him to the ground, the city said.

This is not an accurate description of what the officers' body cameras recorded.

The video shows Wheeler walk up silently behind Smith, grab his right wrist and pin both of his arms to his sides in a bear hug. Only then does he order Smith to put his pinned hands behind his back, and Wheeler slams him to the ground almost immediately thereafter.

Asked about this discrepancy, a city spokeswoman, Ashlyn Johnson, said the city had no further comment. She said she did not know the status of the officers involved.

"The City of Valdosta and the Valdosta Police Department take any report of any injury to a citizen seriously," the statement said.

The videos, recorded at noon on a clear, sunny day, show the encounter from beginning to end. Smith cries out in pain that his wrist is broken, and Wheeler says: "Yeah, he might be broke." The officers remove the handcuffs within about a minute and call for an ambulance. Still on the ground, Smith asks why he's being arrested.

"We have a warrant for your arrest," one officer tells Smith.

That prompts the officer who first stopped Smith, identified in court records as Dominic Henry, to correct them.

"Hey, this was another guy," Henry says. "The guy with the warrant's over there. No, there's two different people."

Smith leaves the scene before paramedics arrive. His lawyer said Smith wanted to get away from the officers as quickly as possible, and the wrist never healed properly.

Smith's lawsuit in U.S. District Court seeks unspecified monetary damages. In a letter sent to Valdosta officials seeking a settlement before the lawsuit was filed, Smith's attorneys asked for $700,000. But he also wants something more, his lawyer said: A commitment by the Valdosta Police Department to reform.

Periscope employees walk out in protest, claiming ownership muted Black Lives Matter stance

Tensions between ad agency Periscope and its parent company Quad/Graphics Inc. broke into public view this week as roughly 150 people - virtually the entire Periscope Minneapolis office - walked out Thursday, claiming Quad/Graphics had tried to quash employee support for the Black Lives Matter movement in the wake of the death of George Floyd a month ago.

A day earlier, 13 employees, four of them Black, walked out of the Minneapolis agency, claiming that Quad/Graphics officials misreported diversity levels among its executives.

"They said there were 25% people of color at the director level," said Periscope's Group Strategy Director Nathan Young. "By my count I am the only one."

The walkout follows a dispute between Periscope and Quad/Graphics over how to respond to Floyd's death, which occurred during an arrest by four Minneapolis Police Department officers. The incident sparked days of protests that spiraled into riots and widespread damage to businesses; the four officers have been fired and are facing criminal charges.

In the wake of the protests, businesses large and small came forward with statements supporting the Black Lives Matter movement. Periscope wanted to issue its own statement, but the phrase "Black Lives Matter" was scrubbed by Quad/Graphics, according to a statement from Periscope. Quad allegedly issued bans on other Periscope-related material that contained "Black Lives Matter," too.

"We do not know why the leadership at Quad took the position that we could not post the words Black Lives Matter," Periscope said. "We heard that it was because Black Lives Matter is too closely associated with defunding the police, and that making that statement is derogatory to law enforcement officers. We disagree."

Sussex, Wis.-based Quad Graphics, which bought Periscope in November 2018, said Thursday it re-issued diversity data, will be instituting diversity and inclusion training and supports Periscope's desire for freedom of expression.

"Unfortunately, we were slow to communicate our position so, today, I want to unequivocally confirm that Black Lives Matter and apologize for any pain I may have caused our employees, clients and others for not explicitly stating this fact sooner," CEO Joel Quadracci said in a statement. "I am sorry."

Young said he expects to be back in the office Monday.

"Our new president (Cari Bucci-Hulings) will be starting Monday and we have all the confidence in the world in her," he said. "Given that she is there, I do feel confident that we are going to be able to right this ship."

Periscope is the second-largest advertising agency in the Twin Cities with more than $83 million in annual revenue, according to the Business Journal's 2019 list of largest ad agencies. Some of its biggest clients are Target Corp. and UnitedHealth Group Inc.

Some members of a commission reviewing a proposal to dismantle the Minneapolis Police Department expressed concern Wednesday about the fast-tracked timeline they must follow if the proposed change has any chance of getting on the November ballot.

The Minneapolis Charter Commission met Wednesday to outline how it will go about its work over the next several weeks as it reviews the City Council's proposal to amend the city's charter. The proposal, which comes following widespread criticism of law enforcement over the killing of George Floyd, would replace the police department with a new "Department of Community Safety and Violence Prevention" that has yet to be fully defined.

The Charter Commission has the authority to approve the amendment, propose a substitute amendment, reject it or ask for a 90-day extension. The City Council is not bound by the commission's recommendation, but it can't move forward until the review is complete.

In order to meet an Aug. 21 deadline to get the question on the November ballot - where voters would have the final say - the commission must finish its work in 35 days. Typically, the commission has 60 days to review a proposed amendment change, and can ask for a 90-day extension.

"If we elect to take our additional time, this ballot question will not be on the ballot in November," Commission Chairman Barry Clegg said.

The 15-member commission will hold two public hearings - one on July 15, and another that has yet to be scheduled. Commissioners also voted to invite members of the City Council and the mayor to its July 8 meeting to answer questions. The public may submit comments online until the conclusion of the final public hearing.

Minneapolis Charter Commission members fretting timeline of police overhaul

Initially, Clegg proposed to have the first public hearing next week, but some commissioners said they were uncomfortable with that tight timeline.

"I'm not as concerned about meeting the council's timeline as I am about getting this right," said Commissioner Matt Perry. He suggested holding the first public hearing in two weeks, to give neighborhood organizations and other groups time to talk with constituents. "And if that pushes the timeline out, so be it."

The Minneapolis police force has come under heavy pressure since Floyd, a Black man in handcuffs, died May 25 after an officer pressed his knee on Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes.

According to draft language of the amendment posted online, the new department "will have responsibility for public safety services prioritizing a holistic, public health-oriented approach." The director of the new agency would have "non-law-enforcement experience in community safety services, including but not limited to public health and/or restorative justice approaches."

The amendment would still allow for armed police officers - it calls for a division of licensed peace officers who would answer to the new department's director.

BOSTON - When Mahdi Hashemian was looking for a bicycle for his 7-year-old daughter Zeynab last week, the Cambridge, Massachusetts, resident decided to skip his local cycle shops in favor of a Black-owned one a few miles away in Boston's Dorchester neighborhood.

At Spokehouse, a bike shop with "Black Lives Matter" painted in large bold letters outside, the pair picked out a simple, white-colored model and had training wheels and a white basket for its handlebars installed.

Hashemian, who is set to earn his doctorate from MIT, said he's been reminded in recent weeks of the outpouring of support he felt from the campus community when President Donald Trump imposed a ban on travelers from Muslim majority countries in 2017, including his native Iran.

"It seems small," he said of his bike purchase, "but a little show of support can mean a lot."

As the May killing of George Floyd by a white police officer in Minneapolis has fueled a worldwide outcry against racism and police brutality, many on social media are encouraging people to spend their money at Black-owned businesses. Lists of local retailers, artisans and manufacturers have been circulating on Instagram, Facebook and Twitter, helping Black-owned businesses raise their profile at a time when the coronavirus pandemic has ravaged the economy.

According to Google, searches for "Black owned businesses near me" reached an all-time high last month in the U.S. Yelp has also made it easier for customers to search for Black-owned establishments on the restaurant review site, and Uber Eats says it'll waive delivery fees for purchases from Black-owned restaurants through the end of the year.

"It's great seeing people realize that where they shop can be another form of activism, that it's a way to put your money where your mouth is," said Randy Williams, founder of Talley & Twine, a Black-owned watch company in Portsmouth, Virginia. "You're helping Black businesses become self-sustaining, and that helps the whole ecosystem."

Black-owned businesses see sales surge amid racism reckoning

Sales at Talley & Twine these past few months are up more than 300% from the same period last year, partly because more people are shopping online during the pandemic, he said. But the company was also recently mentioned on a number of social media lists of Black-owned businesses, and its Juneteenth-themed watch sold out before the June 19 holiday commemorating the emancipation of enslaved African Americans, Williams said.

In Los Angeles, cupcake sales and shipping orders on other sweets are up at Southern Girl Desserts after it was also mentioned on social media lists, said Catarah Coleman, co-owner of the bakery in the city's Baldwin Hills neighborhood.

"It's not nearly the level of business we had before the virus, but it's something," she said. "If we only depended on foot traffic and folks just stayed in their own neighborhoods, I'm not sure we'd be able to keep going."

At Slade's Bar and Grill in Boston's historically Black Roxbury neighborhood, online gift card purchases and take-out orders are up significantly as the long running soul food and live music venue - which boasted Malcolm X, Muhammad Ali and Martin Luther King, Jr. as patrons in its heyday - is just starting to reopen after shuttering during the pandemic, said Shawn Hunter, the managing partner.

"We're definitely seeing white customers and customers from outside the neighborhood that we would probably have never seen before," Hunter said.

In nearby Dorchester, Kerri Thibodeau said she drove about half an hour from suburban Stoughton to shop at Pure Oasis, the state's lone Black-owned retail marijuana shop and one of the few in the nation.

The 35-year-old mother of two, who is white, said there's a marijuana shop about five minutes from her house but she decided to support Pure Oasis after hearing that more than $100,000 worth of marijuana products were stolen from the shop during a large Black Lives Matter protest through Boston last month.

"We really need to come together and show that it doesn't matter the color of our skin," Thibodeau said after buying some marijuana flower and pre-rolled joints last week.

But the business boon hasn't been without growing pains for some companies. Black-owned bookstores have struggled to keep up with a surge in orders, many of them for a handful of sold-out titles on race relations.

In Boston, the owners of Frugal Bookstore, the city's only Black-owned bookshop, say customers are already seeking to cancel orders and complaining about delays and poor customer service. The Roxbury shop, which raised more than $40,000 through an earlier social media campaign to help it weather the economic downturn, said in a note to customers that went viral last week that 75% of the more than 20,000 purchases it's received are for the same 10 books.

Black-owned businesses see sales surge amid racism reckoning

At Spokehouse, the Boston bike shop, owner Noah Hicks hopes the interest isn't a passing fad and that it leads to more concrete efforts to address the challenges facing Black entrepreneurs, including access to capital.

Hicks said his nearly five-year-old shop's sales have tripled this month, compared to last June, in part because bike shops are enjoying brisk business during the pandemic .

The shop also received about $16,000 in donations after it was robbed during last month's unrest, though Hicks ended up donating about half to efforts benefiting the local Black community, including covering the costs for a "Ride for Black Lives," a cycling rally in Boston this past weekend.

"People being intentional about their economic purchases is refreshing," he said. "But we also want them to help tear down the systems that make it hard for us, not just spend their dollars with us."

"Lift Ev'ry Voice and Sing" will be performed live or played before "The Star-Spangled Banner" prior to each NFL game during Week 1 and the league is considering putting names of victims of police brutality on helmet decals or jersey patches, a person familiar with the discussions told The Associated Press.

The person said the league is working collaboratively with players to recognize victims of systemic racism throughout the season in a variety of ways. The person spoke to the AP on Thursday on condition of anonymity because discussions between the league and the NFL Players Association are ongoing.

Additional plans include the use of educational programs and storytelling about the victims and their families similar to the league's PSA on Botham Jean released in January and the Super Bowl commercial on Corey Jones featuring his cousin, former NFL star Anquan Boldin.

"Lift Ev'ry Voice and Sing" is traditionally known as the Black anthem. It'll be played first when the Super Bowl champion Kansas City Chiefs host the Houston Texans to kick off the NFL regular season on Sept. 10.

It's uncertain whether fans will be in attendance Week 1 or at all this season because of the coronavirus pandemic. The league is considering asking fans to sign a waiver and wear masks, according to a person familiar with those conversations.

The NFL announced last month it is committing $250 million over 10 years to social justice initiatives, targeting what it calls "systemic racism" and supporting "the battle against the ongoing and historic injustices faced by African Americans."

VOICES OF DISSENT ON ENDING MPD

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

Egregious, grotesque, absurd, crazy, ridiculous.

These are a handful of the words that some local African American leaders are using to rebuke the Minneapolis City Council's moves toward dismantling the Police Department, even as they demand an overhaul of law enforcement.

While the movement to defund the police has been driven by Black activists, others say that city politicians rushed the process and failed to include a police chief who has the backing of many Black residents.

"They have shown a complete disregard for the voices and perspectives of many members of the African American community," said Nekima Levy Armstrong, a civil rights attorney and former president of the Minneapolis chapter of the NAACP. "We have not been consulted as the city makes its decisions, even though our community is the one most heavily impacted by both police violence and community violence."

A month after George Floyd died under the knee of a police officer, the City Council unanimously voted Friday to revise the city charter to permit the dismantling of the Police Department, the first step toward putting the matter to voters on the November ballot. The ordinance, which the Charter Commission discussed during a meeting Wednesday, would abolish the city's current law enforcement structure in favor of a Department of Community Safety and Violence Prevention.

It also raises questions about the future of Medaria Arradondo, the city's first Black police chief.

The measure doesn't preclude a chief with a traditional policing background, but it requires the head of the new agency to have "non-law enforcement experience in community safety services, including but not limited to public health and/or restorative justice approaches." Arradondo joined the department as a patrol officer in 1989 in his early twenties.

Voices of dissent on ending MPD

"Why now, when you have an African American chief who is highly regarded and trusted in the Black community?" said Steven Belton, president and CEO of the Urban League Twin Cities. "This strikes me as being passive-aggressive Minnesota Nice on steroids. This is a hit on Chief Arradondo."

Pastor Brian Herron said the council is "pandering."

"We have a department that is troubled, but it is also a department that with the leadership of our chief could be really transformed, and the culture of policing could change dramatically if he was given the proper support," said Herron, who ministers at Zion Baptist Church in north Minneapolis.

Council Member Jeremiah Ellison said that there's urgency to create a system of emergency response that isn't harmful and that the council is not "pre-prescribing" what that looks like. He added that the charter change provides room for the council to make changes that the community asks for and doesn't lock them in to minimum police staffing or having police as the sole emergency responders.

"The Black community is not a monolith, and just because there's someone that might have a high profile doesn't mean that they necessarily speak on behalf of the Black community of Minneapolis," said Ellison, who is Black and represents a North Side ward that's about half Black.

He said the city wants to create a system that is sustainable because "I'm not always going to be the council member of Ward 5, Jacob's not always going to be the mayor, Rondo's not always going to be the chief, and so we can't build policy based on one person's personality."

On June 7, a veto-proof majority of the council vowed to disband the Police Department at a rally in Powderhorn Park. The event was hosted by Black Visions Collective, a Black-led racial justice nonprofit, and Reclaim the Block, an affiliated coalition demanding divestment from the police.

Those organizations have pushed City Hall in recent years to shift money from the Police Department to violence prevention and community programs as the first move toward a police-free society.

"We have been working to call for defunding of the police primarily because we feel like it's one really critical step in actually being able to abolish the police and open up the resources that are really needed in our communities to provide true safety," Kandace Montgomery, director of Black Visions Collective, told Belton last week.

They spoke during a collegial online discussion hosted by the Twin Cities Urban League. When Belton relayed a question from a listener asking why they couldn't work with the chief instead of removing power held by a Black person, Montgomery replied, "It's not a target towards Rondo. It's actually saying we need the type of leadership, the decades of experience to lead a department like this, that are rooted in community models of safety and restorative justice ... and most career law enforcement folks do not have that."

She said she was on daily calls with council members "trying to get stronger and more clear and specific language ... we think this is a first step and this is a marathon."

Belton said that some voices have been lost, noting, "There have been a lot of others who have been left out of this conversation."

He told the Star Tribune that the problem is a culture of policing that disregards Black lives, but he said nothing in the new proposal addresses that. He said it's irresponsible to talk about funding health care, housing and education - advocates want to shift more money from the police budget to social programs - without discussing public safety.

"The tension of living in many of these African American communities is that we are overpoliced, we are subjected to excessive police use of force, but at the same time we are also disproportionately victims of crime and witnesses of crime," said Belton. "And you cannot talk defunding the police if there is not a concomitant strategy of community safety in place as well."

Belton and others want more public hearings, broad community input and a deliberate process before the charter change is put to voters - not after.

Levy Armstrong said she doesn't have confidence in the City Council after it failed to take significant action on police issues over the years. She's among the those who pushed for more police accountability following the 2015 officer shooting of Jamar Clark, an unarmed 24-year-old African American man. Outrage over the killing prompted an 18-day protest outside the police Fourth Precinct that included Levy Armstrong, along with Montgomery and other activists working to defund police.

"I think some of them are seizing upon the national spotlight to look as if they're making a difference," Levy Armstrong said of the City Council.

Activist Raeisha Williams agreed. She believes in reducing the police budget and making officers reapply for their jobs, doing deep background checks and suspending cops who have more than a few complaints against them. But Williams also wants to ensure the safety of her ward, which is represented by Ellison, whom she ran against in 2017.

Williams said it was "grotesque" for the council to propose eliminating emergency response by police "when they had nothing else in place for who was going to protect the community the right way."

Sondra Samuels, president and CEO of the Northside Achievement Zone, urged neighbors at a community meeting this week to write to City Hall in opposition to the plan. She said residents want the same things for the city, but the council's vote "is premature, it's immature and it's dangerous."

WASHINGTON - President Donald Trump is asking Americans to let him keep his job. His critics are questioning how much of that job he's actually doing.

The questions have gotten louder in recent days following revelations Trump didn't read at least two written intelligence briefings about Russia paying bounties to the Taliban for the deaths of Americans in Afghanistan.

He also appeared to either downplay or miss repeated warnings about the coronavirus included in intelligence briefings, and he's been reluctant to amplify some of his own government's recommendations for reducing transmission, including wearing masks.

"He is not doing his job," said Michael Hayden, former director of the CIA and the National Security Agency.

Such assessments put Trump in a precarious position four months from Election Day and risk undercutting the central argument most incumbents make to voters when seeking reelection: Keep me on the job because I've proved I can do it.

Instead, Trump's uneven handling of the crises battering the nation, and the new revelations about his lack of attention to intelligence, have given Democrats an opening to argue to voters the president has proved he's ill-equipped to lead the nation through tough times, or outright absent in moments that demand leadership.

"It seems like our wartime president surrendered, waved the white flag and left the battlefield," said Joe Biden, Trump's Democratic opponent in the presidential race. Biden, who spent more than three decades as a senator and eight years as vice president, pitches himself to voters as a steady and experienced hand.

Trump came to power without any experience in governing, making the case to voters the go-with-your-gut decisions that helped him in business and as a reality television star would serve him as president. For some Americans disillusioned with career politicians in both parties, his outsider credentials were part of the appeal.

Trump has indeed taken an unconventional approach to the presidency. He's known to demand only the sparest detail in his briefings, and his workdays frequently include hours watching cable news and posting on Twitter. White House aides have at times been leery of delivering bad news to him for fear of sparking an angry reaction, according to current and former advisers. They said there's particular concern in the West Wing about discussing Russia because the subject can send Trump into a tirade about accusations he has a too-cozy relationship with Vladimir Putin and about the special counsel investigation into Russian interference in the 2016 election.

The current and former advisers insisted on anonymity to discuss their private dealings with the president.

Trump's tweets for any occasion and obsession with dominating the news cycle, even if it involves something negative, has sustained him for much of his presidency, when many of the crises were of his own making or fleeting in nature. Republicans often bristled at his tone and tweets but justified their support for him by pointing to the strong economy and the new generation of conservative judges he nominated to the courts.

But 2020 has been a year that's demanded more substance than style from the president. More than 125,000 Americans have died from COVID-19, and known infections are rising in several states. The strong economy Trump hoped to run on has cratered. And the deaths of several Black Americans has sparked a national reckoning over race and police brutality.

On each of those matters, Trump's critics - and some of his allies - argue he's fallen short rather than rising to the moment.

He's all but declared the pandemic over and has focused aggressively on reopening the economy, even as some Republican allies in key states start rolling back those efforts in a bid to contain outbreaks. Just 37% of Americans say they approve of Trump's handling of the pandemic, down from 44% in March, according to a recent poll from The Associated Press-NORC Center for Public Affairs Research.

The president has also been largely absent from the discussion of systemic racism in America following the death of George Floyd, a Black man who died when a white police officer pressed his knee into Floyd's neck for several minutes. Trump has focused much of his energy on the subject of racism on defending the prominent placement of memorials to Confederate figures.

Democrats also say the revelations over the past week that the president may not have read or absorbed intelligence briefings have put a finer point on the questions they're raising about his competency. The White House insisted Trump was unaware of assessments that Russia had put a bounty on U.S. service members in Afghanistan, though intelligence officials told the AP that the matter was included in at least two written briefings over the past year and that senior advisers alerted the president to the intelligence.

"At best, our commander in chief is utterly derelict in his duties, presiding over a dangerously dysfunctional national security process that is putting our country and those who wear its uniform at great risk," Susan Rice, who was President Barack Obama's national security adviser and is under consideration to be Biden's running mate, wrote in a New York Times opinion piece.

Some Republicans have defended Trump, including Texas Sen. John Cornyn, who told reporters the president "can't single-handedly remember everything, I'm sure, that he's briefed on." And White House press secretary Kayleigh McEnany stated: "The president does read."

"This president is the most informed person on planet Earth," she declared.

To Democrats, what's transpired in the White House was foreshadowed during the 2016 campaign, when Hillary Clinton argued Trump simply wasn't prepared for the presidency. Voters still chose him over the experienced former senator and secretary of state.

Now, Democrats believe their case about competency is more compelling given Trump has a record in office to defend.

"His actions and inactions directly impact people's lives now," said Josh Schwerin, spokesman for the Democratic super PAC Priorities USA.

Body

WASHINGTON - It's rare for public opinion on social issues to change sharply and swiftly. And yet in the wake of George Floyd's death, Americans' opinions about police brutality and racial injustice have moved dramatically.

About half of American adults believe police violence against the public is a "very" or "extremely" serious problem, according to a poll conducted earlier this month by The Associated Press-NORC Center for Public Affairs Research. Only about a third said the same as recently as last September, as well as in July 2015, just a few months after Freddie Gray, a Black man, died in police custody in Baltimore.

Floyd, a Black man, died on May 25 after a white Minneapolis police officer pressed his knee into Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes. In the weeks that followed, protests erupted nationwide.

The recent shifts in public opinion stand out when compared with years of survey research conducted following similar slayings of Black people by police. They are distinct from slow and steady movement on other social issues, such as support for same-sex marriage. And there is evidence they may last.

"I think this seems to be something different from the gradual change that we often see with cultural and social issues," said Jennifer Benz, the deputy director of the AP-NORC Center.

The new poll and recent trends from NORC's General Social Survey, she said, are "suggestive that there's been something brewing for the past couple of years that could well be leading to lasting change, as opposed to situational change."

More Americans than in 2015 say police in most communities are more likely to use deadly force against a Black person than a white person, 61% today compared with 49% in 2015. Only about a third of Americans say the race of a person does not make a difference in the use of deadly force, compared with roughly half in 2015.

Wide shift in opinion on police, race rare in U.S. polling. It just happened.

And 65% say that police officers who cause injury or death in the course of their job are treated too leniently by the justice system, compared with 41% in 2015. Fewer now think police are treated either fairly or too harshly.

The recent poll builds on marked changes in public attitudes toward race relations observed in the 2018 General Social Survey, a long-running poll of Americans that started in 1972. The percentage saying the country spends too little on improving conditions of Black Americans peaked at 52%, up dramatically from 30% in 2014. Republicans and Democrats alike were more likely to say that. The poll also found more Americans attributing racial disparities in income, jobs, housing and education to discrimination.

Opinion on social issues often change gradually over an extended period of time.

Just 11% of Americans said gay and lesbian people should have the right to marry in 1988, according to the General Social Survey. That grew to 31% by 16 years later, the next time the question was asked. But after that, support for gay marriage didn't rise by more than 10 percentage points from one survey to the next. Support instead grew steadily over two decades to become the majority opinion, most recently at 68% in 2018.

The trend is similar in support for marijuana legalization. In 1973, the General Social Survey found that just 19% of Americans said marijuana should be made legal. Support ticked up and down for most of the following three decades, never exceeding 30%. It reached 31% in 2000 and steadily rose to 44% in 2010 and 61% in 2018. Like for same-sex marriage, the share saying marijuana should be legal never rose more than 10 percentage points from one poll to the next.

Sometimes, public opinion responds to specific events that bring attention to a social issue, but then returns back to a "normal" in quiet moments. Polling by Gallup is evidence of how American views on gun laws are responsive to mass shootings, with somewhat more saying they want to see laws on the sale of firearms made more strict in the aftermath of such an attack.

Support for stricter gun laws ticked up from 60% in February 1999 to 66% in late April that year, just after the shooting at Columbine High School in Colorado, which killed 21 people. By the early 2000s, the percentage of Americans preferring stricter gun laws slipped back down - as low as 51% in October 2002.

Gallup polling shows the trend has oscillated regularly since. It fell as low as 43% in 2011 but rose again to 58% the next time the question was asked in December 2012, after the shooting at an elementary school in Newtown, Connecticut, that killed 28 people. A year later, support fell back to 49%.

A similar bump again happened after the high school shooting in Parkland, Florida, in February 2018.

Meanwhile, significant shifts in public opinion inevitably follow presidential and midterm elections. In April 2016, before President Donald Trump was elected, just 34% of Republicans considered the nation's economy to be in good shape, according to an AP-NORC poll. By March 2017, that figure rose to 63% and was 89% in January 2020 before taking a hit amid the economic fallout of the COVID-19 pandemic.

Meanwhile, according to Gallup polling, just 24% of Democrats in 2018 said they were satisfied with the country's global standing, down 32 percentage points from 2017. What changed? Trump's inauguration in 2017 following eight years of President Barack Obama's time in office.

But events or crises that touch most Americans can often be agents of change.

Wide shift in opinion on police, race rare in U.S. polling. It just happened.

Approval of President George W. Bush went from 51% in the days just before the Sept. 11 attacks to 86% in the days just after, according to Gallup polling.

And more recently, the pandemic has deeply affected Americans' views of their own lives. A May poll from NORC at the University of Chicago found the lowest percentage of Americans saying they are very happy in nearly five decades. Just 14% say they very happy today, down from 31% in 2018.

Graphic

A federal charge has been dropped against a Ramsey woman who authorities initially said was involved in an arson at a St. Paul nutrition store in the wake of George Floyd's death.

Three 19-year-olds - Samuel Elliott Frey of Brooklyn Park, McKenzy Ann DeGuidio Dunn of Rosemount and Bailey Marie Baldus - were all charged in June in connection with the May 28 arson at the Great Health Nutrition store at 1360 W. University Ave.

On Thursday, charges against Baldus were dismissed.

"We're happy to see that the government decided to drop the charges," said her attorney, Daniel C. Guerrero. "I think it was clear from anyone's view of the video of what occurred in that health supplement store that Bailey's actions were certainly non-participatory in any alleged arson on that particular day."

Guerrero added that he was glad that authorities were following through with the prosecution of those who "needlessly destroyed property," saying Baldus was an innocent person caught up in the wide sweep.

"She certainly understands that she shouldn't have been in that building and she acknowledged that to the government, but what we saw on the video demonstrates her non-culpability and non-participation," he said.

According to the criminal complaint, after the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives circulated images of people seen on video surveillance, they received numerous tips that led to the three arrests. In the video footage at the Midway store, Frey can be seen pouring flammable hand sanitizer onto a shelving unit and setting it on fire, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Minnesota.

Magistrate Judge Hildy Bowbeer agreed on Thursday to dismiss the charges after two assistant U.S. attorneys filed a motion Wednesday.

The attorneys wrote that the arson investigation is ongoing and would include "reviewing material seized pursuant to search warrants and reviewing other evidence to determine the scope of the alleged conduct by Ms. Baldus and others." Fish & Richardson says it's been focused on racial disparity issues for some time, but George Floyd's death while in the custody of Minneapolis police prompted a bigger push.

The Boston-founded law firm, whose CEO works in Minneapolis, announced Tuesday a slate of new initiatives around racial justice. They include:

- Ongoing education that includes racial bias training across the firm
- An online resource hub for information sharing, particularly for racial issues
- Pro bono work centered around racial justice and community engagement. Staffers can spend up to 200 hours a year on racial issues and cases. Cases and efforts are still being determined.

The firm made similar efforts in the past, but it needed urgency and more commitments, said Kristine McKinney, Fish & Richardson's chief talent and inclusion officer.

Fish & Richardson announces initiatives to address racial inequity

"Fish has been doing a lot for diversity for a very long time," she said. "Right now, having a racial justice initiative came out of having a lot of employees in the Twin Cities and George Floyd was killed here."

The firm has done racial bias training in the past, but it often only involved one set of employees or one particular office; the new efforts will be firmwide.

The online hub will be a portal for employees to share books, podcasts and articles around racial issues that could spark thoughtful conversations.

The firm has let staffers do 200 hours of pro bono work per year in the past, but now pro bono directors will be looking for cases that specifically deal with racial matters.

"I think many firms were not pursuing progressive change," McKinney said. "We would like greater representation of diversity."

The firm also announced it will recognize Juneteenth, which celebrates the end of slavery in America, as an official holiday.

Fish & Richardson has a staff 376 in Minneapolis, 43 of whom are ethnic minorities, according to the firm. Its CEO, John Adkisson, offices there as well.

Gov. Tim Walz is asking the riots after the death of George Floyd be declared a federal disaster, opening the way for funds to help rebuild.

As much as $500 million in damages was reported, most of that to privately-owned buildings set afire during the unrest. Nearly 1,500 businesses were damaged during the riots, which lasted several days and nights.

State officials say about $15 million of public infrastructure was also damaged.

The riots, which began May 27, required the first full mobilization of the Minnesota National Guard since World War II.

Since the unrest, 10 people have been federally charged for rioting or arson.

Federal assistance would allow local governments to be reimbursed for debris removal, protective measures and the damages inflicted on the public buildings.

In his request, Walz said Minnesota faces a projected $2.4 billion revenue deficit, adding that the coronavirus pandemic has only aggravated the problem.

"Disaster assistance under the Stafford Act is clearly warranted," Walz wrote in the request. "Without it, and given the already heavy burden of so many previous state and federal disasters and the COVID-19 response, Minnesotans will struggle to return to their communities to normalcy." Midway small businesses left to pick up pieces with landlord terminating lease

Highlight: "Now we might lose everything," said one business owner.

Jenny Hui got choked up earlier this week when talking about the family business being shut down.

She's 28-years old and essentially grew up inside Golden Gate Cafe.

Her parents opened the restaurant in St. Paul's Midway Shopping Center shortly after they emigrated from China decades ago.

"They worked super hard all these years to build everything we have now," Hui said. "It's devastating to see it go out like this."

But the aftermath of civil unrest last month left parts of the Midway Shopping Center significantly damaged, and the landlord has informed tenants that he intends to terminate their leases.

The Pioneer Press obtained a copy of a letter dated June 25 in which the landlord cited a clause in the lease agreement that allows him to terminate in the case of extensive damage. He noted that all personal property must be removed from the premises by July 17.

Major League Soccer's Minnesota United principal owner Bill McGuire is involved in the property, though owner Rick Birdoff with RK Midway wrote the letter to tenants. Neither responded to requests for comment.

The Midway Shopping Center sits in the shadows of the newly constructed Allianz Field soccer stadium, home to Minnesota United.

"Obviously none of us anticipated this," Hui said. "Things have already been hard with the coronavirus pandemic and now it's going to be even harder because we could lose our whole livelihood."

That feeling resonates across businesses in the Midway Shopping Center as they are left to pick up the pieces.

Mary Lau owns Peking Garden and has operated out of the strip mall since 2005. She put more than $350,000 worth of improvements into the restaurant a few years ago and was heartbroken to find out that her lease was being terminated.

"We thought things could be fixed down the road and we could go back to our normal life," Lau said. "We were really hoping for that. Now there is no chance of that. We pretty much lost everything."

Her frustration started to manifest as she talked about needing to move out in the next couple of weeks.

"They want us to move out so fast," Lau said. "What do I need the tables for? What do I need the chairs for? What do I take the plates for? If I don't have a restaurant, I don't need any of that stuff. It's just a big headache for me right now."

While the orders at Peking Garden never made her family "a big fortune" over the years, Lau said it was more than enough to keep food on the table and help pay for college tuition.

"Now we might lose everything," Lau said. "It's hard to even explain how difficult it is for us right now."

Manylone Luangrath has been put in a tough spot, too. She opened Thien's Cajun Boiling Seafood in 2018 and was expecting to be around for much longer.

"What about the the money I put in?" Luangrath said. "I put a lot in to build this place and I'm not going to get any of that back."

She added that she has never missed a rent payment - even during the coronavirus pandemic - so it's especially frustrating to her that her lease is being terminated based on something completely out of her control.

Maybe the most frustrating thing for some businesses in the Midway Shopping Center is that the extensive damage doesn't apply to their respective storefronts. Golden Gate Cafe, for example, was untouched during the civil unrest, suffering nothing more than a little smoke damage. While the city has temporarily turned off the water, the gas, and the electricity, in theory, if the restaurant could get that stuff turned on, it could continue operating with relative ease.

"It feels like the easy way out for the landlord," Hui said. "That's how I'm seeing it at least. I understand that it's hard for everyone with the circumstances that we are going through. It just sucks because some of these tenants have been a staple of the community for a long time and it feels like they are completely disregarding that."

In a perfect world, Golden Gate Cafe would reopen at a new location.

"That's easier said than done because there are so many things that need to be worked through," Hui said. "We weren't expecting this at all so it's really tough to say what we are going to do."

In the letter sent out to tenants, the landlord mentioned the plans for retail space in the upcoming United Village at Midway project. That could be a viable option for some businesses, and it's something Lau, in particular, is holding out hope for down the road.

"I have nowhere to go right now," Lau said. "I still want to continue my business. I want to reopen whether it's finding another location or it's working with the landlord again to have a space in the future. I'm hoping I can do that."

By HANNAH FINGERHUT

WASHINGTON (AP) - It's rare for public opinion on social issues to change sharply and swiftly. And yet in the wake of George Floyd's death, Americans' opinions about police brutality and racial injustice have moved dramatically.

About half of American adults believe police violence against the public is a "very" or "extremely" serious problem, according to a poll conducted earlier this month by The Associated Press-NORC Center for Public Affairs Research. Only about a third said the same as recently as last September, as well as in July 2015, just a few months after Freddie Gray, a Black man, died in police custody in Baltimore.

Floyd, a Black man, died on May 25 after a white Minneapolis police officer pressed his knee into Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes. In the weeks that followed, protests erupted nationwide.

The recent shifts in public opinion stand out when compared with years of survey research conducted following similar slayings of Black people by police. They are distinct from slow and steady movement on other social issues, such as support for same-sex marriage. And there is evidence they may last.

"I think this seems to be something different from the gradual change that we often see with cultural and social issues," said Jennifer Benz, the deputy director of the AP-NORC Center.

The new poll and recent trends from NORC's General Social Survey, she said, are "suggestive that there's been something brewing for the past couple of years that could well be leading to lasting change, as opposed to situational change."

MORE ON THIS MOMENT

More Americans than in 2015 say police in most communities are more likely to use deadly force against a Black person than a white person, 61% today compared with 49% in 2015. Only about a third of

Wide shift in opinion on police, race rare in US polling

Americans say the race of a person does not make a difference in the use of deadly force, compared with roughly half in 2015.

And 65% say that police officers who cause injury or death in the course of their job are treated too leniently by the justice system, compared with 41% in 2015. Fewer now think police are treated either fairly or too harshly.

The recent poll builds on marked changes in public attitudes toward race relations observed in the 2018 General Social Survey, a long-running poll of Americans that started in 1972. The percentage saying the country spends too little on improving conditions of Black Americans peaked at 52%, up dramatically from 30% in 2014. Republicans and Democrats alike were more likely to say that. The poll also found more Americans attributing racial disparities in income, jobs, housing and education to discrimination.

SLOW AND STEADY SOCIAL CHANGE

Opinion on social issues often change gradually over an extended period of time.

Just 11% of Americans said gay and lesbian people should have the right to marry in 1988, according to the General Social Survey. That grew to 31% by 16 years later, the next time the question was asked. But after that, support for gay marriage didn't rise by more than 10 percentage points from one survey to the next. Support instead grew steadily over two decades to become the majority opinion, most recently at 68% in 2018.

The trend is similar in support for marijuana legalization. In 1973, the General Social Survey found that just 19% of Americans said marijuana should be made legal. Support ticked up and down for most of the following three decades, never exceeding 30%. It reached 31% in 2000 and steadily rose to 44% in 2010 and 61% in 2018. Like for same-sex marriage, the share saying marijuana should be legal never rose more than 10 percentage points from one poll to the next.

REACTIVE CHANGE

Sometimes, public opinion responds to specific events that bring attention to a social issue, but then returns back to a "normal" in quiet moments. Polling by Gallup is evidence of how American views on gun laws are responsive to mass shootings, with somewhat more saying they want to see laws on the sale of firearms made more strict in the aftermath of such an attack.

Support for stricter gun laws ticked up from 60% in February 1999 to 66% in late April that year, just after the shooting at Columbine High School in Colorado, which killed 21 people. By the early 2000s, the percentage of Americans preferring stricter gun laws slipped back down - as low as 51% in October 2002.

Gallup polling shows the trend has oscillated regularly since. It fell as low as 43% in 2011 but rose again to 58% the next time the question was asked in December 2012, after the shooting at an elementary school in Newtown, Connecticut, that killed 28 people. A year later, support fell back to 49%.

A similar bump again happened after the high school shooting in Parkland, Florida, in February 2018.

POLITICAL CHANGE

Meanwhile, significant shifts in public opinion inevitably follow presidential and midterm elections. In April 2016, before President Donald Trump was elected, just 34% of Republicans considered the nation's economy to be in good shape, according to an AP-NORC poll. By March 2017, that figure rose to 63% and was 89% in January 2020 before taking a hit amid the economic fallout of the COVID-19 pandemic.

Wide shift in opinion on police, race rare in US polling

Meanwhile, according to Gallup polling, just 24% of Democrats in 2018 said they were satisfied with the country's global standing, down 32 percentage points from 2017. What changed? Trump's inauguration in 2017 following eight years of President Barack Obama's time in office.

PROFOUND MOMENTS

But events or crises that touch most Americans can often be agents of change.

Approval of President George W. Bush went from 51% in the days just before the Sept. 11 attacks to 86% in the days just after, according to Gallup polling.

And more recently, the pandemic has deeply affected Americans' views of their own lives. A May poll from NORC at the University of Chicago found the lowest percentage of Americans saying they are very happy in nearly five decades. Just 14% say they very happy today, down from 31% in 2018.

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 897 wordsByline: PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The 50 or so kids and a handful of parents paid little mind to the fireworks booming across north Minneapolis during football practice one evening last week at Jordan Park.

But as a car slowly turned the corner, blasts of gunfire reverberated across the field. Bullets pinged off the posts above children ages 5 to 14 who took cover while their coaches shielded them with their bodies. A woman prayed and cried.

"I could hear the bullets whizzing over my head," a shaken but steeled Carrie Heinrich said in a Facebook video that went live barely two hours later, which has been viewed more than 1.5 million times since the incident.

"The worst feeling as a parent," Heinrich said, "was seeing my kid out in the middle of an open field with bullets flying and not being able to get to him."

In an especially violent day amid skyrocketing gun violence since George Floyd's May 25 death at the hands of Minneapolis police, nine people were shot across the city on June 22. Another two were stabbed, and one of them didn't survive.

The park shooting prompted Police Chief Medaria Arradondo to pledge Wednesday that "our children must be protected, and those who would dare to bring harm their way must be held accountable."

The shooting could have been much worse. Gunfire sprayed from one moving vehicle to another over the heads of youngsters, coaches and parents during practice that day. The adults swooped up the kids, hustled them into vehicles and spared the innocent from being wounded or worse.

From there, multiple vehicles took everyone to coach Melvin Thompson's home a few minutes' drive away.

"Once we got back to my house," Thompson said Tuesday, "we lined them all up and made them take their shirts off" to see whether anyone was shot.

AT PRACTICE, A HAIL OF BULLETS

Thompson returned to Jordan Park, collected bullets from the grass and looked ahead to his Minnesota Jays practice moving 3½ miles south Wednesday night to Bryn Mawr Meadows Park, "a nice, secluded area," he said.

Arradondo watched Heinrich's 9-minute video Wednesday afternoon and acknowledged the bravery and compassion of the coaches and parents who risked their own lives to shield and protect the children. "Everyone who was out there that day may have been traumatized by what occurred, and my thoughts are with them," he said.

Strained emotions

More than a week after surviving the terror, Heinrich said that Cal, the 12-year-old son she always knew as a "goofy, outgoing, happy old soul [has since] been on edge, short-tempered and has cried. ... He said, 'I just want to give up.' "

The shootings elsewhere in the city that day, along with the Jordan Park rolling gun battle on either side of the football players, came in the midst of a troubling surge in shootings in Minneapolis since Memorial Day. Less than two days before, 11 people were injured in a hail of gunfire in Uptown, while another man was shot and killed downtown at roughly the same time.

The violence has showed no signs of letting up since bullets flew over Jordan Park, at N. 30th and James avenues. From June 23 to 29, 18 people were hit by gunfire, with nine of them being hit over this past weekend, police said.

Halfway through 2020, 207 people have been shot in Minneapolis, a significantly higher tally than the five-year average for the same time span, according to police data. The six-month homicide total stands at 27.

Police spokesman John Elder said that when officers responded to Jordan Park, the shooters were gone. No arrests have been made in any of the shootings or stabbings that day.

On Wednesday, protecting the kids at practice at Bryn Mawr focused more on fending off mosquitoes, staying hydrated and getting loose.

"Start getting strapped up," Thompson said in his best head coach's voice to his Minnesota Jays. One player called home: "Coach says I need a mouth guard."

Thompson wove among players in line military style for calisthenics, correcting their form while mixing in fist bumps of encouragement.

A mom made the rounds with bug repellent, spraying down many of the boys on the steamy and sunny field.

'We need the cops'

In her post-shooting video, Heinrich broke the promise she made to herself to not "get political" and spoke up for keeping a strong law enforcement presence in the city, amid renewed scrutiny of the Police Department and efforts to dismantle it following the death of an unarmed and handcuffed Floyd while being pinned by officers to the pavement.

AT PRACTICE, A HAIL OF BULLETS

"We need the cops," said Heinrich, an emergency room nurse and former paramedic. "If you want to troll on [social media] and say dismantle the police, get off my page. ... I have no respect for anyone who has never gone through this and then wants to go spit in a cop's face. That's who we needed tonight."

Backing Heinrich's point on reforming the role of police in the city, Arradondo said, "In our city, the police play an important role in responding to violent crime. There is still a need for us to protect and serve our communities, and we will continue to do that in a manner that preserves the public's trust."

Police debate aside, Heinrich didn't lose sight of who ultimately was responsible.

"Never again should these kids have to duck and dodge bullets while playing football," Heinrich said in the video's closing moments, her language punctuating rising anger. "What the hell is wrong with you people? Zero regard for life."

ARTICLE MXLVI. BIG Q4 FOR GENERAL MILLS - CORRECTION APPENDED

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 2, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

 Correction Appended

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 776 wordsByline: EVAN RAMSTAD; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: At-home eating drove sales and profits for the global food company.Body

Few big businesses experience a moment when demand spikes for all its products all at once. But General Mills did this spring, and its latest results Wednesday revealed both the size of the spike and the challenge of making it last.

A burst of in-home eating caused by the need to fend off coronavirus produced a 21% jump in sales from March through May for the Golden Valley-based food giant, a result not seen for decades at one of Minnesota's oldest companies. Profit also surged as General Mills was able to keep production going, unlike some food processors, and increase it at most plants.

In the process, General Mills kept workers safe. The firm has tracked 120 or so COVID-19 cases among its 70,000 employees worldwide since the outbreak began early this year.

Executives forecast more sales gains for the next nine months, until it runs into the comparisons of this most recent fiscal quarter. But they decided not to issue precise guidance on sales and profits, saying the spread and control of the virus is too uneven.

"Away-from-home and at-home consumption is going to be determined by how the pandemic goes, and that's really uncertain at this point," Jeff Harmening, the company's chief executive, said in an interview.

General Mills has seen market share growth across nearly all its product lines and everywhere it sells goods globally, he said. "We're confident in our ability to compete."

Before the pandemic, about 85% of its sales were to people buying food for home consumption, putting it in a strong position when people began to work and learn from home.

General Mills initially sold out of many products, particularly flour, baking mixes and soups. In late March and April, it ramped up production and adjusted its output to the most popular goods.

"I feel great about how the company met the moment," Harmening said.

Companies of General Mills' size usually experience sales ups and downs that are measured in single-digit percentages. Larger growth tends to happen only with an acquisition. General Mills doubled its sales by purchasing Pillsbury in 2001 and added 10% to sales with the purchase of Blue Buffalo pet food two years ago.

The year-over-year sales jumps General Mills just experienced, by contrast, came straight from consumer demand. For instance, sales of all products through U.S. stores grew 37%. Sales of flour and baking mixes rose 75%. Cereal sales were up 26%, and snacks and yogurt both 10%.

"When demand is up, as it was 37% in our retail business, people were counting on us to meet that," Harmening said. He attributed the company's ability to perform to its employees and suppliers and efforts to keep everyone safe.

General Mills earned $626 million, or $1.02 a share, on sales of $5.02 billion in the three months ended May 31, the last quarter of its 2020 fiscal year. Adjusted for the one-time accounting effects, the profit amounted to $1.10 a share, beating the consensus forecast by analysts of $1.06 a share.

General Mills shares fell 2% Wednesday but are up 16% for the year.

Harmening told investors in a conference call that operational changes made in the quarter "set us up to deliver continued strong results in the months and years to come."

But in the interview, Harmening said he believed that the work to sustain the gains began two or three years ago when General Mills started to examine and refresh dozens of products.

"We have made our Pillsbury biscuits taste better, reformulated a lot of our soups, added more fruit to yogurt, started talking about heart health on Cheerios," he said. "That's what gives me confidence. If we were just thinking now how to maintain these gains, we'd probably be behind."

On a separate note, Harmening said the police killing of George Floyd and the aftermath, as it did at other companies, produced a lot of discussions on multiple levels at General Mills.

One of its internal events, a Zoom-based conversation about race, drew more than 3,500 participants.

The company in recent weeks allowed all its Twin Cities employees paid time off to volunteer in ways they identified.

He said General Mills has produced an inclusive culture and that the diversity of its board and executive ranks reflect it. But he added that the company must always be vigilant about providing opportunity to everyone internally and supportive of community change externally.

"We've donated tens of millions of dollars to help support our community in things like education," Harmening said, referring to its outreach in the Twin Cities.

"But if you look at education gaps or the structural issues with the police, it's clear there's a lot more work to do," he added.

Correction

This story misstated the size of the General Mills' workforce. It employs approximately 35,000 people.

The Minneapolis City Council's proposal to eliminate the Police Department has moved to an obscure commission that has shown no urgency in the past to move forward on police reforms.

With 15 volunteer members appointed by a Hennepin County district judge, the Minneapolis Charter Commission plays a crucial role in determining whether the city can change its constitution, which requires minimum staffing for police based on the city's population.

In the coming weeks, many will be watching to see whether the commission uses its procedures to prevent the City Council's proposal from fast-tracking its way onto the November ballot. It did that two years ago, when the council tried to increase its oversight of the department.

A public meeting Wednesday provided the first hints as to what the commissioners might do, with a tight deadline looming.

"I'm not as concerned about meeting the council's timeline as I am about getting this right," said Commissioner Matt Perry. He added: "If that pushes the timeline out, so be it."

A few commissioners echoed his thoughts, while others seemed optimistic about the possibility of quickly scheduling hearings.

Five Minneapolis City Council members - Jeremiah Ellison, Alondra Cano, Cam Gordon, Steve Fletcher and President Lisa Bender - want voters to decide whether to replace the Police Department with a Department of Community Safety and Violence Prevention. Within that department, the city could create a division that includes "licensed peace officers," but it would not be required to do so.

Mayor Jacob Frey blasted the proposal when it was presented, saying that it left basic questions unanswered and that voters deserved more clarity.

Board takes up bid to end MPD

The proposal is drawing intense public interest as residents and business owners wait to see how Minneapolis will redefine public safety following George Floyd's death. Charter Commissioner Jana Metge said she has been inundated with messages and has already spent 11 hours reading through them.

Before the change can make it on the ballot, the Charter Commission can take up to 150 days to review it. If their deliberations stretch beyond Aug. 21, the measure will not make it onto the November ballot.

During a roughly 45-minute meeting Wednesday, the commission outlined the first steps for how it will proceed. The commission will invite Frey and the council members who wrote the proposal to their July 8 virtual meeting.

The commission will then hold public hearings on July 15 and a date to be determined.

Then, on Aug. 5, it will face its toughest decision. The commission could approve or reject the proposal or offer one of its own. The City Council would not be bound by its recommendation, but would have to hold its own vote to decide whether to send the item to the ballot. Frey would then approve or veto that effort.

Two years ago, the City Council asked the Charter Commission to fast-track a different proposal that would have increased the amount of influence the council has over the Police Department.

The commission declined, saying more research was needed. The proposal didn't make it on the ballot that year. Discussion languished.

The current reforms also revive the City Council's bid to take more control of police. The council members want to eliminate the mayor's "complete power" over the Police Department and add language that says the council "may maintain a division of law enforcement services" within the new department.

Frey has said he fears the proposal would weaken accountability and oversight of police, forcing any version of a department to respond to direction from 14 people instead of one.

"I'm about accountability here," Frey said Friday, when the measure was presented. "If this is about me, well, there's an election next year."

Gordon, one of the authors of the amendment, pushed back on that idea, saying that any officers who are employed would report to one person: the department head. The head of the Department of Community Safety and Violence Prevention would be nominated by the mayor and approved by the council.

The Charter Commission is accepting public comment on the new proposal. People can submit comments at minneapolisismn.gov, by calling 311 and by e-mailing councilcomment@minneapolisismn.gov

Three days after George Floyd's death, Bobby Awaijane helped board up the E. Lake Street gas station and convenience store his family owned for 17 years.

Hours later, the family monitored security footage on a computer as more than 50 people flooded the store, ransacking shelves and destroying property. When they called 911, an operator said it would be days before someone could respond.

The next morning as they cleaned up, the family decided to stay and protect the property themselves. For days, Awaijane and others kept watch 24/7, taking turns napping in a nearby shed.

"If the store burns down, there's nothing left," he told state lawmakers Wednesday. "This is our livelihood."

Awaijane shared his story at the Minnesota Senate's first oversight hearing into the unrest that followed Floyd's May 25 killing by a Minneapolis police officer. For several hours, business owners and employees detailed destruction sustained amid the chaos.

One Lake Street property manager said days of vandalism, including dozens of fires, left owners with tens of millions of dollars in damages across several buildings. Jim Stage, owner of Lloyd's Pharmacy in St. Paul, broke down into tears as he recalled seeing his store, a staple in the neighborhood since he was a boy, leveled after it was looted and burned to the ground.

The testimony marked the first in what Senate Republicans say will be a series of oversight hearings focused on the aftermath of Floyd's death.

"I don't know [if] there is fault to be laid out on any one person, or maybe it's the system that didn't react properly," said Sen. Scott Newman, R-Hutchinson, who led the hearing. "This is the first step."

Business owners testify about damage from riots and looting

Newman said the goal is to document and investigate "very, very serious criminal activity" that damaged or destroyed more than 1,000 public and private structures across the Twin Cities, as well as the state and local response to the crisis.

As the Senate launches its inquiry, the partisan divide over the political and policy response to Floyd's death is growing at the State Capitol. Senate Democrats sharply criticized Republicans for holding hearings on property damages, instead of focusing on a package of police accountability measures that stalled in a late June special session.

Several also questioned why lawmakers of color who represent the impacted communities were not invited to participate.

"If we are going to take this opportunity to spend many hours on end examining what happened in the aftermath of a killing of a Black man, a slow agonizing and dehumanizing death, why can't we spend the time trying to root out or explain how that happened?" said Sen. Scott Dibble, DFL-Minneapolis.

A wide array of lawmakers have called attention to the economic toll of the civil unrest but remain divided on providing aid to the damaged neighborhoods. On Tuesday, members of the DFL-led House heard from about a dozen community members in a hearing at Plaza Verde on Lake Street.

"The city of Minneapolis has failed to protect our businesses, and I hope our elected officials will not do the same," Amina Osman, who owns a business called Post Plus, told legislators Tuesday. "I understand that government functions slowly, but that is not reassuring to small businesses like ours. We need help and assistance, and we need it now."

Dozens of young children practicing football last week at a Minneapolis park were spared when bullets began to fly over their heads from a rolling gun battle one shaken mother described in a Facebook post that has been widely viewed.

Carrie Heinrich said 50 or so children and a handful of parents heard fireworks one evening last week while the players were practicing at Jordan Park. But soon, gunfire rang out as a car slowly turned the corner. Coaches ordered the players, ages 5 to 14, to get down as bullets flew overhead and pinged off posts at the park, Heinrich said in her post, which has been viewed more than 1.5 million times.

"The worst feeling as a parent," Heinrich said, "was seeing my kid out in the middle of an open field with bullets flying and not being able to get to him."

Gunfire sprayed from one moving vehicle to another over the heads of those on the playing field as coaches and parents swooped up the children, hustled them into vehicles and took them a coach's house nearby.

June 22 was an especially violent day in Minneapolis when nine people were shot and two were stabbed. It comes amid skyrocketing gun violence since George Floyd's May 25 death at the hands of Minneapolis police.

As the Minneapolis City Council works to remove the charter mandate for the Police Department, other city leaders are taking important steps to reform policing now.

Police Chief Medaria Arradondo signaled change was coming last month when he stepped away from negotiations with the Police Officers Federation, saying the union has traditionally stood "in the way of progress."

In an agreement with the Minnesota Human Rights Department, the chief, mayor and council banned their officers from using chokeholds and neck restraints. That court-approved deal came 11 days after George Floyd was pinned down on the pavement by Minneapolis cops in a deadly encounter recorded on video and seen around the world.

And this week, Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey and Arradondo announced tighter rules on how body camera videos are reviewed - a move they say will provide more transparency and accountability. The new rules went into effect Tuesday.

Those are the most recent actions city leaders have taken in response to legitimate calls for sweeping changes to law enforcement practices. They're right to pursue needed reforms - and they are promising to do more.

Concurrently, a coalition of business groups is calling for a solid set of "guiding principles" for a new and improved approach to Minneapolis public safety. In a recent letter, the Downtown Improvement District, Minneapolis Regional Chamber, Downtown Council, and Minneapolis Building Owners and Managers Association acknowledged that MPD reinvention is necessary and urged immediate and lasting change in MPD culture - including ridding the department of bad cops.

The group rightly favors reforming - not dismantling - the department. Its principles make clear that trained, sworn personnel must be available in appropriate numbers to provide first responder services and "address threats to citizens, businesses and properties." And while the status quo is not acceptable, they say, neither is chaotic change or transition that excludes law enforcement.

Meaningful change in Mpls. policing

The business leaders want clear and increased authority for the mayor and chief. To that end, they recommend the council maintain the current city charter provision that calls for the mayor to oversee the MPD, not the mayor plus a City Council of 13 individuals. As the Editorial Board has argued before, managing the department by committee would be a disaster.

Recognizing that law enforcement is essential but cannot alone provide for community safety, the business leaders expressed support for strategies such as expanded use of co-responders, downtown ambassadors and homeless, housing and mental health services. The group wisely seeks to have every sector of the city involved in creating the new public safety vision for Minneapolis.

Along with community input, the changes being made by Arradondo and Frey - along with the recommendations from businesses invested in the city's future - can help Minneapolis reinvent policing.

PARK BOARD VOTES DOWN HOMELESS CAMP LIMITS

A divided Minneapolis Park and Recreation Board on Wednesday rejected a plan that could have restricted homeless encampments in parks across the city, including a sprawling community at Powderhorn Park that leaders say has become the largest in Minnesota history.

The Park Board has accommodated hundreds of homeless residents who migrated across Minneapolis in the midst of the uprising following the police killing of George Floyd. Last month, commissioners voted to allow homeless residents to stay overnight at city parks.

Yet it has struggled to contain the Powderhorn site, where two separate encampments at the northern end of the park have now grown to as many as 600 people in 400 tents, according to the board. It's now larger than the Wall of Forgotten Natives, a tent encampment disbanded in 2018, and park leaders say conditions are becoming increasingly dangerous.

On Wednesday, the Park Board was scheduled to vote on a resolution that would limit the size of the encampments to 10 tents at 10 park locations, and which would have ended the current order allowing encampments of all sizes Sept. 1.

Commissioner Londel French, who has become a regular presence volunteering at Powderhorn Park, moved to pull the resolution from the meeting agenda. Five commissioners voted in favor; four voted against.

"I think a real, true resolution would be thought out and would take considerations of the folks who actually don't have a place to go," French said. "Maybe they can have some better ideas than we do."

Commissioner Brad Bourn also voted to remove the resolution, saying it went against the Park Board's earlier commitment to make parks a refuge for the homeless. "I'm just incredibly confused by it because it seems to take a 180-degree position from what the board passed at its last meeting," he told commissioners.

PARK BOARD VOTES DOWN HOMELESS CAMP LIMITS

Commissioners French, Bourn, AK Hassan, Chris Meyer and Kale Severson voted to remove the resolution from the agenda. Commissioners Meg Forney, Steffanie Musich, LaTrisha Vetaw and Park Board President Jono Cowgill voted against the motion.

Several people who attended the meeting, some of whom are living at Powderhorn, applauded and cheered the vote, with some later saying the resolution was ill-formed and proposed without another plan in place.

Earlier this week, Cowgill said he had brought forth the resolution to set some deadlines he hoped would push other government agencies, particularly the state, to move quickly to offer resources for homeless residents, including mental health support and other camping areas.

"I have yet to see the tangible commitments that can help us move to a next step for a lot of people on the ground," Cowgill said Tuesday. "While it seems like winter is a far ways off, it really isn't. Staring down the idea of having 200, 300 tents in Powderhorn in August is really concerning to me for the folks that are there."

Campers, volunteers and neighbors at Powderhorn Park have made the same request in recent days, calling on the state to provide emergency funding for the homeless population and swiftly connect campers with permanent housing. Hennepin County, the Park Board and the city of Minneapolis are asking the state to fund nonprofits to do more outreach, set up emergency shelters at the State Fairgrounds and buy more hotel rooms across the state.

Small encampments have shown up in about 35 park locations, including one in front of Park Board Superintendent Al Bangoura's home at Lyndale Farmstead Park.

The board is spending nearly $16,000 a week renting materials such as portable restrooms and providing "additional staff services" at Powderhorn, according to its website.

The Powderhorn encampments, Cowgill said, have become untenable and brought in "dangerous, problematic and predatory behaviors." Former residents said they have witnessed fights breaking out each day. Last week, a teen was sexually assaulted at a campsite.

On Wednesday night a teenager was shot several times near a tent encampment at Peavey Park in south Minneapolis, according to several reports. He was in critical condition but expected to survive.

Scott Alan Harper, 49, was staying at Powderhorn and felt the camp becoming increasingly volatile. When he learned a teen had been sexually assaulted, he packed his belongings and left with a group of other residents, forming the encampment outside Bangoura's home.

He has been in Minnesota for less than a month, traveling across the country using military and retirement benefits. At the encampment, he said Minneapolis was "such a beautiful place," and that he was going to help pick weeds at a neighboring house.

Current Powderhorn residents painted a calmer picture Wednesday.

Nadine Little, who was at the former Sheraton hotel shelter before arriving at the park, said the west side of the park is quieter than the larger east camp.

PARK BOARD VOTES DOWN HOMELESS CAMP LIMITS

She did not support the Park Board's plan to shrink the encampments and said the people in the camp need more volunteers, security and housing options.

"I hope that we are not all here in the park, and be housed, and not have to worry about being out here in the streets," Little said.

THE PANDEMIC

"Holy [bleep]" is right! That was Michael Flor's reaction to his 181-page, $1.1 million bill for COVID-19 treatment ("Protect patients on million-dollar bills," editorial, July 1). I'll bet he was plenty relieved that he had good insurance.

Multiply that $1.1 million bill by the tens or hundreds of thousands of COVID-19 patients who have already been treated, and those who have yet to be treated, and that's the cost our insurance companies are also absorbing now and will absorb in the future. Covering costs are what insurance companies do, but after natural disasters, and now a pandemic, to stay in business, they must adjust their rates.

My partner and I are in our 80s. We're on Medicare, like Flor, and are lucky to be able to afford additional supplemental insurance. We're expecting our insurance rates to rise because of this pandemic, but after reading about Flor's bill, I can't even imagine what those increased rates are going to be. But I can imagine our reaction and the reaction of the thousands of others of our generation: "Holy [bleep]."

Address inequality with education

When I worked for the city of Minneapolis, I was a strong supporter of the Minnesota Homeownership Center, and I agree with most of center President Julie Gugin's comments about structural racism in the current lending industry ("When lamenting homeownership rates, lament structural racism," Readers Write, June 30). There is no doubt about the historical failures of our private lenders when it comes to lending to communities of color, but I believe there is a bigger problem affecting their ability to obtain a loan.

Our current educational system does a good job of educating young people about math, science and other typical educational subjects. However, it does little to help them to understand the financial impact of poor money management. Instead, this education is left to our banks, credit card companies and legal system. Our market economy promotes the idea of immediate gratification and the end result is large amounts of debt and little or no savings.

The city of Minneapolis has provided financial support to counseling agencies that reach out to communities of color, and based upon reports on the outcomes, the counseling agencies were successful in helping most counsees to improve their credit rating, get their debts paid off and improve their household income and savings. These programs give families the tools to improve their own lives and economic prospects through education and counseling, but sadly this is done on a very small scale compared to the actual need.

How much better would it be if we brought this knowledge to our middle and high schools to help young people to understand the importance of properly managing their finances before entering their adult life? Yes, we need to address systemic problems in the lending industry, but the bigger emphasis should be placed on empowering people with the financial information they need to better help them to afford a home, manage their household finances and prepare them for retirement.

Mark Anderson, Ramsey

Recently the explosion of justifiable outrage at the treatment of George Floyd has focused a light on the fact that while people at the top live comfortable financial lives, the people in the lower strata struggle. For Black people, this has brought up discussion of reparations.

The fact is that a large proportion of the population, no matter what they do, end up with little or no retirement savings. Further, nothing in the current tax and retirement system seems to even begin to solve the problem. Social Security was never designed to provide people with an adequate retirement. But there was a proposal to begin to attack this problem.

In the 1990s, Sens. Bob Kerrey of Nebraska and Joe Lieberman of Connecticut proposed a program called "KidSave." This program would have given $1,000 to every newborn child. Under their proposal, for the first five years of a child's life, $500 would be added to that account. There would be other subsidies. The accounts would be administered the same way as the federal employees' plans are managed. Under Kerrey and Lieberman's 1990s proposal, the funds could not be withdrawn until age 65. The person could add to his or her account, but they could not withdraw from the account. With this proposal, at retirement everyone would have a much better chance at a comfortable life.

Kerrey and Lieberman's proposal was ignored then, it is said, because it would have cost billions of dollars each year.

We just borrowed, what, several trillion?

Had Kerrey and Lieberman's proposal, or something like it, been turned into law in the 1990s, a significant portion of the American people would now be better off. It wasn't picked up then, but if you want our children to have a brighter future, then this proposal, or something like it, should be part of our future.

MONUMENTS

More to the story on Crazy Horse

It's interesting that the letter writer who wrote about the Crazy Horse Memorial said that the monument was unfinished and suggested it was due to lack of federal funds and caring about a tribute to an American Indian.

The sculptor, Korczak Ziolkowski, turned down millions of dollars offered by the federal government, as he wanted complete and total artistic and financial control over the monument. It is now funded by admissions and private donations and money from their various shops and restaurants on the property. It is a very lucrative business and takes in many millions of dollars a year and has been worked on solely by the family. They do not ask for or accept federal money.

Although it was commissioned by Lakota chief Standing Bear and many favor it, the monument is opposed and resented by other tribal members as it is on sacred land and a scant amount of the revenue goes to the tribe, although one is led to believe that the monument has humanitarian purposes.

ABILITIES

Watch your descriptors - and bias

An Associated Press story that ran in the June 24 issue of the Star Tribune ("Trump-backed GOP candidates in Kentucky and North Carolina lose") included the following sentences: "In western North Carolina, GOP voters picked 24-year-old investor Madison Cawthorn over Trump-backed real estate agent Lynda Bennett. ... Cawthorn, who uses a wheelchair following an accident, will meet the constitutionally mandated minimum age of 25 when the next Congress convenes." (The printed paper version was slightly different.)

The fact that Cawthorn uses a wheelchair has no relevance to his candidacy in any way, so why mention it? Bennet uses eyeglasses, yet her dependence on adaptive technology is not mentioned. Nor should it be, any more than wheelchair use should be.

Candidates with disabilities should be judged by their experience, qualifications and policy proposals, just like any other candidate. To gratuitously report on (presumed) disability is to engage in social "othering." In fact, people with disabilities are not "them." People with disabilities are us. Let the reporting that the Star Tribune publishes reflect this liberating fact.

There's a certain irony, isn't there, in the fact that Minneapolis taxpayers have spent an extra $63,000, at least, in the last month to provide private security for three City Council members who had declared their intention to dismantle the Police Department and replace it with some other structure.

We don't want to be too cynical about it, though. The other way to describe the situation is that three elected officials have faced threats to their personal safety for introducing into the public discourse an idea that many of their constituents support following another in a long series of wake-up calls over police behavior, in this case the death of George Floyd.

Though (as we've stated previously) the repeal-and-replace initiative is not well thought out, and though its clarity is little improved even after a unanimous City Council vote last week to advance it, this process - proposition, debate, decision - is at the heart of the democracy whose origin Americans will be celebrating in just a few days. Ideas are meant to be ambitious and debate is meant to be vigorous, but change is not meant to be effortless. Too many people on too many points of the ideological spectrum want to kick one or more of these pillars down.

The private security measures for the three council members are temporary, according to a city spokeswoman, who also said the two companies providing the services have licensed, armed officers. As long as the costs don't exceed $175,000, the council doesn't need to publicly sign off, she said.

How shameful for our society that it's come to this, but the extra security must be provided. We do hope that council members fully consider the implications, though. Residents and businesses also face threats that can be mitigated by the presence of licensed, armed officers.

City Council President Lisa Bender told CNN last month that the fear of not having the police to call upon "comes from a place of privilege." We can see what she was trying to get at - that the realized benefits of the current policing structure depend upon who you are and where you live - but that word "privilege" is loaded.

A sense of safety is a basic human need, and fear in its absence is universal. The debate in Minneapolis and elsewhere should not be about taking security from some but providing it persuasively to all.

Highlight: Negotiations between NHLPA, league seem to be wrapping up unresolved issues.

NHL games probably won't be taking place in the Twin Cities anytime soon.

Toronto and Edmonton will reportedly be named hub cities if the season resumes later this summer, a return that's still a work in progress, although talks seem to be escalating toward a resolution.

The players union and the league have been working on protocols for training camp, a 24-team tournament to award the Stanley Cup that includes the Wild, and an extension for the collective bargaining agreement. Negotiations appear to have resolved many issues, according to TSN, and a vote among players could happen this weekend.

A flat salary cap, NHL participation in the Olympics and giving players the option to opt out of the current season - like some MLB and NBA players have done this week - are among the details on the table, according to Sportsnet.

It's also possible players signed to a contract since the NHL was paused March 12 by the coronavirus pandemic won't be eligible to compete the rest of the season, a potential ruling that would prohibit prized prospect Kirill Kaprizov from joining the Wild even if he signed.

That's been the NHL's stance, to proceed without what it described as "ringers." The league does have to consult the NHL Players' Association, but TSN's Bob McKenzie reported he's under the impression these players won't be allowed to play.

Nothing, however, is guaranteed until both sides approve a restart.

The NHL is scheduled to open training camps on July 10, but it's possible that gets delayed. No date has been announced for the action to begin, but the season could continue by the end of the month if camps start by mid-July.

Toronto, Edmonton likely to be two hub cities

Under the format the NHL and NHL Players' Association agreed upon in May, the top four teams from each conference will play in a round robin to determine first-round seeding and the remaining eight teams will square off against each other in a best-of-five series to advance to the Stanley Cup playoffs.

Hubs both have team playing

Toronto will reportedly house the Eastern Conference teams and Edmonton the Western. Although each city has a team competing, the league has said players from the host city will adhere to the same accommodations as everyone else.

Players and staff are expected to be sequestered in hotels and practice and play in a "bubble" atmosphere, with no fans at games because of the pandemic.

Teams will be limited to 50 personnel in each hub city, and only a small number of support staff will be allowed to enter the event areas. By the time games potentially return, players will be tested every evening and results will be available the next morning before they leave their hotel room.

Commissioner Gary Bettman previously said the selection of sites will be dependent on COVID-19 conditions, testing ability and government regulations, all of which explain Canada's appeal.

Canada relaxed rules for NHL

The Canadian government recently announced the NHL would be exempt from the current 14-day quarantine required of those crossing the border into Canada. Instead, players would be kept away from the general public and screened regularly. Cases in the country also have been mostly on the decline.

Meanwhile in the United States, some states are being ravaged by outbreaks. Las Vegas was long hyped to be a frontrunner to host the NHL, but cases in Nevada are on the rise and one model pegs the state's transmission rate as the highest in the country.

Vancouver was also in the running, but its bid apparently fizzled when health officials and the league couldn't agree on how to handle a positive test.

Overall, 10 locations were under consideration when the league revealed its return-to-play plan on May 26.

Chicago, Columbus, Dallas, Los Angeles and Pittsburgh were the others in contention, along with Minneapolis/St. Paul.

Twin Cities bounced

Although there's a lack of high-end hotel rooms near Xcel Energy Center, Minnesota figured to be in the mix because of the number of hockey rinks in the Twin Cities. The area was also vetted by the league not too long ago to host the Winter Classic on New Year's Day in 2021 at Target Field. It's unclear what impact the May 25 killing of George Floyd and civil unrest that followed had on Minnesota's chances.

The Wild is set to face the Canucks in a best-of-five qualifying matchup should the season continue as planned.

Team facilities, including Tria Rink in St. Paul, have been open for voluntary, small-group workouts capped at 12 players per session. The NHL said Monday 15 players out of more than 250 who reported to train at team rinks have tested positive; another 11 players who aren't skating at team sites also have tested positive since June 8.

Toronto, Edmonton likely to be two hub cities

Periscope ad agency's parent company changed a rule forbidding employees from using "Black Lives Matter" in social media posts after 179 Minneapolis workers walked off the job on Thursday.

Employees said they wanted to use the term to show solidarity with Black and racial-justice protesters in the wake of the George Floyd killing, but were repeatedly told no by Wisconsin-based parent company, Quad.

After the walkout, Quad agreed to give Periscope editorial independence over its social media posts and promised to release employment data by race and sex. Leaders also said they would undergo diversity training and planned to increase the number of people of color hired throughout the company.

Quad CEO Joel Quadracci

apologized to Periscope employees and clients in a statement. He said the company was "slow to communicate" its commitment to ending systemic racism.

"Our integrated marketing agency Periscope in Minneapolis has witnessed firsthand the nation's reawakening to persistent, systemic racism," he said. "In recent days, our Periscope colleagues have made it clear that we, as a company, failed to act with the urgency, transparency and sensitivity required on this important social issue, and we agree. Quad can and will do better."

Nathan Young, who moved from Seattle in March to join Periscope as group strategy director, said he is still shocked that Quadracci directly ordered him to delete the phrase "Black Lives Matter" from a Periscope statement addressing systemic racism.

For a month, he was told Quad first needed to review its policies.

"The fact that as a billionaire white CEO of a company, you literally told your Black employee - one who lives four blocks from where George Floyd was murdered - to delete the phrase 'Black Lives Matter' from a statement of support, is a shocking dereliction of duty as a leader," Young said. "The wound that created never fully healed."

'Black Lives Matter' policy prompts ad-agency walkout

Subsequent efforts to retweet supportive messages on Facebook or Twitter prompted Quad's legal staff to intervene.

On Wednesday, Young, Periscope's three other Black employees and one LGBT worker walked off the job in protest. On Thursday, the rest of the office walked out, too. Periscope has 16 people of color on its 179-member staff.

Young is one of two advertising leaders who rallied 600 Black advertising professionals to pen a letter outlining 12 actions agencies should take to help eradicate systemic racism in their organizations.

Chief Creative Officer Peter Nicholson said Quad's initial decisions were "particularly hurtful to our people of color and to all 179 of us because of the situation we were all experiencing" in the wake of Floyd's killing.

Nicholson said he was proud of the agency for banding together.

Periscope closed Thursday for "reflection and in solidarity with our colleagues," the agency said in a statement. "We believe the day is necessary for us to reaffirm our values and our commitment to real change - not only for ourselves but for our wider community."

POLICE REFORM

A viable, ethical and just police department for all is an equity issue. I do not support the proposed charter amendment to eliminate the Minneapolis Police Department, which should be deeply reformed instead. I support the kind of intelligent reform that Mayor Jacob Frey and Chief Medaria Arradondo have already embarked upon but not an expensive, disruptive, divisive and unclear process as the City Council has proposed ("Meaningful change in Mpls. policing," editorial, July 2). Our city has been through the wringer, the most difficult year in recent memory. This current idea will only further unsettle and divide us as a city at a time when unity is needed more than ever.

I have traveled extensively in countries where police departments are corrupt, dysfunctional and essentially nonexistent. In one three-week period in Mexico and Honduras, I was robbed twice, once at gunpoint. This lack of safety and security in places like Honduras, El Salvador, Guatemala and Mexico is one of the main factors driving people (quite reasonably) to seek refuge in the United States. I have heard countless stories about the lack of safety and security in these places from my students, friends and neighbors. In these places, the richest and/or most powerful people have access to private security guards (like our own City Council members Andrea Jenkins, Alondra Cano and Phillippe Cunningham), the somewhat less privileged buy their own guns and install electronic security systems, and the poorest are left at the mercy of organized (and not-so-organized) criminals. This is not the future I envision and hope for in the city that I have lived in for 30 years. Minneapolis can do so much better than this.

John Strand, Minneapolis

Regarding the City Council's proposals to reform or disband our dysfunctional MPD - or to revise the city charter to achieve those ends - I think the city's leadership instead should investigate what has worked in other cities and other countries and look at how those successes could be applied here.

I have a relative in Norway who asked me why the police in America have so little training. I learned that in Norway, getting into the police academy is very competitive, and as a result, only good prospects are admitted in the first place. Training in the academy lasts three years - one year in the classroom, one year on the streets with mentors, and another year in the classroom. Police are required to have 40 to 80 hours of continuing education each year. Here, future police are required to have two years of post-high school education and then several months of training, including on the streets with a mentor. (Ironically, Derek Chauvin, who is now charged with the murder of George Floyd, was acting as a mentor, despite a reported history of many prior complaints.) A better-functioning police academy could go a long way toward producing a better, kinder and more effective Police Department.

We don't need to reinvent the wheel. Rather, we should be interested in what has worked elsewhere and be willing to learn from others. Disbanding or defunding the MPD or revising the city charter are all a bridge too far.

CONFEDERACY

Get those images out of schools

On June 10, the Minnesota State High School League (MSHSL) issued a statement on the tragic killing of George Floyd. In part, it said that the MSHSL has "the opportunity and responsibility to support our students by listening, learning, advocating and leading." I agree. As such, the MSHSL should ban the use of all Confederate imagery (rebel soldier mascots, flags, etc.) by member schools because such imagery symbolizes racism and white supremacy. No students should have to face this offensive imagery - at their school district or another - while participating in MSHSL activities.

If the MSHSL does not ban the use of these images, how can it honestly say the following in its June 10 statement: that it affirms "our shared humanity"? That it is working "to make dignity, respect, equity, fairness and justice the values that our students carry with them as they form their futures"? That "dignity and respect for all are nonnegotiable"? That "embracing diversity best serves all students and school communities"? That it has "a clear focus on equity, inclusion and respect"? That "through our activities and athletics, we can promote healing, build unity and work toward the elimination of racism and discrimination"? And finally, that "through our words and actions, we must honor and embrace our diversity and move forward together toward a world that is fair, equitable and just"?

It can't.

It's time for the MSHSL to turn words into deeds and ban the use of Confederate imagery by member schools.

Brett Gaul, Marshall, Minn.

...

With complete sincerity I say "cheers" to Mississippi on its decision to remove the "stars and bars" from its state flag, which has been there for more than 100 years ("Mississippi moves to rid state flag of rebel emblem," June 29). This act shows the profound impact George Floyd's death has had upon our nation. Not with the intent to diminish the significance of their act, the fact that they will replace the insignia with "In God We Trust" was a bit of a letdown. Will it take another 100 years to get "God" off our money and our flags? Why should these promote a specific theological belief? I thought we, as citizens, had the right to believe or not to believe.

REBUILDING LAKE STREET

It transformed, and will do so again

Regarding the discussion about whether or not the city of Minneapolis has done "nothing" to clean up Hennepin Avenue: Turn the focus to Lake Street ("Yes, Minneapolis government is dysfunctional," June 26). Forty years ago I was taking the bus to temp jobs on Lake Street where I used a manual typewriter with five sheets of carbon paper to type invoices. Lake Street was a run-down, sad place then. Fast-forward to early 2020. Invoices are done on computers and Lake Street has become an extraordinarily vibrant place of diverse cultures and businesses, with colorful murals reflecting the community adorning buildings. The memory of that transformation will not fade.

Now, though many of those Lake Street businesses are damaged or rubble, I have great faith they will be rejuvenated and the community revitalized, and I expect the support of our City Council and leaders will again help Lake Street transform itself. Like Hennepin Avenue, Lake Street is a work in progress.

Diane Erdmann, Minneapolis

I am almost 13 and have lived in Longfellow my whole life. Minneapolis means everything to me. I realize that the past few months have been hard for the city with COVID-19 and the death of George Floyd leading to protests and riots. Like I said, Lake Street and Minneapolis mean everything to me, and I don't want to just see Lake Street be torn down and rebuilt with condos and new buildings. I know that a lot of the buildings have already collapsed because of fires. But buildings like the Minnehaha Liquors aren't completely collapsed. I feel like it would show the strength and power of Minneapolis if we kept buildings like Minnehaha Liquors how they are, rebuilt the floors, made it safe to be in and turned it into a memorial and museum about Minneapolis and civil rights. But I am not suggesting that we make this a memorial of George Floyd, because I don't want his name to go down in history as someone who started riots.

I don't know where to start with this project considering I am only 13 years old and have little education on how to start something like this, so I came to the Star Tribune. Thank you for your time.

DULUTH - The Duluth Police Department outlined updates - most of them formalities - to its use of force policies on Thursday, with Chief Mike Tusken saying chokeholds are considered deadly force and had already been out of practice for decades.

"After the tragic death of George Floyd, our community requested an audit of our policies and to assure them we are aligned with the best practices in policing," Tusken said.

The timing allows the department to add and clarify policies to "provide clearer direction to our officers about our expectations and foster better community understanding."

Officers will continue to be required to follow de-escalation tactics and exhaust all alternatives before shooting.

"Communication is the number one tool our officers use when they're out in the field," Tusken said. "Having the capacity to use less lethal tools to resolve potentially lethal encounters is another way we are poised to save the lives of people who are experiencing a crisis today but through good tactics, training and tools, can live tomorrow."

Tusken said a "duty to intervene" policy was updated to state that "regardless of tenure or rank, officers must intervene verbally or physically if another officer is using force outside of policy and training."

Four former Minneapolis police officers have been charged in the murder of George Floyd on Memorial Day. For nearly eight minutes, officer Derek Chauvin knelt on Floyd's neck, even as Floyd, who was handcuffed, said he could not breathe, and three other officers stood by and did not intervene.

In 2019 Duluth police had more than 100,000 interactions with the public and made 3,500 arrests; use of force was recorded in 158 incidents. In 2018 police used force 151 times; use of force was reported 150 times in 2017.

Other policy updates and clarifications include:

ARTICLE MLIX. CITY COUNCIL SECURITY DEFENDED

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 3, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 882 wordsByline: LIZ NAVRATIL; MIGUEL OTAROLA; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Critics say armed protection for Mpls. council members working to abolish the police is hypocritical.Body

A Minneapolis City Council member defended the decision of three colleagues to use private security agencies to protect them, saying the service was recommended by the city's security experts following threats.

"Anybody that's making a threat over a policy action or statement or decision is engaging in a form of terrorism meant to suppress the democratic system through a form of intimidation or violence," said Council Member Andrew Johnson, who said he has also received a threat but hasn't asked for private security.

The revelation that the city has spent at least $63,000 in recent weeks on private security for council members at a time when they are discussing ending the Minneapolis Police Department (MPD) has drawn criticism and accusations of hypocrisy from some city residents.

In the days after the killing of George Floyd, the city discussed whether Minneapolis police could protect council members, but none of them asked the mayor's office to have a police vehicle parked outside their home, according to a statement from Mayor Jacob Frey's office.

Marjaan Sirdar, a community organizer who lives in south Minneapolis, said it was "ridiculous" for council members to get personal protection, questioning why the families of men who were killed by Minneapolis police have not been given security.

Other elected officials have received help from community members who have volunteered to look after their homes overnight, Sirdar said.

"We're letting these folks who feel unsafe know, 'Hey, it's probably a scare tactic. If you feel unsafe, we'll keep showing up,' " he said. "But there's plenty of other people in this community who deserve protection as well."

City Council security defended

The city has not identified the council members receiving security, but the Star Tribune has confirmed they are Council Vice President Andrea Jenkins and Council Members Alondra Cano and Phillippe Cunningham. The three declined to comment, said they were tied up on other city business or did not respond to messages. They have not publicly discussed why they opted for private security over Minneapolis police officers.

The Minneapolis Police Department did not have reports of threats to Cano or Jenkins, spokesman John Elder said earlier this week. Asked whether they had reports of threats to Cunningham, Elder said he did not have any information he could share.

In Minnesota, public officials who make reports to police can ask that their names be redacted, which would prohibit the department from confirming whether those reports exist.

Lacey Severins, a spokeswoman for the Hennepin County Attorney's Office, said they had "not received any cases related to these threats" as of Thursday morning. Kevin Smith, a spokesperson for the local FBI office, said they "do not ordinarily confirm or deny the existence or status of an investigation."

Johnson said council members have received threats on social media, from calls with blocked numbers, via e-mail and in the traditional mail.

He said "security experts" within the city "offered them security based off of specific threats." He did not know what the threats were, though he said he had received one as well.

Johnson said he believes council members are being targeted for "taking on a controversial issue." He said: "I don't see what would be hypocritical about trying to find a more effective way to improve safety in our community, and expecting personal safety for public servants."

The private security is coming from two companies - Aegis and BelCom - which provide armed, licensed security officers. Aegis charges $75 an hour and BelCom charges $125 an hour for their services, according to the city. The city has not publicly released those contracts. Because they have not yet surpassed $175,000 in spending, the contracts do not need to be approved by the City Council during a public meeting, the city has said.

Cunningham, in a Twitter thread, compared the security council members are receiving to protection offered to the mayor via Minneapolis police.

The police have protected the mayor for decades. An officer, who also serves as a driver, accompanies the mayor at many public events. At least two officers rotate on that duty. Sometimes they both work simultaneously if the mayor is attending large events.

The city did not provide data Thursday on how much that police protection costs, saying it had to track down hourly rate and benefit costs.

The mayor's office said it was not consulted about the decision to bring in private security. "During the initial week of unrest immediately following Floyd's death, at the request of Council Members, there were conversations between mayoral staff and MPD about how MPD could help protect Council Members' safety, but there were no requests to detail MPD vehicles to individual Council Members' homes," the mayor's office said in a statement.

City Council security defended

Frey has received "hundreds of serious threats, including death threats and anti-Semitic threats," since he clashed with President Donald Trump last year over who should pay for the costs of the president's rally in Minneapolis.

"Many of those [threats] have come in during the last few weeks," the mayor's office said. "Administrative staff have flagged a sampling of threats for MPD."

Sally Schmidt, the majority owner of One Fermentary & Taproom, said Thursday she plans to close the North Loop watering hole until July 7 to "implement short-term and long-term plans" following the departure of two other co-founders of the business.

Ramsey Louder and Joseph Alton announced their departures from One Fermentary last week, saying the company hadn't done enough to support Black people and other people of color. Louder owned 5% of One Fermentary and is the first Black man to co-own a brewery in Minneapolis. He also is One's head brewer until he departs on Aug. 10. Alton served as a consultant for One and did not have an ownership stake.

"When I started ONE, my mission was to contribute to the diversity and inclusion in the brewing industry - something that is sadly missing," Schmidt wrote in an Instagram post responding to the resignations.

One Fermentary closing 'til July 7 after two founders announce exit

"My mission remains the same but I realize I could have done more," she continued. "I could have ensured that we sought out more diverse suppliers, hired more staff with various levels of experience to provide opportunities to those normally shut out of the industry and created a better path to allow committed staff to learn and grow. And I, as a woman in a male-dominated industry, could have taken a more public role as the majority owner so that the face of the business did not fall mainly on my partner, who holds a 5 percent ownership in the business. This has led to charges of tokenism, for which I am profoundly sorry. I vow that I will do better going forward."

Moving forward, One plans to continue to seek partnerships with diverse suppliers and hire diverse staff, Schmidt wrote in an email to the Business Journal. The taproom also plans to introduce a specialty beer to honor the memory of George Floyd. Proceeds from the sale of this beer will be donated to funds and organizations whose missions align with One, such as the rebuilding efforts in North Minneapolis being done through the West Broadway Business and Area Coalition.

When Louder announced his departure, he said in a Facebook post he "wants to be in a space that can proclaim that Black Lives Matter." Alton wrote his resignation post a few hours later, saying he was uncomfortable that Schmidt, a white person, edited the company response to the killing of George Floyd, and that One was frequently identified as a black-owned business by media outlets even though Ramsey only had a 5% ownership stake.

Schmidt did not comment on the editing of the response to the killing of George Floyd. Louder could not be reached immediately for further comment. Alton declined to comment.

"To me, growing this business has been like starting a garden," Schmidt's statement continued. "Where I failed was tending it - feeding the soil, watering the plants and removing the weeds. I somehow expected it to flourish over time without the necessary nurturing and a plan of action for when the seasons change. I am truly sorry for my inactions that have led to the storm that has uprooted all of my good intentions."

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 1CLength: 731 wordsByline: KENT YOUNGBLOOD; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Maya Moore stepped away from the Lynx to correct a huge wrong.Body

Anyone who watched the video could see the emotion. A day later Maya Moore - relieved, exhausted, exhilarated - remembers racing to the prison where Jonathan Irons was about to emerge, watching him walk through the doors that had kept him, being overcome.

"Well, apparently, I couldn't keep standing," Moore joked Thursday in a national video conference call. "I fell to my knees. It felt so surreal to watch him walking on the other side of those doors."

It was like winning a championship, said Moore, who should know. The former NCAA and Olympic champion helped lead the Lynx to four WNBA titles.

And now, another victory.

All the work she, her family and her legal team did trying to get Irons' conviction on robbery and assault overturned, all the sacrifice made by Moore, who stepped away from her WNBA career more than a year ago, came to fruition when the 40-year-old Irons - convicted at age 18 - walked through the doors of the Jefferson City (Mo.) Correction Facility.

"Just relief and gratitude, when I saw him walking out," she said. "In this journey there is so much to my life that I just do privately. ... I don't really make it a huge priority to tell every single thing that I do every single day about my life. But one of the things I have wanted to share is the work in the criminal justice reform space, sharing and talking about Jonathan's life."

Moore will continue to fight for prosecutorial reform. She and Irons intend to tell his story, hoping to spur others to join the cause for reform of a criminal justice system that, she said, dehumanizes people of color.

But not right away. This was another huge win in Moore's life. Her biggest, easily. But it exacted a toll.

"It's the next-day exhaustion of, we just went to the mountaintop, and now our bodies are exhausted. Our hearts and minds are exhausted," she said. "We're walking around like zombies today. In a good way."

Biggest win yet: Freeing prisoner

So, first, recovery. Any long-term talk, including basketball, can wait.

"I feel like our family needs to enter into a new season of rest for a little while," she said. "I still am very much talking about another full year of just being more rooted at home."

Lynx coach/General Manager Cheryl Reeve, in a statement released by the team, also talked of feeling overwhelmed watching the scene Wednesday. "I am overcome with joy that Maya and all involved were able to reach their goal of Jonathan's exoneration," Reeve said.

Reeve said she was angry that Moore had to leave her profession to engage in the fight against the "two-tiered criminal justice system that over polices, wrongfully convicts and over sentences Black and brown communities."

It's not over, Moore said. She will continue to work for criminal justice reform, focusing on prosecutorial misconduct. In a lengthy question-and-answer period with reporters, Moore touched on many subjects, including:

- The legacy of Irons' exoneration: "That real change happens through relationships. This journey was deep. We were invested. Jonathan was invested. If you're not committed to being deeply committed and investing over time? That's not how legacies are made. ... Hopefully our story, at the very minimum, can be a foundation for people who want to get started and do something."
- How Irons' case and the response to George Floyd's killing has created the possibility for historic change: "Because we're starting to talk more about the roots of systemic racism, we can start to weed out the dehumanizing practices through these systems. Changing systems doesn't make sense until you get to the heart behind that system. By saying George Floyd was a human being. And all the lives we don't have time to talk about are human beings."
- How Irons' release after spending more than two decades of a 50-year sentence feels like a rebirth. "We were driving, racing, to the prison to get him. And I was like, 'This is what expectant fathers must be feeling as they're driving to the hospital and the baby's coming.' Everything is just so new. So I'm looking at him like a newborn in a way, of needing that time to just breathe and rest and grow and enjoy."

"But he's going to grow fast, and I know his heart is for helping people. Our family has been spoiled having him all to ourselves. ... He's going to talk and speak and share and write. He has such a wealth of experience he'll be able to share. So I'm looking forward to helping him do that."

ARTICLE MLXII. DISCOURSE OVER NATIONAL ANTHEM LOOMS FOR NBA, OTHER LEAGUES

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

Rick Carlisle isn't sure what to expect from players during the national anthem when the NBA season resumes in empty arenas in Florida.

The Dallas Mavericks coach does know how he will react if players kneel or otherwise violate a longtime league policy that requires them to stand during the playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner."

"We support our players 100% in terms of their ability to express themselves individually or as a group if they wish," Carlisle said. "I don't know exactly what it's going to look like in Orlando. There could be different forms of expression. But our country is a free country."

The death of George Floyd in the custody of Minneapolis police in May sparked fresh questions across sports about kneeling during the anthem and the gesture has been seen from European soccer to North American auto racing. Former San Francisco quarterback Colin Kaepernick started the latest movement in 2016, saying he was protesting racial inequality and police mistreatment of minorities.

Since sports resumed following Floyd's death, players have knelt worldwide, at professional and even youth sporting events. And NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell has said the league was wrong not to acknowledge the right of its players to peacefully protest, a move that perhaps prompted new criticism from President Donald Trump, who has long opposed kneeling during the anthem.

There's no indication of any leagues skipping the anthem despite empty venues.

"It's kind of a declaration we're still here," said Adrian Burgos Jr., a University of Illinois history professor who has studied issues of minorities in pro sports. "This is how much the anthem has become part of the pageantry of spectator sports in the United States."

On the eve of the Fourth of July holiday, here's a rundown of the major North American sports leagues and their approaches to the national anthem - a longtime fixture at games.

The policy calling for players to "stand and line up in a dignified posture" has been around almost 40 years. There were two instances during the 2016 preseason of singers - both female, one white, one Black - dropping to a knee as they performed the anthem. Both said they did it to call attention to systemic racism.

It is believed that the NBA not only expects, but will encourage, players to make statements about the need for social change when the season restarts. Commissioner Adam Silver, speaking at a Time 100 event this week, suggested the league isn't sure what will happen if players choose to kneel.

"We've had a rule on our books that goes back to the early 1980s, that precedes even David Stern's tenure as commissioner, that calls for players to stand in line at attention during the national anthem," Silver said. "I also understand the role of protest and I think that we'll deal with that situation when it presents itself."

The WNBA has the same policy, but players have not been disciplined for kneeling.

Because Kaepernick was the first to kneel during the anthem, the NFL has always been at the epicenter of the debate. League policy at the time was murky on whether players were required to stand. But there were vocal owners, such as Jerry Jones of the Dallas Cowboys, who threatened to bench players if they didn't stand.

Ultimately, the NFL settled on a policy that players and non-playing personnel were "expected" to stand, while giving players the option of staying in the locker room during the anthem. Through it all, there have usually been at least a few players who knelt and never faced discipline.

The tide shifted suddenly after Floyd's death, with several NFL stars essentially daring the league to keep them from kneeling if there are games in 2020 amid the coronavirus pandemic. Goodell responded quickly.

"We, the National Football League, admit we were wrong for not listening to NFL players earlier and encourage all to speak out and peacefully protest," Goodell said in a video in early June. "I personally protest with you and want to be a part of the much-needed change in this country."

Plenty of players, including young star quarterbacks Baker Mayfield in Cleveland and Arizona's Kyler Murray, have made it clear they will kneel. So has Houston coach Bill O'Brien and Carolina coach Matt Rhule might, too.

Baseball's guidelines have the flexibility to allow for personal choice, and former Oakland catcher Bruce Maxwell was believed to be the first in his sport to do kneel during the anthem in 2017, not long after Trump criticized NFL players.

While the NBA has said it will have multiple outlets for expression of social causes assuming its season resumes, MLB is considering similar possibilities with the 60-game season set to start July 23.

Texas Rangers manager Chris Woodward said he and his players have had several discussions in the wake of protests around the country over Floyd's death.

"I felt it was very important for a lot of our, especially minority players, to share their feelings with their teammates," Woodward said. "I don't know where we stand as far as how the anthem is going to play out. But I will support our team. I will support our players individually if they have personal beliefs that they feel like they need to share."

The NHL rule book does not address player behavior during the national anthems at its games. Protests have been rare; Tampa Bay forward J.T. Brown raised his right fist during the anthem before the team's first road game of the season in 2017.

The National Women's Soccer League revised its anthem policy after most players knelt during the anthem before season-opening games last weekend at the Challenge Cup. The NWSL was the first pro sports team league to resume or start play since the shutdown. Some players were criticized for not kneeling, so the league will allow players to stay in the locker room during the anthem.

"The NWSL stands behind every player, official and staff member," NWSL Commissioner Lisa Baird said. "Kneel on the field. Stand with your hand over your heart. Honor your feelings in the privacy of the locker room or at midfield."

The largest auto racing series in North America for years had specific guidance for its teams to stand, helmetless and hatless, with right hands over the heart during the anthem. That language was removed less than a month ago as NASCAR goes through a reckoning of its own.

North America's biggest pro men's soccer league has had a policy supporting freedom of expression for players, and Commissioner Dan Garber sent a note to league staff supporting that right three years ago when the Kaepernick debate was raging.

Highlight: Instead, Trump's plans for an event at Mount Rushmore are causing even more division.

Body

For July 4th observances this year, President Donald Trump plans a reprise of last year's "Salute to America" in Washington. And on Friday, he will attend a fireworks display and military flyby at Mount Rushmore, where pyrotechnics have been banned for years. Environmentalists, Native groups and public health experts are objecting, but the celebrations appear likely to proceed as planned.

It's unfortunate, because this year the nation could use a more sensitive and inclusive observance of its identity. It's a year to take stock and reflect on the spasms that have convulsed the country - namely, the virus that has killed more Americans than were lost in the Vietnam and Korean wars combined, and the horrendous events that began on Memorial Day with a Minneapolis police officer's knee on George Floyd's neck. This Independence Day is an opportunity for soul-searching. It's a time to ponder how well the country has succeeded at the goal passed down in the preamble to the Constitution: to "secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." Whether we can do that depends on who we mean when we say "ourselves."

A good place to begin the soul-searching is Frederick Douglass' speech of 168 years ago, titled "What to the Slave is the Fourth of July?" As a man born into slavery himself, the abolitionist leader knew that when the Founders said "ourselves," they were not talking about him. His entire speech is worth reading, but here is a bit of it:

"I say it with a sad sense of the disparity between us. I am not included within the pale of glorious anniversary! Your high independence only reveals the immeasurable distance between us. The blessings in which you, this day, rejoice, are not enjoyed in common. The rich inheritance of justice, liberty, prosperity and independence, bequeathed by your fathers, is shared by you, not by me. The sunlight that brought light and healing to you, has brought stripes and death to me. This Fourth of July is yours, not mine. You may rejoice, I must mourn."

Douglass was raising his voice against slavery, the evil of his time, and not the systems of white privilege that he would be attacking if he were alive today. But it is hard to read his words without thinking of the turmoil that has rocked our cities in the weeks since Floyd's death. "For it is not light that is needed, but

This July 4th calls for soul-searching fire; it is not the gentle shower, but thunder," he declared. "We need the storm, the whirlwind, and the earthquake. The feeling of the nation must be quickened; the conscience of the nation must be roused"

That conscience has indeed been roused. We are seeing at least the stirrings of a national reappraisal that could bring lasting change. American society is asking questions about implicit bias and institutional racism that have for too long gone unaddressed. To paraphrase Douglass, a change has now come over the affairs of humankind. This Independence Day, that change demands our attention.

'Hamilton' comes to the small screen

On Friday, Disney Plus will begin streaming a movie that could become an Independence Day tradition: a filmed version of the live-stage production of "Hamilton," performed mostly by the original cast. The plan had been to premiere the film in movie theaters late next year, but the COVID-19 pandemic persuaded the producers to change those plans. "I'm getting messages every day from folks who had tickets to 'Hamilton' and can't go because of the pandemic," the creator and star, Lin-Manuel Miranda, told the New York Times. "So moving up the release so everyone could experience it this summer felt like the right move."

It's a welcome addition to this holiday weekend. Not only does "Hamilton" explore the American Revolution; it does so with voices and vernacular that reflect American diversity. The show asks a pertinent question: "Who tells your story?" The founders thought of "ourselves" as themselves - that is, as white men. If "Hamilton" can help expand the circle of "ourselves" in the American imagination, it comes not a moment too soon.

A Lowertown artist said she had a mission as she painted a mural on a downtown St. Paul store's boarded-up windows - she wanted the message to be about the need for more conversation about racism in the wake of George Floyd's death in Minneapolis police custody.

But the painting came to an end before it was done.

Olga Nichols said the owner of the business - Adam's Market on 5th Street, between Jackson and Robert streets - gave her and a few other artists permission to paint the mural on the wood covering the windows.

The building's owner, however, said his company did not grant permission for the mural to be painted on the store. James Crockarell also said many people had voiced concerns about the particular depiction of Floyd in the mural, adding some could interpret it as "negative and inflammatory."

The mural, which included the words "solidarity," "unity," "equality" and "equity," also included a painting of Floyd in a noose.

Nichols said she knew the image would be controversial, but that's why she painted it. Experiencing racism has inspired her art in the past, and she said she wanted the mural to provoke that conversation.

"I think doing controversial pieces is worth it, and my point was to show how uncomfortable I am everyday as a person of color when I'm followed by the police," Nichols said.

Crockarell, the largest private downtown St. Paul building owner, said no one contacted his company, Madison Equities, about painting the mural.

"We do not want to participate in inflammatory graphics being put on the side of our building," he said. "It is private property; it shouldn't have been put there to begin with and they did not have a right to do it without our approval, so we removed it."

George Floyd mural sparks controversy with noose portrayal. Building owner covers it up.

The artists began painting the mural June 23. According to Nichols, Madison Equities sent a security guard the next day to tell the artists that new windows would be arriving to replace the boards in a day or so, and therefore Nichols may want to stop painting.

"To us, that was an option," Nichols said. "So we planned on continuing."

Nichols is a freelance artist and activist in downtown St. Paul. She had planned a community involvement event for the mural on June 27, but had to cancel it when the art was covered up.

She said the owner of Adam's Market apologized to her and said that while they were forced to cover the art, they will return the mural to Nichols. Nichols said she picked the location of the market because it was vandalized during the civil unrest in the wake of Floyd's killing on Memorial Day.

A representative from the market could not be reached for comment Thursday.

Nichols said she doesn't know where she will display the unfinished mural, but that it will find a temporary or permanent home somewhere in St. Paul.

The historic Calhoun Beach Club apartment building in Minneapolis will soon change its name, dropping the controversial Calhoun from its 92-year-old moniker, property owners have announced.

In an e-mail last week to its apartment residents and athletic club members, the building owner, Denver-based Aimco, wrote, "Recent events have inspired deeper dialogue and discussion that we are engaging in. Today, in alliance with our broader community, we're announcing our decision to remove Calhoun from our name. Over the next few weeks, you'll see us transition to a new name; one that we are still working as a team to finalize."

John Caldwell Calhoun was a South Carolina politician who is perhaps most noted today as an ardent defender of slavery. He served in the U.S. Senate and as vice president under presidents John Quincy Adams and Andrew Jackson. He died in 1850.

The Calhoun Beach Club sits adjacent to the former Lake Calhoun, which was renamed Bde Maka Ska, its original Dakota name, by the Department of Natural Resources in 2018. A court battle ensued, with the Minnesota Supreme Court ruling earlier this year that the DNR had the authority to rename the lake.

Two weeks ago, the owner of the Calhoun Square retail center in Uptown announced that the killing of George Floyd and recent riots and protests about racial inequities prompted it to also change its name.

"The tragic death of George Floyd and ensuing events throughout the country have made it crystal clear that to move forward as a community we must remove painful reminders of the worst chapters in our nation's history," the building owner Northpond Partners wrote on Calhoun Square's website. "A property named for a known racist and champion of slavery has no place in Minneapolis or anywhere in our society."

Aimco officials could not be reached Tuesday.

Aquatennial organizers, citing the absence of that celebratory feeling, announced Thursday that this year's activities scheduled for later this month in Minneapolis are canceled.

"We will miss seeing you in person this year," read a statement from the Minneapolis Downtown Council.

The business group went on to cite two key reasons: the COVID-19 pandemic's impact on public health along with the city's challenges following the killing of George Floyd on May 25 by police.

"Our community continues to navigate the realities of COVID-19 and its impacts on public health," the statement continued. "We will always prioritize community safety over celebrations. More importantly, Minneapolis is still reeling from the death of George Floyd. Our community has been deeply impacted by his tragic death and the unrest that followed."

Summing up, the statement said, "It does not feel like it is time to celebrate. We want to take the time to honor our community and give space for the important work that needs to be done."

Minneapolis' annual summer party began in 1940 and offers many free events that draw thousands of people downtown. They include the Torchlight Parade, a 5K run and fireworks.

This year's events were scheduled to run from July 22-25. Organizers have scheduled the 2021 Aquatennial for July 21-24.

Leah Wong, the council's vice president for external relations, said the group made the decision on Wednesday, just three weeks before festivities were to start.

Wong said the group "tried to hold off until the last possible moment" while assessing various scales of celebration.

"We were really working hard to bring this celebration forward," she said, going over "multiple plans since April ... on how we could do a social-distanced Aquatennial."

Not party time: 2020 Aquatennial is canceled

Ultimately, this summer's Aquatennial will be a strictly virtual affair that will include coloring pages, jigsaw puzzles, a scavenger hunt and more. Visit aquatennial.com/aquativities for more information.

In the midst of the COVID-19 pandemic and the protests that followed the death of George Floyd, a wave of sexual misconduct accusations have flooded the Twin Cities local music scene through social media.

It started with women calling out several members of the hip-hop scene, but it quickly snowballed with accusations leveled at musicians in multiple genres, managers, DJs, nightclub staff and owners, photographers, prominent fans and even, according to reporting by MPR News, an on-air host at its own 89.3 The Current.

So far, the most prominent public response has come from Rhymesayers, the Minneapolis hip-hop record label known for its annual Soundset Festival, which drew as many as 35,000 fans to the Minnesota State Fair Midway each Memorial Day weekend. (In January, Rhymesayers announced it was putting Soundset on hold this summer and was planning instead to focus on celebrating the label's 25th anniversary later this year.)

Last week, Rhymesayers dropped two of its local artists, Prof (Jake Anderson) and Dem Atlas (Joshua Turner). In a lengthy social media post, the label said, "abuse of women is not acceptable and is not in alignment with our values ... to abusers, racists and those engaged in predatory behavior, we don't want you as artists, fans or affiliates and as we become aware of you, you will be held accountable."

The move came one day before Rhymesayers was set to give Prof's album "Powderhorn Suites" a nationwide release. While Rhymesayers didn't specifically address it, several women had accused a former DJ of Prof's of abuse, which led to the wider accusations.

Prof responded with a pair of social media posts. The first apologized for his DJ, who he said he fired in 2016 "because he wasn't performing at his job and I didn't enjoy his company. ... I truly didn't know the depths of the manipulation and abuse."

The rapper went on to say his own "shock-jock persona" was an act to get him attention but that "looking back, my garbage attempts at building an edgy persona and making dark comedy that pushed boundaries were brutal and at minimum very hurtful to women, especially survivors."

It's unclear what, if any, further public action will take place regarding the more than a dozen other men accused of sexual misconduct, although a handful of those men have posted statements online addressing their own behavior or apologizing for turning a blind eye to the actions of a friend or colleague.

Rapper P.O.S. (Stefon Alexander), who is known for his work with Doomtree and as a solo act, appeared to do both in a statement: "I've definitely missed many opportunities to lift women, been a shamefully bad partner at times. And have been guilty. Of lying, cheating, and gaslighting lies to cover it up. That stuff can also cause real pain and lasting damage."

I initially attempted to cover this as a news story and I contacted a series of local women for interviews, both directly and through sympathetic second parties. Most declined, some didn't respond at all.

Last week, I spoke to one woman willing to go on the record. Over the course of nearly an hour, she detailed the abusive relationship with a man she thought was her friend and how difficult it was to share her story publicly. She said after she posted her accusations, about 50 other women contacted her with similar stories. She also talked about the many open secrets about abusive men in the scene.

Some 20 minutes after we spoke, she contacted me and asked not to use her name. She had learned her alleged abuser, who she thought she had cut off all contact with, had just been trying to talk to several of her friends. She was, she said, scared.

Amber L. Carter, a Minneapolis author, knows how she feels.

"It's terrifying," Carter said of publicly accusing someone of sexual misconduct. "There's a sense of knowing you're doing the right thing, but it (also makes you) incredibly anxious. Especially as a woman speaking out, there's definitely a fear for your own safety and fear that people aren't going to believe you and find your words to be not credible."

Last week, Carter posted on Twitter about a once-prominent local fan who often referred to himself as a "tastemaker." Carter did not accuse him of sexually abusing her, but said she stood up for him when other women accused him. She wrote that he was someone "I knew had used and abused friends, and who had also used and abused me and my friendship. ... Believe the stories. They are all true."

In an interview, Carter said the Twin Cities music scene is a tight-knit group.

"It's such a small community and everybody knows each other," she said. "That fosters a lot of power given to very particular people." Newcomers, she added, can feel overwhelmed and intimidated by those with power and influence. And even though stories of abusive men have circulated for years, many women have kept quiet out of fear of being banished from the scene altogether.

What has changed? Why now? Carter pointed to the current uncertainty and unrest of life in general.

"People are just not giving a s- anymore," she said. "With everything that's going on, people are energized for change and feel more empowered about speaking out. They want to call out people in positions of power who abuse that power."

So what happens next?

"That's the million-dollar question," Carter said. "I've seen some apologies and I think they're bulls-, frankly. There's been a wave of men saying 'Whoops, I thought I could do this but I got caught and now I'm going to go away for a while.' I think we need to deliver actual, tangible consequences.

"People who are being hit with credible allegations need to be absolutely honest and forthright. They need to say how they intend to make up for it. I want to see legit, actual apologies and contrition. And I want people to stop supporting these people and stop supporting their work. I want to see actions toward change."

Dai Thao stood in front of a burned-out strip mall off University Avenue, its storefronts boarded up and its neon signs stained with smoke. In the distance, the St. Paul City Council member could see a construction crane, still standing despite the destruction.

"Before COVID-19, it was booming," Thao said. "There was a lot of energy, a lot of excitement here."

Minneapolis was hit hardest when some of the protests following George Floyd's killing turned violent, but the riots struck St. Paul, too. According to data compiled by the Star Tribune, 246 buildings in St. Paul sustained damage, from smashed windows to fires. Nearly 60% of those buildings are on University Avenue, a corridor defined by a mosaic of small businesses, many owned by people of color.

The close-knit neighborhoods surrounding University Avenue have sprung into action, first helping to board up storefronts and post "Black-owned business" signs to guard against vandalism, then returning to transform the beige plywood into brightly painted murals.

"Everything was so raw at that moment," said Alex Smith, an artist who helped paint multiple murals along the corridor, including outside the Victoria Theater. "It felt like we really needed to heal."

There's hope that this moment will be a turning point for the area, which survived the construction of Interstate 94 and the Green Line only to be hit by a pandemic and violent unrest. But there's also anxiety that the gentrification and displacement residents have long feared will arrive in a way they never expected - that speculators will descend on vacant buildings and empty lots and erase the diversity that's been their strength.

"If we lose the Black-owned businesses, we lose the Vietnamese-owned businesses, we lose ... the East African businesses, everything - what's going to come in next?" said Sarah Nichols, who grew up in the

St. Paul neighborhoods look to lessons of past in riot recovery

Midway neighborhood and now lives in Rondo. "We need this to be an opportunity for community to build."

Businesses face uncertainty

Just a few months ago, the neighborhoods surrounding University Avenue - Hamline-Midway, Union Park, Frogtown and Summit-University - were waiting for redevelopment stemming from the Allianz Field soccer stadium.

Now, the boarded-up storefronts make the area look like it's bracing for a hurricane. In between, there are empty spaces where buildings are just gone - of 20 buildings that burned, four were completely destroyed, data show. Thao said state help will be needed to rebuild the area, especially considering the budget shortfall the city is facing due to COVID-19.

After watching on TV as the Midway Shopping Center off University Avenue went up in flames, Mary Lau and her family were ready to get to work and reopen Peking Garden, the restaurant they've operated there since 2006. Two GoFundMe pages raised more than $20,000 to support the restaurant and its employees, and customers even offered to help clean up.

Then, at the end of June, they learned their lease was being terminated and they had just a couple weeks to vacate.

The strip mall, home to chains such as Foot Locker and Great Clips as well as small businesses, will be demolished after sustaining significant fire and water damage, according to Rick Birdoff, principal and president of RD Management LLC, the New York-based property owner. Tenants got lease termination notices last week.

The damage has accelerated plans for redevelopment at the site, which will include commercial space that will be available to local tenants, Birdoff said.

"Our hope is what we rebuild there will be something the community can be proud of," he said.

Va-Megn Thoj, executive director at Asian Economic Development Association, is skeptical that there will be space in the new development for the current businesses. Like other commercial renters along University Avenue, the survival of Midway Shopping Center tenants is uncertain, he said.

"It's going to cost a lot for some of these businesses just to recover, and that in itself is potential displacement of these businesses, because they don't have the cash to recover and reopen," Thoj said. "Or if they do, they won't be as strong as they were before."

Building a stronger future

Nieeta Presley has been here before.

The executive director of the Aurora/St. Anthony Neighborhood Development Corp. has deep roots in Rondo, a historically Black neighborhood that was torn apart to make way for I-94. Decades later, she helped guide community members and business owners through the yearslong construction of the Green Line.

St. Paul neighborhoods look to lessons of past in riot recovery

COVID-19 and the civil unrest have taken a toll on multiple businesses between two development corporation properties. But Presley is convinced that a focus on art and cultural identity will heal the community, and make it stronger.

"Let's do something new and let's do something greater than before," she said. "Out of the sadness, strife, stress, there is an opportunity to envision and revision really what could be an inclusive community."

As the plywood begins to come down along University, plans are forming to create an art exhibit with the murals, said Tyler Olsen-Highness, the executive director of the Victoria Theater Arts Center. Behind Gordon Parks High School, where windows were broken, there's a park where Thao said he wants to see a sculpture symbolizing unity and peace.

"I guess the only thing that really keeps you going is hope," Presley said. "Maybe today it's stormy, but God promises a new day tomorrow."

The emergence of a bipartisan consensus following weeks of protests about racial injustice - that police departments need either complete overhauls or major reforms - is a big moment years in the making for the progressive movement. Many Republican conservatives who once reflexively called the killing of unarmed Blacks "isolated acts" are now suddenly backing law enforcement reforms in reaction to a never-ending series of cellphone videos showing callous or deadly police misconduct - as well as fresh examples of police brutality at recent protests against, yes, police brutality.

George Floyd's killing by Minneapolis police on May 25 will be seen as a turning point in American history.

Perhaps a major one. Many activists sense a desire for societal change to address inequities that go far beyond police behavior. New York Mayor Bill de Blasio is one of many politicians who agrees, vowing "to rebuild a fairer city that profoundly addresses injustice and disparity."

And high-profile Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez, D-New York, is renewing her push for a Green New Deal to transform the economy in a way that helps the environment and lifts up underprivileged minorities. She just won a primary with 72% of the vote and has emerged as a fundraising juggernaut who can help like-minded candidates win office.

In California, a ballot measure asking voters to reconsider affirmative action - which Proposition 209 banned in 1996 for state contracts, hiring and college admissions - won swift and overwhelming approval in both the Assembly and Senate, supercharged by recent anti-racism protests. And the state Assembly had another historic moment this month when it approved a measure to study how to provide reparations to African Americans.

So could this national mood translate into vast change beyond police reform if Joe Biden defeats President Donald Trump and Democrats control the Senate and House in 2021?

Here are three reasons to be skeptical about that - and none involve Republican lawmakers' opposition.

The first is that progressives' current detente with the conventionally liberal Biden-Barack Obama-Nancy Pelosi-Chuck Schumer wing of the Democratic Party is a fig leaf covering up the fact that the groups have huge differences. The anger of the progressive left toward the last two Democratic Party presidents and Democratic congressional leadership is hard to exaggerate.

It's not just over old-school Democrats' insufficiently aggressive agenda - shorthanded as noisome "neoliberalism." It's that many longtime party members say American democracy is flawed but still good while many progressives call the U.S. a "failed state" or "failed experiment." It was then-President Barack Obama who pointed out the party's disconnect in 2015 when he said many on college campuses "don't want to read a book if it has language that is offensive to African Americans, or somehow sends a demeaning signal towards women." Obama said that he doesn't agree that students "have to be coddled and protected from different points of views," breaking with progressives on the fundamental issue of speech.

The second reason to doubt a series of dramatic overhauls is that millions of registered American independents - a group that in February for the first time outnumbered registered Republicans - are by and large mushy moderates who support incremental change. A 2019 NBC News-Wall Street Journal poll showed that 62% of independents wanted a third political party because of their unhappiness with Democrats and Republicans alike.

But the third reason to doubt we will see a societal transformation has to do with the cynical version of the Golden Rule: He who has the gold makes the rules. You don't have to be a Marxist member of the Occupy movement to realize how much government functions in a fundamental way to protect the super-rich. You just need to contemplate an absurdly complex U.S. tax code in which the amount of taxes the very wealthy pay are a function of the skill of their tax attorneys - and neither Democratic nor GOP presidents have a problem with this.

If tech billionaires in Silicon Valley, finance billionaires on Wall Street and energy billionaires in Texas think there's a real chance that the progressive movement will come for their wealth - and that a post-Trump Republican Party is a wrecked brand that is too weak with young voters and minorities to regain its past clout - they will act on their fear. And every four years, we'll see tycoon presidential candidates in the vein of Michael Bloomberg or Ross Perot who run ridiculously well-funded independent campaign against what they will depict as Democratic extremists on the left and GOP extremists on the right.

If America's billionaires think the Republican Party is permanently diminished by Trump and the Democratic Party is ready to abandon capitalism, they will be even more blatant in trying to buy power. And they'll have the resources to make their campaign seem like it's about empowering cautious moderates - not preserving their fortunes.

So, yes, progressives are having a moment. But there is a ceiling on what they can achieve because large swaths of the public don't share their agenda - and the nation's most powerful people hate it.

On his fourth straight day of peaceful protest, Soren Stevenson linked arms with demonstrators gathered at the Interstate 35W on-ramp, staring down a phalanx of Minneapolis police in riot gear.

Without warning or provocation, bystanders say, officers fired a series of flash bang grenades and tear gas to disperse the crowd. A nonlethal police projectile struck Stevenson in the face, exploding his left eye and leaving him partly blinded.

Nearly a week after George Floyd was killed by Minneapolis officers, the state's largest police force struggled to restore order amid unrest in its smoldering city. Although police officials acknowledge that some innocent civilians were injured during days of protests and riots, they argue that the situation required force to maintain public safety and it was difficult to distinguish between peaceful protesters and those wishing to cause harm.

But interviews with activists, elected officials and use-of-force experts suggest that police at times used extreme measures against the protesters, in violation of department policy, and missed several opportunities over the first few days to defuse tensions. Widely shared videos caught law enforcement officers indiscriminately spraying chemical irritants outside squad cars, at nonviolent groups and in the face of a journalist held at gunpoint, whose credential was visible. In other instances, officers shot marking rounds at civilians on their own property. One business owner even testified before the state Senate that he was hit with chemical irritant by police while guarding his family's East Lake Street gas station from looters.

"It seems hard to fathom that it was a mistake," said Stevenson, 25, whose May 31 injury required several surgeries to reset facial bones and remove the eye. "We couldn't have been more than 30 feet away and I wasn't moving."

Since Floyd's death, allegations of misconduct and excessive force have poured into the city's Office of Police Conduct Review. The civilian review board is now investigating more than 400 such complaints against the MPD - an unprecedented number that has, in a matter of weeks, surpassed annual complaint totals of previous years, officials said. And those figures are expected to rise.

Complaints skyrocket over police response to protests

While specifics of the complaints are not yet public, the Star Tribune has identified two recent cases that are under investigation. One complaint, filed internally, involves Facebook posts purportedly made by Officer David Peña, who used a fake name to mock protesters and encourage looting in a neighborhood that is home to much of the city's East African population.

Another is related to the actions of an unidentified Minneapolis police sergeant caught on camera pepper spraying a VICE news correspondent in the eyes even after he repeatedly identified himself as a member of the press.

Corrections Commissioner Paul Schnell, who acted as a special operations spokesman during the unrest, filed an internal complaint after being alerted to the incident by a state senator, who described it as "an egregious, gratuitous attack." Schnell declined to comment further, saying "the e-mail speaks for itself."

"I believe the conduct to be wholly inappropriate and contrary to MPD policy," Schnell wrote in an e-mail that was later shared with members of Gov. Tim Walz's staff.

When asked by a reporter last month about how he would rate his department's response to the rioting, Police Chief Medaria Arradondo said that tactical decisions were made based on "preservation of life."

In a more recent interview, he said that his department would take a hard look at the use of pepper spray and projectiles on protesters during mostly peaceful demonstrations. The chief has since presented a new policy that requires his authorization for any "crowd control weapons" to be used during a protest, at the behest of state officials. "That's certainly a change from allowing supervision on the ground to make that call, because of the serious nature of that kind of level of less-lethal force," Arradondo said.

For the average Minneapolis resident, the complaint filing process can be a labyrinthine, said Elizer Darris, an organizer with the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) of Minnesota. Those who do attempt it often lose confidence in a system that rarely results in discipline for the officers accused of wrongdoing, he said.

"Faith in that particular process has eroded pretty dramatically," said Darris.

Last month, the ACLU filed a class-action lawsuit on behalf of journalists who were threatened, assaulted and arrested while covering demonstrations in the wake of Floyd's death. The organization has since turned its attention to protesters maimed at the hands of law enforcement. Several attorneys have already notified the city clerk's office that lawsuits are pending regarding injuries inflicted by police during the unrest.

Freelance journalist Linda Tirado filed a federal lawsuit against city and state law enforcement officers after losing her left eye to a police projectile while outside the Third Precinct in south Minneapolis. She is among at least two dozen people who suffered traumatic eye injuries during recent U.S. protests.

So-called kinetic impact projectiles, including rubber bullets and 40-mm "less lethal" foam rounds, are commonly used in crowd-control situations. But MPD's own use of force policy states that 40-mm rounds can cause grievous injury and should be reserved "for the incapacitation of an aggressive, noncompliant subject," and "unless deadly force is justified," officers should aim for large muscle groups in the lower extremities. The policy explicitly advises against targeting a person's head and neck.

The American Academy of Ophthalmology was so troubled by the extent of life-altering eye injuries last month that the medical group took a rare public-policy stance asking law enforcement to immediately cease use of rubber bullets as a form of crowd control.

"Americans have the right to speak and congregate publicly and should be able to exercise that right without the fear of blindness," physicians wrote in a statement. "You shouldn't have to choose between your vision and your voice."

Critics also say that tear gas is increasingly being used as a crowd dispersal tool, part of the ongoing militarization of police forces around the country.

According to best practices, the gas should only be deployed at the edge of demonstrations to minimize protesters' exposure.

But, in the days after Floyd's death, social media lit up with photos and videos of officers firing canisters into the middle of large, densely packed crowds or spraying the gas at protesters from moving vehicles.

Amid backlash, cities like Seattle and Philadelphia have temporarily stopped its use, while other places are mulling similar bans.

In Minneapolis, the debate over the post-Floyd law enforcement response followed days of intense clashes between police and demonstrators.

MPD supporters contend that police used force in response to an escalation of violence from some protesters - pointing out that officers were pelted with bricks and bottles on a nightly basis - and blame city leaders for allowing the riots to get out of control before intervening. There were numerous reports of officers taking gunfire in the field, though none were struck.

Authorities fired their weapons at least twice during the unrest - once when a downtown motorist swerved into and nearly struck two police officers in a utility vehicle and again when a National Guardsman fired at a car that was driving toward a police blockade on Washington Avenue.

Some of the criticism leveled at the MPD echoed complaints made after the 18-day occupation of the Fourth Precinct police station that followed the 2015 killing of Jamar Clark. A federal after-action report found numerous instances in which officers used "less-lethal and nonlethal weapons" on protesters during the occupation, in clear violation of department policies, and often failed to document their actions. Federal officials also recommended that the department "strengthen, train on, adhere to and enforce the use of force policy - especially as it relates to the use of chemical agents."

City Council Member Jeremiah Ellison, who represents the North Side, said he thinks that, had police done more to control the situation on the first night of unrest, things may not have snowballed as they did.

"Obviously, by the third night the whole situation had grown into an unmitigated disaster," said Ellison, among the most vocal proponents of dismantling the police force. "The tactics being used by protesters [on the first night] seemed mild enough that you could have successfully de-escalated the situation."

Federal arson charges were dismissed Thursday against a 19-year-old woman from Ramsey, Minn., who was arrested in June in connection with a fire set at a St. Paul nutrition store.

Magistrate Judge Hildy Bowbeer ordered the charges dropped against Bailey Marie Baldus on the recommendation of federal prosecutors.

In a motion filed Wednesday seeking the dismissal, Assistant U.S. Attorneys Matthew Ebert and Joseph Teirab wrote that "the government is continuing its investigation into this matter, including reviewing material seized pursuant to search warrants and reviewing other evidence to determine the scope of the alleged conduct by Ms. Baldus and others."

Besides Baldus, federal authorities have also arrested two other people for the May 28 fire at the Great Health and Nutrition store at 1360 W. University Av., which took place three days after the police killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis.

The original complaint, filed June 8, said that Baldus conspired with McKenzy Ann Degidio Dunn and Samuel Elliott Frey to commit arson.

Daniel Guerrero, a defense attorney who was appointed to represent Baldus through the federal public defender's office, said he was notified Wednesday that charges were being dropped.

"The video [from the store] shows she was in the wrong place at the wrong time and was not familiar with the individuals that were arguably responsible for the arson at the health supplement store," Guerrero said.

A spokesperson with the U.S. attorney's office in Minneapolis could not be reached for comment.

COVID-19 cases rose in Minnesota and across the nation Thursday, as residents continued to stock up on fireworks and make plans to have company over during for the Independence Day holiday weekend.

The average number of newly confirmed cases of the viral respiratory infection in Minnesota has grown almost every day since June 19, according to a seven-day average of cases. Minnesota added 500 cases, giving it 37,210 total.

Nationally, the number of confirmed cases reached an all-time high, with more than 50,000 new lab-confirmed cases reported in a single day and infection curves rising in 40 of 50 states.

While some of that increase is likely because of increased testing, the Associated Press reported that 36 states are seeing an increase in the percentage of positive tests. An increasing share of positive tests is seen as a sign that overall transmissions are increasing, even if more tests are being conducted.

Minnesota Health Commissioner Jan Malcolm said this week that 3.7% of the diagnostic COVID-19 tests in the state came back positive, compared with 3.3% the week before.

Arizona, a national hot spot for COVID-19 cases, has the highest test-positivity rate in the nation, with 24% of all tests coming back positive, according to data maintained by Johns Hopkins University in Maryland. Arizona is providing about 2 tests per 1,000 residents, compared with 2.2 per 1,000 in Minnesota.

Although public health officials are closely monitoring any increase in the case-positivity rate, Malcolm said Wednesday that Minnesota's latest figure was "still very good" and speaks to how the state has managed the epidemic with testing.

Minnesota's testing has ramped up to about 12,000 per day.

Malcolm urged Minnesotans to celebrate the holiday primarily with the people in their own households and to consider virtual visits with larger groups. But the state has not canceled the holiday.

July 4th watchwords: Celebration, caution

"If you do gather together, keep group sizes limited," Malcolm said. "And gathering outdoors is a wonderful option. Outdoors is such a better environment in terms of protection from the spread of COVID-19. But even outdoors it's important to still practice social distancing and to wear masks when you are in close proximity, and absolutely indoors."

For many Minnesotans, giving up summer retreats and family gatherings during the July 4th weekend is a tough sell.

That means some will celebrate as they always have despite the looming threat of COVID-19, while others like Patty Zeidler of Farmington and her husband will keep to themselves, camping and kayaking in Cable, Wis.

Others plan to adjust their annual gatherings, keeping them smaller and incorporating social distancing whether they're at a park, poolside or Up North at the cabin.

"We don't want to take the risk," said Jim Thompson, 65, who walked into Lakeville Liquors wearing a mask. His usual large-group barbecue will be replaced by a social-distance gathering at the community pool.

When night falls, he'll try to catch whatever local fireworks he might be able to see from the solitude of his deck.

"That will be good enough," Thompson said. "We're trying to reduce the spread."

Nancy Lindstrom left a Cub store in Apple Valley with groceries for a much smaller cabin getaway than the usual gathering of two dozen family members, including nieces and nephews. Instead, she'll gather with those she has already spent time with the past few months - her daughter, son-in-law and his parents.

"I feel we have to be smart," she said. "If you look at the numbers around the country, you have to be concerned. Now is not the time to be in a big crowd. I don't think it's safe."

Others remain skeptical.

"I don't buy into the whole thing. I'm not saying [COVID-19] doesn't exist. I don't think the data is accurate," said Chandra Arthur of Apple Valley.

She'll head to Prescott, Wis., this weekend for a party with about 50 friends to celebrate one of the first big gatherings they've had since the pandemic shut down normal life.

"Everyone is missing everyone else," she said, noting that only a few friends will opt out this year.

Arthur feels safe gathering with the group. She has met friends for small patio or driveway happy hours and doesn't feel the need to wear a mask unless it's required.

"I'm not afraid of getting sick," she said, pointing to the low infection numbers among protesters who took to the streets after George Floyd's May 25 killing.

Her 70-year-old father was hospitalized for 10 days in May with COVID-19 and recovered.

"I don't feel invincible," said the 43-year-old, "but the odds are that I'll recover if I get it."

July 4th watchwords: Celebration, caution

In Minnehaha Park in Minneapolis, DeAnn Hoff, 52, said she's scaling back her traditional gathering for the holiday, inviting over only one other family this year. Although the holiday is supposed to be about celebrating America, she said it's hard to be upbeat and hopeful this year, given all the social unrest and how fast COVID-19 is spreading here compared with other countries.

Her friend Priscilla Elwell, 74, sitting 6 feet away, agreed: "I hope that next Fourth of July, that we can be hopeful."

ARTICLE MLXXIII. REDSKINS TO HAVE 'THOROUGH REVIEW' OF NAME AMID RACE DEBATE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 3, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 689 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: WASHINGTON (AP) - The Washington Redskins began a "thorough review" of their name Friday, a significant step toward moving on from what experts and advocates call a "dictionary-defined racial slur."Body

By STEPHEN WHYNO

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Washington Redskins began a "thorough review" of their name Friday, a significant step toward moving on from what experts and advocates call a "dictionary-defined racial slur."

Even though owner Dan Snyder had shown no willingness to change the name since buying the team in 1999, the recent national conversation on race has renewed opposition to the name and prompted sponsors to speak up. With support from the NFL, it may finally lead to a new moniker for the long-struggling storied franchise with long-ago Super Bowl success.

"In the last few weeks, we have had ongoing discussions with Dan, and we are supportive of this important step," Commissioner Roger Goodell said.

In a statement, the team said recent events around the U.S. and feedback from the community prompted the formal review.

"This process allows the team to take into account not only the proud tradition and history of the franchise but also input from our alumni, the organization, sponsors, the National Football League and the local community it is proud to represent on and off the field," Snyder said.

Native American advocacy groups have tried for decades to force a change, and a peer-reviewed UC Berkeley study released earlier this year revealed 67% of those surveyed who strongly identify as Native agreed or strongly agreed the name was offensive. The death of George Floyd in Minnesota and other examples of police brutality against Black people in the U.S. sparked protests worldwide and changes to various brands considered racially insensitive.

Redskins to have 'thorough review' of name amid race debate

Asked last month about the name, a spokesman said the team had no comment. But this week marked a possible sea change on the issue with investors writing to FedEx, PepsiCo and other sponsors hoping they would influence change.

FedEx was the first to act publicly. The title sponsor of the team's stadium in Landover, Maryland, FedEx said Thursday, "We have communicated to the team in Washington our request that they change the team name." FedEx paid $205 million in 1999 for the naming rights to the stadium.

On Thursday night, Nike appeared to remove all Redskins gear from its online store. Nike said Friday it has shared its concerns with the NFL over the name and is "pleased to see the team taking a first step towards change."

PepsiCo, a sponsor since 2017, expressed a similar sentiment and said, "We believe it is time for a change." Sponsor Bank of America said it has "encouraged the team to change the name" and welcomed the organization's review.

Coach Ron Rivera, who said in a recent radio interview now is not the time to discuss the name, called it "an issue of personal importance." Rivera, who is of Mexican and Puerto Rican descent and is the only Hispanic head coach currently in the NFL, added he'd work closely with Snyder during the process.

"There is no reason not to immediately announce that the team is changing the mascot, since any real review will lead to the inevitable conclusion that the deeply offensive and racist name of Washington's NFL team must go now," said Oneida Indian Nation Representative Ray Halbritter, leader of the "Change the Mascot" campaign. "Dan Snyder can stand on the right side of history and create a new, positive legacy for his team, or instead continue embracing a bigoted slur that denigrates Native Americans and people of color."

Washington Mayor Muriel Bowser said recently the name was an "obstacle" to the team building a stadium in the District. The current lease at FedEx Field expires in 2027, and the old RFK Stadium site in Washington is one of several options for the team's new headquarters, along with locations in Maryland and Virginia.

The team in late June removed racist founder George Preston Marshall from its Ring of Fame. A monument of Marshall was also removed from the RFK Stadium site.

Marshall's granddaughter supported those moves and recently told The Associated Press she's fine with the team changing its name.

"I think if anybody's offended that they should change the name," Wright said. "I've always felt that way."

ARTICLE MLXXIV. S.D. TOWN REMOVES CONFEDERATE FLAG EMBLEM

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 3, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 434 wordsByline: PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Action comes after Floyd uncle protests insignia.Body

Officials in a small South Dakota town have decided not to wait for formality and have removed from public view the police insignia that includes the Confederate flag, according to a relative of George Floyd who lives there and raised objections over the logo.

Selwyn Jones said Wednesday that the emblem is gone from the Gettysburg police vehicle, the station and all other visible locations in the town of roughly 1,200 that is named for the battlefield where Union forces turned the tide against the South's defense of slavery in the Civil War.

"Yes, they are gone," said Jones, who returned late Monday from Minneapolis, where he had sat in the hearing for the four fired Minneapolis police officers charged in Floyd's May 25 death. "They're off. I see them every day."

The fate of the insignia with the flag was to be up for debate Monday before the City Council. On Tuesday, Mayor William Wuttke told the Star Tribune that the Police Department was "working on something different," but added that he felt his community was being pressured by liberals and the news media.

The mayor of the nearly all white town and Police Chief David Mogard did not make themselves available Wednesday to say whether the emblem would be addressed at the council next week, given it's now out of view.

Jones was pleased with the unexpected development but cautious about what could happen next.

"It's just not needed in this world," he said. "We shall see."

Mogard said at a special council session called on June 12 that a redesign was needed to the patch he has worn on his uniform since took over the department in 2018.

S.D. town removes Confederate flag emblem

After the meeting that night, Mogard started the transition process on his own, albeit in a small way. Television reporter Ryan Martin, on assignment for DakotaNewsNow.com, said Mogard told him outside the police station he was going to remove the emblem from the station's door.

Martin said he was working on his laptop in preparation for a live report, and "when I looked up, it was off the door."

Jones was joined in his objection to the insignia, which has represented police since 2009, by a University of South Dakota political science student whose online petition collected several thousand signatures and by a major national civil rights group.

"We welcome this apparent decision to remove a symbol of racism, white supremacy and slavery from the department's logo, vehicles and facilities," said Ibrahim Hooper, spokesman for the Council on American-Islamic Relations. "All such symbols honoring the traitors and racists of the Confederacy should be eliminated nationwide."
