Byline: Farah Stockman

Highlight: A month later, the city is still struggling to understand what happened and why: Not since the 1992 unrest in Los Angeles has an American city suffered such destructive riots.

Body

Two days after George Floyd died, the police chief of Minneapolis called the mayor around dinnertime. He needed help. What had begun as peaceful protests outside the 3rd Police Precinct was turning into mayhem.

"He said, 'The Target is getting looted. We are not going to be able to handle this on our own,'" recalled Mayor Jacob Frey, who called Gov. Tim Walz, and asked for the National Guard.

The governor said he would consider the request. Afterward, he expressed surprise that city leaders did not seem to have a plan for where they wanted the soldiers to go.

As the night wore on, dozens of buildings burst into flames, without a fire crew in sight. A six-story apartment building that was still under construction collapsed into a ball of fire. A high-tech factory was set ablaze. Residents called 911 desperate for help, but dispatchers were overwhelmed.

Over three nights, a 5-mile stretch of Minneapolis sustained extraordinary damage. The police precinct house itself was set on fire, after the mayor gave orders to evacuate the building. A month later, the city is still struggling to understand what happened and why: Not since the 1992 unrest in Los Angeles has an American city suffered such destructive riots.

The vast majority of protesters in Minneapolis, like others around the country, marched peacefully, and some tried to intervene to stop the destruction. To many, the damage was an understandable response to years of injustice at the hands of Minneapolis police, an explosion of anger that activists had warned was coming if the city did not reform law enforcement.

At the same time, it struck a close-knit, civic-minded community that was already struggling under the coronavirus pandemic. Fires and looting destroyed hundreds of businesses, among them a worker-owned bicycle co-op, a historic diner run by a husband and wife, and the new headquarters of a nonprofit organization that works with Native American teens.

'They have lost control': How Minneapolis leaders failed to stop their city from burning

A close examination of the events, including interviews with more than two dozen elected officials, activists, business owners and residents, suggests at least some of the destruction resulted from a breakdown in governance. The mayor and other local leaders, many of them relatively new to their roles, failed to anticipate the intensity of the unrest or put together an effective plan to counter it.

Frey has struggled to regain the confidence of Minneapolis residents. He has been slammed by business owners for not doing enough to protect their property. He has been pilloried by the police for ordering the abandonment of the precinct house. And he's been booed and heckled by activists because he doesn't support their demand to dismantle the police department.

When asked about his handling of the looting and fires, Frey said that in the moment he was faced with a series of impossible choices, all of them bad.

"I hope that in years and decades from now, we can look back at this time of great trauma and turmoil and recognize it as the moment where we rose up, united in purpose and finally created the change that we all envision," Frey said.

And he stressed the unprecedented nature of the crisis - three nights of rioting in the midst of a pandemic. "There is no playbook for this," he said.

The day after George Floyd died on Memorial Day, Frey announced that all four officers involved had been fired. He also called for criminal charges to be filed.

"Whatever the investigation reveals, it does not change the simple truth that he should be with us this morning," Frey said of Floyd in emotional remarks early Tuesday morning, standing next to the police chief, Medaria Arradondo. "Being Black in America should not be a death sentence."

His swift, unequivocal statement won praise from activists and even some seasoned politicians. But others said the move dangerously alienated rank-and-file officers.

"Once Frey comes out and basically sides with the protesters, he has sent the signal that the police are on their own," said Lawrence Jacobs, professor of public policy at the University of Minnesota. "If you are going to say something like that, you have to have a plan for what is going to happen, because you have now inflamed both sides of the issue."

Elected 2½ years earlier, at age 36, Frey had promised to remake the city's public image after years of negative news stories about high-profile police killings. His meteoric rise in Minnesota politics stemmed from his ability to talk the language of social justice while at the same time wooing the business community with his charisma.

"I'm disgusted that Minneapolis is in the spotlight for all the wrong reasons," he said in a campaign ad in 2017. "Police shootings. Intolerance and inequality."

His victory over his predecessor, Betsy Hodges, was all the more extraordinary, given his relatively recent ties to the city. A Northern Virginia native who was a professional runner for years, Frey fell in love with Minneapolis after he ran a marathon there. He earned a law degree and took a job with a white-shoe law firm in the city in 2009. Four years later, he ran for City Council and won.

Two years later, a 24-year-old Black man named Jamar Clark was shot in the head after police responded to a call about a domestic dispute. Activists camped out in the vestibule of the 4th Police Precinct for days. Mayor Hodges personally showed up there to broker a solution, and the 18-day occupation ended without a riot.

'They have lost control': How Minneapolis leaders failed to stop their city from burning

"All we kept saying is 'Our goal is to not have the city burn,'" said Carla Kjellberg, an informal adviser to Hodges at the time.

Nekima Levy Armstrong, a civil rights attorney who helped organize that police protest as well as the one for George Floyd, said that she warned city leaders in 2015 that she had personally encountered people who were ready to burn down the police precinct house.

"If we do not rein in the police department and address the economic inequalities, we were poised to become the next Ferguson," Levy Armstrong said she told the City Council at the time, referring to the Missouri city that had been the site of riots. "This is a combustible situation."

The day after George Floyd died at 38th Street and Chicago Avenue, protesters marched from the place where he gasped under a police officer's knee to the 3rd Precinct, on Lake Street, where they believed the officer worked.

They rallied peacefully on the steps with a megaphone and signs. Then, as night closed in, they started wandering home. But a rowdy group peeled away, spray-painting graffiti on the police precinct wall. Someone smashed the window of an empty police cruiser. "This is not OK," a young female protester can be overheard saying on a video later posted to Facebook. A scuffle broke out. "Everybody go home," someone screamed.

Three miles away, at City Hall, Frey, was receiving calls from worried local leaders. He assured them everything was under control.

"I'm hearing it's not that bad," he told a city council member over the phone.

Jeremiah Ellison, a newly elected city council member who had participated in the 2015 protest against police, advised the mayor to leave the vandals alone.

"The focus of anger is the police and this building," Ellison reasoned. "If we let the crowd do its thing, we might spare neighborhood."

But Frey did not intervene to stop police officers from moving in and firing tear gas and flash grenades.

The next day, hundreds of angry protesters gathered once again outside the precinct house, facing off against lines of officers who occasionally fired tear gas and rubber bullets. Nearby, a white man, who wore a gas mask and carried an umbrella, began calmly breaking the windows at an AutoZone with a hammer. Within hours, the AutoZone went up in flames.

That night, the mayor asked for the Minnesota National Guard to help the city. He left the police to handle the details of the deployment since he believed they had the right expertise.

Assistant Chief Mike Kjos acknowledged "some confusion" over the level of detail required.

"It was a rapidly evolving situation," he said. "We thought we could put a request in and while the people are arriving, we could be formulating what to do."

'They have lost control': How Minneapolis leaders failed to stop their city from burning

In addition, city leaders did not understand how much time it can take for the citizen soldiers of the National Guard to leave their normal jobs, report for duty, collect their gear, and travel to Minneapolis.

"We expected them to be on site right then and there," said Alondra Cano, a City Council member, who participated in a "prosecute the police" campaign in college and now heads the council's public safety committee. Like Frey, the vast majority of Minneapolis City Council members are relatively new to governing. Five took office in 2018; another five in 2014, including Cano.

As Wednesday night wore on, buildings up and down Lake Street burst into flame.

"This whole neighborhood could burn down tonight," Jamie Schwesnedl, co-owner of Moon Palace Books, a bookstore near the police precinct house, remembered thinking as he spent the night on his roof watching buildings around him burn. "I just can't believe that the city hasn't anticipated this or responded to it in any kind of proactive way."

Schwesnedl, who has long believed that the police caused more problems than they fixed, said city leaders should not have been caught off guard by the level of fury.

"It was clear to me on Tuesday morning that this was a big deal," he said. "This wasn't just people were going to come out and protest on Tuesday and go home. This is, people are furious and traumatized and unemployed and they have been inside for 2½ months."

Firefighters wanted police escorts to protect them from rioters as they battled the flames, and so they held back. Residents did what they could with garden hoses.

As the sun came up on Thursday morning, many in the city hoped that the worst had passed. But later that day, as peaceful protests continued elsewhere, an angry crowd gathered once again outside the police precinct house.

That afternoon, Hennepin County Attorney Mike Freeman said his office needed more time to investigate before charging officers for Floyd's death. Frey decided to pull officers off the street outside the 3rd Precinct building in a bid to de-escalate tension. But it had the opposite effect, according to Patricia Torres Ray, a state senator from Minneapolis who represents the district, a racially diverse area that has seen increased development in recent years. Looters broke into the liquor store across the street from the police precinct house and handed out bottles to the crowd.

"People were getting drunk," she recalled. "The mayor told me that he had this under control," she said of her brief phone conversation earlier in the day with Frey, who had yet to visit the embattled police precinct. As night fell, smoke began to billow from more buildings. Torres Ray panicked. She called the governor and begged him to intervene.

"I need help. My district is burning," she said she told Walz. "I do not see the plan of the city to address it. His answer was, 'Senator, I am on my way.'"

Walz was surprised that the city had still not given state officials details on what the National Guard should do.

"I don't know what the plan is and absolutely I'm not going to wait for the city to tell me what the plan was," he said. "I thought, 'They have lost control.'"

'They have lost control': How Minneapolis leaders failed to stop their city from burning

A few hundred soldiers with the National Guard, along with members of the State Patrol, arrived in Minneapolis late Thursday night. But they didn't go to the police precinct. Instead, the Minneapolis Police Department had asked them to escort firetrucks, and to protect the Federal Reserve and Nicollet Mall in downtown.

But things were spinning out of control in the neighborhood around the precinct house. Nearly every building around it had been vandalized, looted or set on fire. Neighbors banded together to protect their own property, since 911 dispatchers were overwhelmed. "Do not put yourself at risk to protect our store," Schwesnedl posted on the Facebook page of Moon Palace Books. "Your life is priceless, just like George Floyd's."

At about 10 that evening, a few hours after Frey appealed for calm on Rachel Maddow's show on MSNBC, the crowd outside the police precinct house breached the doors. Faced with the possibility of hand-to-hand combat, the mayor gave orders to evacuate the building.

"We were faced with these fail fail fail options," Frey said. "We were literally having to choose between preventing additional looting, protecting a precinct and providing escorts to firefighters to put out fires. There was no way we could do all three."

Officers left the compound in a phalanx of police vehicles. The crowd cheered and set the building on fire. A horrified Walz took charge of the effort to restore order in the city. Hours later, the National Guard arrived.

In the weeks since the police precinct burned down, at least three men, ages 22, 23 and 26, who were unfamiliar to protest organizers have been arrested and charged with aiding and abetting arson.

Frey, who once campaigned on the idea of putting the city in the news for the right reasons, is vowing to rebuild what was destroyed and put something better - and more equitable - in its place.

"I think we are turning a page," he said.

Those affected by the fires are tallying what was lost and trying to move forward. Town Talk Diner, which had fed the neighborhood since 1946, so long that its iconic teal sign had been added to the list of historic landmarks, was first looted that Wednesday night, then burned to the ground Thursday night.

"Unthinkable and surreal," Kacey White and Charles Stotts, the husband-and-wife team who own the restaurant wrote on Facebook. "Brought down by a mighty blaze, the old bright sign illuminated for the final time, in the wee hours, from the flames that surrounded her."

The headquarters of Migizi, a nonprofit that runs programs for Native American teens, was destroyed by fire just one year after the group raised $1.6 million to purchase and renovate it. "It hurts to see hard work, dreams and spirit - yes spirit - go up in flames," the staff wrote in a statement. "We will rebuild!"

But the owner of the factory, 7-Sigma, which employed 50 people, announced that the company was moving away because city leaders failed to protect the plant. The company's Facebook page has been inundated with offers from around the country to welcome the new factory. "Rebuild in Dickinson ND," one wrote, promising that businesses there were protected, not burned down.

Schwesnedl, of Moon Palace Books, intends to keep his business in the neighborhood, although he admits that area looks "a little bit like Dresden," the German city flattened during World War II.

'They have lost control': How Minneapolis leaders failed to stop their city from burning

Of the mayor, Schwesnedl said he keeps hearing him talk about feelings.

"I think it's really good to have someone in public leadership talk about feelings, but we also need him to talk about policy," he said. "I wouldn't want to have his job right now."

Repair, remodel and relocate: How three University Avenue businesses are still recovering from unrest AP Interview: Heat's Leonard stands for anthem, explains why Dumba kneels, NHL puts focus on Black Lives Matter Portland, Oregon, protests relatively calm after US drawdown Sorting through 'humongous haystack' of evidence, St. Paul police working to ID people who damaged businesses, looted them

Graphic

The sun shines over the shell of the IOOF Building at Lake St. and 27th Ave. E. in Minneapolis Saturday, May 30, 2020 as volunteers converge on the area to clean up after another night of violent protests and looting. Fires burned unchecked and thousands protesting the police killing of George Floyd ignored a curfew as unrest overwhelmed authorities for another night in Minneapolis. The governor acknowledged Saturday that he didn't have enough manpower to contain the chaos. (John Autey / Pioneer Press)

FILE - In this May 28, 2020, file photo, Minneapolis Police Chief Medaria Arradondo, center, listens as Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey becomes emotional during a news conference in Minneapolis, Minn. George Floyd's death and the protests it ignited nationwide over racial injustice and police brutality have raised questions about whether Arradondo - or any chief - can fix a department that's now facing a civil rights investigation. (Elizabeth Flores/Star Tribune via AP, File)

The Auto Zone store at Minnehaha Avenue and Lake Street in Minneapolis burns early Thursday, May 28, 2020, as protests continue over the death of George Floyd on Monday in police custody. (Nick Woltman / Pioneer Press)

Burnt vehicles remain in a parking lot along East Lake Street after they were destroyed in a protest two days prior, Tuesday, June 2, 2020, in Minneapolis. Protests continued following the death of George Floyd, who died after being restrained by Minneapolis police officers on May 25. (AP Photo/John Minchillo)

A former Sears building, now known as the Midtown Market place, stands behind Chicago Avenue buildings destroyed in a fire from riots Sunday May 31, 2020, in Minneapolis. Outrage following the death of George Floyd, who died after being restrained by Minneapolis police officers on May 25, has led to the burning of businesses along the Lake Street corridor where immigrants have found success. (AP Photo/Bebeto Matthews)

Charles Stotts and wife Kacey White, owners of Town Talk Diner on Lake Street in Minneapolis, watch as water pours out of the restaurant on Thursday, May 28, 2020. The building had been looted the night before. "We have our whole lives tied into this restaurant," said Stotts. (Andy Rathbun / Pioneer Press)

'They have lost control': How Minneapolis leaders failed to stop their city from burning

Load-Date: August 2, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MLXXVI. IN TROUBLED TIMES: INDEPENDENCE DAY IN A LAND OF CONFUSION

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 4, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1390 wordsByline: Ted AnthonyHighlight: It was the worst of times. It was the weirdest of times.Body

It was the worst of times. It was the weirdest of times.

It was a season of sickness and shouting, of defiance and tension, of industrial-strength falsehood and spin. It was a moment of ugliness and deep injustice - and perhaps, too, a moment when the chance for justice felt nearer than ever before.

On Independence Day, we Americans - if there is in fact a "we" in American life - celebrate the anniversary of a time when a lot of people, feeling really angry and scared, decided to do something about it that changed the world forever. This year, we mark that event at a time when a lot of people are feeling really angry and scared. Some of them are trying to do something about it, hoping it will change the world forever.

COVID-19 resurgent in 40 of 50 states. The death of George Floyd, the fight for racial justice, and the reactions against it. The fractious politics of masks. A national conversation - loud, enraged and anguished - about the place that a history blemished by ugliness should hold in the present. An uneven president embraced by millions and despised by millions. And superimposed over it all: a sure-to-be-chaotic election season that has only just begun.

Irritable, overstressed, buffeted by invisible forces and just plain worn out, the United States of America on its 244th birthday is a land of confusion.

"At this moment, we are a country profoundly at odds with our own history. We're seething," says historian Ted Widmer, author of "Lincoln on the Verge," which chronicles the 16th president's journey to his 1861 inauguration weeks before the Civil War began.

"There's this feeling that there are multiple versions of a country that is really supposed to be one country," Widmer says. "People are finding it hard to figure out which America is going to survive over the other one."

In troubled times: Independence Day in a land of confusion

"Future historians will be asked which quarter of 2020 they specialize in." - tweet from author David Burr Gerard a few weeks ago.

"There is too much news," read the subject line last week in an email newsletter from the Columbia Journalism Review, which happens to cover the news business.

This is not the kind of remark you'd usually hear from that particular publication. But it's one of the few things most Americans could agree on these days - that the news, so far in 2020, is overwhelming. And this weekend is only the halfway point of a year many Americans would love to return for a refund.

This past week, the Pew Research Center found only 12% of Americans satisfied with the way things are going in their country - down from 31% in April, which was already a month into the coronavirus pandemic. The poll was conducted June 16-22 among 4,708 adults, three-quarters of them registered voters.

But how is that related to the dissonance, as Widmer says, among the differing versions of the American narrative?

This country has always contained multiple versions of itself. That's part of what's held it together - "e pluribus unum," or "out of many, one" - but also part of what's driving today's unraveling. One group's story of America - a story of triumph and exceptionalism and always prevailing - is very different from that of others, which include narratives of abuse, subjugation and systemic slavery.

That's not new. But many things make this particular Fourth of July different.

It comes after millions of Americans have been forced to marinate in their own juices for months, stuck at home, in some cases losing their jobs, being economically stressed, fearing a horrifying death, feeling both trapped and unable to access the "normal" life they remember.

"The ordinary flow of daily life - all of that has been disrupted. Every day looks more similar than it did before," says Jennifer Talarico, a psychology professor at Lafayette College in Pennsylvania who researches the role of emotion in how people remember events.

The weirdness, she suspects, also reflects the new ways we possess to share and amplify things at lightning speed: Could more sources of information - social media - be intensifying things? Could we be feeling more because we're stuck inside with our screens for company?

Wherever it's coming from, there's lots of it to think about. Eruptions that would have claimed days of oxygen a few years back are now just part of the background noise.

Like the notion that the nationwide Black Lives Matter movement would be riffed off, in Texas, by an anti-closure protest by tavern owners with signs saying that "bar lives matter." Like the made-for-TV image of a Missouri husband and wife (he in a tucked-in pink polo shirt) brandishing weapons at protesters in their gated community - and setting off a brief, meme-filled national debate.

Like Vanilla Ice, of all people, scheduling, then canceling, an Independence Day weekend concert in the middle of Austin, capital of Texas, which has some of the highest coronavirus numbers in the land.

In troubled times: Independence Day in a land of confusion

Like the people who still insist that the entire virus saga - all 129,000-plus American deaths of it - is a conspiracy-driven hoax. And like the college students in Alabama who threw "COVID parties" to see who'd get the virus first.

Is it any wonder that this is the year Mike Judge has decided to bring back "Beavis and Butt-head"?

"If you think it's hard to breathe with a mask on! Try breathing while you're in a chokehold!" - tweet from comedian D.L. Hughley last weekend.

On a holiday that celebrates the dawn of the United States, recent weeks' protests hint at an important question: How do you grill burgers and set off flag-colored fireworks but not engage with the actual racial history of the nation and its birth?

There are those who say: Put it aside for the day and just celebrate what the country means - American ideals of equality. But an increasing number of voices are insisting that the discussion has been put aside for far too long.

To Fred L. Johnson III, a U.S. historian at Hope College in Michigan who studies slavery, race and the Civil War, the notion of marking Independence Day without digging into what it means - including the compromises the founders made to appease the pro-slavery South - is ludicrous.

"The very things they were complaining that the British were doing to them, they were doing the same thing - oppression - to Black people early on," he says.

"Being an American citizen is like having a relationship," Johnson says. "If all you can do is accept the good parts of the relationship and can't deal with the hard stuff, I question the sincerity of your relationship. We need to look at the warts, the dark spots and all."

Repair, remodel and relocate: How three University Avenue businesses are still recovering from unrest AP Interview: Heat's Leonard stands for anthem, explains why Dumba kneels, NHL puts focus on Black Lives Matter Portland, Oregon, protests relatively calm after US drawdown Sorting through 'humongous haystack' of evidence, St. Paul police working to ID people who damaged businesses, looted them

No one would question whether American life on this Independence Day - after the dawn of coronavirus, after the ascent of a nationwide movement, at the cusp of a volatile election - is different from the previous one. Many are dead. Many more are confused. Many are deeply angry at each other and at the system. Many are terrified. Many have simply had enough.

On the national birthday, bang and whimper are fighting it out as never before. The country, collectively, is a driver without a map.

"When you can't make sense of what's going on in the world, life feels pretty meaningless," says Daryl Van Tongeren, co-author of "The Courage to Suffer: A New Clinical Framework for Life's Greatest Crises."

In troubled times: Independence Day in a land of confusion

"This holiday extols our way of life," he says. "This is absolutely an emphasis of the exact American values which are under question, and are under question because they're not holding up to reality. The curtain's been pulled back. And people feel like a lot of this is not working anymore."

That might explain a meme circulating among weary Americans in the past few days. "Dear July," it says, "I don't want any trouble from you. Just come in, sit down, don't touch anything and keep your mouth shut."

Ted Anthony, director of digital innovation for The Associated Press, has been writing about American culture since 1990. Follow him on Twitter at <http://twitter.com/anthonyted>

Load-Date: August 2, 2020

End of Document

Letters: Hoping the St. Paul school board will reconsider its erroneous decision on school resource officers

ARTICLE MLXXVII. LETTERS: HOPING THE ST. PAUL SCHOOL BOARD WILL RECONSIDER ITS ERRONEOUS DECISION ON SCHOOL RESOURCE OFFICERS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 4, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 719 words

Byline: Letter Writers

Highlight: This erroneous decision I am disappointed in the Saint Paul School Board's decision to end the contract with the Saint Paul Police Department for School Resource Officers as reported by Josh Verges in your June 24 edition. I believe the decision is based on a misreading of political signals. First, they failed to recognize that [...]

Body

I am disappointed in the Saint Paul School Board's decision to end the contract with the Saint Paul Police Department for School Resource Officers as reported by Josh Verges in your June 24 edition. I believe the decision is based on a misreading of political signals.

First, they failed to recognize that the Saint Paul Police Department is exceptional. It is not a run-of-the-mill department. By lumping all Police Departments together and stereotyping them they are doing a disservice to their students. Judging from Board Member Allen's quote they appear to equate the presence of an officer with an increase in trauma. To the contrary, having a friendly officer nearby allows the students to relax a bit about the safety of their environment.

Second, they are ignoring the input of their pupils and the principals of their schools. Ninety-six percent of St. Paul High School juniors said last year that it was a "good idea" to have an officer present in the school. Principals of the seven high schools with officers assigned also support the program.

Third, following the lead of districts like Winona and Minneapolis has the priority turned upside down. If anything, Minneapolis could learn a few things by studying the Saint Paul Police Department.

I hope the school board will reconsider this erroneous decision.

David May, Lilydale The writer is a retired Social Service Director for Ramsey County

Letters: Hoping the St. Paul school board will reconsider its erroneous decision on school resource officers

There has been systematic racism and police brutality for decades or centuries. There has been extensive discussion about it, and other issues, for just as long a period. Our elected politicians have been noticeably inactive in addressing the problems during that same period of time.

As a result of the horrendous, unnecessary George Floyd death, and resulting widespread protests, these elected politicians now finally say they understand there is systemic racism, and police brutality. Wow, an epiphany? Why now and not 40 years ago, or before?

We can lay much of the blame on "don't rock the boat" elected politicians. Yet these politicians seem to have avoided taking any responsibility for the decades of any meaningful change and action. Why rock the boat when they want to be in office forever, even through government shutdowns, yet they still got paid?

So if we're to defund anyone or anything, why aren't the elected politicians front and center in the discussion? They have made the laws and look where we are now.

Scooter Thompson, West St. Paul

When Covid-19 first appeared in March we felt quite safe shopping for groceries in the early morning when there was a designated time for seniors. Everyone had a mask and everyone was a senior.

Lately many are not seniors, and many don't have masks on.

I no longer feel the comfort and safety of that designated time frame. Until I can find a grocery store that requires masks and honors the early time for seniors I don't know how we will be able to acquire the necessary items to survive Covid 19.

The young have no memory of polio but I do and also the fear of acquiring it. That fear is back because I believe Covid-19 would be fatal to us if we can't avoid it.

Tom Kapsner, White Bear Lake

My parents' generation is called the "greatest generation" for a reason.

I thought ours would be the "love generation".

It won't be.

Martha Edgar, St. Paul

It's been three weeks since protestors took the law into their own hands and toppled the statue of Columbus near the Minnesota state Capitol. Those responsible are clearly shown committing the crime on video, the law is clear on the destruction of public property, and Gov, Walz and Attorney General Ellison have the responsibility to uphold the law, whether they like it or not.

We used to be a country based on law. To not enforce the law on obvious crimes sends a dangerous message. To allow mob rule makes us no better than a third-world country.

Letters: Hoping the St. Paul school board will reconsider its erroneous decision on school resource officers

Minnesotans deserve better than what state leadership has shown lately.

Robb Jacobs, Stillwater

Letters: I'm guessing most are ambivalent about reopening schools. Here's why I'm in favor. Sainted: Nurse Erin, social worker Katie, docs Teriyaki and Ostenso and many more, you made Dad's life better Letters: Why do so many Democrats behave so badly? Letters: Learn more about why people are protesting Letters: Open the schools. Children need in-person instruction.

Load-Date: August 2, 2020

End of Document

CTC pushes reopening to March 2021

ARTICLE MLXXVIII.

CTC PUSHES REOPENING TO MARCH 2021

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 4, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 360 wordsByline: ROHAN PRESTON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Live stage productions will relaunch with "Annie" and "Seedfolks."Body

The Children's Theatre Company (CTC) has pushed back its live stage productions to March 2021, joining the Guthrie Theater in setting a restart date a year after nearly everything shut down because of the global coronavirus pandemic. Like other companies, the nation's largest theater for youth and families hopes that there will be an effective vaccine by the start of next year.

"The COVID-19 pandemic has had a profound impact on CTC, as we had to suspend and postpone over 160 performances this past spring and summer," artistic director Peter C. Brosius said in a statement. "We've made our plans with a commitment to ensuring the highest safety standards."

The company plans to launch live productions again with a remount of internationally successful "Seedfolks," the stage adaptation of Paul Fleischman's story about a Cleveland neighborhood garden that draws a diverse cast of characters. Actor Sonja Parks played all the roles in a production that toured the United States and also made a splash at a South African theater festival. Brosius will again direct (March 2-April 11, 2021).

The company also plans to revive "Annie," which was initially slated to go up this past April, next April 27-June 27. Peter Rothstein, who had done the show before, was tapped for that remount.

The pandemic, coupled with the racial schisms revealed by the unrest following the killing of George Floyd, has left many grappling with how to address the inequities evident in the community. The theater has commissioned works from such playwrights as Ifa Bayeza, Lloyd Suh and Larissa FastHorse.

"This will also be a time where we will think critically about the disparities in our community and how we can have maximum impact of our mission to educate, challenge and inspire through theater," Brosius said. "We are engaging our partners and examining how our work in the community and with schools should move forward to meet the needs of students and create better outcomes that address the profound challenges emotionally, mentally and educationally of our young people coming out of the multiple traumas of the past several months."

CTC pushes reopening to March 2021

Rohan Preston · 612-673-4390

@rohanpreston

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

End of Document

During the pandemic, voter registrations fell off a cliff in Minnesota

ARTICLE MLXXIX. DURING THE PANDEMIC, VOTER REGISTRATIONS FELL OFF A CLIFF IN MINNESOTA

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 4, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1306 words

Byline: Bill Salisbury

Highlight: As new voter registrations soared early this year, Minnesotans appeared excited about casting ballots in the 2020 elections. But then the COVID-19 pandemic hit, and registrations dropped like a rock. The number of new voters signing up to cast ballots plunged from 25,618 in March to 3,543 in June - an 86 percent dive, the [...]

Body

As new voter registrations soared early this year, Minnesotans appeared excited about casting ballots in the 2020 elections.

But then the COVID-19 pandemic hit, and registrations dropped like a rock.

The number of new voters signing up to cast ballots plunged from 25,618 in March to 3,543 in June - an 86 percent dive, the state's elections director, David Maeda, said this week.

The March number may be "a little bit inflated" because Minnesota held its first presidential primary election since 1956 on March 3, and several thousand citizens registered to vote at the polls.

From January through March of this year, registrations were well ahead of the pace in 2016, the last presidential election year. It looked like Minnesota might be on course for a record turnout for the Nov. 3 general election.

But registering to vote started to fall off in mid-March after the first COVID-19 cases were confirmed in Minnesota and the state started closing schools, libraries and most government buildings and enforcing stay-at-home orders, social distancing requirements and bans on large public gatherings. That meant the most popular options for signing up voters were virtually shut down.

Door-knocking campaigns ended, there were no public events available for setting up voter registration tables, and citizens couldn't drop off registration forms at closed city and county election offices. One of the most popular opportunities for signing up voters is when they apply for or renew their driver's licenses, Maeda said, but those offices also were shuttered.

During the pandemic, voter registrations fell off a cliff in Minnesota

Minnesota's decline in voter registrations mirrored other states. The nonpartisan Center for Election Innovation and Research last month reported that the number of new voters registered in 13 states it surveyed in April dropped by more than 70 percent compared with April 2016.

In some other states, groups reported increasing voter registration amid protests in response to the murder of George Floyd in Minneapolis in late May. That growth hasn't appeared in Minnesota - at least not yet.

CHANGING APPROACH

It's too early to predict what the pandemic's long-term impact on voter registration will be. But drives to sign up new voters likely will change.

The League of Women Voters of Minnesota, which has conducted in-person voter registration drives for years, is struggling to devise new ways to contact potential new voters, said Nick Harper, the League's civic engagement director.

It had planned to have volunteers fan out to high schools across the state this spring to register the graduating seniors to vote, but those public events were canceled. "There isn't another good way to contact those young people," Harper said.

Libraries and other public locations where League members have set up voter registration tables were closed, and community events were called off. In addition, Harper said, the organization's leaders were concerned about putting volunteers at risk of being exposed to the virus.

Despite those obstacles, the League will find ways to continue registering new voters this year, he said. For example, some local chapters are contacting churches and homeless shelters to arrange sign-up opportunities.

Minnesota allows voters to register online. That option is available at mnvotes.sos.mn.us.

Eligible citizens also may register at the polls on primary Election Day Aug. 11 or general Election Day Nov. 3.

But Maeda encourages people to register before then. Registering at the polls "takes more time," he said, "and a lot of the focus in our office is making sure when we get to November, the polling places are safe for people to vote in. If we have a lot of people that need to Election Day register, that's going to create longer lines, which we want to avoid."

SEEKING POTENTIAL VOTERS

There are signs suggesting Minnesotans are eager to vote this year. The first, he said, was the surprisingly large 21 percent turnout - more than 850,000 voters - for the March 3 presidential primary.

Another sign of voter interest is the number of people who have applied for absentee ballots. "It's astronomically higher than we've ever seen," Maeda said - 207,835 applications so far this year compared with 7,939 in all of 2018 and 8,964 in 2016.

Plenty of folks will be searching for "eligible but unregistered" voters - or EBUs - for the next four months.

During the pandemic, voter registrations fell off a cliff in Minnesota

The Minnesota Secretary of State's office has the nonpartisan Electronic Registration and Information Center send monthly mailings to those EBUs in the state, Maeda said. Since 2014, the office has done 1.7 million such mailings in the state, and more than 880,000 recipients have registered to vote.

The Washington, D.C.-based, nonpartisan Voter Participation Center and its partner, the Center for Voter Information, are joining the hunt for EBUs. They are mailing voter registration applications to more than 800,000 Minnesotans this month as part of their largest-ever campaign to register new voters.

More than a million Minnesotans are eligible to vote but haven't registered, the organization said in a statement. Two-thirds of them are young people, people of color and unmarried women - groups that often move between elections and register and vote at lower rates than the rest of the population.

The Voter Participation Center wants to get these "historically disadvantaged communities" to exercise their right to vote in order to "strengthen our democracy," Page Gardner, the group's founder and board chair, said.

PARTIES DEAL WITH VIRUS

With social distancing rules preventing them from implementing their traditional door-knocking campaigns to register voters, the Minnesota Democratic-Farmer-Labor and Republican parties are resorting to alternative tactics to sign up supporters to vote.

In 2016, President Donald Trump came within a whisker of becoming the first Republican to carry Minnesota since 1972. Convinced that he can win it this year, he and the Republican Party started organizing their state operations in late 2016 and now have offices, paid staff and volunteer networks throughout Minnesota conducting what they say is the party's largest ground operation ever.

"We are leaving no stone unturned. Our goal is to register as many voters as we need to flip Minnesota for President Trump in November," said Republican National Committee spokesperson Preya Samsundar.

The coordinated national, state and local GOP campaigns are hosting video conferences with and letter-writing campaigns to unregistered voters, hosting "MAGA meetings" and small group gatherings and have created an online voter registration site. While many GOP candidates are making public appearances without wearing masks, a party operative said volunteers and field staff are using masks, hand sanitizers and practicing social distancing as they slowly transition to traditional door-knocking to register voters.

To avoid spreading COVID-19, state DFL Chairman Ken Martin said his party's staff and volunteers have stopped virtually all in-person voter registration efforts and instead are contacting EBUs by phone, text messages and other digital tools. "So far, we haven't seen any slow down in registering new voters," he said.

Ivanka Trump visits Duluth outdoor gear maker; mining protesters gather The party is exceeding its voter-contact goals and is getting positive feedback from voters who want to engage in conversations and volunteer to work on campaigns, he said. "Despite the fact that we're not at the door, we haven't lost a step along the way."

EBUs also will be targets for national voter-registration groups, such as Rock the Vote, an online organization that has been promoting voter registration to young people for over 20 years, and Facebook, which announced this week that is launching the "largest voter information campaign in U.S. history" with a goal of registering 4 million voters before November.

During the pandemic, voter registrations fell off a cliff in Minnesota

Load-Date: August 2, 2020

End of Document

STREETSCAPES

ARTICLE MLXXX. STREETSCAPES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 4, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 1019 wordsByline: LARRY MILLETT, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The making of a mall // Now Minnesota's "front porch," the Capitol Mall was home to mix of Victorian dwellings.

Body

Special to the Star Tribune

The Minnesota State Capitol Mall in St. Paul has been a busy place in recent weeks, site of numerous protests in the wake of the killing of George Floyd. These protests have served to underscore the mall's importance as the state's "front porch," where Minnesotans can gather to exercise their democratic rights.

With its broad green expanse dotted by statues, monuments and memorials, the mall is such a familiar place that it's hard to realize it wasn't always part of the Capitol complex.

Cass Gilbert's white marble palace opened in 1905, but the mall wasn't completed until 50 years later, and it required a huge clearance project.

The mall, one of St. Paul's many graveyards of Victorian architecture, was carved out just a few years before Minneapolis began its enormous Gateway Urban Renewal Project. The Gateway project has garnered plenty of attention from historians over the years, and I'll plead guilty to adding my fair share of words to that endeavor. But relatively little has been written about how the Capitol Mall transformed a big chunk of St. Paul at almost the same time.

When the Capitol opened in 1905, it was fronted by a small, irregularly shaped patch of green space set amid a tangle of streets. Just beyond this rather measly space was a largely residential neighborhood crisscrossed with streets that offered an array of housing built between the 1870s and early 1900s.

Single-family houses, row houses, double houses, apartment buildings and even a few mansions were included in the mix. There were also some small commercial buildings, several bars and diners, and a pair of historic churches.

STREETSCAPES

As time went on, this aging neighborhood came to be viewed, in the words of one newspaper writer, as "a screen of ugliness" detracting from the Capitol's magnificence. Over the years Gilbert and others had advanced a variety of monumental schemes to create a more suitable foreground for the Capitol, but it wasn't until 1945 that plans for the present mall began to take shape.

Funded by a $2 million state appropriation, the mall was designed to provide a grand setting for the Capitol and for several new state buildings to be constructed in the 1950s. At the same time, plans were underway for what became I-94, which eventually swept past the southern end of the mall, requiring the destruction of numerous structures for its right of way.

Once all the plans were in place, more than 100 homes and buildings were condemned and then demolished. In less than five years, the old neighborhood south of the Capitol was completely gone.

A few years later, the old residential buildings around Central Park just to the southeast of the Capitol were also cleared to make room for the Centennial Office Building.

Although the lost Capitol neighborhood was no Summit Avenue, it did include some fine houses, intermixed with quite a few seedy buildings ripe for demolition. The area was in fact regarded by the city as little better than a slum, although photos taken in the early 1950s show that many of the properties were far from decrepit.

Much of the housing was along two short streets, Tilton and Central Terrace (also known as Dexter), which were wiped out by the mall. Other residences were on sections of Central, Iglehart and Summit avenues, which once ran in front of the Capitol. Still others were on streets - including Cedar, Wabasha and Rice - that remain near the Capitol but have been scoured of all of their historic homes as well as their old commercial structures.

Fortunately, there's a visual record of many of these lost properties, the bulk of which were demolished between 1952 and 1955. Before they were condemned and taken by the state, the properties were professionally photographed. Scores of these images are now in the collections of the Ramsey County Historical Society and have been posted on the society's excellent website, rchs.com.

Some of the largest and most elaborate of the condemned houses were on Tilton, a two-block street that ran from Wabasha to Rice streets along what is now the southern part of the mall.

Tilton's lineup included several big Queen Anne-style houses, most of which ended their days as rooming houses. Perhaps the most impressive of the lot, at 63 Tilton, was a tall, multi-gabled house with incised ornament built in 1887 and torn down in 1953. The house's crisp interplay of forms suggests it was designed by an architect. Next door at 69 Tilton was another Queen Anne beauty, built in 1889, which featured a tower and a distinctive curved pediment atop its steep front gable.

Another impressive specimen was a brick row house, in the Romanesque Revival style, at 117-125 Iglehart Av. (just west of Rice Street in what is today the right of way of I-94). Built in 1890 and torn down in 1955, the row house originally had five units, and judging by its level of finish it was intended for a well-to-do clientele. Like other row houses in the area, it was later subdivided into apartments.

Double houses were also common throughout the neighborhood. Among the most interesting was a high-roofed, Gothic Revival-style double house at 576 Cedar St. (near today's 12th Street). It was probably built in the 1870s, as was a small house next door at 580 Cedar. A wonderful photograph taken in 1950 shows a man sitting in the house's tiny front yard, perhaps ready to observe the impending destruction of his neighborhood.

STREETSCAPES

The loss of the old Capitol neighborhood was probably inevitable given the longstanding push to create a mall and to expand the footprint of state government with new buildings.

The construction of I-94 (which, in a better world, would have been routed north of the Capitol) also doomed a big swath of the neighborhood as well as much of the historic Rondo Avenue district to the west.

I've never been an admirer of the mall, which has always struck me as too big for its own good. But for better or worse, it's now deeply integrated into the fabric of St. Paul, and the city would feel very different without it.

Larry Millett is an architecture critic and author. He can be reached at larrymillett.com.

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

ARTICLE MLXXXI. FACEBOOK GROUPS PIVOT TO ATTACKS ON BLACK LIVES MATTER

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 5, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 892 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: CHICAGO (AP) - A loose network of Facebook groups that took root across the country in April to organize protests over coronavirus stay-at-home orders has become a hub of misinformation and conspiracy theories that have pivoted to a variety of new targets. Their latest: Black Lives Matter and the nationwide protests of racial injustice.Body

By AMANDA SEITZ

CHICAGO (AP) - A loose network of Facebook groups that took root across the country in April to organize protests over coronavirus stay-at-home orders has become a hub of misinformation and conspiracy theories that have pivoted to a variety of new targets. Their latest: Black Lives Matter and the nationwide protests of racial injustice.

These groups, which now boast a collective audience of more than 1 million members, are still thriving after most states started lifting virus restrictions.

And many have expanded their focus.

One group transformed itself last month from "Reopen California" to "California Patriots Pro Law & Order," with recent posts mocking Black Lives Matter or changing the slogan to "White Lives Matter." Members have used profane slurs to refer to Black people and protesters, calling them "animals," "racist" and "thugs"- a direct violation of Facebook's hate speech standards.

Others have become gathering grounds for promoting conspiracy theories about the protests, suggesting protesters were paid to go to demonstrations and that even the death of George Floyd, an unarmed Black man who died in the custody of Minneapolis police, was staged.

An Associated Press review of the most recent posts in 40 of these Facebook groups - most of which were launched by conservative groups or pro-gun activists - found the conversations largely shifted last month to attacking the nationwide protests over the killing of Black men and women after Floyd's death.

Facebook users in some of these groups post hundreds of times a day in threads often seen by members only and shielded from public view.

Facebook groups pivot to attacks on Black Lives Matter

"Unless Facebook is actively looking for disinformation in those spaces, they will go unnoticed for a long time and they will grow," said Joan Donovan, the research director at the Harvard Kennedy School's Shorenstein Center on Media, Politics, and Public Policy. "Over time, people will drag other people into them and they will continue to organize."

Facebook said it is aware of the collection of reopen groups, and is using technology as well as relying on users to identify problematic posts. The company has vowed in the past to look for material that violates its rules in private groups as well as in public places on its site. But the platform has not always been able to deliver on that promise.

Shortly after the groups were formed, they were rife with coronavirus misinformation and conspiracy theories, including assertions that masks are "useless," the U.S. government intends to forcibly vaccinate people and that COVID-19 is a hoax intended to hurt President Donald Trump's re-election chances this fall.

Posts in these private groups are less likely to be scrutinized by Facebook or its independent fact-checkers, said Donovan. Facebook enlists media outlets around the world, including The Associated Press, to fact check claims on its site. Members in these private groups have created an echo chamber and tend to agree with the posts, so are therefore less likely to flag them for Facebook or fact-checkers to review, Donovan added.

At least one Facebook group, ReOpen PA, asked its 105,000 members to keep the conversation focused on reopening businesses and schools in Pennsylvania, and implemented rules to forbid posts about the racial justice protests as well as conspiracy theories about the efficacy of masks.

But most others have not moderated their pages as closely.

For example, some groups in New Jersey, Texas and Ohio have labeled systemic racism a hoax. A member of the California Facebook group posted a widely debunked flyer that says "White men, women and children, you are the enemy," which was falsely attributed to Black Lives Matter. Another falsely claimed that a Black man was brandishing a gun outside the St. Louis mansion where a white couple confronted protesters with firearms. Dozens of users in several of the groups have pushed an unsubstantiated theory that liberal billionaire George Soros is paying crowds to attend racial justice protests.

Facebook members in two groups - Wisconsinites Against Excessive Quarantine and Ohioans Against Excessive Quarantine - also regularly refer to protesters as "animals," "thugs," or "paid" looters.

In the Ohio group, one user wrote on May 31: "The focus is shifted from the voice of free people rising up against tyranny ... to lawless thugs from a well known racist group causing violence and upheaval of lives."

Those two pages are part of a network of groups in Ohio, Wisconsin, Minnesota, New York and Pennsylvania created by conservative activist Ben Dorr, who has for years raised money to lobby on hot-button conservative issues like abortion or gun rights. Their latest cause - pushing for governors to reopen their states - has attracted hundreds of thousands of followers in the private Facebook groups they launched.

Facebook groups pivot to attacks on Black Lives Matter

Private groups that balloon to that size, with little oversight, are like "creepy basements" where extremist views and misinformation can lurk, said disinformation researcher Nina Jankowicz, a fellow at the nonpartisan Wilson Center, a Washington, D.C., think tank.

"It's sort of a way that the platforms are enabling some of the worst actors to stay on it," said Jankowicz. "Rather than being de-platformed - they can organize."

—
Associated Press technology writer Barbara Ortutay in Oakland, California, contributed.

Load-Date: August 3, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MLXXXII. UNPLUGGED INDEFINITELY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 5, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 1580 wordsByline: CHRIS RIEMENSCHNEIDER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: First Ave is at the center of a new national lobbying group as shuttered music venues fight to get through 2020, from the Dakota to the Amsterdam.Body

After earning support from senators like Lindsey Graham and Kamala Harris and such rock stars as Billy Joel and Billie Eilish over the past two months, the owner of First Avenue felt relatively optimistic.

Dayna Frank's virtual meeting with other Minnesota music venue operators, however, added to her despondency.

"Everyone on the call across the board said their break-even point was at least 50 percent capacity, and more like 75 percent," Frank recalled, referring to attendance limits imposed by COVID-19 health guidelines.

"I don't know if any of us can survive long enough for that. Not without help."

Independence Day marks a reckoning of sorts for independent music venue owners in Minnesota and around the country. Soon they'll find out if help is on the way.

As Congress reconvenes after the July 4 holiday break, one of its main orders of business is a fourth stimulus package to spur the U.S. economy through the lingering pandemic. And one of the lobbying groups most prominently vying for tax abatements and relief money is a brand-new one called the National Independent Venues Association (NIVA), which counts the owner of Minneapolis' world-renowned rock hall as its president.

Formed in early April with other club operators in New York and Milwaukee, NIVA's membership now includes a total of more than a thousand clubs and promotions companies from all 50 states. Its 29 other Minnesota members range from the Bluestem Amphitheater in Moorhead and the Minnetonka-based Blue Ox Productions to the Cabooze and Cedar Cultural Center in Minneapolis.

The organization not only launched a social-media campaign under the hashtag #SaveOurStages, it went old school and hired a prominent Capitol Hill lobbying firm. Members of Congress are now being schooled on what a big deal small venues like the Troubadour in Los Angeles or 7th St. Entry in Minneapolis really are.

Among the sales pitches: NIVA claims its members generate $10 billion nationwide annually. Most of that money stays local, too, via taxes, rent, employment and spillover to neighboring businesses.

"We're very community-oriented businesses," said Lowell Pickett of Minneapolis' Dakota jazz club. "The reason we're remaining closed is for the health and safety of our community."

NIVA sent out an April 22 letter to congressional leaders spelling out how bad things are at the moment for its members: "Our businesses were among the first to close as COVID-19 spread across the country, and are also likely to be among the last to reopen," it read.

"The collapse of this crucial element in the music industry's ecosystem would be devastating," read a subsequent letter sent June 18 and signed by more than 600 musicians and comedians, including Willie Nelson, Lady Gaga, Mavis Staples, Coldplay, Eilish and Joel.

Most venue operators have written off the rest of 2020 altogether. So has the concert industry as a whole, with most major tours now rescheduling for the second half of 2021. NIVA claims more than half the venues in its ranks won't see 2020 without support.

It's worth noting, too: The industry was actually doing very well overall up until March.

"We're not asking for help because our business model wasn't working," Frank emphasized, carefully differentiating independently owned music venues from corporate competitors AEG and Live Nation.

The latter company opened the newest in its chain of fancy Fillmore concert halls in Minneapolis just a month before quarantine hit.

"Independents can and are competing under normal circumstances, we just don't have the deep resources they do to weather this," Frank said. "We don't have our own ticketing company. We can't sell $500 million in stock to Saudi Arabia to get by."

Live Nation representatives have not responded to any requests for comment from the Star Tribune in recent months, and plans at the darkened Fillmore remain gray. The company did pledge $10 million in relief to stage and tour crews globally.

Half capacities & bottom lines

Between its growing roster of venues also including the Palace and Fitzgerald theaters, Turf Club and Fine Line - First Avenue Productions was slated to host 28 sold-out shows in April. Among them were a series of concerts to celebrate the namesake club's 50th anniversary in early April, including some unannounced shows by such famous alumni as the Foo Fighters.

Jarret Oulman, co-owner of the Amsterdam Bar & Hall in downtown St. Paul and the 331 Club in northeast Minneapolis, had just made his biggest liquor order of the year - for St. Patrick's Day - before the Amsterdam abruptly shut down in mid-March. He had also just purchased a cool old building over the winter to convert into a small music venue along W. 7th Street in St. Paul.

Unplugged indefinitely

"I'm confident we can eventually bounce back," Oulman said, "but not with the kind of incremental path that we're looking at. If we can only operate at 25 percent capacity, that's just going to put us in a bigger financial hole trying to operate with those limits."

Music venues were given the chance to reopen at 25% capacity in Minnesota's latest COVID-19 guidelines last month. Nearly all of them have stayed closed, though.

The nonprofit Cedar Cultural Center's executive director isn't ruling out reopening before year's end, but he worries about having to raise ticket prices too high to break even - along with many other concerns.

"Hopefully we will do some shows at reduced capacity later this fall," David Hamilton said. "But we have to implement training and safer distancing procedures and document our procedures."

Some venues that double as restaurants or have patio space - which can now operate at 50% capacity in Minnesota - have offered modest live music bookings.

Both the Aster Café and Icehouse in Minneapolis are planning limited music shows starting this month. Crooners, on a spacious lakeside property in Fridley, started up its drive-in concert series last month and is also now hosting a patio music series.

"We're trying new things and pushing the envelope a bit, but it's not out of desperation or charity," Crooners marketing director Beck Lee said. "We just want to be able to turn a profit while keeping everyone safe."

With its downtown location on Nicollet Mall, the Dakota cannot expand outdoors for its music offerings and will likely wait until it's safe to fill the room.

"I just don't see a way out this year," Pickett said.

Not sitting by idly

Closed venues are scratching out modest revenues via a variety of alternate sources.

The Dakota, for instance, sold "virtual e-cards" with musicians singing Father's Day and Mother's Day greetings. It has also promoted gift cards, some sales of which benefited its out-of-work staffers.

First Avenue has been pushing 50th anniversary T-shirts and other merchandise while also touting its Twin Cities Community Trust, a nonprofit fund that has doled out more than $200,000 to unemployed local music venue workers. It's even opening up its doors for small private events, including weddings.

Amid all the uncertainty of the pandemic, the tragedy of George Floyd's death in police officers' hands and the subsequent week of rioting and looting last month became another calamity for Twin Cities venues to face.

Rioting along University Avenue in St. Paul left the Turf Club with months' worth of repairs from looting and water damage. Near the largely ruined E. Lake Street in Minneapolis, the Hexagon Bar was burned to rubble, and the Schooner Tavern sustained extensive fire damage and looting.

The Hook & Ladder Theater - around the corner from the destroyed Third Precinct police headquarters on E. Lake - also got hit by looters and arsonists but survived well enough to begin hosting audience-less virtual concerts at the end of June. Its operators say the neighborhood's destruction has only added to their resolve to survive the pandemic.

"We feel like we have a moral responsibility to fulfill now," executive director Chris Mozena said.

NIVA halted its campaigning in the weeks immediately following the Floyd tragedy out of respect. Many of its members have been supporting Black Lives Matter and other racial justice causes in the meantime.

"We don't want it to sound like our industry needs money before these causes are addressed," said Frank, who has used First Ave's resources to tout numerous BLM-related causes and cut contractual ties with Minneapolis police for security purposes.

Frank said her company "would be throwing all kinds of benefit concerts" for racial justice efforts if it could right now, and pledged to do so post-quarantine. That's alongside the stockpile of dates already on the calendar for next year with concerts postponed from this year.

"There are a lot of reasons to be optimistic about 2021," Frank said. "We just have find a way to get there."

Chris Riemenschneider · 612-673-4658

@ChrisRstrib

NIVA's REQUEST to Congress

Here are some specifics on what the National Independent Venue Association asked for in its April 22 letter:

Modify the federal Payback Protection Program (PPP) to include an increased loan cap, flexible loan forgiveness and delayed payback for one year.

Provide tax relief for tickets refunded for cash, and defer federal taxes until six months after venues return to full capacity.

Offer unemployment insurance for contract workers and artists, along with mortgage and rent abatement and recovery grants.

Aid reopening through a national testing strategy, guidance for large gatherings and assistance to businesses that comply with health guidelines.

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

It's been 4 years since Philando Castile died. His mother thinks about him 'every breathing day.'

ARTICLE MLXXXIII.

IT'S BEEN 4 YEARS SINCE PHILANDO CASTILE DIED. HIS MOTHER THINKS ABOUT HIM 'EVERY BREATHING DAY.'

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 5, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 2556 words

Byline: Sarah Horner

Highlight: It was the first time in the state's recent history that a police officer was charged in a deadly on-duty encounter, though a jury later acquitted him.

Body

It's been nearly four years since a St. Anthony police officer fatally shot Philando Castile as he sat seatbelted next to his girlfriend inside his Oldsmobile, 74 seconds after the officer pulled him over for a broken taillight in Falcon Heights while on their way home from picking up groceries.

Not a day has gone by since that his mother, Valerie Castile, doesn't ache over what happened.

"Every breathing day," she said in a recent interview about how often she thinks about the 32-year-old St. Paul public schools cafeteria supervisor whose death turned the eyes of the country toward Minnesota in the summer of 2016.

It was the first time in the state's recent history that a police officer was charged in a deadly on-duty encounter, though a jury later acquitted him.

Protesters shut down the interstate. A weeklong encampment stood guard in front of the Governor's Residence. A state task force was convened to talk about the troubling and deadly history between law enforcement and Black and brown community members. Local police departments changed policies. "De-escalation training and implicit bias training" became buzz words.

And yet, this past Memorial Day, George Floyd's body went limp while handcuffed on his stomach under the knee of a Minneapolis police officer for nearly eight minutes.

With the world's attention back on Minnesota, this time with intensified outrage and fervor, and the anniversary of Philando Castile's fatal shooting on Monday, the Pioneer Press asked Valerie Castile and a handful of others to reflect on what the community learned from his death - and what still needs to be done.

Valerie Castile believes God gave the community Philando so Minnesota could finally rectify its long history of racism, one that includes the lynchings of three Black men in Duluth and countless stories of people of color mistreated, brutalized and killed by law enforcement.

It's been 4 years since Philando Castile died. His mother thinks about him 'every breathing day.'

"That is the ugly side of the great state of Minnesota," Castile said. "A constant murderous trend from the people who are supposed to protect and serve."

And while Castile's death did mark a turning point for the state in that it taught "the community how to come together to try and come up with solutions," it wasn't enough to turn talk into meaningful change, his mother said.

Now God has given the state and country another chance with Floyd, she said.

"God made the world stand still for George," Castile said. "Nobody is working (because of the coronavirus pandemic). Nobody is going to school. Everybody is on their tablets, on their phone. So everybody got a chance to witness that. With Philando, people were busy working two jobs. Everybody didn't see that. But the ones that did, they were outraged, they were hurt, they were frustrated."

Since then, Valerie Castile has taken part in groups about community and police relations, she's been to countless meetings, she helped create a national toolkit for prosecutors and police on how to better respond to officer-involved shootings. She started the Philando Castile Relief Foundation, which awards scholarships, helps schools erase student lunch debt and offers relief to other families impacted by gun violence.

Still, too little has been accomplished, she says with palpable anger. Diamond Reynolds settles defamation lawsuit against former Rice County sheriff's deputy for 'cocaine' comments St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting 'Hands are what kill.' New traffic stop instructions follow Philando Castile's death

"I've got all these documents that have been created over the last four years ... but don't nobody want to use them," Castile said. "Stop all this talking and let's do something ... because there is no reason to take a human life when someone is running away from you, or strapped in a seatbelt or handcuffed behind their back on the ground."

It feels different since Floyd, she said, noting that everyone is "scrambling" in a way she's never seen before. But she's skeptical that it will amount to anything meaningful.

Valerie Castile is quick to rattle off what other reforms need to happen, starting with changing the statute that she said allows officers like the one who shot Philando Castile - Jeronimo Yanez - to rely too easily on the defense that they were in fear for their life to justify their fatal actions.

Yanez could not be reached for comment.

Castile also wants to see officers forced to get their own insurance so they have "something to lose" when they act recklessly instead of leaving state taxpayers on the hook. And she thinks funding should be taken from police departments, saying they too often use the money to "militarize," though she doesn't believe police departments should be abolished.

She is still haunted by questions about her son's killing, like what would have happened if he had not told the officer he was a licensed gun carrier; by the senselessness of his death; by the outcome of Yanez's trial.

It's been 4 years since Philando Castile died. His mother thinks about him 'every breathing day.'

To keep going, she relies heavily on her faith and the connection she feels with Philando Castile and her ancestors.

"It's nothing that I wanted, but I have been given this torch to fight for our children because, like I said from the beginning, this is not about Philando anymore," she said.

John Thompson found himself catapulted into the spotlight after the death of Philando Castile, his friend and coworker. He quickly became a well-known protester and activist.

Now he's running for a seat in the state legislature.

"I just don't want to yell at them anymore," he said. "There is a time and a place for that, but this is the other side of the bullhorn for me. This is the other protest."

In addition to law enforcement reform and racial justice issues, Thompson hopes to inspire others to run for office, noting that far too many seats are occupied by what he calls WORMS - "white, old, representative men" - who have been uncontested for too long.

Castile's death gave people like him a platform that they didn't have before and helped start mobilizing a movement, Thompson said.

It also taught the community "that it can come together and heal" and push real change, as evidenced in communities such as Falcon Heights, Thompson said. Diamond Reynolds settles defamation lawsuit against former Rice County sheriff's deputy for 'cocaine' comments St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting 'Hands are what kill.' New traffic stop instructions follow Philando Castile's death

That's the spot he points to when asked about tangible change. Not only did the city talk about making changes, it listened to what the community wanted and followed through, he said.

"Everybody was asking me, 'John, what do you want?' " he said. "I told them, 'I want you to get rid of the St. Anthony Police,' " Thompson recalled.

Falcon Heights contracted its police services through the St. Anthony Police department but now uses the Ramsey County sheriff's office.

Thompson says he's watched police and motorist interactions on Larpenteur Avenue - where Castile was shot - from one of his favorite gyro spots along the stretch and sees a detectable difference.

He recalled a recent interaction where he overheard an officer approach a motorist and start the conversation with "Good afternoon."

"He humanized the uniform," Thompson said.

That's not the case in many other places across Minnesota, where Thompson said it still "sucks" to be a Black man.

He agrees with Valerie Castile that there has been far too much talk and not enough action.

"Here we are on the eve of Philando's anniversary and we are dealing with George Floyd," Thompson said. "We could have stopped George Floyd. ... We could have stopped (a lot of these officer-involved fatalities), ... But we have not put the fear of something into these police officers yet so they stop feeling invincible."

It's been 4 years since Philando Castile died. His mother thinks about him 'every breathing day.'

While his department wasn't involved in Philando's death, St. Paul Police Chief Todd Axtell's officers felt the aftershock.

Axtell, who had just become police chief, said it taught him his most valuable lesson to date.

"Now, more than ever in the history of policing, we need to continue to operate with the philosophy of the bank of trust," Axtell said. "Without trust being one of the cornerstones of any police department, you are nothing more than an occupying force."

That means law enforcement officers need to be willing to sit at the table with community members "even when conversations are uncomfortable" and "hard" and "stay engaged and never believe you are the best," Axtell said.

He said he's proud of the changes his department made after Castile's death, many of which are now at the forefront of the national conversation following Floyd's death.

His office released 15 years of traffic stop data at the request of the community, for example, and adopted national recommendations around 21st century policing models. The department also incorporated more than three dozen community recommendations for its revised use-of-force policy and launched a mental health unit. Diamond Reynolds settles defamation lawsuit against former Rice County sheriff's deputy for 'cocaine' comments St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting 'Hands are what kill.' New traffic stop instructions follow Philando Castile's death

Axtell said he's also made it a point to hire officers based on character and integrity, with the understanding that skills can be trained.

But he acknowledges that there are still many lessons that haven't been learned, adding that he expects that will always be the case.

"You will never hear me say we have it all figured out," Axtell said. "... If the St. Paul police department doesn't believe we can continue to make changes and improve then we have failed."

Semhar Solomon was 12 when Castile was killed. She attended her first protest days later on Silver Lake Road across from the St. Anthony police department in the city where she's grown up.

Now she will be the one hosting the protest, in the same place, on Monday.

Solomon, now 16, said Castile's death "opened her eyes" to what she'd previously only heard about happening to Black and brown community members across the country. This time it was "in her backyard."

"Unfortunately it has come full circle," said Solomon, who will be a senior in the St. Anthony school district in the fall. "It shouldn't be at this point four years later that I have to have this conversation and take this action, but St. Anthony has not been held accountable, especially the police department."

Other than adopting a policy on implicit bias training, Solomon said the department has done nothing.

It's been 4 years since Philando Castile died. His mother thinks about him 'every breathing day.'

St. Anthony Police Chief Jon Mangseth declined to comment, referring a reporter to the city's website for information on changes its made.

It's been difficult growing up Black in a majority-white city such as St. Anthony, which Solomon says masks racial inequities by boasting strong school test scores and other superficial strengths. Diamond Reynolds settles defamation lawsuit against former Rice County sheriff's deputy for 'cocaine' comments St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting 'Hands are what kill.' New traffic stop instructions follow Philando Castile's death

"Unless you are the exception because you are exceptional, you are an outcast," she said. "... It took this recent uprising (following Floyd's death) for me to step outside that and not just be that comforting person with the star image they want me to be anymore."

Solomon also credits the conditions created by the COVID-19 pandemic, which shifted people's focus online, and, in turn, to Floyd's death, for coalescing a national movement that Castile's death did not.

It's given her the confidence to speak out, she said.

"Before I saw all these problems with police brutality and my Black brothers and sisters getting murdered, and I never spoke up," Solomon said. "It took really knowing that people have my back now ... not just the Black community, for me to take this initiative."

Ramsey County Attorney John Choi made the historic decision to file manslaughter charges against Yanez in Philando's death.

A jury later acquitted Yanez after the officer testified that he believed Castile was reaching for his gun when asked for his driver's license and registration.

Castile told Yanez he had a firearm and a license to carry just before the officer shot him.

The biggest lesson for Choi's office was trying to convince jurors to "turn their worldview upside down" and question the decision-making and integrity of a police officer, Choi said.

"The world has changed a lot since then, and I can only wonder what kind of outcome we would have gotten (today)," Choi said.

Like others, Choi believes Castile's death started a conversation locally, but he said in many ways it was treated as an isolated incident.

"The horrific nature of watching George Floyd's life being extinguished" shed light on the deeper, systemic problems, Choi said.

"I think we as a community are tired of it ... and civilians recognize that they have control over their police departments in a way that didn't before," he said.

Peter Lindstrom was Falcon Heights' mayor when Castile was fatally shot.

He remained at the helm until last year.

The experience illuminated the relationship-building work he said he had not yet done with segments of his community at the time, especially the Black community.

It's been 4 years since Philando Castile died. His mother thinks about him 'every breathing day.'

That was a hard lesson to learn, Lindstrom said recently.

"I learned that the best time to connect with people is before a tragedy. ... Trying to afterward is incredibly difficult," he recalled. Diamond Reynolds settles defamation lawsuit against former Rice County sheriff's deputy for 'cocaine' comments St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting 'Hands are what kill.' New traffic stop instructions follow Philando Castile's death

He also learned the depths of the problems that existed between Black and brown community members and law enforcement and said city leaders should be "laser-focused" on policing, especially as it makes up the largest chunk of city budgets.

His community underwent numerous listening sessions and engaged in many "difficult conversations around race" that prompted changes citywide, Lindstrom said.

And while he believes Falcon Heights has done "amazing work" to build a more inclusive and equitable community, he acknowledges there are "hundreds of things that we should still be looking at."

"I am not naive to think that something couldn't happen in Falcon Heights again. ... I don't think we should fool ourselves or lay off the throttle of dismantling systemic racism," he said.

FYI

A fourth annual candlelight vigil will be held to commemorate Philando Castile's death Monday from 8 to 9:30 p.m. at the location on Larpenteur Avenue where he was shot. A rally will take place the same day in St. Anthony from 4 to 7 p.m. near the St. Anthony Village City Hall and Community Center. Diamond Reynolds settles defamation lawsuit against former Rice County sheriff's deputy for 'cocaine' comments St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting 'Hands are what kill.' New traffic stop instructions follow Philando Castile's death

Graphic

Valerie Castile, mother of Philando Castile gave an impassioned plea to the Minnesota Board of Peace Officer Standards and Training on, July 27, 2017. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

Philando Castile (Courtesy photo)

John Thompson, a friend of Philando Castile, cries as he embraces two supporters on the steps of the state Capitol in St. Paul on June 16, 2017, after a police officer was cleared in the shooting. (Evan Frost/Minnesota Public Radio via AP)

St. Paul Police Chief Todd Axtell. (John Autey / Pioneer Press)

Ramsey County Attorney John Choi.(Jean Pieri / Pioneer Press)

Peter Lindstrom, then mayor of Falcon Heights, speaks during a news conference on July 8, 2016. (Jean Pieri / Pioneer Press)

It's been 4 years since Philando Castile died. His mother thinks about him 'every breathing day.'

Load-Date: August 3, 2020

End of Document

Floyd story got personal for Black journalists

ARTICLE MLXXXIV.

FLOYD STORY GOT PERSONAL FOR BLACK JOURNALISTS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 5, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 201 wordsByline: NEAL JUSTIN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

For many Twin Cities journalists, covering George Floyd's death and the events that followed has been the biggest assignment of their careers. For Black reporters, it's something much more.

News gatherers are conditioned to keep their composure in the field, even when tear gas fills the air or neighborhoods go up in flames. Stay objective, stay cool. But that becomes a bigger test when race is the core issue, when you're related to someone who looks just like George Floyd. When you could be George Floyd.

"I'm trained to keep my opinion out of the interviews I do, but I have 52 years of experience being Black," said Minnesota Public Radio host Angela Davis. "We're witnessing the pain and trauma that Black folks have had to endure for generations. I can't separate myself from that because it's my story, as well."

To help get through the sleepless nights, local reporters of color lean on each other for emotional support. It's a small club, since minorities are underrepresented at major media outlets throughout the Twin Cities.

Six Black journalists recently opened up about the struggles they have faced the past few weeks, revealing the challenges they normally only share with each other.

NEAL JUSTIN

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

End of Document

'Food is how we grieve'

ARTICLE MLXXXV. 'FOOD IS HOW WE GRIEVE'

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 5, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1E

Length: 1007 words

Byline: SHARYN JACKSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: Cooks feed mourners and demonstrators at the George Floyd memorial.

Body

A group of volunteers in matching yellow Juneteenth T-shirts clustered in front of a grill on 38th Street, steps from the Chicago Avenue corner where George Floyd had been killed by police.

They ordered hamburgers and hot dogs and, twice, one of the group members asked what he owed the cook, Glen Walton, as if he didn't believe the answer.

"It's free, man," Walton said.

Walton, an arborist out of work since COVID-19 came to Minnesota, has spent the past month behind a grill, feeding many of the thousands of visitors and demonstrators who have come to the corner to pay respects to Floyd.

He is not alone on that south Minneapolis corner. Walton is among those who have set up tents, carts, food trucks and trailers, grills and a smoker on the streets that radiate from this intersection-turned-memorial.

While city and state officials and community members explore ways to make the site a permanent tribute to Floyd and the worldwide movement his death helped ignite, a kind of town square has emerged.

Volunteers spray visitors' hands with sanitizer, a sound system projects the voices of poets and singers, florists cart in buckets of stems for mourners to place on the street, canvassers sign constituents up for politicians' mailing lists.

And everywhere - at plastic picnic tables, on blankets on a grass lawn, on the curb or around the flower-ringed shrine to Floyd - people eat.

Like a spread after a funeral, the food is comforting, nourishing, even uplifting.

'Food is how we grieve'

"Food is how we grieve," said Nancy Alayon, owner of Qué Tal Street Eats, a Salvadoran food truck that served 2,000 free meals over two weekends at the memorial.

Many of the cooks who come and go throughout the day set up tents in small parking lots between buildings or on the street, like Walton. They park trucks on the perimeter. Or, in the case of the brick and mortar establishments on the block, like Dragon Wok, they've been there all along.

On a recent hot Friday, Dwight Alexander loaded 200 chicken wings onto a grate inside a massive barrel of a smoker in front of his takeout restaurant, Smoke in the Pit. The wings turned a deep bronze while smoke billowed over the street.

It was Alexander's first day cooking out front; he usually keeps the smoker behind his building. But he was proud of the 15-year-old workhorse that was enabling him to feed the crowds.

"I wanted them to see the original," he said.

Since these streets became a memorial site, the new customers streaming past Alexander's business are learning something important about the intersection, he said. In the past, "everybody painted this corner as a hard corner."

But with the world's eyes watching, an unspeakable tragedy became a flash point for anger and then change. The corner's true nature has been revealed, Alexander said. "It's as soft as a pillow."

He made about 1,200 wings that day. Some were sold from his storefront window. Others he offered for free to gatherers at picnic tables down the street. "They forget about the sadness for five minutes when they eat this food," Alexander said. Providing that moment of relief in the epicenter of a global movement toward racial justice, he says, makes him feel blessed.

"This is anointed ground," he said.

On the next corner, just past the welcome crew of hand-spritzers, Harold Porter has been cooking from his Phattone's Finger Food trailer since late May. The trailer is equipped with a griddle, refrigerator and deep fryer.

Porter is typically swamped with orders for cheeseburgers, chicken sandwiches and fried cauliflower. He started out giving away food, but had to begin charging to keep his business afloat.

Porter usually parked his restaurant-on-wheels in St. Paul, but when he heard about Floyd, whom he considered a friend, he relocated here to be closer to the movement.

"I'm tired of white folks killing us," he said about his reason for feeding fellow mourners. "This is what I do and I love doing it," he said. "People love to eat. "

Similarly, Alayon of Qué Tal had been drawn to the corner in the aftermath of Floyd's death.

"We knew we couldn't go on with business as usual," she said. "We thought about how we could best serve our community, and we decided what we do best is feed them," she said.

The truck canceled its upcoming events, and turned to its supporters to raise about $6,000 - enough to feed 2,000 people and donate needed toiletries to a nearby church.

'Food is how we grieve'

Alayon was amazed at how quickly the corner became a community-run marketplace, with several food vendors rotating in and out, many of them handing out food for free. As soon as her truck ran out of meals and began to pull out of its parking spot, another cook moved in with more trays of food.

"It was organically beautiful, the flow of how that happened," she said. "Everyone was incredibly generous with their time and their resources, and we were one of many. Food brings people together."

Walton set up his tent and grill two days after the memorial emerged. He had never cooked for the public before. But he had grown up in the neighborhood, and felt "it was my duty to come down and make sure everybody eats."

There are two signs at the back of the tent: one with Walton's Venmo and Cash App names so people can send him donations; the other with the menu - beef hot dogs, chicken and cheese sausage, watermelon, shrimp, veggie burgers and his specially seasoned "Humble Burger," because "it's made by a humble person."

Every day, Walton tallies his donations, goes to the grocery store to buy more supplies, and goes back to his spot on 38th Street. Someone donated the charcoal grill, too - he doesn't know who.

To protect himself and others from the coronavirus, Walton applies the condiments to the meat himself, to order.

Thousands of people over the past month have flocked to the most famous corner in Minneapolis. Many have stopped by his tent, whether for a humble bite, or to fuel the fight. Does he worry about risking his health?

"Not at all," he said over the sizzle of the grill. "This is a special place."

Sharyn Jackson · 612-673-4853

@SharynJackson

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

Walker West Music Academy expands community connections, seeks to raise $ 7 million

ARTICLE MLXXXVI.

WALKER WEST MUSIC ACADEMY EXPANDS COMMUNITY CONNECTIONS, SEEKS TO RAISE $ 7 MILLION

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 5, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 812 words

Byline: Isabel Saavedra-Weis

Highlight: Thirty years ago, the Walker West Music Academy opened hoping to provide a few Black students with after-school music lessons. Now, the academy in St. Paul teaches almost 200 students per week, and has plans to get even bigger. Walker West Music Academy has begun the "Walker West Without Walls" initiative. This spring, they announced [...]

Body

Thirty years ago, the Walker West Music Academy opened hoping to provide a few Black students with after-school music lessons. Now, the academy in St. Paul teaches almost 200 students per week, and has plans to get even bigger.

Walker West Music Academy has begun the "Walker West Without Walls" initiative. This spring, they announced a $7 million effort to increase funding and enrollment, and to build a stronger connection with the St. Paul community.

When the school opened in 1988, the founders Rev. Carl Walker and Grant West taught piano lessons in a Summit-University neighborhood duplex. Today, the music school is located on Selby Avenue, where over twenty music instructors teach piano, percussion, winds, strings, and voice lessons.

GOALS FOR ITS FUTURE

When Braxton Haulcy became executive director of Walker West in 2019, he made a point to contact as many local foundations as he could to introduce himself. To his surprise, most people he spoke with didn't know what Walker West was.

"We've been here 30 years, but some people have never heard of us?" he said.

Haulcy decided that Walker West was not doing enough to network and connect with its community, so he developed the Without Walls initiative.

The academy hopes to double its enrollment by 2023, and triple the number of students receiving tuition assistance from about 50 to 150. The music school also hopes to provide faculty with more training, and raise faculty wages closer to the regional salary average. And eventually, the Music Academy plans to move to a new set of walls entirely.

Walker West Music Academy expands community connections, seeks to raise $ 7 million

Although the coronavirus pandemic has forced that all classes now be taught remotely, Walker West is running out of in-person teaching space in their 6,000-square-foot building on Selby Avenue. In 2023, they hope to move to a bigger building with more studios, more storage and a designated parking lot.

A $7 MILLION BUDGET

About $7 million will be required to fund all the projects the Without Walls initiative seeks to tackle in the next three years. A capital campaign will start in the fall.

About $2 million will be used to purchase 14,000-square-feet for a new location, according to plan estimates. Another $3 million will expand music programs in collaboration with local St. Paul Public Schools. The rest will go toward a variety of projects, such as replacing instruments, and upgrading technology.

Fundraising during an economic recession may seem a tall task, but Haulcy is still optimistic. He recently started working with a fund development consultant, and he's been speaking to potential donors. Schools like Walker West are heavily funded by private donors, many of which are looking for black organizations to support in the wake of the death of George Floyd, Haulcy says.

A PARTNER WITH SPPS

Although the academy was founded on extra-curricular music lessons, the academy plans to take its music education to nearby public schools.

For the past two years, Walker West faculty has been collaborating with St. Paul's Michelle and Barack Obama Elementary school to offer keyboard and African drumming lessons to the students, of which 95 percent are African-American.

"We have worked with Walker West for two years, and we hope to grow that program so that more students can benefit," said Jill Knutson, assistant principal at Obama Elementary. "It's important for our scholars to see music instructors who look like them."

Walker West also hopes to expand the program to other local elementary schools.

"A lot of elementary and middle schools don't have a music class during the day," Haulcy said. "If you have music as an elective, the kids may not take it seriously."

But the lack of music education in school curriculums is serious, he said. When he was in elementary school, he performed badly in school until his mother enrolled him in music lessons.

Hiring spree at St. Paul City Hall: Who got the jobs? How much are they paid? Who else applied? Repair, remodel and relocate: How three University Avenue businesses are still recovering from unrest Buzz, Como Zoo bear named after Apollo 11 astronaut, has died Circus Juventus postpones shows, adapts programs to stay afloat Homicide victim's family invites community to Saturday peace walk, calling for justice for Nia Black and safety for all "Music is reading, writing and arithmetic. It builds life skills like determination, discipline, teamwork," said Haulcy.

As Minnesota officials grapple with schooling in the face of the coronavirus pandemic, Walker West will likely have to reimagine how they teach music lessons in public schools. But the academy is already adjusting to teaching during a pandemic, and currently teaches music lessons over the web.

Walker West Music Academy expands community connections, seeks to raise $ 7 million

Teaching remotely will benefit the Academy in the future. Virtual lessons are more accessible for those living farther away and allows music teachers to reach more students, Haulcy says.

Load-Date: August 3, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MLXXXVII.

BLACK VOICES, NO LONGER SILENT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 6, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 1292 wordsByline: JEFF STRICKLER; ROHAN PRESTON; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Influential Black members of the Minnesota arts community have joined together to "illuminate an unabashed and missing narrative" for "a historical moment of transformation" following the death of George Floyd.

A collection of essays titled "A Moment of Silence," the compositions come from a wide cross-section of the area's theatrical, musical, artistic and literary circles. The 55-plus contributors include author Marlon James, rapper Toki Wright, writer/director Carlyle Brown and Star Tribune theater critic Rohan Preston.

The project is edited by performer/playwright Shá Cage and is produced under the auspices of the Playwrights' Center and the arts organization Tru Ruts. It can be accessed at blackmnvoices.com. The featured artists will rotate each month, with a spotlight post made every week.

By ROHAN PRESTON rohan.preston@startribune.com

"Where justice is denied, where poverty is enforced, where ignorance prevails, and where any one class is made to feel that society is an organized conspiracy to oppress, rob and degrade them, neither persons nor property will be safe."

- Frederick Douglass, American abolitionist, writer and philosopher

In the end, the image that would spark a global uprising against systemic injustice and oppression would not be of a stereotypical Bubba in a pickup truck. That was so last week, when three men hunted and savagely killed 25-year-old Ahmaud Arbery as he was out for a jog not far from his home in Georgia.

Nor would the spark come from the no-knock drug raid that resulted in the shooting death of Breonna Taylor, a 26-year-old medical technician who was asleep in her Louisville, Ky., home. That death was one of the many nauseating tragedies that African Americans face across the country.

The searing, catalytic image would come via video from Minnesota, my home and a state that sent activists to the South in the 1960s. That progressive reputation was brought into sharp relief by a picture that shatters myths about good guys and bad guys.

Derek Chauvin, the Minneapolis police officer who snuffed out the life of George Floyd by pressing his knee on his victim's neck for nearly eight long, excruciating minutes, is a regular-looking guy. We all know him. He's somebody's neighbor and uncle and fishing buddy. He's the middle manager who knows the system well, and that it's designed to protect him; management has got his back.

And in the picture, he's putting on a demonstration of his power, not just for the junior officers around him, but for all to see. Cocky, self-assured and relaxed, he has sunglasses on his forehead and a hand in his pocket. That casual demeanor is not one we associate with a killer, much less a villain. No, Chauvin's mien is that of someone out golfing or boating or, even, trophy hunting. And if he's the person he seems to be, he'll swear on a stack of black bibles that he doesn't harbor any bigotry. He may even claim to have a Black friend. And, the kicker: His wife is Asian American, just like one of the junior officers charged with abetting him.

I cannot bear to watch the entire snuff video of Chauvin kneeling on Floyd's neck. It's too traumatizing. Nor is the often-viewed video, shot by now-scarred 17-year-old Darnella Frazier, the problem. Cellphones have become tools of evidence to present to a society skeptical of the routine degradations that Black people endure in America.

The disturbing stills of the scene that fateful day in Minneapolis challenge the traditional narratives that dominate the nation's stages and screens.

As viewers, we are trained to look at the officer, who is in the command position, as the good guy. White and in uniform, he is representative of the law. We make presumptions about him based on his office, even if those presumptions diverge along racial lines. Floyd, the dark victim, is faceless and in a subservient position, literally under a knee.

Shorn of context on any screen or stage, the story playing along with the picture suggests white virtue and Black guilt. That's a narrative we know well.

Twin Cities casting director Kelli Foster Warder has likened Chauvin to Willie Conklin, the white fire chief in the musical "Ragtime" who takes umbrage at the sight of a Black man driving his own car and eventually destroys the vehicle.

"Everybody recognizes Willie Conklin as the bad guy because he shouts the N-word," Foster Warder said. "Otherwise, no one who sees him walking down the street would think he's the poster child for racism and white supremacy."

The fact that Chauvin is such a regular guy means that it will be difficult for the mainstream to separate from him. I mean, some talk about the banality of evil. Chauvin embodies white supremacy as ordinary.

We associate heroes with those who're winning and living. But the picture of Floyd forces a reordering. We don't know nearly enough about this father and uncle who became an unwilling martyr in a centuries-long struggle for justice in America. And we cannot let the image of how he died represent his life.

We know that he had survived the COVID-19 pandemic and was making do. He is accused of passing off a fake $20 bill. That's about how much his life was valued in a caste system where the virus of bigotry that was present at the beginning still courses through the nation's DNA.

Those ills have created qualifying asterisks on America's lofty promises. We are a land of liberty (except for Black people, enslaved and brutalized for centuries as they forged a nation). We have equal protection under the law (hmm, cue the nauseating sequence of cellphone videos showing otherwise). Anyone can be anything (lie to kids and they stop respecting adults).

It's apropos that this upwelling, led by young people, should start in Minnesota, and not just because Prince founded the Revolution here, as a popular meme notes. Minnesota has some of the nation's largest racial gaps in housing, education, jobs and incarceration rates. Those statistics belie the "Minnesota miracle" of lore.

Minnesota has been at the forefront of cultural trends and events that have helped humanity advance. Starting more than a century ago during a time of food scarcity, the state began to feed the world through innovations in milling and agriculture, helping the global population grow to what it is today.

Minnesota-led advances in health care, embodied by the Mayo Clinic and many medical device companies, have contributed greatly to the health of the globe. Culturally, the 1963 founding of the Guthrie Theater sparked the regional theater movement across America.

African Americans have been integral members of an area where, in the 19th century, Dred Scott sought freedom and where today the University of Minnesota houses the Givens Collection of African-American Literature, one of the largest resources in the nation.

Renaissance artist Gordon Parks found his voice as a writer and filmmaker in St. Paul, as did dramatist August Wilson, who honed his craft at Penumbra Theatre.

The killing of Floyd comes 99 years after three Black circus workers were lynched in Duluth - an atrocity memorialized by Bob Dylan in "Desolation Row." Citizens and leaders of Minnesota now have an opportunity to show a nation how to turn tragedy into medicine.

The state cannot just go back to business as usual with shallow window dressing and paeans to racial equity and justice. We must address our worst-in-the-nation disparities, heal the divides and build a more just, equitable and freer society, one where the unrealized promises of American democracy flower in the glimmering light bouncing up from the state's 10,000-plus lakes.

Such an outcome would be a fitting tribute not just to George Floyd, but would help to reframe images that bind us to a past that often imprisons us all.

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

2020 Aquatennial is canceled

ARTICLE MLXXXVIII.

2020 AQUATENNIAL IS CANCELED

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

July 6, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 151 wordsByline: Mark ReillyBody

Organizers of the Minneapolis Aquatennial have called off the annual summer festival this year, saying that "it does not feel like it is time to celebrate."

The Minneapolis Downtown Council, which manages the event, said in a statement last week that, "We will miss seeing you in person this year," but cited the challenges of the Covid-19 pandemic, as well as the death of George Floyd and the subsequent civil unrest in the Twin Cities.

"We want to take the time to honor our community and give space for the important work that needs to be done," the Downtown Council said.

Aquatennial typically brings thousands of people downtown and to other neighborhoods for events including boat races and fireworks. This year's festival was scheduled to run from July 22-25. It'll be held July 21-24 in 2021.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

2020 Aquatennial is canceled

Load-Date: July 6, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MLXXXIX.

ATLANTA MAYOR KEISHA LANCE BOTTOMS CONTRACTS COVID-19

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 6, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 423 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: ATLANTA (AP) - Atlanta mayor Keisha Lance Bottoms announced Monday that she had tested positive for COVID-19.

Body

ATLANTA (AP) - Atlanta mayor Keisha Lance Bottoms announced Monday that she had tested positive for COVID-19.

The 50-year-old Democrat is among the women named as a potential vice-presidential running mate for presumptive presidential nominee Joe Biden.

"COVID-19 has literally hit home. I have had NO symptoms and have tested positive," Bottoms tweeted.

She told MSNBC that she decided her family members should get tested again because her husband "literally has been sleeping since Thursday." She said the only other symptoms she and her husband have been experienced are those similar to allergies they have.

"It leaves me for a loss for words because I think it really speaks to how contagious this virus is," Bottoms told MSNBC. "We've taken all of the precautions that you can possibly take. We wear masks, we're very thoughtful about washing our hands, I have no idea when and where we were exposed."

Bottoms' national profile has risen in recent months both as a mayor handling the coronavirus pandemic and amid the national reckoning on race that has followed a white Minneapolis police officer's killing of George Floyd, an unarmed Black man, on May 25.

A first-term mayor, Bottoms issued a firm plea for peaceful protest as demonstrators gathered on downtown streets after Floyd's killing - and urged the protesters to get tested for COVID-19. She invoked Atlanta's civil rights history and her personal experience as the mother of Black sons. She won plaudits from progressives after firing Atlanta officers for using excessive force during the protests.

She has also been noted for earlier criticizing Republican Georgia Gov. Brian Kemp on his slowness to order Georgians to shelter in place and his quickness to lift that order.

Atlanta mayor Keisha Lance Bottoms contracts COVID-19

Bottoms was an early and vocal supporter of Biden, who has been considering Bottoms as his possible vice presidential running mate in his own presidential bid.

Violence in the city has grown worse since protesters burned down a fast food restaurant where a white officer fatally shot Rayshard Brooks after he seized a stun gun and ran. Armed people have been manning roadblocks at the site and an 8-year-old girl was shot dead near the site on Saturday. At the same time, some police officers have been refusing to answer calls, angry that the district attorney has charged officers in the Brooks shooting.

Atlanta police again broke up the roadblocks at the site Monday, but that wasn't enough for Kemp, who said he was mobilizing up to 1,000 National Guard troops after a spike in shootings in Atlanta.

Load-Date: August 4, 2020

End of Document

mover & shakers

ARTICLE MXC. MOVER & SHAKERS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 6, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 578 wordsByline: TODD NELSON, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Teaming up to fund rebuilding after Floyd's deathBody

Special to the Star Tribune

Pahoua Yang Hoffman, the new senior vice president of community impact at the St. Paul & Minnesota Foundation, is working with other nonprofit leaders to promote racial equity and help rebuild small, minority-owned businesses damaged in the unrest after George Floyd's death on Memorial Day.

Hoffman joined Minnesota's largest community foundation in mid-May after six years as executive director at the St. Paul-based Citizens League.

Floyd's killing by Minneapolis police led Hoffman to team up with Chanda Smith Baker, senior vice president of impact at the Minneapolis Foundation, and Acooa Ellis, senior vice president of community impact at the Greater Twin Cities United Way.

In early June, their organizations created the Twin Cities Rebuild for the Future Fund to support small businesses damaged in the unrest. They announced June 25 that the fund will distribute $2.5 million to 11 nonprofits to help business owners pay for repairs, get technical assistance and disseminate information in their native languages.

A member of the St. Paul & Minnesota Foundation's executive leadership team, Hoffman serves as its chief strategist for grant making.

Hoffman was born in Laos and immigrated to the United States with her parents after a year in a Thai refugee camp. She earned an MBA from the University of St. Thomas and was a 2013-2015 University of Minnesota Humphrey School of Public Affairs policy fellow.

Hoffman also has served as government affairs manager at Twin Cities PBS and an international student adviser at St. Thomas.

"Pahoua's leadership and experience embody the foundation's strategies and values," said Eric Jolly, CEO of the foundation, which has $1.6 billion in combined charitable assets.

"She's convened diverse groups of citizens to inform rich, community led-solutions. In the advancement of equity, she has worked tirelessly to cultivate a Minnesota where all voices are counted, heard and appreciated," he said in a statement. "Her vision has inspired generosity and contributions of all kinds."

Q: What's motivating your collaboration with Acooa Ellis and Chanda Smith Baker?

A: We all know each other, we trust each other, we listen to each other and we hang out with each other. It's going to take collaboration with these two women and more to say who is doing what, where are we not spending the money, where are the gaps? It's working together with a shared vision for what it is that we all feel is needed.

Q: What is a priority for you in your new role?

A: At the St. Paul & Minnesota Foundation, it's about racial equity and how do we carry out the work that we want to do through that lens. I am very interested in pursuing how we can support nonprofits that are led by leaders of color or that are serving communities of color and Indigenous populations. When you think about the greatest challenges that we're facing as a state and as a country they are largely issues affecting these populations.

Q: How do you do that?

A: One piece of our strategic plan is that the community informs the solution. The foundation may hold the funding and may get donors to contribute, but that doesn't mean we have the knowledge of where it should go. I love the idea that the foundation is saying we are about listening, about learning what's happening in the community and having the community tell us where we should make these investments.

Todd Nelson is a freelance writer in Lake Elmo. His e-mail is todd_nelson@mac.com

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

ARTICLE MXCI. [NATIVE AMERICAN GROUPS ASK NFL TO FORCE REDSKINS
NAME CHANGE](#)

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 6, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 594 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: WASHINGTON (AP) - More than a dozen Native American leaders and organizations sent a letter to NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell on Monday calling for the league to force Washington Redskins owner Dan Snyder to change the team name immediately.Body

By STEPHEN WHYNO

WASHINGTON (AP) - More than a dozen Native American leaders and organizations sent a letter to NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell on Monday calling for the league to force Washington Redskins owner Dan Snyder to change the team name immediately.

The letter was signed by 15 Native American advocates and obtained by The Associated Press. It demands the team and the NFL cease the use of Native American names, imagery and logos - with specific importance put on Washington, which last week launched a "thorough review" of its name.

The letter was delivered on the same day that President Donald Trump voiced his opposition to any name change by the team. Several team sponsors have come out in favor of change recently and Snyder showed his first indication of willingness to do so amid a nationwide movement to erase racially insensitive symbols.

According to their letter, the groups "expect the NFL to engage in a robust, meaningful reconciliation process with Native American movement leaders, tribes, and organizations to repair the decades of emotional violence and other serious harms this racist team name has caused to Native Peoples."

The NFL did not immediately respond to a message confirming receipt of the letter. Goodell last week expressed support for Snyder's review process of the name.

Retired PGA Tour golfer Notah Begay, IllumiNative founder Crystal Echo Hawk, two former executive directors of the National Congress of American Indians and several authors and professors signed on to the letter, which wants a full re-branding of the team "to ensure that continuing harm is not perpetuated by anyone."

Native American groups ask NFL to force Redskins name change

Trump is against re-branding the Redskins and Major League Baseball's Cleveland Indians, who are also considering a name change.

Trump tweeted: "They name teams out of STRENGTH, not weakness, but now the Washington Redskins & Cleveland Indians, two fabled sports franchises, look like they are going to be changing their names in order to be politically correct."

Snyder had been steadfast against changing the name on several occasions since buying the team in 1999. Last week, sponsors FedEx, PepsiCo, Nike and Bank of America released statements saying they requested a change, and several online stores removed the team's gear.

"We believe it is time for a change," PepsiCo said.

FedEx CEO Frederick Smith is a minority owner, and the company is the title sponsor of the team's stadium in Landover, Maryland. The sudden flood of sponsors coming out against the name prompted the organizational review announced Friday.

"This process allows the team to take into account not only the proud tradition and history of the franchise but also input from our alumni, the organization, sponsors, the National Football League and the local community it is proud to represent on and off the field," Snyder said.

The death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody in May sparked protests and a nationwide debate on racism. That conversation renewed calls for Snyder to change the name called a "dictionary defined racial slur" by Native American advocates and experts.

"We've never been faced with a greater opportunity and moment for this to finally happen," Echo Hawk said last month.

"Native Americans have been working and fighting on this issue for decades, decades and decades, and I think really talking with different Native leaders around the country, this is the moment. There's really no excuse now for this Washington team and for the NFL to do the right thing."

More AP NFL: <https://apnews.com/NFL> and https://twitter.com/AP_NFL

Load-Date: August 4, 2020

ARTICLE MXCII. ON SMALL BUSINESS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 6, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 824 wordsByline: NEAL ST. ANTHONY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: DEFENDING WITH PRIDE // As the Global Market was attacked by looters, guards and volunteers rose to fight for its safetyBody

About midnight on May 27, security officer Ken Reese Jr. heard a plate-glass window shatter on the E. Lake Street side of the Allina Commons-Midtown Global Market complex, east of Chicago Avenue.

Reese, monitoring cameras at the security desk, told a Securitas colleague to stay put as he ran toward the sound of looters streaming through the broken glass to nab bicycles that had been collected by a youth-nonprofit tenant for low-income neighborhood kids. Beyond that were food and merchandise shops owned by 50 small businesses.

"The first looters through the window were surprised," recalled Reese. "I started yelling. There was six of them inside. They backed out.

"Then somebody busted out another window and I told them to get out. I told them this was small businesses, minority businesses and people living upstairs here. They stopped and listened. They left. Looters and arsonists want empty buildings."

Reese, 54, a 20-year security professional who works two jobs, is known by business owners, tenants and employees for his easy smile, courtesy and professionalism. He is also built like a linebacker.

"Ken was standing in the window the first night, fending off looters," said Mihailo "Mike" Temali, chief executive of Neighborhood Development Center (NDC), the majority owner and manager of the global market.

"The protesters had righteous anger over what they perceive as a racist system. And in here we have small businesses owned by neighbors of color," Temali said. "And for two nights after that, Ken was supported by other security and residents and business owners and neighbors who ringed the building all night. We need to do more [on race and equity]. But we first needed to preserve what we have achieved."

ON SMALL BUSINESS

The complex emerged from a $190 million redevelopment 14 years ago of an abandoned Sears Roebuck warehouse and store. Its success became part of a broader storefront-by-storefront reclamation of E. Lake Street in recent years, often by immigrant entrepreneurs.

On the third night of the protests over the police killing of George Floyd, with the market portion of the complex covered by several Securitas guards and volunteers, Reese watched video monitors from the security desk. He noticed several people with backpacks slip into the Allina portion of the building through a broken door. He confronted them just as they pulled tools from the backpacks.

"They were arsonists and don't like to be seen," Reese said. "I told them to get out and they left."

He said no one in the building was hurt during the four nights of protests and subsequent violence May 26-29.

"We had old ladies in the lobby praying," he said. "We had people protecting their own building. We were like an oasis."

Across the street to the east, a Family Dollar Store and furniture shop went up in flames. A U.S. Bank branch burned across Lake Street, after looters emptied the ATM. A nearby liquor store was vandalized and looters drank and sold inventory on the street.

Next door, a new Los Ocampo restaurant, the latest of several owned by Mexican immigrants Armando Ocampo and wife Lilia, who started 27 years ago with a hole-in-the-wall taco shop, was damaged on the ground floor of a new apartment building.

Raja Ziadi, a native of Morocco and co-owner with her husband of Moroccan Flavors restaurant in the Global Market, was one of the perimeter defenders in late May. Ziadi lives above the market with her family.

"I was frightened," she said. "But this is our dream ... since 2016. We work hard. And we love these people."

"Some teenagers broke in one night. We asked them why they did this? They put their heads down and left. On Friday night, we observed two guys and a lady drive an old car up to the [Global Market]. It had a can of gasoline in it. They left. We pushed the car away from our building."

Earlsworth "Baba" Letang, NDC's director of the Global Market, met last week with tenants about improvements and with the owners of other shops that were burned about leasing space in the building.

Damages from the riots and fires are estimated to be around $500 million across the Twin Cities, with at least $200 million of that along Lake Street. The Lake Street Council has started to make grants from a fast-growing fund of several million in donations.

My late mother, who grew up on Lake Street, remembered as a girl in the 1920s the construction of the magnificent Sears complex. After the Sears store shuttered there in the early 1990s, a chain-link fence, symbolizing blight, went up around the vacant hulk.

In 2006, Ryan Cos., Allina, NDC, the city and dozens of entrepreneurs, financial and other partners opened the Allina-Global Market Center. Two-thirds of its visitors come from outside Minneapolis.

ON SMALL BUSINESS

It will take more of the same vision, heart and significant investment to rebuild E. Lake Street.

Neal St. Anthony has been a Star Tribune business columnist and reporter since 1984. He can be contacted at nstanthony@startribune.com

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MXCIII. CLASSICAL AGITATOR

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 7, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 1650 wordsByline: JENNA ROSS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Radio host Garrett McQueen knocks a few "old, dead white men" off their pedestals while elevating Black artistry.Body

Smoke was still rising from Lake Street when Garrett McQueen started his shift hosting "Music Through the Night." He settled into the Classical MPR studios, readied his notes and introduced a choral piece that mourns seven unarmed Black men killed during encounters with the police - setting to music the last words they uttered, gasped, pleaded, cried.

A piece of music meant for that moment. A piece that changed McQueen's own life.

"Those were Eric Garner's last words: 'I can't breathe,' " he told listeners across the country over a snippet of "The Seven Last Words of the Unarmed." He paused. "As the protests continue here in the Twin Cities, those same words are being repeated in memory of George Floyd."

His voice didn't reveal that he was holding back tears - not only for Floyd's family. Days after Floyd's killing, a Black classical music host was playing a work by a Black composer centering the voices of Black men.

"It's one thing for listeners, for the first time ever, to hear the voice of a Black person as it applies to these conversations in classical music," he said later. "But for that to be centered in a piece of music that directly addresses police brutality is such a huge moment."

The 33-year-old bassoonist turned radio host has long been calling for the conversation erupting in classical music around who plays - and gets played - in the concert hall and on the radio.

On his show, syndicated by St. Paul-based American Public Media (APM), and his podcast "Trilloquy," McQueen spotlights Black composers and musicians, inviting them to tell their stories. He shakes up the typical repertoire, refusing to play pieces by "old, dead white men" who profited off the slave trade. He questions the very term "classical music," prefacing it with "so-called."

"Because of imperialism and white supremacy, that phrase ... sets the art music of western Europe on a higher pedestal," he said. But other countries have centuries-old instrumental traditions that count as classic, he noted. "If you do that here in America, in my opinion, truly American classical music is the Negro spiritual. That is the music born purely from here."

That conversation - about what music gets labeled "classical" and why - illustrates one of his main points: "You can't talk about classical music without talking about race."

Some listeners, who tend to be an older, whiter bunch, disagree. When McQueen wrote an essay this month about "the power (and complicity) of classical music," pointing out Handel's ties to the slave trade, they appeared in his inbox. "Why don't you keep race and ranting out of classical music," one note began.

But McQueen is unafraid.

Friends in this fight describe him both as a professional with a perfectionist streak and an agitator unbothered by the norms of classical music.

A Memphis native, he came to Minnesota two years ago to become host and producer of "Music Through the Night." On his podcast and on Twitter, where he goes by Bassooncé, he's become known for challenging the status quo - the Minnesota Orchestra included.

"He doesn't care if you're not comfortable," said Scott Blankenship, a fellow APM classical announcer who co-hosts and coproduces the Trilloquy podcast. "That's his charge - having people look at and deal with the uncomfortable issues that have been sidestepped or ignored for way too long."

One of their early guests, composer and multi-instrumentalist deVon Russell Gray, said McQueen's "influence on me was immediate. As soon as we finished the interview, he said, 'Man, I really wish you had named names.' "

McQueen came to Minnesota "pretty bold and, if anything, has only gotten bolder," Gray said. "He's not letting this place soften him."

His 'authentic self'

Too "fabulous" for choir, McQueen joined band in seventh grade, taking up the bassoon.

He earned a bachelor's degree in performance at the University of Memphis and a master's at the University of Southern California. The plan was to move back to his hometown, become a teacher. Nabbing an orchestra spot felt as likely as making the NBA or winning the lottery. But an instructor encouraged him to audition.

"That bit of affirmation became the turning point of my education and my career," McQueen said.

After a two-year fellowship with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, he won a permanent position with the Knoxville Symphony Orchestra, rare for a Black musician in a field still stubbornly white. African American musicians accounted for less than 2% of players in U.S. orchestras in 2014, according to the League of American Orchestras.

That performance background adds credibility to his criticism, said Lecolion Washington, a bassoonist and music school administrator with whom McQueen studied at Memphis. "He's someone who has clearly shown he has the chops."

While many Black classical musicians get assimilated into the system, then have to find their way out, McQueen "stayed true and kept his authentic self," said Washington. "He stood up even in places in which the power dynamic was such that many people wouldn't have."

Four seasons in, Knoxville's public radio station, WUOT-FM, reached out, looking for a sub for its afternoon classical music show. McQueen was tending bar to make extra money. Radio felt more relevant. For a while, he split his attention between the gigs.

But then he heard "The Seven Last Words of the Unarmed," by Atlanta-based composer Joel Thompson, and his calling became clearer.

It was at a concert in 2017. McQueen had performed earlier, then ran into the audience and found a seat. "I didn't even grab a program, so I didn't know what was about to happen."

The piece begins with piano, a touch of violin.

Then, a swell of voices: "Officers, why do you have your guns out?"

Sitting in the hall, McQueen sobbed.

Going into battle

On a muggy, mid-June afternoon, he helped ready Blankenship's basement studio. As Blankenship flipped off the fan and the fridge, McQueen adjusted his dreadlocks and his microphone, then pressed open his notebook.

There was a lot to cover.

"With Black artists, the tokenization has just multiplied," he told Blankenship before they pressed record. "Let me write that down, so I don't forget."

Each week, the two prep, record, edit and publish a podcast featuring "true and real stories from the fringes of classical music," as the tagline goes.

They met when McQueen took over Blankenship's radio shift. McQueen was listening to a lot of podcasts while commuting via bus and train. ("Driving in the snow was not something I was interested in," he laughed.) The podcast he wanted to hear didn't exist. So they started "Trilloquy."

"Trill" is both a musical term and a colloquial one, a combo of true and real. "If I can be extra trill," McQueen likes to say, before posing a tough question or launching into a hot take.

Here, sipping Blankenship's home-brewed beers, McQueen is as likely to profess his love for Beyoncé or Nas as Dmitri Shostakovich or William Grant Still. He quotes both Nina Simone and hip-hop's N.W.A. (Yes, that lyric.)

There's an odd couple quality to their early episodes. Blankenship is 50 years old, white, Nebraskan. A Steely Dan fan. They trust one another and check one another, modeling how to dig into issues around race with honesty and grace.

McQueen welcomes a knotty topic. Last year, he took the Minnesota Orchestra to task for programming Aaron Dworkin's "The American Rhapsody," which features the writings of George Washington. Clad in a Black Lives Matter T-shirt, he left at intermission.

He invited orchestra violist Sam Bergman onto the podcast, and the two hashed it out. McQueen met, too, with an orchestra executive. "I felt, as an audience member, I was supposed to walk away forgiving George Washington for his proximity to American slavery," he explained.

"We've had more conversations in the wake of that concert," Bergman told him, "than just about any previous concert I can imagine."

McQueen isn't just agitating from the outside. He's now a board member of the American Composers Forum and the St. Paul Chamber Orchestra.

When the SPCO asked him to join, Gray remembers McQueen saying: "If I take the gig it's mostly because I want to battle the Minnesota Orchestra." Gray promised to go into battle beside him.

Feeling hopeful

As a Black man in an overwhelmingly white state and field, Gray knows well what McQueen is combating.

"It's based in fear - people are afraid there's not enough airwaves, not enough time," he said. Before McQueen, Gray never listened to Classical MPR, "because they don't program for the me's of the world."

But tuning into McQueen's show makes him hopeful. "I hadn't really realized what radio needs for that change to happen is to have folks like Garrett," he said. "I have hopes that someday he will inspire others to take up that task and not just be on air ... but be running the stations."

McQueen, too, sees reasons to be optimistic, though he hates that it took a man's death. After the killing of Floyd, the Minnesota Orchestra cut its ties with the Minneapolis Police Department. "I'm not sure that orchestras would have done that six months ago, much less six years ago," McQueen said.

On Juneteenth, a handful of Black composers, musicians and activists gathered in a Zoom room for a Composers Forum roundtable to discuss what's changed and what hasn't.

As usual, McQueen was direct. Each time he spoke, the group nodded emphatically.

When another panelist mentioned a revolution, McQueen jumped onto that point and delivered a sermon.

"I agree that the revolution is happening. When I saw the police run from the Third Precinct in Minneapolis as it burned down, that reminded me Nat Turner and his crew taking over their overseers ... When I see Black folks with platforms who are telling the truth, I see the revolution ...

"The revolution is here ... The fire is burning. We have to make sure we keep the fire going."

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

End of Document

MN lawmakers to return Monday to St. Paul to take up unfinished work

ARTICLE MXCIV. MN LAWMAKERS TO RETURN MONDAY TO ST. PAUL TO TAKE UP UNFINISHED WORK

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 7, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 516 words

Byline: Dana Ferguson

Highlight: Lawmakers will return for another special session to weigh an extension of the state's peacetime emergency to combat the coronavirus, consider a bill to fund public construction projects and potentially compromise on police policy bills.

Body

Minnesota lawmakers will return for another special legislative session on Monday to weigh an extension of the state's peacetime emergency to combat the coronavirus, consider a bill to fund public construction projects and potentially compromise on police policy bills.

Gov. Tim Walz on Tuesday said he would call lawmakers back a month after they left the Capitol with no meaningful progress on the bonding bill or police measures.

Walz told reporters that he'd been in contact with legislative leaders as they continued to work behind the scenes to reach agreements on legislative priorities. And he said he was optimistic this time lawmakers in the divided Legislature would be able to strike deals at the Capitol.

"I think what we're trying to do is lay the groundwork for what that looks like. Obviously, we cannot walk away without doing some police reforms in the aftermath of George Floyd's (death), and we also have bonding that is part of the economy that is going to be really important and some supplemental issues that need to be addressed," Walz said. "I think for Minnesotans as they see a hyperpartisan environment, I can tell you this, that the legislative session is working, that there is a commitment to try and get it done."

But members of the People of Color and Indigenous Caucus on Tuesday said Republicans weren't coming to the table to negotiate police reform measures. And without them, they said they would hold up other policy priorities like a bonding bill.

"Minnesota is united in our call for justice for George Floyd," Rep. Rena Moran, D-St. Paul, said. "The Senate GOP needs to show Minnesotans that we all need to be accountable for bad behavior and that includes police officers who are sworn to serve and protect."

MN lawmakers to return Monday to St. Paul to take up unfinished work

Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, R-East Gull Lake, on Twitter said Republicans continue to support some changes like banning chokeholds, but continue to have concerns about other measures like increasing the role of community members in policing and police accountability.

If Walz plans to extend the state's peacetime emergency to deal with the COVID-19 pandemic, he will have to call lawmakers back to give them the option to veto the move. Most states have peacetime emergencies in effect to allow them to draw down federal aid funds and activate the National Guard.

Walz has said he likely will add another 30 days to the peacetime emergency and, in doing so, further his enhanced executive authority. Republicans have said they oppose the move as it gives too much power to the governor, while Democrats have said they support it as the divided Legislature can't act quickly enough to address the pandemic and its effects on Minnesota.

Minnesota will close 2 prisons to prepare for budget shortfall. Other agencies face holes, too. MN tobacco age increases to 21 on Aug. 1 Decisions on MN Capitol artwork will take months; task forces formed will seek public input Minnesota governor signs police accountability bill. A deeper look at what law does. MN Legislature approves police accountability measures. Here's what the bill will do.

Load-Date: August 4, 2020

Correctional officers of color who say they were segregated from Derek Chauvin: Why isn't Ramsey Co. jail superintendent on leave?

ARTICLE MXCV. CORRECTIONAL OFFICERS OF COLOR WHO SAY THEY WERE SEGREGATED FROM DEREK CHAUVIN: WHY ISN'T RAMSEY CO. JAIL SUPERINTENDENT ON LEAVE?

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 7, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 898 words

Byline: Mara H. Gottfried

Highlight: The Ramsey County Jail superintendent who made the decision that correctional officers of color could not interact with the former Minneapolis police officer charged with murder in the George Floyd case remains at work. But he should be on administrative leave, the attorney representing eight officers reiterated to the sheriff this week. "Although your office [...]"

Body

The Ramsey County Jail superintendent who made the decision that correctional officers of color could not interact with the former Minneapolis police officer charged with murder in the George Floyd case remains at work. But he should be on administrative leave, the attorney representing eight officers reiterated to the sheriff this week.

"Although your office apparently now admits this discrimination occurred, it has not placed Superintendent (Steve) Lydon on administrative leave and he continues to work for the County, in the same building as my clients," attorney Bonnie Smith wrote to Sheriff Bob Fletcher. "Employees of yours have been placed on administrative leave for much less."

Lydon's job title remains "superintendent," according to Chief Deputy Dave Metusalem. "He has been administratively reassigned to work on special projects pending the outcome of an internal investigation into his conduct and the resolution of the Human Rights complaint."

The eight correctional officers, who are minorities, filed complaints on June 19 with the Minnesota Department of Human Rights, in which they said they were discriminated against by their employer because they were prohibited from interacting with ex-officer Derek Chauvin when he was brought to the Ramsey County Jail. Chauvin is white and Floyd was Black.

Lydon said in a statement on June 21 that he made the move to protect employees "who may have been traumatized and may have heightened ongoing trauma by having to deal with Chauvin." He said after staff expressed concern, "within 45 minutes I realized my error and reversed the order" and apologized.

Correctional officers of color who say they were segregated from Derek Chauvin: Why isn't Ramsey Co. jail superintendent on leave?

Metusalem said Tuesday that Lydon reports to him and "his work space has been physically moved from the detention center as he no longer is supervising jail staff."

Lydon previously came into the jail for supervising, but his office was always in the administrative side of the building, according to an acting sergeant who was among the people who filed a discrimination complaint.

Smith said Tuesday she has not received a response to the letter she sent Fletcher on Monday. She said her message was sparked by correctional officers having an "incredibly difficult time going to work" because they feel changes have not been made.

Smith announced the discrimination complaints on June 21, without publicizing the names of the correctional officers because she said they fear retaliation.

The most senior employee in the group is an African-American man who is an acting sergeant in the jail. He's also a captain in the U.S. Army Reserve and said he's commanded the largest company in the Minnesota National Guard.

When Chauvin was brought to the jail, he began a standard pat-down to check him for weapons or anything else that's not allowed in the jail.

"In the 10-plus years I've worked there, I've had a high number of high-profile inmates and he was no different than anybody else," the sergeant said in a recent interview. "It wouldn't have affected the way that he was treated."

At that point, the sergeant said Lydon told him he didn't want him doing the pat-down or escorting Chauvin to the housing unit.

The sergeant said he called his direct supervisor and asked if it was true that all minorities were being moved off the fifth floor, where Chauvin was being held, which he confirmed.

He felt sick to his stomach, he said, because, "in essence (Lydon) was saying because we were people of color, that we could not be depended on to do our job professionally."

Two correctional officers said in their complaints that white officers weren't segregated from Chauvin and "to the contrary," they saw on the jail's cameras that a white lieutenant "was granted special access" to Chauvin on May 30. They wrote that she sat on his bed and allowed Chauvin to use her cell phone, which the acting sergeant said would be a violation of jail policy.

Metusalem said there is an open investigation into her conduct. "At this point, investigators have reviewed several hours of jail video and found no evidence that a violation occurred," he said.

Several days later, 60 to 70 correctional officers brought their concerns to Fletcher in a meeting. Fletcher said on June 21 that his office had made changes immediately, including having Undersheriff Bill Finney temporarily head the Detention Division.

The acting sergeant said they filed their complaints with the state about two weeks after the meeting, however, because they didn't see changes happening. On June 21, Fletcher announced he was reviewing the matter to determine whether any additional action was necessary.

Correctional officers of color who say they were segregated from Derek Chauvin: Why isn't Ramsey Co. jail superintendent on leave?

The sergeant said Tuesday he has not been interviewed for an internal affairs investigation into Lydon.

Metusalem said Tuesday that the sheriff's office "values each and every one of its employees."

"We are complying with all of the prescribed timelines and look forward to working with the Minnesota Department of Human Rights to reach a resolution in this matter," he said. St. Paul, Ramsey County debut six career labs at libraries Local nonprofit suspends bail services at Ramsey County jail due to concerns over COVID-19 Minneapolis man charged after authorities say he fired at Ramsey County deputies, led them on high-speed chase Mounds View man charged with murder after woman he met on Tinder died of 'date rape' drug Ramsey County offering \$5,500 in emergency rent, mortgage and utility assistance

Load-Date: August 4, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MXCVI. AMERICA DISRUPTED: TROUBLES CLEAVE A NATION, AND A CITY

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 7, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 2558 wordsByline: Josh Boak, Kat StaffordHighlight: It was difficult to celebrate America in Saginaw this year. The deadly coronavirus had torn through the county. Unemployment had surged five-fold. Weeks of protest over racial inequality left many debating what should be hallowed and what must be changed.Body

SAGINAW, Mich. - It was difficult to celebrate America in Saginaw this year. The deadly coronavirus had torn through the county. Unemployment had surged five-fold. Weeks of protest over racial inequality left many debating what should be hallowed and what must be changed.

But Tom Roy had given it his best. As the head of the July Fourth fireworks board, he struggled to save the display of red-rocketed flares and bursting peonies, fruitlessly seeking a venue that felt safe from the sickness.

He couldn't do it. So Saginaw canceled its festivities, upsetting many of Roy's neighbors who lost an opportunity to unify a bitterly divided community for one night.

The dark skies over this mid-Michigan city were a plaintive marker of a nation utterly disrupted in a matter of months.

EDITOR'S NOTE - Americans are preparing to choose a leader and a path through a time of extraordinary division and turmoil. Associated Press journalists tell their stories in the series "America Disrupted."

This period of national crisis has not inspired unity. Americans are aiming their anger at each other, talking past each other, invoking race, class and culture. They cannot even agree on the need to wear a mask to protect against a virus that has killed more than 130,000 Americans.

These forces are converging as the country hurtles toward a convulsive presidential election. President Donald Trump continues to portray himself as a disrupter, with a wrecking-ball agenda that is rooted in nationalism and roils racial divisions - taking the stage over the July Fourth weekend to warn of "new far-left fascism" that would tear down "our national heritage." His Democratic rival, Joe Biden, meanwhile, calls for a national reset to something resembling normal for a "suffering" nation.

"It's never been this divided," says Roy, vice chair of Saginaw's Republicans.

It is in places like Saginaw County, Michigan, which narrowly flipped from voting for President Barack Obama to voting for Trump, where clarity about America's future is likely to come.

The traditional battleground states of Michigan, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin and Florida, and emerging ones such as North Carolina and Arizona, have all been hit with the triple shock of a pandemic, recession and an uprising against police abuse. The political fallout is unfolding, leaving a striking degree of uncertainty just four months from Election Day.

Will younger voters, whose generation is the first since World War II to be faring worse than their parents, turn out? Will older voters, those most vulnerable to the coronavirus, seek change? Will the growing political power of Black women manifest itself in ways that swing key states? Will the suburbs once again provide the pivot points in the country's partisan divide?

The election will provide answers to all these questions, but not necessarily to the central issue of American life in the year 2020: Can the United States pull itself together?

The country is beset by "parties who see each other as 'the other' instead of collaborators in a democracy," says historian Doris Kearns Goodwin.

"A crisis allows you, if you've got the leadership, to unite the nation. What's needed - and we've seen this for a while - is a national direction," she said.

In 2010, out of love for his ailing hometown, a Saginaw artist spray-painted some familiar lyrics on the husks of buildings and stumps of concrete steps: "I'm empty and aching and I don't know why."

But in 1968, when Simon & Garfunkel released "America" - starting their hitchhiking narrator's cross-country odyssey in Saginaw - the city was a very different place.

The population then was nearly twice as large as the 48,115 people who now call it home. General Motors alone operated at least eight plants in the city and surrounding county, providing middle-class jobs that drew African Americans from the Deep South. The Great Migration gave Saginaw its most famous native son: Stevland Hardaway Judkins, better known as Stevie Wonder.

The Saginaw River slashes a diagonal line through the city and became a dividing line between Black residents on the east side and white residents on the west.

GM stumbled and there were layoffs and closures - manufacturing jobs dropped by 50% in the last 30 years. White people fled to the suburbs, the population declined, and the question arose: How to save Saginaw?

The answers have been disjointed - and none erased the economic inequality or racial segregation. The city of Saginaw, 45% Black, has a median income of $29,800, while the majority white county has a median income of $47,000.

In 2016, the area ended a Democratic voting streak. By just 1,073 votes, voters in the county entrusted Trump to revive its fading industrial hub.

Yet the people of Saginaw are now coping with a 20.7% jobless rate, more than four times the rate on Election Day 2016. There have been 123 confirmed deaths so far from COVID-19, among the top 10th of counties per capita nationwide. Trump's promise of a renaissance in manufacturing remains unmet.

And despite all the hardship, or because of it, Dave Adams believes that Saginaw might help save America - from Trump.

Until February, Adams was athletic director at Swan Valley High School, a suburban school with about 580 students. He had dabbled in local politics, enjoying the competition that so reminded him of sports, but Trump's election changed him.

The former social studies teacher used to make a point of teaching students about respect for the presidency. But Donald Trump, he thought, showed no respect for the office he held.

At 47, in a sort of midlife political crisis, Adams left his job. He would help turn out voters for the Democrats. He wanted to live without regrets, he says.

"You don't want to look back and say woulda, coulda, shoulda," Adams says.

Trump's very nature had forced him to take a stand. "I always thought that the president should be a role model," Adams says. "The current president is so far from it, for me, that it blows my mind. It's everything I'm against."

Trump came to power as a bulldozer, an approach that had wider than expected appeal in a country that was fed up with Washington's chronic fighting and inertia. The president has emphatically kept his promise to upend American politics, but in the process has ripped at racial wounds, antagonized allies and courted foes, been impeached and acquitted, and flouted norms of presidential leadership.

Relatively few Americans think Trump tells the truth or cares about people like them, but neither point is a deal-breaker for his supporters. A majority of Americans believe the country is off track and in a June poll by The Associated Press-NORC Center for Public Affairs Research, about two-thirds said they believe Trump is making America more divided.

Even Republicans are more likely to describe Trump as divisive than unifying, 37% to 20%. But they still overwhelmingly approve of the job he's doing.

They like the idea of a tough businessman who speaks his mind, cuts taxes, appoints conservative judges and promises to crack down on illegal immigration. And even if they have misgivings about his style, many Republicans believe a Democrat would be worse.

But the Trump style that worked well in times of relative calm - inattention to detail, indifference to briefings, go-with-your-gut decisions - is now facing an ultimate test in the face of real crises, not those of his invention.

A virus cannot be dispatched with a tweet. Four months into the fight against the disease, the U.S. has more than 2.9 million infections.

For Adams, that means his new job - canvassing neighborhoods looking for voters - has become a health risk, and much of the work has shifted to calls and online meetings.

The pandemic also exposed his own financial vulnerabilities. He had planned to return to a school district after the November election. He needs just two more years of service to qualify for a pension. But it's still unclear how schools will reopen in the fall - and whether anyone needs a substitute teacher if classes move online.

Out of caution, Adams began a new job this month as a school custodian.

"I'll take what I can get," he said.

Hattie Norwood doesn't remember a time when Saginaw was a growing middle-class haven. At just 31, she's already witnessing the second major recession of her adult life. She sees Saginaw's problems - crime, poverty, struggling schools, food deserts - as entrenched. Déjà vu, she says.

Norwood has tried to take it in stride. As a Black woman in America, "I can't let them see me sweat," says the communications consultant and mother of four girls.

She remembers well the protests that erupted eight years ago when Saginaw police officers fatally shot at Milton Hall, a Black homeless man who was waving a pocket knife, 47 times. The officers never faced charges. She marched then.

But this moment has changed her.

Norwood watched with frustration as the coronavirus seemed targeted at her community, tearing through Black neighborhoods at a disproportionate rate. The economic collapse that followed only made things worse. And with schools closed, kids were deprived of the free meals upon which they depended.

So Norwood and eight strangers she connected with online met in a Tim Hortons coffee shop in March to devise a plan to distribute food to families.

When George Floyd, a Black man, died after a Minneapolis police officer pinned him on the ground for nearly 8 minutes, she went a step further. She and others organized the county's first protest in response and later launched Saginaw's own Black Lives Matter chapter.

"I've gained my political grounding," Norwood said.

It felt right to join the wildfire of activism that spread across the country after protests and riots raged through Minneapolis. The marches filled American streets, even in conservative bastions. They called attention to police brutality and deaths of Black men and women at the hands of police - to deaths like that of Milton Hall - but also evidence of racism in housing, health and education. They've toppled Confederate monuments and statues of past leaders.

The next phase of the protest movement is still evolving. Many activists say they're focused on local issues - largely overhauling police departments - and not the presidential race. Still, Democrats hope it's part of a warm-up for November. Young, liberal voters have been cool to Biden, a 77-year-old moderate, and a fight for racial justice may be the thing that mobilizes these often elusive voters.

They'll have extra hurdles this year. The virus has shaken up voting, pushing many Americans to vote by mail for the first time. Norwood intends to ensure that people are ready.

"We're talking more about voter education in our community and I am for doing whatever it takes to get Trump out of office." Norwood said. "When I leave this place, when I'm gone, there will be brown girls after me and I just can't fathom a world that continues in this way."

—
Tom Roy, a white man, sees a very different America. In his experience, anyone who sacrifices can buy into the stock market and get ahead.

At 57, Roy thinks of himself as a Reagan Republican and a self-made man. Roy started playing the stock market in the 1980s, but the profits really piled up years later while working as a manager at a roller rink. He did well enough to buy a Corvette (and six others since).

Trump had planned to make Roy's pocketbook politics the heart of this campaign. Republican-leaning voters often express reservations about Trump's Twitter feed, but they like his tax cuts and handling of the economy.

The almost-overnight recession disrupted that plan.

That pain hit Republican and Democratic areas alike, even as COVID-19 was initially concentrated in urban centers and coastal cities. That disconnected impact helped breed skepticism about the virus' danger and fuel the resentment about government-ordered business closures that seemed unnecessary.

As businesses started to reopen in June, so did the offices of the Saginaw County Republicans - in time for riled-up voters to come by, asking to sign a petition to recall the Democratic governor, Gretchen Whitmer.

Many Republicans blamed her stay-at-home orders for Michigan's economic morass. Protesters and an armed militia filled the statehouse to demand an end to the restrictions some labeled "tyranny." Prosecutors even charged one of her critics with terrorism for making credible death threats against her.

But there was a hitch in the recall effort: There was nothing to sign.

"People on Facebook and social media had talked about recalling the governor," said Roy, a GOP candidate for town trustee who marvels at what he views as evidence of pro-Trump energy. "We never had a document."

The virus has now shifted course, spreading with alarming speed into Republican counties in the south and southwest. Some GOP governors have been forced to follow in Whitmer's path, to close bars, talk up wearing masks and urge people to stay home.

The surge in red America seems to contradict the Trump campaign's message that the country - the economy - is already coming back.

But in a polarized America, shared facts are hard to find. About two-thirds of Republicans viewed economic conditions as "good" in June, even though the unemployment was near the highest in 70 years. An overwhelming majority of Democrats held the opposite view, according to AP-NORC polling.

Indeed, Roy's view on the economy is filtered through his own experience. Business has been steady at his landscaping company - the grass keeps growing during a pandemic. He recently mowed the lawn around the temporarily closed Fashion Square Mall after it crested 2 feet.

Roy says he thinks most companies will learn to adapt during the crises. He notes the stock market has nearly recovered to where it was before the pandemic.

"Everyone has a chance to make money - that's what is great about America," he says.

"Michigan seems like a dream to me now," says the narrator of the song "America," deeply weary as he boards a bus in Pittsburgh.

Look for America in 2020 and you'll find exhaustion. So many tribulations, so much strife. But there are those in Saginaw who say maybe the United States isn't being pulled apart. Maybe it's growing, even if uncomfortably so.

The Rev. Hurley Coleman is head of the World Outreach Campus Church, a congregation founded by his parents in 1957 in their living room on Saginaw's east side. He knows it's a hard time to talk about hope.

In the past month, he's lost a parishioner to gun violence. Many in his congregation are struggling to survive on low-wage jobs or as front-line health workers. He hasn't delivered a sermon in person in weeks, but he has participated in three marches since last month.

Those recent protests were the first time he's seen Black and white people march together in Saginaw for racial equality, he said. They walked together - crossing the bridge over the Saginaw River - to call for change. It made him think this might be a moment of such upheaval that even long-standing barriers are broken, divides disrupted.

"This is one of those terrible growth moments where people of goodwill and good thought can bring us to another level," Coleman said. "When you build on truth, anything is possible."

Associated Press writers Nicholas Riccardi and Angeliki Kastanis contributed to this report.

Graphic

COVID-19 cases in counties won in 2016 by Democrat Hillary Clinton and Republican Donald Trump have converged in recent weeks.;

A new AP-NORC poll finds that a majority of Americans believe Donald Trump's presidency has made the country more divided, including about 4 in 10 Republicans and 9 in 10 Democrats who say so.;

In several political battleground states, the percentage of African Americans dying from COVID-19 is disproportionately higher than their percentage in the population.;

Load-Date: August 4, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MXCVII. SOCIAL-MEDIA GROUNDSWELL SPARKS PLANS FOR BLACK-OWNED BOOKSTORE

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

July 7, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 555 words

Byline: Iain Carlos

Body

When Dionne Sims discovered there were no Black-owned bookstores operating in Minnesota, she tweeted that it was her new dream to start her own.

The June 15 tweet immediately garnered immense support, so much in fact, that Sims has begun working to make that dream a reality.

Black Garnet Books will eventually carry works written exclusively by Black and racially diverse authors and will likely begin online shipping sometime in July.

"I know that books mean a lot to the Black community and that we, despite that, don't see ourselves represented in literature or in publishing, or, as we know, in bookstores," Sims said. "I would love to be able to have this bookstore be a place where we flip that on its head."

Sims has yet to establish how she would ship the inventory, and is considering either using a third-party inventory service or purchasing books through a distributor to then re-sell directly. The second option would be more profitable, but could also lead to a supply-shock, as interest in purchasing from Black-owned bookstores across the nation has soared, Sims said.

Social-media groundswell sparks plans for Black-owned bookstore

After establishing a shipping service, the idea, according to Sims, is to set up a pop-up to sell books in-person in the Merci Tattoo - formerly the Aldridge Tattoo Parlour - located at 2836 Lyndale Ave. S., sometime later this summer. If the store is able to gain some traction, the goal is to eventually open a physical location.

Sims is working on a soon-to-launch GoFundMe campaign, the success of which will determine whether she'll need to draw on her own savings or take out a loan to finance the business.

Sims is currently a user-experience designer doing contract work for Best Buy. She previously worked as an information architect for Thomson Reuters. She earned a B.A. in Communication and Media Studies from the University of Minnesota Twin Cities and a certificate in user-experience design from Prime Digital Academy.

She's an avid reader, and has always wanted to open a bookstore - though it was something she thought she'd do much later in life.

While COVID-19 presents a unique challenge to entrepreneurs, it has also fostered online connections. That, alongside the groundswell of support for Black-owned businesses in the wake of the killing of George Floyd, has likely helped make Black Garnet a possible reality, Sims said. But it's unclear how long the bolstered interest will last.

"As thrilling and exciting as it is to know that people recognize the need for this bookstore, I would also say this is not the first Black bookstore that Minnesota has had or the first that Minneapolis has had," Simms said. "We really want to create something that lasts."

Her concern isn't unreasonable. Ancestry Books, a North Minneapolis bookstore that sold works by authors of color, shut down only 16 months after it opened back in 2014, according to an MPR article.

Whatever the market for Black-owned bookstores looks like in the future, opening Black Garnet will have been worth it, Sims said.

"I just can't think of anything that feels more life-affirming than seeing yourself be represented and having yourself taken care for in the way that reading stories about you, about people that look like you, can do for you," Sims said.

?

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: July 7, 2020

ARTICLE MXCVIII. WHITE WOMAN CHARGED AFTER RACIST CENTRAL PARK CONFRONTATION

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 7, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 562 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: NEW YORK (AP) - A white woman who called the police during a videotaped dispute with a Black man over her walking her dog without a leash in Central Park was charged Monday with filing a false police report.Body

By TOM HAYS

NEW YORK (AP) - A white woman who called the police during a videotaped dispute with a Black man over her walking her dog without a leash in Central Park was charged Monday with filing a false police report.

In May, Amy Cooper drew widespread condemnation and was fired from her job after frantically calling 911 to claim she was being threatened by "an African American man," bird watcher Christian Cooper. On the video he recorded of the woman, he sounds calm and appears to keep a safe distance from her.

District Attorney Cyrus Vance Jr. said in a statement on Monday that his office had charged Amy Cooper with falsely reporting the confrontation, a misdemeanor that carries a maximum penalty of a year behind bars. She was ordered to appear in court on Oct. 14.

Cooper's attorney, Robert Barnes, said Cooper would fight the charge. His client, he said, has already lost her livelihood and "her public life. Now some demand her freedom?"

Reached by phone on Monday, Christian Cooper said he had no reaction or comment.

After the backlash, Amy Cooper released an apology through a public relations service, saying she "reacted emotionally and made false assumptions about his intentions."

"He had every right to request that I leash my dog in an area where it was required," she said in the written statement. "I am well aware of the pain that misassumptions and insensitive statements about race cause and would never have imagined that I would be involved in the type of incident that occurred with Chris."

Amy Cooper's 911 call was seen by many as a stark example of everyday racism and fueled outrage in the period leading up to the street protests sparked by the police custody death of George Floyd. It also inspired New York state lawmakers in June to pass a law that makes it easier under civil rights law to sue an individual who calls a police officer on someone "without reason" because of their background, including race and national origin.

White woman charged after racist Central Park confrontation

The new law, which the governor also signed last month, holds an individual who makes such 911 calls liable "for injunctive relief, damages, or any other appropriate relief" in a civil lawsuit. Cooper was charged under an existing false-report law that's been long on the books and doesn't reference race.

The confrontation began early one morning when Christian Cooper said he noticed Amy Cooper had let her cocker spaniel off its leash against the rules in the Ramble, a secluded section of Central Park popular with birdwatchers.

In the video posted on social media, he claimed the dog was "tearing through the plantings" and told her she should go to another part of the park. When she refused, he pulled out dog treats, causing her to scream at him to not come near her dog.

Amy Cooper also warned him she would summon police unless he stopped recording.

"I'm going to tell them there's an African American man threatening my life," Amy Cooper is heard saying in the video as she pulls down her face mask and struggles to control her dog.

"Please call the cops," Christian Cooper says.

"There's an African American man, I'm in Central Park, he is recording me and threatening myself and my dog. ... Please send the cops immediately!" she says during the call before he stops recording.

Police say by the time they responded, they were both gone.

Associated Press writer Michael R. Sisak contributed to this report.

Load-Date: August 4, 2020

Officer Chauvin to George Floyd: 'It takes ... a lot of oxygen to talk'

ARTICLE MXCIX. OFFICER CHAUVIN TO GEORGE FLOYD: 'IT TAKES ... A LOT OF OXYGEN TO TALK'

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 8, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1003 words

Byline: Amy Forliti

Highlight: As George Floyd told Minneapolis officers more than 20 times he couldn't breathe, the officer pressing his knee against Floyd's neck said, "it takes a heck of a lot of oxygen to talk," according to newly-released transcripts.

Body

As George Floyd told Minneapolis officers more than 20 times that he couldn't breathe, the officer who pressed his knee against Floyd's neck dismissed his pleas, saying "it takes a heck of a lot of oxygen to talk," according to transcripts of body camera video recordings made public Wednesday.

The transcripts for the body camera videos of officers Thomas Lane and J. Kueng provide the most detailed account yet of what happened as police were taking Floyd into custody on May 25, and reveal more of what was said after Floyd, a Black man who was handcuffed, was put on the ground.

"You're going to kill me, man," Floyd said, according to a transcript of Lane's body camera video.

"Then stop talking, stop yelling. It takes a heck of a lot of oxygen to talk," said Derek Chauvin, the white officer who held his knee to Floyd's neck for nearly 8 minutes, even after Floyd stopped moving.

"They'll kill me. They'll kill me. I can't breathe. I can't breathe," Floyd said.

Chauvin's attorney, Eric Nelson, had no immediate comment Wednesday.

The transcripts were made public Wednesday as part of Lane's request to have the case against him dismissed. Lane's attorney, Earl Gray, said in a memorandum that there isn't probable cause to charge his client, based on all of the evidence and the law.

MORE: Read the George Floyd police body camera transcripts in full here

Gray painted an image of a rookie officer who trusted Chauvin, a senior officer, after Floyd had been acting erratically, struggling and hurting himself during an arrest. Gray said that once Floyd was on the ground, Lane had asked twice if officers should roll Floyd on his side, and Chauvin said no.

Officer Chauvin to George Floyd: 'It takes ... a lot of oxygen to talk'

Gray also submitted the body camera footage itself, but that was not immediately made public. The transcripts show Floyd appearing cooperative at times but becoming agitated as he begged not to be put in a squad car, saying repeatedly he was claustrophobic.

"Oh man, God don't leave me man, please man, please man," he begged, later adding: "I'll do anything y'll tell me to, man. ... I'm just claustrophobic, that's it."

Gray wrote that Floyd started to thrash back and forth and was "hitting his face on the glass in the squad and began to bleed from his mouth." Officers brought Floyd to the ground and, "the plan was to restrain him so he couldn't move and hurt himself anymore," Gray wrote.

Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and manslaughter. Lane, Kueng and Tou Thao are charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and manslaughter. Lane was holding Floyd's legs at the time, Kueng was at Floyd's midsection and Thao was watching nearby bystanders. All four officers were fired.

A message left with an attorney for Floyd's family wan't immediately returned. A spokesman for the attorney general's office said prosecutors plan to oppose the motion to dismiss.

As part of his court filing, Gray also submitted a transcript of Lane's interview with state investigators and police department training materials on restraint holds. Gray wrote that all of the evidence exonerates his client and that it is not "fair or reasonable" for Lane to stand trial.

Gray said in a memorandum that his client's body camera video shows the encounter with Floyd from the time Lane got on the scene to the point where Floyd was put into an ambulance; Lane went in the ambulance and helped with CPR, according to the transcript.

Lane repeatedly told Floyd to show his hands, and he told investigators he drew his gun at first because Floyd was reaching for something, but holstered it once Floyd showed his hands. Body camera video transcripts show Floyd initially said he had been shot before, and begged police not to shoot him.

Gray said Floyd was acting erratically and had foam at his mouth. According to the body camera video transcripts, when asked about the foam and whether he was on something, Floyd said he was scared and had been playing basketball.

As officers struggled to get Floyd into the squad car, Floyd said: "I can't breathe" and "I want to lay on the ground," the transcripts say.

Once Floyd was on the ground, Lane told the other officers "he's got to be on something." and he asked twice whether officers should roll Floyd onto his side - Chauvin said no.

"Lane had no basis to believe Chauvin was wrong in making that decision," Gray wrote.

Bystanders told officers repeatedly to check Floyd's pulse, and after Kueng did he said, "I can't find one."

Minneapolis mayor: City seeks right mentors for new officers Why are these shoe shiners polishing St. Paul officers' boots? To give back, find common ground Walz renews pitch for federal aid in cleanup in aftermath of George Floyd unrest British paper publishes police bodycam video of Floyd arrest Navy investigates video of dogs attacking Colin Kaepernick fill-in

Officer Chauvin to George Floyd: 'It takes ... a lot of oxygen to talk'

"Huh?" Chauvin said, according to the transcript of Keung's body camera video.

Lane told state investigators that Chauvin was not Lane's field training officer, but that he had trained Kueng and was someone Lane had previously gone to for guidance. According to a transcript of that interview, one investigator said it seemed like Lane's gut was telling him something wasn't right with the way Floyd was being restrained.

"Yeah. I would say felt like it maybe could have been handled differently or we should be reassessing what we're doing, I think is what I was kind of coming to," Lane said.

Gray argued in his memorandum that in order to charge Lane with aiding and abetting, prosecutors must show Lane played a knowing role in committing a crime. He said there's no evidence Lane played an intentional role or knew Chauvin was committing a crime, namely assault.

"The decision to restrain Floyd was reasonably justified," Gray wrote, adding: "Based on Floyd's actions up to this point, the officers had no idea what he would do next - hurt himself, hurt the officers, flee, or anything else, but he was not cooperating."

Gray wrote that Lane's trust in Chauvin was "reasonable and not criminal."

Graphic

Former Minneapolis police officer Thomas Lane, right, walks out of the Hennepin County Public Safety Facility on Monday afternoon June 20, 2020, in Minneapolis with his attorney, Earl Gray, after a hearing. Lane is one of four former officers charged in the death of George Floyd. (Glen Stubbe/Star Tribune via AP)

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

In risky bid, Trump stokes racial rancor to motivate voters

ARTICLE MC.

IN RISKY BID, TRUMP STOKES RACIAL RANCOR TO MOTIVATE VOTERS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 8, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1140 words

Byline: Associated Press

Highlight: NEW YORK (AP) - President Donald Trump is wielding America's racial tensions as a reelection weapon, fiercely denouncing the racial justice movement on a near-daily basis with language stoking white resentment and aiming to drive his supporters to the polls.

Body

By JONATHAN LEMIRE

NEW YORK (AP) - President Donald Trump is wielding America's racial tensions as a reelection weapon, fiercely denouncing the racial justice movement on a near-daily basis with language stoking white resentment and aiming to drive his supporters to the polls.

The incendiary discourse is alarming many in his own party and running contrary to the advice of some in his inner circle, who believe it risks alienating independent and suburban voters. It's a pattern that harks back to cultural divisions Trump similarly exploited in his victorious 2016 campaign.

"It's not about who is the object of the derision or the vitriol. The actual issue is understanding the appeal to white resentment and white fear," said Eddie Glaude, chair of the Department of African American studies at Princeton University. "It's all rooted in this panic about the place of white people in this new America."

Though Trump has long aired racially divisive language and grievances in the public sphere, his willingness to do so from behind the presidential seal - and on his Twitter account - has reached a breakneck pace in recent days as the nation grapples with racial injustice.

The president tweeted - and later deleted - a video of a supporter yelling "white power." He referred to the Black Lives Matter mantra as a "symbol of hate." He took a swipe at NASCAR for removing the Confederate flag from its races and falsely suggested a Black driver had carried out a racially charged hoax. He mused about overturning a suburban fair-housing regulation and spoke approvingly of the current branding of the Washington Redskins and Cleveland Indians, team nicknames that many consider offensive to Native Americans.

In risky bid, Trump stokes racial rancor to motivate voters

Most notably, he has engaged in a full-throated defense of the Confederate legacy, which he at times has cloaked within tributes to the Founding Fathers, including during a pair of high-profile Fourth of July weekend speeches.

"Those who seek to erase our heritage want Americans to forget our pride and our great dignity, so that we can no longer understand ourselves or America's destiny," Trump said Friday at the base of Mount Rushmore. "In toppling the heroes of 1776, they seek to dissolve the bonds of love and loyalty that we feel for our country, and that we feel for each other. Their goal is not a better America; their goal is the end of America."

In defending Thomas Jefferson and George Washington that night, Trump did not mention the Confederacy. Instead, he painted racial justice demonstrators with a broad brush that made no distinction between the many who oppose honoring the Confederacy and the relative few who question celebrating Founders who owned slaves.

But Trump has repeatedly called for the preservation of statues of the Confederacy and the names of its generals on military bases - all assailed in the protests that have swept from coast to coast in the aftermath of the death of George Floyd.

His comments are an apparent descendant, a half-century later, of Richard Nixon's coded outreach to white voters known as the Southern Strategy. Trump himself has embraced Nixon's phrase "the Silent Majority" to describe his own supporters.

By all accounts, the president's actions are, at times, born of impulse and an instinctive reaction to what he sees on television. However, according to current and former Trump campaign officials, his overarching strategy is an appeal to white voters - some of them racist and some who fear being left behind by a government seemingly consumed with helping others. Those officials were not authorized to publicly discuss such private matters and commented only on condition of anonymity.

The belief is that his appeals will generate enthusiasm among the same disaffected white voters who made up the president's base of supporters four years ago.

But many in Trump's orbit are sounding the alarm that 2020 is not 2016.

White House advisers Kellyanne Conway and Jared Kushner, according to the officials, have both warned that some of the racist rhetoric, including the use of China-blaming "kung flu" to describe the COVID-19 pandemic, could turn off swaths of voters. And some believe there was more of an audience for inflammatory rhetoric about immigration four years ago, particularly as polls show the Black Lives Matter movement gaining widespread support.

"The 2016 debate about immigration was about the future of sovereignty, the American worker, and our culture. The issues that involve race now are completely different," said Sam Nunberg, a former Trump campaign adviser.

"It's not easy to conflate people who want to tear down the statues of the Confederacy and the few who want to get George Washington," said Nunberg. "I don't think it's a winning argument in a time of a pandemic. This doesn't affect people's daily lives. This is a dumb issue to fight."

In risky bid, Trump stokes racial rancor to motivate voters

Four months before Election Day, Republicans are nervously watching polls that show Trump slipping behind his Democratic rival Joe Biden. They have grown increasingly worried that his focus on racial rancor could force GOP senators locked in tough campaigns to distance themselves from their party's president.

"Defending the Confederacy and racial dog whistles is not going to help win the suburbs. He is solely focused on a small part of his base when he should be looking to grow his support," said Alex Conant, a Republican strategist who advised Sen. Marco Rubio's presidential bid. "If Joe Biden proposed tearing down Mount Rushmore, that would be a huge opening for Trump. But Biden is not doing that."

Sen. John Thune, R-S.D., said GOP candidates "need to do what they need to do to win. And in some states, he will be a benefit in some parts of the country. In other parts of the country, less so."

The Trump campaign dismisses accusations of racism.

"President Trump's Mount Rushmore address was a defining speech highlighting America's highest ideals of freedom and individual liberty," said campaign spokesman Ken Farnaso. "He both educated citizens on our shared history and pushed for a more united front combating those who want to create chaos."

Democrats have charged that the president's recent rhetoric is consistent with Trump's history, including his call in the 1980s for the death penalty for Black teenagers later exonerated for the rape of a jogger in Central Park and for questioning whether the nation's first Black president, Barack Obama, was born in the United States.

"We are beyond dog whistles with this president," said TJ Ducklo, the Biden campaign's national press secretary. "Donald Trump openly embraces racist rhetoric and sends blatant signals of support for the causes of white supremacists - and he does it from the highest office in the land."

Associated Press writer Alan Fram contributed to this report.

Follow Lemire on Twitter at <http://twitter.com/@JonLemire>

Load-Date: August 4, 2020

Monuments and statues are falling. But what comes next?

ARTICLE MCI. MONUMENTS AND STATUES ARE FALLING. BUT WHAT COMES NEXT?

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 8, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 706 words

Byline: Russell Contreras

Highlight: The dusty town of Tierra Amarilla perches in the shadows of the Sangre de Cristo Mountains. Here, five decades ago, this poor northern New Mexico community saw one of the most violent clashes in civil rights history when armed Mexican American ranchers raided a courthouse in a dispute over land grants. It shocked the nation and helped trigger the Chicano Movement.

Body

TIERRA AMARILLA, N.M. - The dusty town of Tierra Amarilla perches in the shadows of the Sangre de Cristo Mountains. Here, five decades ago, this poor northern New Mexico community saw one of the most violent clashes in civil rights history when armed Mexican American ranchers raided a courthouse in a dispute over land grants. It shocked the nation and helped trigger the Chicano Movement.

Today, there's almost nothing in town to honor this historic moment, except for graffiti art on an abandoned gas station and a sentence on a marker. There's also almost no public art about the event anywhere.

As monuments and statues fall across the United States, activists and towns are left wondering what to do with empty spaces that once honored historic figures tied to Confederate generals and Spanish conquistadors. They also are debating how to remember civil rights figures and events in areas where they have been forgotten.

The opportunity to reimagine spaces has created a debate: whose history should the U.S. now honor and why? Should anything go on those empty podiums at all?

Some advocates say monuments to the late U.S. Rep. Barbara Jordan or Mexican American civil rights leader Dolores Huerta should replace the fallen statues. Others say World War II Marine Sgt. Miguel Trujillo Sr., a member of the Isleta Pueblo who sued to get Native Americans the right to vote in New Mexico, or former slave-turned-abolitionist Olaudah Equiano should have monuments erected in their honor. Christy Symington, a London-based sculptor, has already created an image of Equiano that some advocates say should be replicated in now empty spaces.

Monuments and statues are falling. But what comes next?

"I almost think the pedestals just need to be left there (empty)," said Rev. Rob W. Lee, a senior pastor of Unifour Church in Newton, North Carolina, and a descendant of Confederate Gen. Robert E. Lee, who now speaks out against Confederate monuments.

Lee said he sees the toppling of Confederate statues with Black Lives Matter graffiti as a move to reclaim Black lives from white supremacy. "I think it's quite beautiful," Lee said. "Leave it like that."

Brett Chapman, a Tulsa, Oklahoma, attorney and descendant of Standing Bear, a Ponca chief and civil rights leader, said he'd like to see the fallen statues replaced by largely unknown social justice advocates. "There are so many people we can honor that will show how we've overcome oppression," Chapman said. "It'll be a chance for us to learn and reflect."

On Saturday, protesters in Baltimore pulled down a statue of Christopher Columbus and threw it into the city's Inner Harbor. That followed other episodes of Confederate and Spanish colonial statues getting toppled last month by demonstrators or after officials ordered their removal.

It's also led to statues of Presidents George Washington and Ulysses S. Grant getting vandalized.

Minneapolis mayor: City seeks right mentors for new officers Why are these shoe shiners polishing St. Paul officers' boots? To give back, find common ground Walz renews pitch for federal aid in cleanup in aftermath of George Floyd unrest British paper publishes police bodycam video of Floyd arrest Navy investigates video of dogs attacking Colin Kaepernick fill-in

That has given some supporters of anti-racism protests pause. Cultural critic Thomas Chatterton Williams, the author of "Self-Portrait in Black and White," said he understood the need to remove Confederate monuments but is uncomfortable with the vandalism of statues honoring the Founding Fathers and American Union Civil War figures.

"Mobs in the street tearing down Ulysses S. Grant statues is a really chilling sight," Williams said. "We should understand the context (of history). But erasing these men from the public sphere seems like a bad road to go down to me."

Vanessa Fonseca-Chávez, an assistant English professor at Arizona State University and author of the upcoming book "Colonial Legacies in Chicana/o Literature and Culture: Looking Through the Kaleidoscope," said she can see the spaces honoring people who are not famous.

"What about the people who are living and breathing right now who made this place what it is today?" Fonseca-Chávez said. "Not a famous person. Just who we are. I think that could go a long way."

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

ARTICLE MCII. DOYLE MCMANUS: TO JUDGE MONUMENTS, THINK ABOUT THEIR MEANING

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 8, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 796 wordsByline: Doyle McManusHighlight: WASHINGTON - At Gettysburg, where the bloodiest and most decisive battle of the Civil War occurred, no fewer than 1,320 monuments are scattered across the rolling Pennsylvania landscape. Some memorialize Union generals and their men; others remember Confederates. One is especially poignant: the Maryland monument, which lists both Union and Confederate units from one divided [...]Body

WASHINGTON - At Gettysburg, where the bloodiest and most decisive battle of the Civil War occurred, no fewer than 1,320 monuments are scattered across the rolling Pennsylvania landscape. Some memorialize Union generals and their men; others remember Confederates.

One is especially poignant: the Maryland monument, which lists both Union and Confederate units from one divided state. It depicts two wounded men, one from each army, propping each other up.

There's a statue of Confederate Gen. Robert E. Lee, surveying the battlefield on horseback, and another of the Union commander, Gen. George G. Meade.

The Union monuments outnumber those of the Confederates, just as their armies did in 1863.

It's an open-air museum, and it leaves no doubt which side won: the North.

Almost 200 miles to the south, in Richmond, Va., Civil War statues were erected to convey a very different message.

Monument Avenue is the Virginia capital's grandest boulevard. Until recently, it was dominated by heroic statues of Lee, Stonewall Jackson, Confederate President Jefferson Davis and others.

They are the men who lost the war - but on Monument Avenue, they appeared triumphant.

That was the point. Richmond's statues were erected more than a generation after the war ended, after white segregationists regained control of the Southern states.

Doyle McManus: To judge monuments, think about their meaning

"The message (was) a victory narrative about the overturning of Reconstruction and the reestablishment of white supremacy," Yale historian David W. Blight, the biographer of Frederick Douglass, wrote last week.

Now the Richmond statues are coming down. Protesters toppled Davis on June 10, the city removed Jackson, and the governor is battling in court to remove Lee.

Their removal is long overdue. By contrast, Lee's statue in Gettysburg should remain standing because its meaning is so different.

In Richmond, Lee appears dominant, his presence designed to intimidate. At Gettysburg, outnumbered by federal troops and about to lose the most important battle of his career, he appears in a more appropriate context - as history, not mythology.

The distinction is not only whom the statue shows, but what message it conveys.

Monuments to George Washington and Thomas Jefferson celebrate their wisdom in founding the republic, not their flaws, chief among those flaws their ownership of slaves. We honor them despite those flaws, not because of them.

Statues of Christopher Columbus pose a tougher question. Are we honoring him for his intrepid navigating or because he opened the Americas to European colonization?

The good news about this summer's protests is that they've forced us to confront our history more squarely - not merely the mythologized version most of us received.

Case in point: Army bases. Until last month, how many of us knew that 10 U.S. Army bases in the South were named for Confederate officers who fought against the United States? The names were usually given to placate white politicians.

The strangest is Fort Bragg, N.C., named for Braxton Bragg, perhaps the least competent general in Lee's army. One of his officers called him "cruel, yet without courage ... crafty, yet without strategy." He resigned his commission after losing the battle of Chattanooga.

Defense Secretary Mark Esper says he's open to changes, but President Trump has declared the Army bases' names a matter of high principle. The only principle involved is his relentless drive to nail down his conservative base by pushing a culture war against Black Lives Matter.

The president waded back into the battle at Mt. Rushmore last week, charging spuriously that protesters against racism "are determined to tear down every statue, symbol and memory of our heritage."

This argument has a long way to go. Since the death of George Floyd, 22 Confederate statues have come down - but 748 are still standing, according to the Southern Poverty Law Center.

More of the public agrees with the protesters, not with the president. A Quinnipiac University poll last month found that a small majority, 52%, think the statues should come down - a notable change in public opinion.

The protests have not only started useful conversations; they appear to be building a new national majority in favor of change.

Doyle McManus: To judge monuments, think about their meaning

Those Confederate generals should be hoisted off their pedestals and put where they belong: in a museum or on a battlefield, not in a position of honor.

Doyle McManus writes for the Los Angeles Times. Ivo Daalder: What Pompeo gets right - and wrong - about China Karl W. Smith: The case Mitch McConnell needs to make on COVID spending Phillip Atiba Goff: Our brains are conditioned to blame Black people and block change - but we can change that David Brooks: The future of American liberalism John Kass: What happened to an America where you could freely speak your mind?

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCIII. MAN CHARGED WITH FATALLY SHOOTING PREGNANT WOMAN AT GEORGE FLOYD MEMORIAL

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 8, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 387 words

Byline: Kristi Belcamino

Highlight: Authorities are looking for a Minneapolis man they charged with murder Wednesday in the fatal shooting of a pregnant woman on Sunday at the George Floyd Memorial site. Officials say the man also shot and injured a witness According to the criminal complaint, in addition to shooting the mother of his baby dead, Zachary Robinson, [...]

Body

Authorities are looking for a Minneapolis man they charged with murder Wednesday in the fatal shooting of a pregnant woman on Sunday at the George Floyd Memorial site. Officials say the man also shot and injured a witness

According to the criminal complaint, in addition to shooting the mother of his baby dead, Zachary Robinson, 27, also shot and injured a witness at the murder scene. Robinson, who is not in custody, was charged Wednesday with second-degree murder, second-degree assault and felon in possession of a gun, according to Hennepin County Attorney Mike Freeman.

Police have issued an arrest warrant for Robinson's arrest.

According to the criminal complaint, police responding to a shooting on July 5 at 38th Street East and Chicago Avenue South found a shot-up Ford Explorer a block away-at 37th Street East and Elliot Avenue.

Leneesha Columbus, 27, was outside the Ford. She had been shot in the upper back, and bystanders were performing life-saving measures. She later died at the hospital but doctors delivered the baby, who is in critical condition, according to a press release by Freeman's office.

During their investigation, officials learned that Robinson is the baby's father, according to the complaint.

Witnesses said Robinson and Columbus were arguing near the Ford in a parking lot on Chicago Avenue. Then, as Columbus drove away, Robinson fired several shots at the vehicle. He then returned to the parking lot, sticking the gun in his waistband, according to the complaint.

A man who authorities say was working as a peacekeeper at the George Floyd memorial confronted Robinson in the parking lot, asking him what he was doing. Robinson took out the gun and shot the man in his right foot, according to the complaint.

Man charged with fatally shooting pregnant woman at George Floyd Memorial

That man was treated at the hospital for his injury.

According to Freeman's office, Robinson has a history of felony assaults dating back to 2009 and is prohibited from possessing any firearms or ammunition. Minneapolis commission takes up proposal to disband police Minneapolis mayor: City seeks right mentors for new officers Heading to Minneapolis? Westbound I-94 to close at MN 280 for the weekend Some residents have distrust of the Minneapolis police, and also the effort to defund them Walz renews pitch for federal aid in cleanup in aftermath of George Floyd unrest

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

End of Document

Ramsey County Attorney's Office named pilot site for national program aimed at reducing racial disparities in criminal justice system

ARTICLE MCIV. RAMSEY COUNTY ATTORNEY'S OFFICE NAMED PILOT SITE FOR NATIONAL PROGRAM AIMED AT REDUCING RACIAL DISPARITIES IN CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 8, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1100 words

Byline: Sarah Horner

Highlight: Turning to incarceration as a last resort, declining to prosecute low level and non-violent crimes, ignoring a person's past criminal history when making present-day charging decisions. Those are just some reforms two national justice organizations are pushing prosecutors across the country to consider as a way to address racial disparities in the criminal justice system. [...]

Body

Turning to incarceration as a last resort, declining to prosecute low level and non-violent crimes, ignoring a person's past criminal history when making present-day charging decisions.

Those are just some reforms two national justice organizations are pushing prosecutors across the country to consider as a way to address racial disparities in the criminal justice system.

The Ramsey County Attorney's Office was one of three offices across the country chosen to participate in the Vera Institute and the Institute for Innovation in Prosecution's new pilot program focused on strategically shaking up traditional prosecutorial approaches in the name of racial equity.

Prosecutors' offices in Suffolk County in Boston as well as Ingham County in Lansing, Mich., also were selected.

A DEEP DATA DIVE

The organizations' staff will do a deep dive into data collected by three offices to understand how prosecutorial decisions have impacted black and brown communities, and then work to identify strategies and policies aimed at eliminating racial disparities, said Jamila Hodge, director of Vera's Reshaping Prosecution program.

To ensure the work isn't done in a vacuum, the pilot will engage community members, particularly those most impacted by the criminal justice system, to develop plans. Line-attorneys will also receive in-depth training and education on the changes.

Ramsey County was a natural choice given the work Ramsey County Attorney John Choi did to help lay the groundwork for the initiative, as well as his offices' commitment to reform, Hodge said.

Ramsey County Attorney's Office named pilot site for national program aimed at reducing racial disparities in criminal justice system

Ramsey County adopted a policy last year to stop prosecuting low-level marijuana possession, for example, and adopted another policy that instructs prosecutors to consider the collateral consequences of charging decisions, such as their impact on an individual's immigration status.

"We tried to pick three places where we can push and push hard for real change," Hodge said. "I think Ramsey County, under John's leadership, presents us with that opportunity."

TIMING 'COULDN'T BE MORE IMPORTANT'

Ramsey County applied for the spot last year, long before protests erupted across the country after George Floyd's handcuffed body went limp under the knee of a Minneapolis police officer.

With that in mind, the timing of this work "couldn't be more important," Choi said.

"I used to be a prosecutor that believed these issues were so complex that a lot of it was out of my control," Choi said. "Now I have come to believe that a prosecutor can play an important role ... in helping ensure justice for everybody, and that means paying attention to racial disparities, and more importantly, doing something about them."

While his office has been committed to reform for years, Choi described most of that work to date as "tinkering" with the "entrance" and "exit" ramps of the criminal justice system.

This work will focus on overhauling "the highway," he said.

An example he pointed to was the juvenile system, where his office has tested the waters of involving community members in not only charging decisions, but also in deciding appropriate consequences.

INVOLVING COMMUNITY MEMBERS, OTHER LEGAL OFFICIALS

Community members and other justice partners - probation, police, child protection, public defenders - could get more heavily involved at the adult level as well, Choi said, emphasizing that change is necessary.

In Ramsey County, 67 percent of adults in the criminal justice system are people of color, while they make up 37 percent of the county's population, for example, according to his office.

The disparities, which persist nationwide, are the result of a system built to find new ways to enslave the Black community after formal slavery was abolished, Hodge said.

Black people were arrested for minor offenses, such as vagrancy or being out in public without written permission, to create ways to lease them back to the plantations where they were formerly enslaved, she explained. The War on Drugs is a more modern example of a practice that led to the mass incarceration of Black people, she said.

One of the leading action steps outlined in the initiative is to train prosecutors on local discriminatory practices and policies, Hodge continued, noting that understanding how the criminal justice system evolved is key to reshaping it.

She said she is aware that some ideas might appear radical, such as not considering criminal history in charging decisions, but urged people to stay open to their merit.

Ramsey County Attorney's Office named pilot site for national program aimed at reducing racial disparities in criminal justice system

Black communities have historically been over-policed, which has impacted criminal records, so relying on that in present charging decisions can further perpetuate a problem, she said.

Plus an individual's past conduct has no bearing on whether a prosecutor has enough evidence to prove a present allegation, she added.

CUSTOMIZED TO INDIVIDUAL COMMUNITIES

Each pilot program will be customized to individual communities, and no decisions have been made yet on which policy or prosecutorial changes will take place where.

The data, and engagement with the community, will drive those decisions, Hodge said, adding that the organizations' will continue to study the data after changes have been made to see if they really help.

Meanwhile, Robert Small, executive director of the Minnesota County Attorneys Association, said the association as a whole hasn't talked about what role, if any, prosecutors should play in eliminating racial disparities, though it has offered quite a bit of training on implicit bias.

He wasn't surprised to hear Choi's office was examining it though. Choi led the association two years ago.

"I would say John is a progressive thinker and that he was a leader on progressive thinking in our office so I think this sounds like a great pilot for his office to be involved in," Small said.

Choi said he is excited about the work ahead for his office, noting that he expects it will trigger some opposition and hard conversations. That's necessary though, he said.

"We are not going to get anywhere unless people start understanding some of the historical harms that we have done and to own and acknowledge some of the bad things about our criminal justice system," he said. "From there we can start building something new and something better." Minneapolis mayor: City seeks right mentors for new officers Why are these shoe shiners polishing St. Paul officers' boots? To give back, find common ground Walz renews pitch for federal aid in cleanup in aftermath of George Floyd unrest British paper publishes police bodycam video of Floyd arrest Navy investigates video of dogs attacking Colin Kaepernick fill-in

Graphic

Ramsey County Attorney John Choi.(Jean Pieri / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

Three non-profits create fund for minority-owned businesses in Twin Cities

ARTICLE MCV. THREE NON-PROFITS CREATE FUND FOR MINORITY-OWNED BUSINESSES IN TWIN CITIES

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 8, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 234 words

Byline: Bob Shaw

Highlight: Three large non-profits are donating $2.5 million to minority-owned businesses damaged in rioting after the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis. The Greater Twin Cities United Way, The Minneapolis Foundation and the St. Paul & Minnesota Foundation created the fund. The Twin Cities Rebuild for the Future Fund will support businesses owned by "Black people, [...]"

Body

Three large non-profits are donating $2.5 million to minority-owned businesses damaged in rioting after the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis.

The Greater Twin Cities United Way, The Minneapolis Foundation and the St. Paul & Minnesota Foundation created the fund. The Twin Cities Rebuild for the Future Fund will support businesses owned by "Black people, indigenous people and people of color," according to the United Way.

Protests and riots occurred along Lake Street in Minneapolis, in North Minneapolis and on University Avenue in St. Paul, wrecking dozens of businesses in the days after Floyd's death.

The money will be given to 11 local non-profits, including the African Development Center and the Latino Economic Development Center. Those non-profits will manage and distribute the funds to help the businesses. The United Way reported that 200 individuals and 22 companies and foundations donated the money for the fund. Three nonprofits - Dodge Nature Center, Catholic Charities, Hennepin Healthcare Foundation - warn of information theft 180 Degrees awarded \$450,000 grant to expand prevention, intervention of sex-trafficking MN food charities expect demand to increase when extra \$600 unemployment money ends School supply drive will be held virtually this year, sponsored by United Way, Minnesota United A \$600 weekly boost for the unemployed expires July 25. What happens then?

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

ARTICLE MCVI. WOMEN MUSICIANS PITCH A 'SAFE SPACE'

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 8, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 542 wordsByline: CHRIS RIEMENSCHNEIDER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Launched via a $5 million GoFundMe campaign, Auntie's will be owned by women of color.Body

After dozens of women spoke up with stories of abuse and harassment in the Twin Cities music scene via social media two weeks ago, three prominent local musicians have kicked off a fundraiser campaign to open a safe-haven music venue operated by women of color.

With no set location yet but a firm name in mind - Auntie's - hip-hop and R&B stars Sophia Eris, Lady Midnight and DJ Keezy announced their intentions last week along with an ambitious $5 million GoFundMe campaign to get the venue up and running.

"With the recent uprising ignited from the murder of George Floyd combined with accusations of abuse in the music community, the need for a safe space is evident and urgent," the power trio wrote at the start of their GoFundMe mission statement.

"Auntie's will be a venue owned by womxn of color rooted in radical freedom of expression without judgment. Leading with loving accountability, it will provide a safe space that presents performance, fosters healing and provides professional knowledge. Highlighting powerful femininity, Auntie's welcomes people of any age, race, gender or sexual orientation to leave our space feeling empowered, inspired and supported."

Response has been swift and in some cases rapturous, with $37,000 raised in the first 24 hours and a widespread show of support from the Twin Cities music scene and beyond.

"You all are being the change we need," ex-MPR producer Jeyca Maldonado posted with her donation.

"We can't imagine better people to be leaders in the Twin Cities," Justin "Bon Iver" Vernon tweeted.

The three women behind Auntie's have diverse musical backgrounds and amount to a wide range of experience.

Women musicians pitch a 'safe space'

Sophia Eris spent most of 2019 on tour with Lizzo while also releasing singles under her own name and serving as an on-air host at Go 95.3 FM.

Keezy recently toured as Atmosphere's opener and is the chief organizer of the Klituation dance parties, which have packed First Ave and other spaces with all-female or gender-fluid performers.

And the ethereally voiced Lady Midnight has been performing all over town - from Icehouse to the Turf Club - after dropping her acclaimed album "Death Before Mourning" last year and guesting on a wide variety of other artists' tracks, including at least one male artist beset with allegations.

While they listed a wide variety of idealistic plans to set their dream venue apart - they even pledged to enlist mental health and sex abuse experts as advisers - many logistical questions remain, including the size, shape and location of the place and a targeted opening date.

This would not be the first Twin Cities music venue operated by women minorities, as their post claims. Arnellia's in St. Paul and El Nuevo Rodeo in Minneapolis were owned and run for decades by women of color, but each is now closed (the latter destroyed by arsonists in the E. Lake Street riots after George Floyd's tragic death).

Of course, any timetable for opening hinges on the ongoing pandemic and limited-capacity issues plaguing music spaces around the world.

For now, though, it's nice to at least have Auntie's as a goal to aim for once live music can rise again - and to help ensure not everything will return to normal in the Twin Cities scene.

Chris Riemenschneider · 612-673-4658

@ChrisRstrib

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

How Henry Jimenez is helping Latino-owned businesses through the pandemic

ARTICLE MCVII. HOW HENRY JIMENEZ IS HELPING LATINO-OWNED BUSINESSES THROUGH THE PANDEMIC

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

July 8, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 1357 words

Byline: Iain Carlos

Body

Henry Jimenez is the executive director and president of Latino Economic Development Center (LEDC), a St. Paul-based community development financial institution (CDFI) dedicated to bolstering Latino-owned businesses in Minnesota. The organization has helped lead a number of well-known Twin Cities businesses to success, including the Cooperative Mercado Central, Plaza Latina and Midtown Global Market.

Jimenez, a Las Vegas native, had successful tenures as executive director of Central Area Neighborhood Development Organization in Minneapolis and the Minnesota Council on Latino Affairs prior to taking the helm of LEDC. His career has centered around providing resources to and amplifying the voices of Latino entrepreneurs and community members in Minnesota.

As the Covid-19 crisis and anti-racist efforts have gripped the Twin Cities, the Business Journal spoke with Jimenez about his recent work with Latino-owned businesses and what might be done to help them prosper. His comments have been edited for clarity and brevity.

How Henry Jimenez is helping Latino-owned businesses through the pandemic

How have Latino-owned businesses been affected by the Covid-19 crisis?

There was a lot of attention on the federal programs that were available for small businesses. To receive a lot of that funding from the federal government, you have to have a Social Security number and be a legal resident in the country. Not that all Latino businesses are undocumented folks, because that's not the case, but there really is a good number of immigrant-owned businesses that are working under an Individual Taxpayer Identification Number (ITIN), which is a federally provided number to do your taxes. ITIN users do not qualify for PPP or any of the other loan programs that came out. They are impacted by not being able to be on an even playing field with their colleagues next door to them who might have received support to pay their employees while these folks were trying to make it without any funding.

Even the state and municipal emergency funding programs that were available, I think that a lot of these small businesses are already so small and so busy trying to stay afloat and solvent that if they didn't have a close connection to organizations like LEDC or other CDFIs, they may have missed knowing about these programs and it saddens me. We did as much as we could to communicate with the few thousand contacts that we have. During the beginning parts of Covid-19, it was difficult to keep our team members safe and also the business owners safe, while at the same time trying to help them apply to these programs.

What is the importance of the Latino Economic Center and other CDFIs?

There's a reason why CDFIs like Latino Economic Development Center exist. The business owners, the entrepreneurs we work with, when they walked into a bank, whatever their proposal might have been, they must have been considered a high-risk loan. The bank likely told that business owner or entrepreneur, "We're not going to give you a loan on this" because they thought it was too risky. I can tell you that a significant number of our clients have been told "no" by multiple banks in their community.

When they come to us, it's different. We know what the needs of our community are. We have a better sense of what goods or services are needed, and when someone comes around with a great idea of some sort, sometimes we're kind of amazed that they said no to this individual. I can give you examples of businesses that have grown to be big enough that I can guarantee you that any bank would be ready to fund their next project. We exist because we do take those risks, but we're doing very well with our loan portfolio.

The entrepreneurial spirit of Latinos and other immigrant business owners is so strong that they give it their all to make sure that their business thrives and stays solvent. I think that somehow some of that is kind of hard to quantify as a traditional loan office. They don't consider that, but we consider that. And I think that that is one of the denominators of success for these businesses.

How have damages from the riots in the wake of the killing of George Floyd affected Latino-owned businesses and what has moving forward looked like?

There are several buildings that were damaged or destroyed that didn't just house one business, they housed multiple tenants. Plaza Mexico, for example. I estimate there's probably over 80 Latino-owned businesses there. Not only was the building damaged, there's now major street-construction in the front. These businesses are going to have a significantly hard time getting back and running. What we've been trying to do is figure out what is the quickest fix so they can start earning an income as we deal with insurance companies. We've been helping fix windows and doors.

How Henry Jimenez is helping Latino-owned businesses through the pandemic

There's folks that had insurance and others that didn't have insurance or were under-insured. But even the folks that had insurance are not necessarily covered because there are clauses that riots are not something that the insurance companies cover.

We are trying very hard to work with other partners, with folks who have talked about pro bono services, there are law firms that are helping to look into these claims.

And the Lake Street Council has done a phenomenal job of working with us and other companies and agencies trying to support the area.

One thing I've seen among all of our Latino-business owners and immigrant business-owners - they say, "Hey, I came to this country with not much in my pockets, and I was able to build a successful business. It's damaged or destroyed now, but I've done it before, I'm going to do it again." There's this resilience among this group of business-owners and it's time for us to invest in them.

How can Latino businesses be better supported in the Twin Cities?

Any government system, any program, I think that we need to start having these institutions be more creative themselves instead of having the businesses be the creative minds. How do we make sure that everything is more easily accessible? For example, it might be more work on the upfront to translate things into different languages, but the benefit would be that a lot more people would be able to access these programs for funding opportunities. Instead of putting the burden on the applicants themselves, government and other agencies putting out funding should take the extra step to make sure that they're more inclusive in the communities that they're trying to address.

When we think about entrepreneurs and businesses, I always tell my clients, "First of all, we want to make sure you make money." When people make money, they're paying taxes, they're contributing, they're creating jobs. So we really should be talking about how we make sure that people make money.

What I find is that all of our clients, the very first thing they do after they receive any type of assistance from our organization, the first they want, for the most part, is "OK, when is my first loan payment due, and how can I help? How can I give back to this organization and give back to my community?" I think that if these small entrepreneurs, small businesses are successful in making money, they do give back, they will give back, and they will do it by creating jobs again. A lot of our entrepreneurs, a lot of our businesses, were some of the folks that were donating to the families that need food right now or services when they themselves are the ones that are hurting, too. I can only imagine that if they were making even more money, how much more would they be contributing to their own communities. I have no doubt that they would, and that's why we should be investing in small businesses, because they'll give back. They already do.

Executive director and president, Latino Economic Development Center

Age: 35

Education: Master's degree in advocacy and political leadership from the University of Minnesota Duluth, B.A. in women's studies and political science

Hobbies: No time for hobbies, but I need one. If I have time, it's for my kids Lucia and Javier in the playground.

How Henry Jimenez is helping Latino-owned businesses through the pandemic

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: July 8, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCVIII. NEW DISTILLERY TO OPEN IN NORTHEAST MINNEAPOLIS

Finance and Commerce

July 8, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 BridgeTower Media All Rights Reserved

FINANCE & COMMERCESection: NEWSLength: 631 wordsByline: Brian JohnsonBody

With an eye toward social justice, a local distillery vows to make high-end hooch with a heart at a new space in northeast Minneapolis.

Minneapolis-based Brother Justus Whiskey Co. aims to produce up to 40,000 gallons per year of what it calls “Minnesota-style American single malt whiskey” within the new distillery and bar at 3300 Fifth St. NE.

Brother Justus said this week it has signed a lease with First & First, a Minneapolis-based real estate development company, to occupy 14,000 square feet of space in the building. First & First typically buys and renovates older buildings that need updates.

Designed by local architect Aaron Wittkamper, the space will include a 4,000-square-foot “whiskey-centric cocktail room” and “will be suitable for social distancing and fully accessible to people with disabilities,” the company says. Brother Justus has tapped Minneapolis-based Building Assets for construction duties.

“We want to completely reimagine how a distillery could look,” Kate-Madonna Hinds, communications manager for Brother Justus Whiskey Co., said in an interview. “We want people to feel like it’s high-end without feeling high-brow.”

Wittkamper, of Minneapolis-based Wittkamper Studio, said the space will feature ample wood and natural light and create a “calming or elevating experience.” One design goal is to pull back the curtain on the whiskey-making operation.

A large grain silo, for example, will be on display out front. From there, guests can see delivery trucks unload grain into the silo, and follow the fermenting and distilling process as it winds through the production area, he said. Tours will be available.

“It’s meant to be very open book. You can see what’s going on. It’s not in a back room somewhere,” said Wittkamper, who has designed more than a dozen local craft breweries.

Founded in 2014, Brother Justus Whiskey Co. describes itself as one of the “oldest and smallest of the new wave of craft distilleries in Minnesota.” Within its current location, at 451 Taft St. NE in Minneapolis, Brother Justus produces about 2,000 gallons of whiskey each year.

New distillery to open in northeast Minneapolis

The new facility is expected to open in late October roughly two years after Brother Justus began distributing its first bottles, which hit the shelves after the upstart distillery spent four years “perfecting its remedies and inventing innovative techniques,” the company said.

Brother Justus Whiskey Co. said the new operation will follow the example of its namesake, who reputedly taught bootlegging Minnesota farmers to make salable Benedictine-style rotgut during Prohibition, thus giving them a way out of poverty.

At the new facility, Brother Justus Whiskey Co. will make a special effort to create jobs for people who face “structural barriers to economic opportunity and employment,” company officials say.

Alluding to the COVID-19 crisis and the Memorial Day death of George Floyd in Minneapolis, Brother Justus Whiskey Co. Founder Phil Steger said in a press release that it’s “more important than ever that we contribute to positive change for our community and invest in values of justice, opportunities and stewardship.”

“The historical Brother Justus created opportunities for people facing tough times,” Steger added. “And he held himself to the highest standards of craft and care for the well-being of others. We can’t do less.”

Hindes said, “Brother Justus taught families in Minnesota how to make whiskey with respect for the craft, cultivating it from a love of the land and the people. That is how we try to build our business.”

RELATED: Distiller to be latest Keller Building tenant

[divider]

Like this article? Gain access to all of our great content with a month-to-month subscription. Start your subscription here.

Copyright © 2020 BridgeTower Media. All Rights Reserved.

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

ARTICLE MCIX. REPUBLICANS ASSAIL LAW ENFORCEMENT AFTER ACTIVISTS FELL MN'S COLUMBUS STATUE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 8, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 856 words

Byline: Dana Ferguson

Highlight: "People in my district watched what went on and are frustrated, furious, mad, angry to watch what happened on our Capitol grounds that day," Sen. John Jasinski, R-Faribault, said.

Body

A rehashing of the demonstrations that toppled the Christopher Columbus statue at the Minnesota Capitol and the law enforcement reaction that failed to prevent the removal drew sharp condemnation from Minnesota Senate Republicans Wednesday.

A joint Senate committee weighed the removal in the latest hearing in a series of discussions aimed at reviewing the impact of civil unrest in Minneapolis and St. Paul following the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police.

The discussion echoes a national dialogue about racial equity and whether monuments honoring slave owners or historical figures with a record of racism should continue to stand. President Donald Trump and Republicans have sought to defend the monuments as part of the country's history. Opponents, meanwhile, have said the nation can't have a meaningful discussion while the monuments stand or remain without additional context.

Law enforcement officers who responded to the pulling down of the statue on June 10 said they initially sent a tribal liaison to speak with demonstrators about legal procedures to request the statue's removal. And they had prepared to deploy armored troopers if the situation warranted it.

But a faulty timeline for the statue's teardown resulted in slow response, Minnesota State Patrol Col. Matt Langer said. Langer said troopers saw social media posts that indicated demonstrators would arrive later than they did that day and they expected the statue would take longer to pull down than it did.

Facing those expedited events, Langer said troopers weighed the safety of demonstrators and law enforcement officers before responding. He said they avoided using force or chemical agents because children and protesters were present and they determined not making an immediate arrest at the scene could limit tensions between demonstrators and troopers.

Republicans assail law enforcement after activists fell MN's Columbus statue

"I'm not suggesting this was flawless or a victory for our organization or for the state of Minnesota, but in the end, the statue came down illegally, nobody was hurt, we know who did it and we have the statue," Langer said.

Columbus, who is often said to have "discovered" the Americas, brutalized the Indigenous people upon his arrival and sold Native people, including children, into slavery. The statue sustained about $154,000 in damage, state officials said, and anyone found guilty after investigation and prosecution could face 10 years in prison and a $10,000 fine.

Republicans on the panel questioned Langer and Department of Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington about the statue's toppling and said more should've been done.

"People in my district watched what went on and are frustrated, furious, mad, angry to watch what happened on our Capitol grounds that day," Sen. John Jasinski, R-Faribault, said. "(There was) $153,000 in damage in front of all the news channels and no arrests were made."

Langer and Harrington defended the state's response and acknowledged the situation wasn't handled perfectly.

"We chose discretion, and for that, we can be accused of many different things," Langer said. He noted in response to senators' questions that no one had asked the troopers to stand down.

Harrington told lawmakers that neither he nor Gov. Tim Walz's administration issued any order for troopers to stand down in the face of demonstrators.

Langer and Harrington said the Department of Public Safety and State Patrol would run a follow-up review of their actions and aim to prepare a plan based on that for similar situations that could emerge in the future.

Democrats on the panel said the Senate should place the same amount of time and importance it dedicated to a statue to reviewing and responding to Floyd's killing at the hands of Minneapolis police.

"Back on Memorial Day, someone was killed. It wasn't a statue that wasn't breathing. Let's spend that much time that we spend today talking about that incident and why it happened and the consequences that led to it and the tragic result," Sen. Melisa Franzen, D-Edina, said. "We have to have rule of law, no one's questioning that, there's a process, but we also have to go back and talk about the root of the problem."

Republicans on the panel said allowing the toppling without interference or arrests could inspire others to unlawfully remove statues or monuments elsewhere.

Voters, GOP lawmakers plan lawsuit over Walz's mask mandate at polling places State Patrol cancels police academy class 'due to lack of funding' Minnesota will close 2 prisons to prepare for budget shortfall. Other agencies face holes, too. MN tobacco age increases to 21 on Aug. 1 Decisions on MN Capitol artwork will take months; task forces formed will seek public input "Tolerance of lawless behavior begets more lawless behavior, and I think we've been witnessing that," Sen. David Osmeck, R-Mound, said.

Other GOP lawmakers said the statue should be repaired and placed back on its pedestal at the Capitol as the state's Capitol Area Architectural and Planning (CAAP) Board sets a review process for taking down statues.

Republicans assail law enforcement after activists fell MN's Columbus statue

Lawmakers are expected to return to the Capitol Monday, July 13, for a special legislative session.

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

End of Document

Medical experts: Floyd's speech didn't mean he could breathe

ARTICLE MCX. MEDICAL EXPERTS: FLOYD'S SPEECH DIDN'T MEAN HE COULD BREATHE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 9, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1132 words

Byline: Amy Forliti

Highlight: "The ability to speak does not mean the patient is without danger," said Dr. Mariell Jessup, chief science and medical officer of the American Heart Association.

Body

MINNEAPOLIS - As George Floyd repeatedly pleaded "I can't breathe" to police officers holding him down on a Minneapolis street corner, some of the officers responded by pointing out he was able to speak. One told Floyd it takes "a lot of oxygen" to talk, while another told angry bystanders that Floyd was "talking, so he can breathe."

That reaction - seen in police restraint deaths around the country - is dangerously wrong, medical experts say. While it would be right to believe a person who can't talk also cannot breathe, the reverse is not true - speaking does not imply that someone is getting enough air to survive.

"The ability to speak does not mean the patient is without danger," said Dr. Mariell Jessup, chief science and medical officer of the American Heart Association.

"To speak, you only have to move air through the upper airways and the vocal cords, a very small amount," and that does not mean that enough air is getting down into the lungs where it can supply the rest of the body with oxygen, said Dr. Gary Weissman, a lung specialist at the University of Pennsylvania.

The false perception that someone who can speak can also take in enough air is not part of any known police training curriculum or practices, according to experts on police training and use of force.

"I'm not aware of any standard training of police officers that lets them know, 'Hey, if someone is still able to talk they are not having difficulty breathing, so you can just keep doing what you are doing,'" said Craig Futterman, professor at University of Chicago Law School and an expert on use of force.

Floyd, a Black man who was handcuffed, died May 25 after Derek Chauvin, a white police officer, pressed his knee on Floyd's neck for nearly 8 minutes, keeping Floyd pinned even after he stopped moving. In the moments before he died, Floyd told police he couldn't breathe more than 20 times.

Medical experts: Floyd's speech didn't mean he could breathe

A transcript from one of two police body camera videos released Wednesday shows that at one point after Floyd said he couldn't breathe and was being killed, Chauvin said: " Then stop talking, stop yelling. It takes a heck of a lot of oxygen to talk."

Widely viewed bystander video shows Tou Thao, the officer who was managing people who had gathered, told the concerned crowd, "He's talking, so he can breathe."

The medical community disagrees.

In a recent article in the medical journal Annals of Internal Medicine, Weissman and others wrote that when air is inhaled, it first fills the upper airway, trachea and bronchi, where speech is generated. The article says this "anatomical dead space" accounts for about one third of the volume of an ordinary breath, and only air that gets beyond this space goes to air sacs in the lungs for gas exchange, which is when oxygen is sent to the bloodstream and carbon dioxide is removed as waste.

The volume of an ordinary breath is about 400 to 600 mL, but normal speech requires about 50 mL of gas per syllable, so saying the words "I can't breathe" would require 150 mL of gas, the authors wrote.

A person can utter words by exhaling alone, using reserve left over after a normal breath is exhaled. But, the article says, "adequate gas exchange to support life requires inhalation. ... Waiting until a person loses the ability to speak may be too late to prevent catastrophic cardiopulmonary collapse."

Minneapolis police spokesman John Elder said there is nothing in current training that instructs officers that a person who can talk while restrained is able to breathe. He said training surrounding the issue of talking and ability to breathe comes up only when discussing whether someone can speak or cough while choking on a foreign object - and even then, the person's condition must be reassessed. Chief Medaria Arradondo has also said the restraint used by Chauvin was not taught by his department.

But the misperception that a talking person is able to breathe has also come up in other high-profile in-custody deaths.

Craig McKinnis died in May 2014 in Kansas City, Kansas, after he was restrained by police during a traffic stop. According to a federal lawsuit, McKinnis' girlfriend said that after McKinnis cried, "I can't breathe," one of the officers said, "If you can talk, you can breathe."

Eric Garner cried out "I can't breathe" 11 times on a street in Staten Island, New York, in July 2014 after he was arrested for selling loose, untaxed cigarettes. Video shot by a bystander showed officers and paramedics milling around without any seeming urgency as Garner lay on the street, slowly going limp.

Officer Daniel Pantaleo, who performed the chokehold, was fired. Pantaleo's defenders have included Rep. Peter King, a New York Republican, who said at the time that police were right to ignore Garner's pleas that he couldn't breathe.

"The fact that he was able to say it meant he could breathe," said King, the son of a police officer.

"And if you've ever seen anyone locked up, anyone resisting arrest, they're always saying, 'You're breaking my arm, you're killing me, you're breaking my neck.' So if the cops had eased up or let him go at that stage, the whole struggle would have started in again."

Medical experts: Floyd's speech didn't mean he could breathe

Futterman said best practices offer police training on positional asphyxiation and teach officers to roll a person onto his or her side for recovery, if necessary. And, he said, chokeholds or other restraints that restrict oxygen are considered deadly force, and can only be used as a last resort to prevent imminent threat of death or serious bodily harm.

Lawyer for ex-officer says he only did crowd control during George Floyd's arrest Proposal to disband Minneapolis police blocked from ballot Local businesses damaged during George Floyd unrest can apply for disaster loans from SBA Minneapolis mayor: City seeks right mentors for new officers Why are these shoe shiners polishing St. Paul officers' boots? To give back, find common ground

He said just because a person is struggling does not give an officer the right to use deadly force.

According to a transcript of his interview with state investigators, Thomas Lane, the officer who was at Floyd's legs, said that he'd had past experiences in which someone who was overdosing would pass out and then come to and be more aggressive. He told investigators that he asked if Floyd should be rolled onto his side, and after Chauvin said they would stay in position, he thought it made sense since an ambulance was on the way. Lane said he watched Floyd and believed he was still breathing.

Randy Shrewberry, executive director of the Institute for Criminal Justice Training Reform, said officers are supposed to ease up on any restraint once a person is under control.

"In the moment they are under control, or the moment you have someone restrained, is when everything stops," Shrewberry said.

Load-Date: August 6, 2020

ARTICLE MCXI. MINNEAPOLIS COUNCIL MEMBERS PLEDGE THOUGHTFUL POLICE REVAMP

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 9, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 438 words

Byline: Associated Press

Highlight: MINNEAPOLIS (AP) - Members of the Minneapolis City Council are pledging a thoughtful approach to their proposal to dismantle the city's police department following the killing of George Floyd.

Body

MINNEAPOLIS - Members of the Minneapolis City Council are pledging a thoughtful approach to their proposal to dismantle the city's police department following the killing of George Floyd.

Council members sought Wednesday to reassure the Minneapolis Charter Commission, with some commissioners expressing concerns that the council was rushing to push through the proposal so voters can decide it in the November election.

The proposal would eliminate the Minneapolis Police Department and replace it with a new agency, the Department of Community Safety and Violence Prevention. The commission needs to sign off on the question by Aug. 21 for it to be possible to make the November ballot.

Council member Alondra Cano told the Charter Commission that the council has tried to reform the police department for the past five years, and she saw all of that work "go down the drain" when Floyd, a handcuffed Black man, died May 25 after a white Minneapolis police officer pressed his knee against Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes. Floyd's death sparked protests around the world.

Commissioner Andrea Rubenstein asked how the council would address people's fears that the process is rushed and lacks details and planning.

"What we're actually describing is a much more planful and intentional process than has often been portrayed," answered council member Steve Fletcher, a co-author of the proposal. He said council staff should come back July 24 with a plan for engaging the public on the proposal.

Council member Jeremiah Ellison said the proposed charter amendment would "allow us to reimagine public safety entirely" and would "change the culture of public safety" by deemphasizing the "use of armed force as a response to every situation."

Minneapolis council members pledge thoughtful police revamp

Commissioner Dan Cohen said the Charter Commission should hear from the police rank-and-file and its union representative. The amendment would still allow for armed police officers as part of a division of licensed peace officers who would answer to the new department's director.

"I don't think this should be framed as an anti-police initiative," Cano said. She said officers are welcome to be part of the conversation.

The 15-member commission will hold two public hearings on the amendment, including one on July 15.

Minneapolis mayor: City seeks right mentors for new officers Why are these shoe shiners polishing St. Paul officers' boots? To give back, find common ground Walz renews pitch for federal aid in cleanup in aftermath of George Floyd unrest British paper publishes police bodycam video of Floyd arrest Navy investigates video of dogs attacking Colin Kaepernick fill-in

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

'We don't think we did this all right': State leaders weigh in on response to Minneapolis riots

ARTICLE MCXII. 'WE DON'T THINK WE DID THIS ALL RIGHT': STATE LEADERS WEIGH IN ON RESPONSE TO MINNEAPOLIS RIOTS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 9, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 801 words

Byline: Dana Ferguson

Highlight: Top law enforcement leaders said earlier deployment of National Guard members in Minneapolis and St. Paul could've mitigated the damage that resulted in May.

Body

Top law enforcement leaders on Thursday said earlier deployment of National Guard members to assist in the response to protests, arson fires and looting in Minneapolis and St. Paul could've mitigated the damage that resulted in May.

It's the first time state law enforcement officers have chronicled in-depth their efforts to respond to the protests.

Tens of thousands of people took to the streets in the Twin Cities to demonstrate after George Floyd's death after former Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin knelt on his neck on May 25. And after a night of initial protests, some began setting fire to businesses and breaking into dozens of stores.

The fires and looting affected or destroyed 1,500 businesses and racked up more than $500 million in damages. Gov. Tim Walz has sought federal help from the Trump administration to rebuild.

Heads of the Minnesota National Guard and Department of Public Safety on Thursday told a Senate panel that their reaction lagged as civil unrest grew beyond what state officials expected and as National Guard officials attempted to reset plans to mobilize an appropriate number of members to address the scene.

Republican lawmakers on the panel were quick to criticize the response, saying top officials should've stepped in sooner to limit the damage from the riots.

"I question whether you and the governor failed to recognize the threat to public safety in Minneapolis and St. Paul in time," Sen. Scott Newman, R-Hutchinson, said. "Clearly the level of criminal violence was escalating rapidly."

Minnesota National Guard Adjutant Gen. Jon Jensen said he and other public safety officials on May 27 began preparing to deploy 200 service members to help respond to civil unrest in Minneapolis and St. Paul. But it became clear later that Wednesday, as demonstrators started arson fires around Minneapolis and again Thursday, May 28, as people set ablaze Minneapolis' third police precinct, that more members would be needed.

'We don't think we did this all right': State leaders weigh in on response to Minneapolis riots

"It immediately occurred to me that 200 wasn't going to be enough," Jensen said.

On Thursday, May 28, Jensen and Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington agreed to send in hundreds more members than they'd initially planned. And they started preparing 700 trained guardsmen to get to the Twin Cities to respond to the unrest. The State Patrol, Department of Natural Resources and several local law enforcement agencies had already sent in additional officers to help Minneapolis and St. Paul police.

"My assessment of the situation is that it's not a light switch, it's not on or off, it's more like a dimmer," Jensen said. "It's on super bright Thursday night, our ability to begin dimming that light is what we were working toward."

Walz on Thursday, May 28, said he would call in guardsmen to help local law enforcement respond to the protests, fires and looting. And a formal written order came out early Friday, May 29.

And slowly, the enhanced presence began rolling out across the Twin Cities and gradually assisted in quelling the civil unrest. But less than 24 hours after sending out National Guard members, Jensen and Walz realized they needed a stronger presence. And early Saturday, May 30, they called on more than 7,000 members from around the region to respond.

At the same time, National Guard leaders began wondering whether their approach could adversely affect other cities if similar demonstrations cropped up there.

"While we were all focused on Minneapolis and St. Paul, we weren't sure if Rochester or Duluth or Mankato or Bemidji was going to be the next Minneapolis," Jensen said. "What happens if we are all so solely focused on Minneapolis that something in Duluth happens? We needed to have that opportunity to immediately respond."

Guardsmen were later deployed to Moorhead to assist with managing civil unrest there.

Harrington said top law enforcement leaders thought initial demonstrations would end during that week following Floyd's death and pick up again over the weekend. And as they began preparations for demonstrations they expected could bring out 75,000 people that Saturday, other protests and riots picked up across the region, exceeding local law enforcement's capacity to respond.

"We're not perfect, we don't think we did this all right," Harrington told lawmakers. "There are lessons to be learned from those experiences and if we are smart, which I think we are, we are not going to have to go down that same road again."

Voters, GOP lawmakers plan lawsuit over Walz's mask mandate at polling places State Patrol cancels police academy class 'due to lack of funding' Minnesota will close 2 prisons to prepare for budget shortfall. Other agencies face holes, too. MN tobacco age increases to 21 on Aug. 1 Decisions on MN Capitol artwork will take months; task forces formed will seek public input

Load-Date: August 6, 2020

'We don't think we did this all right': State leaders weigh in on response to Minneapolis riots

End of Document

George Floyd transcript: Read it in full here

ARTICLE MCXIII. GEORGE FLOYD TRANSCRIPT: READ IT IN FULL HERE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 9, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 130 words

Byline: The Associated Press

Highlight: Transcripts of body camera recordings from Minneapolis police were made public Wednesday, giving a more detailed account of events surrounding the death of George Floyd. The transcripts were part of a request by attorneys for former officer Thomas Lane to have charges against him dismissed. Lane was one of four officers charged in the death [...]

Body

Transcripts of body camera recordings from Minneapolis police were made public Wednesday, giving a more detailed account of events surrounding the death of George Floyd.

The transcripts were part of a request by attorneys for former officer Thomas Lane to have charges against him dismissed. Lane was one of four officers charged in the death of Floyd. Read the full transcript below.

Lawyer for ex-officer says he only did crowd control during George Floyd's arrest Proposal to disband Minneapolis police blocked from ballot Local businesses damaged during George Floyd unrest can apply for disaster loans from SBA Minneapolis mayor: City seeks right mentors for new officers Why are these shoe shiners polishing St. Paul officers' boots? To give back, find common ground

Load-Date: August 6, 2020

ARTICLE MCXIV. FACT CHECK: TRUMP TEAM DISTORTIONS ON BIDEN AND POLICE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 9, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 997 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: WASHINGTON (AP) - President Donald Trump's campaign team is misrepresenting Democratic rival Joe Biden's stance on improving police practices following George Floyd's death.Body

By HOPE YEN

WASHINGTON (AP) - President Donald Trump's campaign team is misrepresenting Democratic rival Joe Biden's stance on improving police practices following George Floyd's death.

In ads and emails this week, the Trump campaign and the Republican National Committee assert that Biden would "defund the police." That's not Biden's position. The former vice president has repeatedly made clear he would boost money for social services and condition federal dollars on police adhering to standards of decency.

Meanwhile, Biden left out some context when he asserted that Trump had ordered the government to slow down coronavirus testing.

A look at some of the claims from the campaign:

TRUMP on BIDEN

TRUMP campaign ad, playing out a scenario where a person needing help calls the police during a Biden presidency and gets a voice recording: "You have reached the 911 police emergency line. Due to defunding of the police department, we're sorry but no one is here to take your call." The ad closes with the message: "You won't be safe in Joe Biden's America."

THE FACTS: Biden has not joined the call of protesters who demanded "defund the police" after Floyd's killing in Minneapolis. Biden has proposed more money for police, conditioned on improvements in their practices.

"I don't support defunding the police," Biden said last month in a CBS interview. But he said he would support tying federal aid to police based on whether "they meet certain basic standards of decency, honorableness and, in fact, are able to demonstrate they can protect the community, everybody in the community."

Biden added in remarks Wednesday to reporters: "We don't have to defund the police departments, we have to make sure they meet minimum basic standards of decency."

Biden's criminal justice agenda, released long before he became the Democrats' presumptive presidential nominee, proposes more federal money for "training that is needed to avert tragic, unjustifiable deaths" and hiring more officers to ensure that departments are racially and ethnically reflective of the populations they serve.

Specifically, he calls for a $300 million infusion into federal community policing grant programs.

That adds up to more money for police, not defunding law enforcement.

Biden also wants the federal government to spend more on education, social services and struggling areas of cities and rural America, to address the root causes of crime.

Democrats, meanwhile, have pointed to Trump's repeated proposals in the administration's budget to cut community policing and mediation programs at the Justice Department. Congressional Republicans say the program can be effectively merged with other divisions, but Democrats have repeatedly blocked the effort. The program has been used to help provide federal oversight of local police departments.

Despite proposed cuts, Attorney General William Barr last month said the department would use the COPS program funding to hire over 2,700 police officers at nearly 600 departments across the country.

REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE email: "In the wake of rioting, looting, and tragic murders ripping apart communities across the country, Joe Biden said 'Yes, absolutely' he wants to defund the police." - email Wednesday from Steve Guest, RNC's rapid response director.

THE FACTS: That's misleading, a selective use of Biden's words on the subject.

The email links to an excerpted video of Biden's conversation with liberal activist Ady Barkan, who endorsed Biden on Wednesday after supporting Sens. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts and Bernie Sanders of Vermont during the Democratic primaries. A full recording of that conversation provided by the Biden campaign to The Associated Press shows he once again declined to support defunding police.

Barkan raises the issue of police reform and asks whether Biden would funnel money into social services, mental health counseling and affordable housing to help reduce civilian interactions with police.

Biden responds that he is calling for more money for mental health providers but "that's not the same as getting rid of or defunding all the police" and that both approaches are needed, including additional dollars for community police.

Asked again by Barkan, "so we agree that we can redirect some of the funding," Biden then answers "absolutely yes."

Biden then gives the caveat that he means "not just redirect" federal money potentially but "condition" it on police improvements.

"If they don't eliminate chokeholds, they don't get (federal) grants, if they don't do the following, they don't get any help," Biden replied.

"The vast majority of all police departments are funded by the locality, funded by the municipality, funded by the state," he added. "It's only the federal government comes in on top of that, and so it says you want help, you have to do the following reforms.."

BIDEN on TRUMP

BIDEN: "President Trump claimed to the American people that he was a wartime leader, but instead of taking responsibility, Trump has waved a white flag, revealing that he ordered the slowing of testing and having his administration tell Americans that they simply need to 'live with it.' - statement Wednesday marking the rise in U.S. coronavirus infections to more than 3 million.

THE FACTS: To be clear, the government did not slow testing on the orders of the president.

Trump at first denied he was joking when he told a Tulsa, Oklahoma, rally on June 20 that he said "to my people, 'Slow the testing down, please'" because "they test and they test." Days later he said he didn't really mean it.

In any event, a succession of his public health officials testified to Congress that the president never asked them to slow testing and that they were doing all they could to increase it. But testing remains markedly insufficient.

EDITOR'S NOTE - A look at the veracity of claims by political figures.

Find AP Fact Checks at <http://apnews.com/APFactCheck>

Follow @APFactCheck on Twitter: <https://twitter.com/APFactCheck>

Load-Date: August 6, 2020

Cub opens temporary tent store with pharmacy at Lake Street

ARTICLE MCXV. CUB OPENS TEMPORARY TENT STORE WITH PHARMACY AT LAKE STREET

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 9, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1D

Length: 518 words

Byline: JOHN EWOLDT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: A scaled-down version of the closed W. Broadway store will also open soon.

Body

Yes, it's air-conditioned.

That's the first question shoppers may wonder as they make their way to Cub Food's new temporary supermarket on East Lake Street in Minneapolis.

The tent-like structure opened Wednesday in front of the store at 26th Avenue and Lake Street that was badly damaged on May 28 in riots that followed protests over the police killing of George Floyd.

"I live two blocks away and I'm disabled so this is very important to me," Darryl LeVells said as he shopped Wednesday morning. "The selection is very good despite the smaller size and prices seem very reasonable. I got eight pieces of fried chicken for $6.99 instead of $8.99."

For the past several weeks, LeVells said he also been using the free shuttle that takes customers from the Lake Street store to a Cub store at the Quarry in Minneapolis, which was not damaged.

The temporary store includes fresh produce and meat, canned goods, cleaning supplies, frozen foods, dry goods, a pharmacy, wide aisles, and five checkouts.

A service desk sells bus passes and MoneyGrams. Money orders will be available soon. The site also includes a TCF ATM.

"Opening the Cub community market is one of the first steps in bringing the Lake Street community back together," said Cub's chief executive Mike Stigers in a statement. "It's emotional to hear customers share personal stories of what's happened to them over the past month, and I couldn't be more proud of the Cub team who worked quickly to put this plan in place, and get us back in the store to take care of the essential needs of this neighborhood."

The damage from four days of protests that turned violent also encompassed nearby Target and

Cub opens temporary tent store with pharmacy at Lake Street

Aldi stores, turning the area around the busy Lake and Minnehaha intersection into a food desert. Several bank branches in the area - TCF, U.S. Bank and Firefly Credit Union - were also closed.

At its temporary store, Cub allows customers to get $50 in cash with a debit card with purchase.

The original Cub structure on Lake Street is expected to reopen by the end of the year. Once the weather cools, the tent will also be heated.

Cub will soon open another temporary store as a subset of its store on W. Broadway in Minneapolis, which also closed because of riot damage.

Both locations are owned by Jerry's Foods in Edina but are operated by Cub's parent company, United Natural Foods Inc., and considered Cub corporate stores. Jerry's is responsible for rebuilding the stores and transferred many of its employees to other Cub locations.

"UNFI is the franchiser of Cub and they control the brand, the division and the model," said Ben Schultes, vice president of finance for Jerry's Foods. "The lease is in our name and we control the building and the lot, but it made more sense for them to be the operator."

The Broadway store's temporary structure within the existing store will open at some point the week of July 20. The renovation of that location is expected to be finished by October.

"The Broadway store was not destroyed inside like the Lake Street store was," Schultes said. "The coolers and freezers were not destroyed."

John Ewoldt · 612-673-7633

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

Endowment will expand UMN professor's research on health and racial equality

ARTICLE MCXVI. ENDOWMENT WILL EXPAND UMN PROFESSOR'S RESEARCH ON HEALTH AND RACIAL EQUALITY

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 9, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 312 words

Byline: Isabel Saavedra-Weis

Highlight: The Blue Cross Foundation has endowed a professorship at the University of Minnesota School of Public Health to address racial disparities in the state's health care system. The professorship was granted to Rachel Hardeman, P.h.D., an associate professor at the School of Public Health Health Policy and Management Division. The endowment will allow her to [...]

Body

The Blue Cross Foundation has endowed a professorship at the University of Minnesota School of Public Health to address racial disparities in the state's health care system.

The professorship was granted to Rachel Hardeman, P.h.D., an associate professor at the School of Public Health Health Policy and Management Division. The endowment will allow her to expand on her research and instruction regarding the racial implications of health care.

Hardeman will use the endowment to continue examining how race impacts health outcomes, specifically in reproductive care. In the near future, she hopes to fund a new department dedicated to anti-racist research for health equity at the University of Minnesota.

Although discussions about the new endowed professorship were happening before the coronavirus pandemic and the death of George Floyd, both events have heightened the importance of the position, she says.

"People are seeing the disproportionate impact of COVID-19 on Black and brown communities across our country," Hardeman said. "Once you see it, you can't look away."

The Professorship of Health and Racial Equity is the newest version of an endowed professorship established 26 years ago. In 1994 the Blue Cross Foundation gave the University of Minnesota a grant to expand health insurance research after the Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Minnesota's historic lawsuit against the tobacco industry.

"We are thrilled to reinvigorate and evolve this professorship to focus on the defining public health issue of our time: racial and health equity," said Carolyn Link, president of the Blue Cross Foundation.

Endowment will expand UMN professor's research on health and racial equality

UMN marching band prepares for an unprecedented season M Health Fairview offers antibody tests for \$45 It's been four months since Minnesota recorded its first case of COVID-19. What have we learned? U to help international students comply with ICE directive

Graphic

Rachel Hardeman

Load-Date: August 6, 2020

End of Document

NYC mayor helps paint 'Black Lives Matter' outside Trump Tower

ARTICLE MCXVII. NYC MAYOR HELPS PAINT 'BLACK LIVES MATTER' OUTSIDE TRUMP TOWER

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 10, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 404 words

Byline: Karen Matthews

Highlight: New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio grabbed a roller Thursday to paint "Black Lives Matter" in front of the namesake Manhattan tower of President Donald Trump, who tweeted last week that the street mural would be "a symbol of hate."

Body

NEW YORK - New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio grabbed a roller Thursday to paint "Black Lives Matter" in front of the namesake Manhattan tower of President Donald Trump, who tweeted last week that the street mural would be "a symbol of hate."

De Blasio was flanked by his wife, Chirlane McCray, and the Rev. Al Sharpton as he helped paint the racial justice rallying cry in giant yellow letters on Fifth Avenue in front of Trump Tower. Activists watching chanted, "Whose streets? Our streets!"

"When we say 'Black Lives Matter,' there is no more American statement, there is no more patriotic statement because there is no America without Black America," de Blasio said. "We are acknowledging the truth of ourselves as Americans by saying 'Black Lives Matter.' We are righting a wrong."

The mayor announced the plan to paint "Black Lives Matter" in front of Trump Tower last month after earlier saying the slogan would be painted on streets at several locations around the city. Trump responded via Twitter that the mural would denigrate "this luxury Avenue" and "further antagonize New York's Finest." De Blasio tweeted back that "Black Lives Matter is "a movement to recognize and protect the lives of Black people."

Rahima Torrence, 20, who was among the people slapping yellow paint onto Fifth Avenue, said that even though the mural might be a symbol, "it's the beginning of something more." She said the location in front of Trump's own skyscraper "shows that we matter and it shows to him that you can't ignore us."

Washington, D.C. was the first U.S. city to get a giant yellow "Black Lives Matter" mural when Mayor Muriel Bowser had it painted on the street leading to the White House. Bowser said the painting was intended to show solidarity with Americans outraged over the killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis.

NYC mayor helps paint 'Black Lives Matter' outside Trump Tower

Trump lived in Trump Tower before he took office as president but has spent little time there since. He changed his official residence from New York to Florida last year. His business empire is still headquartered there.

Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police Attorney for fired Minneapolis officer says Freeman should be removed from George Floyd case Lawyer for ex-officer says he only did crowd control during George Floyd's arrest Proposal to disband Minneapolis police blocked from ballot

Load-Date: August 7, 2020

End of Document

Lawyer: Over 150 Minneapolis officers seeking disability following unrest

ARTICLE MCXVIII. LAWYER: OVER 150 MINNEAPOLIS OFFICERS SEEKING DISABILITY FOLLOWING UNREST

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 10, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 925 words

Byline: Amy Forliti

Highlight: About three-quarters are citing post-traumatic stress disorder as the reason for their planned departures, according to an attorney representing the officers.

Body

MINNEAPOLIS - More than 150 Minneapolis police officers are filing work-related disability claims after the death of George Floyd and ensuing unrest, with about three-quarters citing post-traumatic stress disorder as the reason for their planned departures, according to an attorney representing the officers.

Their duty disability claims, which will take months to process, come as the city is seeing an increase in violent crime and while city leaders push a proposal to replace the Minneapolis Police Department with a new agency that they say would have a more holistic approach.

While Floyd's death in May and the unrest that followed are not the direct cause of many of the disability requests, attorney Ron Meuser said, those events and what Meuser called a lack of support from city leadership were a breaking point for many who had been struggling with PTSD from years on the job. Duty disability means the officer was disabled while engaged in inherently dangerous acts specific to the job.

"Following the George Floyd incident, unfortunately it became too much and as a result they were unable to, and are unable to, continue on and move forward," Meuser said. "They feel totally and utterly abandoned."

He said many officers he represents were at a precinct that police abandoned as people were breaking in during the unrest. Some officers feared they wouldn't make it home, he said, and wrote final notes to loved ones. People in the crowd ultimately set fire to the building.

Mayor Jacob Frey issued a statement saying that COVID-19 and unrest following Floyd's death tested the community and officers in profound ways. He said cities need resources to reflect the realities on the ground.

"In the meantime, I am committed to supporting those officers committed to carrying out their oath to serve and protect the people of Minneapolis during a challenging time for our city," he said.

Lawyer: Over 150 Minneapolis officers seeking disability following unrest

Meuser said in recent weeks, 150 officers have retained his office for help in filing for duty disability benefits through the state's Public Employment Retirement Association, or PERA. So far, 75 of them have already left the job, he said.

Police spokesman John Elder questioned Meuser's figure of 150, though he does expect an increase in departures. The department currently has about 850 officers and will adjust staffing to ensure it can do its job, he said.

The city said it has received 17 PTSD workers compensation claims in the last month, but when it comes to PERA duty disability, officers are not obligated to notify the Police Department that an application was submitted. Meuser said the city isn't being transparent about departures, and the numbers it sees will lag as PERA benefits take months to process.

Doug Anderson, executive director for PERA, said 150 officers seeking duty disability from one department would be high. PERA approved 105 disability applications from both police and firefighters statewide in all of 2019, including 60 claims for duty-related PTSD and 20 for other work-related injuries.

PERA is primarily a retirement plan, in which members and employers contribute funds. Members who become disabled can receive a disability benefit until age 55, at which time retirement benefits kick in.

A high percentage of those on duty disability do not return to the job, Anderson said.

"It's a disability that as a general rule is a permanent designation entitling them for benefits for the rest of their life," Meuser said.

A high number of people taking PERA disability likely won't impact the city budget immediately, as the city's rate of contribution to the plan is fixed, though the Minnesota Legislature could increase contribution rates. The city can incur significant costs if the leave is classified as "duty disability," because the city would continue to pay for the officer's health insurance.

To apply, an officer needs supporting documents from two physicians. A third-party administrator ensures applications are complete. If there is a discrepancy, PERA can require an independent medical evaluation. The Police Department could also challenge an application, and there is a process for appeal. Denials and appeals are uncommon, Anderson said.

Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police Attorney for fired Minneapolis officer says Freeman should be removed from George Floyd case Infant dies one month after mother died in fatal shooting in Minneapolis Lawyer for ex-officer says he only did crowd control during George Floyd's arrest Proposal to disband Minneapolis police blocked from ballot

Meuser made his announcement amid an increase in violent crime. From Thursday night to Friday morning alone, nine people were shot in Minneapolis, including one fatally. Police data analyzed by the Star Tribune show that at least 243 people have been shot so far this year, compared with 269 in all of 2019.

Asked about his timing, Meuser said he believes Minneapolis officers are being unfairly tarnished, and it's time to call out "decades of failed leadership" in the city.

Meuser opposes calls to dismantle or defund the Police Department, and said he hopes the news that veteran officers are leaving will make the public reassess the city's current trajectory.

Lawyer: Over 150 Minneapolis officers seeking disability following unrest

"The men and women in public safety who give their heart and soul to serve Minneapolis and keep it safe deserve to have Minneapolis leaders to step up and supporting them," he said. "Instead of spending time plotting the dismantling of the force, let's come together to improve community trust and work towards a safer city for all. "

Load-Date: August 7, 2020

End of Document

John Kass: When Black children are killed, where's the outrage from the white and the woke?

ARTICLE MCXIX. JOHN KASS: WHEN BLACK CHILDREN ARE KILLED, WHERE'S THE OUTRAGE FROM THE WHITE AND THE WOKE?

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 10, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 953 words

Byline: John Kass

Highlight: As street violence spikes in big cities across America run by Democrats, as parents grieve the loss of their children in the street gang wars, two things become terribly clear: The first is that Black Lives Matter isn't promoting much, if any, public outrage at city halls run by Democratic Party mayors over urban street [...]

Body

As street violence spikes in big cities across America run by Democrats, as parents grieve the loss of their children in the street gang wars, two things become terribly clear:

The first is that Black Lives Matter isn't promoting much, if any, public outrage at city halls run by Democratic Party mayors over urban street violence that is out of control.

BLM isn't a movement as much as it is a political and fundraising arm, founded by neo-Marxists and currently aligned with the Democratic Party. BLM sees no percentage in pressuring big-city mayors to stop street violence. Its outrage is select and reserved for white police officers who kill unarmed Black men.

But it's the second thing that hardly gets attention from media that skews left, and from Democratic Party politicians:

Those young, white and woke BLM supporters who filled the streets, masked, chanting and angry, in legitimate protests over the Minneapolis police killing of George Floyd by a white police officer aren't venting much public, organized outrage over Black children being slaughtered.

They shouted so loudly and passionately about defunding or abolishing the police, but aren't they also concerned about the lives of Black children being taken in street gang wars across the country?

It's possible they're just terrified and sad and don't know what to do without leaders to herd them. They might need a safe space, even though the children being shot to death don't have a safe space.

Or, could it just be that the protesters, so silent now, see no political advantage for the November elections in drawing attention to the Black children, some as young as 1, who are killed?

John Kass: When Black children are killed, where's the outrage from the white and the woke?

This is July. And what's on their mind is November, November, November.

Nationally, the white protesters who joined BLM and filled the streets during the George Floyd protests are almost sure to vote Democrat in November.

I'll take a leap of faith and guess that the white and woke live in wealthy and working-class neighborhoods. Many no doubt are from white suburbs, and their parents are Democratic Party donors.

They don't live in neighborhoods where car doors open and guns come out and children are killed almost every day. And so from them, we hear nothing but summer crickets.

Then the bullets start flying again, in cities across America, in Chicago, Atlanta, New York and Milwaukee and elsewhere, and babies are cut down.

"They say Black lives matter," said Secoriya Williamson, whose 8-year-old daughter was shot to death in Atlanta the other day. "You killed your own. You killed your own this time. ... You killed a child. She didn't do nothing to nobody."

In Chicago, there were some 90 people shot over the Fourth of July weekend, including 7-year-old Natalia Wallace, who was killed when armed hitters jumped from a car and began spraying gunfire into a crowd.

And on Monday there were some 19 shot. On Tuesday, there were 11 shot.

Chicago has always been a violent city, and street gangs have historically been intertwined with local politics, providing muscle and intimidation long before the days when Paul Ricca let the world believe that Al Capone was the boss.

According to Chicago Tribune reporting, Chicago homicides as of Sunday have risen sharply, by 39% this year so far, with 353 homicides reported, compared with 254 during the same period last year. And shootings of one or more people struck by gunfire are up 42 percent.

Homicide data alone doesn't tell the story of violence. Shootings tell the story. In Chicago, the worst year on record was 1992, with more than 940 homicides.

But what would 2020's final death count be if paramedics and emergency room doctors were working with technology from the early 1990s?

Does it matter?

If data can't be forged into a weapon for the November elections, does it matter in America anymore?

I called Rafael A. Mangual, a legal policy analyst for the conservative Manhattan Institute and a writer for City Journal.

He's studied the left's new favorite social justice warrior toys, including "decarceration" and liberal criminal bond policy that allows for the release of the violent from jails, even if they'd been arrested previously on gun charges.

And I asked him why white protesters aren't pressuring big-city Democratic Party mayors to do more about the wave of spiking urban violence, including in Chicago, where Mekhi James, 3, was killed in the gang wars just weeks ago.

John Kass: When Black children are killed, where's the outrage from the white and the woke?

"As cynical as it may sound, it's hard not to conclude that the lack of political pressure being brought to bear on Chicago leaders to get tough on crime is at least partly a function of the fact that the gang violence claiming so many innocent lives - like that of 3-year-old Mekhi James - is a problem from which the donor class lives several degrees removed," Mangual said.

That's not cynicism. That's reality.

"As bad as things are on the city's South and West sides, its high-end neighborhoods and upper-middle-class suburbs remain very safe," he said. "As a result, the political class doesn't bear any of the downside risk that attends the misguided 'decarceration' and de-policing efforts so popular among 'progressives' desperate to establish their social justice bona fides."

When it comes to the lives of Black children taken in street violence, what's clear is that the white woke world has no skin in the game. Pamela K. Johnson: 55 summers have gone by since the Watts rebellion. How far have we traveled? Michael Bloomberg: Let's hire laid-off oil and gas workers to fight climate change Noah Smith: Focusing on Facebook and Google's monopoly misses the point Jamelle Bouie: Democracy? John Lewis embodied it Erwin Chemerinsky: Trump can't postpone the election. But here's why we have to take his tweet seriously

Load-Date: August 6, 2020

Police reforms among the issues legislators expected to take up when they return to the Capitol

ARTICLE MCXX. POLICE REFORMS AMONG THE ISSUES LEGISLATORS EXPECTED TO TAKE UP WHEN THEY RETURN TO THE CAPITOL

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 10, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 504 words

Byline: Dana Ferguson

Highlight: Days before Minnesota lawmakers were expected to return to the Capitol for a special legislative session, the Minnesota Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party plans to pressure Republican legislators to pass police accountability measures in the wake of George Floyd's killing. DFL party leaders intend to hold a rally in support of the measures on Saturday and launch digital [...]

Body

Days before Minnesota lawmakers were expected to return to the Capitol for a special legislative session, the Minnesota Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party plans to pressure Republican legislators to pass police accountability measures in the wake of George Floyd's killing.

DFL party leaders intend to hold a rally in support of the measures on Saturday and launch digital ads targeting GOP senators in swing districts. The moves were aimed at getting the GOP-led Senate to approve police reform measures approved by the DFL-controlled House.

Republicans have made a point that they're open to reforms, and they approved a handful last month including banning chokeholds and more training for officers. But they said they wouldn't support efforts to defund or dismantle police departments.

Democrats at the Capitol haven't proposed defunding police, but in Minneapolis, the City Council there is weighing a move to replace the police department with the "department of community safety and violence prevention."

On Friday, Twin Cities law enforcement officials sent a letter to legislative leaders urging them to pass a number of police reforms. The letter was signed by Ramsey County Attorney John Choi, Hennepin County Attorney Mike Freeman, St. Paul Police Chief Todd Axtell, Minneapolis Police Chief Medaria Arrandondo and Minnesota Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington.

The letter asks that lawmakers:

Reform the arbitration system that "currently undermines Police Chiefs' ability to hold officers who violate our policies and betray the public trust accountable." Change policy on use-of-force guidelines. Banning chokeholds. Prohibit "warriorlike trainings that teach officers to be constantly fearful and view everyone around them as a threat." Require that law enforcement officers have a duty to intercede when another officer is using excessive force. Require that law enforcement officers have a duty to de-escalate encounters to minimize use of force. Create statewide jurisdiction to respond to officer-involved fatalities, including an investigative unit in the state Bureau of Criminal Apprehension.

Police reforms among the issues legislators expected to take up when they return to the Capitol

In an interview Friday, Choi said he believed it was important that lawmakers heard from law enforcement leaders and those in prosecution on reform issues.

"(We) feel that these changes are really critical," Choi said. "... And we believe that they're necessary to improve the quality of justice in our communities."

Choi noted that he believes officer-involved fatalities should be investigated by an outside unit with the state.

"I think it's really important to kind of wall off this section of the BCA," he said.

Deanna Weniger contributed to this story.

Minnesota's primary is Tuesday. Here are key east metro races to watch. Voters, GOP lawmakers plan lawsuit over Walz's mask mandate at polling places State Patrol cancels police academy class 'due to lack of funding' Minnesota will close 2 prisons to prepare for budget shortfall. Other agencies face holes, too. MN tobacco age increases to 21 on Aug. 1

Load-Date: August 7, 2020

ARTICLE MCXXI. MARIA ISA PREACHES 'AMOR'

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 10, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 1177 wordsByline: CHRIS RIEMENSCHNEIDER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The "SotaRico" hip-hop vet has been closely touched by 2020's calamities but remains defiantly upbeat on her new EP with YMMI.Body

She's still heartbroken over the death of her friend George Floyd, who fawned over her baby girl the last time she saw him. She's upset over newly surfaced stories from women about abuse and harassment in the Twin Cities music scene, which she has confronted for years.

Oh, and Maria Isa is obviously still worried about the coronavirus, which has taken away much of her livelihood as a musician and teacher and been especially hard on her family's beloved homeland of Puerto Rico.

So why did the Twin Cities hip-hop trailblazer just release a new EP that's discernibly upbeat and built around the theme of loving ourselves and one another?

"So many people are losing faith in love," she explained, "but it's really the only thing that's keeping us going."

Titled "Amor Universal" (Spanish for "Universal Love"), the six-song collection is her third collaboration with Minneapolis hip-hop producer YMMI, who's been racking up credits in commercials and video games in recent years.

They're billing the EP as "AfroLatinx dance music," and the results - available via streaming channels and Isa's website - are as richly layered, buoyant and lively as that description sounds.

There's nothing wrong with having a little fun in 2020, is there?

"Music heals," Isa, 33, said.

"Especially in communities of color, we don't have services provided where we can seek therapy to find the love or to feel loved. Music has been that."

A rapper and singer since her teens - she grew out of the invaluable incubatory Yo! the Movement and B-Girl Be festivals of the mid-'00s - Maria Isa Pérez-Hedges and fellow rapper and husband Muja Messiah became parents last summer to a smiley bundle of energy named Loíza Rosa. Muja sent video of the baby kicking it in a kiddie pool while Mamá was doing her interview last week.

Isa has also been busy in recent years as co-host of the Latina Theory podcast; president of her record label, SotaRico Records (Minnesota + Puerto Rico); mentor and teacher of schoolchildren via the Twin Cities Mobile Jazz Project; activist and adviser with the St. Paul Foundation's El Fondo Boricua Hurricane Relief fund, for which she joined the Minnesota Twins' 2018 trip to help with the island's recovery; a McKnight Foundation fellowship recipient; actress; arts organizer, and even lobbyist.

"Maria Isa has long been engaged as an artist and advocate in Saint Paul and across the Twin Cities," St. Paul Mayor Melvin Carter told the Star Tribune. "She continues to inspire and uplift the many voices of our community."

The lobbying role came up the day of our meetup with YMMI on a patio on St. Paul's West Side. A Type 1 diabetic, Isa found out that morning the Alec Smith Emergency Insulin Act - which she helped get passed at the State Capitol in April - is being held up by a lawsuit from Big Pharma.

"One more thing to worry about," she lamented.

'Back to the music now'

Isa not only had the foresight to stockpile insulin ahead of the quarantine in early March, she also brought home a box full of musical gear knowing she wouldn't be able to work in her studio inside St. Paul's Landmark Center.

"We needed something to keep us going as parents, as artists, stuck at home," she said, noting scrapped plans to tour Central and South American countries this year via her McKnight grant.

In much the same boat, YMMI - pronounced "Yimmy," a play on his former moniker Young Menace - messaged Isa just a few days into the quarantine to see if she was interested in collaborating again virtually.

The pair first made music together in 2013, when their song "Latinization" was used for ESPN's X Games. YMMI humorously said his only Latinx music experience before that was sampling Tito Puente on many occasions. (Coincidentally, Isa knew Puente as a child via her mom Elsa Vega-Pérez's nonprofit St. Paul school, El Arco Iris Center for the Arts.)

Before the virus hit, YMMI had actually refocused his attention on a new YMMI clothing line.

"OK, back to the music now," he remembered thinking.

"The bottom of the economy got yanked out from under everybody. It's a world crisis. I see music as the way out. So we started cooking."

"Amor Universal" certainly cooks. The EP kicks off with the booming warning "Peligroso," and from there blows through a fast mix of reggaeton, dancehall, Latin trap dance music and classic boom-bap hip-hop - maybe the ultimate hybrid yet of Isa's diverse musical background.

One track, "Voy Contigo," finds her singing with Celia Cruz-style jazzy zest, while "By My Side" posits her as a 2020-ready Top 40 pop singer.

Maria Isa preaches 'Amor'

Isa now says YMMI is the best producer in town to garner an authentic Latinx music vibe.

"Every producer in the Twin Cities would say to me, 'We made a reggaeton track!' and I'd say, 'No, you didn't,'" she recounted with a sharp laugh.

She also said of YMMI, "Our communication has always been 100 percent professional. As a woman who's run her own label for 11 years, if I'm not comfortable, it's not acceptable."

'I'm a survivor, too'

Although this profile was planned before dozens of assault, harassment and misogyny accusations emerged on social media two weeks ago, that MeToo-rooted tidal wave put Isa near the center of yet another storm in her hometown this year. Isa said she has her own stories of sexual mistreatment but did not want to share them.

"I'm a survivor, too," she offered. "I've experienced the worst and survived with the best."

She pointed to her husband as a converted ally. Muja got his start in the pioneering local group Raw Villa in the late '90s. In 2011, he and Maria recorded an album as the duo Villa Rosa but did not become romantically involved until a few years later.

"Revolution has to start from home," she said. "It can't happen by Instagram. I don't think Twitter is the solution. It's just a step toward communicating and finding solutions."

She faulted many music venues in town for not doing enough to protect female performers. That's partly what endeared "Big Floyd" to her. He worked in security at both El Nuevo Rodeo and Conga Latin Bistro dance clubs before dying in Minneapolis police custody on May 25.

"He was the gentle giant who stood at the gates to make sure women and men could feel comfortable there," she said. "It's something you remember, because we don't get treated like that very often in the Twin Cities."

She and YMMI considered delaying last month's release of "Amor Universal" out of respect. YMMI, however, said he decided to push on with it once he saw all the protests that followed Floyd's death.

"You saw Black, white, Mexican, Puerto Rican, all colors on the front lines," he said, evoking the EP's title. "That what that was: universal love."

What's more, Isa pointed to her last conversation with Floyd: "He was like, 'Man, when you putting new music out?'"

"This is what Big Floyd would have wanted," she said. "This is what our community needs. I'm no doctor, but music is my medicine."

Chris Riemenschneider · 612-673-4658

@ChrisRstrib

Maria Isa

Maria Isa preaches 'Amor'

Music: iammariaisa.com. · Podcast: audioboom.com/channel/latina-theory. · Workshops:
twincitiesmobilejazzproject.org.

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCXXII. TARGET ACCUSED OF BIAS IN 'ISIS' CUP INCIDENT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 10, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 628 wordsByline: NICOLE NORFLEET; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Its own internal investigation found the mislabeled coffee was an accident; CAIR-MN not so sure.Body

A Muslim woman has filed a discrimination complaint against Target Corp. after she said a Starbucks barista at the Midway Target store in St. Paul wrote "ISIS" on her cup instead of her name.

The woman submitted the complaint Monday to the Minnesota Department of Human Rights, the state's civil rights enforcement agency.

Target said after its own internal investigation of the employee that the act wasn't deliberate.

The woman, a Black Muslim of Somali descent, visited the Target with a friend around 6:30 p.m. on July 1 and ordered a drink from the cafe, according to a redacted version of the complaint provided by the Minnesota chapter of the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR-MN).

After taking the order, the employee asked the woman, whose first name is Aishah, for her name to write on the cup. When the woman received her drink, she found the word "ISIS."

A photo of the cup shows there's room to question whether the word is fully capitalized like an acronym.

The first "I" appears to be uppercase, but the second "i" is missing the cross-strokes of a capital letter and the dot of a lowercase letter.

Asked why she wrote "ISIS" on the cup, the employee said she had not heard the customer's name correctly, the complaint said. After the customer asked for a manager, the manager told her baristas sometimes make mistakes with names, the complaint said.

Security officers who arrived at the scene and were shown a photo of the beverage were "dismissive," the complaint also said. A Target store manager directed security personnel to get another beverage for the woman and a $25 gift card before she was escorted out, it said.

Isis is the name of an Egyptian goddess and one used by women in many parts of the world. But in the past decade, the acronym ISIS emerged for the jihadist group Islamic State of Iraq and Syria that once controlled large territories in Syria and Iraq.

The word has been used as a slur against Muslim residents throughout the Twin Cities, said Jaylani Hussein, executive director of CAIR-MN. "It's the most flagrant Islamophobic thing somebody can say about someone pretty much," he said.

Hussein said he doesn't believe that the barista, a white teenager, accidentally mistook the name Aishah. There have been local incidents in schools of Muslim students being bullied by classmates using ISIS, Hussein said.

And four years ago, in a high-profile trial in Minneapolis, several men were convicted of planning to commit murder in the name of ISIS.

"If you can't hear, you can ask again or you can ask to spell it," Hussein said.

The Starbucks is Target-run and the workers are Target employees.

In a statement Thursday, Minneapolis-based Target said, "We are deeply sorry this happened to our guest. We have no tolerance for racism, discrimination or harassment of any kind, and upon learning of this incident we investigated it thoroughly and took the matter very seriously. While our investigation strongly concluded this was not a deliberate act, and we immediately apologized, in no way does that diminish the negative impact this has caused our guest. At Target, we work every day to foster a company culture committed to diversity, inclusion and anti-racism, and we want everyone who shops with us to feel welcomed, valued and respected."

The employee hasn't faced any discipline. CAIR-MN wants the barista and manager fired. "I'm really extremely disappointed with Target's response," Hussein said.

Last month, Target pledged $10 million to social justice organizations such as the National Urban League in the wake of the George Floyd killing, and the company created an internal task force of senior company leaders to help examine racial equality throughout its organization.

Nicole Norfleet · 612-673-4495

Twitter: @nicolenorfleet

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

ARTICLE MCXXIII. WELLS FARGO LAUNCHES \$400M FUND

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 10, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 915 wordsByline: JEFFREY MEITRODT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The bank will donate PPP fees to help small businesses owned by Blacks and other minorities.Body

To help small businesses survive the pandemic, Wells Fargo announced Thursday that it is donating the $400 million in fees it earned off the federal Paycheck Protection Program to nonprofit organizations that primarily assist Black and other minority owners.

Wells Fargo, which lost many business customers after bungling their PPP applications, wound up processing more than 185,000 PPP loans worth a total of $10.4 billion, the fifth highest loan total in the banking industry, according to the U.S. Small Business Administration.

"We can see that small businesses are hurting," said Jenny Flores, head of small business growth philanthropy at Wells Fargo. "Forty-one percent of small, Black-owned businesses have closed since COVID hit. We want to make sure we put our money where our mouth is."

Community lenders said they hope other financial institutions follow suit, noting that no other bank has donated so much money in a single move to their efforts.

"This is huge," said Maurice Jones, president of Local Initiatives

Support Corp. (LISC), a New York nonprofit with community lending offices in 35 cities, including St. Paul. "I hope other banks will see this as a challenge and try to better them. I want to see them compete on this."

Wells Fargo is donating fees it received from the SBA for processing loans for the government's largest small business relief program. Under the program's rules, lenders could not collect fees from the companies themselves. So far, several other big banks - including Bank of America, Citigroup and JP Morgan - have pledged to donate their net profits from processing PPP loans, but not 100% of their fees.

Wells Fargo will be taking applications from community lenders over the next month for its new Open for Business Fund, with money flowing by August. By January 2021, Wells Fargo expects to provide a total of $250 million to so-called Community Development Financial Institutions, which promote economic development in poorer communities that are traditionally underserved by banks. Flores said lenders will provide a combination of grants and low-interest loans to struggling business owners.

Wells Fargo launches $400M fund

"We know some businesses cannot absorb a loan at this time, so we are being very flexible in terms of how the money is used," Flores said.

Another $100 million will flow to Small Business Development Centers and other groups that provide technical assistance to minority business owners, such as help with budgets, business plans and marketing. The remaining $50 million will be set aside for future needs of small businesses.

"We don't have a crystal ball to say, 'This is what small businesses will need a year from now,' " Flores said. "But we want to make money available to small businesses so they have support on an ongoing basis to recover."

Flores said Wells Fargo wants lenders to use some of the money to help businesses that were hurt in the protests following the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis. More than 1,500 businesses in the Twin Cities were damaged in the riots, with costs expected to reach $500 million.

"We haven't earmarked any money, but we want to prioritize those applications when they come in," Flores said.

Wells Fargo's gesture to small businesses comes as it battles to emerge from a fake-accounts scandal that has enveloped the company for nearly four years, a sprawling controversy that has upended its executive suite, sparked widespread litigation, and cost the company billions of dollars in fines and settlements. The San Francisco-based bank is ranked No. 2 in Minnesota based on market share, behind U.S. Bancorp.

Flores said she recognizes the fact that some people will assume the bank is making the donation to offset bad publicity, but she noted that the program is effectively an extension of a $175 million campaign begun in 2015. That donation generated $1.6 billion in financing for minority-owned small businesses, creating nearly 200,000 jobs in the United States.

Community lenders said Wells Fargo has been a significant partner in their work for decades.

"If I had to look at the most consistent investors in our community-development work - and we've been doing this for 40 years - Wells Fargo would be among the top," said Jones, whose nonprofit has invested more than $22 billion in the minority community since 1979. "This is going back long before the recent troubles that Wells has gotten into."

One of the first recipients of the new round of funding is the Metropolitan Economic Development Association (MEDA), a Minneapolis nonprofit that has helped more than 22,000 minority business owners since 1971. MEDA will share in a $13.5 million grant to the Expanding Black Business Credit Initiative.

"MEDA is incredibly appreciative of the award," said Alfredo Martel, MEDA's president and CEO. "It comes at a time of incredible urgency and relevance to our mission."

Jones said the minority business community is desperate for capital. He said his organization expected about 5,000 applications when it recently announced it was making $2.5 million available for small businesses hurt by COVID-19. Instead, the group was swamped with 250,000 requests for assistance from around the U.S., prompting LISC to increase the program to $15 million. But that is still enough to fund only about 2,000 applicants.

Wells Fargo launches $400M fund

"The platform is on fire right now," Jones said. "We've got to help these businesses if we want them to survive the combination of the COVID shutdown and the recession."

Jeffrey Meitrodt · 612-673-4132

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

End of Document

What will happen to the murals?

ARTICLE MCXXIV. WHAT WILL HAPPEN TO THE MURALS?

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 10, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1E

Length: 852 words

Byline: ALICIA ELER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

Kenda Zellner-Smith felt numb. With everything that had been going down in her south Minneapolis neighborhood following George Floyd's killing while in the custody of Minneapolis police, she needed time to be able to express herself and heal. Instead, she had to go to work.

"I felt so down that morning and not ready to be in my day and in that predominantly white space," said Zellner-Smith, 23, who works at a nursing home.

On the drive to work, something caught her eye. It was graffiti on a boarded-up business that expressed, with an expletive, the anger she felt toward the police. "Another board said A.C.A.B. [All Cops Are Bastards]. We were heard this time," she said.

That same day, she learned that the plywood boards covering businesses' windows were starting to be removed. She ducked into her office and quickly launched @savetheboards_mpls, an Instagram account focused on preserving the art and messages that had been left. With the help of friends and her dad's truck, she's since collected 30 to 35 boards.

University Rebuild, a grassroots group of unemployed theater artists and volunteers who handed out 2,000 plywood boards to secure businesses damaged after Floyd's death, have offered to help her preservation efforts.

Zellner-Smith and others sharing the preservation mission are committed to keeping the boards in the communities where they were made, and keeping them out of museums. The Walker, Mia, Weisman Art Museum, Minnesota Historical Society and Minnesota Museum of American Art confirmed to the Star Tribune that they are not collecting the murals. Ranging from fast graffiti to highly detailed murals with Floyd's signature portrait, the boards have become defacto canvases for people expressing pain and grief, and protest art that crystallizes this historical moment.

In a recent Zoom discussion with 10 Black arts leaders in the Twin Cities organized by Robyne Robinson, board chair at the Minnesota Museum of American Art in St. Paul and a public art consultant, artist Alex

What will happen to the murals?

Smith took issue with the urge to "Minnesota-ify the movement." He urged people not to focus on just the prettier boards, but to also pay attention to the ones with raw, reactive messages scrawled over them.

"It's like going out the next day and sweeping up all the broken glass," he said. "Like, maybe we need to see some of that broken glass so we can remember what happened the night before."

Robinson pointed out the plywood protest art's connections to AfriCobra, the collective founded in the 1960s that helped define the Black arts movement outside of the mainstream art world.

Supporting the effort

Members of University Rebuild, who are not Black themselves, envision their role as supporting community.

"As stewards to art, it's our responsibility that it's used equitably, and that means listening to BIPOC people and Black people in particular about what they want," said University Rebuild organizer Daisuke Kawachi. The organization is offering to temporarily house boards at their storage facility.

Wolfpack Promotionals, a full-service promotional printing business in north Minneapolis, hasn't made a decision about what to do with boards covering their windows that have "Big Floyd" painted over them. They were made by artists Jack Reynolds, Kyle Alexander and Tony Cineus, who swung by and asked if they could paint.

"We said "sure," figuring it would only be up for a little bit," said co-owner Katie Brown. "We like so much what they did that we're having a hard time taking them down."

The boards are too big to store inside Wolfpack, but they don't want to take them out of the North Side, and are continuing conversations with community about what to do.

"We're keeping it up for probably through the middle or end of this month at the minimum," said Brown.

Future visions

St. Paul-based Leesa Kelly, who owns the BIPOC-focused community engagement organization We Live, is working with the Minnesota African American Heritage Museum and Gallery on a show of select boards, slated for 2021. (The museum will reopen Aug. 4.)

"It is time for us to focus on telling the story ourselves," said Kelly. "Too many times has Black history been whitewashed. I didn't want that to happen this time especially when we have a Black-owned and -operated museum."

While some are thinking about the immediate future, others are dreaming long-term.

Robinson wonders if the murals could be collected city by city and toured nationally for a period of time, like the AIDS quilt. She thinks that could be accompanied by discussion from arts groups and historians, with a portion given to the Smithsonian and the rest returned to the community.

Kawachi said that community members have suggested a public installation of the murals on Lake Street that references photographer Wing Young Huie's "Lake Street U.S.A." project, hanging them in schools or putting them on view in neighborhood community centers.

What will happen to the murals?

"A lot of people are still in the grieving process and processing," said Kelly. "As far as a permanent solution [for the plywood mural art], I think we are about a year off."

Alicia Eler · 612-673-4437

@AliciaEler

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

End of Document

Working from home, Securian Financial employees donate monthly parking fee to local nonprofits

ARTICLE MCXXV. WORKING FROM HOME, SECURIAN FINANCIAL EMPLOYEES
DONATE MONTHLY PARKING FEE TO LOCAL NONPROFITS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 10, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 506 words

Byline: Emma Harville

Highlight: After more than 95 percent of Securian Financial's workforce transitioned to working from home in March because of the coronavirus pandemic, the downtown St. Paul company's parking ramps were left empty. In response, Securian suspended employees' parking contracts and offered them two choices: They could receive the extra cash in their paychecks or they could [...]

Body

After more than 95 percent of Securian Financial's workforce transitioned to working from home in March because of the coronavirus pandemic, the downtown St. Paul company's parking ramps were left empty.

In response, Securian suspended employees' parking contracts and offered them two choices: They could receive the extra cash in their paychecks or they could donate it to local nonprofits across St. Paul, and Securian would match every dollar.

Of the 50 percent of Securian employees who had signed parking contracts, 30 percent opted to donate their monthly parking fee. Since, the company has generated more than $382,000 in donations related to the parking abatement, according to Securian Community Relations Manager Nicole Hansen.

In May, Securian donated a total of $150,000 to St. Paul nonprofits Neighborhood House and Face to Face. And in June, the company spread a donation of $120,000 to the Sanneh Foundation, the Conway Community Center and the National Alliance on Mental Illness Minnesota.

"(After the first two donations) we thought that was probably the last time we were going to do this," Hansen said. "Then civil uprising related to the murder of George Floyd happened, and we said, 'Yep, we're going to do this again.'"

Securian chose Ujamaa Place for its final donation in July, a St. Paul nonprofit organization that works primarily with African American men between the ages of 18 and 30 so they can receive necessary access to services, jobs and rehabilitation.

Working from home, Securian Financial employees donate monthly parking fee to local nonprofits

Ujamaa Place CEO Otis Zanders said the nonprofit's mission is to address mass incarceration, create stable housing and help young men work through trauma related to racism and poverty. Zanders also noted the toll COVID-19 has taken on those in the community experiencing homelessness.

"What the donation does is give us additional resources to expand our services," Zanders said. "A lot of the adjustments that we've had to make because of COVID-19 that we did not budget for, the donations allow us to reach more people and provide more daily care."

Without facing the need to lay off or furlough any employees, Securian has remained relatively unscathed amid the coronavirus pandemic. The company's solid position during the economic downturn, Hansen said, is what drove Securian employees' desire to give back.

"As a business community in St. Paul, we all have to come together," Hansen said. "That doesn't just mean corporate dollars. That means our family of associates who want to give back, who can give back. We can work together and we can make a big difference." Friends of the St. Paul Public Library alerts donors to data breach suffered by vendor Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots St. Paul has a community commission to review complaints against officers, yet many don't know it exists, coordinator says \$15 million Ramsey County small business relief fund opens to artists, entrepreneurs National ATF team joins investigation into blaze at downtown St. Paul hotel under construction

Load-Date: August 7, 2020

Feds deny Minnesota request for aid after George Floyd unrest. Walz has 30 days to appeal.

ARTICLE MCXXVI. FEDS DENY MINNESOTA REQUEST FOR AID AFTER GEORGE FLOYD UNREST. WALZ HAS 30 DAYS TO APPEAL.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 11, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 486 words

Byline: Forum News Service

Highlight: The federal government has denied a request from Minnesota Gov. Tim Walz for federal funds to rebuild and repair fire damage from the unrest that followed George Floyd's death.

Body

Minnesota Gov. Tim Walz has 30 days to appeal after the federal government denied his request for a disaster declaration because of the damage caused in the aftermath of the police killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis in May.

According to multiple media reports, the governor's office was informed on Friday that the disaster declaration was denied, and an agency spokesperson said the damage was something that local and state governments could handle.

In a statement to Minnesota Public Radio on Saturday, a FEMA spokesperson said, "After a thorough review of Minnesota's request for a major disaster declaration from extensive fire damage as a result of civil unrest in late May and early June, it was determined that the impact to public infrastructure is within the capabilities of the local and state governments to recover from. The governor has 30 days to appeal that decision."

According to media reports, Walz spokesperson Teddy Tschann said in a statement that the governor was "disappointed" in the decision and that the state was exploring its options.

Former Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin has been charged with second-degree murder and manslaughter in the killing of Floyd. The three other former officers present, Thomas Lane, Tou Thao and J Alexander Kueng, have been charged with aiding and abetting murder. After Floyd's death, multiple protests and rioting occurred in the Twin Cities, including burning down the Third Precinct police station in Minneapolis. The Minneapolis unrest spurred multiple protests across the country and around the world.

Walz sent a letter to President Trump on July 2, noting that there was more than $15 million in damage and cleanup costs that could be eligible for reimbursement from the federal government. In all, the current estimates of all damage exceed $500 million, according to media reports.

Feds deny Minnesota request for aid after George Floyd unrest. Walz has 30 days to appeal.

In making the request for help, Walz had noted that the financial challenge had been made even harder by the impacts on the state budget from the coronavirus pandemic. A projected $1.5 billion budget surplus in February was soon wiped out by a projected $2.4 billion revenue shortfall, he wrote in the request to President Trump via FEMA.

The federal government's denial of the request from Walz, a Democrat, came a day after Republican U.S. Rep Tom Emmer of Minnesota sent a letter to Trump and other federal officials raising questions about the request.

While not stating opposition to Minnesota receiving federal money, Emmer asked that - in the wake of Walz's request - the Trump administration "undertake a thorough and concurrent review of my state's response to the violence."

Emmer wrote that if federal money helps pay for cleanup and rebuilding, the government "has an obligation to every American - prior to the release of funding - to fully understand the events which allowed for this level of destruction to occur and ensure it never happens again."

Load-Date: August 8, 2020

End of Document

Letters: A heavy burden, but Minnesotans should pay the price for riot repair

ARTICLE MCXXVII.

LETTERS: A HEAVY BURDEN, BUT MINNESOTANS SHOULD PAY THE PRICE FOR RIOT REPAIR

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 11, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 569 words

Byline: Letter Writers

Highlight: While DFLers are strategizing to defund police departments and crafting bills to "reimagine" public safety, Gov. Walz is appealing to the federal government for funds to repair $500 million in damages wrought by rioters back in May. At a time when we're being exhorted to be mindful of injustices, past and present, it's clearly unfair [...]

Body

While DFLers are strategizing to defund police departments and crafting bills to ", Gov. Walz is appealing to the federal government for funds to repair $500 million in damages wrought by rioters back in May.

At a time when we're being exhorted to be mindful of injustices, past and present, it's clearly unfair to stick the rest of the country with the tab for Gov. Walz's failure to deploy in a timely and effective manner the peace-keeping forces provided by Minnesotans' tax dollars.

I understand that the shut-down orchestrated by Walz and his administration has left the cash drawer alarmingly depleted and that the riots were, therefore, exceedingly ill-timed. I concede that the clean-up is a very heavy burden for Minnesotans to bear alone - first, to pay for peace-keepers who were not allowed to do their jobs and then to pay a second time to repair the devastation that resulted.

But is it right to stick the rest of the country with responsibility for the mess we brought on ourselves? We are the ones who elected Walz and his cohorts, after all.

As a matter of justice, Gov. Walz should get busy making budget cuts and raising taxes - inflict the pain that will be necessary to restore the neighborhoods, the businesses, and the public property ruined on his watch and because of his dithering. Then we Minnesota voters should make him pay the political price.

Debra L. Kaczmarek, Northfield

I see that U.S. Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis) wants to offset one "cost" of establishing a national holiday for Juneteenth by reducing paid time off for federal employees. Too bad he wasn't so concerned about federal deficits when he decided to vote for the trillion-dollar giveaway lavished on the rich by the 2017 tax cuts.

Letters: A heavy burden, but Minnesotans should pay the price for riot repair

Not to mention that, as reported in your paper, he was persuaded by right wing media outlets to stop his quest to eliminate Columbus Day as an offset for the new holiday. I guess we know who the senator really wants to please.

Ken Thielman, Woodbury

I truly believe that Black Lives Matter. If I were younger and not a senior citizen, I would be out there supporting them.

In January 2017, I marched with my daughter in Washington, D.C., for women's rights. At that time, there were both women and men marching together. There was also a person carrying a Black Lives Matter sign.

But what has happened to America in 2020?

Since the terrible death of George Floyd, we now have a terrible . It brings tears to my eyes when I read the paper or watch the news on TV. The number of children who are victims of gun violence is horrible. Who are these people who are shooting at a street party, shooting into a car, shooting at a football practice, shooting a pregnant women, and shooting a little boy in the foot who was coming out of a store with his dad? Because I believe that all lives matter, I am suggesting that some of the leaders in the current protests form a group to include gun violence in their concerns. Where are these people getting these guns? Are there mental-health issues involved?

We do need to work with police and other city leaders.

DeAnne Cherry, Woodbury

Hey, State Fair ticket scalpers: you're tainted! reimagine" public safety wave of gun violence Letters: Mayor and governor point fingers but expect the federal government to pay? Letters: Is it the most-rigged election ever, win or lose? Letters: What's the St. Paul budget plan? Letters: Talk about bad behavior!

Load-Date: August 8, 2020

ARTICLE MCXXVIII. A SHOUT-OUT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 11, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 1123 wordsByline: ROHAN PRESTON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: A theater artist and Macalester professor creates a ritual of release during COVID and George Floyd crucibles.Body

Whee!

On a sunny afternoon, a group of dizzy people collapse on the ground after running around in circles while screaming at the top of their lungs. They lie on their backs looking at the sky before rising to do the exercise all over again, running counterclockwise and collapsing in glee.

This activity has been happening nearly every Wednesday and Saturday afternoon on the western edge of Minneapolis' Powderhorn Park since mid-March. If it all looks like child's play - where, but at an amusement park or a horror show, do adults have license to scream with such abandon in public? - it's because it's meant to be fun. But it also has serious purpose.

"It's for physical and psychological relief and release," said Harry Waters Jr., a theater artist and Macalester College professor who started and hosts this unique combination of laughing yoga and theater exercises. "We live in strange times with the pandemic and the uprising against systemic racism. People are stuck in front of Zoom or feel they don't have an outlet. This is something that's needed."

That "something" is Outside Voices, an activity that offers an outlet in a time of worries and troubles. The communal screaming at the sun is the culmination of a ritual process that can last 10 to 15 minutes. It involves an introduction of everyone in the circle, the telling of gibberish jokes and lots of laughter. In fact, laughter is a through-line for most of the activities, including the sharing of some dire, even tragic things.

In some cultures, people write down things that ail or terrify them and then burn the pieces of paper. In Powderhorn Park, they laugh at such things.

The 10 or so people who gathered in the circle on a recent Saturday gave voice to a series of distressing personal news - a single person said she feared dying alone, another threw out that she has no way to make a living in August, and a third shared news that a relative was back on meth.

After each of those depressing shares, the circle erupted in hearty laughter.

"I feel so relieved, especially by the laughing at tragedies," Laura Esping, an actor, said. "There's something so powerful about expelling all this macabre stuff. It's goofy fun and absolutely cathartic, especially doing it en masse."

Esping knew about Outside Voices because Waters is a friend. But Chika Okafor, who did not know anyone in the circle, was just walking with a friend in her favorite park before heeding Waters' invitation to join.

"I feel like transformative is a word that gets thrown around a lot, but let's go ahead and use it," Okafor said. "It's such good energy. You get to stand with people, which we haven't done much of. And given everything that's happening, this is a moment to commune with other people and to take a pin to the balloon of whatever pressure is building inside of you."

Socially distant loudness

Outside Voices began organically.

After the coronavirus pandemic forced a shutdown of schools, theaters and cultural life in mid-March, Waters, 67, who originated the role of Belize in Tony Kushner's landmark drama "Angels in America" and who played the "Teen Angel" singer alongside Michael J. Fox in "Back to the Future," was walking in the park after being cooped up at home. He saw a friend, Katie Burgess, across the lake.

"We just started screaming at each other," said Burgess, an actor and co-founder of Open Flame Theatre. "Harry laughs loud and I'm loud, and we just had this joy and excitement."

The two friends, who had worked in the same experimental, edge-pushing theater environment, decided to meet in the park so that they could commune and be loud while being properly socially distant. They let others know about their reunions, and they also were open to anyone passing by. Pretty soon the word was out, especially in the performing arts community.

Esther Ouray, a performer and certified laughter yoga teacher, showed up early on and contributed an exercise to the ritual. It was to tell a joke in gibberish, using the cadence of stand-up but in a totally made-up language.

"That way no one is offended," Ouray said. "Then we laugh our tails off."

On a recent Saturday, Waters' joke had a staccato cadence resolved in naughtiness: rata ta rata ta-tah, pada pa-ra-da-dah, pooh.

"We're laughing not because of the words in the jokes itself but because of the kind of ridiculousness of the situation," said Sonja Kuftinec, a theater professor at the University of Minnesota. "And even if the laughter starts out fake, it becomes real because it does something to your body to change your mood."

Although it has attracted performers, Outside Voices is not theater. At least, not exactly.

"True, it's not telling stories or using dramatic persona but it's doing some of the things that are theater-adjacent without having the stories or impersonation that we think about conventional theater," Kuftinec said. "All you do is take a moment of natural connection, put a little ritual and structure to it, and that's performance."

A shout-out

Expanding scope

Although started as an antidote to COVID-19, Outside Voices has been extended to offer a kind of healing ministry in the post-George Floyd era. In fact, the park is just eight blocks from where officer Derek Chauvin put his knee on Floyd's neck.

The sessions took on a different tone, starting with one held just two days after Floyd's death.

"Everybody was still in shock," Waters said. "There were seven of us there who were just present with each other. We didn't have to solve anything, just recharge, release and get back out there, whether to march or to Zoom."

It's also relevant that the sessions take place in Powderhorn Park, which now has hundreds of tents sheltering residents, many of them left homeless by the unrest that followed Floyd's death. The fact that Waters leads Outside Voices and is a Black man is literally and metaphorically apt, intimated Kuftinec, who has taken her grade school-age son to the circle several times.

"This is not just about Black lives but Black liberation and Black joy," Kuftinec said. "It shows the importance of Black bodies in public spaces laughing and living. It's important for Black bodies to be out here experiencing and expressing joy and calling out to people, saying, 'I'm inviting you into this circle, and you don't have to fear this Black stranger.' "

For his part, Waters loves the mix of different elements of the ritual, including theater and yoga.

"If people use yoga to get in touch with their inner core, this is something for relief, release and recharge," he said. "Everybody's holding tight right now. It's 20 minutes of your life that allows you to be outside and let go. And you have permission to say hello to people just walking by."

Rohan Preston · 612-673-4390

@rohanpreston

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

ARTICLE MCXXIX. CARYN SULLIVAN: A THINNING BLUE LINE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 11, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1001 wordsByline: Caryn M. SullivanHighlight: There's a lot of fear in the air. Week after week, we've been hearing about death in different contexts: the coronavirus, George Floyd, and the latest shootings. In the days following Floyd's death, I watched as police officers and National Guard members in full gear stood on hot asphalt streets, often face-to-face with strangers whose [...]Body

There's a lot of fear in the air.

Week after week, we've been hearing about death in different contexts: the coronavirus, George Floyd, and the latest shootings.

In the days following Floyd's death, I watched as police officers and National Guard members in full gear stood on hot asphalt streets, often face-to-face with strangers whose behavior varied from peaceful and respectful to violent and abusive. How could they endure it?

Amid plans to defund or dismantle the largest police department in the state, we haven't heard much from those who are called upon to respond when shots are fired, stores are looted, women are assaulted in public parks - and much more.

Over the past few weeks I've contacted many in the law enforcement community to find out what they're thinking and how they're doing.

The response was consistent and disturbing.

They were reluctant to speak publicly.

It's not that they have nothing to say. Rather, they've become silent because of what feels like an absence of support. Moreover, they - and their families - feel they've got targets on their backs.

Some were willing to paint a picture of what life has become. But no one was willing to go on the record.

Except for attorney Ron Meuser.

For more than 30 years, Meuser has represented police officers and first responders, handling an average of 10 claims per month.

Since late May, roughly 150 officers have sought representation for PTSD-related worker's compensation and disability claims. Most are from Minneapolis, though they come from various agencies around the state, including St. Paul.

While he doesn't speak for every officer or for their departments, Meuser agreed to tell the story clients have shared with him "like a broken record." It's the same story I've heard.

"The men and women who serve our communities as police officers don't go into this line of work for the money or the limelight," he said. "They do it out of a sense of duty and honor, to help their communities."

They recognize the damage to the trust within the community as a result of George Floyd's death, he said, but feel they've been lumped into the same category, when they've done nothing but seek to support the community.

Officers have received death threats. Their home addresses have been disclosed. They've been followed home from work.

"It's been justified that somehow they deserve it and they have to take it because that's just part of the job," Meuser said.

"They feel they've been completely abandoned and let down by the community representatives of the state, specifically the governor, Mayor Frey, the city council and Chief Arradondo," he said.

For every action there is a reaction.

"There's not one person in this society who would continue to go to work and risk their lives every day to have fireworks shot at them, concrete thrown at them, to have their lives be threatened, to be spit on or urinated on," Meuser said.

"It's difficult when they are already suffering from symptoms consistent with PTSD and have attempted to deal with it on their own in the hopes they can continue to perform the duties of a police officer. But when they have been completely abandoned by their support group, they are simply unable to wrap their arms around it and carry on."

"You are seeing a mass exodus of police officers from throughout the state who have decided it's not worth it."

Proponents for change might consider the retirements an opportunity to replace old-school officers with new ones.

It won't be easy. Law enforcement agencies have been struggling to recruit new officers for years.

When surveyed, licensed officers from around the country overwhelmingly said they wouldn't recommend the profession to others, citing lack of departmental support and respect for the profession, increased legal liability, and safety concerns.

What would life with less policing look like? Read the newspaper.

Cooped up, overheated, and saturated with COVID-19 warnings, many people are fearful and angry.

Criminals are seizing the moment. Shootings are up dramatically in the first six months of 2020 - more than 220 in Minneapolis and 100 in St. Paul.

Teens, men, pregnant women, and young children are dying in streets and alleys, cars and nightclubs.

Police are duty-bound to respond, regardless of how stretched, stressed, and unwelcome they may be.

Policing can be high-adrenaline work involving emotionally charged human interactions and instantaneous judgment calls.

In the current environment, officers are understandably hesitant to respond, intervene, or make arrests. Cellphones and body cameras will memorialize at least part of interactions. If officers make what could be construed as a mistake or misjudgment, they could be fired, prosecuted, sued, or imprisoned.

Concerned about lack of response and/or protection, citizens are literally taking matters into their own hands.

Handgun purchases are skyrocketing.

Individuals and organizations are hiring private security companies. Minneapolis City Council members, who voted to defund the police department, have received taxpayer-funded protection.

Minnesota has 10,000 licensed police officers. If we're seeking a more just society, is it just to impute the actions of a few to all, to punish all for the actions of a few?

As one retired officer said, the blue line has become a very thin blue line. The consequences are being borne out in this moment. As a society, we need to pause and make thoughtful, measured decisions about how thin a line we can live with.

Caryn Sullivan of Mendota Heights, an inspirational speaker and author of "Bitter or Better: Grappling with Life on the Op-Ed Page," is a contributing columnist for the Pioneer Press. Kyle, Spencer, Kulas: We love St. Paul. Here's how to help Banaian, Schmitz: Are 4-year degrees oversold? Not at all, even in the liberal arts Caryn M. Sullivan: Can we agree or disagree, or agree to disagree - and listen along the way? Soucheray: And our ability to reason is swept away Bonnie Blodgett: Focus on the fruit, tomato plant!

Load-Date: August 7, 2020

As gun violence continues, Mpls. marchers plead for peace

ARTICLE MCXXX. AS GUN VIOLENCE CONTINUES, MPLS. MARCHERS PLEAD FOR PEACE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 11, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1A

Length: 1033 words

Byline: RYAN FAIRCLOTH; LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

Pleading for an end to the gun violence that has ravaged their city this spring and summer, marchers walked through the heart of north Minneapolis Friday evening, calling on residents to put their "guns down" and their "love up."

A few dozen community members gathered for remarks and prayer outside Shiloh International Temple Ministries before heading east on W. Broadway, stopping along the way to mourn and to honor victims of gun violence.

It wasn't the first such gathering since George Floyd's May 25 death in Minneapolis police custody unleashed a sea of unrest, followed by a wave of gun violence. And it certainly wasn't the largest.

But it might have been one of the most urgent, taking place just hours after Minneapolis' 32nd homicide of 2020. That's double what the number was at this time last year.

All told, 224 people have been shot in Minneapolis this year, according to police data. In all of 2019, the city had 269 gunshot victims.

"Father, you know exactly why we're here," North Side resident Korey Dean said as he and a group of Black pastors led the mostly masked group in prayer under the beating sun. "The gun violence has to stop. ... The guns must be put down and the love must arise."

The violent stream continued unabated Thursday into Friday, with yet another person killed and eight others injured in shootings across the city. Among those wounded were a pregnant woman and a 17-year-old boy who was struck in the leg three times, officials said.

In the most recent homicide, a man in his mid-20s was gunned down early Friday near Farview Park, in the 2900 block of N. 6th Street.

As gun violence continues, Mpls. marchers plead for peace

A woman was critically wounded in that shooting. She was taken to HCMC, where she went into surgery for critical injuries. Officials said they were told that she was pregnant. Her condition was unknown Friday night.

The double shooting in a residential neighborhood was a grimly familiar scene, and the second shooting involving a pregnant woman in less than a week.

In the other incident, 27-year-old Leneesha Columbus was fatally shot near the south Minneapolis street corner where Floyd was killed, and a man serving as a security guard at the memorial site was also hit, but survived.

Police said that doctors delivered the baby at an area hospital before Columbus died. A 27-year-old man, the father of the baby, has been charged in her death.

Chuck Robinson, a 60-year-old North Side resident who lives in the Folwell neighborhood, has been on the scene of six shootings in recent weeks - including one where a 7-year-old boy was shot in the foot.

At Friday's march, Robinson expressed a range of emotions as he grappled to understand and explain what's driving the surge in gun violence.

"There's a high range of anger," Robinson said, referring to reaction to the police killing of Floyd as well as the COVID-19 pandemic, which has put many people out of work. "We have to come together. We can't police ourselves out of this problem."

The Rev. DeWayne Davis, a North Side resident and pastor at All God's Children Metropolitan Community Church, said the violence is a culmination of long societal neglect of minority communities and lost confidence in law enforcement.

Solving this complex problem will require all Minneapolis residents to band together against it, not just those on the North Side, he said.

It will also require Minneapolis police to be a "constructive partner" in addressing gun violence, not one that treats residents as "enemy combatants," Davis said.

"No one has the luxury, especially after what we've seen since George Floyd's killing ... to say this is not about me," he said.

Outside Shiloh Temple, community leaders warmly welcomed Minneapolis Police Chief Medaria "Rondo" Arradondo and urged residents to engage with him.

Arradondo told the group of marchers that police alone will not quell community harm and violence. The problem will only be solved with "the hard work of all of us coming together," he said.

The current spate of violence is "unacceptable," Arradondo said. There are a lot of guns on the streets, he said, and police are finding more gunshot rounds at scenes than they did in previous years.

Some of the violence is associated with gangs, "but we've also seen a lot that has not been," he said.

Some at the gathering questioned whether police have scaled back their response amid the debate over the department's future and backlash against police. Arradondo said that isn't the case.

As gun violence continues, Mpls. marchers plead for peace

The surge in gun violence has drained the department's resources and affected response times, he said.

Most who marched Friday agreed that police reforms are needed. But few were open to the idea of eliminating police officers' role in public safety.

Davis, the pastor, said leaders need to rethink whether the first responder to a mental health crisis or school discipline problem should be an armed officer. Bringing in mental health and social workers will help free up police to focus on problems like gun violence, he said.

"I think we really do need to have a serious conversation about what our law enforcement is for, and who it is for," Davis said.

Activist and civil rights lawyer Nekima Levy Armstrong sought to highlight the need for police reform, economic investment and job creation, saying those measures will help address the root causes of gun violence.

Many young men in the community have lost hope and turned to violence as an outlet, she said.

"What we have to do is come together, and we have to give our young people a reason to live and not die," she said.

FEMA denies post-riot aid

On Friday, Minnesota learned that the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) had denied its requests for disaster aid to clean up after the riots that followed Floyd's death.

Gov. Tim Walz had requested aid to help rebuild and repair structures in Minneapolis and St. Paul that were damaged by rioters, looters and vandals. Federal funds would have been used to reimburse local governments.

ryan.faircloth@startribune.com 612-673-4234

Twitter: @ryanfaircloth

libor.jany@startribune.com 612-673-4064

Twitter: @StribJany

32 -- Homicides in Minneapolis this year

16 -- Homicides in the city at the same time last year

224 -- People shot in the city this year, as of Friday

Load-Date: July 23, 2020

Soucheray: This progressive transfer of wealth from renters to developers and big corporations

ARTICLE MCXXXI. SOUCHERAY: THIS PROGRESSIVE TRANSFER OF WEALTH FROM RENTERS TO DEVELOPERS AND BIG CORPORATIONS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 11, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 674 words

Byline: Joe Soucheray

Highlight: Among their other inadequacies, which became more evident in the month of George Floyd, the city councils in Minneapolis and St. Paul appear not to factor families and children into their long-term planning. In Minneapolis, that would be called the 2040 Plan, essentially the elimination of the single-family home and the automobile. In St. Paul, [...]

Body

Among their other inadequacies, which became more evident in the month of George Floyd, the city councils in Minneapolis and St. Paul appear not to factor families and children into their long-term planning. In Minneapolis, that would be called the 2040 Plan, essentially the elimination of the single-family home and the automobile.

In St. Paul, council member Mitra Jalali appeared seemingly gleeful to note that St. Paul is now a majority rental city. She was just as gleeful that the city council voted 7-0 to approve a set of tenant protections that are probably the most draconian in the country. Why anybody would now want to be a landlord in St. Paul will soon become evident as it is expected that small property owners will sell out to larger corporations with deeper pockets. Under the new rules, for example, a landlord would have to justify in writing to the city council why they have chosen not to renew a tenant's lease.

Jalali and her council mates will decide who might continue to rent, not the proprietor who maintains the building and pays the taxes.

A larger and more insidious unintended consequence is in play here. For all I know, it is intended. How are families of color, for example, supposed to build wealth by renting?

"It should be no surprise that Black families cannot build wealth through home ownership - urban progressive policies haven't produced any homes to own," wrote Carol Becker in a guest editorial last week in the Minneapolis Star Tribune.

Becker is a member of the Minneapolis Board of Estimate and Taxation, one of those people way down at the bottom of the ballot. I suspect Becker might call herself a proud progressive, but not when it comes to this glaring absence of recognizing families and children in housing policies. Becker can talk with the best of the political class and she has solid numbers and data.

Soucheray: This progressive transfer of wealth from renters to developers and big corporations

"Children under the age of 18 make up 20 percent of the population in Minneapolis," Becker wrote.

Where are the kids supposed to live in the dystopian future imagined by council members, few of whom, if any, have ever had any real-life experience in finance, management, hiring and firing, or building anything?

"Families of color," Becker said, "are bigger, more multi-generational and often have a non-family member living with them. Where? In a one-bedroom rental apartment?"

Transportation, Ms. Becker?

"Parents don't ride transit as much as non-parents," Becker said. "How are you supposed to get your child to school and then you get to work on public transit?"

Becker calls the people behind the rental property and high-density movement progressives. They find her thinking disagreeable in chat rooms and alternative news sites; she's a heretic. I call the same people Mysterians, in the sense that they mysteriously enough envision a future absent of single-family homes replaced by high-density stacked living. Great, I suppose, if you're 25 years old, work downtown and all your transportation needs are met by a bicycle. Not so great for mom and dad and three kids.

If Lisa Bender, the Minneapolis City Council president, believes that calling 911 in an emergency "comes from a place of privilege," it's not hard to imagine what she must think of the single-family home.

Becker wrote that urban progressivism has incentivized the destruction of home-ownership opportunities and celebrated when Minneapolis became a majority-rental city. Rental in Minneapolis, she wrote, is a $1.6 billion transfer of wealth from individuals to the pockets of developers and corporations.

Soucheray: And our ability to reason is swept away Soucheray: Those cheering and jeering have something in common Soucheray: Lawless people are shooting up the towns. That's not the fault of the police. Politicians not so keen on their own collectivist vision of the future would have created policies to benefit home ownership and a sense of propriety where now none exist.

No rational soul can think of a public good created by rent-dependent citizens, and yet we keep electing activists who cheer it on.

Load-Date: August 8, 2020

Attorney: 150 cops are filing claims

ARTICLE MCXXXII.

ATTORNEY: 150 COPS ARE FILING CLAIMS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 11, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 651 wordsByline: MATT MCKINNEY; LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Many officers have contacted him to begin disability paperwork after rioting, he says.Body

Minneapolis police officers rattled by the unprecedented public unrest after the killing of George Floyd have filed for mental and physical disability claims at worrying levels, according to an attorney handling their cases.

Ron Meuser Jr., who held a news conference across the street from City Hall on Friday afternoon, said that some 150 Minneapolis police officers out of a sworn force of 850 have contacted him to start filing disability paperwork, a majority for symptoms of Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder, or PTSD. Seventy-five of those officers have already left the force, and he expects many more to follow, he said.

"While law enforcement is a high-stress career, the last two months in Minneapolis have pushed many officers to their breaking point," said Meuser.

At least 13 officers were inside the Third Precinct building when it was ordered abandoned by city officials, Meuser said, and some of them wrote final notes and texts to loved ones while others said they would reserve their last bullet for themselves to avoid being beaten to death.

His numbers haven't been confirmed by city officials, and when asked about lower numbers reported at City Hall, Meuser said there may be bureaucratic reasons or paperwork delays with disability claims filed at the Public Employees Retirement Association that could account for the difference.

A city spokeswoman said the city has received 17 PTSD workers' compensation claims from officers over the past 30 days. Spokeswoman Sarah McKenzie said the officers don't have to tell the city when they submit an application for disability benefits through PERA.

A Minneapolis police spokesperson did not immediately respond to a request for comment. The Minneapolis police officers' union declined to comment. The state's workers' compensation statute was amended in 2013 to recognize PTSD as legitimate grounds for claiming benefits. The move made Minnesota one of a handful of states to include PTSD in the list of injuries that could result in a successful workers' compensation claim. And a modification to the law last year created a statutory presumption whereby if police officers develop PTSD, it's presumed to have developed because of their work.

Attorney: 150 cops are filing claims

To qualify for benefits due to PTSD, an officer must provide two medical reports attesting to their condition, one of which must come from a licensed medical doctor, according to Doug Anderson at PERA. The benefit continues until they are no longer considered disabled or until they reach retirement age. An officer who goes on disability for PTSD would get at least 60% of his or her salary until they retire or are no longer considered disabled, Anderson said.

Minneapolis City Council President Lisa Bender said last year's change in state law "is likely to result in more first-responders filing for PTSD and becoming eligible for long-term disability, which would be a cost to the city in a long-term fashion."

"There was concern or anticipation that there might be more coming and just a general concern about the cost to local governments, including Minneapolis, for this state law change that didn't include any financial support to cities who are bearing the cost of the requirement," Bender said.

Council Member Linea Palmisano, chairwoman of the council's budget committee, said these types of claims have been a "known issue," and the city has been working for two years to try to mitigate the effects of state law.

"This is difficult for cities like ours," Palmisano said. "It's also absolutely devastating for smaller cities."

Mayor Jacob Frey said that state law needs to reflect dedication to healing while cities need the resources to back it.

"In the meantime, I am committed to supporting those officers committed to carrying out their oath to serve and protect the people of Minneapolis during a challenging time for our city," he said.

Matt McKinney · 612-673-7329

Liz Navratil · 612-673-4994

Load-Date: July 23, 2020

Fewer living in park than thought

ARTICLE MCXXXIII.

FEWER LIVING IN PARK THAN THOUGHT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 11, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 647 wordsByline: MIGUEL OTAROLA; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Powderhorn survey finds 282 campers, well below the Park Board's estimate.Body

State and Minneapolis officials on Friday said they're working to reduce the size of two encampments in Powderhorn Park, which they say are already significantly smaller than previously estimated.

The encampments on the north end of the park were formed after homeless residents were evicted from a hotel-turned-shelter nearby in the aftermath of the killing of George Floyd. A survey conducted by nonprofit Avivo counted 282 campers as of July 2, according to the Minnesota Housing Finance Agency.

By counting tents and not individuals, the Minneapolis Park and Recreation Board overstated the number of campers, said parks spokeswoman Dawn Sommers. The board had based its estimates on a calculation of 1.5 people per tent; there were 560 tents in Powderhorn this week.

Avivo, which used state funding to conduct its survey over three days last week, found that most campers had an additional tent for their belongings, according to Minnesota Housing communications director Jill Mazullo. There were also volunteers staying at the park.

"It's really impossible to get a completely fail-safe, foolproof count at an encampment," said Margaret King, regional manager for unsheltered homelessness at the Minnesota Interagency Council on Homelessness. "Just by nature, they're really dynamic environments where people come day by day."

Through the Avivo survey, state officials found that roughly half the people at the encampment had previously received homelessness services from Hennepin County. About 45% identify as Native American.

Different outreach workers serving youth, Native Americans and other groups are at the encampments daily looking to connect people with shelter or housing, King said. "Even though there are some shelter beds available every night ... it's still a very small number compared with the number of people that are left to survive outside," she said.

There are now encampments in about 35 park locations, including larger ones at Elliot, Peavey, Kenwood and Lyndale Farmstead parks, according to Park Board tent counts.

Fewer living in park than thought

Minneapolis City Council President Lisa Bender said about 100 encampments overall exist across the city, which makes it difficult to focus on Powderhorn Park. She disagreed with the Park Board's rejection of a resolution that could have limited the size of park encampments last week, saying large encampments can become unsafe and "impossible to reduce."

Next week, the Park Board will vote on a new resolution that would limit the number of encampments in parks to 20, with no more than 25 tents at each location. It would also create a temporary encampment permit that volunteers or other entities can apply for, making them responsible for day-to-day oversight of the camp.

Bender also criticized an executive order by Gov. Tim Walz that prohibited the clearing of encampments unless they pose a documented health and safety threat.

"If you are going to create a scenario where you have very large encampments ... you can't walk away and point back at the city and say, 'What are you going to do to shelter and house everyone?' " she said. "We are already pursuing dozens of strategies to shelter and house people, and we know that encampments create really crisis-level safety concerns."

In an e-mail, a spokesman for the governor said, "[We understand] that encampments of a certain size pose a public safety risk. ... That's why in April, Gov. Walz clarified his initial executive order to allow local governments to take action to improve safety. Our administration will continue to work with the Minneapolis Park Board, the city, and the county to find a solution."

Miguel Otárola · 612-673-4753

Park populations

Nonprofit Avivo's estimate of the number of homeless camping in Minneapolis parks is much lower than the city Park Board's.

Park, Tents

Powderhorn, 560

Kenwood, 20

Elliot, 17

Lyndale Farmstead, 15

Peavey, 15

Source: Minneapolis Park Board

Load-Date: July 23, 2020

PICK SIX

ARTICLE MCXXXIV. PICK SIX

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 11, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 6ELength: 328 wordsByline: JON BREAM; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Pick Six is a half-dozen cool things in music, from two points of view.

Jim Anderson of Minneapolis:

1 James McMurtry, the Dakota. This was my last live show before the music world shut down. He was playing solo, demonstrating his superior guitar skills, especially on the 12-string. He is an outstanding songwriter, as well. If this is my last concert for a while, it was a great one.

2 Country Westerns, "Country Westerns." Singer-guitarist Joey Plunkett of Nashville reminds me a bit of Lucero's Ben Nichols, without quite as much gravel. A satisfying guitar-based album with well written songs and solid playing. An ideal band for the Turf Club; I hope it can open again.

3 Bob Dylan, "Rough and Rowdy Ways." Seems like everyone loves the new Dylan album, and they should. I think he learned something from singing all of those Sinatra-era songs, his delivery is smooth (sort of) on the quieter songs. But he can still groan on the blues numbers. Now we can all hope for another record.

Jon Bream of the Star Tribune:

1 Keedron Bryant, "I Just Wanna Live." After George Floyd was killed, the 12-year-old sang this song (written by his mother, Johnetta Bryant) a cappella. The video went viral, and Warner Bros. has released a new version, produced by Dem Jointz, with understated instrumentation, incorporating elements of hip-hop, jazz and spirituals. Arresting.

2 Killer Mike interview, Rolling Stone. The Run the Jewels rapper talks about protest, presidential politics, police (his father was a cop) and RTJ's potent new album. He keeps it real - in conversation and on the mic.

3 Jeannette Bayardelle and Austin Scott, "Make You Feel My Love" video. They both appear in the raved-about Broadway musical "Girl From the North Country," featuring Bob Dylan songs. This piece is reimagined from the show. It's presented as a socially distanced duet, a piano ballad with each pining, gorgeous-voiced singer in a different bucolic setting, perfect for these pandemic times.

PICK SIX

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCXXXV.

SPECIAL SESSION RENEWS HOPES FOR THOSE SEEKING STATE MONEY

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 11, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 790 wordsByline: Mohamed Ibrahim

Highlight: The city of Bemidji has a problem: firefighter training that used so-called "forever chemicals" has left the city's water supply so contaminated that it needs a new water treatment facility to make water safer for its 15,000 residents. City officials are seeking state funding for the $16.5 million project, and crossing their fingers that a [...]

Body

The city of Bemidji has a problem: firefighter training that used so-called "forever chemicals" has left the city's water supply so contaminated that it needs a new water treatment facility to make water safer for its 15,000 residents.

City officials are seeking state funding for the $16.5 million project, and crossing their fingers that a bonding deal that includes the facility can be struck in next week's special legislative session. Whether they get the money or not, they have to move ahead.

"We're anxious right now because we need to do this water treatment facility and we could not receive state assistance," City Manager Nate Mathews said. "We don't have a choice but to provide clean drinking water to our residents."

The water treatment facility is one of more than $5 billion in infrastructure funding requests from stakeholders statewide that face uncertainty as a capital investment bill remains undone. Despite coronavirus relief and policing reform legislation shouldering aside attention to bonding during the regular and special sessions, some lawmakers say they're optimistic they can deliver an infrastructure package next week.

"Most of us couldn't say 'coronavirus' going into the session," said GOP state Sen. Dave Senjem. "The whole legislative session has changed from what it might normally be - the focus is much different."

Senjem, chairman of the capital investment committee, said work with committee members slowed considerably as the legislative process moved online to mitigate the spread of coronavirus at the Capitol.

"While that may be easy enough, it doesn't really afford the kind of conversations you need to have to make decisions on almost anything (and) I would say in this case especially a bonding bill," he said.

Special session renews hopes for those seeking state money

A bonding bill requires a three-fifths majority in both chambers to pass, and disagreements on the size of the bill contributed to the impasse. With an election later this year, lawmakers also have to consider how decisions can help or hurt them politically.

About a week after the regular session ended, George Floyd died at the hands of Minneapolis police, sparking protests and unrest worldwide. The subsequent calls for policing reform dominated the June special session, leaving infrastructure projects in limbo.

In Red Wing, city officials requested $10.5 million to complete a rail grade separation project for a busy four-lane roadway that intersects the Canadian Pacific Railroad.

Sturgeon Lake Road is the only public access point for tribal lands of the Prairie Island Indian Community, Xcel Energy's Nuclear Generating Plant and the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers Lock & Dam No. 3. Red Wing Mayor Sean Dowse said the road is a major public safety concern.

"You can imagine when emergency vehicles are coming from Red Wing to Prairie Island and if they encounter a train ... there's going to be delays of vital services," he said. "It just creates a barrier to emergency responders so we really want to get this done."

The Minnesota State Colleges and Universities system, which serves more than 350,000 students, requested $271.2 million for building maintenance and other campus-specific projects.

"Taking care of the infrastructure at our colleges and universities is very important for our students as well as the communities we serve," Minnesota State Chancellor Devinder Malhotra, said in a statement. "A bonding bill should be on the 'must do' list in a special session."

On Friday, Gov. Tim Walz convened the Legislature for a special session beginning Monday. Though Republican lawmakers in the House threatened to use a bonding bill as leverage to eliminate Walz's peacetime emergency powers, House and Senate leadership have agreed upon a $1.35 billion bonding bill they hope to bring to the governor's desk by the end of the session.

Senate Minority Leader Susan Kent said she thinks $1.35 billion isn't enough and the state missing a "huge opportunity to be more ambitious." But she said a bonding bill, as well as addressing policing reform and the economic fallout of COVID-19, remain a priority this special session.

Mohamed Ibrahim is a corps member for the Associated Press/Report for America Statehouse News Initiative. Report for America is a nonprofit national service program that places journalists in local newsrooms to report on undercovered issues. Walz calls special session next week to consider 30-day extension of pandemic powers Minnesota's primary is Tuesday. Here are key east metro races to watch. Voters, GOP lawmakers plan lawsuit over Walz's mask mandate at polling places State Patrol cancels police academy class 'due to lack of funding' Minnesota will close 2 prisons to prepare for budget shortfall. Other agencies face holes, too.

Load-Date: August 7, 2020

ARTICLE MCXXXVI.

STATE'S 1ST BLACK-OWNED BOOKSTORE TO OPEN ONLINE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 11, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 696 wordsByline: ZOE JACKSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Shop will carry books by African American writers.Body

When she was a child, Dionne Sims couldn't stop reading.

"I used to go to the library and check out 12 books at a time, and my mom used to be like, 'How many times can I bring you to the library?'" Sims recalled.

She devoured books through middle and high school. But like many voracious readers, Sims' love for reading tapered off in college.

"When I got into college, the text that we were reading was so overwhelmingly dry and white. It felt like I never saw myself reflected in anything," Sims said. "That kind of took the passion out of it for me, where I felt very disconnected from literature. So, I didn't do a lot of reading for fun while I was in college."

Since graduating from the University of Minnesota and beginning a career in user experience design, Sims, 27, has returned to her old reading habits. Reading Tomi Adeyemi's "Children of Blood and Bone," made her remember how much she loved getting lost in a book.

A dream of opening a bookstore returned to her after George Floyd was killed by Minneapolis police on May 25.

During the weeks of racial reckoning that followed, many people looked for ways to learn about anti-racism.

Similarly, Sims was looking for ways to support Black people, and decided to look for books.

"I just ended up looking to see if there were any Black-owned bookstores. My intention, of course, wasn't to open one at the time. I was just kind of wondering where they were at, where the closest one is. I discovered that there was none in Minnesota, and that was when I made the tweet."

In Sims' viral tweet on June 15 she wrote that there are no Black-owned bookstores in the state, and that opening one had long been a dream.

State's 1st Black-owned bookstore to open online

"It just absolutely took off, and I wasn't expecting it. But at the same time, it's such an amazing community of people around to me and it just felt really great to be supported in that way," Sims said.

Her store, called Black Garnet Books, will mostly stock books by Black and other diverse authors.

The books will primarily be adult and young adult, as St. Paul bookmobile Babycake's Book Stack already focuses on diverse children's books.

Crowdfunding for the store was set to launch July 10, and Sims says she hopes that online sales will follow shortly afterward on Bookshop.org, an online store that intentionally supports local bookstores.

The possibility of pop-up sales as well as a permanent physical space will depend on the success of the crowdfunding, as well as the COVID-19 pandemic, Sims said.

"I'm trying to be really intentional about the timeline for this because with all the excitement it's very easy to just rush everything, and my plan for this bookstore is really to make sure that it's sustainable and that it can stay in the Twin Cities longer than previous Black-owned bookstores," Sims said.

Sims briefly had a partner in Black Garnet Books, Muna Abdulahi, who is no longer involved in the endeavor. She wished Abdulahi well in a post on the store's website on July 8.

Carrie Oby, executive director of the Midwest Independent Booksellers Association, based in Minneapolis, was in her role when the last Black-owned bookstore in Minnesota, Ancestry Books, came and went, closing in 2015.

Oby said the New York Times bestseller list, which has been filled with books by Black authors in recent weeks, bodes well for Sims' store.

"With the whole country and the whole world focusing on these issues, it's amazing. I think there really is a hunger and an eagerness to support Black-owned businesses and bookstores specifically because books are so important for opening people's minds and getting the right information out there," Oby said.

Black-owned bookstores continue to energize the independent bookstore landscape, which is going through a renaissance of its own with recent developments like Bookshop.org, said Oby.

"I think that a Black-owned bookstore, especially here in the Twin Cities, after the uprising and the protests, having this bookstore on the horizon, I think that's a really powerful statement," Oby said.

Zoë Jackson covers young and new voters at the Star Tribune through the Report For America program, supported by the Minneapolis Foundation. 612-673-7112 · @zoemjack

Load-Date: July 23, 2020

St. Paul champion gymnast Sunisa Lee: 'It's been hard to stay positive. I'm trying'

ARTICLE MCXXXVII.

ST. PAUL CHAMPION GYMNAST SUNISA LEE: 'IT'S BEEN HARD TO STAY POSITIVE. I'M TRYING'

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 11, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 803 words

Byline: Dane Mizutani

Highlight: It's been a difficult year for Sunisa Lee and her family, but the St. Paul teenage gymnast who won a gold medal at the last World Championships still has her Olympic dreams within reach.

Body

In less than a year, Sunisa Lee's world has been completely turned upside down.

She became a household name last August with her stunning performance at the U.S. Gymnastics Championships, and did so while battling through indescribable turmoil.

In the days leading up to the national competition, her father John fell from a ladder while helping a friend trim a tree branch. He sustained a spinal cord injury that put him in the hospital and left him paralyzed from the chest down.

Somehow, the St. Paul gymnast bottled up her emotions and used them as fuel, taking first place on uneven bars and finishing as runner-up to the GOAT Simone Biles in the all-around.

That mental fortitude put Lee firmly on the map and positioned her to chase down her lifelong dream of qualifying for the 2020 Olympics in Tokyo. She will need more of the same moving forward amid the toughest year of her life.

"Sometimes it's hard to think this is real life," Lee said. "It's like the stuff in movies. You don't think it's ever going to happen and then it does. It's definitely tested my character."

As if her father's accident wasn't enough to deal with, Lee, 17, has been forced to battle through more adversity over the past few months.

She watched helplessly as the coronavirus pandemic postponed the 2020 Olympics for at least a year. She sat back as civil unrest spread across the Twin Cities in the aftermath of George Floyd's killing. She tried to be a rock for her family as her aunt and her uncle passed away a couple of weeks apart.

All the while Lee's safe haven was taken from her, too, as Midwest Gymnastics in Little Canada was shut down amid statewide restrictions.

St. Paul champion gymnast Sunisa Lee: 'It's been hard to stay positive. I'm trying'

"I've had to deal with a lot," Lee said. "There's just been so much negativity around the world. It's been hard to stay positive. I'm trying."

A few weeks ago, Lee injured her left ankle upon returning to the gym. She's currently in a walking boot and working with coach Jess Graba to figure out a plan for the next few months.

"It seems like it's been nonstop bad news," Graba said. "I think the hardest thing for her is staying motivated on a day-to-day basis when we aren't sure what's going to happen. We spent nearly 10 years planning for this. It's like everything was built around the 2020 Olympics, and then it all changed."

That's still hard for Lee to stomach, especially knowing the 2020 Olympics were supposed to start in a couple of weeks. "It's super weird," she said. "I was talking to my coaches and I was like, 'I could've been an Olympian right now.' It's hard to come to grips with that sometimes. I try not to think about it."

In the moments that she does, Lee remembers that everything she wants to accomplish is still in front of her. She remains among the best gymnasts in the world and knows she needs to start thinking about the Olympic Trials sooner rather than later.

"It's hard to motivate myself sometimes because I felt like I lost everything," Lee said. "It feels so much different than last year. I remember I was already panicking thinking about the Olympics because I knew it was coming up fast. Now it feels like they aren't coming anytime soon because everything keeps changing."

That's not at all the case, and Lee will likely have to follow a similar schedule if she wants to be ready for the Olympic Trials next year. That's something Graba has tried to hammer home while also making sure not to plan things too far in advance. He has kept benchmarks more general than usual with everything still up in the air.

"It's really hard because we don't want her to feel like she has to keep picking up the pieces," Graba said. "I want to try to avoid setting her up to have a big goal only to have that get taken away again. She's had enough stuff to deal with over the last year or so."

As tough as life has been, Lee is grateful for the time she got to spend with her family over the past few months. Her life is usually consumed by gymnastics, so it was nice to take a step back during such a tough time.

That said, Lee was thrilled to get back into the gym last month. She said it provided a sense of normalcy, allowing her to latch on to something familiar in a time surrounded by so many unknowns.

"I felt like she was a little lost," Graba said. "It's such a big portion of what she does every day, and all of a sudden everything just stopped. You could just see it as soon as she got back in the gym the first day and it seemed like there was a weight lifted off her shoulders. She felt like she could finally do something about everything that was going on."

As she continues to rehab her left ankle, Lee vowed to take it day by day and return stronger than ever. It's hard to bet against her at this point.

"It definitely hasn't been an easy journey," Lee said. "But if I make the Olympics then obviously it's going to be worth it."

St. Paul champion gymnast Sunisa Lee: 'It's been hard to stay positive. I'm trying'

Load-Date: August 7, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCXXXVIII.

PROVING GROUND: THE MIDWEST REMAKES AMERICAN POLITICS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 12, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1848 wordsByline: TOREY VAN OOT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: TURNING AWAY // Polls show eroding support for the president among womenBody

AN OCCASIONAL SERIES

Erika Weber, a 39-year-old mother of four from Lakeville, was pretty sure that come November she was going to vote once again for President Donald Trump. In line with her conservative lean, she overlooked the president's blustering style and overactive Twitter feed. As 2020 opened, she was generally pleased with his job performance.

Now she's not so sure.

The coronavirus pandemic put a damper on a once-booming U.S. economy. More recently, George Floyd's death left Americans of all kinds reckoning anew with issues of race. Weber was disappointed in Trump's response, including a Fourth of July speech at Mount Rushmore casting the protests surrounding Floyd's killing as an assault on America's culture and heritage.

"People were doing well," Weber said, watching two of her sons splash in Lake Marion in Dakota County. "Now, I will say it's harder for me. I feel like it's a way more stressful election this time than any one I've voted in before."

With four months until Election Day, suburban women like Weber find themselves once again a pivotal demographic in the battle between Trump and Democratic challenger Joe Biden. They are a focus of the campaigns in key Midwestern battleground states that helped Trump win in 2016, and which he needs to hold if he hopes to win re-election in 2020.

That includes Minnesota, a state that Trump narrowly lost in 2016, and one that he has personally vowed to flip in 2020. But across the state, as well as the nation, Trump appears to be facing a stiff headwinds in the suburbs, particularly among women.

PROVING GROUND: THE MIDWEST REMAKES AMERICAN POLITICS

A Star Tribune Minnesota Poll in May found 63% of women statewide disapproved of Trump's performance as president. That came two months into the pandemic that upended the economy and daily life. It was an 8% increase in Trump's disapproval among Minnesota women in a February poll. The rise in disapproval was even bigger in the Twin Cities suburbs.

National polls also have shown Trump slipping with women, including white working-class women, among his most loyal supporters. While Hillary Clinton carried female voters in 2016, Trump won the votes of 53% of white women nationwide. Exit polls showed him with a 27-point edge among women without college degrees. But that margin shrank to a single-digit lead in a Washington Post/ABC News poll in late May. Support among college-educated women also has dropped, a June New York Times poll showed.

In 2018, female voters were key in delivering big suburban wins to Democrats in congressional races, including in Minnesota. Two of the biggest prizes were in races around the Twin Cities, where women were instrumental in helping Democratic U.S. Reps. Angie Craig and Dean Phillips unseat GOP incumbents in districts long held by Republicans.

This year, those same voters are poised to swing not just the presidency but to help decide the political alignment in both Congress and the Minnesota Legislature. If Trump's support continues to erode among suburban women, it could become increasingly difficult for Republicans to tip the state relying mainly on rural districts that have been their most reliable source of votes.

Presidential politics more than ever is a turnout game. Black voters, senior citizens, white men without college degrees, young evangelicals, women in the suburbs: All these groups can tip the scales one way or another. But given high turnout rates among female voters, especially well-educated women, the 2020 election has become a test for Trump's Republican Party as it tries to hold onto voters who have increasingly been moving toward Democrats.

"Democrats need the gender gap to be big and Republicans want to narrow the gender gap," said Kathryn Pearson, a University of Minnesota political scientist. "Suburban women is one of those routes."

Suburbs divided

Women across the seven-county Twin Cities area have always brought a multitude of experiences and views to the voting booth. Voting trends vary by community, race, marital status and education. Interviews with more than two dozen suburban women, political operatives and strategists reflect that diversity, revealing a range of concerns that weigh on this must-win slice of the electorate. But this year, Trump's singular rhetoric and unconventional approach to the presidency appear to be driving views across the political spectrum.

"He doesn't think before he speaks," lamented Robin Schaeppi, a 58-year-old day care provider from the east metro who backs Biden. "He's creating a divide in the country that I've never, ever seen in my whole adult life."

Darlynn Johnson shares those concerns. She voted for Trump in 2016. The 44-year-old from Coon Rapids found him "strong minded" and liked that he brought a business background to the role. But she's undecided this year. Johnson, like Weber, also has reservations about Biden.

PROVING GROUND: THE MIDWEST REMAKES AMERICAN POLITICS

"I thought it would be a lot different," Johnson said of Trump, as she waited to order corn dogs and curds at a fair stand in Anoka. "The negativity that he brings, the tone in his voice. Nobody's opinion matters, he bashes them."

Sue Pickens also sees a fractured nation. But the retired school bus driver from Apple Valley doesn't think Trump is to blame. She got involved in GOP politics after 2016, saying she was "appalled at the way that he was so vilified" by critics.

"It pushed me to the point where I have to do something," she said. "I want to know in my heart that I did what I could."

Pickens, a fan of Trump's hard line on immigration and approach to trade, thinks voters should focus on actions not words. "He's getting things done," she said. "So in the end, who gives a rip what he put on Twitter?"

Like Pickens, Mika Pieper-White considers herself an independent. The 24-year-old engineer from Oakdale says she's fiscally conservative but counts women's and LGBT rights among her top issues. She gives Trump kudos for being a "great marketer," but thinks he's sold the country a false bill of goods.

After voting for Libertarian candidate Gary Johnson in 2016, Pieper-White is pivoting to Biden, whom she sees as a more strategic choice. "I should have felt it last election," she said as she watched her dog Nala play at a Woodbury park. "But I don't think anybody in my circle realized how much of a realistic chance Trump had."

New conversations

Many campaigns believe the way to win over suburban women - particularly white moms seen as swing voters - is through "kitchen table issues" that affect their families' lives. The economy, education and public safety loom large. Since 2016, gun laws, health care and abortion rights have newly re-energized women, especially on the political left.

But this year, the far-reaching impact of the coronavirus pandemic appears paramount.

A top concern for many moms, including Weber, is whether school classrooms reopen this fall and, if they do, what safety precautions are in place. Trump is pressing for schools to open, a prospect that worries many educators and parents.

At the same time, Pickens worries that business and community shutdowns enforced by state and local leaders ended up "destroying more lives" than they saved.

Karla Litch of Plymouth wants to see the president do more to control the virus spread. Her job as a flight attendant has been on hold. "We haven't even hit the iceberg yet," the 62-year-old said. "We don't have the leadership to really take care of what's going on."

Floyd's death and the unrest that followed have brought issues of racism and police brutality to the forefront of the presidential race. A number of Black women filed to run for the Legislature in suburban districts, including in Maple Grove and Woodbury. For them and many others, racial equity is a top priority.

PROVING GROUND: THE MIDWEST REMAKES AMERICAN POLITICS

GOP operatives, meanwhile, believe the civil unrest and calls to "defund" police will help them win back female suburban voters in November. Republican candidates already are making law and order a central theme. The issue played prominently in a recent Zoom meetup for roughly 80 female Trump supporters.

Suburban women are around Minneapolis looking in and saying, 'Wow, I'm really glad I'm not living there right now. I'm glad I'm in the suburbs' and 'Lets keep the suburbs safe,' " said Kathy Tingelstad, a GOP activist from Andover who represented Anoka and Coon Rapid counties in the Legislature.

But calls for racial justice are mobilizing women on the other side of the political divide as well. Across the suburbs, women are participating in Black Lives Matter protests, using Facebook to lobby for policy changes and participating in book clubs focused on structural racism.

"People assume [our] focus is very limited and directly on our families and making sure we are secure in our homes. I think that's underestimating the size of our hearts and the focus that we have," said Anita Smithson, a progressive activist from Bloomington. "The moms and the suburban women I know care about everyone's kitchen table issues, not just their own."

'Can't take them for granted'

Given the stakes, both sides are aiming to shore up support from suburban women in the next four months.

"We can't take them for granted," said Mikki Murray, a GOP official focused on the east metro. "With the swing and change that took place with the last election, clearly we'd be foolish not to have some sort of targeted energy."

The Trump campaign, which hired a women's outreach coordinator here, is holding female-focused events in person and online. Amy Stretcher Burkes, 33, has attended several. The stay-at-home mom of two thinks polls fail to capture support for the president and the pre-pandemic economy.

"The silent majority is alive and well," she said. "I truly believe in it."

Democrats, meanwhile, hope to repeat the so-called "pink wave" of electoral participation and activism of 2018.

Diana Jones, a warehouse manager from Woodbury, was part of a surge of political engagement that year. Jones, who is Hispanic, said Trump's family separation policy for refugees motivated her to join her college-age daughter as a volunteer for Democrats. She plans to do even more this year. "She said, 'Mom, you have to have a voice as well,' " she recalled. "Everybody counts."

torey.vanoot@startribune.com

651-925-5049

About this series

Proving Ground is an examination of the vital role that the Midwest will play in the 2020 election. Voters here put Donald Trump in the White House, and Democrats are determined to win them back.

Online: Read more of the series at startribune.com/proving.

PROVING GROUND: THE MIDWEST REMAKES AMERICAN POLITICS

TRUMP APPROVAL RATING BY GENDER

"Do you approve of Donald Trump's job performance as president?"

Jan. 2018 -- Women: 37%; Men: 54%

Sept. 2018 -- Women: 33%; Men: 46%

Oct. 2019 -- Women: 37%; Men: 44%

Feb. 2020 -- Women: 40%; Men: 49%

May 2020 -- Women: 36%; Men: 55%

TRUMP APPROVAL RATING BY REGION

"Do you approve of Donald Trump's job performance as president?"

May 2020

S. Minn.: 56%

N. Minn.: 56%

Rest of T.C. suburbs: 46%

Henn./Ramsey cos.: 31%

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete chart.)

Source: Star Tribune/MPR/KARE 11 Minn. Polls, 2018-2020

800 Minn. registered voters, +/-3.5% margin of error at each date of polling.

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

ARTICLE MCXXXIX.

EDINA CREATES BLACK LIVES MATTER ART EXHIBIT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 12, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 455 wordsByline: MARA KLECKER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The installation by student and professional artists will be on display at 50th and France.Body

Shortly after the police killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis, Rebecca Sorensen drove through Edina and was heartened by the Black Lives Matter posters she saw in the windows of businesses at 50th and France.

A short time later she learned an Edina Realty agent had been fired after writing on Facebook that she had taken down many of the posters in the business district. So Sorensen, a member of Edina's Arts and Culture Commission, started organizing her own solution.

As a result, two dozen artists, both professionals and students, have created wooden signs with messages of inclusion and racial justice that will be placed in flowerpots along W. 50th Street.

The public art installation, called Seeds of Change, will be dedicated at noon Sunday at the fountain downtown. Mayor Jim Hovland plans to speak and Edina Realty will provide Popsicles and children's activities.

Artist Alexander Brooks Parker helped some of the students create their art pieces, which will be waterproofed so they can be displayed all summer.

Brooks Parker was approached by Sorensen, who had seen his art outside his wife's clothing store, Carole Bruns Couture, in Minneapolis. At 53, he has never had an official display of his artwork.

"I was a little surprised that Edina was doing this but very proud to be a part of it as an African American artist," he said. "Having teenagers involved was a great thing too - to let the youth express themselves right now."

Much of Brooks Parker's work for the installation includes images of Floyd with phrases like "Keep Justice in Your Heart." He's eager to see the pieces surrounded by the students' work.

Edina creates Black Lives Matter art exhibit

"It's such a powerful sentiment for those in Edina and the larger community," he said. "We've been segregated for so long. ... I believe if people take the time to look at it, it will be far reaching and show the necessity of us coming together."

Rachel Adegbenro, former president of Edina High School's Black Student Union, provided some of the art and involved other BSU students in the project. The group helped organize a Black Lives Matter march in Edina and a communitywide effort to collect donations for south Minneapolis in the wake of the riots.

Adegbenro said that while much of Edina doesn't look like her, she has been touched to see how many Edina residents support the project and want to understand more about the Black Lives Matter movement.

"I feel like in Edina, we're kind of in a bubble," she said. "I think this is a way to spread awareness and a way to get the conversation started here."

Sorensen said the project offers "messages of hope and inclusion and racial justice from all ages, with every facet of community life jumping in to help bring [it] to life."

Mara Klecker · 612-673-4440

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

Theater couple creates a show to take on the road - or at least to the driveway

ARTICLE MCXL. THEATER COUPLE CREATES A SHOW TO TAKE ON THE ROAD - OR AT LEAST TO THE DRIVEWAY

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 12, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 980 words

Byline: Kathy Berdan

Highlight: What do you do when you're a married theater couple quarantined in your house for months with your stage work shut down? You write and perform a play about it and you take it on the road. Um, make that take it to the driveway. Or a back yard. Husband and wife Jen Maren and [...]

Body

What do you do when you're a married theater couple quarantined in your house for months with your stage work shut down?

You write and perform a play about it and you take it on the road. Um, make that take it to the driveway. Or a back yard.

Husband and wife Jen Maren and Peter Simmons created "My Funny Quarantine" - a 30-minute performance featuring songs, storytelling, improv, pantomime and ... swordfighting - that shares a story of a couple at home together due to the COVID-19 shutdown. Maren and Simmons are performing it on request outdoors for neighborhood and family gatherings of 25 people or fewer.

If these were non-pandemic times, Maren would now be on stage for her sixth round as Marjorie Congdon Caldwell in History Theatre's "Glensheen." Simmons would be on stage at Park Square Theatre this month in "Holmes and Watson." (Both productions have been rescheduled for summer 2021.) They would also be working as part of the "Science Live Theatre" acting company at the Science Museum of Minnesota.

Maren said they were on their way to their most successful year ever as a theater couple. When their performances shut down, she panicked.

"What can I do? What can Pete do?" she wondered as she lost sleep. She woke one morning and asked, "Pete, what can you do?"

Maybe they could perform together, Maren suggested. Simmons acts, plays guitar and has done street theater, including a stint at the Minnesota Renaissance Festival in the early 1980s. Maren acts and sings.

Simmons reacted the way he always does, he says: "No, that wouldn't work."

Theater couple creates a show to take on the road - or at least to the driveway

Maren says she reacted the way she always does. She kept quiet about it.

About four days later, she says, Simmons announced: "I wrote a play about a couple quarantined together."

A chat with the couple on the front porch of their St. Paul home is solid proof the dialogue for "My Funny Quarantine" is based in real life.

Like most married couples in conversation, they often continue one another's sentences, toss in a jab or inside joke.

Like most actors in conversation, they are witty and animated and, well, dramatic.

Maren and Simmons, who met during a show in 2011 and were married in 2014, call their two-person theater company Theatre Unmasked (and make fun of the spelling during their show, saying it proves they are "theater professionals").

Before the COVID-19 lockup, the most time they'd spent together - just the two of them - had been on vacations, Simmons says. Confined together 24/7, they did projects around their 1890s house, including adding an upstairs laundry room that doubles as a sound studio for voiceover work ... which has also become scarce during the coronavirus shutdown.

"Everything is gone," Maren says she worried. "What do I do?"

Creating "My Funny Quarantine" gave him purpose, Simmons says. "It's not underselling it to say for me, this was a lifesaver." He calls his wife the engine for ideas: "En-Jen".

"I have the idea, he makes it happen," Maren says.

Electric bikes are a pandemic boon. We tried one of the best \(and priciest\). Need a pedal-push? Rentals offer chance to try out electric bikes Friends of the Hennepin County Library's 24th Pen Pals season to feature five top authors Minnesota native and fan favorite Janelle Pierzina returns to 'Big Brother' for the fourth time There's no Irish Fest this year, but you can do a 'porch pour' on Saturday They knew the play had to appeal to families, since they're staging it outdoors. Their experience working with the acting company at the Science Museum helps there, Maren says. Science Museum performances are for kids and adults "with a lot of distractions around them," Simmons says.

But just as Theatre Unmasked was ready to take its tale to the driveway, the killing of George Floyd changed everything. Riots following Floyd's death hit two blocks from their home.

"We didn't want to be tone deaf," Simmons says. "We can't sugarcoat it. This is a play by, and about, white people."

After a respectful pause, Maren and Simmons decided to go ahead with the show, but acknowledge that problems cannot be ignored. Through July, they're donating half of their proceeds to Black Lives Matter and the Equal Justice Initiative.

There are no set fees for the show for now. Audience donations are accepted.

"We still also think there validity in some release from everything (through entertainment)," Maren says, "so you can come back and pick up the fight again."

Theater couple creates a show to take on the road - or at least to the driveway

Simmons also wrote Maren's one-woman play, "Live from New York! He's a Prom Date!", which ran at History Theatre in May 2019. It was based on a true story about Maren coming home from high school in Red Wing in 1992 to find her mom had entered her to be on the "Sally Jessy Raphael" daytime talk show because Maren didn't have a prom date. They were flown to New York to appear on the show. Maren and Simmons say Theatre Unmasked may bring that story back.

From song parodies ("Wasting Away Again in My Corona-ville) to pantomime improv where Simmons acts out a story based on audience suggestions, "It's a psychological drama about people learning how to stay in love," he says.

So, how much of "My Funny Quarantine" is based on real life?

"There's some crossover," Simmons says, and Maren nods.

Let's just hope that doesn't include the swordfighting.

Want to bring the show to your back yard?

If you'd like to book Theatre Unmasked, you can schedule a performance by going to jenmaren.com/unmasked or call Theatre Unmasked at 612-644-6785. They ask for a minimum of 10 people and suggested donation of $5 to $10 per person. The maximum crowd allowed during COVID-19 restrictions is 25.

Northrop season has mix of live stream, online and live performances Minnesota Fringe is still wacky, irreverent, heartfelt and online Minnesota Jewish Theatre Company season opens with show at Harriet Island Park Square whodunit has clues and characters, online in four installments

Graphic

Jen Maren and husband Pete Simmons air their differences with a swordfight, as they perform "My Funny Quarantine" in the alley behind their St. Paul home, Sunday, July 5, 2020. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

Jen Maren and husband Pete Simmons of Theatre Unmasked on the porch of their St. Paul home. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

Neighbors gather to watch Jen Maren and husband Pete Simmons perform "My Funny Quarantine" in the alley behind their St. Paul home, Sunday, July 5, 2020. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: August 8, 2020

ARTICLE MCXLI. ECHOES OF THE STRIFE OF 1967

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 12, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 879 wordsByline: MARISSA EVANS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Fifty-three years later, the unrest in north Minneapolis resonates in a new way.Body

As the world watched the civil rights uprising in Minneapolis after George Floyd's death, some in the city were not surprised that it happened here. They had seen it before.

In July 1967, people angered by suspected police brutality took to the street on Plymouth Avenue, then one of the city's commercial strips. Three nights of arson and destruction drew hundreds of National Guard troops and added Minneapolis to the list of cities in the mid-1960s rocked by protests.

In the eyes of two activists of that era, Minnesota is still in denial about its own issues with systemic racism.

Lifelong civil rights advocate Josie Johnson was an adviser to the mayor at the time, and hopes that the city's pain in 2020 will lead to real change.

"It was a hurtful moment to see this man murdered and yet I felt that perhaps his sacrifice would enlighten the world as to how our Black men can be treated without any worry on the part of the authority," Johnson said. "I had the feeling that perhaps George Floyd's life had a historical and lasting help in the world seeing how Black men in America can be treated."

The state's unwillingness to confront racism and inequities is why "Minnesota is the Mississippi of the north," said Spike Moss, who, helped co-found The Way, a Black community center on Plymouth Avenue, in 1966.

"It's never just the incident that sparks it," Moss said. "The fuse is always there, we just need you to light it. We go to bed and we wake up in the same hell."

The spark on July 19, 1967, was the rough handling by Minneapolis police of two Black girls who were fighting over a wig, the Star Tribune reported at the time.

"The police were not gentle, but you can't be in separating two women," police Inspector Donald Dwyer said then.

ECHOES OF THE STRIFE OF 1967

Police said Black youths set fires and threw rocks at law enforcement and shop windows of north Minneapolis businesses, most of them Jewish-owned at the time. Thirteen Black people were arrested after the first night of disturbances.

Black people were protesting in the street over more than just their grievances of police violence but lack of access to jobs, housing and other injustices based on the color of their skin, Johnson said.

During the 1967 protests, Johnson was an adviser to Mayor Arthur Naftalin and was urging him to understand why the Black community was rebelling.

She said Naftalin had a "deeper sense" than other mayors seeing disruption in their cities at that time on why there was anger and unrest in the Black community, even if Minneapolis wasn't perceived as having the same problems with race as Detroit or Newark, N.J.

"We were viewed as a different collection of people, and we too in Minnesota are having serious racial and equality issues and therefore there was a need to pay attention to that," Johnson said.

"We too needed to say that Black people in Minnesota are upset and angry and felt that denial of justice and equality too and we could identify what our brothers and sisters in other parts of the U.S. felt."

Moss said part of the reason Minnesota's problems on racism and discrimination were not more widely known at the time was because of the lack of local media coverage - including the Star Tribune's predecessors - and suppression of stories about how Black people and Native Americans were being discriminated against and brutalized.

He said The Way was unfairly blamed in the media for stoking trouble. It became harder for the center to secure funding after that.

After Floyd's death in May, he felt as if "finally" there was tangible evidence of the brutality the Black community had long spoken of and no one could deny it.

Rose Brewer, a professor of African American and African studies at the University of Minnesota, pointed out that while the 1967 uprising and the Floyd protests happened in different political and social moments, there's "certainly continuity" in what the Black community is fighting for.

Another difference is that Minnesota's inequalities were exposed during the Floyd protests in a way that had more reach than the 1967 protests. There was a "convergence of crises" with the coronavirus pandemic, people losing jobs, lack of access to health care and more, Brewer said.

"You have a whole period of instability and the fact that that police narrative has always been embedded in what catalyzes the Black community to respond," Brewer said. "It's just been so consistent over so long of a period of time I would say it should not be surprising to folks to make that connection between an earlier period that did catalyze a lot of what we are confronting today."

For Johnson, Floyd's death shows "the struggle is probably more evident" for how hard it's been to not only seek justice but force Minnesotans to see how the police can treat Black people.

As horrified as she is by what happened to Floyd, she is heartened that this time feels different.

ECHOES OF THE STRIFE OF 1967

"Everything dealing with humans and policies has a time that finally is understood, is seen, is heard and it's when those times come that people are able to respond," Johnson said. "Minnesota's time finally came when people could actually associate the disadvantaged inequality and abuse of our people everywhere and acknowledge that, yes, we too need to be conscious of that and work on it."

Marissa Evans · 612-673-4280

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCXLII. POLICE CONSIDER THE COST OF SHARP CUTS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 12, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1501 wordsByline: LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Stung by budget constraints and growing calls for reimagining public safety since the killing of George Floyd, Minneapolis police officials are considering sharp cutbacks to popular community-oriented programs like the Police Athletics League and procedural justice to avoid making cuts elsewhere.

At the same time, the department is facing staffing pressures. Since June, 35 officers have retired or been terminated and dozens more may soon be temporarily sidelined on medical furloughs. Officials worry the resulting shortages could affect the department's ability to adequately police the city amid rising crime.

Budget pressures come as the City Council pushes to shrink or radically restructure the MPD. The figure circulating around precinct houses and at downtown headquarters is that the department will have to cut $8 million to $13 million from its $193.3 million budget. About 80% of the department's budget is tied up in salaries and benefits.

In Minneapolis, as elsewhere, calls to defund, or even abolish, the city's police force have grown since Floyd's death, which prompted nationwide protests over racial injustice and police brutality. Advocates say it only makes sense to divert some of the millions of public dollars given to police departments to social service agencies and community groups that focus on social issues - like mental health, housing, systemic racism and the opioid crisis - that help crime flourish.

With the recent departures, the number of MPD officers has fallen to about 825 - out of an authorized strength of 888 - which includes a class of 31 rookie officers who just hit the streets. But with the COVID-19 pandemic stretching the city's financial reserves, the MPD and other city departments face difficult choices.

MPD insiders say this will likely involve scaling back or disbanding the procedural justice and community engagement units, as well as the PAL program - which runs youth sports teams across the city - in order to preserve a more essential function: responding to 911 calls. If those units do fold, most of those officers would likely go back to patrolling the streets, joining school resource officers, who returned to working out of a squad car after the department lost its contract to work in city schools.

Police consider the cost of sharp cuts

Jamil Jackson, who consults for the city's Office of Violence Prevention, said he found the decision to cut programs like PAL "disappointing, but not surprising."

"Cutting community engagement and cutting the youth programs, which are supposed to be about preventing, that's asinine," said Jackson, who runs a mentoring program called Change Equals Opportunity. "Community engagement is what we're lacking in the most, if you ask me."

Those efforts have been complicated by a recent surge of gun violence as well as continued calls by some council members to disband the police force in favor of a transformative new public safety model.

On Thursday, Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey announced cost-saving measures meant to help fill an estimated $156 million budget hole left by the pandemic. He has signaled that he would seek to minimize cuts for police and other first responders, but he is likely to face stiff resistance from some council members, who may ask to drop the department down to the minimum staffing levels allowed under the city charter.

Shrinking departments

The "abolish the MPD movement" has been around for several years but was thrust into the mainstream only after Floyd's death. Similar debates have broken out in other U.S. cities, notably Los Angeles, where leaders voted last month to shrink the city's police force and cut $150 million from its budget, and New York City, which went even further, cutting roughly 20% of its $6 billion budget.

MPD backers say that any cuts would only hurt the crime-fighting abilities of the department, which a little over a decade ago boasted an authorized strength of 916 cops but has shrunk by 28 in the ensuing years, despite the city's growing population.

Instead of investing more in police, critics say money should be diverted to programs like the Cahoots, a nonprofit intervention program in Oregon that responds to mental health calls. Another widely cited model is Oakland's Ceasefire program, which targets violent offenders and has been credited with cutting the city's shootings and homicides nearly in half between 2012 and 2018 using a violence reduction strategy. Minneapolis has developed a similar program, Project L.I.F.E., which enlists police, ex-cons and relatives of shooting victims to try to reach youngsters who are most prone to committing or being victims of violence.

Most officers don't necessarily want to respond to calls involving mental health and domestic violence, for which they don't receive adequate training and which are inherently dangerous, says Minneapolis police Cmdr. Charlie Adams, who thinks it's symbolic of a broader social issue: As social service programs have been gutted over the years, police have been asked to take on a bigger role in dealing with the problems that result.

"We deal with everything that society doesn't want to deal with, and we're not trained to deal with it, but we're trying to figure out how to deal with it," he said. "They tell us, 'You guys have gotta make sure they stay away from the downtown businesses, you've gotta hide them, we don't want to deal with them' - then we become the bad guys."

The question of how many police officers Minneapolis needs has been raised many times. The city has long maintained around two officers for every 1,000 residents, a ratio that is far eclipsed by other major Upper Midwest cities like Detroit and Milwaukee but is higher than in places like Des Moines and

Police consider the cost of sharp cuts

Omaha. Minneapolis' ratio is about the same as St. Paul's. A Star Tribune analysis of FBI data found that in the decade between 2008 and 2017, the number of officers per capita dropped about 15% - a bigger decline than in other U.S. cities with similar populations and crime rates.

Options to consider

The city charter requires maintaining a police department and funding a force at a certain level based on the population; based on the latest census data, the city would only be required to have closer to 730 officers.

In some ways, Minneapolis has already moved toward downsizing its police force in recent years, notably with the expansion of its co-responder program, which partners officers with social workers on certain calls involving the mentally ill. In recent months, the council voted to reroute some police funding to the fledgling Office of Violence Prevention, and later some council members balked at applying for a federal loan to hire more officers.

Todd Foglesong, a professor at the University of Toronto's Munk School of Global Affairs and Public Policy, suggested that city officials might want to follow the example of the United Kingdom, where in 2010 the recession-ravaged government ordered all law enforcement agencies to cut their budgets by 20% over a decade while adopting reforms.

"First, many police departments tried to shift the demand for police services away by diverting noncritical, non-urgent calls for help to other agencies. Nearly all police chiefs acknowledged that the majority of 911 calls did not require a police response - or, as one chief put it, 'the armed authority of the state in your living room,'" Foglesong said.

Under a proposed charter amendment, five council members support the move to eliminate the requirement for a city-maintained police department and would instead create a new public safety department - which could include licensed peace officers, but wouldn't be required to do so. The city's Charter Commission faced a similar situation in the late 1980s, albeit from the other side, when then Council Member and former police officer Walt Dziedzic proposed amending the city charter to raise the staffing ratio to 2.35 officers per 1,000 residents. At the time, the force had 722 officers and crime was on the rise. But the measure was defeated.

Sam Sanchez, a longtime organizer with the reform group Twin Cities Coalition for Justice for Jamar, said he isn't in favor of abolishing the department but rather putting it under community control, which would allow citizens to have more of a say in policy decisions and make it easier to rid the force of problem officers.

"I'm glad people are thinking about change, but we don't need to reinforce the mayor and the council's power, we don't need to change the name of the department, we don't need a new department head," said Sanchez.

Adams, the police commander, says that potential cuts to MPD's community engagement efforts couldn't be coming at a worse time.

"So I mean, now we cut out all the engagement pieces, who does that hurt? It doesn't hurt anybody in southwest Minneapolis, right?" he said. "It hurts Little Earth. It hurts north Minneapolis, with all the programs that PAL provides there."

Police consider the cost of sharp cuts

Staff writer Liz Navratil contributed to this report.

Libor Jany · 612-673-4064 Twitter: @StribJany

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCXLIII. A DREAM ROOTED IN EQUALITY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 12, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 1334 wordsByline: SHARYN JACKSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Delayed by pandemic and unrest, a Black-owned juice bar will welcome all.Body

Catiesha Pierson's dream to own a juice bar by the time she turned 30 had almost come true when everything stopped.

Pierson signed the lease on a space in Minneapolis' Longfellow neighborhood in March, just a couple of months before her 30th birthday.

Interior walls still needed to be built and paperwork filled out when the coronavirus effectively shut down Minneapolis. When schools closed, she had to balance starting a business while supervising her 10-year-old son's schoolwork from home.

Then, unrest gripped the neighborhood where she lived and worked, after George Floyd was killed by police. The new business, called the Dripping Root, is located at 4002 Minnehaha Av. S., a little more than a mile from the fire-damaged Third Precinct.

"Everything in this neighborhood has been destroyed," said

Pierson. "I was super-worried. 'Oh my god, is my business going to end before it starts?' "

Her building was untouched, and now Pierson is closer to her goal of having a juice bar that welcomes "all races, all cultures," she said. "I see the Dripping Root as the rose left in the garden to bloom. It stayed there for a reason: because it was needed in the community."

In addition to healthy fruit and vegetable juices, Pierson will be serving "very Instagrammable" smoothie bowls, chia seed pudding and kombucha on tap when her juice bar opens later this summer.

A single mom, Pierson's road to entrepreneurship was long and winding. She went in and out of a career in collections for more than a decade, with stints as an interior designer and cosmetologist, toting her homemade fruit and vegetable blends to work with her all the while.

"My heart was in juice, 24/7," she said. "I've always been intrigued by how certain foods benefit the body." By removing the fiber, the nutrients from fruit and vegetables are "more direct," she said. The body absorbs them "like a sponge."

But as much as she loved to drink cold-pressed juices, Pierson, who is Black, didn't feel comfortable going to many of the shops that sold them.

"There have been times that I've gone places, and I've been looked past. I didn't feel welcome there. My money didn't feel welcome there," she said, adding, "I don't think juice is a white thing."

Other shops lacked "spunk," she said. The drinks were grab-and-go, and there was little incentive to sit down, talk or share an experience.

She began selling her juice blends, with names like Greentox, Sunshine and Down to Earth, to her colleagues and followers on social media. She offered the 16-oz. bottles for $10, and often delivered to customers throughout the metro area.

"She has delivered her delicious juice to me at my home, my workplace, my business, my baby daddy's," said Karmen Black, a longtime customer. Black describes Pierson's ginger shots as "magical" and credits them with helping her get over a bad cold. She's also done three-day cleanses where all she drank was Pierson's juices. "It completely resets your body," she said.

One of Pierson's earliest clients was the youth nonprofit Juxtaposition Arts in north Minneapolis, where Pierson had been a paid apprentice, mural artist and shoe designer during her teen years.

Her mentor Roger Cummings, one of the founders of Juxtaposition Arts, introduced Pierson's juices to the organization's operations staff. The steady business they provided allowed Pierson to figure out inventory, presentation, and, most important, to perfect the kind of customer service she longed for at other juice bars.

"Outside of her optimism, and her drive and her passion for health and wellness, I would say that she really cares about what people think about her and what she produces," Cummings said. "She's a passionate, committed person, and this is going to be an asset for the city."

After more than two years operating out of her home, Pierson was looking to expand. She explored selling at farmers markets, but realized she'd need to rent space in a commercial kitchen to keep pace with demand.

She was going on daily grocery runs and cramming her kitchen with produce. Often, she had to go from store to store to get what she needed. She had already gone through 10 personal juicers, and still could press only 60 bottles in a day.

She realized it was time to launch her own shop. She designed a logo, landed on a name and quit her job.

The name, Dripping Root, is a playful reference to a vegetable "literally getting the crap squeezed out of it," she said. "I always liked weird names," Pierson said, "because they stick with you."

While the name is playful, her vision is not.

"To have a place where nobody is going to get looked past," she said. "I think that's very important."

Help and hope

Pierson's 30th birthday was May 27, but she didn't celebrate. Minneapolis was reeling from Floyd's death two days earlier, particularly Pierson's neighborhood, which was the scene of several nights of unrest.

As residents emerged each morning to clean, Pierson said, she was encouraged by neighbors, family and friends who were hopeful that her business could help bring the community back together.

"With everything that was happening in the city, we were seeing that there were people out there who really wanted to see a change," said Andrea Witt, Pierson's mother. "They were looking for bright and fresh, and people were giving money to rebuild. She was just trying to build."

Pierson wanted to establish her juice bar without taking out a small-business loan. But she still needed funds to complete the build-out and purchase a $14,000 juicer. Witt launched a GoFundMe campaign to help her daughter over the finish line. It has now surpassed its $70,000 goal.

"It all worked out exactly how it should have worked out," Pierson said. "There are a ton of people that want to see this here. It's still standing, and a ton of people support it. Strangers that want to see it thrive."

Her landlord gave her a break on rent for the months construction was stalled. Artists are contributing murals. The wall and floor tile work are being donated. Room & Board has offered to provide the furnishings.

"As a brand, we are strong believers in contributing to the success of the communities we are a part of, especially when there's a chance to support a woman-owned business," said Room & Board partnership marketing manager Dianna J. Bauer.

"I'm so happy it's coming together," Pierson said. "The amount of support I'm getting from all over - I don't even have words for it. I literally cry at the happiness."

Pierson views her own success within the context of history. "I got lucky," she said. "A long time ago, I wouldn't have been able to do this. I wouldn't have been free, I wouldn't have had rights, being a woman or being Black. So it's just amazing to be able to do it."

Another helper: her son, Ahliyas, who refers to himself as her "money counter," she said. "The only thing he doesn't know how to do is taxes."

Raising him alone while launching a business has been her biggest challenge, she said. "Your child is your life. You have to do everything for them. And this," she said, gesturing toward the empty storefront on Minnehaha Avenue, "is my second child."

Pierson is still waiting on her permit for construction, which has encountered delays while Minnesota's economy slowly reopens. For now, the space - just two blocks from where Pierson lives - is a blank slate. But to her, the trajectory is clear.

"I have a lot of personality, so my juice bar is going to have a lot of personality. It is going to be very welcoming, bright, relaxing. There will be a lot of art," she said.

It'll be grab-and-go to start, with curbside pickup and delivery. When she's ready to open to customers indoors, they'll find a cafe-like setting that encourages customers to linger.

A dream rooted in equality

Despite the setbacks and delays amid a pandemic and civil unrest, Pierson's dream is coming true.

"My story is real," she said. "I am a Black woman. I am a single mom. All odds are literally supposed to be against me. And it's happening."

Sharyn Jackson · 612-673-4853

@SharynJackson

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

End of Document

BOOKMARK

ARTICLE MCXLIV. BOOKMARK

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 12, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 4ELength: 602 wordsByline: LAURIE HERTZEL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: COVID is changing how, why we readBody

A couple of weeks ago, I spent a weekend in a small town in Sligo.

Obviously I didn't physically travel there - COVID-19 is keeping me tied to my house most of the time, except for occasional trips to the grocery store. There will be no trips to Ireland, or anywhere, for a long time.

But when reading for pleasure these days, I travel: I am drawn to books with a strong sense of place, books that are set in cities or countries I love or would love to someday visit.

The book set in Sligo is called "Long Time No See," by the late Irish novelist and poet Dermot Healy. Published in 2011, it's told in first person by a teenage boy who has suffered a great trauma. He is waiting for the results of his Leaving Cert and spending his time doing odd jobs and working as a caregiver to his elderly uncle.

There is not much plot and not much action; the book is told primarily through dialogue. The reader figures out what is happening, and who the characters are, as the book unfolds.

I think I would have loved this book no matter when I read it, but it was particularly resonant now - it placed me thoroughly in this village, with its people, its grudges and affections, its history. The narrator is in pain, and without ever discussing it, the whole town is looking out for him.

Healy's novel is steeped in something I think we all want fervently now - a sense of benevolence and community.

This year - with the pandemic, and the protests, and the clamor for change - is changing the way some of us read, or at least changing what we want to read.

Me, I'm looking for reassurance that the world is still a good and safe place.

BOOKMARK

Some people are using this crucial moment to delve into the difficult problems of race in America - problems that have existed forever, but have come to the forefront since the death of George Floyd while in police custody.

As Jenna Ross reported on these pages in June, requests at the local libraries and bookstores for books by people of color have gone way up. The titles topping the New York Times bestseller list are important books by writers of color, including Ta-Nehisi Coates, Michelle Obama, Ibram X. Kendi and Bakari Sellers.

Locally, "A Good Time for the Truth," a collection of essays by Minnesota writers of color, has been chosen as the second book for the One Book/ One Minnesota statewide reading club.

Meanwhile, some readers are seizing the long days to tackle huge books that have been on their to-be-read piles forever.

The Wall Street Journal reported recently that people are picking up books such as Leo Tolstoy's "War and Peace," George Eliot's "Middlemarch" and Robert Caro's four-volume series on Lyndon Johnson.

"Americans have been so desperate for diversion they are reaching for fat literary works that taunted them from their bookshelves for years - the same ones many have falsely claimed at dinner parties to have read," the Journal reported. (This definitely sounds like a Wall Street Journal kind of dinner party to me.)

So what about you? Has COVID, or maybe the combination of COVID, protests and lockdown affected your choice of reading matter? Are you reaching for books you never thought you'd read - or books you figured you'd never get around to?

Write us at books@startribune.com and tell us know what you're reading, and why, to help you get through this complicated time. Please include your name and city, and I'll include your thoughts in a future column.

And in the meantime, if you're interested, Sligo is wonderful this time of year. Just ask Dermot Healy.

Laurie Hertzell is the senior editor for books at the Star Tribune. email: lhertzell@startribune.com

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

ARTICLE MCXLV. INSIDE TRACK

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 12, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 3DLength: 728 wordsByline: NEAL ST. ANTHONY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Business groups warn on 'defunding'Body

Key Minneapolis-area business associations support the proposed police reforms of Mayor Jacob Frey and Police Chief Medaria Arradondo.

At the same time, the groups' spokesman, Downtown Council CEO Steve Cramer, has warned Frey and the City Council that the riots following the death of George Floyd in police hands and subsequent calls of council members to "dismantle" or "defund" the police has led some businesses to plan to relocate.

"Virtually overnight the desirability of Minneapolis as a place to maintain or locate business ... was diminished," Cramer said in a letter to Frey that summarized a recent meeting with business representatives.

"While we see it as an absolute obligation to bring to your attention and the attention of council members to the economic impacts ... it's equally our obligation to be part of the effort to develop a better, more effective and just law enforcement and safety program for Minneapolis," he said in the letter.

The Downtown Council was joined by the Minneapolis Regional Chamber of Commerce and the Greater Minneapolis Building Owners and Managers Association in drafting suggestions for police reform and public safety.

They disagree with council members who want to replace the police department with a department of "community safety and violence prevention," including a "law-enforcement services division" that would dilute the mayor's oversight of the police chief.

But Cramer said, "There will have to be police reforms. They must regain the trust of the community."

However, he said that the polarizing discussions among city management, council members and police union leadership "perpetuates that we are an unsafe city and in state of paralysis. We have to get behind [the chief's leadership] proposals."

inside track

Arradondo has tightened rules on use of body cameras and withdrawn from contract negotiations with the police union, which some say have protected bad-apple cops. He and Frey also support state legislation to outlaw chokeholds and strengthen the chief's ability to discipline officers by banning state arbitrators from reversing or reducing discipline imposed when an officer is demonstrated to have lied on a formal statement, engaged in "unreasonable force" or other egregious conduct.

There also is an ill-conceived rush by some to get the Minneapolis Charter Commission to place on the November ballot an overhaul of public safety before a full airing of issues and consequences.

The president of the police union, Lt. Bob Kroll, also has overstayed his welcome, says the business lobby. Under Kroll, say critics, the union became a shadow command of the department. "The membership needs to think [about] whether Kroll is the right leader to restore community trust," Cramer said.

The business groups support a strong police department as well as a "continuum of safety strategies."

Cramer, 30 years ago a moderate council member, subsequently ran one of the Twin Cities' largest affordable housing and employment-training nonprofits. He has perspective and experience. The Downtown Council, through its uniformed Downtown Improvement District (DID) ambassadors, assists citizens and alerts police to criminal activity.

The DID and partners also supplement police with trained street workers who deal with the homeless and mental-health issues. That frees cops for more dangerous crimes.

"We need a continuum of responses," Cramer said. "What scares people is the idea that ... there is an unwillingness to acknowledge that there must be a law-enforcement component to our public safety strategy."

The business organizations said in their statement on public safety: "There is an unmistakable and significant negative impact from the framing of a needed discussion about improving law enforcement ... as dismantling the police department. Without a clear understanding that policing services will be reinvented but not eliminated ... we can anticipate the desirability of Minneapolis as a community to live, visit, invest and create and maintain jobs will diminish.

"It is essential that we come together as a community to reimagine policing and public safety. Significantly improved law enforcement is needed and overdue component of an overall continuum of responses to maintain safety for all."

Neal St. Anthony has been a Star Tribune business columnist and reporter since 1984. Reach him at nstanthony@startribune.com

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

ARTICLE MCXLVI. NONFICTION CRIME STORIES, BEYOND THE POLICE BLOTTER

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 12, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 5ELength: 613 wordsByline: REID FORGRAVE; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: NONFICTION: Journalist Mark Bowden delves deep into the dark side with these six true stories about abuse and murder.

Body

We live in an age marked by tragedy: by the all-encompassing fears of the coronavirus pandemic, by George Floyd's killing at the hands of Minneapolis police and the rage that fueled its aftermath, by the uncertainty of what the coming months might hold.

One reaction to continually being on edge is to engage in a literary escapism of sorts, to dive deep into books that avoid tragedy and either linger on life's superficialities or delve into matters of the heart and the soul but not matters of life and death.

Mark Bowden's latest anthology, "The Case of the Vanishing Blonde," is not that. To be sure, each of the six nonfiction stories goes beyond the police blotter and the court documents to dive into the darkness of human nature. One of his generation's masters of literary nonfiction, Bowden - best known for "Black Hawk Down," his account of the U.S. military's disastrous 1993 raid in Mogadishu to capture a Somali warlord - has focused on seeing the grays in what could be black-and-white crime tales between forces of good and evil. His subjects have included some of the worst actors in modern human history, such as Osama bin Laden and Pablo Escobar.

This new collection includes a story about a sexual assault at an Ivy League fraternity house, a story about a police detective investigating online sex crimes, and a story about a police detective convicted of murdering the wife of a former lover.

It's heavy stuff, but something about the way Bowden approaches these topics makes this book an unexpected salve during this age of anxiety.

It feels a little loathsome to refer to this book as a joy; after all, each story revolves around the worst moments in someone's life. But that's exactly what the book is: an absolute joy to read. Bowden's writing is a reminder that, in all the complexity of an age of upheaval, there is still good, and there is still evil, and the most interesting parts of humanity lie in the gulfs of gray in between.

Take the opening story, "The Incident at Alpha Tau Omega," first published in 1983 in the Philadelphia Inquirer. The story of a campus sexual assault and its aftermath both seems ahead of its time and from a different era. Today, such stories get sorted into the MeToo hashtag, stripping them of nuance. But Bowden's groundbreaking piece is all nuance, and it leaves you wondering what the real moral of the story is.

Bowden's piece about online sex crimes, "why don't u tell me wht ur into," is equally disturbing. A sex-crime detective comes across a potential child sexual predator online; who is going to have any empathy for a potential predator? But Bowden's story delves into the uncertain line between fantasy and reality and the gray areas of entrapment.

Bowden's stories, three of which focus on a private detective named Ken Brennan who is straight out of central casting, do not all fit into the current political moment. He gives a voice to people you may reflexively despise, such as fraternity brothers who took advantage of a drunken classmate. You will not like all his heroes, and you will not despise all his villains. His stories make you think about life's grays.

Best of all? His stories are serious literary journalism, but they won't send you into despair like so much in today's world. You may feel a bit guilty for enjoying them, but Bowden's stories of humanity's darkness double as fast-paced mysteries, and it's easy to simply kick back and enjoy.

Reid Forgrave is a Star Tribune reporter and the author of "Love, Zac," to be published in August by Algonquin Books of Chapel Hill, N.C. · 612-673-4647

The Case of the Vanishing Blonde

By: Mark Bowden.

Publisher: Atlantic Monthly Press, 400 pages, $26.

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

State leaders look for options as Feds refuse to help rebuild

ARTICLE MCXLVII. STATE LEADERS LOOK FOR OPTIONS AS FEDS REFUSE TO HELP REBUILD

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 12, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1A

Length: 663 words

Byline: KATY READ; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

Denied federal aid to help rebuild burned-out, vandalized businesses in the wake of riots that followed George Floyd's killing, Minnesota leaders pondered their next steps Saturday.

But it's not yet clear what other sources of funds they may tap.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) on Friday denied Gov. Tim Walz's request for nearly $16 million in aid to help rebuild and repair structures in Minneapolis and St. Paul, many of them left in ruins by the riots and fires that erupted during protests of Floyd's May 25 death while in Minneapolis police custody.

On July 2, Walz had asked President Donald Trump to declare a "major disaster" for the state of Minnesota. More than 1,500 buildings were damaged by fires, looting and vandalism, racking up more than $500 million in damages, according to Walz. The $16 million would have been used to reimburse local governments for debris clearing, repair and rebuilding costs.

In a prepared statement, FEMA said Saturday that after "a thorough review," the agency determined "that the impact to public infrastructure is within the capabilities of the local and state governments to recover from."

On Saturday, Walz's spokesman, Teddy Tschann, said the governor had little to add to his Friday statement expressing disappointment with FEMA's denial. Tschann said Walz is considering appealing the decision, which he has 30 days to do.

The governor has been "exploring all options," to help rebuild, but those discussions are too preliminary to discuss, Tschann said.

Minneapolis' and St. Paul's mayors also expressed disappointment with the lack of federal help.

State leaders look for options as Feds refuse to help rebuild

"This decision is another sad reminder that Americans cannot look to this president's administration for support, even in our darkest hours," St. Paul Mayor Melvin Carter said through a spokesman.

"The people and businesses that make Minneapolis the cultural and economic engine for our state are hurting," Mayor Jacob Frey said in a prepared statement. "And with local government budgets already stretched thin by the pandemic, the need for compassion and support from the federal level could not be more critical."

Many small businesses and grocery stores, pharmacies and post offices were damaged during the unrest. In his letter to FEMA, Walz said what happened in the Twin Cities after Floyd's death was the second-most destructive incident of civil unrest in U.S. history, after the 1992 riots in Los Angeles.

The overwhelming majority of FEMA's disaster declarations follow natural events like hurricane, tornadoes and flooding.

While there are no recent examples of FEMA aiding cities hit by rioting, its response in 1992 to Los Angeles was a major counterexample. Within a week of the riots, President George H.W. Bush had declared Los Angeles a federal disaster area, and within a month the government began distributing $638 million in assistance to the city, according to the New York Times. Adjusted for inflation, that's $1.2 billion in today's dollars.

In 2015, however, FEMA, under the Obama administration, denied aid to the state of Maryland after rioting in Baltimore over the death of Freddie Gray, a Black man who died in police custody. Maryland appealed the decision and was again rejected.

In Minnesota, the Walz administration conducted a preliminary damage assessment riot that found nearly $16 million of eligible damages related to fires. That led the state to request that amount.

Not every leader thought federal aid was a good idea. U.S. Rep. Tom Emmer, R-Minn., sent a letter to Trump in response to Walz's request asking for a thorough review of the state's response to the unrest. "If the federal government is expected to assist in the clean-up of these unfortunate weeks, it has an obligation to every American - prior to the release of funding - to fully understand the events which allowed for this level of destruction to occur," Emmer wrote.

Staff writers Reid Forgrave and Ryan Faircloth contributed to this report.

Katy Read · 612-673-4583

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

Fired Minneapolis cops in George Floyd case want gag order lifted

ARTICLE MCXLVIII.

FIRED MINNEAPOLIS COPS IN GEORGE FLOYD CASE WANT GAG ORDER LIFTED

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 13, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 336 words

Byline: The Associated Press

Highlight: Attorneys for three former Minneapolis police officers who are charged in the death of George Floyd asked a judge Monday to lift a gag order in the case, saying prosecutors and public officials have already made comments that could prejudice a potential jury pool against their clients. Attorneys for Derek Chauvin and Tou Thao said [...]

Body

Attorneys for three former Minneapolis police officers who are charged in the death of George Floyd asked a judge Monday to lift a gag order in the case, saying prosecutors and public officials have already made comments that could prejudice a potential jury pool against their clients.

Attorneys for Derek Chauvin and Tou Thao said in court filings Monday that a gag order should not have been issued without a public hearing. Thomas Lane's attorney, Earl Gray - who made comments to the media the day before the gag order was issued last week - clarified that he said nothing that would have warranted the judge's order that bars the parties and attorneys from discussing the case.

Floyd, a Black man who was handcuffed, died pleading for air May 25 after Chauvin, a white police officer, pressed his knee against Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes. Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and manslaughter. Thao and two other officers are charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and manslaughter.

Chauvin's attorney, Eric Nelson, said that while the court may have a legitimate interest in reducing pretrial publicity to avoid tainting a jury pool, in the last several weeks Chauvin has been called a murderer or killer. Nelson added that some public officials have referred to the case as a "murder."

Nelson argued that after more than six weeks of one side of the story, prosecutors are the only ones who have benefited from pretrial publicity.

On June 29, Judge Peter Cahill told all parties to avoid talking about the merits of the case, evidence and guilt or innocence. Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Fired Minneapolis cops in George Floyd case want gag order lifted

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

How Target kept its ads away from news on George Floyd, Minneapolis protests

ARTICLE MCXLIX. HOW TARGET KEPT ITS ADS AWAY FROM NEWS ON GEORGE FLOYD, MINNEAPOLIS PROTESTS

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

July 13, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 337 words

Byline: Mark Reilly

Body

Target Corp. has played a prominent role in the events following George Floyd's death; the chain's stores were damaged in the riots that followed, and executives were outspoken about calls for social justice afterward. But when it comes to news stories about the issue, the retailer has made an effort to keep its ads at arm's length.

The Wall Street Journal reports that Minneapolis-based Target (NYSE: TGT) was among companies putting news about Floyd - as well as others killed by police, such as Breonna Taylor in Louisville - on advertising "blocklists" that keep its digital ads from appearing on news stories about the subjects. Cable channel MTV, owned by ViacomCBS Inc., has made similar moves.

A Target spokesman said the blocklist "does not discount the importance of reporting on topics like Black Lives Matter or the murder of George Floyd. It's intended to acknowledge that the person consuming that content may not be receptive to a marketing message from a mass retailer like Target at that time."

How Target kept its ads away from news on George Floyd, Minneapolis protests

RELATED: Corporate voices get behind 'Black Lives Matter' cause

Blocklists have become more popular as major brands seek to avoid stories that might be about controversy or tragedy: "Bomb," "shooting," "immigration" and "Trump" have been widely used, the Journal notes. But they've become a problem for news sites, which wind up getting less revenue for their most-read stories. That's especially true in 2020, when stories about Covid-19 have also been added to blocklists.

One of Target's stores was badly damaged and looted during the riots that followed Floyd's death at the hands of Minneapolis police. It plans to reopen that store by the end of the year. In the wake of the protests, Target CEO Brian Cornell joined other business leaders in calling for police reform, and the company pledged \$10 million to support social justice and recovery efforts in the neighborhoods hurt most by the unrest.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

United, KC take a knee before kickoff

ARTICLE MCL. UNITED, KC TAKE A KNEE BEFORE KICKOFF

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 13, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 4CLength: 528 wordsByline: JERRY ZGODA; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

After four months away, Minnesota United returned Sunday in its MLS is Back Tournament opener to a drastically changed world swept by not one, but two pandemics.

Loons starters acknowledged a world altered by George Floyd's death on Memorial Day by kneeling alongside their Sporting Kansas City counterparts for nearly 30 seconds before Sunday night's 2-1 victory at ESPN Wide World of Sports Complex in Orlando.

Floyd's death - a Black man killed by a white police officer who knelt on his neck for nearly 8 minutes - ignited worldwide protest and unrest and it motivated Black MLS players to form a "Black Players for Change" organization that suggested two initiatives adopted by the tournament's 24 remaining teams.

Minnesota United veteran defender Michael Boxall wore a black captain's armband - Ozzie Alonso didn't play because of a hamstring injury - in support of the Black Lives Matter movement. Floyd's name was printed prominently on Boxall's armband, and each Loons player wrote his own hand-written messages on a "MLS Unites" patch as well.

Minnesota United players changed jerseys - and messages - at halftime on a humid Florida summer night. Eight players wrote messages seeking justice for Breonna Taylor, a 26-year-old EMT fatally shot eight times in March in her apartment after midnight by plainclothes police officers in Louisville, Ky., executing a no-knock search warrant.

Alonso wrote "End racism, we all bleed the same color" on his patch. Romain Metanire wrote "Am I Next?" and in French "Black and proud." Midfielder James Musa quoted Nelson Mandela, while Robin Lod and Chase Gasper both noted healthcare workers on the coronavirus pandemic's front lines.

"The time is always right to do what's right," Gasper wrote.

Jacori Hayes wrote "Dismantle Systemic Racism" on his first-half jersey and "Charge Breonna Taylor's killers" on his second-half jersey.

United, KC take a knee before kickoff

Hayes said this in a posting on the club's website about remembering Floyd: "I think we have to own up that this happened in our backyard. We're not using him as a mascot. We're just reminding people that, at least in our community back home in Minnesota, that this happened here and hopefully we can effect change - starting here - that can spread to the rest of the world."

Defender pursued

Minnesota United is pursuing left-side defender Bakaye Dibassy from France's Amiens club as well as the Mali national team, a source said, confirming European media reports. Amiens was just relegated from Ligue 1 to Ligue 2.

Dibassy, 30, can play left center back and left back. MLS' next transfer window begins Aug. 12, the day after the MLS is Back final. Center back is an area of need with two-time MLS Defender of the Year Ike Opara home in Minnesota injured and Brent Kallman suspended through the tournament's three-game group stage.

Safe at home

The club's watch party Sunday night was its first event for fans at Allianz Field since the league shut down March 12. Season-ticket holders and supporters scooped up 250 free tickets in advance within 15 minutes.

They sat masked and socially distanced in the north end and watched their team's tournament debut on the south end's big scoreboard screen.

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

ARTICLE MCLI. MOTHERS MARCH IN ST. PAUL FOR JUSTICE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 13, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 850 wordsByline: KIM HYATT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

George Floyd called out for his mother 10 times during his encounter with Minneapolis police and as he struggled to breathe while officers pinned him to the ground.

On Sunday, moms from across the country took Floyd's pleas as a call to action and marched to the State Capitol in St. Paul, demanding justice for loved ones and accountability from police.

"It means a lot to me and my family to stand with other families to demand that they reopen all cases, because you see that there's a lot of corruption going on," said Greta Willis, who flew in from Baltimore in honor of her 14-year-old son, Kevin Cooper, who was shot and killed by police in front of her in her home on Aug. 12, 2006.

The National Mothers March Against Police Violence brought together more than 100 families in the U.S. who have lost a loved one to law enforcement officers, said organizers with Take a Knee Nation.

Mothers and widows united in that loss and the fight for justice sat in a truck flatbed leading a crowd of 1,000 protesters down St. Paul's University Avenue to the Capitol. Over megaphones and speakers, chants of "Love your ...!" were followed with "Mother!" as well as calls to prosecute the police involved in the deaths.

Philando Castile's mother, Valerie Castile, was dancing as she marched toward the Capitol, where she thanked the crowd for supporting the movement and all the mothers.

"This is what my community looks like. We are a community and we support all the families that are here," she said wearing a "Justice for Philando" face mask while flanked by families from Georgia, Florida, Colorado, New York, Ohio, Missouri, California and Maryland.

Willis said her teenage son was having an emotional breakdown when he was shot by an officer who was promoted and remains on the force today.

MOTHERS MARCH IN ST. PAUL FOR JUSTICE

"There needs to be accountability," she said. "If this didn't happen to George Floyd, we wouldn't be at this point because the world could see the officer on his neck. In Kevin's case, we had no camera. But they didn't take my word, they took the officer's."

Maria E. Rosario-Rivera, the mother of 30-year-old Brian Quinones, was not at Sunday's march, but she was there in spirit while other members of her family helped organize the event.

Quinones was fatally shot by Richfield and Edina police officers last September. In February, the Hennepin County Attorney's Office said deadly force was justified and none of the officers involved would face charges.

Sobbing over the phone from her home in Puerto Rico, Rosario-Rivera said Quinones was her firstborn child. It hurt to see her son's name included in a long list of other victims of police violence at the Floyd memorial on 38th Street and Chicago Avenue in Minneapolis. She visited the site and was invited along with other family members to Floyd's funeral. She recently left Minnesota because she said her "heart can't hold it no more," but plans to return for the anniversary of her son's death.

"It's really hard for me to understand why the police do that to my son. That destroys me. I don't know what's going on in this world," she said. "From my heart, I got a feeling that things will change, but change takes time. It is sad that this has to happen. Nobody deserves to leave this world that way. God bless all the mothers being in these situations."

Her 13-year-old grandson, Cameron, reminds her of his late father, and she's proud of daughter-in-law Ashley Quinones' continuing fight for justice - most recently with a wrongful-death lawsuit. Ashley Quinones, founder of the Justice Squad, was one of several organizers of Sunday's march, along with Minnesota Families Supporting Families Against Police Violence, 10K Foundation, Black Lives Matter Chicago and Communities United Against Police Brutality.

The protest was one of many across the Twin Cities over the weekend, six weeks after Floyd died. Gun violence this summer has plagued Minneapolis, where 224 people have been shot in 2020, including 33 homicides. Last year, 269 people were shot in the city. The spike prompted the "Guns Down, Love Up" rally Friday. Organizers of the Mothers March held a retreat Saturday for families affected by police violence.

Activists are planning a march in Washington, D.C., on Aug. 28 outside the Department of Justice to demand officials reopen cases involving police violence.

On Sunday, Ashley Williams held her 8-year-old son's hand as she marched. She said while she's been attending many protests the past month, this was the first one where she brought her son along.

"I'm out as much as possible marching every chance I get until changes are made that benefit us and that treat us Black people the same way that white people are treated in America," she said.

She said so many families were part of the Mothers March, and they only represent a fraction of those who lost a loved one to police violence. "If they're killing your family members, you can't trust them. There's no trust," she said.

"There should be no reason you have to march week after week after week after week letting people know our lives matter," she said.

MOTHERS MARCH IN ST. PAUL FOR JUSTICE

Kim Hyatt · 612-673-4751

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

End of Document

Four pro bono attorneys join Keith Ellison's prosecution team in George Floyd case

ARTICLE MCLII. FOUR PRO BONO ATTORNEYS JOIN KEITH ELLISON'S PROSECUTION TEAM IN GEORGE FLOYD CASE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 13, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 289 words

Byline: Katrina Pross

Highlight: Minnesota Attorney General Keith Ellison said Monday that four experienced attorneys and trial lawyers have joined his prosecution team in the George Floyd case on a pro bono basis. Ellison's team includes attorneys from the Hennepin County Attorney's Office and the Minnesota Attorney General's Office. "I've put together an exceptional team with experience and expertise [...]"

Body

Minnesota Attorney General Keith Ellison said Monday that four experienced attorneys and trial lawyers have joined his prosecution team in the George Floyd case on a pro bono basis.

Ellison's team includes attorneys from the Hennepin County Attorney's Office and the Minnesota Attorney General's Office.

"I've put together an exceptional team with experience and expertise across many disciplines," he said in a statement. "We are united in our responsibility to pursue justice in this case."

UPDATE: Attorneys ask George Floyd judge to hold Ellison in contempt

The new attorneys are former acting U.S. Solicitor General Neal Katyal; Lola Velázquez-Aguilu, an attorney at Medtronic and former prosecutor with the U.S. Attorney's Office for Minnesota; Jerry Blackwell, who last month won the first posthumous pardon in Minnesota for a man wrongly convicted in the aftermath of the lynching of three Black men in Duluth 100 years ago; and Steve Schleicher, a former federal prosecutor who led the prosecution of the man responsible for the kidnapping and murder of Jacob Wetterling.

Floyd died in Minneapolis police custody on May 25, after now-former officer Derek Chauvin kneeled on his neck for minutes, despite Floyd's pleas that he could not breathe.

Gov. Tim Walz announced on May 31 that Ellison would take the lead in prosecuting the case. Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case. Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say. Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case. Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots. Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Four pro bono attorneys join Keith Ellison's prosecution team in George Floyd case

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCLIII. RESIDENCY RULES WON'T CURE POLICING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 13, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 10ALength: 518 wordsHighlight: Incentives are fine, but a mandate would hurt efforts to strengthen, diversify departments.Body

In the aftermath of George Floyd's death, one of many police reforms under consideration is requiring officers to live in the cities they serve. In fact, the Minnesota Human Rights Department is looking at residency rules as part of its investigation of the Minneapolis Police Department.

Legislation introduced during the June special session included a measure that would allow cities to make residency mandatory for officers. While many provisions in the proposed bill are welcome, that particular change would be counterproductive.

Minneapolis has had experience with and without residency rules, and although there may be pluses, there's little evidence they make a significant difference. There are better ways to drive fundamental change in policing.

Just over 20 years ago, Minneapolis required officers to live in the city. But in 1999, the Legislature banned residency requirements. MPD says about 7% of its officers now live in Minneapolis. In St. Paul, 22% of sworn officers live in the city; the national average is 40%.

MPD officers live mostly in suburban areas, with some exceptions, and concentrate in Anoka, Andover, Elk River, St. Paul, St. Cloud and Hudson, Wis. The four officers charged in Floyd's killing are from Oakdale, St. Paul, Plymouth and Coon Rapids.

The idea behind residency rules is that officers who call a city home will be more personally invested in the city and therefore provide higher-quality service. But restricting hiring to only candidates living within Minneapolis ZIP codes would limit the pool of applicants department leaders have to choose from.

In recent years, police and city leaders have consistently told the Star Tribune Editorial Board that recruiting quality candidates is getting more difficult at the same time they are striving to bring more diversity to their departments. People choose homes and neighborhoods for a range of reasons, and a mandate would likely exclude good candidates.

When the Minneapolis City Council considered taking up a residency requirement in 2017, the group Communities United Against Police Brutality recommended against it, calling it a "distraction" from more significant reform. Overhauling police departments and changing laws to end practices such as no-knock warrants and chokeholds were more important steps, they argued. "Throughout our research, we have never encountered a shred of evidence that requiring or incentivizing police officers to live in the communities in which they work has any positive effect on the quality of policing," the group states in its reform recommendations.

Residency rules won't cure policing

Nevertheless, our view is that cities should consider taking reasonable steps to encourage officers to live within their borders. Voluntary incentives - such as mortgage deals, day-care assistance and bonus points on civil service exams - could be offered.

Being part of a neighborhood - on duty or off - can help foster community policing and help break down the us-vs.-them, occupation-force culture that too often harms police-community relations.

But in our view, encouraging rather than requiring residency is the best approach.

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

ARTICLE MCLIV. NATIONAL LEGAL EXPERTS REVIEW 16-YEAR-OLD'S LIFE SENTENCE IN MINNEAPOLIS MURDER OF GIRL, 11

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 13, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 745 words

Byline: Robin McDowell

Highlight: An independent panel of national legal experts will review the conviction of an African American man sentenced as a teenager to life in prison for the murder of a little girl struck by a stray bullet in Minneapolis, Northwestern University's Center on Wrongful Convictions and the New York-based Innocence Project announced Monday. Myon Burrell, 34, [...]

Body

An independent panel of national legal experts will review the conviction of an African American man sentenced as a teenager to life in prison for the murder of a little girl struck by a stray bullet in Minneapolis, Northwestern University's Center on Wrongful Convictions and the New York-based Innocence Project announced Monday.

Myon Burrell, 34, has spent nearly two decades behind bars. His case captured widespread interest, first at the time of his 2002 arrest, and again this year after Sen. Amy Klobuchar touted it during her run for the U.S. presidency. She used it as an example of how - when top prosecutor in Hennepin County - she helped find justice for the African American community outraged by gun violence and the senseless death of Tyesha Edwards, an 11-year-old Black girl killed while doing homework at her dining-room table.

After the Associated Press and APM Reports highlighted flaws in the investigation that pointed to a possible wrongful conviction, Klobuchar called for a review, saying justice was not only about punishing the guilty but protecting the innocent. She and the Hennepin County Attorney's Office expressed support Monday for the new panel, which hopes to release its findings by the year's end. The senator has also said she would like to see the formation of a Conviction Integrity Unit and a Sentencing Review Board to look into other potentially flawed cases.

Barry Scheck, co-founder of the Innocence Project and one of the first proponents for Conviction Integrity Units nationwide, called the review of Burrell's case an important first step.

He and Laura Nirider - co-director of the Center on Wrongful Convictions, who led efforts to identify and select prospective panel members - will act as advisors as the team looks at the evidence that led to Burrell's conviction and the appropriateness of his sentence.

"A conviction integrity review is a non-adversarial process that seeks cooperation from prosecutors, defenders and police," said Scheck, who is an expert in best practices in conviction integrity and will help guide the panel. "Best practices today include consideration of excessive sentences as well as a review of guilt or innocence and the fairness of the trial."

Nirider, a Minnesota native, who represents innocent juveniles and those widely considered to be wrongfully convicted, including Brendan Dassey, subject of the Netflix series "Making a Murderer," said the panel is filled with some of the country's top legal minds, including a former state attorney general, the leader of one of the first Conviction Integrity Units in the country, and the past president of the national Innocence Network.

The death of George Floyd - who was killed by police in May at a south Minneapolis corner store just three blocks from where Tyesha was shot - has put a spotlight on Minnesota and its long history of racial injustice.

Burrell, 16 at the time of Tyesha's killing, has steadfastly proclaimed his innocence saying he was not even at the scene.

A yearlong AP investigation found there was no hard evidence - no gun, fingerprints, DNA - linking him to the crime.

Surveillance tape that Burrell told police would clear him was never pulled from Cup Food, the same store that called the police on George Floyd for allegedly trying to pass a counterfeit $20 bill. Much of the state's case relied on jailhouse informants, several of whom have since recanted. And another man has admitted to the shooting, saying Burrell was not even present.

The Hennepin County Attorney's Offices said in a statement Monday it has been cooperating with Burrell's current attorney for nearly two years and will continue to be responsive to the panel's advisors.

Klobuchar, meanwhile, she has been advocating for a review for months.

"As I told Mr. Burrell's family earlier this year, if any injustice was done in the quest for justice for Tyesha Edwards, it must be addressed," she said in an emailed statement. "This investigation is an important step forward and I fully support the work of this distinguished panel." North St. Paul man killed in crash after fleeing Dakota County sheriff's deputy Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Cleric assaulted outside Bloomington mosque; police searching for suspects U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities Minneapolis man sentenced to 33 years in prison for sex-trafficking young women and girls out of massage parlor

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Police release video from mistaken identity arrest; Black driver says he feared for life

ARTICLE MCLV. POLICE RELEASE VIDEO FROM MISTAKEN IDENTITY ARREST; BLACK DRIVER SAYS HE FEARED FOR LIFE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 13, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 268 words

Byline: The Associated Press

Highlight: A Black man says he was left shaken up and fearing for his life after police arrested him in Bloomington in a case of mistaken identity. Darrius Strong posted an emotional video on Facebook after his arrest on Friday. Strong said four white officers pulled him over, and he had thoughts of George Floyd, the [...]

Body

A Black man says he was left shaken up and fearing for his life after police arrested him in Bloomington in a case of mistaken identity.

Darrius Strong posted an emotional video on Facebook after his arrest on Friday. Strong said four white officers pulled him over, and he had thoughts of George Floyd, the black man who died in a Minneapolis police encounter, after he was placed in the back of a police car.

"I could have been dead today," Strong said in his video.

Strong said all of the officers approached him with "their guns out," but Richfield police, one of the agencies involved in the traffic enforcement detail, said only one officer momentarily drew her gun, but she pointed at the ground and never at Strong. The department posted dashcam video of the stop Monday.

Once the officer determined Strong was compliant, she holstered her gun, police said. The officer discovered a different person had used Strong's name, resulting in an arrest warrant in his name, police said. Strong was released.

Police said the officers "regret the stress Mr. Strong felt."

Strong said in his video that his arrest "could have ended in a whole different route."

"Racial profiling is a thing," he said.

North St. Paul man killed in crash after fleeing Dakota County sheriff's deputy Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Cleric assaulted outside Bloomington mosque; police searching for suspects U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin

Police release video from mistaken identity arrest; Black driver says he feared for life

Cities Minneapolis man sentenced to 33 years in prison for sex-trafficking young women and girls out of massage parlor

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCLVI. HABITAT FOR HUMANITY'S RESTORE REOPENS IN NEW BRIGHTON, MINNEAPOLIS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 13, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 264 wordsByline: Emma Eidsvoog

Highlight: The Twin Cities Habitat for Humanity ReStore in New Brighton reopened June 9 after a $300,000 remodel that added 14,000 square feet and increased parking space. The reopening was delayed because of COVID-19, but is now open for customers who must wear a mask to shop and be prepared to load items themselves. "We're really [...]"

Body

The Twin Cities Habitat for Humanity ReStore in New Brighton reopened June 9 after a $300,000 remodel that added 14,000 square feet and increased parking space.

The reopening was delayed because of COVID-19, but is now open for customers who must wear a mask to shop and be prepared to load items themselves.

"We're really excited about our new space and our increased ability to serve our customers and provide opportunities for our donors and volunteers," said Pete O'Keefe, ReStore Director.

The ReStore location in Minneapolis reopened June 16 after being closed because of COVID-19 and damage in the days after George Floyd's death.

Chris Coleman, president and CEO of Twin Cities Habitat for Humanity, said he hopes the Minneapolis store will be an affordable resource for the Lake Street corridor as the community rebuilds from the protests after the killing of George Floyd.

The ReStore is a discount home improvement outlet that is open to the public and sells new and like-new furniture, appliances and building materials. The inventory comes from donations from individuals and companies. The materials are sold to the public at discounted prices. The money from sales goes into building homes and supporting local families to buy their first home. Trump's end run around Congress raises questions Business People: Sunday, Aug. 9 Minnesota cities, counties scramble to keep businesses afloat by dishing out CARES Act grants As shops struggle with coronavirus restrictions, White Bear Lake closes street to help Trump orders more unemployment pay, a payroll tax deferral

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Habitat for Humanity's ReStore reopens in New Brighton, Minneapolis

End of Document

ARTICLE MCLVII. MN SENATE GOP LEADER SAYS DEAL CLOSE ON BONDING, TAX BILLS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 13, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 278 wordsByline: Steve Karnowski, Mohamed IbrahimHighlight: Legislative leaders have agreed on most details of a public construction package and a tax bill, the Minnesota Senate's top Republican said Monday, while discussions are continuing on whether a compromise is possible on police accountability in response to the death of George Floyd. Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka said at a news conference that [...]Body

Legislative leaders have agreed on most details of a public construction package and a tax bill, the Minnesota Senate's top Republican said Monday, while discussions are continuing on whether a compromise is possible on police accountability in response to the death of George Floyd.

Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka said at a news conference that his chamber would open the special session Monday with a vote to rescind the special powers that Democratic Gov. Tim Walz has used to respond to the coronavirus pandemic. The Democratic-controlled House is expected to block that effort, as it did during last month's special session.

Gazelka said the Senate would then adjourn for about a week to give the House time to pass the public construction legislation, commonly known as a bonding bill, as well as a bill to conform the state's tax code with a federal tax break for new equipment purchases. The tax bill that would benefit farmers and small businesses in the Twin Cities that are rebuilding from the unrest that followed Floyd's death in Minneapolis police custody.

The bonding and tax bills must pass the House first.

Gazelka also said lawmakers should focus on less-controversial policing proposals that can pass both chambers of the divided Legislature. Walz calls special session next week to consider 30-day extension of pandemic powers. Minnesota's primary is Tuesday. Here are key east metro races to watch. Voters, GOP lawmakers plan lawsuit over Walz's mask mandate at polling places. State Patrol cancels police academy class 'due to lack of funding'. Minnesota will close 2 prisons to prepare for budget shortfall. Other agencies face holes, too.

Load-Date: August 9, 2020

MN Senate GOP leader says deal close on bonding, tax bills

End of Document

Postal Service will rebuild burned branch near Nicollet Ave., but will need Kmart store in the meantime

ARTICLE MCLVIII. POSTAL SERVICE WILL REBUILD BURNED BRANCH NEAR NICOLLET AVE., BUT WILL NEED KMART STORE IN THE MEANTIME

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

July 13, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 435 words

Byline: Nick Halter

Body

The U.S. Postal Service plans to rebuild both of its South Minneapolis locations destroyed in riots that followed the police killing of George Floyd.

In order to rebuild its station near Nicollet Avenue, the USPS needs a temporary location for a year or two during construction. The Postal Service and the city of Minneapolis have reached terms of a lease agreement to put the post office into the former Kmart store on Lake Street that city officials eventually want to tear down so they can reconnect Nicollet Avenue.

That Kmart store was scheduled to be demolished at the end of June. City officials - after years of efforts - finally acquired the store in 2017 for $8 million. In March, the city paid $9.1 million to terminate Kmart's lease.

City officials have never given a hard timeline for when Nicollet Avenue would be re-opened or what such a re-opening would look like (some are advocating for pedestrians, bicycles and buses only). The city said that despite the delayed demolition of the building, the USPS lease won't delay the re-opening of Nicollet.

Postal Service will rebuild burned branch near Nicollet Ave., but will need Kmart store in the meantime

"Approving this temporary lease, for up to a maximum of 24 months, does not negatively impact the City's plans for reopening Nicollet Ave. and redevelopment of the site," city staff wrote in a memo. "With community engagement, street design, and engineering not yet started and the lease terminating by July 31, 2022, there remains ample time to demolish the structure prior to any construction start."

The USPS, under terms that will be voted on by the City Council, will begin leasing 36,500 square feet starting on Aug. 1. It will pay the city $30,400 a month, which is a rate of $10 per square foot. The lease ends on Jan. 31, 2021, but the USPS can extend it in six month increments until July 31, 2022.

The Postal Service will pay for its own buildout and will also pay all utility bills, unless another tenant leases the other side of the space, according to the memo. The city will pay for property maintenance and snow removal, capped at $365,000 annually.

Both the Lake Street Station, located at the corner of First Avenue and 31st Street, and the Minnehaha Station at 3033 27th Ave. S., are complete losses, said USPS spokeswoman Nicole Hill.

The USPS leased the Minnehaha Station before it was burned in the riots following the death of George Floyd in custody of Minneapolis Police. The city memo said the USPS will lease space in rebuilt Minnehaha Station.. Hill had no timeline on a rebuilding of the Minnehaha Station.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

Deals remain elusive as Minnesota special session approaches

ARTICLE MCLIX. DEALS REMAIN ELUSIVE AS MINNESOTA SPECIAL SESSION APPROACHES

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 13, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 760 words

Byline: Steve Karnowski

Highlight: The Minnesota Legislature convenes Monday for its second special session of the year with few public signs of lawmakers and the governor being close to deals on the big issues of police accountability and public construction. When Democratic Gov. Tim Walz formally called the special session Friday, he urged Republicans and Democrats to work together [...]

Body

The Minnesota Legislature convenes Monday for its second special session of the year with few public signs of lawmakers and the governor being close to deals on the big issues of police accountability and public construction.

When Democratic Gov. Tim Walz formally called the special session Friday, he urged Republicans and Democrats to work together for deals on policing and infrastructure projects. "Our state had a trying few months, and we need the Legislature to rise to the occasion and get things done to help Minnesotans rebuild and recover," he said in a statement.

The challenge is akin to threading multiple moving needles because the issues are so interconnected, with different power centers competing. The various sides have kept talking since last month's session ended in partisan rancor.

But there isn't a lot of urgency to compromise just yet. That's because legislators could be back in another month anyway for yet another special session.

Here's a look at the key issues in play:

POLICE ACCOUNTABILITY

The House Democratic and Senate Republican majorities appeared to be far apart late last week on a package of police accountability measures in response to the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police on Memorial Day.

Democrats are still pushing for a sweeping slate proposed by the People of Color and Indigenous Caucus.

Deals remain elusive as Minnesota special session approaches

Senate Republicans were willing to pass a more limited set of changes that included a ban on the use of chokeholds and requiring officers to intervene if they see a colleague using excessive force, but rejected several other Democratic proposals.

BONDING

A borrowing package to fund public construction projects across the state, known as a bonding bill, was at the top of the Legislature's agenda this year before the coronavirus crowded it out.

The bill has yet to recover its lost momentum, though leaders have agreed on a cap of $1.35 billion that may include money for rebuilding parts of Minneapolis and St. Paul damaged in the unrest after Floyd's death.

Passing a bonding bill requires a three-fifths majority in each chamber. Getting that supermajority requires at least some House Republican and Senate Democratic votes. And that's where reaching deals gets really complicated.

In the House, Republican Minority Leader Kurt Daudt, of Crown, has softened on his earlier price for GOP votes: Walz giving up the emergency powers that he uses to respond to the pandemic. Daudt met with Walz staffers last week about his ideas for changing state statutes on emergency powers to give lawmakers more control, but reached no agreement.

And in the Senate, Democrats last week renewed their threat to withhold their votes unless Republicans agree to comprehensive policing accountability measures.

EMERGENCY POWERS

The governor first invoked his emergency powers during the regular session, which ended May 18. He can keep extending them in 30-day increments. But each time he does so he must summon lawmakers back so they get the chance to rescind his powers. That's why he had to call this special session.

Republican efforts to void his special authority failed last month, and will as long as Democrats hold the House. Walz presumably will have to call his third special session of 2020 next month if he intends to keep those powers.

WILD CARDS

Senate Republicans are already framing policing issues for the fall campaign with hearings on the damage that ensued amid the protests over Floyd's death. Democrats, meanwhile, announced an ad campaign Friday targeting potentially vulnerable Senate Republicans over policing. Democrats need a net gain of just two seats to take control of the Senate.

House Republicans announced Friday that they'll try to push legislation during the special session to give local school districts authority to decide for themselves whether to reopen as usual this fall, use distance learning again or some hybrid of the two models. GOP Rep. Sondra Erickson, of Princeton, said they're ready to try to force a floor fight.

It wasn't clear Friday how long this special session will last. While governors have the power to call lawmakers back, each chamber decides when to adjourn. Walz calls special session next week to consider 30-day extension of pandemic powers. Minnesota's primary is Tuesday. Here are key east metro races to

Deals remain elusive as Minnesota special session approaches

watch. Voters, GOP lawmakers plan lawsuit over Walz's mask mandate at polling places State Patrol cancels police academy class 'due to lack of funding' Minnesota will close 2 prisons to prepare for budget shortfall. Other agencies face holes, too.

Load-Date: August 9, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCLX. FEMA REJECTS MINNESOTA PLEA TO HELP REBUILD AFTER RIOTS

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

July 13, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 333 wordsByline: Mark ReillyBody

The federal government has turned down a request from Minnesota for aid to help rebuild following the riots that struck the Twin Cities in late May, saying the damage - estimated at $500 million - is "within the capabilities of the local and state governments."

Minnesota Public Radio has a report on the decision, which turned aside a request from Minnesota Gov. Tim Walz, who earlier this month had asked President Donald Trump to declare a "major disaster" in the area, due to extensive impacts to public infrastructure, and said that more than $15 million of the damage could be eligible for federal reimbursement.

Hundreds of businesses were burned or looted during several nights of widespread unrest that erupted following the death of George Floyd during an arrest by Minneapolis police officers. (The four officers have since been fired and are facing charges.) Fires also wrecked two U.S. Post Office branches and a Minneapolis police precinct.

FEMA rejects Minnesota plea to help rebuild after riots

RELATED: 'They have lost control'

Walz's office said the governor was disappointed in FEMA's rejection. "As we navigate one of the most difficult periods in our state's history, we look for support from our federal government to help us through," spokesperson Teddy Tschann said in a statement.

The Star Tribune also has a report, noting that the federal government has stepped in before to help cities rebuild after civil unrest. After the 1992 riots in Los Angeles, which did an estimated $1 billion in damage, President George H.W. Bush declared the city a federal disaster area and began distributing more than $638 million in assistance within a month.

But this time, Minneapolis and St. Paul are even having trouble winning support from their own state. The state Legislature couldn't reach a deal during an emergency session to distribute existing federal aid, though Walz has called for another special session to begin this week.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

Midtown Global Market to celebrate reopening Saturday after months of turbulence

ARTICLE MCLXI. MIDTOWN GLOBAL MARKET TO CELEBRATE REOPENING
SATURDAY AFTER MONTHS OF TURBULENCE

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

July 13, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 686 words

Byline: Dylan Thomas

Body

Midtown Global Market hosts a grand reopening celebration Saturday after a turbulent few months for both the market and the dozens of restaurant and retail vendors who call the former Sears building on East Lake Street home.

First came the pandemic, which forced the market to lock its doors to the public in mid-March as non-essential businesses across the state shuttered to slow the spread of Covid-19. Some businesses pivoted to carryout and delivery, while others remain closed.

Then came the unrest that tore down Lake Street after the police killing of George Floyd on Memorial Day. The market building sustained some damage - a few broken doors and windows - while some of its neighbors on Lake Street and Chicago Avenue were damaged or destroyed by fire.

Midtown Global Market to celebrate reopening Saturday after months of turbulence

Roughly a week later, market leaders chose to terminate the lease of Minneapolis-based Holy Land Brand Inc., which operated a deli, grocery store and butcher counter in the market. The decision was made after the company came under fire for years-old racist social media posts by the founder's daughter.

It will be a long road back to normal for the market, which is facing a shortfall in its annual operating budget that could top $600,000, according to Renay Dossman, executive director in the Twin Cities for Neighborhood Development Center, one of two nonprofits that own and manage Midtown Global Market. That shortfall is largely due to NDC agreeing to reduce or defer rent payments for market vendors.

Dossman said half or more of the market's vendors are currently open, but many are still struggling with the loss of walk-up business from workers at Allina Health's corporate offices, which are also located inside the Midtown Exchange. Like office workers across the state and country, many are telecommuting during the pandemic, and it could be months until they return. She said some market vendors generated as much as 25% to 50% of their business from Allina workers.

"We just can't rely on Allina to come back and save us," Dossman said, adding that the multiple challenges facing the market are forcing leaders to "get creative."

They've been helping restaurant vendors improve their online presence to boost carryout and delivery orders, and Dossman said they're exploring options for creating an online marketplace for retail vendors.

"We don't only want them to survive in this, we want them to thrive during this time and when this is over," she said.

Like other restaurant and retail spaces in Minnesota, the Midtown Global Market is currently limited to 50% of capacity to slow the spread of Covid-19. Even then, some patrons aren't comfortable lingering inside, so market leaders are working with Minneapolis-based Ryan Cos., the building's owner, to add more outdoor seating.

Midtown Global Market Mend is a GoFundMe campaign aiming to raise $250,000 for businesses inside the market as well as neighboring businesses damaged or destroyed in the unrest. The campaign had raised over $150,000 as of mid-July, and Dossman said each Midtown Global Market vendor recently received a $2,000 check.

Dossman said the focus now is on bringing customers back. New businesses could help.

She said multiple parties have expressed interest in the former Holy Land space. And the market has a signed letter of intent with Midtown Eye Care to take another space. Midtown Eye Care's former Chicago Avenue building was one of those destroyed during the unrest.

Dossman said the market is working on a Minnesota State Fair-themed event for later in the summer. The market's restaurant vendors won't be taking turns in a Midtown Global Market-themed booth since the Great Minnesota Get Together was cancelled by the pandemic.

"We're going to bring the State Fair to the market and showcase a lot of the business owners and entrepreneurs who have participated in the State Fair over the year," she said.

The grand reopening celebration runs 10 a.m.-6 p.m. Saturday and will feature drawings for Midtown Global Market gift certificates and other prizes.

Midtown Global Market to celebrate reopening Saturday after months of turbulence

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

End of Document

Mpls. man arrested in Chicago in pregnant woman's fatal shooting

ARTICLE MCLXII. MPLS. MAN ARRESTED IN CHICAGO IN PREGNANT WOMAN'S FATAL SHOOTING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 13, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 8A

Length: 297 words

Byline: MARA KLECKER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

A Minneapolis man charged with fatally shooting a woman who was pregnant with their child has been arrested in Chicago, authorities said.

Zachary V. Robinson, 27, was charged last week in Hennepin County District Court with second-degree murder, second-degree assault and being a felon in possession of a firearm in connection with the July 5 shooting of Leneesha H. Columbus, 27.

Robinson was arrested with the help of the recently formed Twin Cities Violent Crime Task Force, said Minneapolis police spokesman John Elder. The effort involves state and federal law enforcement across a dozen agencies and comes in response to a spike in gun violence and other crimes in the months since George Floyd's death in Minneapolis.

Columbus was shot while sitting in an SUV near the memorial to Floyd, who died on May 25 while being detained by police.

Columbus was taken to HCMC, where she gave birth that night before she was pronounced dead from a gunshot wound to her upper torso. Bystanders had pulled her out of the shot-up SUV and did what they could to try to save her, according to the charges.

Witnesses saw Columbus in the stopped SUV at E. 37th Street and S. Chicago Avenue arguing with Robinson before three shots were fired, according to the complaint. The vehicle traveled one block before coming to a halt.

The baby was in critical condition, according to charging documents filed Wednesday.

A nationwide warrant was issued for Robinson's arrest.

Robinson has a long and violent criminal history in Hennepin County. He's been convicted on five counts of assault in connection with two cases, and he has cases pending on other assault and firearms possession cases.

Mpls. man arrested in Chicago in pregnant woman's fatal shooting

Authorities in Minneapolis said Robinson is in Illinois awaiting transport back to Minnesota.

Mara Klecker · 612-673-4440

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCLXIII. ON SMALL BUSINESS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 13, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 857 wordsByline: NEAL ST. ANTHONY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Hospitality on hold // Hotels can only wait for guests to return as restrictions ease.Body

Baheru Haile is a veteran of the idled hotel industry.

Haile, 61, has worked just about every job over the past 20 years at Sheraton-branded hotels, including night auditor, front desk and shuttle driver. He isn't optimistic about returning to work soon.

"I want to work and I like hospitality," said Haile, who emigrated from Ethiopia in 1979 and earned degrees in international relations and economics at the University of Minnesota. "I enjoy talking with people who I see year after year, while driving the shuttle. I have made many friends."

Haile and other employees at the former Sheraton Midtown Hotel, near the Allina Health headquarters in south Minneapolis, were laid off in February when a new owner took over the hotel. In March, the employees were told to clean out their lockers and that they would have to apply for their old jobs. Haile did. And he's heard nothing.

Jay Patel, a local hotel operator, acquired the hotel in February for $8 million from a Qatar-based investment group that had paid about $10 million in 2016, according to Hennepin County records. The deal closed just before the coronavirus outbreak disrupted travel and lodging.

Patel briefly arranged for the former Sheraton Midtown to house homeless people after the protests over the May 25 killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis. But he ended the arrangement in June after a drug overdose and the trashing of the hotel.

Haile spent some of his free time working with his kids on school in the spring, and volunteering with his YMCA and an agency that settles immigrants. He has a mortgage and other expenses that won't be covered by state unemployment benefits. The $600 weekly federal stimulus payments to idled workers expire this month.

"I have good work experience," said the married father of two. "I'm looking for work."

ON SMALL BUSINESS

And his search will transcend the hard-hit hospitality business.

With business travel waylaid, conventions canceled and professional sports postponed, Twin Cities hotel occupancy has fallen from about 70% last summer to about 10% this summer, Tanya Pierson, managing director of hotel consulting firm HVS told the Star Tribune earlier this month. Hotels are bleeding money.

At least one big hotel operator has been pushing the administration of Gov. Tim Walz - without success so far - to allow hotels to expand meeting occupancy from 25% to 50%.

Doug Greene is managing director of Florida-based Haberhill, which owns several hotels including the downtown Hyatt Regency and Hilton, which are the biggest in the Twin Cities with nearly 1,500 rooms in aggregate. About 800 of the 850 workers who make base wages of $13 to $16 an hour are idled, said Greene. The company has helped with health benefits, gift cards and helping file for government benefits.

Greene said Haberhill's Marriott St. Louis Grand downtown flagship is proving that well-run hotels can safely host meetings of up to 50% of capacity using protocols also practiced by Hyatt, Hilton and other major hotels.

"Your governor doesn't understand what Hilton, Hyatt and Marriott are doing," Greene said. "We can space. We're not doing buffets. We're constantly cleaning. The meeting planners understand."

Steve Grove, Minnesota commissioner of employment and economic development, told Greene in late June that the Walz administration wouldn't budge in July from hotel restrictions on meeting rooms beyond 25% capacity and 250 people in the room.

"I'm frustrated," Greene said. "We've got groups in the fall that may start canceling."

The Hyatt Regency had 3.7% occupancy in June and $78,000 in revenue, Greene said. Last June, it was 85% occupied and grossed $5.5 million. The Hilton dropped to $176,000 in revenue last month from $5.8 million a year ago.

More months like this spell a significant 2020 loss for two hotels that have generated positive annual cash flow of about $30 million on an investment of $300 million-plus by the Haberhill partners and their lenders.

A spokesman for Grove said that despite meetings with Greene and other hospitality executives, state leaders have yet to decide on when to move to the next phase of opening the Minnesota economy that would allow for increased capacities.

Walz has taken a cautious approach in light of spikes in coronavirus in Texas, Florida and Arizona. Those states were in the vanguard of opening businesses more fully in recent months.

Jim Graves, the Minneapolis-based hotel owner and manager, doesn't like draining money or idling employees.

"But the science and virus dictate," he said. "I think most people want to play it safe. I don't think Walz or anybody can turn the clock back. Our occupancy is ticking up a bit. There's more corporate travel, particularly medical-related travel.

ON SMALL BUSINESS

"Our airport hotel occupancy is around 30%. But our downtown properties are fighting to maintain 10%. There's no Twins or Guthrie or Orchestra Hall. Little vacation travel. Nothing is going on downtown. The earliest we're coming back may be the first quarter of 2021. And that depends on a vaccination."

Neal St. Anthony has been a Star Tribune business columnist and reporter since 1984. He can be contacted at nstanthony@startribune.com

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCLXIV. Q&A: DR. ANDREW OLSON ON THE FRONT LINES AT BETHESDA HOSPITAL'S COVID FACILITY IN ST. PAUL

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 13, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 936 words

Byline: Frederick Melo

Highlight: When M Health Fairview converted Bethesda Hospital in St. Paul into a 90-bed COVID facility, Dr. Andrew Olson was on the front lines. Olson is a director of hospital medicine at the University of Minnesota and an associate professor of medicine and pediatrics at the University of Minnesota Medical School. Since March, he's also been [...]

Body

When M Health Fairview converted Bethesda Hospital in St. Paul into a 90-bed COVID facility, Dr. Andrew Olson was on the front lines.

Olson is a director of hospital medicine at the University of Minnesota and an associate professor of medicine and pediatrics at the University of Minnesota Medical School.

Since March, he's also been one of the medical directors at Bethesda, providing direct patient care and helping set facility-wide policy.

The following interview has been edited for clarity and brevity.

It sounds like your job is a bit intense.

It is intense, but it is probably the most positive healthcare working environment I've ever been in. There are people who signed up saying, "I want to be on the frontlines of this thing. Put me in." I love it there. It's an incredibly positive environment. None of us are happy this happened, but that said, I've never been prouder of anything in my professional career. We're doing OK in Minnesota, and we're all really proud of that.

What are you doing differently today than four months ago?

In February, or even in March, nobody was an expert in COVID. When something evolves this fast, we have to harness a lot of different resources in order to get the information we need to provide the best care we can for our patients. When this started, there were no protocols. The decision was made to standardize care and decrease unnecessary variation. I really believe keeping COVID patients together in one location works. If you're able to run your non-COVID hospitals at normal volumes, or close to it, that helps everybody. It's allowed us to have the majority of COVID patients at one or two sites and standardize care.

What do you mean by standardized care?

For instance, we learned that where you are in the course of your treatment is really important. It says whether you are on the upswing or getting worse. "This patient is 10 days in, they might be getting better. This patient is four days in, they might be getting worse." So we added that into our standard note template for 100 percent of our patients. These patients get blood clots at a very high rate, so we added blood thinners, to treat our patients more aggressively with anticoagulants than we normally would.

What else has COVID taught us?

Health disparities are not new. This thing has shined a light on that in a big way. Superimposed on the death of George Floyd, it's a time to have reckoning as a healthcare system and say, Can we do the right thing for these communities? ... This is the time when I hope we start to address some of the fundamental inequities.

What else has changed in four months?

In February, March, we were all really scared. There were horror stories coming out of Italy and New York about healthcare professionals getting COVID. But bravery does not mean not being scared. It means leaning into it despite being scared. We actually feel really, really safe. There's no mystery - every patient has COVID, and our healthcare provider "getting sick rate" is really low. It's about wearing a mask all the time at work, washing your hands. A couple times, when my mask was tearing, somebody handed me a new mask. Doing the simple things right is really important. We're double checking and triple checking each other. The highest risk isn't from patient to provider. It's when providers let their guard down with each other. We sit apart at lunch, even. You can't let your guard down ever with this, and it's about supporting each other in doing so.

We've heard of some unusual symptoms, such as painful toe inflammation, or "COVID toe." Is that something you're seeing?

We have not seen that a ton. That has been described in children, and certainly we are seeing some multi-vascular inflammatory changes. But in the hospital, (what we're seeing is) respiratory failure.

Things are changing fast on the drug front. The federal Food and Drug Administration no longer supports giving hydroxychloroquine to COVID patients. When did Bethesda Hospital stop administering the drug?

We never used this to a significant degree in our system. Patients were asking for it. The president was telling people to take it. But I'm very proud that we as a system said, 'We are going to follow evidence-based medicine, and follow the practices we know how to do.' This is the first modern pandemic, and we are in the information age. Patients, providers, they're all consuming massive amounts of information on the news and through social media. And there's good information and bad information out there.

There's certainly a lot to take in.

We had to make changes that sometimes surprised us. Recently, we had to get stakeholders together very quickly and make a decision that we would encourage the use of Dexamethasone (a hormonal steroid that fights inflammation) in selected patients. There's no silver bullet for treating this. Yeah, Dexamethasone helps. Remdesivir helps. But the mainstay of treatment is good standard supportive care. What do we know how to do? Monitoring patients' fluid levels, preventing blood clots - none of those things are new. But they're terribly important. The most important thing is doing the work we know how to do and doing it well. Sunday coronavirus update: 9 more MN deaths, 806 more infections Minnesota cities, counties scramble to keep businesses afloat by dishing out CARES Act grants As shops struggle with coronavirus restrictions, White Bear Lake closes street to help Health officials say these MN districts can reopen schools. So, why won't they? Rescheduled, postponed or canceled? Here's the status of all the major Twin Cities summer concerts.

Q&A: Dr. Andrew Olson on the front lines at Bethesda Hospital's COVID facility in St. Paul

Graphic

Dr. Andrew Olson

Nurses gather in one of the wards at Bethesda Hospital in St. Paul. (John Autey / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: August 9, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCLXV. READERS WRITE DON'T BOTCH ROUND TWO

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 13, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 10ALength: 1197 wordsBody

LEGISLATURE

The Minnesota Legislature reconvenes for another special session Monday and this time, Minnesotans need the Senate majority to step up to the plate.

Last time around, with all eyes on our state after the killing of George Floyd at the hands of police, the House rose to the occasion and passed meaningful police accountability legislation. Meanwhile, Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka set an arbitrary deadline and managed to adjourn the session without having to give these issues serious consideration.

Minnesotans are united across race and geography on the need for serious reform. This is not just a Twin Cities problem; in the past five years, 60% of the state's deadly-force encounters with law enforcement occurred in greater Minnesota.

Each week in the congregation I serve, we hear that all people are created in the image of God and endowed with intrinsic human dignity, a message that is fundamentally at odds with the white supremacy upon which America's systems and institutions are built. Racism is America's original sin and dismantling it requires our singular focus.

The Minnesota Senate has another chance to get this right. This time, I hope they will stay in session and keep doing their job until they get the job done. The world is watching.

Javen Swanson, St. Paul

...

An apology is in order. Gazelka and House Minority Leader Kurt Daudt were critical of Gov. Tim Walz's stay-at-home and closure orders - to the point of wanting to impede other, unrelated legislation. Soon after, other states (Texas, Florida) did what Gazelka and Daudt were advocating for and opened their states. These are the very states that are now seeing spikes in new cases every day. Seems to me the caution the governor was urging has paid off for Minnesota.

Once again we see (almost every day) the ability to grab headlines is very different than leadership.

Scott Barsuhn, Minneapolis

OIL PIPELINES

Keep Line 3 from crumbling

There is a big difference between headlines and the reality of what matters.

Instead of putting pressure" on it, the recent court decisions about pipelines does more to show how Line 3 is different, better and ready to go to bring jobs and hope to Minnesota ("Three pipeline setbacks in two days turn heat up on Minnesota project," July 7).

After again voting to approve it, last month Public Utilities Commissioner John Tuma said that "this permit will be viewed as the gold standard for petroleum infrastructure replacement." That's because the Line 3 project is the most studied project in Minnesota's history.

Minnesota has already completed the review being ordered for the other projects. The Star Tribune Editorial Board last year said the PUC's process "was rigorous and exhaustive." It went on to say that "Minnesota must take responsibility for its energy needs. A new Line 3 should be seen as a transition that will take more oil off rail cars while the state and nation wean themselves off fossil-fuel sources."

PUC Commissioner Katie Sieben said, "A new pipeline with thicker and safer materials, constructed with up-to-date safety standards by skilled laborers operating under prevailing wage laws is a better outcome than leaving an old pipeline that again was ordered by federal consent decree to seek replacement."

When you look at the facts, Line 3 makes even more sense. That's why I and 42 other northern Minnesota mayors support this project. As the Star Tribune Editorial Board said last year, "Walz and the Commerce Department should drop the court challenge and allow the project to proceed."

Dylan Goudge, Clearbrook, Minn.

The writer is mayor of Clearbrook.

DAIRY MARKET

Virus exposed what was already there

It's hard to look at the "Support Dairy, Dairy Strong" signs dotting our rural communities in northeast Wisconsin without wincing in pain. While recognizing the well-meaning efforts of those believing campaigns like this one will alleviate ongoing dairy woes, we must not fall into a mind-set in believing gulping down a few extra glasses of milk on "Milk Mondays" (or any other days of the week, for that matter), or eating more cheese will take a bite into the already 1.4-billion-pound cheese surplus that the United States has currently. It's time to recognize that what ails dairy in its demise is a systematic, inside job.

Ben Brancel, former Wisconsin Agriculture, Trade and Consumer Protection secretary, and former Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker did their parts in the troubled dairy crisis, in their push and promotion of the "30/20 plan" - a plan to flood the market with 30 billion pounds of milk by 2020.

Brancel vanished off the landscape, along with many of Wisconsin's small dairies that were already struggling to survive. Small farmers remained true to their farmer allegiance, despite the writing on the wall. As small farms failed, farmer suicide rates skyrocketed, with farmer suicides in the U.S. almost double the national average by May 2019.

One needn't look further than the vertical integration that has already taken place in the pork, beef and poultry industries to understand that dairy is just following suit with the rest of the U.S. food production in its consolidation. The pandemic exposed our supply chain vulnerability and the true threats when our food supply is in the hands of a few corporate monopolized giants.

The pandemic has set the table. The choice is ours. Real change must occur in our communities that can once again recognize the value of our small farmers and the true food security they bring to our rural communities and beyond. We need to put our support into a strong food system that again values people, animals, our land and natural resources and does not leave our farmers and our farming communities behind.

Nancy Utesch, Kewaunee, Wis.

LOCAL STORES

Thanks to a neighborhood gem

It is in these exceptional times that ordinary people doing extraordinary things should not go unnoticed.

I have become friends with Tarig "Tally" Mohamed at the Phoenix Market in St. Paul over the last 14 years. He is more than the man behind the counter; he truly cares about the people who come into his store. He has on more than one occasion paid for my groceries. I always pay him back, but how many store owners do you know who will do that?

We took for granted the neighborhood convenience store and the employees we saw while filling up on coffee and fuel on our way to work. All that changed when the country went into lockdown and the silent, deadly coronavirus settled in.

While we were safe in our homes, the C-store operators and employees had to navigate a whole new way of doing business. Being deemed "essential" because they sold food and fuel, stores stayed open, employees kept their jobs and new heroes emerged. Owners and employees are now greeting customers with gloved hands and masked faces and speaking through plexiglass screens. Owners are raising wages and employees are leaving loved ones at home to serve us when there are few places to turn.

I want to thank my friend Tally at the Phoenix Market for keeping the lights on and having warm meals and cold drinks in a neighborhood that lacks both.

Mary Carlson, St. Paul

We want to hear from you. Send us your thoughts here.

Load-Date: July 13, 2020

ARTICLE MCLXVI. MEDIA SEEK VIDEO FOOTAGE IN FLOYD CASE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 14, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 659 wordsByline: CHAO XIONG; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: It can be viewed only by appointment at the courthouse, not recorded.Body

A coalition of local and national media companies, including the Star Tribune, filed a motion Monday chastising the court for withholding two body-camera videos recorded by police officers the night George Floyd was killed, and called for their immediate release.

Attorney Earl Gray filed two body-worn camera (BWC) videos in court about a week ago as evidence supporting his motion to dismiss the charges against his client, Thomas Lane, making it public data, according to state law.

The court's insistence that the videos be viewed by appointment only in the Hennepin County Government Center downtown violates state laws governing public records, court rules and the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, the motion argued.

"The Media Coalition requests that the Court ... immediately make the BWC [body-worn camera] footage available for copying by the press and public so that it may be widely viewed not just by those who have the time and wherewithal to visit the courthouse during a global pandemic but by all members of the public concerned about the administration of justice in one of the most important, and most-watched cases, this State - perhaps this country - has ever seen," said the motion written by attorneys Leita Walker and Emmy Parsons.

The media coalition also includes American Public Media, which owns Minnesota Public Radio; the Associated Press; CBS Broadcasting Inc.; Dow Jones & Co., publisher of the Wall Street Journal; Hubbard Broadcasting, which owns KSTP-TV; and the New York Times Co., among others.

Hennepin County District Judge Peter Cahill, who is presiding over the cases against four former Minneapolis police officers charged in Floyd's death, is making the videos viewable from 9 a.m. to 4:15 p.m. Wednesday.

"Attendees must store their electronic devices while in the room, and no video or audio recording will be allowed," said the court website.

Media seek video footage in Floyd case

The footage was recorded by Lane and J. Alexander Kueng, rookies whose attorneys have argued that they were deferring to officer Derek Chauvin, a 19-year veteran, as they pressed on Floyd while he lay handcuffed, stomach-down in the street complaining he couldn't breathe.

The videos' release would lend more context and accuracy to transcripts of the videos released last week that contradicted each other, according to the coalition's motion.

"Reporting is hamstrung by the inadequacy of the transcripts ..." the motion said. "... The transcripts appear to have obvious errors."

The court has not identified "extraordinary circumstances" to limit the videos' release, and the court is compelled by rules to hold a public hearing before taking such action, the motion said.

"There is no reason to believe that making the BWC footage itself easily accessible to the press and public would materially impact the fairness of trial," the motion said. "... As days of unrest in the Twin Cities showed, it is vitally important that the public have full confidence in the process and outcome of this criminal prosecution."

The coalition asked to argue its case in court next Tuesday.

Gray has also said the public should see the videos so people don't "cherry-pick" information about the case. A bystander recorded and publicly broadcast video of Floyd's death, which did not capture Lane or Kueng, who were obscured behind a squad car.

Lane was holding onto Floyd's feet and Kueng was holding onto his back while Chauvin knelt on his neck for nearly eight minutes as bystanders pleaded with the officers to stop.

Former officer Tou Thao controlled the bystanders and rebuffed their concerns. The killing of Floyd, a 46-year-old Black man, set off days of protests across the world.

Chauvin is charged with one count each of second-degree unintentional murder, third-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter. Kueng, Lane and Thao are charged with aiding and abetting murder and manslaughter.

The former officers' trial or trials are set for next March.

Chao Xiong · 612-270-4708

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

ARTICLE MCLXVII. GEORGE FLOYD FAMILY FILING CIVIL SUIT AGAINST MINNEAPOLIS, POLICE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 14, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 247 wordsByline: Forum News Service

Highlight: Attorneys representing the family of George Floyd, who died while in police custody in May, are announcing a lawsuit against the city of Minneapolis and police officers on Wednesday. Florida-based civil rights attorney Ben Crump and co-counsel Antonio Romanucci, who are both representing the Floyd family, are set to announce details of the lawsuit at [...]

Body

Attorneys representing the family of George Floyd, who died while in police custody in May, are announcing a lawsuit against the city of Minneapolis and police officers on Wednesday.

Florida-based civil rights attorney Ben Crump and co-counsel Antonio Romanucci, who are both representing the Floyd family, are set to announce details of the lawsuit at a Wednesday morning news conference in Minneapolis, according to a Tuesday news release.

The impending civil suit comes less than two months after Floyd died in Minneapolis on May 25, when Minneapolis Police former-officer Derek Chauvin, who is white, knelt on Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes as he cried out that he couldn't breathe. As Floyd, who was Black, grew unresponsive under Chauvin's knee, three other Minneapolis police former-officers present at the scene - Thomas Lane, Tou Thao and J Alexander Kueng - did not intervene.

Chauvin has been charged with murder and manslaughter, and Lane, Thao and Kueng have been charged with aiding and abetting murder. All four former officers' trial dates have been set for March.

Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCLXVIII.

ATTORNEYS FOR 4 FIRED OFFICERS OBJECT TO GAG ORDER

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 14, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 1001 wordsByline: CHAO XIONG; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Derek Chauvin's lawyer says judge's order violates his constitutional rights to free speech and a public trial.Body

The attorneys for four ex-Minneapolis police officers charged in the death of George Floyd are asking a judge to rescind a gag order issued last week prohibiting attorneys and others from discussing the case.

Eric Nelson, who represents Derek Chauvin, filed a motion Monday arguing that Hennepin County District Judge Peter Cahill's gag order violates Chauvin's state and federal constitutional rights to free speech and a public trial.

Attorneys Thomas Plunkett, Robert Paule and Earl Gray, who are representing the three other former officers charged in the case, also filed motions Monday to vacate the order.

"Given the global extent and tenor of pretrial publicity in this case, halting the flow of any information from Mr. Chauvin, through his counsel - before even a single statement has been made - to the public is more likely to prejudice the jury pool (to the extent that it has not already) than to prevent a taint," Nelson wrote. "The Court's order effectively allows the repeated and unmitigated condemnation of a criminal defendant by nonparty public officials and celebrities."

Nelson also criticized the media, public officials and others for contributing to the "overwhelming pretrial publicity damning Mr. Chauvin."

Cahill issued the order Thursday after Gray and Plunkett spoke to the Star Tribune about their clients.

"The court finds that continuing pretrial publicity in this case by the attorneys involved will increase the risk of tainting a potential jury pool and will impair all parties' right to a fair trial," Cahill wrote in his order, which covered "all parties, attorneys, their employees, agents or independent contractors working on their behalf."

Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter for planting his knee on the neck of Floyd, 46, for nearly eight minutes, leading to his death on May 25.

Chauvin's former colleagues J. Alexander Kueng, Thomas Lane and Tou Thao are charged with aiding and abetting murder and manslaughter.

Gray filed a motion last week to dismiss the case against Lane, and said the court should allow the public to view two body camera videos he filed with the motion. Plunkett said he was considering a similar motion for Kueng.

Nelson and Paule did not comment.

Gray wrote in his Monday motion that he was trying to explain the motion and videos to media.

"Nothing defense counsel filed or said warrants this Court to issue a Gag Order," Gray wrote.

The court did not make the body camera videos available for viewing when Gray filed his motion; it later announced that the videos would be publicly viewable at the courthouse on Wednesday.

Plunkett said in his motion that he was contacted by roughly a dozen media outlets about Gray's motion, and that media reports were "incomplete and tainted" because the court did not make the videos immediately available.

"The public narrative is being driven by the Court's denial of access to publicly filed exhibits which has caused a piecemeal release of information that unfairly portrays the evidence," argued Plunkett.

Cahill's order prohibited defense attorneys and the prosecution, which is being led by the Minnesota Attorney General's Office with assistance from the Hennepin County Attorney's Office, from divulging "opinions, strategies, plans or potential evidence" to the media or general public.

Nelson, Paule and Plunkett rebuked public officials including Attorney General Keith Ellison, Gov. Tim Walz, Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey and Minneapolis police Chief Medaria Arradondo and others for speaking publicly about the case before the judge issued the gag order.

"For more than a month, the press, popular figures, high ranking politicians, and the attorney leading this prosecution [Ellison] - as well as his councilman son - have all rendered their verdicts in this case and on the most public stages possible," Nelson wrote. "And they have all deemed the Defendant guilty."

Nelson argued that the judge inappropriately issued the order without citing legal authority or convening a hearing on the matter, depriving Chauvin of his constitutional right to due process.

Cahill cited a Minnesota court rule in issuing the order. Nelson, Paule and Plunkett argued that the rule required a motion and court hearing.

Plunkett also called for the immediate release of the body camera videos, accusing the court of withholding public data by "delay and limitation."

Evidence submitted in court is public data under the Minnesota Data Practices Act.

Attorneys for 4 fired officers object to gag order

Nelson noted that he has not spoken to the media about the case and that Chauvin should not be penalized for other attorneys' actions. Paule also argued that his client's case should not be affected by others' statements.

"If anything, the gag order should apply only to the State and county prosecutors, who have enjoyed a lengthy, unrestricted media honeymoon, during which to comment and posit and discuss this case at length - likely in violation of their ethical duties," Nelson wrote.

Gag orders are highly unusual in Minnesota, but have been used in the past.

Also on Monday, Ellison announced that he appointed four veteran attorneys as special assistant attorney generals on the Floyd case. The attorneys are working pro bono.

"Out of respect for Judge Cahill's gag order, I will say simply that I've put together an exceptional team with experience and expertise across many disciplines," Ellison said in a written statement.

The attorneys are Neal Katyal, former acting Solicitor General and former Principal Deputy Solicitor General of the United States; Lola Velázquez-Aguilu, an attorney at Medtronic and former prosecutor with the U.S. Attorney's Office; Jerry Blackwell, a trial attorney who won the state's first posthumous pardon for Max Mason, a Black man wrongly convicted of rape 100 years ago; and Steven L. Schleicher, a former prosecutor with the U.S. Attorney's Office who led the successful prosecution of Jacob Wetterling's kidnapper and killer.

Chao Xiong · 612-270-4708

Twitter: @ChaoStrib

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

ARTICLE MCLXIX. ATTORNEYS ASK GEORGE FLOYD JUDGE TO HOLD AG KEITH ELLISON IN CONTEMPT

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 14, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 234 wordsByline: The Associated Press

Highlight: Attorneys for two former Minneapolis police officers charged in George Floyd's death are asking a judge to hold Attorney General Keith Ellison in contempt for violating a gag order. The attorneys for Tou Thao and Thomas Lane took issue Tuesday with a news release from Ellison on Monday announcing that four "seasoned attorneys" would be [...]

Body

Attorneys for two former Minneapolis police officers charged in George Floyd's death are asking a judge to hold Attorney General Keith Ellison in contempt for violating a gag order.

The attorneys for Tou Thao and Thomas Lane took issue Tuesday with a news release from Ellison on Monday announcing that four "seasoned attorneys" would be helping his office prosecute the case for free.

Lane's attorney, Earl Gray, said the release violated Hennepin County Judge Peter Cahill's gag order and amounted to "an obvious statement to the public that these 'super stars' believe that our clients are guilty."

Cahill said in issuing the gag order last week that continuing pretrial publicity in the case would increase the risk of tainting the potential jury pool and "will impair all parties' right to a fair trial."

The judge has also warned that the trial might be moved out of the county if public officials, attorneys and family members didn't stop speaking out about the case.

Ellison's office declined comment. Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCLXX. MINNEAPOLIS COPS REQUIRED TO REPORT DE-ESCALATION EFFORTS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 14, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 552 wordsByline: Amy Forliti

Highlight: The Minneapolis Police Department is changing its policy on reporting use of force incidents to require that officers document their attempts to de-escalate a situation in all incidents, whether or not they end with force being used, the mayor and police chief announced Tuesday. The change, announced amid calls for widespread police reforms following the [...]

Body

The Minneapolis Police Department is changing its policy on reporting use of force incidents to require that officers document their attempts to de-escalate a situation in all incidents, whether or not they end with force being used, the mayor and police chief announced Tuesday.

The change, announced amid calls for widespread police reforms following the May 25 death of George Floyd, is designed to place a greater emphasis on de-escalation and curb excessive use of force, Mayor Jacob Frey said in a statement. Besides requiring that officers report de-escalation attempts, the new policy expands requirements for reporting use of force incidents across the board and orders that officers provide more detail.

"These comprehensive reporting requirements will help reinforce de-escalation as the first resort, increase accountability where de-escalation is an after-thought, and provide improved data to head off problematic interactions before they happen," Frey said.

The changes take effect Friday.

Floyd, a Black man who was handcuffed, died after Derek Chauvin, a white police officer, pressed his knee against Floyd's neck for nearly 8 minutes as Floyd said he couldn't breathe. Chauvin is charged with murder and manslaughter, and three other officers are charged with aiding and abetting. All four officers were fired.

Floyd's death sparked protests in Minneapolis and beyond and led to calls for an end to police brutality and racial inequities.

Frey and Chief Medaria Arradondo have said they're committed to deep structural change in the police department, but they oppose abolishing it entirely. The announcement on the policy change came a day before the city's charter commission planned to take public comment on a City Council proposal to dismantle the department and replace it with a new agency that has a more holistic approach.

Minneapolis cops required to report de-escalation efforts

It also came as Ben Crump, an attorney for members of Floyd's family, announced he will file a lawsuit against the city and police officers on Wednesday.

Frey and Arradondo said Tuesday that the new policy raises department standards for use of force documentation, reporting and the notification of supervisors.

Prior to the new policy, there were no reporting requirements for techniques such as arm bars, wrist locks, drawing a firearm or using handcuffs, they said. Now, officers will be required to outline their attempts to de-escalate a situation, and provide written rationale that describes the force used and why that level of force was used.

Officers will also be required to document if there was an injury, and if medical aid was given and by whom. And officers using authorized takedown techniques or chemical agents will also now be required to follow the same documentation and reporting requirements, as well as tell a supervisor.

Arradondo said the new changes will "play a key role in our efforts in building trust and legitimacy with all those we serve." Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCLXXI. LONG FIGHT OVER NAMES HITS HOME

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 14, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1052 wordsByline: RANDY FURST; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The Washington football team announced that it is scrapping its Redskins nickname, nearly three decades after the first major protest of the moniker and logo decried as racist during the 1992 Super Bowl in Minneapolis.

American Indian leaders and some of their longtime allies held a news conference on Monday afternoon at the American Indian Center in south Minneapolis to celebrate a victory many felt was long overdue.

"Black lives matter and Indian lives matter" said Clyde Bellecourt, a national leader of the American Indian Movement (AIM), who helped organize the 1992 Super Bowl march with his late brother Vernon Bellecourt, the first president of the National Coalition on Racism in Sports and Media. In the end, he said, the Washington team capitulated because "money matters."

"Dan Snyder [Washington's owner] has succumbed to pressures put by FedEx, PepsiCo, Nike and all the sponsors," said David Glass, now president of the national coalition.

The news media that descended on the Metrodome in January 1992 to cover the Super Bowl were puzzled at the thousands of demonstrators gathered on the plaza to protest the contending Redskins' nickname as racist.

"What's it all about?" asked Andy Rooney, at that time a famous pundit for "60 Minutes" who came to see Washington play the Buffalo Bills. When a reporter explained the reason, Rooney pronounced it "silly."

Washington, one of the oldest teams in the NFL, did not announce a new name Monday but said it was being reviewed. "Today, we are announcing we will be retiring the Redskins name and logo upon completion of this review," the statement said. The decision to abandon the name after nearly 90 years came just 10 days after the team said it would reconsider the name. Snyder had stridently defended the name for years.

Long fight over names hits home

Snyder said the new name, when it is chosen, would "take into account not only the proud tradition and history of the franchise but also input from our alumni, the organization, sponsors, the National Football League and the local community it is proud to represent on and off the field."

At the end of June, some of the team's biggest sponsors, including FedEx, Nike and Pepsi, received letters from investors who called on the companies to cut their ties with the team.

On July 2, FedEx, which pays about $8 million a year to have its name on the team's stadium in Landover, Md., told the Redskins in a letter that if the team did not change its name, FedEx would ask that its name be taken off the stadium at the end of the season.

The decision to change the name of one of the country's most valuable professional sports franchises comes after hundreds of universities and schools have abandoned team names and mascots with Native American symbols.

Professional teams like the Kansas City Chiefs of the NFL and the Atlanta Braves and Cleveland Indians of Major League Baseball have resisted changing their names and logos, although the Indians dropped the mascot Chief Wahoo last year and recently said they would review the team name.

Although the Redskins are a Washington, D.C. football team, there were reasons the fight over its mascot was ignited in Minnesota.

AIM was founded in Minneapolis 50 years ago to protest inequality and police misconduct, but it soon expanded into a range of other areas including education, child welfare and team mascots.

"The American Indian Movement was really central to this [protest over the Redskins' name]," said David Zirin, sports editor of the Nation magazine. "They were the folks who put mascots at the center of the fight for Native American liberation. They saw fighting mascots as part of fighting for humanity. Over the years, whenever Washington came to Minnesota, they had demonstrations."

American Indians represent 1.6 % of Minnesota's population, but AIM helped infuse a sensitivity in local residents and leaders to Native American issues. And despite the relatively small numbers of American Indians here, the numbers are far greater than the Indian population of Washington, D.C. which is .006 %.

The reaction Monday from AIM's supporters who stood alongside the group during the 30-year fight was emotional. "We didn't give in and didn't turn around," said Spike Moss, a Black civil rights activist who joined Bellecourt at the news conference. "It's hard to look up to Clyde and not tear up," he said.

"Today is a really good day and I am honored to be here," said Lt. Gov. Peggy Flanagan, Minnesota's first American Indian in her position. "... There are many more teams left to go," she said.

"Every time the Washington team came here, it has brought our community together," said Rebecca Crooks-Stratton, secretary-treasurer of the Shakopee Mdewakanton Sioux Community. "There's still a long way to go."

Tyrone Terrill, secretary of the national coalition, said he thought he'd never see the day the team would drop the mascot, but now his group must press on to get the other teams to change their names.

Over the course of the past three decades, a number of prominent Minnesota politicians have weighed in against the Redskins name, and on Monday they expressed satisfaction that it is being dropped.

Long fight over names hits home

"We are now in a moment in America in which society and the marketplace will no longer tolerate, let alone reward, blatant racism," Fourth District congresswoman Betty McCollum said in a statement. "The decision ...is long overdue, but nonetheless welcome."

Calling the nickname "racist and offensive," former Gov. Mark Dayton said, "It's very unfortunate it has taken a terrible tragedy like the murder of George Floyd to force this issue on the Washington management."

"I think it's the right thing to do [to change the name] provided they lose to the Vikings," said former Gov. Arne Carlson.

Former Gov. Jesse Ventura marched in several local demonstrations against the name and could not be reached for comment Monday, but told a reporter a few days ago that the nickname evoked images of genocide. "Black lives matter and so do red ones," he said.

"How would the players of the NFL feel if they did an expansion to Birmingham, Ala., and they named 'em the Birmingham Slaves? Do you think that'd fly? I don't. And it shouldn't. This is the same thing."

Randy Furst · 612-673-4224

The New York Times and Star Tribune staff writer Jennifer Brooks contributed to this report.

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

ARTICLE MCLXXII. PROTEST IN PENNSYLVANIA AFTER COP USES KNEE TO RESTRAIN MAN

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 14, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 890 wordsByline: Michael RubinkamHighlight: ALLENTOWN, Pa. (AP) - Activists against police brutality expressed outrage and demanded accountability Monday after video emerged over the weekend of an officer placing his knee on a man's head and neck area outside a Pennsylvania hospital.Body

ALLENTOWN, Pa. - Activists against police brutality expressed outrage and demanded accountability Monday after video emerged over the weekend of an officer placing his knee on a man's head and neck area outside a Pennsylvania hospital.

Allentown police released a much longer surveillance video of the incident that showed the officer putting his knee on the man's head and neck area twice while he was being restrained a few steps from the emergency room entrance - the first time for eight seconds, the second for 20 seconds.

The man appeared to be "suffering from a medical, mental health or drug and alcohol crisis," police said in a statement late Monday.

Police violated their own policy against neck restraints when an officer used his knee to bear down on the man's head, activists said, while the American Civil Liberties Union of Pennsylvania called it an illegal use of force.

Hundreds of people marched in downtown Allentown on Monday night, calling for the officer to be fired and police funds to be reallocated to education, mental health and other social services.

"These police officers should not have been restraining him. He needed help," said Maegan Llerena of Make the Road Pennsylvania, an advocacy group. "Not even two months after George Floyd was murdered in Minneapolis, there was a knee on the neck of a man in front of a hospital. What is that? Can someone explain that to me?"

Police launched an internal probe.

The videotaped incident occurred nearly seven weeks after a white Minneapolis police officer pressed his knee into the neck of Floyd, a Black man, for nearly eight minutes. Floyd's death in police custody sparked global protests over police brutality and racial injustice.

Protest in Pennsylvania after cop uses knee to restrain man

"I can't believe this is really happening now, and here," said Justan Parker, founder of Allentown-based Black Lives Matter to Lehigh Valley.

The group issued a list of demands, including the release of any police bodycam video of the incident, the suspension of the officers involved, the name and condition of the man, the establishment of a regional criminal justice review board and a reallocation of police funding.

The brief bystander video, shot from a passing vehicle and posted on social media, shows Allentown officers restraining the man on the ground outside the emergency room of the Sacred Heart Campus of St. Luke's Hospital. An officer had his elbow on the man's neck before switching to a knee to hold him down while other officers restrained his arms.

In the soundless, 9:38 surveillance video, released late Monday, the man can be seen staggering on the street and sidewalk, vomiting several times and stopping in the driveway of the ER.

Two of the three officers at the scene approached the man after several minutes and attempted to place him into handcuffs, and the man appeared to resist. One of the officers swept the man's leg to bring him to the ground. Shortly after, the other officer put his knee on the man's head and neck.

An earlier police statement said the man had begun to yell and spit at officers and hospital staff, adding the man was "noncompliant which required officers to restrain" him. The surveillance video shows a hospital staffer placing what police called a "breathable spit mask" over the man's head, which is used to protect staff, officers and others from contact with bodily fluids.

The man was treated at the hospital and released, police said.

The ACLU criticized the police explanation.

The police department's "appalling excuse for an officer illegally placing his knee on a man's neck is that he was in mental distress and being 'non-compliant,'" the group tweeted in reaction to the shorter bystander video. "Police should NOT be first responders to those in a mental health crisis."

Attorney Benjamin Crump, who represents Floyd's family, tweeted the bystander video, writing that the restraint used by the unidentified officer is "exactly what led to #GeorgeFloyd's death." Crump demanded the officer's name.

Police have not released the name or race of any individuals seen in the video. Community advocates said they were trying to identify the man in the video to offer support.

"During a health crisis, whatever it was, when he should've been given support, instead he was criminalized and he received a knee to his neck," said Hasshan Batts, executive director of Promise Neighborhoods of the Lehigh Valley, an Allentown community group.

Police said their internal investigation is moving swiftly. The Lehigh County district attorney's office assigned two detectives to the internal probe and planned to issue findings later this week.

"Our investigation is ongoing, and as we uncover additional information we're trying to release that as we can," Assistant Police Chief Bill Lake said.

Protest in Pennsylvania after cop uses knee to restrain man

Though Allentown police wear body cameras, Lake declined to say Monday whether police video of the incident exists.

A St. Luke's spokesperson said the hospital has turned its own video over to police. Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Lynx will begin July 26 against Connecticut

ARTICLE MCLXXIII.

LYNX WILL BEGIN JULY 26 AGAINST CONNECTICUT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 14, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 3C

Length: 431 words

Byline: KENT YOUNGBLOOD; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

The Lynx should have a very good idea about where their 2020 season is going very early.

The Lynx open the season Sunday, July 26, at 11 a.m. against Connecticut, a nationally televised game on ESPN that will be part of the network's season-opening weekend coverage. In the league opener on July 25, No. 1 pick Sabrina Ionescu and the New York Liberty will face Breanna Stewart and the Seattle Storm in a nationally televised game.

For the Lynx, it will be the start of a difficult first week of play in a shortened, 22-game season in which every game will have more importance attached to it. They will play Seattle on July 28, Chicago on July 30 and the Sun again on Aug. 1.

The season is taking place at the IMG Academy in Bradenton, Fla., without fans in attendance in response to the COVID-19 pandemic. There will be three games a day.

The 22-game slate includes two games against each of the other 11 teams in the league. The games will come rapid-fire, though the Lynx never play on back-to-back days.

The two games vs. Connecticut will give Minnesota native Rachel Banham a good look early at her former team.

Other highlights: The Lynx play the Los Angeles Sparks - and former Lynx great Seimone Augustus - for the first time on Aug. 9. Two days later the Lynx play defending champion Washington. Their first game against traditional rival Phoenix comes Aug. 21. The Lynx's regular season concludes against Indiana on Sept. 12.

The Lynx have eight nationally televised games: three on ESPN or ESPN2 and five more on CBS Sports Network.

All games on the opening weekend will be dedicated to the Black Lives Matter movement.

Lynx will begin July 26 against Connecticut

"This 2020 WNBA season will truly be one unlike any other, and we're looking forward to using our collective platform to highlight the tremendous athletes in the WNBA as well as their advocacy for social change," WNBA Commissioner Cathy Engelbert said.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

2020 LYNX SCHEDULE

All games at the IMG Academy in Bradenton, Fla., with designated home teams.

JULY-AUGUST

26, Connecticut (ESPN), 11 am

28, at Seattle (CBSSN), 9 pm

30, Chicago, 7 pm

1, at Connecticut, 3 pm

5, at New York (CBSSN), 6 pm

7, Indiana, 5 pm

9, at Los Angeles (ESPN2), 6 pm

11, Washington, 5 pm

13, at Las Vegas (ESPN2), 8 pm

15, New York (CBSSN), 5 pm

19, Dallas, 8 pm

21, at Phoenix (CBSSN), 9 pm

23, Atlanta, 3 pm

26, Los Angeles (CBSSN), 7 pm

28, at Atlanta, 6 pm

30, Phoenix, 5 pm

SEPTEMBER

2, at Chicago, 6 pm

4, at Dallas, 7 pm

6, Seattle, 5 pm

8, at Washington, 7 pm

Lynx will begin July 26 against Connecticut

10, Las Vegas, 7 pm

12, at Indiana, 5 pm

Note: FOX Sports North will announce its TV games at a later date

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

End of Document

Gov. Walz to appeal federal decision rejecting disaster aid for Twin Cities following riots

ARTICLE MCLXXIV.

GOV. WALZ TO APPEAL FEDERAL DECISION REJECTING DISASTER AID FOR TWIN CITIES FOLLOWING RIOTS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 14, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 482 words

Byline: Dana Ferguson

Highlight: Gov. Tim Walz on Tuesday said he plans to appeal a federal decision rejecting Minnesota's request for disaster aid to help rebuild following arson fires and looting following the May 25 killing of George Floyd. Walz said he was disappointed in the Federal Emergency Management Agency's decision, as it had helped fund rebuilding efforts following [...]

Body

Gov. Tim Walz on Tuesday said he plans to appeal a federal decision rejecting Minnesota's request for disaster aid to help rebuild following arson fires and looting following the May 25 killing of George Floyd.

Walz said he was disappointed in the Federal Emergency Management Agency's decision, as it had helped fund rebuilding efforts following other episodes of civil unrest around the country. And he said he would ask the agency to review its decision and appeal to Vice President Mike Pence for his help.

"That fact of the matter is that we had a catastrophe in Minneapolis that was precipitated by the police killing of George Floyd," Walz said. "Folks took to the streets and, again, I think we know many of them from Minnesota but not necessarily from the Twin Cities area. We are committed to rebuilding these areas as vibrantly as we possibly can."

Walz earlier this month wrote to the Trump administration noting that there were more than $15 million in damage and cleanup costs in Minneapolis and St. Paul that could qualify for federal reimbursement. More than 1,500 businesses were damaged or destroyed during the riots that lasted several days.

And initial estimates indicate the total damage could exceed $500 million, the second-highest reported damage resulting from civil unrest in the nation's history behind the 1992 Los Angeles riots.

Republican lawmakers expressed approval for the Trump administration's decision not to grant the disaster aid to the Twin Cities.

U.S. Sen. Ted Cruz, R-Texas, on Twitter said local leaders "willfully allowed Minneapolis to burn & then blamed the police whom they demonized." Cruz said he planned to file legislation putting local governments on the hook for private property damage if they withhold police protection.

Gov. Walz to appeal federal decision rejecting disaster aid for Twin Cities following riots

And U.S. Rep. Tom Emmer, a Republican who represents Minnesota's 6th District, in a letter didn't support or oppose the request but called on the federal government to launch an investigation into state and local response to the riots in Minneapolis and St. Paul.

Walz on Tuesday said he was frustrated to see lawmakers celebrate the federal government's decision not to grant the disaster request.

"There appeared to be some happiness among some legislators that the federal government denied that or the idea that why should the rest of Minnesota pay for Minneapolis? And that is the wrong road to go down," Walz said. "We're there for one another."

The state has 30 days from the date of FEMA's rejection to file an appeal. Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCLXXV. POLICE APOLOGIZE FOR MAN'S ARREST

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 14, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 1035 wordsByline: PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Black driver had visions of Floyd's death; Richfield video shows cordial stop.Body

A Black man said thoughts of George Floyd's fatal police encounter went through his head as he sat in the back of a squad car last week in Bloomington after three white officers pulled him over and approached him briefly with a gun drawn.

Darius Strong posted a video on Facebook soon after the encounter saying "I could have been dead today" during what began as a traffic stop along Old Shakopee Road. "Just remember ... anything can happen to us, man, especially Black bodies ... Black people, Black men. ... Racial profiling is a thing."

Police released Strong after they realized they had the wrong man, and on Saturday night the Richfield Police Department issued an apology on Facebook saying he was victim of an "unfortunate case of mistaken identity."

On Monday, Richfield police released squad car dashcam footage that showed a cordial encounter for the entire 14-minute stop Friday afternoon between the officers and Strong, who questioned why he was being arrested before police realized their mistake, apologized and let him go.

Strong, 30, of Burnsville, said after watching the police video that he had a faulty recollection "because I had so much fear in me" when he contended in a Facebook video soon after the encounter that all the officers had their guns drawn.

"My mind was so jumbled," he added. "I just wanted people to know how frightened I was."

The discrepancies between Strong's initial account and the dashcam video prompted the Minnesota Police and Peace Officers Association to caution citizens against mischaracterizing interactions with police.

"There are clear differences between Mr. Strong's earlier Facebook video and both the officer report and [Monday's] released dash camera video," Association Executive Director Brian Peters said in a statement. "Based on the video evidence released, Mr. Strong was treated with respect, and the officers followed all of their trainings and procedures."

Police apologize for man's arrest

Strong's public account of his detention by police comes at a time of intense scrutiny of police encounters, particularly involving Black men. The police killing of Floyd during a routine arrest created weeks of protests and has prompted Minneapolis city officials to look at a dramatic rethinking of the Police Department and the best way to ensure public safety.

Richfield police released squad dashboard camera video Monday in an effort "to promote transparency" about the speeding stop led by one of their officers as part of a state traffic enforcement campaign.

The video showed that Strong was calm, albeit surprised, when told he was wanted for felony check forgery and about to be taken to jail. At the same time, Richfield officer Amanda Johnson and the others remained polite throughout and apologetic once the mistaken identity was cleared up.

"Shoot," Johnson said while reviewing the warrant information as Strong sat behind her. "This might be the wrong guy. ... Yep, exact same name."

Another officer retrieved Strong's identification from the car as he gave police his Social Security number and said he doesn't write checks.

"That guy has a tattoo on his neck," Johnson said in reference to the actual at-large felony suspect.

"So sorry," she said to Strong.

He replied: "I appreciate your kindness."

"You are free to go," she said. "I am sorry. ... Have a better day."

Richfield Police Lt. Brad Drayna said the video showed that "it was a very cordial encounter. It was a very professional traffic stop."

Drayna said that despite the check accurately showing that Strong had a warrant out for his arrest in connection with a 2019 speeding ticket, Johnson chose let him drive off because she "felt sorry for putting him in the back of her squad car." She also didn't cite him for going more than 15 mph over the 35 mph limit, Drayna said.

Strong, a prominent figure in the Twin Cities dance community, is a performer, choreographer and instructor who was awarded a $40,000 Jerome Foundation fellowship last year. The fiancé and father of a 1-year-old who lives in Burnsville said in his video that all of the officers approached his car with "their guns out. [I] stuck my hands out the damn car."

However, video showed only Johnson with her gun out and down at her side. She put it back in the holster once she arrived at his driver's window.

Addressing why Johnson had her gun drawn, the Richfield police statement explained that it's justified because of "the high-risk nature of arresting individuals with felony-level warrants."

Once cuffed and in the back of the squad car, Strong's posting continued, "I'm shaking. ... I don't know what they gonna do to me when this door closes. ... George Floyd came to my head, I ain't gonna lie. He came to my head thinking about ... when they put him in the back and they was doing all kinds of things to him."

Police apologize for man's arrest

He said he questioned the officers about why - as he contended - they had their guns drawn, and was told he was under arrest and would have his vehicle towed because he was wanted for check forgery. However, the video didn't reveal any question like that from Strong.

"Once again, George Floyd popped into my head," his Facebook posting recounted.

Floyd, unarmed and handcuffed, died while in police detention on May 25 at a south Minneapolis intersection. Police were called there on a store clerk's suspicion that Floyd was trying to pass a counterfeit $20 bill.

Once confirmed that Strong was not a wanted felon, the tow truck was canceled about 12 minutes after the stop began, according to emergency dispatch audio, and police let him out of the squad car and took off the handcuffs.

"A Black man traveling in these suburban communities ... it could have ended in a whole different route," Strong said in his posting.

The police statement noted that "this was no doubt a stressful and emotional experience for Mr. Strong. While they were doing their jobs based on what they knew at the time of the traffic stop, officers regret the stress Mr. Strong felt."

The statement added that all three departments will "make sure Mr. Strong's record is cleared and will continue to have important conversations in our communities regarding police-citizen encounters and how they need to reflect the best of all involved."

Paul Walsh · 612-673-4482

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

ARTICLE MCLXXVI.

A TROUBLED BLOCK CALLS FOR HELP

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 14, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1249 wordsByline: LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Until recently, Iglan Ahmed hadn't seriously considered moving from the 2900 block of S. 18th Avenue.

But when a 12-year-old boy shoved a handgun in her face during a robbery attempt outside her south Minneapolis home, the mother of eight decided that she'd had enough.

"I'm scared for my life," Ahmed said of the troubled block just north of Lake Street, which she says has turned into a haven for drug dealing and prostitution. "If no one is doing anything, there's no way for me to live in this neighborhood."

Ahmed and her neighbors say the block has become even less of a priority for police and City Hall after the unrest that followed George Floyd's death in police custody, leading to calls to reimagine policing in the city. They say it's one reason the area stands out as the city's most notorious open-air drug market. And while some sympathize with the long-term goals of the "Defund MPD" movement, they say they're facing a number of other issues that require more immediate attention.

Like the surrounding East Phillips neighborhood - which is 84% people of color - the block is home to many working-class families from Latin America and East Africa.

Drugs, gangs and prostitution have long been prevalent, and last month the area was battered by rioting and looting that spread through the South Side after Floyd died. Located in the Third Precinct, East Phillips also saw violent crime jump about 16% in the decade between 2010 and 2019.

Ahmed and others say the block feels isolated from E. Lake Street, the area's main commercial drag. But it's far from quiet, with dealers openly peddling bags of marijuana and heroin in the middle of the street, day and night. Vehicles pull up like customers at a drive-through, with drug users sometimes getting high in front yards and porches. The stench of urine is overpowering in some places. And employees of a nearby day-care center start each day by sweeping their playground for used syringes and condoms that may have been dumped there the night before.

A TROUBLED BLOCK CALLS FOR HELP

"Before everything with George Floyd, we had been calling the police and asking for their help, but unfortunately the only thing that the Police Department was willing to do or able to do was just driving down the block to say, 'You've gotta keep moving,' " said Jeremy Gray, a block captain.

Minneapolis police spokesman John Elder said police are aware of the ongoing crime and have added patrols and been in contact with neighbors.

"The MPD has long supported neighborhood watch and neighborhood watch patrols for those who wish to do it," he said.

In an e-mail to residents, Kali Pliego, a crime prevention specialist for the Third Precinct, said she was "sincerely concerned" after visiting the block recently and promised to station a mobile police camera nearby when one came available.

"Status quo is not serving your families justice," Pliego wrote. "I want to help, but am not in the position to be able to offer more police resources at the moment. 911 calls will be answered, but temporarily, we cannot count on directed patrols or other proactive measures."

What sometimes gets lost in the post-Floyd conversation around policing is that communities blighted by poverty and neglect are also often deprived of "effective policing," said criminologist Rod Brunson.

"It's not an either-or: It's the combination of under- and over-policing that occurs simultaneously that undermines police effectiveness and police legitimacy," said Brunson, a professor at Northeastern University's school of criminology and criminal justice, noting that "extreme calls for abolishing police altogether" would prove "dire" for people in high-crime areas.

On the day of the attempted robbery, Ahmed said she was sitting in her car behind her house and glanced up to find two youngsters armed with handguns. They demanded she hand over her car keys and wallet. One of the youths stuck a gun in her face as he tried to grab Ahmed's phone, letting off a shot in the air that startled her. Ahmed wasn't injured, but she says the episode left her shaken.

Council Member Alondra Cano, who represents the area, said that she is "equally unsatisfied with the current system" of policing that has alienated residents while failing to put a dent in the area's problems. For years, she says, the department's focus was on cracking down on low-level offenses like public urination while allowing more serious crimes to flourish. Cano, who has supported dismantling the Police Department, says a harm-reduction approach is needed to address the area's problems.

"It's been really frustrating for me in that MPD hasn't been able to deliver results on that front," she said.

But neighbors said that Cano has been equally unresponsive to their pleas for help, and that calls to her office often go unreturned.

Minneapolis may yet serve as a national model for a new approach to public safety, but not if it doesn't first "protect its most vulnerable citizens," according to Sarah Lageson, an assistant professor at the School of Criminal Justice at Rutgers University-Newark.

Like her neighbors, Devika Ghai sees the block's problems as a symptom of general neglect by city leaders, but she isn't convinced that more police are the answer. After Floyd's death, she said, much of the country woke up to the reality that its "Black and brown" citizens have long known: a public safety system that has touted justice for all but rarely delivered.

A TROUBLED BLOCK CALLS FOR HELP

"There just isn't any political will to address any fundamental issues here, which is people don't have housing, people don't have dignified employment and people are criminalized over and over again, so people end up in criminalized industries," Ghai said. "I think the problem is that there've been so few alternatives for so long."

After months of frustration, some residents have banded together to take back the block. They set up private WhatsApp groups to share photos and videos of illegal activity and later began round-the-clock monitoring while wearing yellow T-shirts that read "Neighborhood Watch" on the front and "Security" on the back. Some started carrying guns. Then in the past few days, they blocked off both ends of the street with metal barriers and garbage bins filled with concrete to cut down on speeders who used to fly down the block.

Since then, neighbors say they've enjoyed their first stretch of quiet nights in months, but some doubt the uneasy calm can last long without help from police or Cano.

Residents say that some police officers have shown an interest in their plight, like the sergeant who helped defuse a tense standoff Wednesday between locals and a city worker, who showed up to remove the fencing. The sergeant eventually negotiated an agreement that allowed residents to keep the barriers up, so long as they could guarantee a path for ambulances and other emergency vehicles.

Abdi Hassan, who works for the state Pollution Control Agency, says things got so bad that some neighbors were afraid to use their front doors out of fear of being harassed by dealers, who seem emboldened by the lack of police presence. A few weeks ago, Hassan said he decided to move his wife and two young kids into his mother's house in the south suburbs.

"We told them about the encampment and the drugs and the vacant house," said Hassan, adding that he's left numerous messages with Cano about an abandoned house on the block that seems to attract trouble, to no avail. "Cops don't help, nobody helps - we don't know where to go."

Libor Jany · 612-673-4064

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

Vacant Kmart could be a temporary post office

ARTICLE MCLXXVII.

VACANT KMART COULD BE A TEMPORARY POST OFFICE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 14, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 2B

Length: 275 words

Byline: JANET MOORE; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

Minneapolis officials on Tuesday will consider leasing the vacant Kmart store on Lake Street to the U.S. Postal Service for use as a temporary post office.

Two post offices near Lake Street were destroyed in the unrest following the death of George Floyd. The post office owns the property at 110 E. 31st St., on which it plans to rebuild, and will renew a lease at 3033 S. 27th Av. once that site is reconstructed, according to a city memo.

The Postal Service needs a temporary location during the 12 to 24 months it will take to rebuild, the memo said. A mobile truck has been deployed in the Kmart parking lot at 10 W. Lake St. over the past month to help fill the void for south Minneapolis customers.

The Kmart was already scheduled to shutter by June 30 after the city bought out its lease, but the riots following the May 25 police killing of George Floyd accelerated its closure.

The lease agreement with the city calls for the Postal Service to pay $30,416 a month in rent beginning Aug. 1. The city-owned property has been eyed for redevelopment, but the memo states the temporary arrangement won't affect those plans.

The Postal Service needs a loading dock and about 184 parking spaces for employees, delivery vehicles and customers. Costs to prepare the site will be covered by the Postal Service, but the city will pay for outdoor property maintenance, such as snow removal, and for maintaining building systems. These costs will be capped at $365,000 annually.

The City Council's Business, Inspections & Zoning Committee will consider the matter on Tuesday. Postal Service officials were not immediately available for comment Monday.

JANET MOORE

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

Vacant Kmart could be a temporary post office

End of Document

ARTICLE MCLXXVIII.

VETERANS MAKE PUSH FOR SPECIAL COURTS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 14, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 2BLength: 797 wordsByline: REID FORGRAVE; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: They want law for venue to keep vets out of prison.Body

When Tony Miller returned to Minnesota in 2008 after two tours in Iraq, the Army veteran wasn't right. Military buddies were dying by suicide. He didn't like how his antipsychotic medications made him feel, so he smoked marijuana instead. He was filled with anger, and he vented that anger as a bouncer at a Twin Cities hockey pub. When a bar patron acted out, Miller could beat him up.

It was 2015 when Miller was arrested on drug charges. His attorney helped get him into veterans court, a new concept in Hennepin County that helped give veterans a second chance. Instead of prison, the alternative court instituted another plan. Miller had to stay sober and keep regular therapy appointments at the Minneapolis VA Health Care System, where he worked through his traumatic experiences in Iraq. Five years later, Miller, 37 and living in Bloomington, is about to start at the University of St. Thomas to get his master's social work. After graduation, he wants to do counseling work at the VA.

Now Miller's anger is directed at state politicians. For two years in a row, legislation to expand veterans courts throughout greater Minnesota has stalled in the Republican-controlled Senate. In a last-ditch effort to get it passed this year, veterans organizations are increasing pressure on legislators to pass a bill during this week's special session.

The partisan politics that has stalled the bill is "a slap in the face to veterans," Miller said. "I pray that this will pass." But he also realizes "coronavirus is completely overshadowing every other issue we have."

Gov. Tim Walz called this week's special session to extend the COVID-19 peacetime emergency order by 30 days, and he has urged the Legislature to pass a "robust" capital investment package as well as police reform and assistance for businesses hurt by civil unrest following George Floyd's death in May.

Veterans advocates frame the bill as fitting into this moment, since it is both an alternative form of criminal justice and a cost-saver as COVID-19 has ravaged state finances.

Veterans make push for special courts

The Veterans Restorative Justice Act hasn't made it out of committee in the Senate during the past two legislative sessions, despite legislators on both sides claiming to support the bill that would keep veterans who have committed lower-level criminal offenses out of prison.

The fiscal note attached to the legislation says that had the bill been enacted at the end of the 2019 session, the state would already have saved $422,000 by lower incarceration costs, and $1.3 million by June 2021.

"It costs the state's taxpayers money every day this bill does not pass," said Tommy Johnson, a veterans advocate with the VFW Post in Hopkins.

Parties differ on why the bill has yet to pass.

Republicans say it's a simple question of the Legislature being overwhelmed with COVID-19 concerns. Republican Sen. Roger Chamberlain, R-Lino Lakes, a military veteran, who says he supports the bill, believes it would have passed this session if it weren't for COVID-19 and George Floyd's killing. This week's limited, narrow special session is not the time for a bill like this, he said.

"That's not what this special session is going to be," said Chamberlain, who added he will support the bill in 2021. "There's always next year."

But DFL politicians claim partisan politics is preventing a bipartisan bill supported by national veterans organizations from immediately passing.

"In the 10 years I've been in the Legislature, this was the worst session for political partisanship I've ever seen," said Sen. Jerry Newton, DFL-Coon Rapids, the ranking minority member of the Veterans and Military Affairs Finance and Policy Committee. "But generally with issues regarding veterans, that doesn't happen."

This version of the bill would be limited to veterans with service-related disorders facing low-level felony charges (no more severe than a level 7 criminal offense), and only if the defendant claims the offense was connected to military service. In 2019, 6% of offenders incarcerated in a Minnesota correctional facility self-reported that they were veterans.

For Jeff Johnson, a 70-year-old retired Army major from Shoreview, every day the Legislature waits is a mistake.

Johnson credits the Ramsey County Sheriff's Office and the veterans court for saving his life. Johnson had been bedridden and sick for six years - back and balance issues, nerve surgeries, stress - when in 2017 he called 911, intending to commit "suicide by cop." Instead, deputies shot him with nonlethal beanbags. Veterans court directed him to an inpatient treatment program at the St. Cloud VA Health Care System. He now feels better than any time in his adult life.

"This bill has been up twice," Johnson said. "It's been a political football enough."

Reid Forgrave · 612-673-4647

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

Veterans make push for special courts

End of Document

$1.35 billion bonding bill, tax cuts advance at Minnesota Capitol

ARTICLE MCLXXIX.

\$1.35 BILLION BONDING BILL, TAX CUTS ADVANCE AT MINNESOTA CAPITOL

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 14, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 795 words

Byline: Dana Ferguson, Sarah Mearhoff

Highlight: The Minnesota Ways and Means Committee on Tuesday advanced a public jobs and projects bill complete with $1.35 billion in plans to update wastewater infrastructure, rebuild roads and bridges and fund improvements to university classrooms and labs. On a 18-10 party-line vote, Democrats on the panel passed the proposal that came with an attachment to [...]

Body

The Minnesota Ways and Means Committee on Tuesday advanced a public jobs and projects bill complete with $1.35 billion in plans to update wastewater infrastructure, rebuild roads and bridges and fund improvements to university classrooms and labs.

On a 18-10 party-line vote, Democrats on the panel passed the proposal that came with an attachment to conform the state's tax code with federal tax laws, ending a disparity that forced small business owners and farmers to immediately pay income taxes for the financial gain they saw after trading in equipment or machinery.

Republicans on the committee objected to the combination of two major pieces of legislation, calling the plan a "huge garbage bill" and said they weren't involved in the deal's crafting. Their objection signals likely trouble ahead as the bill moves to the House floor.

A supermajority in each chamber would have to approve the bill to greenlight the state's issuing of bonds to fund the projects. And that means Republicans who hold a minority in the House and Democrats who hold a minority in the Senate hold a key role in deciding whether a bonding bill could advance.

House Speaker Melissa Hortman, D-Brooklyn Park, and Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, R-East Gull Lake, on Monday said they'd come close to brokering a deal on the bonding and tax bill that could win over majority caucuses in each chamber. But the minority caucus leaders said they weren't in those discussions and weren't ready to approve the bill.

"Members, this bill's not going anywhere. You don't have the votes to pass it," Rep. Greg Davids, R-Preston, said. "It's becoming a huge garbage bill."

$1.35 billion bonding bill, tax cuts advance at Minnesota Capitol

Despite the protests from GOP lawmakers on the committee, Democrats said the bill was critical to creating jobs and boosting the state's economy after the COVID-19 pandemic, state response and civil unrest following George Floyd's death cratered Minnesota's economic outlook.

"This is what people around the state are looking for; not excuses," House Tax Committee Chair Paul Marquart, D-Dilworth, said. "We have an excellent chance right now to give our economy a boost in really fragile times."

The package includes \$1.35 billion in general obligation bonds, $300 million in trunk highway bonds, $147 million in appropriation bonds and $38 million cash. The full $1.8 billion proposal will pay for a variety of construction, transportation, housing and infrastructure projects around the state that legislators say could bring online more than 27,000 jobs.

The Public Facilities Authority would receive the largest chunk of general obligation bonds: $254 million, set to be split among municipal governments whose time is running out to replace or repair aging wastewater infrastructure. The state Department of Transportation would spend the most out of any agency on infrastructure construction and improvements - $323 million - but would take out $300 million in trunk highway bonds to do it.

The 180-page bill also recommends $150 million to the state Department of Employment and Economic Development, $96 million to the Department of Natural Resources, $82 million to Minnesota State colleges and universities, $80 million to the Metropolitan Council, $75 million to the University of Minnesota, $50 million to the Department of Public Safety, $44 million to the Department of Corrections, and more.

Members of the panel, both Democrats and Republicans, voiced concerns about taking out another $300 million in trunk highway bonds. And Republicans said they hadn't been adequately consulted in crafting the bill.

The House panel also advanced to the floor a $58 million supplemental state budget complete with funding for overtime payments for corrections officers, payments for State Patrol members deployed to monitor the civil unrest in the Twin Cities following Floyd's death, boost funding to personal care attendants and families on the Minnesota Family Investment Program, test rape kits and increase funding for veteran suicide and homelessness prevention initiatives.

The additional spending was offset by freezes in state hiring.

And a slate of proposed criminal justice and police accountability reforms again cleared the committee, with Democrats supporting them and Republicans opposing them. Marquart voted with Republicans in opposition. Negotiations on policing law changes failed in a June special session. Walz calls special session next week to consider 30-day extension of pandemic powers Minnesota's primary is Tuesday. Here are key east metro races to watch. Voters, GOP lawmakers plan lawsuit over Walz's mask mandate at polling places State Patrol cancels police academy class 'due to lack of funding' Minnesota will close 2 prisons to prepare for budget shortfall. Other agencies face holes, too.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

$1.35 billion bonding bill, tax cuts advance at Minnesota Capitol

End of Document

ARTICLE MCLXXX. ACKERBERG RENAMES LAKE CALHOUN CENTER

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

July 14, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 229 wordsByline: Nick HalterBody

The Lake Calhoun Center office building is getting a new name, joining a move away from the Calhoun moniker by several property owners in the area.

Owner Ackerberg, which also has its headquarters in the building on the north end of Bde Maka Ska, announced it would change the name to Lakeside Center.

In 2018, the state of Minnesota, at the request of the Minneapolis Park and Recreation Board, renamed Lake Calhoun as Bde Maka Ska. John C. Calhoun was vice president of the United States from 1825 to 1832 and later a U.S. Senator. He was one of the foremost defenders of slavery.

"While it's important to not erase history as there are so many critical lessons to be learned, we also can no longer be connected with an individual whose views on equality and humanity are rooted in ignorance." Ackerberg CEO Stuart Ackerberg said in a news release.

Ackerberg renames Lake Calhoun Center

The movement away from the Calhoun name has come in the wake of the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police. Other prominent buildings have also ditched the Calhoun name in recent months, including Calhoun Square and Calhoun Beach Club.

In February, St. Louis Park-based Bader Development quietly renamed Calhoun Towers at 3430 List Place to West Lake Quarter, according to a company spokesperson.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCLXXXI.

FROM OUR BLOGS: RANDBALL

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 14, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 3CLength: 659 wordsByline: MICHAEL RAND; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: This regretful chapter is finally closedBody

Washington's NFL team announced Monday that it is getting rid of its offensive and racist Redskins nickname - a move that feels entirely in the moment, entirely decades too late and entirely like it would never happen, all at the same time.

The moment, of course, is a collective and wholly necessary re-evaluation of race, history and privilege being undertaken in this country (and really this world) - much of it touched off after the Memorial Day killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis.

Since the economy is often a driver when it comes to elevating a collective consciousness beyond mere thought, this particular moment also came to bear with hundreds of billions of dollars at stake and Washington's football organization under pressure to act.

The timing? Well, I remember circulating a petition - along with my longtime best friend, who is Native American - while we were in junior high school that asked for support in changing the "Redskins" nickname of Grand Forks Central, the high school we were going to attend in a couple of years.

I'm fairly sure we created the petition on our own, on a typewriter, and went door to door asking people to sign. I'm not entirely sure what we did with the signatures or how many we got. I remember one woman calling me "Paleface." And I remember that a couple of years later Grand Forks Central did, in fact, change the nickname - eventually to Knights.

That was more than a quarter-century ago. There was plenty of resistance, plenty of false equivalence, plenty of insistence that the nickname was an honor and not a slur. And yes, there were a lot of "Redskins Forever" shirts and caps made, many of which are probably now gathering dust in Grand Forks basements - the same ones, perhaps, that also still contain remnants of the University of North Dakota's "Fighting Sioux" logo and nickname, retired eight years ago.

So it is absurd to think a process undertaken a generation ago by a high school in a state not known for its bastion of liberal viewpoints is now just being started by the most visible professional sports team in our nation's capital.

FROM OUR BLOGS: RANDBALL

But here we are: At a place we so obviously should have arrived a long time ago but one team owner Daniel Snyder promised just seven years ago would NEVER arrive.

Should an organization get to take a victory lap for finally doing the right thing decades too late after being backed into a financial corner? Nope.

We can acknowledge this is better than not doing it. That's about it. But hold your applause, and feel free to keep your arms folded.

Because we also had better acknowledge this: A lot of us accepted the nickname as part of the NFL, even if it made us uncomfortable. And in that way, a lot of us are complicit. I know I've held my nose and used it in things I've written or said - accepting the status quo. And I sure never circulated or signed any petitions to get rid of it, even if that's what I believed was right.

Racism is not merely the problem of the afflicted or the truly vile. It persists when those of us who know better and believe we think better don't speak and act against it. And in that way it is everyone's problem.

Along those lines, gestures like toppling statues and removing nicknames are notable, but they are not nearly enough. This is a signpost, not an endpoint when it comes to the work that must be done - and undone - as all of us in positions of privilege grapple with the world around us that has largely been created for our benefit and with our implied consent.

Racism is so ingrained in society that it often masquerades as normal. More of us need to be more consistent and true allies in the fight against it - recognizing that racism is not a moment but a system.

The fact that Washington changing its racist nickname in 2020 still registers as a surprise and a major event should tell us a lot about how long the journey ahead still is.

Read Michael Rand's blog at startribune.com/randball.

michael.rand@startribune.com

Load-Date: July 14, 2020

ARTICLE MCLXXXII.

LAWMAKERS CLASH OVER POWERS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 14, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 929 wordsByline: JESSIE VAN BERKEL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Disagreement about Walz's extension threatens action on infrastructure spendingBody

Minnesota lawmakers returned to the State Capitol on Monday hoping to resolve continuing partisan differences on police accountability, a major public works package and several tax and spending measures.

But first they faced off over Gov. Tim Walz's decision to extend his emergency powers for another 30 days to respond to the coronavirus pandemic, a move that prompted the second legislative session of the summer, just four months ahead of the November elections.

As expected, the Republican-led Senate quickly passed a resolution to rescind the DFL governor's emergency powers, which have become entangled in negotiations over police reform and a massive infrastructure borrowing package. The vote was 36-31, with only one lawmaker, DFL Sen. Kent Eken, DFL-Twin Valley, crossing party lines.

The DFL-controlled House is unlikely to follow suit, leaving Walz's pandemic decrees intact at least through the middle of August.

Democratic House Speaker Melissa Hortman said she believes the governor's emergency powers are critical as COVID-19 cases rise nationally, a trend that has prompted intensifying national debates about face masks and opening schools in the fall.

Minnesota Republicans argued that even as the pandemic continues, the state of emergency passed.

"The emergency part of the pandemic is over," said Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, R-East Gull Lake, contending that the state acted quickly during the onset of the virus and now has the needed precautions in place.

But Hortman pointed to the spike in Southern states like Texas, where refrigerated trucks are needed to store bodies because morgues are at capacity. "We have to very seriously consider what it could be in the future for Minnesotans," she said. "So the emergency is in no respects over."

Lawmakers clash over powers

Walz characterized the COVID-19 pandemic as an evolving emergency.

"The peacetime emergency has provided us tools to save lives and mitigate the devastating impacts of this pandemic," he said in a statement Monday extending his emergency powers. "As cases skyrocket in other states, we can't let our guard down now."

Every state but Wisconsin has some type of ongoing emergency order to deal with COVID-19, according to National Governors Association data from July 1.

The disagreement over emergency powers continues to threaten action on the infrastructure financing package known as the bonding bill. Long-term state borrowing requires supermajorities in both chambers to pass. GOP House Minority Leader Kurt Daudt has said his caucus will withhold its support for the bonding bill unless Walz relinquishes his emergency powers. That has put him at odds with both Gazelka and Hortman, who say the two issues should not be linked.

Hortman said she pressed Daudt again on the bonding bill Monday morning, but added, "I don't think he's there yet." Daudt made no public comment on the bill Monday.

Legislators are considering more than $1.8 billion in borrowing and spending to support state and local repair and improvement projects, Hortman said. That includes $1.35 billion in general obligation bonds, $300 million in highway bonds, $147 million in appropriation bonds - $100 million of which would be used for housing - and another $38 million in cash.

Bonding discussions also are tied to deal for a GOP tax relief bill for farmers and businesses, as well as to a $58 million spending package that includes some of Democrats' supplemental spending priorities.

While legislative leaders said they are close to a deal on bonding, they remain deep in negotiations over police reforms. Lawmakers on both sides proposed a slate of police accountability measures following the Minneapolis police killing of George Floyd on May 25, an incident that sparked global protests and a national examination of race and social justice.

While a special session in June failed to produce any agreement, lawmakers on both sides said they are still talking, though largely out of public view.

"We have not stopped working on that since the end of last special session," Gazelka said. "It feels like there's real progress that has been happening there."

Among the more contentious proposals are new statewide use-of-force regulations, a plan to spend $15 million on alternatives to policing, new arbitration rules for officers facing dismissal, and reforms to the Minnesota Board of Peace Officer Standards and Training. Both Hortman and Gazelka declined to specify particular areas where they have made progress or struck agreements since the last special session ended on June 20.

Gazelka said legislative leaders will continue closed-door negotiations, with the full Senate not planning to reconvene until Wednesday or next Monday, depending on action in the House. Meanwhile, House Democrats planned to advance police reform and bonding proposals in the House Ways and Means Committee on Tuesday.

Discussions of Walz's emergency powers Monday often centered on reopening Minnesota schools in the next school year. Walz has said he will make a decision about schools on July 27. Republican senators said they want schools to reopen and allow local school boards and administrators to make decisions about how to manage COVID-19.

Lawmakers clash over powers

"Some members seem to think that one person has somehow the ability to understand what 300 school districts face," Sen. Carla Nelson, R-Rochester, said.

Democrats also expressed a desire to open schools. "But we have to do it a way that's safe," said Senate Minority Leader Susan Kent, DFL-Woodbury, noting that the needed precautions could be expensive and complicated.

Jessie Van Berkel · 651-925-5044

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

End of Document

George Floyd's family sues Minneapolis officers charged in his death

ARTICLE MCLXXXIII.

GEORGE FLOYD'S FAMILY SUES MINNEAPOLIS OFFICERS CHARGED IN HIS DEATH

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 766 words

Byline: Amy Forliti

Highlight: George Floyd's family filed a lawsuit Wednesday against the city of Minneapolis and the four police officers charged in his death, alleging the officers violated Floyd's rights when they restrained him and that the city allowed a culture of excessive force, racism and impunity to flourish in its police force. The civil rights lawsuit, filed [...]

Body

George Floyd's family filed a lawsuit Wednesday against the city of Minneapolis and the four police officers charged in his death, alleging the officers violated Floyd's rights when they restrained him and that the city allowed a culture of excessive force, racism and impunity to flourish in its police force.

The civil rights lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in Minnesota, was announced by attorney Ben Crump and other lawyers representing Floyd's family members. It seeks compensatory and special damages in an amount to be determined by a jury. It also asks for a receiver to be appointed to ensure that the city properly trains and supervises officers in the future.

"This complaint shows what we have said all along, that Mr. Floyd died because the weight of the entire Minneapolis Police Department was on his neck," Crump said in a statement. "The City of Minneapolis has a history of policies, procedures and deliberate indifference that violates the rights of arrestees, particularly Black men, and highlights the need for officer training and discipline."

Crump said the lawsuit seeks to set a precedent "that makes it financially prohibitive for police to wrongfully kill marginalized people - especially Black people - in the future."

Mayor Jacob Frey's office said he couldn't comment on pending litigation. Interim City Attorney Erik Nilsson said the city is reviewing the lawsuit and will respond to it.

Floyd, a Black man who was handcuffed, died May 25 after Derek Chauvin, a white police officer, pressed his knee against Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes as Floyd said he couldn't breathe. Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and manslaughter. Three other officers at the scene - Tou Thao, Thomas Lane and J. Kueng - are charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and manslaughter. They have been fired from the police department.

George Floyd's family sues Minneapolis officers charged in his death

The lawsuit came on the same day that a court allowed public viewing by appointment of video from the body cameras of Lane and Kueng. A coalition of news organizations and attorneys for Lane and Kueng have been advocating to make the videos public, saying they would provide a more complete picture of what happened. The judge hasn't said why he's not allowing the video to be disseminated more widely.

The lawsuit takes issue with police policies and training. It says that even though neck restraints can be deadly, the police department allowed them to be used in situations in which deadly force wasn't warranted.

After Floyd's death, Police Chief Medaria Arradondo said the type of restraint Chauvin had used wasn't authorized, and the department banned chokeholds and neck restraints in the days following Floyd's death.

The lawsuit also contends that the city acted with "deliberate indifference" when it came to allowing police to use excessive force. It says the city ratified practices that allowed officers to treat Black community members differently and it fostered a culture in which officers weren't penalized for bad actions.

"It really is about trying to change the culture and behavior of policing," Crump said at a news conference. "We would have hope that George Floyd did not have to sacrifice his life to bring about these changes. But now we are here, and we are at a tipping point."

The families of victims of other high-profile police shootings have received high payouts in Minnesota.

Last year, Minneapolis agreed to pay $20 million to the family of Justine Ruszczyk Damond, an unarmed woman who was shot by an officer after she called 911 to report hearing a possible crime happening behind her home. The settlement came three days after the officer, Mohamed Noor, was convicted of murdering her and is believed to be the largest payout ever stemming from police violence in Minnesota.

At the time, Frey cited Noor's unprecedented conviction and his failure to identify a threat before he used deadly force as reasons for the large settlement.

The mother of Philando Castile, a black motorist killed by an officer in 2016, reached a nearly $3 million settlement with the suburb of St. Anthony, which employed Jeronimo Yanez, who was acquitted of manslaughter and other charges. Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Graphic

A combination of booking photos of former Minneapolis police officers Derek Chauvin, center, Tou Thao, right, Thomas Lane, top left, and J Alexander Kueng, lower left. (Courtesy of Hennepin County sheriff's office)

George Floyd's family sues Minneapolis officers charged in his death

Crump wears a face mask with the words "Where's the love?" after announcing the filing of a civil lawsuit. (AP Photo/Jim Mone)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCLXXXIV.

LAWYERS ACCUSE ELLISON OF CONTEMPT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 674 wordsByline: CHAO XIONG; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: They say AG's news release violated gag order in George Floyd case.Body

Attorneys representing two former Minneapolis police officers charged with killing George Floyd accused Attorney General Keith Ellison of contempt of court: One asked him to be sanctioned and the other called for his arrest.

Earl Gray, who is representing Thomas Lane, and Robert Paule, who is representing Tou Thao, filed separate motions Tuesday objecting to Ellison issuing a news release Monday about the case after Judge Peter Cahill issued a gag order prohibiting either side from discussing such matters.

Ellison announced Monday that he had appointed four veteran attorneys as special assistant attorneys general on the Floyd case and listed their professional accomplishments.

"Ellison should be jailed along with" his spokesman John Stiles, Gray wrote. "There is no reason to announce that these so called 'super stars' are joining the prosecution and that they're doing it for free. It is an obvious statement to the public that these 'super stars' believe that our clients are guilty."

Tensions between the prosecution and defense have been escalating for more than a month as Ellison and several public officials spoke out about the killing of Floyd, a 46-year-old Black man who died May 25 after former officer Derek Chauvin knelt on his neck for nearly 8 minutes while Floyd said he couldn't breathe.

"We have no response," Ellison's office said in a written statement Tuesday.

Paule and Gray asked to be heard about the issue at a yet-to-be determined hearing.

"Defendant ... respectfully moves the Court for an order holding Keith Ellison ... in contempt of court and ordering sanctions as a result of his actions," read Paule's motion.

The judge is unlikely to sanction or have Ellison and Stiles arrested, said Joseph Daly, professor emeritus at Mitchell Hamline School of Law. He'll likely issue a warning or clarify his gag order, Daly added.

"Judges do not like to sanction lawyers unless their conduct is outrageous," he said. "This gag order is unclear."

Ellison's office is leading the prosecution of Chauvin, Thao, Lane and former officer J. Alexander Kueng with assistance from the Hennepin County Attorney's Office.

Ellison sent out his news release Monday after some of the defense attorneys filed motions earlier that day objecting to the order and protesting prior remarks made by Ellison and other public officials.

"Out of respect for Judge Cahill's gag order, I will say simply that I've put together an exceptional team with experience and expertise across many disciplines," Ellison said in the news release.

In his motion, Gray said Ellison's move was intentional.

"Further proof that the news release was done to influence the public is that it was released by John Stiles, who, according to Google, is a chief strategy officer and builds reputations and brands," Gray's motion said.

Cahill issued his order last week prohibiting attorneys from publicly divulging "opinions, strategies, plans or potential evidence."

All four former officers' attorneys filed motions Monday objecting to the order.

Their separate motions argued that the order violated constitutional rights to due process, free speech and a fair trial, and that it unfairly penalized the defense after prosecutors and public officials had spent weeks criticizing the former officers' actions.

Cahill warned at a June hearing that remarks from public officials, attorneys and others were threatening to prompt the court to move the trial or trials to another county because of the possibility of biasing potential jurors.

Chauvin is charged with one count each of second-degree murder, third-degree manslaughter and second-degree manslaughter. The other three are charged with aiding and abetting murder and manslaughter.

Civil rights attorney Ben Crump, who is representing the Floyd family, planned to hold a news conference Wednesday morning in front of the federal courthouse in Minneapolis to announce a lawsuit against the city of Minneapolis and the officers involved. Details of the lawsuit were not disclosed.

Chao Xiong · 612-270-4708

Twitter: @ChaoStrib

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

'I'm not a bad guy': Police video captures a distraught George Floyd

ARTICLE MCLXXXV.

'I'M NOT A BAD GUY': POLICE VIDEO CAPTURES A DISTRAUGHT GEORGE FLOYD

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1003 words

Byline: Steve Karnowski, Doug Glass

Highlight: The footage, which has been blocked from publication by a judge, shows a panicked and fearful Floyd pleading with officers in the minutes before his death.

Body

Body-camera footage made public Wednesday from two Minneapolis police officers involved in George Floyd's arrest captured a panicked and fearful Floyd pleading with the officers in the minutes before his death, saying "I'm not a bad guy!" as they tried to wrestle him into a squad car.

"I'm not that kind of guy," Floyd says as he struggles against the officers. "I just had COVID, man, I don't want to go back to that." An onlooker pleads with Floyd to stop struggling, saying, "You can't win!" Floyd replies, "I don't want to win!"

A few minutes later, with Floyd now facedown on the street, the cameras record his fading voice, still occasionally saying, "I can't breathe" before he goes still.

Though transcripts of the footage were released earlier, the video itself is the fullest public view yet of Floyd's interaction with the officers who were later charged in his death. It also captures an apparent lack of urgency to render aid to Floyd for long minutes after he stopped moving.

The recordings from Officers Thomas Lane and J. Kueng are part of the criminal case against them and two other officers in Floyd's May 25 death. Derek Chauvin, who held his knee against Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes, is charged with second-degree murder. Lane, Kueng and another officer, Tou Thao, are charged with aiding and abetting. All four officers were fired the day after Floyd died.

Journalists and members of the public were allowed to view the footage Wednesday by appointment. Judge Peter Cahill, without explanation, has declined to allow publication of the video.

The footage shows the officers' view of a death already widely seen on a bystander's cellphone video, which set off tumultuous protests in Minneapolis that quickly spread around the world and sparked a national reckoning on race and policing.

'I'm not a bad guy': Police video captures a distraught George Floyd

Floyd appears distraught from the moment officers ask him to step out of his vehicle near a south Minneapolis corner grocery, where he was suspected of passing a counterfeit $20 bill. When Floyd did not immediately display his hands, Lane pulled his gun, leading Floyd to say he had been shot before.

Floyd's hands are soon handcuffed behind his back, and he grows more anxious, telling the officers that he's claustrophobic and pleading with them not to put him in the back of a squad car.

In the struggle, Floyd loses a shoe. What appears to be Chauvin's chest-mounted body camera winds up underneath the squad car, and Floyd eventually winds up on the pavement with the officers holding him down.

Chauvin and Kueng each grip one of Floyd's handcuffed hands to hold them in position behind his back, with Kueng's knee appearing to press on Floyd's bottom or just below. Lane is at Floyd's feet.

The officers sound clinical as the minutes tick by. "I think he's passing out," one officer says. "You guys all right, though?" someone asks. "Yeah - good so far," says one. Another - apparently Lane - says: "My knee might be a little scratched, but I'll survive." Kueng reaches out with a free hand to pull a pebble from the police SUV's tire tread and toss it to the street.

Lane did not sound particularly worried the first time he asked Chauvin whether they should roll Floyd on his side and suggested that Floyd might be in delirium. People in the crowd can be heard expressing fear for Floyd's condition, asking whether he had a pulse and was breathing.

A couple of minutes later, Lane sounds a bit more concerned when he asks again about rolling Floyd onto his side. The officers go quiet but show no apparent urgency as Kueng checks for a pulse and says he cannot find one.

Lane's camera shows him following an unresponsive Floyd on a stretcher into an ambulance, where EMTs instructed him to perform CPR. The video shows Lane performing constant chest compressions by hand with no visible results.

The ambulance parks a few blocks away from the store for several minutes while Lane and the EMTs work on Floyd, rather than heading straight to the hospital, even though they all know that Floyd is in full cardiac arrest, as indicated by dispatcher audio.

Christine Hill, a spokeswoman for Hennepin County Medical Center, the hospital that provided the ambulance, said she could not talk specifically about Floyd's treatment because of medical privacy restrictions. But she said it is not unusual for paramedics to load a patient into an ambulance and move to a more secure location as they provide life-saving care.

A coalition of news organizations and attorneys for Lane and Kueng have said the court should allow the body-camera footage to be copied and published to provide a more complete picture of what happened when Floyd was taken into custody.

The viewing of the video took place on the same day Floyd family attorney Ben Crump was announcing a lawsuit against the city and the police officers involved in his death.

The body camera videos and transcripts were filed in court last week by Lane's attorney, Earl Gray, as part of a request to have Lane's case dismissed. Gray said at the time that he wanted the videos to be made public, telling the Star Tribune that they would show the "whole picture." Gray said the bystander video shows just the last piece of what happened and "is not fair."

'I'm not a bad guy': Police video captures a distraught George Floyd

Gray's request highlighted portions of the body camera video that show Floyd "actively resisting and acting erratic" with officers. It also noted Floyd's "request" to be put on the ground. Gray also argued that Lane did not have a clear view of what Chauvin was doing.

Kueng's attorney, Tom Plunkett, has also asked that the video be made public.

Associated Press Writer Amy Forliti contributed to this report. Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Graphic

George Floyd (Courtesy of Christopher Harris via AP)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis'

ARTICLE MCLXXXVI.

POLICE UNION LEADERS TELL MN SENATE: CITY LEADERS 'FAILED MINNEAPOLIS'

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 751 words

Byline: Dana Ferguson

Highlight: Union leaders representing fellow Minneapolis police officers on Wednesday said officers were prepared to give their lives to protect the city's Third Police Precinct before it was set ablaze in May, but police leaders told them to stand down and let demonstrators take it. The officers told Minnesota senators about their experiences responding to the [...]

Body

Union leaders representing fellow Minneapolis police officers on Wednesday said officers were prepared to give their lives to protect the city's Third Police Precinct before it was set ablaze in May, but police leaders told them to stand down and let demonstrators take it.

The officers told Minnesota senators about their experiences responding to the arsons and looting in Minneapolis that followed large protests after George Floyd's death while in police custody. They said extreme dips in morale are having profound impacts among their ranks.

The hearing was the latest held by a joint Minnesota Senate panel tasked with probing the damage that followed Floyd's death.

And in a four-hour hearing that focused on protesters' occupation of freeways and the police response to civil unrest in the Twin Cities, Republican lawmakers said they would bring legislation increasing penalties for demonstrating on freeways and call for answers from state and local leaders who they felt were responsible for the destruction.

Democrats on the panel, meanwhile, said lawmakers should focus on the issue that fueled civil unrest: the death of Floyd after now-former officer Derek Chauvin knelt on his neck.

Minneapolis Officer Rich Walker Sr. condemned Chauvin's actions and said the bad acts of a handful of officers shouldn't ruin the reputation of an entire department.

"The truth is the leaders of Minneapolis failed Minneapolis," Walker said. "We would've gave the ultimate sacrifice before we gave up our building."

Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis'

Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey said last month that he would "note that the governor has repeatedly stated no city could have handled a crisis of this magnitude without support from other jurisdictions, and the full mobilization of the Minnesota National Guard was necessary."

Officers had riot gear, but the Minneapolis police union said officers were asked not to wear it so as to not inflame tensions. And that caused injuries as demonstrators lobbed bottles, rocks and other projectiles, according to the union.

"We could've defended that precinct, we could've defended that part of Lake Street if we had the resources," said Sgt. Anna Hedberg, who, along with Walker, are Minneapolis Police Federation directors.

The Department of Public Safety last week told the panel that the state was preparing to activate hundreds of National Guard members to assist officers in Minneapolis. But efforts to scale up forces to the extent necessary took days.

The state took control of the situation in Minneapolis on May 29, deploying more than 7,000 National Guard members, the largest operation since World War II.

The panel also took testimony Wednesday about hundreds of demonstrators spilling onto freeways on May 31.

State Patrol Col. Matt Langer said troopers went into "triage" mode that day as two protests at U.S. Bank Stadium and the Capitol grew in size. They, along with the Department of Transportation, moved to close highways before the planned time of 8 p.m. to prevent dangerous situations for demonstrators or drivers.

"Whenever there's a breach of the freeway by a group that wishes to demonstrate or protest that is a harrowing experience as traffic safety officials," Langer said. "... We're quite concerned that someone is going to get hurt."

That almost happened May 31, when a truck driver nearly drove into a crowd of protesters on Interstate 35W in Minneapolis. He said he didn't intend to, but found himself confused on a highway that he didn't understand was closed.

Republicans on the panel said they would bring forth stiffer penalties for demonstrators that enter roadways.

"People are ... absolutely sick and tired of this," said Sen. David Senjem, R-Rochester. "I think we need to look at some consequences or we're going to have this on a repeated basis."

But Democrats said lawmakers should instead look to what is fueling the unrest.

"They took to the streets because they wanted their actions to be heard by Minnesotans," said Sen. Melissa Franzen, D-Edina. "... How do we avoid another killing of a Black man? Because that actually happened on a public street by a public servant." Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Police union leaders tell MN Senate: City leaders 'failed Minneapolis'

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCLXXXVII.

STATUE OF BLACK PROTESTER REPLACES TOPPLED UK SLAVE TRADER

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 373 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: LONDON (AP) - An artist has erected a statue of a Black Lives Matter protester atop the plinth in the English city of Bristol formerly occupied by a statue of a slave trader.

Body

LONDON (AP) - An artist has erected a statue of a Black Lives Matter protester atop the plinth in the English city of Bristol formerly occupied by a statue of a slave trader.

Marc Quinn created the life-size resin and steel likeness of Jen Reid, a protester photographed standing on the plinth after demonstrators pulled down the statue of Edward Colston and dumped it in Bristol's harbor on June 7.

The statue, titled "A Surge of Power \(Jen Reid\)" was erected before dawn on Wednesday without approval from city officials.

Reid, who came to inspect her likeness, said "it's something that fills me with pride."

"I think it's amazing," she said. "It looks like it belongs there. It looks like it's been there forever."

Colston was a 17th-century trader who made a fortune transporting enslaved Africans across the Atlantic to the Americas on Bristol-based ships. His money funded schools and charities in Bristol, 120 miles (195 kilometers) southwest of London.

The toppling of his statue was part of a worldwide reckoning with racism and slavery sparked by the death of a Black American man, George Floyd, at the hands of police in Minneapolis in May.

Quinn, one of Britain's best-known sculptors, said Reid had "created the sculpture when she stood on the plinth and raised her arm in the air. Now we're crystallizing it."

City authorities fished the Colston statue out of the harbor and say it will be placed in a museum, along with placards from the Black Lives Matter demonstration.

Bristol Mayor Marvin Rees cast doubt on whether the new statue would be allowed to stay, noting that it "was the work and decision of a London-based artist."

Statue of Black protester replaces toppled UK slave trader

"The future of the plinth and what is installed on it must be decided by the people of Bristol," he said in a statement.

"This will be critical to building a city that is home to those who are elated at the statue being pulled down, those who sympathize with its removal but are dismayed at how it happened and those who feel that in its removal, they've lost a piece of the Bristol they know, and therefore themselves."

Roseville teens keep making Black Lives Matters signs despite thefts, vandalism Black Lives Matter signs stolen and damaged, Roseville police say. Dead raccoons left near others.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCLXXXVIII.

MPD MAKES REVISIONS TO USE-OF-FORCE POLICY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 2BLength: 366 wordsByline: JOHN REINAN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: De-escalation will be the goal along with more detailed reporting.Body

The Minneapolis Police Department said Tuesday that it's changing its use-of-force policy to encourage officers to try to de-escalate intense situations and hold them accountable when force or weapons are used.

For the first time, officers will be required to document how they tried to de-escalate situations in every report they submit.

Officers also must report why they decided to use force and explain why they used a particular level of force.

The new orders issued Tuesday by Police Chief Medaria Arradondo are the latest in a series of reforms being implemented after George Floyd's death in May.

"This change will instill a stronger emphasis on de-escalation and help effectively curb excessive use of force by ensuring our officers center de-escalation in any and all interactions between officers and the community," Mayor Jacob Frey said in a statement. "These comprehensive reporting requirements will help reinforce de-escalation as the first resort."

The new policies also require officers to report whenever they draw a gun - as well as an additional report whenever they point a gun at anyone or use chemical agents.

Officers also must report whenever they handcuff a suspect, use pressure points and "joint manipulation." When police do use force against a citizen, they will be required to use the code word "force" in their report.

"As the MPD continues to professionalize our service and make necessary reforms, these new changes in policy, strengthening de-escalation and use of force reporting will play a key role in our efforts in building trust and legitimacy with all those we serve," Arradondo said.

MPD makes revisions to use-of-force policy

The department has been under pressure to make changes since Floyd died on May 25 after an officer knelt on his neck and three other officers failed to intervene.

A supermajority of the City Council pledged to disband the department, a move Frey has opposed, saying he wants to improve the department's procedures and culture. Darwin Forsyth, a spokesman for the mayor, said the de-escalation policy is designed to make officers think about it on a regular basis.

"It's one piece of the puzzle of making de-escalation more a part of the culture," he said.

John Reinan · 612-673-7402

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCLXXXIX.

READERS WRITE OUR ASSIGNMENT: RETURNING SAFELY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 6ALength: 1285 wordsBody

BACK TO SCHOOL

President Donald Trump is loudly proclaiming that students across the nation must return to the classroom this fall. So why is he, like Republicans in the Minnesota Senate, not actually doing the work to make that happen?

We all know that school courses have prerequisites. You can't take calculus if you've not passed algebra. No advanced-placement literature without English grammar. And you can't put kids back in the classroom if you haven't controlled that pesky little coronavirus. And, according to scientists - the folks who have studied this - we can control the virus if we all do some really easy things: wash our hands often, stay at least 6 feet away from others and wear a mask.

And that's where my Republican friends (not all of them, just leaders like Trump, Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka and others) draw the line, stomp their feet and cry, "My freedom!"

Sadly, these folks think that they can take calculus without passing algebra and beat the virus without personal responsibility. And many of these privileged folks may be allowed to take some shortcuts. According to his niece, Trump himself got into college by hiring a smart person to take an exam in his place. But the coronavirus stands tall at the door to the school, allowing no shortcuts.

So you want your kids to go back to school? Do your homework. Wear a mask. Or be prepared for virtual classes until we have a vaccine. It's not up to your local school board. It's up to you and whether you are responsible enough to do your part.

Bruce Anderson, St. Cloud, Minn.

...

It is important to be safe; it is also important to be logically consistent and fair across generations. While no activities are without significant risk during this pandemic, increasing amounts of data are consistently showing that children not only have a vastly lower risk of significant illness, but are also less prone to spreading SARS-CoV-2. When taking that emerging data in combination with the established data that decreased access to schooling has profound harms that last for decades, any curtailing of in-person public school access at a time when any businesses or adult activities that were not deemed "essential" during the initial, statewide stay-at-home order are open would simply be inappropriate. While modifications such as having children wear masks and frequently practice hand hygiene would be reasonable, to limit school in the absence of a full return to shelter-in-place would be either an acknowledgment that our society does not truly value children and their future, or that decisions are being driven by cognitive errors such as identifiable victim effect, present bias and omission bias rather than being driven by data and logical consistency.

Jeffrey Nowak, Edina

The writer is a physician.

VOTING

Receive ballot, fill out, return. Easy.

Justin Clark's July 13 editorial counterpoint attacks mail-in voting, a moot issue in Minnesota as mail-in voting is not an option except in a limited number of small precincts ("Mail-in voting would undermine election integrity," Opinion Exchange). Here is my smooth experience in what we do have: no-excuse absentee voting.

A month ago, I submitted an online request to the office of the secretary of state's official elections website, mnvotes.org. On that request I'd needed to include my driver's license number and sign a statement attesting to my eligibility to vote. My ballot arrived in the mail a week or two later.

On July 4th I sat at my kitchen table and voted in our primary election. No need to wear a mask. No risk of contracting COVID-19. No witness needed as I was already a registered voter. Then I mailed my ballot, no postage required, on my morning walk. Five days later I went again to mnvotes.org to check my ballot's status. The website told me that my "ballot was accepted on July 8, 2020, and will be counted."

As for that "I Voted" sticker Clark mentioned - it came with my ballot packet.

Evelyn Solo, North Mankato, Minn.

...

The debate continues about vote-by-mail without much, if any, attention to a very obvious alternative. There is currently one location for early voting in person in Minneapolis, located on East Hennepin Avenue. The city of Minneapolis has 49 recreation centers, according to its park website. Open four of these in convenient locations around the city. If the volunteer pool is limited, open these in-person locations on Fridays and Saturdays. Voters can drop off their absentee ballot or vote in person.

Dan Gunderson, Minneapolis

...

I live a couple of blocks from the early voting center at 980 East Hennepin Av. I've lived here since 1991. I've had to correct directions for Minneapolis residents, bus drivers, cabdrivers (remember those?) and all the others who confuse Hennepin Avenue South with East Hennepin Avenue. (That would be about a mile and a half off, give or take.)

I think the current announcement about the early voting center and all future announcements must include a simple map.

This could be as little as a thumbnail inset including the Mississippi to the left of the map, an abbreviated "East Henn." with a named cross street and a big star or arrow over the correct address.

Thanks for making early voting work well!

Emilie Quast, Minneapolis

POLICING

Encourage the good in officers

While thinking about policing and the urgent need for reform/transformation, a memory surfaced.

In 1989, my son, who struggled with mental illness, came for a weekend in Farmington where I was pastor of a small church. Unfortunately, he became stressed and decompensated - lost it - and it manifested as anger at me. When it escalated into threats to harm me, to take my life, I called the police. The officer handled it well, quietly asking my son how he felt and suggesting they go to the station. My son agreed. The officer later drove him back to his metro group home. The next day a man came to see me in my office - it was the officer in plain clothes. On his day off he came to see how I was doing, and said he was concerned about me - still brings tears to my eyes.

Is there a way to nuance our momentum for change in policing? In my subsequent work in restorative justice, I discovered a police force that facilitated restorative dialogue between victims and offenders, and I recall the push for community policing, having officers get to know the people on their beat, to be seen as part of the community and a genuine resource.

What happened to these initiatives? Let's bring them back and cultivate those caring instincts!

Jean Greenwood, Minneapolis

. . .

We see in "A troubled block calls for help" (July 14) that everyone regardless of their socioeconomic status desires basic safety. It is shameful that local residents must put up their own physical barriers and work shifts to keep trouble out. This is a fundamental responsibility of local government - the Minneapolis City Council and the Minneapolis Police Department. In the wake of the George Floyd tragedy, local officials have traded their mission with calls for defunding and dismantling the police. It is ironic that Council Member Alondra Cano, a supporter of defunding MPD, cannot answer her constituents' calls for a solution. Where is her "harm reduction" plan? Aren't you embarrassed that residents have taken action on their own for self-preservation? This is a failure of elected activists who are more interested in their "woke" status than keeping residents safe.

Minneapolis residents must wake up to the pathway the City Council has chosen. If not, I see more neighborhood barricades appearing in the near future.

READERS WRITE Our assignment: Returning safely

Joseph Polunc, Cologne, Minn.

The writer is a retired law enforcement officer.

We want to hear from you. Send us your thoughts here.

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCXC. WISCONSIN DUO WANTS STIFFER PENALTIES FOR WRECKING STATUES

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 580 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: MADISON, Wis. (AP) - Two Wisconsin legislators introduced a bill Wednesday that would make defacing or destroying statues a felony after protesters ripped down a sculpture of abolitionist Col. Hans Christian Heg and a statue embodying the state's "Forward" motto at the state Capitol last month.Body

By TODD RICHMOND

MADISON, Wis. (AP) - Two Wisconsin legislators introduced a bill Wednesday that would make defacing or destroying statues a felony after protesters ripped down a sculpture of abolitionist Col. Hans Christian Heg and a statue embodying the state's "Forward" motto at the state Capitol last month.

Republican Rep. Rob Hutton and Democratic Sen. Tim Carpenter - who was physically attacked by protesters during the violence - co-authored the bill. It would make damaging or defacing any structure, plaque, statue, painting or other monument of historical significance on public property or maintained by a government entity a felony punishable by up to three-and-a-half years in prison and a $10,000 fine.

"While debates about issues and historical individuals are important and productive in a civilized society, wanton destruction of important history is unacceptable," Hutton said in a statement. "If there is merit for the removal of public statues and monuments, discussions should be had within the structure of the appropriate government body, with open and civil feedback from the public."

The bill's future looks uncertain. Legislators are busy on the campaign trail this summer and aren't expected to return to Madison until the next two-year session begins in January. Aides to Assembly Speaker Robin Vos and Senate Majority Leader Scott Fitzgerald didn't immediately respond to messages.

Heg was a Norwegian immigrant who became an outspoken abolitionist, serving in the 15th Wisconsin Regiment during the Civil War. He was killed at the Battle of Chickamauga in 1863. A statue of him, funded by donations from the Norwegian Society of American, had stood outside the state Capitol since 1926.

Protesters tore down the statue, ripped off its head and dumped it in a nearby lake during a wild night of protests against police racism June 23. The protesters also tore down a statue on the opposite side of the Wisconsin duo wants stiffer penalties for wrecking statues

Capitol that represented the "Forward" motto as a woman pointing to the horizon. That statue was first installed 125 years ago but was replaced with a bronze replica in 1998.

That same night, protesters attacked Carpenter as he watched the demonstration. The senator can be seen on cellphone video collapsing on the Capitol lawn after the beating.

The protest was one of a series of demonstrations that shook downtown Madison after the death of George Floyd, a handcuffed Black man who died after a white Minneapolis police officer used his knee to pin Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes. The June 23 violence in Madison erupted after police arrested a black protester who was walking into businesses while talking into a megaphone and wielding a baseball bat.

Why protesters targeted two statues with no racist history remains a question. Some said they attacked the statues because they present a false reality of racial equality in Wisconsin.

The state Department of Administration hasn't released damage estimates for the statues. The state Capitol and Executive Residence Board, which approves repairs at the Capitol and governor's mansion, plans to discuss reinstalling the statues during a meeting Monday. Wisconsin Dells water park closes for season after coronavirus sickens 2 employees GOP leader wants Wisconsin Senate to strike down mask order Wisconsin's Democratic governor endorses Biden for president Wisconsin Republicans 'stand ready' to kill governor's mask requirement Wisconsin governor orders masks statewide amid virus surge

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCXCI. A TIME TO REIMAGINE' HOUSING

Finance and Commerce

July 15, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 BridgeTower Media All Rights Reserved

FINANCE & COMMERCESection: NEWSLength: 680 wordsByline: Brian JohnsonBody

The triple threat of COVID-19, systemic racism and a struggling economy has added new layers of complexity to the challenge of creating safe and affordable housing in the Twin Cities and beyond.

As part of a Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce webinar Wednesday morning, a panel of Twin Cities housing and development experts made a case for a more holistic approach to affordable housing, and looked at it through the lens of employment, racial justice, and shaking up the status quo.

The panelists were Julie Gugin, president of the Minnesota Homeownership Center; MayKao Y. Hang, vice president and founding dean of the Morrison Family College of Health at the University of St. Thomas; and DeAngelos Svenkeson, founder and CEO of NEOO Partners, a local urban planning and real estate consulting firm. Ellen Sahli, president of the Minnesota Housing Fund, moderated the discussion. Touching on the fallout from the pandemic, Sahli cited a recent report that said nearly a third of all U.S. households did not make their full housing payments in July. Nineteen percent missed their entire payments, while 13% made only partial payments, she said.

“The foundation for housing is shaky for millions of Americans. And in the midst of a pandemic, our region experienced the murder of George Floyd and the civil unrest that showed in stark terms the disparities that our region and our country face,” she said.

One challenge: Mortgage delinquency rates doubled in the Twin Cities in April, even as “many, many folks lack adequate savings to see them through a crisis,” Gugin said.

Communities of color are particularly hard-hit. Citing a New York Times article, Svenkeson noted that roughly 41% of African-American small businesses in the U.S. are “on the brink of failure due to the impacts of COVID. ”

“I think right now, our region needs to think really big about how to rebuild and we cannot rebuild the status quo,” he added. “Our status quo didn't work for people of color in this region. And this is an opportunity now to reimagine. ”

For her part, Gugin said “deep-seated systemic and racist practices” related to housing have not gone away. Redlining and predatory lending practices are traditional barriers that “still exist to a degree, and we need to figure out how to dismantle that,” she said.

Panelists called on the private sector to provide living wage jobs so people are better able to afford safe and quality shelter, and for local communities to create a diverse housing stock, even in the face of “not-in-my-backyard” sentiment.

Oftentimes, local opposition to affordable housing projects is “coded,” said Hang.

“Not-in-my-backyard activities are not necessarily so much sometimes related to poverty. They're related to race, because people don't want individuals who are different moving into their middle-class or suburban neighborhoods,” she said.

“What has resulted is a pattern of a lot of spatial, social and racial segregation in Minnesota. And I think that's bad for us as a society because it makes us less economically productive. There's also a body of evidence now that shows when you have investments in place a lot of that investment is housing that actually the quality of life will improve,” Hang said.

The good news: Resources are available to homeowners who are falling behind on their payments, Gugin said. And unlike the Great Recession, when home prices plummeted and many homeowners owed more than their home was worth, people are in a better position to sell their homes now if they need to, she said.

“What we want consumers to understand is you don't have to sell your property that there might be other options for you,” Gugin added. “We're concerned, quite frankly, about scams, cash deals, people knocking on your door saying, ‘We can give you cash for your property and you can get out from under your COVID financial crisis.’ If consumers really want to stay in their house, they need to know that there are options that can help them that don't involve these sorts of needless sales.”

Copyright © 2020 BridgeTower Media. All Rights Reserved.

Load-Date: July 21, 2020

ARTICLE MCXCII. AMERICAN INDIANS SEE CHANGE COMING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 6ALength: 639 wordsHighlight: Two important decisions herald change for the better.Body

A football team finally discards a despised and derogatory name, and the U.S. Supreme Court unexpectedly holds Congress to account for promises more than a century old. These two decisions, one symbolic, one legal, should provide some genuine hope that despite so many challenges, society is capable of positive change.

The first reform may seem inconsequential to some. The Washington Redskins, after decades of pressure, have renounced a nickname that has long been a pejorative for American Indians. The team did so not out of altruism, but because corporate sponsors applied the ultimate pressure - potential loss of revenue. Corporations are far more sensitive to public opinion than politicians, it would seem, and have wound up helping to lead change on LGBTQ issues, climate, Black Lives Matter and now this. FedEx threatened to pull its name from the team's stadium because it considered the name at odds with its values. Nike pulled team gear from its online stores. These firms recognized that public sentiment has changed on these issues and will no longer tolerate offensive denigration of some groups.

The other decision, that of the Supreme Court in McGirt v. Oklahoma, is nothing short of historic. Justice Neil Gorsuch, writing for the court, opened his opinion with stirring words: "At the end of the Trail of Tears was a promise." What followed was a decision that at long last holds the U.S. to treaties long forgotten by many. Gorsuch said the eastern half of Oklahoma, given to the Creek tribe in return for its ceding other land in an 1833 treaty, was in fact theirs. "Today we are asked whether the land these treaties promised remains an Indian reservation for purposes of federal criminal law. Because Congress has not said otherwise, we hold the government to its word."

An avowed textualist, Gorsuch said that while such a decision might be uncomfortable for some, "wishes don't make for laws, and saving the political branches the embarrassment of disestablishing a reservation is not one of our constitutionally assigned prerogatives." Only Congress, he said, can divest a reservation of its land.

Tim Johnson, a professor at the University of Minnesota and national expert on Supreme Court decisions, said the decision is a strong affirmation of the power of treaties and a major victory for Indian tribes in Oklahoma and across the country. The case itself deals with the issue of whether the state or federal government should have tried a Jimcy McGirt, a Seminole man, for crimes on Muscogee Creek treaty lands. Gorsuch's decision, Johnson said, looks at the criminal jurisdiction issue, deciding in favor of federal jurisdiction, but then goes broader, to an acknowledgment of U.S. treaty responsibilities that he said lawyers will be studying for years.

American Indians see change coming

There could, he said, be implications for Minnesota, where tribes have clashed with government officials and communities over a variety of issues, including fishing rights and, most recently, whether the Line 3 oil pipeline could run through historic treaty land.

"It remains to be seen how broadly this will be interpreted," Johnson said, but "this would seem to give pretty broad rights to tribes across the U.S."

Taken together, the recent developments are "two harbingers that show we are in an era of real change," Johnson said in an interview with an editorial writer.

Lt. Gov. Peggy Flanagan, an Ojibwe, said she never thought she would see the Redskins name dropped in her lifetime. Then, she told an editorial writer, she read the opening line of the Gorsuch decision, which she found so powerful that as she read it, "I held my breath."

In a sentiment that should find broad support, Flanagan said that "I hope and pray these two decisions will continue to lead to more change," and result in a society where "people are seen, heard and valued."

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

Mpls. spent $152K for security for 3 council members

ARTICLE MCXCIII. MPLS. SPENT \$152K FOR SECURITY FOR 3 COUNCIL MEMBERS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 2B

Length: 130 words

Byline: LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

The city of Minneapolis spent $152,400 to provide private security for three City Council members, a higher amount than a previous estimate.

The city provided security coverage for Council Members Alondra Cano and Phillippe Cunningham and Council Vice President Andrea Jenkins after they received threats, a colleague said.

The security came from two companies: Aegis and BelCom. One of the contracts was signed June 7, the day the council members and six of their colleagues promised to "begin the process of ending" the Minneapolis Police Department.

City spokeswoman Sarah McKenzie said services ended June 29.

Because they did not surpass $175,000 in spending, the contracts did not need to be preapproved by the City Council during a public meeting, the city has said.

LIZ NAVRATIL

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect

ARTICLE MCXCIV. POLICE ASSOCIATION: OFFICERS WHO DETAINED MAN IN MISTAKEN ID TREATED HIM WITH RESPECT

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 527 words

Byline: Mara H. Gottfried

Highlight: The largest association representing Minnesota public safety officers says a man mistakenly detained in Bloomington was treated with respect during the incident. Darrius Strong - a choreographer, dancer and dance instructor - posted a video online Friday, saying, "I could have been dead today" after the traffic stop. He said there were four squads that [...]

Body

The largest association representing Minnesota public safety officers says a man mistakenly detained in Bloomington was treated with respect during the incident.

Darrius Strong - a choreographer, dancer and dance instructor - posted a video online Friday, saying, "I could have been dead today" after the traffic stop. He said there were four squads that pulled up "and they all (brought) their guns out."

But Brian Peters, Minnesota Police and Peace Officers Association executive director, said there were "clear differences" between what Strong said in his video and what squad camera footage showed.

"The law enforcement officers who serve their communities conducted the traffic and felony-level warrant stop to keep the public safe, and should be commended for their service and integrity," Peters said, adding the officers did not have "all their guns out."

"Misstatements about police behavior are particularly unfortunate during this time of heightened sensitivities."

The Bloomington, Edina and Richfield Police Departments issued apologies to Strong in a statement. They were conducting traffic enforcement when a Richfield officer pulled over Strong for speeding.

The officer saw the registered owner had a felony arrest warrant, but soon after she "discovered a different person falsely used Mr. Strong's name during a previous police encounter that resulted in an arrest warrant being issued in his name," according to the police statement.

Before that discovery, during the initial traffic stop, the officer momentarily drew her firearm and pointed it at the ground. Police said the other officers did not draw their guns.

Police association: Officers who detained man in mistaken ID treated him with respect

Strong was handcuffed and put in the back of a squad car before the officer determined he wasn't the subject of the warrant and he was released.

On Monday, Richfield police released dash cam footage and Bloomington police released body camera footage.

Strong responded in a Facebook video, saying he recorded his initial video right after he was detained and he was traumatized - which he said he still is. He said he had not taken the time to look his video over and listen to it before posting it.

"I was emotional in the video," he said. "I'm not discrediting my video ... because that was real. ... I went through some trauma in my body. ... Facts may be not lined up with the video."

When police stopped him, Strong said he was thinking about George Floyd, who died in Minneapolis police custody.

"Anything can happen to us, man, especially as ... Black men," he said.

The owner of Elevé Performing Arts Center, where Strong was coming from on Friday after teaching dance classes, has started a petition at bit.ly/StrongPetition to the Bloomington mayor and city council, "asking for clarity on the protocol used for this traffic stop." Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting

ARTICLE MCXCV. ST. ANTHONY CITY COUNCIL REJECTS TEEN'S PHILANDO CASTILE MURAL, BUT SHE VOWS TO KEEP FIGHTING

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 802 words

Byline: Sarah Horner

Highlight: Saying it would set a problematic precedent, the St. Anthony City Council on Tuesday voted against allowing a local high school student to create a mural of Philando Castile on the city council building. In a 4-1 majority, council members told Semhar Solomon that green-lighting her mural would open the door for other residents to [...]

Body

Saying it would set a problematic precedent, the St. Anthony City Council on Tuesday voted against allowing a local high school student to create a mural of Philando Castile on the city council building.

In a 4-1 majority, council members told Semhar Solomon that green-lighting her mural would open the door for other residents to try to honor other individuals or ideas on city property, which has historically been kept neutral.

Some also felt that her location for the mural - on the south side of City Hall next to the police department, was an affront to officers who have made progress since their former colleague, Jeronimo Yanez, fatally shot Castile during a traffic stop in 2016 and they didn't need a daily reminder of the incident, according to comments made by council members Jan Jenson, Thomas Randle and Mayor Randy Stille.

They also voiced concern that the mural would further divide the first-ring suburb, not unite it around a call to end racial injustice as supporters suggested at the meeting.

The council members said they were open to considering a mural elsewhere in the city.

Council member Bernard Walker, a Black man, cast the lone vote in support of the mural. He said Castile's place in the community's history was unique and therefore a mural honoring him would stand apart from other residents seeking city property as a means of expression.

He also dismissed the notion that it should be squashed because it could create division.

"I ask who is causing division? Those who are creating the mural or those who oppose it," Walker asked his colleagues. "Restricting smoking in buildings was divisive. Wearing seat belts was divisive. Slavery

St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting was ... divisive. ... Pretty much any call to justice will lead those not interested in justice to oppose it, thus causing division."

Council member Randle, who voted against the mural, is also Black.

While she so far has yet to get her mural, Solomon has been successful in igniting conversation about race relations in her predominantly white community, which has been one of her aims since George Floyd died in Minneapolis police custody on Memorial Day.

Long privately passionate about racial injustices and police brutality - Solomon went to her first protest after Castile died four years ago - the soon-to-be St. Anthony High School senior said she didn't have the confidence to speak up until she saw people across the country protesting Floyd's death.

"It took really knowing that people have my back, knowing that it's not just the Black community, for me to (have the confidence) to take initiative," Solomon said recently.

She joined in the protests that followed in Minneapolis, and organized an ongoing supply donation drive in St. Anthony that benefits organizations in need across the metro.

She also hosted a rally for Castile on the anniversary of his death, July 6. Solomon was planning for that when she mentioned her mural idea to Castile's mom, Valerie.

When Valerie Castile told her "she wanted her son's face everywhere," Solomon said she felt energized to make sure it became as reality.

"St. Anthony has yet to commemorate (Castile's) life in the past four years and sure, everyone's heads turned for a moment, but that shouldn't have been all that happened," Solomon said. "This is an opportunity to unite our community through art. Honoring someone's life that our police department took is the least we can do."

Growing up Black in St. Anthony has been challenging, Solomon said, adding that she believes there is a lot of racism baked into the way the city and school district operate.

Castile's death epitomized it in the worst way, she continued, adding that she doesn't believe her city has taken meaningful steps to honor his life or change since.

During the meeting Tuesday, city council member Jenson rattled off changes the city has made since Castile's death. He cited body cameras, requiring implicit bias training for officers and adopting protocols outlined in former President Barack Obama's 21st Century Policing report.

Yanez was fired by St. Anthony following the fatal shooting, and was charged with manslaughter and reckless discharge of a firearm. He was subsequently acquitted.

Solomon said she aims to keep pushing the city to tackle hard topics, and says she won't rest until her mural finds a wall in her city.

"This feels really out of the norm for (St. Anthony), but hopefully it will be for the good," she said. Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor

St. Anthony City Council rejects teen's Philando Castile mural, but she vows to keep fighting

Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Graphic

Semhar Solomon (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Police looking for dozens who looted Lululemon on St. Paul's Grand Ave. during Floyd unrest

ARTICLE MCXCVI. POLICE LOOKING FOR DOZENS WHO LOOTED LULULEMON ON ST. PAUL'S GRAND AVE. DURING FLOYD UNREST

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 408 words

Byline: Mara H. Gottfried

Highlight: After dozens of people looted a high-end athletic wear company's store on St. Paul's Grand Avenue, police released surveillance photos Wednesday and asked for the public's help to identify suspects. During civil unrest after the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody, various businesses were vandalized and set ablaze in St. Paul on May [...]

Body

After dozens of people looted a high-end athletic wear company's store on St. Paul's Grand Avenue, police released surveillance photos Wednesday and asked for the public's help to identify suspects.

During civil unrest after the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody, various businesses were vandalized and set ablaze in St. Paul on May 28 and May 29.

Someone used a baseball bat to shatter the front door of Lululemon on Grand Avenue and Victoria Street at 11:45 p.m. on May 28.

"Soon after, dozens of people stepped, stumbled, crashed and crawled their way through the door and over shards of glass," St. Paul police said in a statement on Wednesday. "Then they ransacked the store for whatever they could carry."

At least 30 people were involved and a significant amount of merchandise was stolen, worth tens of thousands of dollars, according to Steve Linders, a St. Paul police spokesman.

Investigators have been gathering evidence and looking for suspects in various cases of arson and burglary. Several people have been arrested.

In the Lululemon case, prosecutors have charged a 24-year-old St. Paul woman with felony burglary.

While others seen in photos and surveillance video from Lululemon were wearing masks, the woman was not and police identified her by a tattoo visible on her neck and upper part of her chest. Police found her selling Lululemon clothing online under the pseudonym "LilBaby Snow," according to a criminal complaint.

Police looking for dozens who looted Lululemon on St. Paul's Grand Ave. during Floyd unrest

Police stopped the woman and a man in a sport-utility vehicle and found several items of Lululemon clothing with security tags still attached. During a search warrant, more than 100 items of Lululemon clothing were found in the man's bedroom; many still had security tags and were on hangers unique to the Grand Avenue store, the complaint said.

Surveillance photos from the Lululemon burglary can be viewed on the police department website at bit.ly/LululemonSuspects. Police are asking anyone with information to contact them at 651-266-5900 or SPPD-CUITF@ci.stpaul.mn.us. North St. Paul man killed in crash after fleeing Dakota County sheriff's deputy Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Cleric assaulted outside Bloomington mosque; police searching for suspects U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities Minneapolis man sentenced to 33 years in prison for sex-trafficking young women and girls out of massage parlor

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCXCVII.

MOST WANT COP FUNDING CUTS NOW

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 583 wordsByline: LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: It's the first Minneapolis public hearing on budget revisions this year since George Floyd's killing.Body

Dozens of people on Tuesday night asked Minneapolis' elected officials to cut more money from the city's Police Department, as they readjust this year's budget for the first major time since George Floyd was killed.

The majority of speakers who called in to the City Council's budget committee hearing asked the city to cut $45 million from the Police Department's $193 million budget.

"I don't know why we would continue to fund the Police Department the way we have, as they continue to murder our Black and brown brothers and sisters," said Hunta Williams, a member of the city's Transgender Equity Council. Williams added later: "We're watching. We have our eyes on you."

Reclaim the Block and the Black Visions Collective encouraged people to advocate for the $45 million cut. Lex Horan, with Reclaim the Block, said they reviewed the department's budget to identify areas that "are not directly linked to community safety," such as the mounted patrol, an activities league and special operations and intelligence. They are also calling for a roughly 30% cut in the precinct and patrol budgets.

One of the only people who didn't advocate for cuts was the leader of a downtown business organization.

"Tonight, I would urge you not to make sudden and significant changes to the mayor's recommended and revised MPD budget until and unless concrete alternatives ... have been established," said Steve Cramer, president and CEO of the Minneapolis Downtown Council.

The public hearing Tuesday set the tone for a series of budget talks as city leaders work first to revise this year's budget and then to approve next year's.

Minneapolis leaders hope by the end of July to cut $156 million from this year's $1.6 billion budget as they grapple with revenue losses because of the coronavirus pandemic.

Most want cop funding cuts now

Mayor Jacob Frey has said he hopes to save larger questions about the future of policing for the 2021 budget process, which kicks off next month.

Earlier this year, city officials approved the first phase of budget cuts, which the city estimates would save $58 million by freezing most hiring, putting a temporary hold on wage increases and making cuts from city contracts. That total includes $8.6 million in cuts from the Police Department, according to the city.

Last week, Frey offered a proposal that would plug the remaining $98 million hole by relying on cash reserves, implementing furloughs for some employees and laying off up to 40 workers.

The mayor's proposal also relies on a series of budgetary transfers. It includes, for example, a $6 million "rollback" for some housing programs, but also seeks to add $4 million from a housing board established in the 1980s.

The mayor's office said it is trying to keep intact programs that provide "immediate service to residents with greatest needs" and programs that allow the city to qualify for additional funding.

This second phase of cuts, as proposed by the mayor, calls for a $50,000 reduction in the Police Department, specifically from its timekeeping and employee-management system, and the system that tracks transactions in pawnshops and secondhand stores.

Many of the people who spoke Tuesday focused on that $50,000 figure as they asked for greater cuts and instead more investments in housing.

Many of them asked City Council members to fulfill a pledge nine of them made in Powderhorn Park last month, when they promised to work toward ending the Police Department.

The city's next public hearing on the budget is July 22.

Liz Navratil · 612-673-4994

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

$10M to replace Third Precinct site

ARTICLE MCXCVIII.

\$10M TO REPLACE THIRD PRECINCT SITE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 2B

Length: 548 words

Byline: MIGUEL OTAROLA; JESSIE VAN BERKEL; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: Walz will appeal FEMA's denial of disaster aid after the riots and Floyd killing.

Body

Replacing the Third Precinct police station in south Minneapolis will cost an estimated $10 million, according to figures showing the damage to public infrastructure during the riots after the police killing of George Floyd.

The figures, shared Monday by Hennepin County, are the first valuations of the damage to the police station, which was looted and torched by protesters after officers abandoned their post May 28. The city is estimating $13.8 million in losses, damages and overtime costs related to fires in the days after Floyd was arrested and killed.

The city provided the estimates to Gov. Tim Walz, who requested $16 million in disaster aid from the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) earlier this month. The agency denied the request, and Walz on Tuesday said he planned to appeal the decision.

"It's not all that unusual that this was denied," he said. "I wish they would take another look at it, and I think we can make a good case."

In addition to the $10 million to replace the Third Precinct, the city estimated an additional $289,000 to replace 911 equipment inside, $225,000 for cleanup, and $5,000 for "paper shredding services," according to documents. It also tallied more than $1 million in related overtime costs for services and police, fire and public works employees.

City officials could not be reached for comment Tuesday.

The future of the precinct is unclear; Council Member Alondra Cano, who represents the area, has said she does not support rebuilding on that site.

The precinct had gained a reputation over the years for the aggressive policing conducted by its officers.

$10M to replace Third Precinct site

Hennepin County estimated $5.7 million in damages to its facilities related to the fires, according to documents. Most of that was sustained at its properties on Lake Street near the Third Precinct, including $3.6 million for East Lake Library, $943,200 for East Lake Clinic and $500,000 for the South Hennepin County Human Service Center.

Under federal law, FEMA can provide financial assistance for cities to recover from natural disasters as well as fires, regardless of their cause. The county and city compiled the damage caused by the fires set during the riots and sent them to the state.

"It's an estimate," said Eric Waage, the emergency management director for Hennepin County. "There is enough stuff going on here that we have clearly met or exceeded our threshold" for federal aid.

In his letter to President Donald Trump asking for financial assistance, Walz said the uprising following Floyd's killing was the "second most destructive incident of civil unrest in United States history" after the Los Angeles riots in 1992.

Los Angeles received federal aid from FEMA following those riots; other cities that have been the site of major riots since have not.

Walz said he would try to talk to Vice President Mike Pence about the need for federal aid.

"I'm disappointed they didn't do it. We are committed to rebuilding these areas as vibrantly as we possibly can," he said.

If Trump rejects Walz's appeal, Minnesota statute indicates that a majority of the recovery costs for public infrastructure would fall on the state, Waage said.

Staff writer Liz Navratil contributed to this report.

miguel.otarola@startribune.com · 612-673-4753

jessie.vanberkel@startribune.com · 651-925-5044

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

ARTICLE MCXCIX. BERKELEY MOVES TOWARD REMOVING POLICE FROM TRAFFIC STOPS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 921 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: SAN FRANCISCO (AP) - After hours of emotional public testimony and a middle-of-the-night vote by Berkeley leaders, the progressive California city is moving forward with a novel proposal to replace police with unarmed civilians during traffic stops in a bid to curtail racial profiling.Body

By JANIE HAR

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) - After hours of emotional public testimony and a middle-of-the-night vote by Berkeley leaders, the progressive California city is moving forward with a novel proposal to replace police with unarmed civilians during traffic stops in a bid to curtail racial profiling.

The City Council early Wednesday approved a police reform proposal that calls for a public committee to hash out details of a new Berkeley Police Department that would not respond to calls involving people experiencing homelessness or mental illness. The committee also would pursue creating a separate department to handle transportation planning and enforcing parking and traffic laws.

The council voted for the committee to find ways to eventually cut the Police Department's budget by half and approved an analysis of police calls and spending.

A tired but excited Berkeley Mayor Jesse Arreguin said he doesn't expect a new transportation department overnight because conversations will be hard and detailed with complicated logistics to figure out. But he said communities of color in his city feel targeted by police and that needs to change.

"There may be situations where police do need to intervene, and so we need to look at all that," he said. "We need to look at if we do move traffic enforcement out of the Police Department, what does that relationship look like and how will police officers work in coordination with unarmed traffic enforcement personnel?"

It's believed the plan to separate traffic enforcement from police is the first of its kind in the U.S. and comes as many cities seek broad public safety reforms, including reducing law enforcement budgets, following the May 25 death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police. Fans of the proposal cheered its passage even as some called for greater cuts to police.

Berkeley moves toward removing police from traffic stops

It could take months, even years, to create a new department, but police and other law enforcement experts rebuked the idea as dangerous, not only for traffic safety but for the people tasked with pulling over drivers, who they say can be dangerous.

"I think what Berkeley is doing is nuts," said Mark Cronin, a director with the Los Angeles Police Protective League, a union for officers. "I think it's a big social experiment. I think it's going to fail and it's not going to take long for, unfortunately, traffic collisions, fatalities to increase exponentially."

Cronin, a former traffic officer, said cities can't rely on unattended traffic signals or camera lights to catch bad drivers and that people are needed to educate motorists on safe driving. But those people also need backup and the authority to arrest should they encounter a driver who is intoxicated, armed and fleeing a crime, or wanted on other charges.

"Traffic stops are one of the most unpredictable and therefore dangerous duties of law enforcement. There is no such thing as a routine traffic stop and to perform them effectively and safely takes months of police training in and outside of an academy," said Frank Merenda, a former New York City Police Department captain who is an assistant professor of criminal justice at Marist College.

Philip Stinson, a criminal justice professor at Bowling Green State University, called the idea an "overly simplistic plan that could have deadly consequences for unarmed traffic enforcement officers."

Nine U.S. police officers were killed during traffic stops so far this year, according to data compiled by the National Law Enforcement Memorial Fund. Six were shot, and three were struck by vehicles.

Numerous studies have shown Black drivers are much more likely to be stopped by police than whites for minor traffic infractions, and the results sometimes can be deadly for the driver.

Philando Castile, for example, was fatally shot after the 32-year-old was stopped for a broken tail light in 2016 in Minnesota. Sandra Bland, 28, died in a jail cell three days after being stopped for failing to signal when changing lanes in Texas in 2015.

The largely affluent and progressive San Francisco suburb of 120,000 has led the country on environmental, cultural and equity issues but still has lopsided traffic stop figures.

A 2018 report by the Center for Policing Equity, a research and advocacy group based in Los Angeles, found that Black and Latino drivers were stopped by Berkeley police at higher rates than whites.

Data analyses by the Stanford Open Policing Project at Stanford University also found that Black and Latino drivers were searched far more often than whites, but the searches turned up fewer drugs, guns and other contraband.

Berkeley police issued a statement Wednesday saying the department would work with the community "to determine how we can best evolve to accomplish our mission of safeguarding our community."

Police unions for Los Angeles, San Francisco and San Jose issued a statement opposing the proposal. The Berkeley police union did not respond to requests for comment this week.

Arreguin, the mayor, said creating a new department is a phase-two development that's at least a year away and would likely involve making changes to state law.

Berkeley moves toward removing police from traffic stops

Traffic stops can be dangerous and require extensive training, said Chuck Wexler, executive director of the Police Executive Research Forum, a research organization that promotes best practices in policing. He also recognizes fairness and profiling are issues for law enforcement.

"At the end of the day, policymakers would have to ask themselves if this change accomplished their intended goals," he said.

Graphic

A Berkeley police vehicle waits at a stop light near graffiti calling for the defunding of the Berkeley police department on Wednesday, July 15, 2020, in Berkeley, Calif. The city of Berkeley moved forward Wednesday with a proposal to eliminate police from conducting traffic stops and instead use unarmed civilian city workers as part of a broad overhaul of law enforcement. The City Council also set a goal of cutting the police budget by 50%. (AP Photo/Ben Margot)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCC. FOUNDATIONS FORM NEW RACIAL JUSTICE COALITION

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 392 wordsByline: KELLY SMITH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

More than 20 foundations and philanthropic organizations across Minnesota - from Target in Minneapolis to Blandin in Grand Rapids - are backing a new coalition aiming to reform philanthropy, denounce racism and raise $25 million for Black-led nonprofits and advocacy groups.

The coalition, announced Tuesday, is in response to the death of George Floyd, 46, at the hands of Minneapolis police on May 25, sparking calls for racial justice.

Minnesota's strong philanthropic and nonprofit sector has its own problems with racial inequities. A majority of its employees are white, especially in leadership, and Black-led initiatives and nonprofits are largely underfunded.

"What are we doing in our systems to perpetuate harmful practices and how can we transform ourselves in order to transform society?" said Lulete Mola, vice president of community impact at the Women's Foundation of Minnesota and one of three leaders of the group. "What we have been doing so far alone has not been working."

The coalition, called the Philanthropic Collective to Combat Anti-Blackness & Realize Racial Justice, is also led by Chanda Smith Baker, senior vice president of community impact at the Minneapolis Foundation, and Repa Mekha, CEO at Nexus Community Partners.

It aims to raise $25 million for its Black-Led Movement Fund, which will be housed at Nexus Community Partners in St. Paul. Black Visions, a Minnesota organization, will help determine how funds will be distributed.

"We believe that fund really symbolizes a transfer of power, if you will, a transfer of resources to Black communities to decide for ourselves where we think we need investments," Mola said.

The coalition wants foundations to sign on to a statement on the sector's role in anti-racism work and help establish policies to address anti-Blackness and racial justice. Those could include how decisions are made about grants that support general operations and changing decisions over hiring employees or naming board members, who are often white.

Foundations form new racial justice coalition

Philanthropy, Mekha added, can create change through the millions of dollars it gives and uniting in a collective voice.

"I think it has called on philanthropy to be bold in a different kind of way," he added of Floyd's death. "The energy behind [the coalition] is greater than anything I've seen in philanthropy in my life."

Kelly Smith · 612-673-4141

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

End of Document

Lake Street Council distributes first $2.8M to damaged businesses

ARTICLE MCCI. LAKE STREET COUNCIL DISTRIBUTES FIRST \$2.8M TO DAMAGED BUSINESSES

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 611 words

Byline: Carrigan Miller

Body

The Lake Street Council has distributed $2.8 million in grants to businesses in the Lake Street corridor that were damaged in the civil unrest following the killing of George Floyd, it announced Wednesday.

The grants were distributed to 175 businesses in south Minneapolis. Eighty-six percent of those businesses are owned by people who are Black, Indigenous, people of color (BIPOC) or immigrants, while 81% have fewer than 10 employees. The grants were open to any organizations on or near Lake Street with 100 or fewer employees and less than $3 million in annual revenue.

It's the first tranche of cash distributed by the Lake Street Council, which has received $8.86 million in donations in the weeks since the violence, as of Wednesday. About 70,000 individuals have donated to the nonprofit.

The grants were capped at $25,000 and are intended to help many of the businesses on Lake Street reopen as soon as possible by helping to fund building repairs, replace inventories and other needs. Nearly two-thirds of the businesses that applied for grants hadn't reopened at the time they applied, said Allison Sharkey, the Lake Street Council's executive director.

Lake Street Council distributes first $2.8M to damaged businesses

"The Lake Street Council's first round of funding helps to provide a valuable lifeline for BIPOC and immigrant-owned businesses at an extremely fragile time. My sincere gratitude and deep appreciation to the Lake Street Council's leadership and team for making sure the funding quickly reached the most at-risk businesses," said Nasibu Sareva, the executive director of the African Development Center, in a statement.

The Lake Street Council is planning a second round of $1 million for other businesses that fit that same criteria. Future rounds beyond that are planned to help businesses that suffered greater damage, like those that completely lost their storefronts due to arson.

"If your place completely burned down, $25,000 isn't going to do it," she said.

To help with distributing the funds, the council hired four contractors last month in addition to its full-time staff of five. It's also receiving pro bono legal and accounting help, Sharkey said.

Much like organizations in North Minneapolis, the Lake Street Council is starting to grow worried about land speculators. While she hasn't yet heard about any businesses that don't plan to return to Lake Street, some businesses have started to receive low-ball offers for their property. There are still hard decisions ahead, she said, and more money will be needed to keep control of Lake Street in the community.

Sharkey has her eyes on the latest special session of the Minnesota Legislature for additional relief funding. That funding would be especially welcome since the federal government denied Minnesota's request for disaster funding.

It's a frustrating decision, and one that goes against the precedent of President George H.W. Bush authorized $638 million to Los Angeles after that city experienced rioting in 1992, Sharkey said.

"While I'm not surprised necessarily, I'm really disappointed. It's pretty devastating not to be able to count on federal support," she said.

On the positive side, people from outside the neighborhood haven't stayed away from Lake Street. There's been a great deal of support not just from South Minneapolis, but from people across the state and country, Sharkey said.

"We've been pretty blown away by the number of people who are coming to check it out, to see and understand better. People are interested in coming back," she said. "We hope that when they come, they stop and spend some money."

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

ARTICLE MCCII. LETTERS: FOLLOW THE STATISTICS - AND FREE MINNESOTA

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1189 wordsByline: Letter WritersHighlight: I realize that bearing the responsibility of the welfare of the citizens of the state of Minnesota is significant, yet Gov. Walz and the Minnesota Department of Health have a dismal batting average when it comes to projecting and administrating the Covid response. On March 25, in his stay-at-home announcement, Gov. Walz spoke of 74,000 dying. [...]Body

I realize that bearing the responsibility of the welfare of the citizens of the state of Minnesota is significant, yet Gov. Walz and the Minnesota Department of Health have a dismal batting average when it comes to projecting and administrating the Covid response.

On March 25, in his stay-at-home announcement, Gov. Walz spoke of 74,000 dying.

In April, the "team" projected a total 12-month fatality rate of 22,000. Model version 3.0 released on May 13 projected total 12-month Minnesota fatalities of 29,000. All of this, it seems, reminiscent of "Pin the tail on the donkey."

Yes, with more testing we are discovering far more people who carry the virus - yet many are asymptomatic, and the number of people who require hospitalization - and, more importantly, the number of Covid-related deaths - are significantly down.

Yet Gov. Walz and his administration continue to strangle our Minnesota commerce, trade and private lives. There are many families, businesses, and corporations that will never recover.

Gov. Walz should - as has been repeated ad nauseam - follow the science, better yet, follow the actual statistics - free Minnesota and her citizens.

Chad Crow, Woodbury

One of the reasons so many people move to Woodbury is our parks and open spaces. Back when the Valley Creek Park was purchased by the city, protecting this land was the priority. The property was purchased through a Metro Greenway Grant from the Minnesota DNR to "provide opportunities for corridors for wildlife movement and ecological connections between natural areas" and the Land and Water Legacy Grant, "Through the Land and Water Legacy Program, the county works with landowners and organizations to purchase land to keep in natural condition." Nowhere is the Miller barn mentioned as a reason to purchase this property ("Is this barn worth saving," July 13).

When the property was purchased the argument given for using tax payer dollars to purchase this property was about protecting this parcel from development. What the parks department and the heritage society has laid out in its plans is a highly developed park. At the time of purchase the city argued this: "Protecting this parcel from development is critical to maintaining the Valley Creek Trout Stream as one of the last few viable trout streams within the Metropolitan Area."

If the city decides to keep the Miller barn and move forward with the current concept plan it will be clearing and removing vegetation, dredging, grading, excavating, transporting and filling land as well as paving and adding additional impervious surface cover.

All the wildlife that lives on this property will be affected. Currently there are deer, frogs, turtles, snakes, pheasants, turkey, woodpeckers, great horned owls, hawks, coyote, red tailed fox, and these are just a few of the animals I have seen myself.

Very little of Woodbury remains as it existed prior to settlement. As a result of human activities such as farming and development, most of Woodbury's native vegetation has been altered or replaced. Important native vegetation still exists in the Valley Creek Park; its native prairie, oak savanna and wetland are home to some of the rarest native plant communities in Minnesota.

Maintaining the natural ecosystem in the Valley Creek Park should be the city's priority. Taking the focus away from protecting the land's natural resources and instead building a barn and a 75-car parking lot and multiple paved trails and a park as large as Madison Place strips Valley Creek Park of all of its value to current and future generations. The Miller barn should be thoughtfully removed and instead the city should create a park and trail system where all of Woodbury can enjoy the wonders of nature for years to come.

Megan Samuel, Woodbury

It's quite the coincidence that not long before George Floyd's death my wife had passed on to me her copy of Melvin Whitfield Carter Jr.'s autobiography, "Diesel Heart." My wife is an avid reader and sometimes passes books on to me that she thinks I will enjoy. I did read the book and feel it has a lot to say to all of us today.

In this turbulent time, where police departments are being scrutinized and we hear one side talking about a few "bad apples," and the other side saying defund the police, it was extraordinary to read a black officer's account of his 28 years with the St. Paul Police Department. Now I know his time as a cop (1976-2005), was a different era, but given the continued frequency of race-related events involving the police today, I think this book must still be relevant. I end here with several quotes, which only scratch the surface of what the whole book delivers. Quotes that hopefully can help illuminate where police and community leaders can focus their attention as they work to improve our police departments:

"The police workplace proved to be hostile, vicious, racist and violent. More amazing was how badly cops treated each other." (p. 180)

"Besides, for a Black officer, 'proving himself' meant acting like a white officer while policing Blacks - in effect, prioritizing blue loyalty over his humanity and betraying his Black identity. Since I never would have chosen police work had it not been for the community-driven, class-action lawsuit, I was always aware that I, more than anyone else, had a debt to repay. Deep community hadn't gone through all that long hard work for me to come on and cosign the traditional insensitive okeydoke! My task was to help curve the arc of justice for change." (p.184)

"A hard-nosed Black cop was the last thing Black folks needed." (p. 191)

"As a one-man squad, I could only count on backup when about three certain white officers were on shift. Some guys called for backup at parking meter violations. But I'd get dispatched to violent domestics, some of the most dangerous calls we had, and be all alone." (p. 194)

"Meanwhile, my personnel file overflowed with thank-you letters from citizens.... (T)he department ... quit putting them in my file. I was told thank-you letters fit in the category of 'public relations' instead of true police work." (p.217)

"Connecting with a citizen's humanity was my thing, but even beyond virtue, it was also a survival tactic. ... The flip side was I couldn't allow a fellow African American to attempt to manipulate me with the term Brother." (p. 225)

"Come to find out, policing white people is infinitely easier than policing Blacks. White people believe in the law and trust the police because both always work on their behalf. Blacks have always had an entirely different experience. They have never had the protection guaranteed by the Constitution, never enjoyed the presumption of innocence, never trusted the police." (p. 226)

"It was ironic that many of the citizens whom cops labeled 'a-holes' had been my dear friends for years." (p. 227)

Jim Stevens, St. Paul Letters: We need more good police, not fewer Hey, State Fair ticket scalpers: you're tainted! Letters: Mayor and governor point fingers but expect the federal government to pay? Letters: Is it the most-rigged election ever, win or lose? Letters: What's the St. Paul budget plan?

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Mpls. begins debate over charter Minneapolis police and the future

ARTICLE MCCIII. MPLS. BEGINS DEBATE OVER CHARTER MINNEAPOLIS POLICE AND THE FUTURE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 15, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1A

Length: 1003 words

Byline: LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

The next few weeks will be crucial for the future of policing in Minneapolis.

In the weeks since George Floyd's death, some people have pushed to abolish the Police Department. Others have advocated scaling it back and boosting investments in violence prevention and mental health programs.

Up for consideration now is an attempt by some City Council members to change the city's charter to eliminate the requirement to have a police department. Here's what we know about the proposal.

Q: Why are we talking about changing the city charter?

Floyd's killing added new urgency to a longstanding argument about how to reform a police department that disproportionately uses force on people of color, especially those who are Black.

Some have called for the department to be abolished, and nine City Council members promised to "begin the process of ending" the MPD.

The city charter presents an obstacle. It currently requires the City Council to "fund a police force of at least 0.0017 employees per resident."

Based on the latest census data, that amounts to roughly 730 police employees. The department currently has about 825 officers, though it's authorized to employ more.

Q: Why does that requirement exist?

A: Some version of the requirement has existed since at least the early 1960s. In 1961, voters agreed overwhelmingly to earmark some tax revenue for police and set a rate of 1.7 officers for every 1,000 residents.

Mpls. begins debate over charter Minneapolis police and the future

Supporters pitched the proposal as a way to add 150 officers to the force, bringing it to roughly 800. The measure was supported by the police union, as well as some local union leaders and business groups.

The precise language has changed some over the years, but the overarching idea of requiring a minimum number of police has remained.

Q: What change is the city considering now?

A: Five City Council members - Jeremiah Ellison, Alondra Cano, Steve Fletcher, Cam Gordon and Council President Lisa Bender - wrote a charter amendment to remove the requirement to maintain a police department. In its place, the city would be required to create a Department of Community Safety and Violence Prevention, which would seek to promote a "holistic, public health-oriented approach" to safety.

It would also remove the language that says the mayor has "complete power" over the Police Department, and gives the City Council some additional authority.

Q: Would there still be police if the charter is amended?

A: Unclear. The proposal as it's currently written says that the City Council "may maintain" a Division of Law Enforcement Services, which would include "licensed peace officers."

Asked during a public meeting why they made that division optional, Council Members Gordon and Fletcher said they wanted to ensure that future city leaders have some flexibility if new models for public safety arise.

If the measure passes in its current form, decisions about police staffing would be made by the mayor and City Council in separate processes.

Bender, in a public meeting earlier this month, said she can say "with relative confidence that the consensus of the [current] council would be that there needs to be some level of peace officers in the new division."

Q: How would this change happen?

A: The proposal is before the Charter Commission, a group of court-appointed volunteers entrusted with overseeing the city's constitution.

Commissioners must review the matter and give a recommendation to approve it or reject it, or offer an alternative.

The matter then heads back to the City Council, which is not bound by the Charter Commission's recommendation.

It would eventually need to be approved by voters.

Q: How do people feel about the proposal?

A: It's too early to get a complete picture. The city has received more than 5,000 public comments.

Mayor Jacob Frey blasted the proposal, saying he believes it's too vague and voters deserve more clarity.

Mpls. begins debate over charter Minneapolis police and the future

Some groups calling for the Police Department to be abolished have said they fear it still leaves open the possibility that a law enforcement officer could helm the new department.

Q: Why is this happening so quickly?

A: There is an Aug. 21 deadline for adding items to the November ballot.

The council members who wrote the amendment have said they believe the charter needs to change quickly so they can embark on an honest conversation about overhauling public safety in the city.

Opponents have said they fear the process, which would normally unfold over several months, is happening too fast. The Charter Commission could take a full 150 days to review the proposal, preventing it from getting on the ballot this year. If the commission bypasses that deadline, the measure could still go on the 2021 ballot.

Q: Do they really need to change the charter?

A: If they want to completely eliminate the Police Department, council members would need to work with the public to change the charter.

The City Council could, in the interim, try to drop the force down to the minimum required levels. Many will be watching to see if they try that as they revise the 2020 budget and work on the 2021 budget.

Q: Are there any other proposals?

A: Two charter commissioners have floated their own ideas.

Commissioner Greg Abbott suggested running a two-year pilot program before switching to a wider public safety department. Commissioner Al Giraud-Isaacson suggested creating one community safety department and a separate law enforcement department, with a minimum staffing requirement set at roughly half the current level.

Q: How can I offer my public comments?

A: The Charter Commission will hold two virtual public hearings on the council's proposal.

The first will start at 5 p.m. Wednesday. The second will start at 6 p.m. July 21. They can be viewed at Comcast Channel 14 or 799; CenturyLink Channel 8001 or 8501; or at www.minneapolismn.gov/government/city-council-tv/.

People who wish to submit public comment can visit www2.minneapolismn.gov or call 311 for help.

People who want to speak during the hearings can sign up online via the city's website.

Liz Navratil · 612-673-4994

Load-Date: July 15, 2020

Bodycam: Cop drew gun at start

ARTICLE MCCIV. BODYCAM: COP DREW GUN AT START

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 16, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1256 wordsByline: CHAO XIONG; LIZ SAWYER; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Body camera footage showed that police gave George Floyd no explanation for why they were questioning him before former Minneapolis police officer Thomas Lane pointed a gun, swore at him and forced him out of his vehicle.

The court made footage captured by Lane and fellow fired officer J. Alexander Kueng publicly viewable Wednesday by appointment. The videos showed that Floyd immediately grew terrified and cried as he told Lane he hadn't done anything, and that paramedics who arrived at the scene appeared unhurried after taking his pulse while he lay unresponsive in the street.

They drew strong reactions from some members of the public who viewed them.

"It was horrifying," said civil rights attorney and activist Nekima Levy Armstrong. "They did not treat George Floyd as if he was human from the moment they approached the vehicle - holding him at gunpoint, not listening to him, not taking his concerns seriously."

Lane, Kueng and Tou Thao are charged with aiding and abetting murder and manslaughter in Floyd's death while he was under arrest on May 25 at E. 38th Street and S. Chicago Avenue.

Another fired officer, Derek Chauvin, is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter for planting his knee into Floyd's neck, even as Floyd pleaded to breathe.

The videos showed that neither Lane nor Kueng told Floyd or his two passengers why they were being investigated until about six minutes after the encounter began and after Floyd had been handcuffed.

Prosecutors have said Chauvin knelt on Floyd's neck for nearly 8 minutes, but Kueng's video showed that it was about 9 minutes and 30 seconds.

Lane's attorney, Earl Gray, filed the two videos in court last week along with a motion to dismiss the charges against his client. Gray has argued that Lane was a rookie working at the direction of Chauvin, a 19-year veteran.

Bodycam: Cop drew gun at start

Lane twice asked about turning the 46-year-old Floyd from his stomach onto his side after Floyd complained that he couldn't breathe, but was rebuffed by Chauvin.

Lane also got into an ambulance and performed CPR, Gray has argued.

Lane was the first officer to engage with Floyd, and did not inform him that he was being investigated on suspicion of using a fake $20 bill at Cup Foods.

Floyd repeatedly said "please" and asked what was going on. "I didn't do nothing," Floyd said about two minutes into the video, holding his left hand in the air as he sat in the driver's seat of a car.

"Put your [expletive] hands up right now!" Lane yelled while aiming a gun at Floyd. "Let me see your other hand."

Location of hands

The videos, which had a limited vantage point, showed that Floyd began crying about two minutes into Lane's video and was reluctant to exit his car after Lane offered no explanation for the investigation.

Floyd was also reluctant to enter the squad car after Kueng had informed him about the report of a fake bill. He did not appear to fight back or flee.

According to the videos and corresponding transcripts: Lane and his partner, Kueng, were the first to arrive about 8:08 p.m. A store manager told them someone used a fake bill and directed them to a blue Mercedes SUV outside.

Floyd was in the driver's seat with his back turned to the rolled up window; he pivoted toward Lane.

"Oh!" Floyd said.

About 1 minute and 38 seconds into Lane's video, the car's windows reflected Lane holding up his gun in his right hand, pointing it toward Floyd.

"Hey, man, I'm sorry!" Floyd said, opening the car door.

"Stay in the car," Lane said.

At 1 minute and 44 seconds in Lane's video, Lane pushed the car door farther open with his left hand while pointing his gun at Floyd and ordering him to "put your [expletive] hands up."

"All right," said a visibly distraught Floyd. "What I do though? What we do, Mr. Officer?"

Floyd forced from car

Lane reached his left hand into the car and placed it on top of Floyd's left hand and part of his head. Lane began to reholster his gun about the same time.

About 2 minutes and 37 seconds into Lane's video, Lane placed his left hand on Floyd's hands and his right hand on Floyd's back inside the car and tugged on him slightly. Floyd was in tears and begged him not to shoot. Floyd was eventually removed from the vehicle. Kueng and Lane handcuffed him, with Lane twisting Floyd's right arm up at a sharp angle.

Bodycam: Cop drew gun at start

Kueng walked Floyd away from the SUV while Lane spoke to Floyd's two passengers, a man and a woman who were standing on the sidewalk. About 6 minutes into Lane's video, he told the woman they were investigating a fake bill.

About six minutes into Kueng's video, he informed Floyd about the investigation while the two are standing apart from the others.

"We're here because it sounds like you gave a fake bill to the individuals in there," he said after getting a name and birth date from Floyd, who appears to have calmed slightly. Kueng then stood him up and Floyd again began to panic, begging them not to place him in the squad.

Chauvin kneels on neck

Lane and Kueng struggled for about three minutes to get Floyd into the back of their squad.

Floyd, who told them he was claustrophobic and pleaded with them to stop, fell sideways into the car on the rear driver's side after Kueng pressed one hand on his chest and the other on his head.

Lane tried to pull Floyd in from the rear passenger side.

Floyd wheezed, telling them he just had COVID and couldn't breathe. He eventually fell out of the passenger door. By that time Chauvin and Thao were at the scene.

About 11 minutes into Lane's video, Lane grabbed Floyd's leg and helped Chauvin and Kueng flip Floyd from his back onto his stomach in the street.

The bodycam video and video recorded by a bystander showed Chauvin kneeling on Floyd's neck while Floyd said he couldn't breathe, called out "mama" several times and warned that he was going to die. Bystanders also pleaded with the officers to stop. Lane's video showed that he asked twice about rolling Floyd onto his side, but did not appear to express urgency or fear in his voice.

About 16 minutes into Lane's video Floyd stopped talking and appeared unresponsive. His last words were: "Come on, man. ... They killed me. They killed me. I can't breathe. I can't breathe. Oh! Ah! Ah! Please, please, please."

Kueng checked Floyd's pulse, couldn't find one and appeared to move back and stopped holding onto Floyd. Chauvin and Lane continued restraining Floyd for about three minutes until paramedics arrived.

Paramedics unhurried

About 19 minutes and 40 seconds into Lane's video, a paramedic arrived and took Floyd's pulse at his neck. The paramedic walked away without a sense of urgency before Floyd was loaded onto a stretcher, still unresponsive and handcuffed.

About three minutes after the ambulance arrived, a paramedic in the back of the ambulance took Floyd's pulse and instructed Lane, who was on board, to begin CPR as Lane explained what happened.

Floyd was pronounced dead at HCMC at 9:25 p.m.

Joseph Malinao, 25, a former EMT who has local police officer friends, watched the videos because he wanted an objective look at what transpired.

Bodycam: Cop drew gun at start

The videos were difficult to watch, he said, adding that he came away feeling that Chauvin was the only one who should face charges. However, Malinao was struck by how quickly the situation escalated.

"It's baffling to pull the gun that quick over a forgery charge," he said of Lane's initial contact with Floyd. "That set the tone for the whole interaction."

chao.xiong@startribune.com

612-270-4708 · Twitter: @ChaoStrib

liz.sawyer@startribune.com

612-673-4648 · Twitter: @bylizsawyer

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCV. FLOYD FAMILY SUES CITY, OFFICERS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 16, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 1502 wordsByline: RANDY FURST; PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Suit claims they used lethal force improperly and that MPD fosters a "warrior-style" culture.Body

Attorneys for the family of George Floyd sued the city of Minneapolis and the four officers involved in his death Wednesday, vowing to send a message that the police training and practices that target Black people and led to his killing must no longer be tolerated in the United States.

"This is a teachable moment for America," said attorney Ben Crump, standing outside the U.S. Courthouse in downtown Minneapolis.

While not specifying how much the family will seek in compensation, Crump said, "This is an unprecedented case, and with this lawsuit we seek to set a precedent that makes it financially prohibitive for police to wrongfully kill marginalized people - especially Black people - in the future."

Crump said that how the city leaders react to the demands put forth by the Floyd family lawyers will have consequences. "Their political legacy will be defined by how they respond," he said.

City Attorney Erik Nilsson said in a statement that "George Floyd's death is a tragedy.

The city is reviewing the lawsuit filed by his family and will be responding to it. Criminal charges are pending against four Minneapolis police officers, and it's very important that the criminal case proceed without interference."

A spokesman for the Police Officers' Federation of Minneapolis said the union is declining to comment about the suit.

Floyd died May 25 after officer Derek Chauvin pinned his knee against Floyd's neck for nearly 8 minutes as Floyd, who was handcuffed, cried out that he couldn't breathe and bystanders pleaded with Chauvin to stop.

Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and manslaughter. Three other officers at the scene - Tou Thao, Thomas Lane and J. Alexander Kueng - are charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and manslaughter. All have been fired.

Floyd family sues city, officers

The federal suit accuses the officers of a "reckless disregard" for Floyd's civil rights.

"This complaint shows what we have said all along, that Mr. Floyd died because the weight of the entire Minneapolis Police Department was on his neck," Crump said in a statement. "The city of Minneapolis has a history of policies, procedures and deliberate indifference that violates the rights of arrestees, particularly Black men, and highlights the need for officer training and discipline."

The suit contends that the officers used deadly force in non-deadly circumstances.

It also alleges that the department engaged in a culture of "warrior-style" or "killology" training, failed to terminate dangerous officers and fostered a culture of racism, leading to a violation of Floyd's civil rights.

In April 2019, Mayor Jacob Frey announced he was banning officers from receiving "fear-based" training. In defiance of the mayor, the police union quickly countered that it was partnering with a national police organization to offer free "warrior-style" training.

On Tuesday, the Police Department said it is changing its use-of-force policy to encourage officers to de-escalate tense situations and hold them accountable when force or weapons are used. Officers will now be required to document how they tried to de-escalate situations, why they decided to use force and why they chose a specific level of force.

The suit lists other litigation over allegations of police brutality by Minneapolis officers, and cites the 2010 death of David Smith, who was killed by two Minneapolis police officers at the downtown YMCA when they subdued him by placing a knee on his back for more than 4 minutes. That death was ruled a homicide by the Medical Examiner's Office, and his family settled the case for $3 million. Jeff Storms, one of the Minneapolis attorneys in that case, is now one of the lawyers representing the Floyd family.

"The Floyd family deserves justice for the inhumane way in which officers with the Minneapolis Police Department killed Mr. Floyd," said attorney L. Chris Stewart, who is also working on the case. "The city has a responsibility to acknowledge the history and practices of excessive force and impunity with its police force, as well as shortfalls in officer training and discipline."

Said Stewart: "He was literally tortured to death."

'Turn a blind eye'

The 40-page lawsuit recounts how officers Lane and Kueng were dispatched to Cup Foods at 38th and Chicago at 8 p.m. on May 25 in response to a call that Floyd had engaged in potential fraud, "a nonviolent offense," for allegedly trying to pass a phony $20 bill.

The suit says Floyd was unarmed and did not resist, yet was handcuffed. Chauvin and Kueng arrived and after Floyd said he was claustrophobic when they tried to put him in a squad car, Lane suggested that the other officers put him in a "maximal restraint technique," placing him face down on the street with the left side of his face pressed against the pavement.

Lane and Kueng knelt on Floyd's back and legs and twisted his arms to the side of his body while "Chauvin drove his left knee in the back of Mr. Floyd's neck."

Floyd family sues city, officers

Floyd begged the officers to stop, saying, "Tell my kids I love them. I'm dead," and repeatedly groaning, "I can't breathe." the suit said. The officers held him in the position even as onlookers said Floyd was bleeding from the nose and begged the officers to get off him.

Lane suggested to the other officers that Floyd be rolled onto his side, stating, "I am worried about excited delirium or whatever." Chauvin responded, "That's why we have him on his stomach," which the suit alleges was contrary to national law enforcement best practices. "No officer attempted to move from Mr. Floyd's body or roll him onto his side," the suit says.

When an onlooker approached officer Thao and urged him to check Floyd's pulse, Thao responded, "Don't do drugs, guys."

The suit said that when another onlooker identified as a health care professional with the city's health department asked officers to check Floyd's pulse, Thao told her to "get on the sidewalk."

The suit alleges that the Minneapolis Police Department trained officers that a "neck restraint" was an authorized form of non-deadly force and that a "chokehold" was a form of deadly force capable of causing serious bodily injury and/or death. The department trained officers that a proper neck restraint required the officer to "[c]ompress veins, arteries, nerves & muscles of the neck," although adding that serious bodily injury or death can result, the suit said.

The suit also says that since 2012, neck restraints and holds were used by Minneapolis police officers on 428 people, 14% of whom lost consciousness. Training materials offered to officers in 2014, including Chauvin and Thao, depict an officer placing a knee on the neck of an arrestee who is handcuffed in a prone position, the suit said.

It said the department failed to provide officers with proper policy guidance and training on how to observe and attend to the medical needs of arrestees subjected to neck restraints.

The suit contends that it has long been known that people placed in a prone position should be on their side as soon as they are secure, but "as of 2012, officers were not provided official training on the dangers of positional or mechanical asphyxia associated with prone restraint" despite the "well-known risk of death."

The suit singles out police union President Bob Kroll, who it alleges had a "white power" logo on a jacket, encouraged officers to "behave aggressively" and has high influence in the department yet has not been disciplined or fired. Kroll has previously denied that he wore such a logo. The suit also said that Chauvin and Thao had enough complaints on their record that they should have been fired before Floyd's death.

The suit also said the department "tolerated, permitted, failed to correct, promoted or ratified a number of customs, patterns or practices that condoned and required officers to turn a blind eye to and not intervene with the use of excessive force by MPD officers."

Similar suits rarely go to trial

Suits against police officers over wrongful death rarely go to trial in Minnesota as city officials worry that a jury could award even more money than a settlement. Payouts involving police encounters have varied widely in recent years in Minneapolis and a nearby suburb; some have been huge.

Floyd family sues city, officers

In 2019, the excessive-force lawsuit by the family of the Justine Ruszczyk Damond, who was white, was settled for $20 million, the largest in the city's history. An unarmed Damond was shot in the alley behind her southwest Minneapolis home by the now-imprisoned officer, Mohamed Noor.

Also last year, the family of Jamar Clark, a young Black man who was fatally shot by Minneapolis police in 2015, reached a $200,000 settlement with the city. It came months after the City Council rejected a previous offer as too low.

The mother of Philando Castile, a Black motorist killed by a St. Anthony police officer in 2016, has reached a nearly $3 million settlement with the city that employed the former officer, Jeronimo Yanez, who was acquitted of manslaughter.

Randy Furst · 612-673-4224

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

End of Document

Fox's Harris Faulkner is used to people making presumptions

ARTICLE MCCVI. FOX'S HARRIS FAULKNER IS USED TO PEOPLE MAKING PRESUMPTIONS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 16, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1221 words

Byline: Associated Press

Highlight: NEW YORK (AP) - As a Black journalist who works at Fox News Channel, Harris Faulkner is accustomed to people who presume to know where she stands on issues.

Body

By DAVID BAUDER

NEW YORK (AP) - As a Black journalist who works at Fox News Channel, Harris Faulkner is accustomed to people who presume to know where she stands on issues.

She's motivated more than bothered by that.

"When anybody looks at you and looks at your position and think they know who you are, you have the advantage of being able to surprise them," said Faulkner, centerpiece of two weekday hours at Fox and host of a special on America's racial reckoning that airs at 10 p.m. Eastern on Sunday.

Faulkner is the most prominent Black personality at Fox as moderator on "Outnumbered" at noon each weekday, reaching an audience that is overwhelmingly white and conservative during a season of racial unrest over police brutality and calls for a more equitable society.

She sees it as an opportunity to involve them in a conversation they're not often part of.

"To be Black and on the air at Fox News presents a greater challenge than if you're working on any other traditional news network," said Roland S. Martin, host of the digital news show "Unfiltered." "It is difficult. It is a minefield you have to walk."

Faulkner schooled President Donald Trump on racial issues in an interview that earned her plaudits last month. She also sometimes asks questions on "Outnumbered" that hew closely to a conservative line.

The 54-year-old Faulkner's father is a former U.S. Army officer who passed on a love of country to his daughter despite experiencing the segregated South. "He used to tell me, 'I'd rather fight for what I believe in and know that America will catch up and get through the struggle than fight for any other nation on Earth.'" she said.

Fox's Harris Faulkner is used to people making presumptions

She worked local news jobs in Greenville, N.C., Kansas City and Minneapolis, joining Fox News in 2005.

Faulkner met Byron Pitts, co-anchor of ABC News' "Nightline," when they both covered the Oklahoma City bombing in 1995.

"She's a very smart journalist," Pitts said. "She's the real deal ... I respect her."

What Faulkner seeks, both Sunday and on "Outnumbered," is to discuss issues brought up in the wake of George Floyd's death from many vantage points.

Faulkner knows that police treatment of Blacks is an issue; she's been pulled over for "driving while Black." At the same time, she holds deep respect for civil servants like police.

"Funding of police is a conversation that needs to have everybody at the table, not just the people shouting in the streets," Faulkner said.

When discussing Black Lives Matter in an interview with The Associated Press, Faulkner brings up violence in cities like Chicago, killings of children and wonders why demonstrators aren't marching in the streets to protest Black-on-Black crime.

Many supporters of the movement consider that a deflection, akin to answering Black Lives Matter with "all lives matter." Of course, all lives matter, they say. The point is to draw attention to times when officials with a duty to serve and protect seem to value Black lives less.

Told that no one is arguing that the lives of young people caught up in street violence don't matter, Faulkner said, "But nobody is saying they do, and that's the problem."

In her view, "everybody's race counts.

"My husband is white," she said. "His faith is Judaism. When we talk about these issues, we don't get into a discussion of how my life matters more than his, or his life matters more than mine. We get at it from, 'how do we both rise in this situation?'"

When Joe Biden told a radio host in May that "you ain't Black" if you can't figure out whether to support him or Trump for president - a remark the Democrat quickly apologized for - it drew an unusually personal response from Faulkner. She publicly said that Biden's statement was hurtful.

"It especially hit home to me because I am in a biracial community in my home," she said, "and talking about somebody's blackness based on how they think or how they look is insulting. And it keeps us back as people of color."

Trump retweeted her statement about Biden, adding that she was "a great American."

One moment from "Outnumbered" last year became fodder for discussion on Martin's show. Jessica Tarlov, usually the lone Democrat on "Outnumbered" was listing racist incidents involving Trump when Faulkner interrupted with a plea for civility. It led to questions about whether she's as hard on Trump on the topic of race as she was on Biden.

Tarlov, in an interview, said she did not think Faulkner cut her off or that it should be viewed that she was protecting Trump. "We're all human and things hit us in certain ways," she said.

Fox's Harris Faulkner is used to people making presumptions

Faulkner recalled being tough on the air about how Trump initially responded to Hurricane Maria in Puerto Rico in 2017.

It's in that moment," she said. "I can't speak to every single moment, but when it hits me, I'm as hard as can be."

Tarlov said she had no idea who Faulkner supported for president in 2016, despite working with her for three years.

Asked whether she supported Trump, Faulkner said people can think whatever they want. "I don't discuss how I vote with anybody," she said. "I'm a journalist. We shouldn't do that. Some do. But I'm not proselytizing any particular point of view, faith or otherwise, and if they want to think what they think, go right ahead."

She added, "I challenge anybody to guess where I'm coming from. And, in fact, if they have answers, can they tell me?"

When Faulkner teamed with Bill Hemmer in the spring for a coronavirus town hall with Trump, they were criticized for going soft. But that wasn't the case when Faulkner sat down with Trump in June during the protests following Floyd's death.

When Trump appeared to question some of Abraham Lincoln's achievements, Faulkner responded, "Well, we are free, Mr. President."

And when she asked about Trump's tweeting, "when the looting starts, the shooting starts," Faulkner came prepared with an explanation of where the phrase originated and why many found it disturbing.

That showed the importance of having an African American journalist with presence do the interview, Martin said.

"Guess what?" he said. "Maria Bartiromo wouldn't have done that. Sean Hannity wouldn't have done that. Laura Ingraham wouldn't have done that."

Bill Grueskin, a Columbia University journalism professor, praised Faulkner in Columbia Journalism Review. He wrote that "she was neither antagonistic nor admiring. She put herself into the interview, framed in her roles as a Black woman and parent, in a way that journalists rarely do with her skill and care."

While you could argue that Faulkner could have pressed harder on some questions, "Trump usually gets more defensive," Grueskin wrote. "Faulkner's methodical approach has its own power."

Faulkner said her role is not to play "gotcha," but to listen to the president's answers and follow up.

"It doesn't bother me that people assume," she said. "But it is an opportunity to show them. You don't know until you watch and listen."

This story has been corrected to show Faulkner is 54, not 56. Minnesota native and fan favorite Janelle Pierzina returns to 'Big Brother' for the fourth time Noontime anchor Ali Lucia has left WCCO after her husband was promoted to new job in Chicago Regis Philbin, television personality and host, dies at

Fox's Harris Faulkner is used to people making presumptions

88 Nick Cannon apologizes for 'hurtful' anti-Semitic comments NBC's video service Peacock stresses 'free,' looks to 2021

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCVII. POLICING IN MINNEAPOLIS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 16, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 11ALength: 883 wordsByline: JEREMIAH ELLISON; LISA BENDER; ALONDRA CANO; CAM GORDON; STEVE FLETCHER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Five City Council members: Our case for changing the charter // In Minneapolis, we are responsible for making change together. Inaction on the charter's mandate on policing restricts the solutions we can consider.Body

On Monday, May 25, a Minneapolis police officer knelt on the neck of George Floyd, suffocating him to death while he called for his mother and said, "I can't breathe." Three other officers did nothing to save his life. George Floyd joined Justine Ruszczuk Damond, Thurman Blevins, Travis Jordan, Mario Benjamin and Chiasher Fong Vue as the sixth person to be killed by a Minneapolis police officer in the last three years and many more in the years preceding, including Jamar Clark and Terrance Franklin.

In the days that followed Floyd's death, thousands of Minneapolis residents took to the streets during a global pandemic to demand fundamental, structural change to the way we provide public safety. The city has received hundreds of complaints about police behavior during that time, and is cooperating with a lawsuit filed by the Minnesota Department of Human Rights investigating patterns of racial discrimination within the Minneapolis Police Department over the past decade.

In neighborhoods, our communities are facing an uptick in gun violence that needs addressing now.

As members of the Minneapolis City Council, we have the responsibility to address the persistent failures in our policing system and to propose the best possible solutions for safety, including investments in proven strategies to prevent violence. Meaningful change requires a common-sense amendment to the city charter, which we unanimously forwarded to the Charter Commission. We urge them to let Minneapolis residents vote on the amendment this fall.

In every corner of Minneapolis, our constituents want to live in communities where they feel safe and their lives are valued - particularly by city employees who are hired to protect them. Across Minneapolis, we are united by our aspiration for a city where all of us can live stable, healthy lives in communities where people of color, particularly Black community members, are not unjustly targeted, harassed or murdered by public servants. We care about each other and deserve to have our tax dollars used to achieve the results our community is worthy of.

POLICING IN MINNEAPOLIS

Mayors, police chiefs and councils have attempted reform under the current city charter for decades and, despite good-faith effort, accomplished too little. They did not prevent the death of George Floyd. At the same time, the number of officers on the force alone has not made a measurable difference in the rise or fall in violent crime, even as millions more dollars each year are poured into the department. On top of the $193 million annual MPD budget, the city has paid more than $24 million in settlements related to police use of force in the past three years.

We can and we must be the generation of Minneapolis residents that creates a just, effective and sustainable approach to public safety. With an amended city charter, we can deploy a full range of solutions to community safety, building on proven successes and drawing on concrete lessons from Minneapolis neighborhoods and models from other cities, including investments in crisis workers, mental health professionals and mediation services instead of armed police. Inaction on the charter restricts what solutions we can consider, prescribes a "police-centric" approach to safety, and limits our leverage with the police union.

The City Council proposed this charter amendment with consensus - and compromise. It replaces the charter-mandated Police Department with a Department of Community Safety and Violence Prevention, broadening the scope of safety and violence prevention solutions while allowing for the option of a police force in a Division of Law Enforcement Services. The new department would report to the mayor and City Council - like every other department in our city government. Its director would have non-law-enforcement experience. And, like every other city department, there would be a clear, publicly transparent way to make policy and direct staff.

Once the charter amendment passes, our city will have the flexibility to build on multiple efforts already underway to improve public safety. This includes scaling up the work of the City's Office of Violence Prevention and applying data-driven lessons from our 911 Workgroup to improve how we respond to emergency calls. Most important, we have started a process of citywide community engagement to reimagine how our city budget and policies can improve safety and better align with the values we share - a process promising that we'll think bigger than our current charter allows.

We believe the people of Minneapolis are ready to seize the historic opportunity of shedding the systems that have failed us and embracing the profound responsibility of transforming the ways we protect one another and keep each other safe.

We have a duty to work toward true solutions. Minneapolis residents deserve to move forward together and exercise their democratic power. The city charter belongs to the people of Minneapolis. We urge the Charter Commission to let the people of Minneapolis vote.

The authors are members of the Minneapolis City Council. Jeremiah Ellison represents the Fifth Ward; Lisa Bender represents the 10th Ward and is council president; Alondra Cano represents the Ninth Ward; Cam Gordon represents the Second Ward; and Steve Fletcher represents the Third Ward.

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

POLICING IN MINNEAPOLIS

End of Document

Minneapolis police union leaders say they felt abandoned

ARTICLE MCCVIII. MINNEAPOLIS POLICE UNION LEADERS SAY THEY FELT ABANDONED

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 16, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1B

Length: 765 words

Byline: JESSIE VAN BERKEL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: In Senate hearings, Republicans focus on lawlessness in aftermath of Floyd killing.

Body

Minneapolis police union leaders told state senators Wednesday they felt abandoned by city leaders during the civil unrest in May that followed the death of George Floyd, a Black man killed in police custody.

"This needs to be talked about. These officers need to be defended," Minneapolis Police Sgt. Anna Hedberg said as she described watching the city's Third Precinct police station burn.

Two Republican-led Senate committees on Wednesday held the last in a series of hearings focused on the lawlessness of the protests and the responses of city and state leaders, which have come under sharp criticism from President Donald Trump and state GOP leaders.

Three Minneapolis Police Federation board members told legislators that city and state leadership failed by not sending in other law enforcement agencies earlier to help Minneapolis police.

Officer Rich Walker said "politics got in the way" of the response of city and state officials. He described being demoralized watching the Third Precinct building being abandoned, overrun by protesters and set ablaze on May 28, three nights after Floyd's death.

Walker, who is Black, said union members told him around noon that day that the department was giving up the Third Precinct. He went to pick up equipment and described the scene of police employees unplugging computers and taking down pictures. "That is the straw that broke our department's back," he said.

Hedberg, Walker and Federation Vice President Sgt. Sherral Schmidt, who also testified Wednesday, have previously condemned the actions of Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey and Gov. Tim Walz during the several nights of rioting, arson and vandalism that accompanied peaceful protests sparked by Floyd's death.

Minneapolis police union leaders say they felt abandoned

Frey said in a statement Wednesday that if he had ordered police to remain at the precinct, there would have been hand-to-hand combat, injuries or worse. "So instead, we prioritized de-escalation at the Third Precinct by reducing the number of officers outside the building and reallocating them to neighborhoods and community that badly needed the support," he said.

A spokesman for Walz on Wednesday defended the governor's actions on the night the Minneapolis police station was set ablaze, which occurred several hours before the State Patrol and the National Guard arrived at the station.

"The only decision Governor Walz made involving the 3rd Precinct was the mission he ordered to reclaim the building early Friday morning after it was abandoned Thursday night," spokesman Teddy Tschann said in a statement, noting that the governor assumed operational control of the situation after the police station was lost.

In past media interviews, the police union leaders have been joined by police union President Lt. Bob Kroll, who did not participate in Wednesday's hearing.

In a "CBS This Morning" interview last month, Kroll called the cellphone video that showed ex-officer Derek Chauvin kneeling on Floyd's neck "horrific." But he denied there was systemic racism on the force. Kroll, long a controversial figure, took the stage at a Minneapolis rally with Trump in October, drawing criticism for pulling the union into partisan politics. He also has been a staunch supporter of the rights of officers accused of misconduct.

The Senate hearing took place as Republican and DFL lawmakers are in talks to forge a package of police reforms in response to Floyd's death and the deaths of other Black Minnesotans at the hands of police. Some Democrats have criticized the GOP's focus on local leaders' response to the civil unrest rather than the police actions that prompted it.

Sen. Melisa Franzen, DFL-Edina, said the Senate hearings have given only one side of the story. They neither addressed how Floyd died nor the need to tackle structural racism and police reform, she said. She also lamented the absence of witnesses who could address those issues.

Sen. Scott Newman, R-Hutchinson, said he reached out to DFL legislators to suggest local community members to testify. "I was not given any names," he said.

Earlier Senate hearings have been largely focused on property damage and other criminal behavior during riots. Meanwhile, several hearings in the DFL-led House since Floyd's death have centered on police accountability proposals.

While legislators seek an agreement in the ongoing special session, the Minneapolis City Council is considering a plan to end the current Police Department and replace it with what they are calling a "holistic, public health-oriented approach" to safety.

Staff writer Liz Navratil contributed to this report.

Jessie Van Berkel · 651-925-5044

Minneapolis police union leaders say they felt abandoned

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCIX. GENERAL MILLS CEO TALKS LESSONS LEARNED SIX
TUMULTUOUS MONTHS INTO 2020

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

July 16, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 649 words

Byline: Dylan Thomas

Body

General Mills Inc. Chairman and CEO Jeff Harmening said lessons from its China-based businesses helped the company prepare for its Covid-19 response back home.

Harmening said the Golden Valley-based company, which operates a chain of Häagen-Dazs ice cream shops and a frozen dumpling business in China, transitioned office employees there to remote work "almost immediately" when the country became ground zero for the outbreak of a pandemic caused by a new coronavirus earlier this year. It started doing temperature checks at its Chinese manufacturing facilities and required employees to wear masks and practice social distancing early on, "without a single case of Covid-19," he said.

"We (learned we) actually could do business during a pandemic ... but we had to act a little bit differently," he said, adding that a General Mills pandemic taskforce was helping to coordinate the company's global response by early February.

General Mills CEO talks lessons learned six tumultuous months into 2020

Harmening made the comments Wednesday afternoon in an online conversation hosted by Consumer Brands Association, an Arlington, Virginia-based trade association for the food industry. The web conference was part of the CPG Speaks series of talks with leaders in the consumer packaged goods industry.

Net sales for General Mills (NYSE: GIS) were up 21% to $5 billion for the company's most recent fiscal year, which closed May 31. A primary driver of the increase was consumers eating more meals at home during the pandemic.

"It sounds trite, but people have really found the kitchen is the heart of the home," Harmening said.

He predicted the company would hang onto some but not all of those sales as consumer demand returns closer to pre-pandemic levels. Still, he said he expects at-home consumption will remain elevated as the economy recovers from a recession and massive job losses prompted by the pandemic.

Harmening said the global health crisis highlighted the importance of the food processing industry, deemed essential during the pandemic. And the company's workforce felt it.

"People are enormously proud of what we've been able to do," he said, noting that 98% of the company's manufacturing and logistics workforce reported for duty every day - a higher rate than before the pandemic.

Meanwhile, office employees adjusted to a new work-from-home reality. The shift meant fewer internal meetings and a greater focus on meeting the day-to-day needs of employees and consumers, Harmening said.

"As a result, we have moved faster than probably we ever have before," he said.

The conversation also touched on the police killing of George Floyd on Memorial Day, which took place on a Minneapolis street corner just 20 miles from the company's suburban headquarters. Floyd's death sparked a global reckoning over police violence and the effects of systemic racism.

"It opened my eyes to the systematic changes we have to make in policing and education and healthcare. There's a lot of work ahead of us," Harmening said, pledging that General Mills will "be part of the solution."

Harmening said the company prides itself on its inclusivity efforts and will share best practices with its industry peers. But it's also a time to listen and collaborate with others, he added.

"We're in it for the long haul, but we also realize we need to get some quick wins," he said.

Harmening said one thing General Mills can do is make sure its supplier base represents as diverse a population as possible.

"Nothing gets people out of the current system like economic justice," he said.

Asked what he learned about leading a global company through the tumultuous first six months of 2020, Harmening said the experience underlined the importance of clear communication.

"It's important to keep everybody on the same page, especially in times of great uncertainty," Harmening said.

General Mills CEO talks lessons learned six tumultuous months into 2020

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCX. READERS WRITE LET'S DECIDE WHO WE ARE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 16, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 10ALength: 1151 wordsBody

NATIONAL HISTORY

Americans are slipping into a social and political whirlpool. Crowds rush about with ropes and paint to pass judgment on our history with no apparent idea of its complexities. Government, corporate America, entertainment and the academy have followed along with unseemly ease. And under it all, free speech has become socially perilous if it does not conform to the trends of the moment. This tyranny of mindlessness, unchecked, promises to drown all human rights as it did in the French Revolution.

The French Revolution began with "liberty, equality, fraternity" and ended with the Terror as the mob indiscriminately guillotined. Now the Black Lives Matter revolution is beginning to adopt the chant "toxic, racist, colonialist" while invoking an intellectual "Terror" even to the toppling of statues of Thomas Jefferson and Christopher Columbus. Elsewhere Washington, Ulysses Grant and numerous other historically impure actors are toppled. This parallel should alert us to the mischief potential of mob-thought.

We have never been a perfect people. Nor have we ever been an especially evil people as trendy revisionist historians assert. What makes us unique is our commitment and dedication to the process of obtaining liberty and justice for all. Jefferson said it, Abraham Lincoln said it, and our constitutional amendments say it. The essential thing is the process, and it defines American exceptionalism set in motion by the framers.

Good people of courage everywhere need to discard the slogans of the moment, call out the taint of the mob for what it is and have a meaningful conversation on the history and ideals of the American political process. The action that follows would certainly reflect more wisdom and efficacy than President Donald Trump's tweets or the mob's rampaging.

Louis Lavoie, Plymouth

...

In conversations about race in America, the voices of white supremacy have sometimes used bullhorns and sometimes used dog whistles. Concerning the debate about removal of Confederate monuments and renaming military bases, the subtlety of dog whistles has been abandoned and the bullhorns are blaring. Those who decry renaming these bases and decommissioning these monuments as attempts to "erase our history" and "defame our heroes" are quite clearly not speaking to all of us. And they quite clearly do not care.

Most of the monuments at issue were erected between 1890 and 1950 and many of the military bases named in the World War II era. It was the era of Jim Crow and in many cases the decisions to honor leaders of the Confederacy, who seceded from the Union in order to preserve and expand the institution of slavery, were openly acknowledged to have been made in furtherance of white supremacist ideology. In any event, with no exception of which I am aware, the Confederate "heroes" were not honored despite their support for the institution of slavery but because of it. Treason to the United States was not, for these men, a blot on their records but their principal claim to fame.

The Civil War ended over 150 years ago. The Confederacy, and its goal to preserve and expand slavery, lost. The price paid for the Union victory should never be forgotten, and the men whose treason exacted that price should never be honored. They belong on the ash heap of history and cannot be consigned there too quickly.

Brian Kidwell, Bloomington

AMENDMENT

Reform education even earlier

I applaud the effort Neel Kashkari and Alan Page are making for an amendment to have all of our kids get a quality public education ("Education amendment is even more relevant," Opinion Exchange, July 14). But in addition to the K-12 experience, all should have the benefits of a quality pre-K experience. The rationale being, this foundation will ensure they are ready to learn and be take full advantage of their next 13 years. The evidence is quite clear: Those with a quality pre-K experience are less likely to drop out of school, be a teenage parent or have anything to do with the criminal justice system. What they will do is graduate from high school, obtain postsecondary education and become a part of the skilled workforce we need.

Bud Hayden, Minneapolis

...

Kashkari and Page ask in their commentary, "What is an adequate education system?" I have to ask them, what is a quality education system?

The lead character in Robert Pirsig's novel "Zen and the Art of Motorcycle Maintenance" was a high school teacher who was asked by another teacher, "Are you teaching quality?" Contemplation of this question led him to madness - what is quality? And in order to dig deeper in the values of the question the character embarked on a long cross-country motorcycle journey that again ended in madness. Quality is not something you can define in legal terms but is an objective term that can only be answered when considered alongside one's personal values. Quality in Edina is not the same as quality in south Minneapolis or Blue Earth or in the Arrowhead. Changing the Constitution to use the term "quality" will just open a slew of lawsuits as legal experts go down the long road to insanity trying to define quality.

Richard Crose, Bloomington

ILHAN OMAR

We gave her a shot, but no more

It was quite a surprise to open my newspaper on Monday morning and see the claim that the campaign of Antone Melton-Meaux is supported by big-dollar Donald Trump supporters ("Big money is behind challenges to Omar," Opinion Exchange, July 13.) My wife and I are among the donors to Melton-Meaux's campaign. We have never given a dime to any Republican candidate or cause in our lives, but we donated to Paul Wellstone, Walter Mondale, John Kerry, Barack Obama, Tina Smith, Amy Klobuchar, Marion Greene, Al Franken, R.T. Rybak and Lisa Goodman, among others. Our support includes the Minnesota Indian Women's Resource Center, Planned Parenthood, Simpson Housing, People Incorporated and the Page Education Foundation - hardly a list of Republican favorites. We donated to the campaign to defeat the marriage amendment that would have denied the right to marry whomever one chooses.

There is a reason why Rep. Ilhan Omar has drawn a stiff challenge, and it is not because she takes progressive positions, or because she is a woman, or because she is a Muslim, or because she immigrated from Somalia. I voted for Omar in 2018. She lost my vote when she took the coward's path and voted "present" rather than condemning the Armenian genocide. She lost my vote by being absent from the House while never missing a chance to get in front of a TV camera. She lost my vote by never communicating to me except in e-mails asking for money. I want a representative, not a publicity seeker. Omar was sent to Congress to represent her whole district, not just herself and her pet causes. She had her chance, but now I'm with Melton-Meaux.

Kent B. Hanson, Minneapolis

We want to hear from you. Send us your thoughts here.

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

Letters: Federal help for riot repair is prudent and fair

ARTICLE MCCXI. LETTERS: FEDERAL HELP FOR RIOT REPAIR IS PRUDENT AND FAIR

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 16, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 826 words

Byline: Letter Writers

Highlight: In response to the letter "A heavy burden, but Minnesotans should pay the price for riot repair," July 12, how is this situation not like that of L.A. civil unrest in 1992 following the beating of Rodney King, after which federal disaster aid was provided to support rebuilding efforts? The civil uprising that followed the [...]

Body

In response to the letter "A heavy burden, but Minnesotans should pay the price for riot repair," July 12, how is this situation not like that of L.A. civil unrest in 1992 following the beating of Rodney King, after which federal disaster aid was provided to support rebuilding efforts?

The civil uprising that followed the murder of George Floyd was the result of anger of countrywide systemic injustice. Public safety, economic, education and judicial systems are still unequal and unfair toward people of color. The murder of Floyd was the spark that led to the largest movement ever in the U.S. with estimates of 15 million to 26 million people having taken to the streets to protest racial injustice. Part of that movement led to significant property damage. And you want a single elected official to bear all responsibility for cleaning up the aftermath?

You argue to punish Gov. Walz for his demonstrably quick response (compare the week of unrest in the Twin Cities to the "long hot summer of '67" in Detroit). This endless cultural insistence of "punishment" is getting us nowhere - not in our criminal justice system and not in our political sphere. Rather than your emphasis of inflicting more pain on our state (and in a pandemic!?), why don't we argue for the same support L.A. received in '92?

It's true that vital cultural and commercial corridors in Minneapolis and Saint Paul unfairly bore the brunt of justified anger at injustice. I invite you to the George Floyd Memorial at 38th and Chicago Avenue to learn more. Let's be honest that anger at injustice had been building for some time in this country, and an event in any American city could have sparked the fire.

At the end of the day, because these businesses need help, because we as Americans pride ourselves on rising to the occasion, and because racial injustice is systemic to our country, it is prudent, fair, and in the American ethos for the federal government to provide assistance to the affected businesses.

Katie Jones, Minneapolis

Letters: Federal help for riot repair is prudent and fair

Finally a voice of reason. The article about Dr. Andrew Olson during the Covid crisis ("Doctor discusses being on the front lines of virus," July 13) was positive and hopeful.

Not buying into hype and supporting patients with good old Minnesota medicine should be the norm. Sounds like he and his teams take the professional caring approach to support each other and to heal the sick - a basic rule that still works.

Heidi Knegendorf, River Falls, Wis

As a 16-year downtown St. Paul home owner I have watched and suffered the deterioration of all of the amenities that made downtown a place worth living.

First to go was the Atrium above Town Square, too hard to manage and control. Then Rice Park became a panhandler's patio with not a shaded bench free for any but the belligerently indigent. The reading rooms in the splendid Central Library, reeked of the negligently unwashed, the public computers are porno outlets for the unashamed.

Then light rail construction impacted negatively many business, and once it was up and running, it was within a year a dangerous and dirty, poor transportation choice. Scofflaws openly avoided paying, transit police were intimidated into passive non-enforcement, blatant smokers, coercive beggars and the rude and foulmouthed abused and annoyed other riders.

The Midway, our convenient shopping center, became so bad with purse snatchers, carjacking and local gunfire that even the Walmart gave up a profitable store unworth the attendant costs in security and loss prevention.

The skyway system, our year-round indoor neighborhood, is unsafe and not a single bench along its five miles where a tired person could sit, for fear they become couches for the belligerent. Six years of asking for a coordinated camera system has produced endless excuses and thousands of wasted tax dollars on unavailable and unread studies and assessments while "litterbug lane" above the central light-rail station has become an intimidating street casino and smoking lounge.

The renovation work in Rice Park drove the beggars and blighters onto the Kellogg Boulevard esplanade where they hold court still, and now that downtown jewel, our "central park," Mears, is a litter-ridden public toilet dominated by the unmannered and unruly, and unmasked.

Who is in charge of this City? Why do we elect the foolish and inept ... for more bike lanes?

Thomas Dunne, St. Paul

Turns out Minnesota already has a law concerning face masks. Minnesota Statute 609.735 makes it a misdemeanor offense to wear a face covering in public, except for a few narrow exceptions.

Why would elected officials order residents to commit a misdemeanor?

Letters: Federal help for riot repair is prudent and fair

Dave Racer, Woodbury Letters: We need more good police, not fewer Hey, State Fair ticket scalpers: you're tainted! Letters: Mayor and governor point fingers but expect the federal government to pay? Letters: Is it the most-rigged election ever, win or lose? Letters: What's the St. Paul budget plan?

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCXII. RETHINKING RESTAURANTS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 16, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: TASTE; Pg. 1TLength: 2084 wordsByline: RICK NELSON; SHARYN JACKSON; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Four leading Twin Cities chefs discuss the challenges of the pandemic and their hopes for their restaurants.Body

In a fascinating online discussion (find the video at tinyurl.com/ycd6mu7m), four top Twin Cities chefs - Gavin Kaysen, Ann Kim, Jamie Malone and Justin Sutherland - shared their fears and hopes for their businesses, the Twin Cities dining scene and their industry. Here's a summary (edited for brevity) of some of their primary talking points.

On running a restaurant during the pandemic

Justin Sutherland: It has been a crazy busy last few months. A constant pivot, reinventing every day, trying to figure out how we navigate this world that's new every day.

We closed some restaurants, relocated the Handsome Hog [in St. Paul] in order to build an outdoor space and go from 66 seats to 300 seats so we can properly distance.

Our biggest effort was doing a lot of community and charity efforts, trying to keep as much of our staff employed [as possible].

Jamie Malone: We started at Grand Cafe [in Minneapolis] with takeaway food, and it started to become clear to me that if we increased our business in that way we would have to increase the people in our space. That would have meant cramming too many of our staff members together, when so much was unknown.

Essentially we decided to make meal kits that we could create with just our core people on the team, with staggered shifts, and keeping people spaced out. We also wanted to focus on keeping the group together.

Working in restaurants is a very challenging job, but we receive so much gratification from other parts of what we do: making people happy, making things beautiful. So we really wanted to focus on making things that fulfilled ourselves.

Rethinking restaurants

Gavin Kaysen: Bellecour [in Wayzata] has only been open for a week, so I don't have a ton of data. In the summertime we would normally do 300 to 400 people on a Saturday night. Now we're doing 100 to 120. That won't fly for long.

I'm asking myself, "Does the brand stay open to stay open?" I don't have a great answer just because I don't have enough data yet, but in the next three weeks I will have that data to really understand what sort of pivots we need to take.

What happens when it's cold? What do we do when we can't sit outside anymore? That changes the game for everybody.

Ann Kim: I feel a little crazy for even saying that I'm opening up a new restaurant [Sooki & Mimi in Minneapolis] in the middle of a global pandemic. To be honest, a couple weeks into the closure of restaurants we did think about walking away from it.

There are lots of challenges in this profession, but then to try and do it in the middle of a pandemic, when every day is uncertain and unknown - you try to accommodate everyone. People are looking to you for answers, and deep inside, you don't have any. Your guess is as good as anybody else's.

Yes, we thought about it, but we realized the missings that would come from walking away from it were far greater than actually forging ahead. I decided to put on my big girl pants and just say, "We're going to do this. We're going to make this happen."

Instead of feeling sorry for myself and scared, I decided to look at this as an opportunity for some great change, and to look at this as a new restaurant not in a middle of a pandemic but in a new renaissance for restaurants.

We're really exploring how we can lean into these challenges in uncertain times to really create something beautiful, joyous, special and surprising, because that's why I got into it and I don't want to lose touch with that. This industry is too dang hard to not have that at the end. I'm in the business of making people happy and to bring some joy and beauty into people's lives, and I'm committed to doing that with the new restaurant and the existing restaurants. I'm not going to quit yet. But I've been tempted. Many times.

Looking to the future

Sutherland on the restaurant industry's racial and gender diversity: I think the gender inequality and race inequality in restaurant staffing has been prevalent for forever, and it's just been very unspoken.

I think COVID compounded the George Floyd incidents. Then George Floyd kind of compounded COVID. It all just kind of exploded into this social unrest that things needed to change on many levels, from the way restaurants were run, from our business plans, to our hiring practices, to discrimination in gender, sexual orientation and race.

We get to choose how we deal with it and what our new role is going to be in the new beginnings. I think we're all taking it very seriously and trying to be as active and vocal as we can, whether it's making changes in our own restaurants, to being out there marching on the street.

Whatever your role is, I think everybody realizes the restaurant industry is a very big part of it. We are a social gathering place, and that place needs to be equal for everybody.

Rethinking restaurants

Malone on a flat service fee instead of tipping: It's been something that has needed to happen for a long time and this really nudges it along and gives us an opportunity to have fresh conversations with guests about why we are making these changes. We're able to be vulnerable with our guests and say, "Yeah, our businesses are really teetering - and it wasn't exactly great before, either."

[The service charge] evens out the disparities among our staff. As business owners, [it] just gives us a little bit more control of being able to run our business in a sustainable way.

Kaysen on the industry's next generation: The consumer is not 100 percent safe and ready to go out to eat. I respect that, but I can't tell my landlords that.

Restaurants won't ever look the same again, they will never look the way they looked on March 15th.

We're realizing that our generation now has a responsibility, more than anything else, to change the way that we have been able to do business, to make it better for the future generation.

We might not necessarily see what that looks like, but that's going to have to be OK. We're still going to have to make the sacrifice to do it and to do it right and to make sure that it lives, frankly, beyond any of our restaurants.

Help for restaurants

Kaysen on assistance for the hospitality industry: They [the federal government] have not done enough. Period. They have failed tremendously, and they continue to fail on a daily basis.

At the end of the day, there's really no way that restaurants will be saved unless the federal government steps in and helps us out. At saverestaurants.com is an amazing report that basically breaks down what a stimulus fund would mean for restaurants. One in four jobs lost were in the restaurant and hospitality industries, and those jobs are not coming back.

This is not us going out and saying, "Put money into our hands because we need it." It's pure survival. We will not be around. The restaurant community as you know it will be gone. Everything about the vibrant hospitality scene will literally be wiped away in less than 10 months if that doesn't happen. It's not an exaggeration. I'm not trying to scare people. It's just an extinction that will happen.

Sutherland on the need for a federal stimulus: Remember how many other industries are so closely tied into the restaurant industry. The supply chain that is attached to it is insane - from farming to trucking - there are so many jobs that are reliant on restaurants to survive. If we go away, a lot is going to fall down with it.

Kim on supporting your favorite restaurants: One thing that humans are capable of right now is to be compassionate. Please, I know we're all scared, but if you are making judgments before you really have full understanding of what we're going through, it's just the adage that your grandma told you: Think before you speak.

If people are making statements, or reacting toward business decisions that we're making, I try and flip it around and say, "Their fear must be greater than mine," and mine is really great right now. I try to respond with compassion, and I ask the same from our guests.

Rethinking restaurants

Kaysen on gift cards: The gift card idea is a really great idea, but it's also sort of a deferment of bankruptcy. All of that money is going into the bank accounts at that time, but when we actually need it is when we don't want you to necessarily use it.

That was a tough message for any restaurateur to get a hold of and say, "Slow down, don't buy $5,000 worth of gift cards right now, buy $5,000 worth of takeout food." Let's do the transaction today, and be done with it versus in the future.

The emotional side

Kim on managing fear: In March we thought, "OK, I can deal with a couple of weeks, maybe I can deal with a couple of months." Now we're at four months, and there is really no end in sight.

We're trying to manage fear because everybody is so scared. I'm scared. Being a leader and being strong, the only time I can break down is in the corner of my bedroom, and crying on the shoulder of my business partner and husband, and he understands.

A mentor of mine asked, "Ann, how much of your day, in percentages, is ruled by fear, and what percentage is ruled by love?" And I said, "90 percent fear, and 10 percent love."

That's a horrible place to be, because when you live and work in fear, you limit yourself to possibility. I didn't come into this business 10 years ago, having never been in it, by saying, "Oh, yeah, the possibilities are 10 percent." I came into it thinking, "The possibilities are 110 percent. I can do anything."

So I'm really trying hard to change that percentage around, to make decisions based in love and possibility and not fear.

Malone on adapting to uncertainty: In the same way that we all wake up not knowing, our guests are feeling the same. Every day is emotionally different.

You have different data about how you want to decide to live your life. There's no way for us to anticipate what the demand is, so you can't decide, "Does staying closed give me a slower burn rate of the money I have left in the bank?" or "Do I have a lower burn rate if stay open?"

If you're open and have to close and then reopen and close, there's a point where you can't keep doing that. You also can't do that to your staff. You can't give them that up and down and back and forth.

Sutherland on vulnerability: It's been ingrained in our industry to always project success, to always make people think that our restaurants are doing great or we were doing great personally, when a lot of times that wasn't the case. That comes from competitiveness and the built-in egos that come with the industry.

[The pandemic] has allowed us to be more vulnerable, to be open and honest, to ask for help and say, "We're all kind of screwed right now." But in all of us being screwed, it allows us to all come together, and realize that we're all experiencing the same thing, and it gives us the opportunity to - hopefully together - build something better.

The vulnerability, it's been refreshing to see that, to be like, "Oh, I'm not the only one who has cried myself to sleep because I don't know if I'm going to open my restaurant tomorrow."

Self-care

Rethinking restaurants

Kim on how she starts her day: One thing that my husband and I started every morning is a ritual of just starting the day with positivity.

Usually we'd start off the day with the paper - the Star Tribune, the Wall Street Journal and the New York Times - but it was all the same regurgitated bad news in a different way.

We just said, "We can't do this anymore. We have to start with the positive." So each of us says five things that we're really grateful for, and then we meditate together. That's actually helped quite a bit.

Sutherland on reducing stress: We've all been so deeply rooted in our careers and our restaurants, which we all still are; we love them. But it's been a good opportunity to realize there's more - and there has always been more - and just reconnecting with the things around me that are important. Taking walks, going to the gym, taking vitamins, allowing yourself some room to breathe and just taking a little pressure off yourself. Because none of this we can control, and everybody is going through it together. So it allows you to take a deep breath, and roll with the punches, while trying to do better.

Rick Nelson · @RickNelsonStrib

Sharyn Jackson · @SharynJackson

Address book

Ann Kim:

Hello Pizza, 3904 Sunnyside Road, Edina, 952-303-4514, helloworldpizza.com

Pizzeria Lola, 5557 Xerxes Av. S., Mpls., 612-424-8338, pizzerialola.com

Young Joni, 165 13th Av. NE., Mpls., 612-345-5719, youngjoni.com

Gavin Kaysen:

Bellecour, 739 E. Lake St., Wayzata, 952-444-5200, bellecourrestaurant.com

SEE MICROFILM OR PDF FOR ILLUSTRATION.

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

Thursday coronavirus update: Hospitalizations and deaths level off, but communities of color disproportionately impacted

ARTICLE MCCXIII. THURSDAY CORONAVIRUS UPDATE: HOSPITALIZATIONS AND DEATHS LEVEL OFF, BUT COMMUNITIES OF COLOR DISPROPORTIONATELY IMPACTED

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 16, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 576 words

Byline: Katrina Pross

Highlight: While hospitalizations and deaths due to COVID-19 in Minnesota continue to level off, minority communities continue to be disproportionately affected. COVID-19 hospitalizations and deaths are largely more widespread among Black, Hispanic, Native American and Asian communities compared to white people, according to a weekly report released by the Minnesota Department of Health on Thursday. State [...]

Body

While hospitalizations and deaths due to COVID-19 in Minnesota continue to level off, minority communities continue to be disproportionately affected.

COVID-19 hospitalizations and deaths are largely more widespread among Black, Hispanic, Native American and Asian communities compared to white people, according to a weekly report released by the Minnesota Department of Health on Thursday.

State health officials have stated that communities of color are being vastly more impacted by the virus due to systemic racism, not because of biological reasons. , such as jobs that don't allow them to work from home and living conditions.

Because people of color and Native Americans experience inequities in income, housing and employment, they are also disproportionately susceptible to multiple health issues and chronic conditions, such as asthma, heart disease and diabetes, the Minnesota Department of Health has said. Underlying health conditions can increase people's risk of becoming sicker from COVID-19.

The hospitalization rate for Black people with COVID-19 is 313 per 100,000 people in Minnesota - that's more than 12 times higher than the rate for white people, which is 25 per 100,000.

For Hispanic people in Minnesota, the hospitalization rate is 311 per 100,000, followed by Native American and Asian people, who have hospitalization rates of 213 per 100,000 and 175 per 100,000, respectively.

Thursday coronavirus update: Hospitalizations and deaths level off, but communities of color disproportionately impacted

Most of the people who have died from COVID-19 in Minnesota have been white - 1,224 - but the death rate of 23 per 100,000 people is less than other populations. By contrast, the death rate for the Native American community is more than seven times higher than the white population and the highest among various races and ethnicities.

Thirty people who were Native American have died from COVID-19, which is a rate of 168 per 100,000 people. There have been 149 Black people who died, a rate of 106 per 100,000.

THURSDAY'S REPORTED CASES AND DEATHS

The death toll in Minnesota from COVID-19 reached 1,526 on Thursday, with an additional eight deaths.

State officials reported another 611 confirmed infections, increasing Minnesota's total number of cases to 44,347. Thursday's results come from nearly 15,000 tests.

Thursday's reported deaths included four people who were residents of long-term care or assisted living centers.

Of the state's total deaths since March, 1,179 were long-term care or assisted living center residents.

HOW ARE PATIENTS DOING? There were 38,290 patients Thursday who no longer need to be isolated because they have recovered enough. This is an increase from 38,179 Wednesday. There were 249 patients with COVID-19 in Minnesota hospitals, down from 254 the day before. Of those patients in hospitals, 103 were in intensive care, down from 106 Wednesday. WHO IS GETTING SICK? Number of health care workers with COVID-19: 4,232 The age group with the most infections is 20- to 29-year-olds, with 10,275 cases. The age group with the most deaths is 80- to 89-year-olds, with 518 deaths. US tops 5 million confirmed virus cases, to Europe's alarm Communities of color have increased exposure risks to the virus in their daily lives Virtual fundraising is a jackpot for some nonprofits. For others, it's a financial blow. Israeli jeweler makes a \$1.5m gold coronavirus mask Sunday coronavirus update: 9 more MN deaths, 806 more infections Minnesota cities, counties scramble to keep businesses afloat by dishing out CARES Act grants

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCCXIV. INCLUSIVE CITY TAPROOM CLOSES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 16, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: TASTE; Pg. 3TLength: 260 wordsByline: SHARYN JACKSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

ONE Fermentary & Taproom in Minneapolis' North Loop has closed "indefinitely to weigh our future options," according to a post on Instagram.

The brewpub opened at 618 N. 5th St. in November 2019, with a mission of fostering inclusivity in craft beer culture.

The closing comes after the public departure of head brewer Ramsey Louder, one of the company's founders and the first Black co-owner of a Minneapolis brewery. Louder and several employees of color resigned over a disagreement about when to reopen after the police killing of George Floyd, he told the Star Tribune.

Louder said he and co-owner Sally Schmidt differed on the right time to reopen the taproom.

The brewpub's future remains up in the air. "We are looking at all our options and have no definitive plans," Schmidt told the Star Tribune.

In St. Paul, a recently shuttered restaurant won't be staying dark for long. Mexican street food concept Elotes is taking over the former In Bloom, which anchors Keg and Case Market (928 W. 7th St., St. Paul). Look for a late summer opening.

Brian and Sarah Ingram, owners of Hope Breakfast Bar (1 S. Leech St., St. Paul) and the forthcoming the Gnome (498 Selby Av., St. Paul), have taken over the soaring former In Bloom space with a 20-foot wood-burning hearth, perfect for wood-fired meats - plus "wet tacos, lava rock bowls, tin-can nachos."

"Top Chef" star Justin Sutherland is collaborating on the menu at Elotes as well as the Gnome.

Staff writer Zoë Jackson contributed to this report. Read full reviews and other restaurant news at startribune.com/dining.

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

Inclusive city taproom closes

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCXV. LAKE HARRIET ART SHANTY PROJECTS CANCELED FOR 2021

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 16, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 332 wordsByline: Kathy BerdanHighlight: COVID-19 has put the freeze on Art Shanty Projects. Organizers announced Thursday that the event - which turns fish houses into art installations and puts them out on a frozen lake in Minnesota in January and February - has been canceled for 2021. In an email, Art Shanty Projects organizers said the decision was made [...]Body

COVID-19 has put the freeze on Art Shanty Projects. Organizers announced Thursday that the event - which turns fish houses into art installations and puts them out on a frozen lake in Minnesota in January and February - has been canceled for 2021.

In an email, Art Shanty Projects organizers said the decision was made for the safety of the artists, staff and visitors. The small enclosed structures are not conducive to social distancing and there is no running water for hand-washing on site. The staff is also looking at its operations in the wake of racial discussions following the death of George Floyd. "We recognize our responsibility as a white-led organization to assess our own structures and programming and to continue to work toward a more equitable organization," the email said.

The Art Shanty Projects began in 2004 and called Plymouth's Medicine Lake home until 2012. In 2014, it relocated to White Bear Lake for a couple of years and then moved to Lake Harriet (Bde Unma).

The event was wildly successful during Super Bowl festivities in 2018. Art Shanties took a year off in 2019 and returned in early 2020. Organizers said a change in the event layout, with one main entrance, helped raise $63,000 in donations on the ice.

The annual budget is nearly $160,000, according to the email, which stated: "While public health is the motivating factor in making our decision to cancel, money factors into the timing of this decision, knowing that there is a financial risk in continuing to prepare for a program that in all likelihood could get canceled eventually due to an expected spike in COVID-19." Mike Lynch's Skywatch: A meteor-shower-planet-peppered sky Rescheduled, postponed or canceled? Here's the status of all the major Twin Cities summer concerts. Literary calendar: Megan Collins reads from 'Behind the Red Door,' more Readers and Writers: Carolyn Holbrook testifies in 'memoir linked by essays' Need a pedal-push? Rentals offer chance to try out electric bikes

Lake Harriet Art Shanty Projects canceled for 2021

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCXVI. LAKE STREET COUNCIL GIVES OUT ITS FIRST GRANTS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 16, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 186 wordsByline: KELLY SMITH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The Lake Street Council has distributed its first grants from a fund to help businesses destroyed in riots at the end of May along the popular south Minneapolis corridor.

The nonprofit announced Wednesday that it's given $2.8 million to 175 businesses and nonprofits that were damaged or gutted in fires and riots after George Floyd died May 25 at the hands of Minneapolis police. Each recipient got up to $25,000.

The Lake Street Council has been flooded with donations, raising more than $8 million from more than 70,000 people or organizations since starting the fund just over a month ago - one of the small Minneapolis nonprofits suddenly inundated by millions of dollars in donations.

The grants are a "critical first step," Allison Sharkey, council executive director, said in a statement, adding that it will likely take five to 10 years to fully recover from the damage done in just a few days in June. Most of the businesses that received the first grants are owned by people of color, including Black, American Indian and immigrant owners, and most are small businesses with fewer than 10 employees.

KELLY SMITH

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

Mpls. will trim number of park encampments

ARTICLE MCCXVII.

MPLS. WILL TRIM NUMBER OF PARK ENCAMPMENTS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 16, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 891 wordsByline: MIGUEL OTAROLA; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The Minneapolis Park and Recreation Board on Wednesday night voted to limit the homeless tent camps that have sprung up across the city's parks, including the two sprawling encampments in Powderhorn Park.

The unanimous vote sets boundaries to a previous resolution passed by parks leaders a month ago that allowed the homeless to stay overnight in parks in response to the growing Powderhorn encampments. The Park Board will designate a select number of parks for encampments and disband any others that are not permitted.

Before Wednesday's vote, dozens of residents complained at the Park Board meeting about the homeless encampments, arguing the parks had become dangerous for visitors, surrounding neighbors and the campers themselves. They said they had become the site of constant drug use, violence and other illicit behavior.

They also noted significant issues at Powderhorn, where sexual assaults, fights and at least one shooting have been reported in recent weeks. Volunteers have scaled back their presence in the eastern camp and begun moving out some residents to other parks.

Commissioner Londel French, who has become a constant presence at the Powderhorn encampments, said the board "may have bitten off a little bit more than we can chew" by allowing the tent camps.

"Everybody decided to write these folks off, and we tried to do the right thing. Lord knows I tried, the neighbors tried, volunteers tried," he said. "But now we have a situation where people aren't safe. And that bothers me."

Wednesday's approved resolution will limit encampments to 20 designated parks and 25 tents. Volunteers, nonprofit organizations and other entities would have to apply for a temporary permit to legalize an encampment; those without permits would be disbanded.

It was still unclear Wednesday what parks would be designated "refuge sites," and when people would need to start moving out of larger encampments. Board President Jono Cowgill said parks staff would follow several guidelines when selecting sites, including proximity to playgrounds and schools and making sure there was proper distance between tents to stave off potential coronavirus contagion.

Mpls. will trim number of park encampments

Other commissioners were skeptical of how well the plan would work and where homeless residents would go. Commissioner Brad Bourn said it seemed unenforceable and renegeing on a promise.

"Some of these encampment residents really relied on President Cowgill's and the board's word that we're providing a safe space for them," he said. "Less than 20 days later, we're telling them you don't have to go home - because you don't have one - but you can't stay here."

Under the amended resolution, Park Board Superintendent Al Bangoura would also be able to limit or close encampments that pose a documented risk to safety under Gov. Tim Walz's executive order declared during the coronavirus pandemic.

Homeless residents have consolidated their encampments over time. While tents were seen at more than 40 parks in the past, they are now at about 30, according to the Park Board's latest count. The Powderhorn sites have also shrunk from a high of 560 tents last week to 310, according to the board.

Parks officials reiterated the need for additional help from the state and other agencies to house park dwellers and provide them resources. Employees have collected hundreds of syringes at the encampments and at times have been threatened by campers.

"Staff has expressed a grave concern for their safety," Assistant Superintendent Jeremy Barrick said. "The morale continues to be low, and these challenges are not helping it."

Many of those who initially migrated to Powderhorn Park were evicted from a former Sheraton hotel that volunteers had turned into a shelter in the wake of the police killing of George Floyd.

The encampments have since been the site of a string of violent incidents, including reported sexual assaults, vandalized cars and most recently a shooting at the western encampment.

Residents who spoke out at Wednesday's meeting said the sites had grown out of control and that the Park Board, while well-intentioned, was not equipped to help the homeless.

Sheila Delaney had volunteered at the Powderhorn encampments and before that at the former Sheraton shelter. At the meeting, she said she was afraid for her safety and was severing ties with the volunteer group in charge.

"[The Park Board] made a very reasonable assumption that the jurisdictions that have statutory responsibility for caring for the unsheltered would come in and do their job," she said. "They didn't, and here we are."

Powderhorn volunteer Kat Eng said others have helped pack up tents at the encampments and driven people to other parks. Volunteers have pulled back their round-the-clock presence at the eastern encampment and are now providing only food, water and other basic services.

"We really have been asking over and over when will any responsible government agency be able to provide some sort of actual solution to people living unsheltered in Minneapolis parks," Eng said.

Mpls. will trim number of park encampments

One resident who lives across the street from Powderhorn Park said the Park Board needs to find a humane way to disband the encampment.

"Everybody's lives have been disrupted," said Bethann Barankovich, who has lived by the park for 25 years. "We have no recourse. We feel hopeless and despaired."

Miguel Otárola · 612-673-4753

Load-Date: July 16, 2020

End of Document

Black Lives Matter signs stolen and damaged, Roseville police say. Dead raccoons left near others.

ARTICLE MCCXVIII. BLACK LIVES MATTER SIGNS STOLEN AND DAMAGED, ROSEVILLE POLICE SAY. DEAD RACCOONS LEFT NEAR OTHERS.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 17, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 274 words

Byline: Emma Harville

Highlight: Roseville police are asking the public for help identifying suspects involved in several bias-motivated crimes that have occurred in the past several weeks. Police say the incidents involved criminal activity targeting a resident's Black Lives Matter and other social justice signs, which were damaged or stolen. Investigators are currently seeking to identify a male and [...]

Body

Roseville police are asking the public for help identifying suspects involved in several bias-motivated crimes that have occurred in the past several weeks.

Police say the incidents involved criminal activity targeting a resident's Black Lives Matter and other social justice signs, which were damaged or stolen.

Investigators are currently seeking to identify a male and female who stole signs on the evening of June 19. Photos show the pair getting into a black Dodge pickup truck with what looks to be an exercise machine in its bed.

There have also been four separate reports of dead raccoons being placed in nearby areas, the latest of which happened the morning of July 12 when a dead raccoon was found nailed to a utility post on County Road B.

Police identified a 55-year-old male in a June 25 incident who admitted he damaged a sign because he thought it was offensive. The Roseville resident was charged with misdemeanor criminal damage to property, and detectives are continuing to investigate whether he was involved in any of the related crimes.

Detectives ask that anyone with information call the Roseville Police Department at 651-792-7008 or submit a tip online at <http://www.cityofroseville.com/3194/Crime-Tips>. North St. Paul man killed in crash after fleeing Dakota County sheriff's deputy Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Cleric assaulted outside Bloomington mosque; police searching for suspects U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities Minneapolis man sentenced to 33 years in prison for sex-trafficking young women and girls out of massage parlor

Black Lives Matter signs stolen and damaged, Roseville police say. Dead raccoons left near others.

Graphic

Roseville police are trying to identify a male and female who stole signs on the evening of June 19, 2020.
(Courtesy of Roseville Police Department)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCXIX. ST. OLAF GRADS CRAFT A POTENT BLACK ANTHEM

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 17, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 630 wordsByline: JON BREM; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Inspired by George Floyd, they call for "A Big Change."Body

They met in a St. Olaf College dorm, played in a band together at school parties and ended up as educators in Phoenix. Now Herb Ronnell and Pat Devon have teamed up on a powerful, timely new single, "A Big Change."

Inspired by the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis, Ronnell and Devon wanted to create a positive song that celebrated Blackness and addressed racial injustice.

"I always call Herb 'the Melody Man,' " Devon said of pianist-singer Ronnell. "He played some music on the piano, and in typical fashion, he will hum and scat and sing jibber-jabber, and I'll put words to the sound. With how close this resonated with us with George Floyd, there was a lot of energy there, a lot of passion, a lot of sadness. This one happened quick."

Ronnell's melody weaves in an echo of "The Star-Spangled Banner" as he sits at a grand piano crooning in his sweet, hopeful tenor, "I know, I know a big change is coming."

Rapper Devon drops a few verses about appreciating the value of work, needing leaders to lead and bringing cops to justice. And the two musicians weave in snippets of a recent fiery speech from Kansas City Mayor Quinton Lucas.

Imagine John Legend collaborating with Common, only with a smaller budget.

The Floyd incident shook Devon, who graduated from Roosevelt High School in Minneapolis and used to get his haircut around the corner from 38th Street and Chicago Avenue, where Floyd was pinned to the ground by police officers and took his final breaths.

"It rang so close to home," Devon said. "It was very surreal to think that me, my brother, my cousins, we could have very well been in that barber chair that day of the George Floyd chaos."

Two weeks ago, Devon and his wife visited that "sacred space" in Minneapolis. "It was wild to think that these blocks where I used to hang out with my friends, this is where it all took place."

Ronnell felt an indirect connection to Floyd as well, since he used to salsa dance at Conga Latin Bistro in northeast Minneapolis, where Floyd later worked as a bouncer.

Even though he grew up mostly in Houston, Devon - Patrick Devon Bass - had siblings who went to St. Olaf and Carleton colleges in Northfield. After graduating, he taught English at Minneapolis North High and Osseo Learning Center before heading to Arizona, where he is now an assistant principal in the Mesa school district.

Ronnell - Herbert Ronnell Washington - is from Phoenix, where a high school music teacher recommended the music program at St. Olaf. After earning his degree, he headed back to the Sun Belt, where he has been affiliated with the Phoenix Boys Choir (he was once a member) for seven years, the past year as artistic director.

At St. Olaf in the '00s, Ronnell and Devon were members of a band called Fellas & A Lady, which they describe as having a "pre-Black Eyed Peas" sound. Since they ended up in Arizona, the two pals occasionally get together and make music. They've worked with Jordin Sparks and Tori Kelly.

Devon - who has had a series of stage names including Ice Daddy and Platinum Pat - has released one solo album, "Vintage Vibes from the Vault + Volume Won," with another one, "Where We Going Next," in the works.

Ronnell and Devon made a video of "A Big Change" in the Great Hall where the Phoenix Boys Choir performs. To add a Minneapolis touch, Devon wore a Rhymesayers hoodie in the clip while Ronnell sat at a grand piano in his quilted jacket.

"It's not flashy," Ronnell said of the video. "And it's black and white to represent where we are today.

"We want to be heard and continue the dialogue that Black Lives Matter. Once the riots and protests stop, then it's easy to get back to no change happening in the country."

"A Big Change" is available only on YouTube, not on any streaming services.

Twitter: @JonBream · 612-673-1719

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

ARTICLE MCCXX. READERS WRITE ALL THIS, AND NOW NUDITY?

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 17, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 6ALength: 1145 wordsBody

MINNEAPOLIS' TRAJECTORY

Oh, Minneapolis.

How far you have fallen. I don't see a future with you anymore. It's not me, it's you.

You've let yourself go. From the weed- and trash-infested Hiawatha Corridor whose trees haven't been pruned all year, to the ugly, overgrown brush that lines our freeways, to graffitied buildings, burgeoning homeless encampments and newly decimated miles of street front, to public nudity about to become legal ("City parks may allow all to go topless," July 16), violent crime night and day, "no go" areas and no leadership to address any of it. Just yard signs, an "imagined" better future and no concrete plans.

Have you no decency? No pride?

I'm glad that I am no longer raising children here.

This isn't going to fix itself.

Are you familiar with Newton's first law of motion?

"An object at rest stays at rest and an object in motion stays in motion with the same speed and in the same direction unless acted upon by an unbalanced force."

Minneapolis, you are in a downward spiral and unless acted upon by another, redirecting force, you'll be a wasteland, inappropriate for families, void of stable businesses, jobs, safety and quality of life.

I used to defend you. I used to love living here, was proud of our City of Lakes, but now ...

I am angry, weary, saddened and repulsed by what you have become.

Deanna Noethe, Minneapolis

...

READERS WRITE All this, and now nudity?

To paraphrase the late Charlie Daniels, Golden Valley police and Minneapolis Park Police must have thought Paula Chesley was "a thoroughly dangerous woman." According to the article Thursday regarding the Park Board's policy on nudity, "five or six police officers approached her" while she was reading and topless in a secluded part of Theodore Wirth Park. Does it really take that many police officers to cite a partly nude woman? Or was there some juvenile thrillseeking on part of the police? Good grief!

Another beachgoer, Krissy Calbert, who is Black and was possibly targeted, was cited for being topless the same day, July 10. She was informed that a drone had spotted her topless at the beach. Were her civil rights violated? Where is Minnesota Attorney General Keith Ellison? Where is the ACLU? Whenever I see Golden Valley or Minneapolis Park Police vehicles, I have never seen a female officer or Black officer inside. One or two police officers citing these women would have sufficed. Do Minneapolis and Golden Valley taxpayers need to support this waste of police time and scarce funds?

Wayne Dokken, Robbinsdale

POLICING IN MINNEAPOLIS

This 'plan,' this mystery - this is not leadership

In reading the remarkably lame commentary from five Minneapolis City Council members ("Our case for changing the charter, July 16), I thought of a time when I interviewed several World War II Medal of Honor recipients for a writing project I was doing. One of Capt. Matt Urban's soldiers said to me that the greatest thing he could say about Matt was that he "always led from up front."

Our City Council members seem to want to take a different approach by asking us to take the lead in voting on the charter. Their article is full of generalities and bromides such as: "flexibility to build," "to reimagine," "to think bigger," "to move forward," and to "seize the historic opportunity." This is all presented without any semblance of a plan. Folks, tell us what you are going to do. Be specific. Then, maybe we will follow your lead. But in the spirit of Matt Urban you have to get up in the front first.

Richard A. Young, Minneapolis

...

I was surprised by the print headline "Most want cop funding cuts now" (local section, July 15, 2020) and the way it misrepresented the story that followed. I read the headline and thought the paper must have conducted a poll of Minneapolis residents. Instead, I found the story that followed reported on a city budget committee hearing where "the majority of speakers" (no specific numbers) asked the city to cut $45 million from the city's Police Department. Readers don't even know how many people spoke.

I haven't made up my mind on whether cutting the department's funding is the best way to bring accountability to the Minneapolis police, but I found the headline misleading and the story woefully lacking in details. As a former small-town newspaper publisher, I know the power that headlines carry.

Dana Schroeder, Minneapolis

...

As a fellow human, I genuinely feel for the stress the individual MPD cops are feeling. We are all upset over all that is happening. And that is good. We should be upset.

READERS WRITE All this, and now nudity?

This is also a time for introspection. We the citizens of Minneapolis have let you down by allowing poor training that does not equip you to confront everything you see one a daily basis. We have allowed this to go on too long.

But I would hope that you would take some time for introspection as well ("Minneapolis police union leaders say they felt abandoned," July 16). You have consistently voted for leadership that routinely shows nothing but contempt for the people of Minneapolis. You are quoted as saying that you cannot live in Minneapolis because you fear for your beautiful children. Really? That is so appalling on so many levels. You have participated in the protection of bad cops. And then you wonder why we can't see what good guys you are?

Think how much better and more fulfilling your job would be if you actually had the trust of the community. It has to start with you. Be the change you want to see.

Alice Johnson, Minneapolis

. . .

Recently I read for the second time about the Minneapolis Police Department's change in use-of-force policy "encouraging" officers to de-escalate tense situations ("MPD makes revisions to use-of-force policy," July 15). Going forward, police will now have to document how they tried to de-escalate a situation and why, after trying to de-escalate, they reverted to the use of force. They will also be required to explain why they chose a particular level of force during the interaction.

I understand that issues of law enforcement in a community are not simplistic. I (white suburban woman) have had positive interactions with police officers where I live. But the fact that any police department is just now requiring (encouraging?) this level of accountability in its officers, in regards to possibly inflicting physical and emotional harm upon citizens in the community it serves, is really just stunning.

Mary G. Alberts, Eden Prairie

CONFEDERATE SYMBOLS

My, how they've endured?

It was a pleasant surprise to learn recently that Secretary of Defense Mark Esper has called for culturally divisive symbols, including the Confederate battle flag, to be removed from U.S. military bases and installations. It was an unpleasant surprise to learn that a Confederate flag has been on display in any fashion at our bases and installations and requires such an action. My, we have a lot of work to do.

Meg Luhrs, St. Croix Falls

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

ARTICLE MCCXXI. HOUSE COMMITTEE ADVANCES BILL TO ASSIST TWIN CITIES BUSINESSES DAMAGED IN GEORGE FLOYD UNREST

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 17, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 449 wordsByline: Sarah Mearhoff

Highlight: Minnesota lawmakers in the House are on their way to passing a bill to help small businesses rebuild after the recent civil unrest, but it may hit a wall in the Republican-controlled Senate. At a Friday hearing, the House's Democratic-controlled Jobs and Economic Development Finance Division passed a measure to establish a loan and grant [...]

Body

Minnesota lawmakers in the House are on their way to passing a bill to help small businesses rebuild after the recent civil unrest, but it may hit a wall in the Republican-controlled Senate.

At a Friday hearing, the House's Democratic-controlled Jobs and Economic Development Finance Division passed a measure to establish a loan and grant program to help rebuild small businesses damaged or destroyed in the civil unrest following the death of George Floyd on May 25. The bill specifically designates some dollars to go to neighborhoods in the Twin Cities that saw the most damage.

Democrats at Friday's hearing said the assistance is crucial for the survival of small businesses, particularly those in minority neighborhoods, such as on St. Paul's University Avenue and Minneapolis' Lake Street. Without help, those businesses - and later on, residents of those neighborhoods - could be pushed out through the process of gentrification, they warned.

Rep. Barb Haley, R-Red Wing, said Friday that legislative Republicans have been trying to negotiate with Democrats on a way to help affected small businesses, who have seen "staggering" damages.

"It's fundamentally very important for the entire state to see both the areas in Minneapolis and St. Paul rebuild and have safety and also have commerce for those neighborhoods," she said.

But with the bill's provisions, Haley said Republicans are still at an impasse. The bill uses money from the state's general fund, to which Haley said Republicans will not agree as the state faces a deficit due to economic fallout from the coronavirus pandemic.

Republicans also oppose money in the bill specifically designated for the Twin Cities.

Rep. Hodan Hassan, DFL-Minneapolis, asked if a natural disaster such as a tornado struck rural Minnesota, would legislators representing those districts be questioning what pot of money to use to rebuild.

House committee advances bill to assist Twin Cities businesses damaged in George Floyd unrest

"And when we talk about Lake Street, West Broadway and University Avenue, we're talking about Black, brown and Indigenous communities, people that our system have intentionally left behind for many, many years," she added.

The committee ultimately passed the bill by a 9-6 vote. It still requires House floor passage, and Senate committee and floor passage before it would make it to Gov. Tim Walz's desk. Walz calls special session next week to consider 30-day extension of pandemic powers Minnesota's primary is Tuesday. Here are key east metro races to watch. Voters, GOP lawmakers plan lawsuit over Walz's mask mandate at polling places State Patrol cancels police academy class 'due to lack of funding' Minnesota will close 2 prisons to prepare for budget shortfall. Other agencies face holes, too.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCXXII.

METRO HOME SALES DEFY RECESSION

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 17, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 964 wordsByline: JIM BUCHTA; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: After two sluggish months, buyers return in force while 30-year mortgage rates hit record low.Body

June was one of the best on record for home sellers in the Twin Cities, according to new monthly sales data. Last month, buyers signed 6,819 purchase agreements, 6% more than last year and the most during any June in nearly two decades, according to a monthly sales report from the Minneapolis Area Realtors.

That gain was fueled in part by pent-up demand from April and May, a topsy-turvy spring market when sales declined by double-digits amid a prolonged government shutdown and metro-wide protests following the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis.

"I call it 'displaced demand,' where sales activity is shifted into later months," said David Arbit, Minneapolis Area Realtors' director of research. "Record-low mortgage rates are a big motivator, especially for first-time buyers who are payment sensitive."

Mortgage rates have been declining incrementally all spring, helping offset rising home prices spurred in part by a lack of inventory. On Thursday, Freddie Mac said the 30-year fixed-rate mortgage averaged 2.98%. It's the first time rates have fallen below 3% and the lowest rate in the survey's 50-year history dating back to 1971.

Motivated by low rates, buyers are competing for a dwindling number of listings. New listings have been declining for the past three months with buyers outpacing sellers in some parts of the metro area and in certain price ranges.

At the current sales pace there were enough listings on the market to last less than two months during June across all price ranges (a balanced market has five to six months of supply), but the availability of listings varies dramatically by price range. For houses priced at more than $1 million, for example, there were enough listings to last more than 11 months.

In Minneapolis and St. Paul, fewer homes hit the market during June compared with last year, but the new listings were a slight increase from May. In all suburbs, new listings during June were down from last year and the previous month.

Metro home sales defy recession

During June, sellers got nearly 100% of their original asking price across the metro area, causing the median price of all closings to hit $305,000. That tied a record high set in March and up more than 5% year-over-year.

Pending sales in all areas of the metro area increased during June from the previous month and last year except in Minneapolis, where pending sales declined slightly in June compared with June 2019.

Home buying in the Twin Cities typically peaks in late summer, then tapers as kids return to school and temperatures drop, but an abundance of multiple offers suggests that there are plenty of willing and able buyers who will keep shopping well into fall. But with economic headwinds looming and the threat of a winter wave of coronavirus infections, it's unclear how long the housing market will retain its resilience.

"As of right now, I don't see any signs of the market slowing down," said Kathy Borys of Coldwell Banker Realty. "The unknown is how the election will affect the market. I think that is more of an unknown than the stability of the market in the Twin Cities."

Borys expects the market to remain strong well into fall, especially in inner-ring suburbs such as St. Anthony, where Dustin and Alisa Gingerich were recently both buyers and sellers. With three kids, they'd outgrown the two-bedroom house they bought in 2008 before starting a family. With mortgage rates low and houses in their neighborhood selling quickly, they decided it was a good time to make a move.

Just after Easter they started shopping for a bigger house in the same city so their kids wouldn't have to change schools. They quickly found one they both wanted. They toured it the day it went on the market and made a full-price offer the same day. After touring it again the next morning they upped their offer, which was one of four bids on the house, by $11,000 and the sellers accepted.

Though their options as buyers were limited, Alisa Gingerich said being a seller in this market was far more difficult than being a buyer in part because of their emotional connection to their midcentury-modern house and their fear that it wouldn't be perfect enough for the market.

They listed the 2,120-square-foot house in late June for $309,000 and on the first night had two showings and at least 10 scheduled for the next day. The first person who toured the house made an offer for nearly 10% more than they were asking. Though they could have waited for a potentially higher offer from those scheduled to see it the next day, they canceled those showings and took the offer.

The decision to sell to the first person who looked at their house was made in part because the buyer had such an appreciation for the house's unusual features, including an original Thermador oven and vintage bathroom tiles, Gingerich said,

"This gentleman was the perfect buyer for the home," she said. "I'm sure that made some folks mad, but we had to do what's right for us."

Jim Buchta · 612-673-7376

HOME SALES RISE

Pending home sales in the Twin Cities rose 16.3% in June from the previous month.

June 2020: 6,856

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete chart.)

Source: Minneapolis Area Realtors

NEW LISTINGS LAG BEHIND

Data on new home listings each week between February and the start of July show the dramatic slowdown in the real estate market during the pandemic lockdown and also a drop in listings, especially in Minneapolis, during the week of protests following the killing of George Floyd. Listings appear to be rebounding after the typically slow July 4th holiday week.

Weeks beginning:

July 5, 2019: 2,259

July 5, 2020: 1,684

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete chart.)

Note: For the weeks beginning Feb. 2, 2020, or the sixth week of the year, and the corresponding weeks of 2019.

Source: Minneapolis Area Realtors

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

100 push Minnetonka schools to take stand against racism

ARTICLE MCCXXIII.

100 PUSH MINNETONKA SCHOOLS TO TAKE STAND AGAINST RACISM

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 17, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 500 wordsByline: ERIC ROPER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The district is "sweeping racial issues under the rug," one student said.

Body

A group of public school students and supporters rallied Thursday night to urge the Minnetonka School District to confront racism and improve diversity.

About 100 people gathered outside the district's headquarters to support changes that would include hiring more teachers of color, giving staffers diversity training, adopting a less "Eurocentric" curriculum and banning hate symbols in school dress codes.

The rally, hosted by the group Minnetonka Coalition for Equitable Education, stemmed in part from a Change.org petition criticizing the district's handling of race. It has garnered about 4,800 signatures so far.

"Minnetonka has a culture of often sweeping racial issues under the rug in order to avoid talking about them," said Lena Pak, an incoming senior at Minnetonka High School. "This results in uneducated white students that make [Black, Indigenous and people of color] feel unwelcome or unsafe and creates inequitable learning."

Rally attendees held signs reading "Make Tonka Anti-Racist," "Equality = excellence" and "Anti-racist curriculum now." Originally the group had planned to make a presentation to the district's Committee for Student Belonging, but speakers said the meeting was moved online as a result of the rally.

Incoming high school junior Jinhyoung Bang, who launched the petition, teared up as she addressed the crowd. "I really wasn't expecting this many people to be here," she said. "But I'm really thankful."

Bang recounted being told, "Go back to the rice fields" by another student on the bus during one of her first days at Minnetonka Middle School East. When she was in seventh grade, a fellow student remarked that she was "his personal calculator."

"I don't blame my naïve and uneducated peers for their words. I know that they come from a place of ignorance and years of conditioning," Bang said. "I blame the school system that did nothing to educate them about the harm of their words and continue to let incidents like mine [happen] to other Black, Indigenous students of color."

100 push Minnetonka schools to take stand against racism

Bang said she was inspired to write the petition after the May 25 killing of George Floyd while in Minneapolis police custody and the subsequent conversations about race.

"I knew that the changes being implemented nationwide could also be implemented within Minnetonka," Bang said.

Incoming high school senior Ahlaam Abdulwali said she has encountered Islamophobia and racism at Hopkins and Minnetonka school districts. During a discussion of religion and Islam, for example, a Minnetonka student told her, "I'm glad that you're one of the good terrorists."

"I've overheard kids saying the N-word more times than I can count," Abdulwali said. "I've seen kids write the Confederate flag more times than I can count."

Abdulwali said her rigorous courseload already makes school mentally taxing. But she realized after Floyd's death how regular "micro-aggressions" take a further toll on her mental health - and that other students are experiencing the same thing.

Eric Roper · 612-673-1732

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

ARTICLE MCCXXIV.

ACTION IS ESSENTIAL AT THE STATE CAPITOL

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 17, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 6ALength: 594 wordsHighlight: Police reform, bonding bill, federal aid are top priorities.Body

As negotiations continue at the Minnesota Legislature, there are welcome signs that leaders may be nearing the kind of compromise that produces movement - and solutions.

Minnesota's job market is slowly recovering - the jobless rate fell to 8.6% in June, down from just under 10% the month before. That, we think, is a testament to the slow, steady reopening Minnesota has undertaken, and the safety measures it's maintained to combat the global pandemic. Still, hundreds of thousands remain out of work, and the path of the virus is uncertain.

Minnesotans need the bonding bill still under debate at the Legislature. The version in the works now would amount to $1.8 billion for infrastructure improvements from a variety of sources. That would go a long way toward providing a boost not just to the economy overall, but to the construction industry, which continues to lag.

DFL Speaker Melissa Hortman and Republican Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka have a working agreement, but the sticking point remains House Minority Leader Kurt Daudt, whose insistence on first ending Gov. Tim Walz' emergency powers has blocked progress since before the regular session ended in May. Hortman, in talking to an editorial writer, noted that 55 U.S. states and territories are under emergency powers so that leaders can act swiftly against COVID-19. "We have great agreement among three of the caucuses," she said.

There also appears to have been movement on a police accountability package, badly needed to bring some uniformity and trust to law enforcement work across the state. "The tough part is getting the details and the language, but it does feel like there's been progress there," Gazelka said at a recent news conference. Given the civil unrest following the death of George Floyd, it is unthinkable that this session would end without the passage of significant police accountability measures that reflect a variety of community voices.

That unrest left its mark on the Twin Cities, and major restoration efforts are underway. It is disheartening that the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) rejected a request for a modest $16 million in disaster relief. Minnesotans were ill-served by U.S. Rep. Tom Emmer's decision to withhold support for such relief. The Sixth District congressman, who also is head of the National Republican Campaign Committee, sent a letter to President Donald Trump seeking an investigation into state officials' handling of the unrest.

As U.S. Rep. Dean Phillips, a Democrat representing the Third District, noted in an interview with an editorial writer, Minnesota is a net contributor to the federal coffers. "The few times we make a request for assistance should be given full consideration and this wasn't," he said.

Gov. Tim Walz is planning to appeal FEMA's decision, but Phillips said that without unified support among the delegation, that may fail as well. "The core question here," he said, "is will this fall only on Minnesota taxpayers, or on a federal government that we have been supporting for decades?"

We urge Emmer to reconsider and spare Minnesotans from having to bear the full burden of recovery. Postmortems can follow, but aid should not be contingent on that.

Minnesota lawmakers, despite having failed to reach agreements in the regular session and the first special session, can hit reset by moving ahead and finishing their work. If at some point they want to end the governor's emergency powers, they first should prove to Minnesotans that they can bridge differences and act swiftly to meet the state's needs.

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

ARTICLE MCCXXV.

HIKER RAISES AWARENESS ONE STEP AT A TIME

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 17, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: OUTDOORS WEEKEND; Pg. 1CLength: 970 wordsByline: BOB TIMMONS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: North Shore opens Atlanta woman to the possibilities.Body

Crystal Gail Welcome will tangle with rocks and roots, tough climbs and relentless bugs on her thru-hike attempt on the North Shore. Yet overcoming racial injustice toward Black Americans, such as herself, and other people of color - that, she says, is the real work.

The Atlanta woman is more than a third of the way through the 310 miles of the Superior Hiking Trail. Far from the urban backdrop of so many uprisings in the wake of George Floyd's tragic death, northern Minnesota is an ideal landscape for her message of social change, she said. Maybe more receptive, too.

Welcome said some media, across platforms, highlight "the worst" of the protests and responses to them to the detriment of peaceful, positive demonstrations of all manner.

"I know there are people standing up for justice in other ways. And I am, like, 'Wait, I can do that. This is what I do: I hike,' " said Welcome, 39. "This is one way I can stand up for justice and know that it is meaningful."

Minnesota's most popular long-distance trail is an apropos spot, she said. Floyd died in the custody of police just a few hours away. On July 4, Welcome's march began. She was joined by several others who'd heard about her hike and her cause. Day 1 began at 8:46 a.m. at the trail's southern terminus on the Wisconsin border near Carlton, Minn. She hiked for 8.46 miles.

The trail's iconic blue blazes - markers that tell hikers they are on the right path - also drew in Welcome. Blue is associated with police - "boys in blue," she said - but in this context, blue amounts to a bridge, not a wedge.

"Hiking this blue blaze is a way of saying, 'Look, nature hasn't let us down.' Hiking this blue blaze is a reminder that not everything that's blue is bad," said Welcome while camping Tuesday morning between Castle Danger and Gooseberry Falls.

Finding her place

While standing for change, Welcome is Up North for personal healing, too.

In remission from a rare brain disease called intracranial hypertension, Welcome attempted a thru-hike in 2016 of the Pacific Crest Trail. She had to drop out for health reasons after 600 miles, leaving her depressed, inactive and seeking some light. Her next steps were the fuel for the moment she's in.

Welcome heard about a nonprofit in California called People of the Global Majority in the Outdoors, Nature, and the Environment (PGM ONE). She'd found her people - and her voice - and was given a scholarship to attend a summit that steered her toward adventure therapy and the healing power of nature.

She recently graduated from Prescott College in Arizona with a master's of arts degree in interdisciplinary studies, in adventure therapy and education. Because of the pandemic, she finished her last semester online and has spent the last year in Minnesota with her partner, Demi Kapler, in Longville, Minn. Kapler is interim camp director at the YMCA's Camp Olson in Longville. The two met at Prescott. Kapler said she plans to thru-hike the trail in support after Welcome finishes.

On the trail (and off), Welcome said the kindnesses by hikers and others have eased her concerns as a person of color moving through northern Minnesota. She has issues of trust around white people - endemic, she said, to the Black experience - that extend beyond social justice to environmental equity, too. She cited the 2014 water crisis in Flint, Mich., where residents were exposed to high levels of lead and other contaminants.

"There are just so many ways we've been failed. So in order for us to find a place in nature that feels safe and healing, we have to have that outside of nature, too. The two just go hand in hand," she said.

In posts about her hike on a site called The Trek, Welcome said strangers haven't failed her thus far. "I have met many SHT trail angels who have helped me in various ways: meeting me on the trail, taking me to the store, and dropping me off at the same trail. A group showing up in solidarity to ensure safe passage through a non-friendly private section of the trail."

One of those strangers was Jane Kaiser of Duluth, who invited Welcome to camp in her yard and checked in on her well-being down the path. The two connected for ice cream.

Another woman, named Lil, was unaware of Welcome's purpose for hiking, but asked if she could join. They stuck together for two days. Lil gave her extra socks.

"People are actually caring about me as an individual and what I am doing," said Welcome, with a hint of relief and acceptance.

A Duluth welcome

Tom O'Rourke had read about Welcome's hike. The trail passes through Hartley Nature Center in Duluth, where he is executive director. He was prepared to meet her and welcome her. They hiked the section through the center, and Welcome used O'Rourke's nearby "Thoreauvian" cabin overnight to get out of stormy weather.

More than anything, O'Rourke said, he looked forward to listening to Welcome. He said the two bonded over their shared love of wild places and books.

Hiker raises awareness one step at a time

"It was interesting to hear her perspective as a person of color, engaging in these activities that are sort of white-dominated spaces," he added. "It was great to listen to her and to learn from her."

O'Rourke said they also bonded over similar past outdoors roles, with different experiences. Both worked at summer camps. "Hearing how her experience was different working camps in a given summer as the only person of color on the entire staff. I think she is bringing voice to important conversations that the outdoors community has to have and should have," he said.

Welcome came upon a lady's slipper on her first day. Seeing the orchid open to summer was symbolic, she wrote in an update July 8:

"Like flowers such as the Lady Slipper, social justice movements sometimes need time to bloom. And like the beauty of the flowers, these movements can bring about deep and lasting change."

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

End of Document

VIRTUAL EVENTS

ARTICLE MCCXXVI.

VIRTUAL EVENTS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 17, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 3ELength: 251 wordsByline: JON BREAM; CHRIS RIEMENSCHNEIDER; STAFF WRITERS; SHEILA REGAN, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

virtual events

Mu-tini Hour: RE:Plays

Friday: Theater Mu's livestreamed Mu-tini Hour pairs playwrights from the Black and Asian communities to confront social issues in the wake of George Floyd's death. It features three brand-new plays, including a science-fiction piece by Saymoukda Duangphouxay Vongsay and Harry Waters Jr. called "Life Sounds," as well as a piece co-written by Alayna Barnes and Katie Ka Vang, and another by Ifrah Mansour and Xiaolu Wang. (7-8:30 p.m. Fri. Free, theatermu.org/mutini-hour.)

SHEILA REGAN

Roots, Rock & Deep Blues Fest

Saturday: It won't be the usual daylong, multistage, sweaty marathon, but the 10th annual RRDB will offer a nice sampling of the festival's potent mix. Prerecorded performances of R&B piano legend Cornbread Harris and TexaSotan Americana rocker Mary Cutrufello will precede a livestreamed set by Duluth's pummeling blues howlers the Black-Eyed Snakes, led by Low's Alan Sparhawk. (5-10 p.m. Sat. $10 via crowdcast.io or thehookmpls.com.)

CHRIS RIEMENSCHNEIDER

Turn Turn Turn

Saturday: The Parkway Theater launches a livestreaming series with a new folk-rock trio. Featuring Adam Levy (the Honeydogs), Savannah Smith and Barb Brynstad, Turn Turn Turn dropped a well-crafted album, "Can't Go Back," last month. The summery, harmony-loving record filled with cold, hard truths evokes, at turns, the Byrds, the Beatles and the Mamas & the Papas. Brian Oake, former master of the airwaves, will interview the group. (8 p.m. Sat. $15, theparkwaytheater.com.)

JON BREAM

VIRTUAL EVENTS

Load-Date: July 17, 2020

End of Document

Media band together to fight Floyd case gag rule

ARTICLE MCCXXVII.

MEDIA BAND TOGETHER TO FIGHT FLOYD CASE GAG RULE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 18, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1B

Length: 797 words

Byline: CHAO XIONG; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: Coalition contends Judge Cahill's order overreached, violated First Amendment.

Body

A coalition of local and national media companies is challenging a judge's gag order that prohibits attorneys and several others from discussing the cases against four former police officers charged in the killing of George Floyd.

The group, which includes the Star Tribune; Minnesota Public Radio; the Associated Press; local TV stations WCCO, KMSP, KARE and KSTP; and the New York Times Co., among others, filed a motion Friday asking that the gag order be vacated.

"The Court's Order in these cases threatens to prevent the press and the public from obtaining meaningful information related to these highly newsworthy prosecutions from a wide - and overly broad - range of interested parties," said the motion by coalition attorneys Leita Walker and Emmy Parsons.

Hennepin County District Judge Peter Cahill issued the order last week, a day after some of the former officers' attorneys spoke to the media about their cases.

"The court finds that continuing pretrial publicity in this case by the attorneys involved will increase the risk of tainting a potential jury pool and will impair all parties' right to a fair trial," Cahill wrote, adding that it covers "all parties, attorneys, their employees, agents or independent contractors working on their behalf."

The matter quickly snowballed into accusations of constitutional violations by the judge and calls by defense attorneys to arrest and sanction Attorney General Keith Ellison, who is leading the prosecution, for allegedly violating the order.

The coalition's motion argued that the order overreached and violated the First Amendment. It could be interpreted to cover "thousands" of people, including every employee of the state and Hennepin County, the motion said.

"George Floyd's death catapulted Black Lives Matter into one of the largest movements in this country's history and spurred important conversations on a number of topics that arguably 'relate' to these prosecutions," the motion said. "For that reason alone, the Order is overbroad. ... The Order can be read to restrict the speech of a breathtaking number of people."

Media band together to fight Floyd case gag rule

Cahill did not list by name or occupation which "agents" or parties were covered in his order. A local legal scholar and a longtime defense attorney have said they believed it would apply to several city and state officials, including Gov. Tim Walz.

The coalition's motion argued that the order could delay the government's communication to the public about efforts to address public safety, racial equity and police reform.

"The Order thus threatens the right of the press and the public to engage in important dialogue with a wide range of people on a broad range of topics that could be viewed as 'related' to these prosecutions," the motion said.

The coalition said state case law allows the court to impose gag orders "only when necessary to ensure a fair trial" but that they should be "narrowly tailored" and based on "an articulated, specific harm."

The coalition will argue its case in court on Tuesday.

On Monday, the attorneys for all four former Minneapolis officers - Derek Chauvin, J. Alexander Kueng, Thomas Lane and Tou Thao - filed separate motions asking that Cahill's order be vacated.

Their motions argued that the order violated constitutional rights to due process, free speech and a fair trial, and that it unfairly penalized the defense after prosecutors and public officials had spent weeks criticizing the former officers' actions.

Later Monday, Ellison issued a news release announcing that he had appointed four veteran attorneys as special assistant attorneys general on the Floyd case and listed their professional accomplishments.

Attorneys Earl Gray, who is representing Lane, and Robert Paule, who is representing Thao, filed separate motions Tuesday objecting to Ellison's news release. Gray called for his arrest. Paule asked that he be sanctioned.

Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter. Prosecutors said he knelt on Floyd's neck on May 25 for nearly 8 minutes, but Kueng's body-worn camera video, shown to the media and public Wednesday, indicated it lasted about 9 minutes and 30 seconds. Ellison's office declined to address the time discrepancy, citing the gag order.

Kueng, Lane and Thao are charged with aiding and abetting murder and manslaughter.

Police were investigating allegations that Floyd had used a fake $20 bill at a local convenience store. They held him down as he lay handcuffed, stomach-down in the street. Floyd complained several times that he couldn't breathe and warned them that he was going to die before he became unresponsive.

Bystanders also called for the officers to stop; one of them recorded and publicly shared video of the incident.

Chao Xiong · 612-270-4708

Twitter: @ChaoStrib

Media band together to fight Floyd case gag rule

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCXXVIII. POLICE BUDGET CUTS PROPOSED

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 18, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 553 wordsByline: LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Amid calls to defund police, Minneapolis also is trying to balance COVID-19 losses.Body

Minneapolis City Council members on Friday pitched their first substantial budget cuts to the Police Department following George Floyd's death - and signaled that additional changes are in the works.

The proposals, which together total just over $600,000, are far from final. They must survive another public hearing, additional council votes and review by the mayor.

If ultimately approved, the revisions would fall far short of the $45 million that some activists have asked the city to cut from the Minneapolis Police Department's $193 million budget. Other residents have said they want the city to maintain the department's budget, or even increase it.

The city is trying to cut roughly $156 million from its $1.6 billion budget as it tries to compensate for the financial losses that came from the coronavirus pandemic.

Last week, Mayor Jacob Frey proposed relying on cash reserves, some furloughs, up to 40 layoffs and a series of budgetary transfers to plug the budget hole.

The city said it had already cut roughly $8.6 million from the Police Department's budget when it implemented a citywide hiring and wage freeze. Frey suggested cutting only $50,000 more, from a timekeeping system and the system that tracks pawnshop transactions.

During a public meeting Friday, council members got their first chance to offer revisions. Members Cam Gordon and Alondra Cano both pitched cuts to the Police Depart ment's budget.

One measure, introduced by Cano, would move $500,000 from the Police Department to the city's Office of Violence Prevention.

Police budget cuts proposed

Gordon suggested cutting a combined $105,000 from the police budget to fund a Health Department program helping people with AIDS or HIV, a program designed to promote "healthy living" in low-income housing, and a youth program in Cedar-Riverside.

Some of the moves, the council members said, were designed to offset cuts or transfers that Frey initially proposed.

On almost every one of the police proposals, Council Member Linea Palmisano was the sole vote against them. Council Member Lisa Goodman also voted against the measure to transfer $500,000 out of the police budget.

Palmisano, the budget committee chairwoman, said that roughly 80% of the Police Department's budget goes toward salaries, and she feared the proposals would likely require staff cuts. She, as well as the city's budget office and the police chief, raised concerns about the lack of detail on where the money would come from.

"It just doesn't sound responsible and transparent ... to do these kinds of blanket cuts," she said during the meeting.

Council Member Phillipe Cunningham pushed back on that idea, noting that department heads have discretion to shuffle money even after council approves the budget.

Another public hearing on the budget is scheduled for 10 a.m. Wednesday. Council members will be able to offer additional revisions, and the budget is tentatively set for a final vote on Friday.

Other proposals are likely to emerge. Cunningham expressed interest in a program that would seek to reduce violence with conflict mediators. Council Member Jeremiah Ellison signaled he's keeping a close eye on the size of the force. Council Member Steve Fletcher said the Police Department "operates on an island" and doesn't interact enough with the rest of city government.

Liz Navratil · 612-673-4994

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

Rosario: Judge in George Floyd case has his work cut out for him

ARTICLE MCCXXIX.

ROSARIO: JUDGE IN GEORGE FLOYD CASE HAS HIS WORK CUT OUT FOR HIM

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 18, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1478 words

Byline: Rubén Rosario

Highlight: I don't envy Hennepin County District Judge Peter Cahill. I'm talking here about the judge presiding over the upcoming trial - or trials - of the four former Minneapolis police officers charged in the death of George Floyd. The former defense attorney and prosecutor who served as deputy chief to former Hennepin County Attorney Amy [...]

Body

I don't envy Hennepin County District Judge Peter Cahill. I'm talking here about the judge presiding over the upcoming trial - or trials - of the four former Minneapolis police officers charged in the death of George Floyd.

The former defense attorney and prosecutor who served as deputy chief to former Hennepin County Attorney Amy Klobuchar is working hard to exert some pretrial control over an event and case that have already drawn national and global attention unlike any other in recent Minnesota history. High-profile trial proceedings of this magnitude are such an administrative and managerial challenge for courts that the National Center for State Courts and other judicial entities created a website to help jurists handle such cases.

The murder trial involving Derek Chauvin, the since-fired officer seen on video kneeling on Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes that fateful day in May two months ago, is at least a year away from taking place.

A decision to jointly or separately try the defendants, notwithstanding potential pleas, possible COVID-19-related or other significant developments in the coming months, could further postpone proceedings.

But Cahill's attempts to assure due process and rein in pretrial publicity have raised some eyebrows as well as questions of whether he's overstepping his authority or unduly restricting free speech.

It was surprisingly Cahill, not the defense, who first warned of a potential change of venue last month if public officials, attorneys and even family members continued to speak publicly about the case.

"What they're doing is endangering the right to a fair trial. They need to understand that," Cahill said at one of the first hearings in the case last month.

Rosario: Judge in George Floyd case has his work cut out for him

A change-of-venue request, which is rarely granted, most often comes from defense lawyers who feel there is no way their client can get a fair trial in the jurisdiction where the alleged crime took place. That request could come later from one if not all four defense attorneys, perhaps emboldened by Judge Cahill's pretrial comments.

Frankly, given that the whole world knows about it and has opinions of what transpired, the only place I suggest they move it to would be the eastern Amazon rain forest where the Awá - people who mostly have never had contact with the outside world - reside.

Yet there is an abundance of cases that prove finding capable jurors in a locale where a notorious alleged crime took place is hardly impossible.

"The court would opine that the standard isn't whether people have heard, or even formed an opinion on the case, but rather can potential jurors be open-minded enough to put their thoughts and feelings aside, listen to the evidence, follow the court's jury instructions and deliver a verdict based upon the law, and not personal animus," notes criminal defense attorney J. Anthony Torres.

Torres represented Robert Guevara, who was tried for murder in connection with the still-unsolved disappearance of Corrine Erstad, a 5-year-old Inver Grove Heights girl who disappeared in June 1992 without a trace. Her body has never been found.

The Dakota County trial judge denied Torres' request for a change of venue. At that time, one could not find a more unpopular and publicly despised trial defendant than Guevara. Yet he was ultimately acquitted of the charges by the jury.

Still, "unlike Guevara, however, this case has become extremely political and transparency is tantamount," Torres added in an email. "The court may consider any appearance of injustice occurring to either side before closing the door to a change of venue."

Will Bunch: From 9/11 to Portland, it was inevitable 'Homeland Security' would be turned on the American people Leah Mirakhor: How James Baldwin spoke to immigrants like me Soucheray: Trust us, the Minneapolis Council said. We don't, said the Charter Commission. Ross Marchand: No more billionaire bailouts Kyle, Spencer, Kulas: We love St. Paul. Here's how to help It bears mention here that Earl Gray, attorney for Thomas Lane, one of the two rookie cops charged with aiding and abetting unintentional murder in the Floyd case, also represented former St. Anthony police officer Jeronimo Yanez and unsuccessfully sought a change of venue from Ramsey County.

Yanez underwent a murder trial for fatally shooting St. Paul public school worker Philando Castile during a traffic stop in Falcon Heights four years ago - another high-profile incident that became known worldwide. A jury acquitted Yanez.

In the Floyd case, Cahill's other notable decision was to impose a gag order earlier this month preventing defense attorneys, the prosecution, trial defendants, public officials and connected "parties" from speaking publicly about any aspect of the ongoing cases. No question Cahill, for that matter any other jurist, might try to muzzle the news media, family members and others if he could. But the law and practicality are not on his side.

Rosario: Judge in George Floyd case has his work cut out for him

In 1976, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that a Nebraska trial judge's decision to impose a gag order on the news media from covering a murder trial before a jury was selected was a form of prior restraint in violation of the First Amendment right of freedom of the press.

In his majority opinion, Chief Justice Warren Burger, a St. Paul native and polio survivor who worked on a crew that built the Robert Street bridge, noted that pretrial publicity does not inevitably guarantee an unfair trial.

As a result, jurists in some high-profile cases have tailored gag orders to target those they feel they have some authority over: trial lawyers who are deemed "officers of the court."

Not surprisingly, defense lawyers in the Floyd case vehemently objected to Cahill's decision.

Chauvin's attorney, Eric Nelson, pointed out that the gag rule violates his client's right to free speech, if not also that of the lawyers and others involved in the case.

"Given the global extent and tenor of pretrial publicity in this case, halting the flow of any information from Mr. Chauvin, through his counsel - before even a single statement has been made - to the public is more likely to prejudice the jury pool than to prevent a taint," Nelson wrote in his court memo. "The Court's order effectively allows the repeated and unmitigated condemnation of a criminal defendant by nonparty public officials and celebrities."

The lawyers are dead right, according to Erwin Chemerinsky, a noted legal scholar and dean of the University of California's Berkeley Law school.

In 1997, Chemerinsky penned an influential, 22-page argument that such gag orders are "virtually always unconstitutional."

Citing numerous high-profile "trial of the century" cases that ended in acquittals, Chemerinsky notes such judicial gag orders rely on the false and largely unproven assumptions that publicity jeopardizes a fair trial and that public statements by trial attorneys and others "cause or exacerbate that harm."

Chemerinsky is as resolute as ever, 23 years later, about his stance on such gag orders.

"I don't think they do anything to lead to a fair trial or prevent a biased jury," Chemerinsky noted in an email. "Judges like them because it keeps lawyers from 'trying their case in the press.' But I don't think that should be the judges' concern (other than ensuring the impartiality of the jury). A sense of decorum is not a reason for a prior restraint. And gag orders are a form of a prior restraint."

Cahill also rejected a request by media outlets as well as defense lawyers to allow televised proceedings of pretrial hearings in the Floyd case, though he left open the possibility of reconsidering his decision at trial. Given Minnesota courts are in the dark ages when it comes to electronic media access to proceedings, a change of heart is as likely as me winning the Powerball while getting hit by lightning.

The judge has also restricted the copying and publication of police body-camera video evidence in the case in apparent violation of state public data laws. Soucheray: Trust us, the Minneapolis Council said. We don't, said the Charter Commission. Kyle, Spencer, Kulas: We love St. Paul. Here's how to help. Banaian, Schmitz: Are 4-year degrees oversold? Not at all, even in the liberal arts. Caryn M.

Rosario: Judge in George Floyd case has his work cut out for him

Sullivan: Can we agree or disagree, or agree to disagree - and listen along the way? Soucheray: And our ability to reason is swept away

Again, I don't envy the man. The last thing he probably wants is to be regarded like another Lance Ito, the judge in the infamous O.J. Simpson case who was criticized for not imposing a gag order and allowing the notorious trial to be televised. But the main factor deciding that case wasn't pretrial publicity or cameras in the courtroom. It was, in the end, one side convincing a jury there was reasonable doubt, even if that verdict was outlandishly the wrong one in the eyes of many trial observers.

Stay tuned.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCXXX.

1 IN 4 MPLS. COPS SEEKS DISABILITY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 18, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1340 wordsByline: JENNIFER BJORHUS; STAFF WRITER; LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The claims come amid a wave of violent crime.Body

The continued surge of Minneapolis police officers seeking disability benefits after the George Floyd unrest is heightening concerns of a police staffing shortage amid a wave of violent crime.

Ron Meuser Jr., the lawyer handling the claims, said his office met with an additional 43 Minneapolis cops this week who have retained him. That's in addition to the estimated 150 officers who Meuser said at a July 10 news conference had retained him. And it brings the total closer to 200 now, out of a sworn force of about 850.

Meuser said most of the officers starting the disability paperwork leave their jobs fairly quickly on a medical leave. The disability claims process can take up to six months.

He said his office has "dozens and dozens" of more appointments with officers scheduled for next week. "The curve has not flattened," Meuser said. "We are signing up a staggering number of officers every day right now."

The increase in officers seeking to file disability claims comes as the Minneapolis Police Department (MPD) faces unprecedented public criticism following the police killing of George Floyd, an unarmed Black man, in May. The City Council has advanced a plan that could end the police department and replace it with a broader community safety department that may or may not have licensed peace officers. Voters would have to approve the change.

Meanwhile, the city has been rocked by an explosion of gun violence.

Meuser said he thinks the city faces a significant police staffing shortage. The vast majority of officers retaining him are seasoned veterans, he said, averaging about 48 years old with at least 20 years of experience. The majority of the duty-related disability claims are for symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder, or PTSD, related to the Floyd unrest.

The stress is cumulative, he said. The unrest and hostility unleashed by the death of Floyd aggravated conditions that officers have experienced for a long time and muscled through, he said. "It further impaired their ability to cope."

According to city spokeswoman Sarah McKenzie, there is no legal obligation for an officer to notify the MPD that they are submitting an application for disability benefits with the Public Employees Retirement Association, which administers the benefits plans. So the MPD does not necessarily know which officers on a temporary medical leave are seeking long-term disability. The process requires two medical reports confirming the condition, one of which must come from a licensed medical doctor.

Meuser dismissed the idea he could be drumming up business by being public about the deluge.

"I have plenty of money," he said. "If anything, the rate at which we're taking on these officers is putting a great deal of stress on me and my staff."

A spokeswoman for the city said that as of Friday, 111 MPD officers are on some type of medical leave, including 40 PTSD claims filed since May 26.

When asked about the loss of so many officers and how the MPD was coping, police spokesman John Elder said: "Staff will be moved to areas necessary to meet the primary goal of law enforcement, public safety."

Mayor Jacob Frey and Police Chief Medaria Arradondo took up the staffing issue at Friday's City Council meeting. They confirmed that 65 officers have left the force so far this year for various reasons. The normal attrition rate is about 45 officers per year. Disability claims, however, are difficult to track, Arradondo said, because "they kind of filter in" from outside the department.

"There is also a level of people who are just going on leave in some form," Frey noted. "That also raises a flag as to whether that individual might ultimately leave in some other form, like more completely. Those wouldn't necessarily be included in the numbers that we just shared."

"It is also happening at the fire department, but the numbers are definitely higher at MPD," Frey said.

The departures add a new layer to an already contentious debate about how to reshape policing following Floyd's death, and they are factoring into the city's budget talks.

Council Member Jeremiah Ellison, during a different public meeting, noted that the MPD is currently budgeted for 888 officers but isn't likely to hit its full strength this year. He said he hopes the city will work to "right-size" the department's force and budget and consider making more investments in violence prevention.

"As we're seeing people losing faith in our ... current public safety system, as we're seeing communities needing support because of the increase in violent crime, we're also seeing, quite frankly, our police force express a deep resentment of our city and abandoning our city," Ellison said. "We're seeing that in the form of officers either resigning or, you know, making claims of harm that they themselves caused and taking advantage of that."

Council Member Linea Palmisano asked him to confirm whether he was referring to the PTSD claims.

"I was referring generally to the fact that we do have officers for whatever reason, and it's not my place to say what that reason is, but we do have officers who are rushing to find their way out of their obligation to our constituents in a myriad of ways," Ellison said.

Palmisano cautioned against attributing motives to the departures and said MPD officials have assured her that officers are continuing to respond to calls. Council Member Andrew Johnson added that he wanted to encourage city workers who might be experiencing PTSD symptoms to seek help if needed.

In a separate meeting earlier this week, Arradondo cautioned against making major cuts to the force while they're struggling to rein in shootings. He noted that not all the remaining officers are available to respond to 911 calls. Some, like the chief, hold supervisory roles that require administrative work. Others, such as detectives, focus on investigating crimes after they occur.

In response to council members' questions about the adequacy of street patrols, Arradondo said the department is reorganizing units to get resources where they are needed. For example, more officers are being shifted to precincts from 911 call center work they had been doing during the COVID-19 pandemic.

"It really has to be an all-hands-on-deck approach," he said.

Meuser said neither the city nor the police department has contacted him about the surge in officers seeking disability benefits.

Sgt. Sherral Schmidt, vice president of the Police Officers Federation of Minneapolis, the police union, said the union hasn't been tracking the officers starting the disability claim process, but has no reason to dispute Meuser's numbers. She said she knows that "a fair number" of officers have taken personal leaves since the unrest.

Losing 200 to 250 officers would have "a really detrimental effect on our police department and how they provide services," she said.

At last week's news conference, Meuser said that at least 13 officers were inside the Third Precinct building when Frey ordered them to evacuate. Some wrote farewells to loved ones and others told him that they were saving a bullet for themselves.

"Those are all true stories," Schmidt said, adding that she was told there were 54 officers left in the station. "I met with a cop last week ... who broke down in tears and said 'My department left me in there to die.' What do you say to that?"

"Morale is probably the lowest I've ever seen it in my almost 23 years in the department," she said. "Cops are fearful they're going to show up one day and they're not going to have a job. It's affecting them and their families greatly."

When asked if the wave of disability claims could be a form of work slowdown, Schmidt called that an "absolutely ridiculous claim."

MPD officers have been accused of staging work slowdowns before. In 2016, North Side officers were accused of a work slowdown after intense public criticism officers faced for the 2015 shooting death of Jamar Clark.

1 in 4 Mpls. cops seeks disability

Liz Navratil · 612-673-4994

liz.navratil@startribune.com

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCXXXI.

TWINS TO REVIEW CONTRACT WITH MPLS. POLICE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 18, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 576 wordsByline: DAVID CHANEN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Although no fans will be allowed at Target Field, team is examining security measures.Body

The Minnesota Twins announced Friday that they will be taking a fresh look at their ballpark security arrangements with the Minneapolis Police Department.

Though the division champions said in a statement that no changes are expected this season - when fans won't be allowed in Target Field - they added that they were re-evaluating the team's relationship with the police following the officer-involved death of George Floyd, which triggered nationwide riots in protest of police brutality. Four ex-officers have been charged in Floyd's death.

Most local professional sports teams use MPD for stadium and arena security.

For this year's shortened 60-game season, the Twins said they will continue to hire off-duty Minneapolis officers to help team security personnel.

"We have seen firsthand that there are individual officers within the MPD that are committed to creating a policing culture of accountability, respect, empathy and fairness," according to the statement.

For the 2021 season, however, the team said it will decide on security staffers "based on authentic progress toward significant reform within the Minneapolis Police Department and/or a community-embraced public safety model."

The statement said that the team encourages Minneapolis city leaders to be "tenacious" in advancing racial equality, and concluded: "There is no place for racism, inequality or injustice in our community."

In a statement, MPD said it was "pleased and honored" to continue protecting fans during Twins games and that it acknowledged "the need for true reform and transformational change creating a new MPD with key stakeholders" such as the Twins.

Twins to review contract with Mpls. police

The statement from the Twins said team officials had been in touch with Minneapolis Police Chief Medaria Arrandondo and praised him for "his integrity, ability and desire to create systemic change."

The Vikings issued a statement Friday saying they need to ponder the issues involved before making any decisions.

Last month, Minnesota Lynx general manager and coach Cheryl Reeve pledged during a conference call to keep social justice issues on the front burner as the WNBA prepares to start its season.

Reeve noted the work done by star forward Maya Moore to free a convicted prisoner, and talked about the news that former Lynx guard Renee Montgomery has taken a year off to work on social issues.

"This is at the forefront of our minds," Reeve said. "Playing basketball is what we do. The other part of us is wanting to make the world a better place for everybody."

Reeve said that she'd be in favor of dropping police for added security but said the team may not have the authority to do that since Target Center - where the Lynx and the NBA's Minnesota Timberwolves play - is owned and operated by the city.

Shortly after Floyd's death, University of Minnesota President Joan Gabel said the school was cutting some ties with city police, including contracting off-duty security for football games, concerts and ceremonies. Minneapolis Public Schools officials terminated a $1.15 million annual contract with the city to have police serve as school resource officers.

The Minneapolis Park and Recreation Board also severed its relationship with MPD, directing Superintendent Al Bangoura to stop using police for park-sanctioned events and to block officers from responding to nonviolent calls. Commissioners agreed to create a new green uniform for Park Police to distinguish them from city police.

David Chanen · 612-673-4465

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

Absolutely nothing gets settled in draw

ARTICLE MCCXXXII.

ABSOLUTELY NOTHING GETS SETTLED IN DRAW

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 18, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 4C

Length: 772 words

Byline: JERRY ZGODA; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: The teams are also locked in a tie atop Group D.

Body

Minnesota United played 90-plus minutes and well past midnight local time in 86-degree heat, all for a hard point earned with a scoreless draw against Real Salt Lake in MLS is Back tournament play late Friday night in Orlando.

"It's the first time I started a game on a Friday and finished it on a Saturday," Loons coach Adrian Heath said by video conference call afterward. "So that's a new one."

The Loons and RSL each are 1-0-1 in tournament play after Friday's 10:30 p.m. kickoff Orlando time. Minnesota United now is 3-0-1 in MLS standings after two victories to start the season in March, Sunday's 2-1 comeback victory over Sporting Kansas City in stoppage time and Friday's draw.

"Overall, if you said to me after four games of the season we'd have 10 points, it has been a good start," Heath said. "I would have settled for this before we started the tournament, for sure."

The Loons welcomed defensive midfielder and team captain Ozzie Alonso back after he missed Sunday's tournament opener injured. With him back, they started better, controlled the ball more and had better of the chances all night.

"It didn't surprise me we controlled more of the possession because we've got somebody who's outstanding at doing that," Heath said.

Midfielder Robin Lod had two of their best, hitting the post in stoppage time just before halftime after Alonso did the work with a long run and pass. Real Salt Lake keeper Zac MacMath reached low with his left hand to stop Lod's left-footed shot - his dominant one - after a run into the 18-yard box in the 50th minute.

Lod has scored one goal in 14 games since he joined the club last summer.

Absolutely nothing gets settled in draw

"Obviously, he's a bit frustrated because he worked really hard to get himself in that position," Heath said. "If he keeps working as hard as he is and training as hard as he is, his goal will be around the corner for sure."

The Loons also got starting striker Luis Amarilla back in a limited role after he walked off the field Sunday fewer than 10 minutes before kickoff after he tweaked his groin in warmups.

Amarilla was a second-half sub who entered in the 67th minute and played to the end on a night when big Aaron Schoenfeld started at striker instead.

"He didn't feel as though he could have gone 90 [minutes]," Heath said. "It was important to give him some time to get his body going again. I don't want to burden him too much and give him too many minutes, but I think it was important to get some time on the field...This sets him up nice for the Colorado game."

The Loons will advance to the tournament knockout round of 16 if they beat Colorado in their third and final Group D game on Wednesday.

"A point was a fair result tonight," Loons goalkeeper Tyler Miller said. "At the end of the day, we control our destiny going forward. We know what we have to do Wednesday to advance."

Uruguayan teenager Thomas Chacon was a halftime sub in the heat and humidity for Kevin Molino and he traded prime scoring chances with Real Salt Lake's Sam Johnson, either one of which could have won the game for his team in the game's final minutes.

MacMath deflected Chacon's attempted chip shot over the goal and Johnson completed a long run without the ball that he finished by just missing wide a chance to convert a long pass into the winning goal.

Heath said Friday that Chacon would soon get his chance. A young designated player who hadn't play a game since he started at Houston last September not long after he was acquired.

"We're going to need all these players," Heath said. "I don't think people who are not here quite understand how difficult these conditions are to be playing, with the humidity, etc. And the fact we've had four months off, people don't seem to recognize that as much as they should."

"Thomas showed little glimpse of what he can do. He will be better for that. I can't remember the last time Thomas was on the field. It has been a long time for him. He'll benefit from the 45 minutes."

Real Salt Lake star Albert Rusnak left the game in the 33rd minute after he went down in a heap not once, but twice because of a leg injury. He is a teammate with Loons midfielder Jan Gregus on Slovakia's national team.

The teams' starters briefly knelt in protest before Friday's game, a statement in support of Black Lives Matter and MLS players' Black Players for Change movements. Alonso wore the captain's armband with George Floyd's name printed on it after Michael Boxall wore it as captain.

The Star Tribune will not be traveling to Florida this month for MLS, NBA and WNBA coverage. This article was written using the television broadcast and video interviews before and/or after the game.

Absolutely nothing gets settled in draw

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCXXXIII.

COUNCIL CALLS RACISM HEALTH CRISIS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 18, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 523 wordsByline: MIGUEL OTAROLA; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The Minneapolis City Council declared racism a public health emergency in the city Friday, vowing to allocate funding and other resources to "name, reverse, and repair the harm done" to people of color in the city.

The resolution was unanimously approved nearly two months after George Floyd, a Black man, was killed by Minneapolis police while in custody in south Minneapolis. Days after his death, Council Vice President Andrea Jenkins called on the council to define racism as a public health crisis.

During a committee meeting last week, Jenkins said Floyd's killing, Black people's vulnerability to the coronavirus and racial gaps in homeownership are issues that have "been deeply agreed upon that at the core is racism."

"How do we begin to address and end racism?" Jenkins asked. "I think the first step in that process is through naming that as an issue."

The resolution, sponsored by Jenkins and Council Member Phillippe Cunningham, listed multiple ways the city would work to reduce the impact of racism on its residents.

Its racial advisory committee would review the city charter and other policies. It would "establish a long-term sustainable source" of funding to increase developmental programming for youth of color.

It would also put together an annual report detailing the health of residents of color.

The resolution included recommended reforms to criminal justice and public safety, such as arresting people only for violent "and other major" crimes and dismissing cash bail.

It also directed future funding toward small businesses and housing to make land more affordable and "reverse and repair the harm experienced" by residents of color.

Systemic racism is among the greatest long-term threats our city and nation are facing, and the last two months have made that reality painfully clear," Mayor Jacob Frey said in a statement. "For Minneapolis to be a place where everyone can live and thrive, we must recognize this crisis for what it is and approach policymaking with the urgency it deserves."

Disparities between white and Black residents in Minnesota are stark, according to a 2019 Star Tribune analysis of U.S. census data.

Black people in the state have higher rates of poverty and unemployment and lower rates of homeownership.

About 60% of use-of-force incidents by Minneapolis police since 2008 were against Black people, even though they only make up about 20% of the city, a Star Tribune analysis found. State data have shown that Black residents and other people of color run disproportionate risks related to the coronavirus, including death and hospitalization.

"We have to specifically name racism if we are ever going to move from standing in awe of the consequences of racial disparities to actually conquering and eliminating them," Cunningham said last week.

The city's declaration Friday came on the heels of a similar resolution enacted by a divided Hennepin County Board late last month.

That resolution, sponsored by Commissioners Angela Conley and Irene Fernando, included several directives to reduce racial disparities in housing, health care, education and other sectors.

Miguel Otárola · 612-673-4753

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

CHALLENGING EXERCISE

ARTICLE MCCXXXIV.

CHALLENGING EXERCISE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 18, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 612 wordsByline: KELLY SMITH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The Twin Cities YMCA is trying to shake off a 30% revenue dropBody

The YMCA is reopening fitness and child care centers across the Twin Cities and western Wisconsin, but closures of programs this spring from the COVID-19 pandemic caused revenue at one of Minnesota's largest nonprofits to drop by 30% so far this year.

The YMCA of the Greater Twin Cities - the third-largest YMCA in the U.S. - closed two-thirds of its camps and fitness and child care centers during the outbreak.

Some of its 82,000 members canceled or paused memberships or stopped child care when buildings closed from March to June. As a result, the YMCA furloughed 90% of its 6,700 employees, and top leaders have taken salary cuts.

Now, as 18 facilities have slowly reopened at 25% capacity, the organization is hoping money starts to flow in as they also look for new ways to drum up donations and grants. The YMCA normally draws $168 million in revenue a year.

"The Y will continue to meet these challenges, embrace them," CEO Glen Gunderson said. "We're really focused on arriving at a new reality, not returning to normal or returning to a new normal."

Minnesota's nonprofit sector has been especially hit hard by the pandemic since many nonprofits were forced to close programs and events that bring in a bulk of their revenue, leading to mass furloughs, layoffs and other cuts.

Unlike a lot of smaller nonprofits, the YMCA also has $30 million in debt in public financing bonds for building projects such as the opening of the Douglas Dayton YMCA facility at Gaviidae Commons in downtown Minneapolis. Moody's Investors Service recently downgraded the rating on the bonds "based on an expected deterioration" of finances after declining membership and revenue.

The nonprofit dipped into its reserves to cover budget gaps, according to Moody's statement, but Y leaders have "responded forcefully to the unprecedented revenue declines."

CHALLENGING EXERCISE

"Revenue has fallen significantly," said Karen Larson, the YMCA's chief finance and administrative officer. "How this all shakes out in the end here as we're back up and running has yet to be seen. But we feel there are challenges ahead and there's opportunity ahead."

YMCA officials said the change won't affect the organization's current finances unless they pursue additional financing.

"Obviously recovery from COVID for all organizations is going to take some time," Larson said.

Starting in March, the COVID-19 pandemic closed gyms and child care centers across Minnesota.

The Y - which has 30 locations in the metro, southeastern Minnesota and western Wisconsin - started live online fitness programs and created a virtual or phone well-being service for senior citizens. By June 10, the YMCA started reopening facilities, and another seven sites, including the Douglas Dayton YMCA, are slated to reopen by Aug. 3.

Day camps, summer programs and family camps are running with modified programs to allow for social distancing, but overnight and wilderness camps were canceled.

During the pandemic, the organization also has expanded other efforts such as helping provide food to people in need, partnering with other nonprofits - Loaves & Fishes in Minneapolis and the Sheridan Story in Roseville - to distribute free food at Y sites.

The Y also has boosted racial equity work, which Gunderson said is even more important after the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police in May. Gunderson said the Y is continuing to look for more community partnerships to increase the number of people the YMCA serves and find ways to boost donations.

"We have a strong organization that's had an amazing legacy," Gunderson said. "And the Y has always reinvented itself to serve what the present needs were."

Kelly Smith · 612-673-4141

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

ARTICLE MCCXXXV.

MIDTOWN MARKET CELEBRATES REOPENING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 18, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 878 wordsByline: SHARYN JACKSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Despite the pandemic, riots and scandal, the international food hall is ready to welcome back customers.Body

The pandemic wasn't the only thing that spelled a tumultuous first half of the year for the Midtown Global Market.

The E. Lake Street international food hall was already struggling under a state-ordered shutdown of indoor dining and a loss of customers this past spring. Then, unrest after the police killing of George Floyd set many neighboring businesses ablaze. Windows and doors to the market were smashed; some tenants' stands were ransacked.

As vendors and management were picking up the pieces, next came scandal. The market terminated the lease of one of its first and largest tenants, Holy Land, after racist social media posts by the CEO's daughter surfaced online.

With its grand reopening on Saturday, Midtown Global Market hopes to send a message that the market - and the area - is on the rebound.

"The last couple months have been really difficult, not just for the neighborhood, but for the whole corridor," said Earlsworth "Baba" Letang, who monitors businesses and sales at the market for the Neighborhood Development Center, a nonprofit that co-owns the market with the Cultural Wellness Center.

"We wanted to do something to bring them back to the area, to celebrate in a safe way," Letang said. "Yes, it is safe."

Visitors to the reopening, which runs from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m., will find more than 30 restaurants, grocery stores and retailers open for business, despite some plywood boards that remain up. Drummers and dancers will perform. A "Passport to Food and Fun" offers discounts and information about the 16 countries that market businesses represent.

Midtown Market celebrates reopening

Guests can travel one-way in the market, ambassadors will be handing out masks, and hand sanitizer will be stationed throughout.

The market, which opened in 2006 in the former Sears building, now the Midtown Exchange, didn't fully shut down when the pandemic first took root in Minnesota.

Three grocery stores stayed open for business and many restaurants launched curbside pickup and delivery to weather the statewide stay-at-home order. Gradually more restaurant vendors relaunched in June, but "traffic is obviously still not where it used to be," Letang said. The market's primary customer base used to come from another tenant in the building, Allina Health. Many employees have been working from home.

With sales down, and rent relief for vendors, the market is facing about a $500,000 budget deficit. A

GoFundMe to support the vendors and repair damage from the riots has brought in almost $155,000 so far.

The market also launched Meals for Medics, an initiative that pays for meals from market vendors and sends them to health care workers at nearby Abbott Northwestern Hospital.

In addition to the loss of Holy Land, which had one of the largest footprints in the market, a handful of other businesses have left in the past few months. Letang said he is fielding offers to take over Holy Land's space and that some Lake Street businesses lost to fire are considering moving into the market.

Letang credits the building's security team, as well as its condo residents, for protecting the market during the nights of unrest on Lake Street. He and other managers stayed up night after night, texting one another and monitoring the destruction to the market's neighbors.

"This is about the future of small business owners," he said. "It was hard to sleep, knowing that anything would happen to the market."

Since it first opened, Midtown Global Market has served as a hub for emerging businesses, many of them owned by immigrants, as a reflection of the neighborhood.

"When you look at the history of Lake Street, immigrants have always played a very significant role in the development of this area," Letang said. "To know there is a public market where they can continue to have their business and follow their dreams, it's a very good thing for them."

Tabota Seyon had opened her market stand, InfusedLife Plant Based Eatery, in January 2020. Not long afterward, workers in the building began staying home.

"It felt strange, worrying about myself and everyone else," Seyon said. "Did they lose their job? Did they get sick?"

She took the next few months as an opportunity to revamp her health food menu. "My business was intended for the sole purpose of helping the community heal," she said. "I think that was what I was put here to do."

Midtown Market celebrates reopening

Manny Gonzalez moved to the United States in 1999 from Mexico City, and launched the sandwich shop Manny's Tortas. When the market opened in 2006, he relocated there, and has been an anchor for the market ever since.

The first months of 2020 have been crushing for his business, he said.

A federal paycheck protection loan has kept him afloat through COVID-19. But then his space was vandalized, and his computer and the tablets he uses for delivery services were stolen.

"They just made a big mess, but we can replace that," he said. "I'm thankful nothing more than that happened."

The grand reopening is symbolic, he said.

"It's going to bring a little normalcy back to the area, and hopefully we come back even stronger than before," Gonzalez said. "The neighborhood has been very supportive. I can't wait till we start seeing more people around here."

Midtown Global Market, 920 E. Lake St., Mpls., midtownglobalmarket.org

Sharyn Jackson · 612-673-4853

@SharynJackson

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

PICK SIX

ARTICLE MCCXXXVI. PICK SIX

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 18, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 6ELength: 328 wordsByline: JON BREAM; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Pick Six is a half-dozen cool things in music, from two points of view.

Chris Uggen of Shoreview:

1 "Gritty Gals of Rock 'n' Blues." It's WDGY's feel-good Sunday morning radio show, which recently celebrated Fanny, the criminally underrated 1970s rockers, with well-chosen songs and well-researched commentary.

2 Cory Wong, "Live at First Ave." This captures the wonderful sound and sweet vibe of his joyous live set from 2019. He's also sharing videos of backstage scenes and new music like his cover of the Beatles' "Blackbird."

3 Livestream from Willie's American Guitars in St. Paul. You don't have to be a guitar geek to enjoy the live sets and mini-lessons from masters like Pat Donohue, or Nate Westgor's fun and informative discourses on vintage gear on Facebook.

Jon Bream of the Star Tribune:

1 Amber Woodhouse, "A Message From One of Your Black Friends" video. The Nashville guitarist/singer was visiting her parents in her hometown of Minneapolis when George Floyd died. She wrote a poem, "Exhausted," at her parents' house and adapted it into this chilling performance-art piece. "Exhausted from a president that doesn't care about us," she declaims, throwing white powder over her body.

2 Booker T. Jones publishes an online directory of Black-owned businesses. At 75, the Rock Hall of Famer isn't leaving his house to protest during the pandemic, but he's contributing by compiling a directory of Black-owned businesses that do e-commerce. potatohole.com

3 Lady A vs. the Group Formerly Known as Lady Antebellum. Seattle blues singer Anita White has been performing as Lady A for two decades, and the suddenly woke country trio changed its name this summer to Lady A, a trademark they obtained in 2011. The two acts tried to work out an agreement; the Black indie singer asked for $10 million (half for charity) from the big stars, who in turn sued her. She has been rightfully speaking up. So has social media, with one Twitter pundit calling the band Lady AntiBLM.

PICK SIX

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

End of Document

Post office will lease Lake St. Kmart; others want in, too

ARTICLE MCCXXXVII.

POST OFFICE WILL LEASE LAKE ST. KMART; OTHERS WANT IN, TOO

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 18, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3B

Length: 142 words

Byline: LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

Minneapolis is poised to temporarily lease out part of the vacant Kmart building on Lake Street to the U.S. Postal Service, which lost two locations in the riots that followed George Floyd's death.

The Postal Service needs a temporary location during the 12 to 24 months it will take to rebuild. Its agreement with the city calls for it to pay $30,416 a month in rent beginning Aug. 1.

The City Council approved the deal Friday, and Mayor Jacob Frey is expected to sign off on it.

The city agreed this year to spend about $9 million to end its lease with Kmart as part of a larger effort to redevelop the area.

Council President Lisa Bender, who represents the area, said the lease covers only a portion of the building and acknowledged other groups have expressed an interest in using part of the space, including as a temporary homeless shelter.

LIZ NAVRATIL

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCXXXVIII.

READERS WRITE WE'RE STILL NOT UP TO SPEED

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 18, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 8ALength: 1219 wordsBody

THE CONTINUING PANDEMIC

I heard a rather mundane news report recently that rattled me to my core. Six months into the mission, and the U.S. is still short of glass vials and swabs necessary to perform adequate coronavirus testing. And test results aren't reported for days, sometime weeks. Seriously?

While our president remains inclined to forgo his leadership position and not mount a national response, where are all the scientists and public health professionals who would normally be all over this crisis? Where are policymakers who hold our safety and security close at heart? Can one Luddite so stymie our scientific, public health, manufacturing and political infrastructure so as to render them ineffective?

I fear this is yet another symptom of sad situation in which the U.S. is no longer capable of coordinating a response to a crisis, much less strive to achieve an inspired goal. We saw this after hurricanes Katrina and Sandy, after 09/11, after the Sandy Hook school shootings, the George Floyd killing and other acts of violence.

Have our politics become so cynical, so divisive that we are now completely paralyzed?

Mr. President, where is your plan? What have you - what have we - done to so nullify the innate creativity and expertise that has inspired citizens of this country to rise up and overcome challenges in the past?

If we are going to sink into authoritarianism in this country, please, let's at least have effective autocrats in charge.

Dennis J. Sutliff, Minneapolis

...

Sadly, my sister passed away from COVID-19 in April. We drove to Nebraska for a carefully planned memorial gathering at the VFW in an Omaha suburb, in the heart of Trump country. My sister was a nurse. Her friends and co-workers were warm, friendly, welcoming, lovely people. I was reminded that many Trump supporters are really good people despite some Trump supporters who embrace or tolerate white supremacy, neo-Nazi-ism, racism, hatred of immigrants, cronyism, groping of women, lies large and small, name-calling, extortion, tax evasion, Putinism, etc. The Nebraskans at the memorial were none of the above. They were patriotic, God-loving, generous, loving folks who loved and appreciated my big sister.

READERS WRITE We're still not up to speed

One day, and it may be soon, the Trump train will go off the rails. Witnesses will at last be allowed to testify, tax returns will be made public, the entire Mueller report will be released and the smoke will clear. Reasonable people on all sides will see him for the corrupt liar he is.

With malice toward none, with charity for all, let us welcome normalcy, civility, compromise and a semblance of truth back to our political discourse so we can begin to address the monumental challenges we face as a united people.

Jay Richardson, Minneapolis

. . .

I recently watched the movie "1917."

A year ago I walked the trenches in Flanders Fields of World War I.

I've been to Pearl Harbor and Normandy.

I've walked along the white stones at Arlington and touched the etched names of the Vietnam War dead of my generation.

There really is no way to thank those who have served and continue to do so.

Now, for those who find it inconvenient to wear masks to protect our citizens from COVID, I cannot describe my bewilderment or sadness.

Have fun at the bars.

You are your own monument to selfishness.

Diane Homa, Blaine

. . .

Just some thoughts on my drive to work this morning: Thanks to the many green-thumbs who have such beautiful flowers for us all to enjoy; loved that brightly painted front door; enjoyed the many hearts in the windows; thanks to the ladies out picking up trash at 8 a.m.; oh, those happy, smiling dogs out for a walk with their owners; and I'm so thankful that COVID-19 doesn't prefer children.

Elizabeth Schading, New Brighton

BACK TO SCHOOL?

Has this, too, become political? Plus: Many questions on reopening

As a hands-on science teacher, I am hoping, fervently, for school to be on campus this fall. The spring was very difficult. I have never worked harder in my 43 years in education. With all of the uncertainty about the fall, the summer has become a desperate time of preparation for whatever our situation will be in late August. The driver is safety, for the students and for the staff members. We are relying on the best information we have from the experts as they see this situation unfold. The suggestion that there is a political conspiracy here shows how removed these accusers are from the realities of the classroom.

READERS WRITE We're still not up to speed

Michael D. Thomsen, St. Paul

...

The positions articulated by Republicans regarding mail-in voting and school reopening are crystal-clear.

There will be no consideration for voting by mail due to the smallest possibility that it may result in even one fraudulent vote. Safety measures included in the process just can't guarantee a flawless result. That is a risk unworthy of consideration!

But the reopening of schools?

It is true, the safety of every student and faculty member cannot be guaranteed. But if we include all reasonable safety measures available, then the possibility of sickness or death to a small number of children and faculty would be an acceptable outcome. Schools must reopen!

It appears there is no margin of error with regard to election integrity. But the possibility of virus outbreaks in Minnesota schools? That scenario is worth the risk of life and death.

Todd Embury, Ramsey

...

Questions for school openings:

- If teachers tests positive for COVID-19, are they required to quarantine for two to three weeks? Is their sick leave paid?
- If that teacher has five classes a day with 30 students each, do all 150 of those students need to stay home and quarantine for 14 days?
- Do all 150 of those students now have to get tested? Who pays for those tests? Are they happening at school? How are the parents being notified? Does everyone in each of those kids' families need to get tested? Who pays for that?
- What if someone who lives in the same house as a teacher tests positive? Does that teacher now need to take 14 days off work to quarantine? Is that time off paid?
- Where is the district going to find a substitute teacher who will work in a classroom full of exposed, possibly infected students for substitute pay?
- Substitutes teach in multiple schools. What if they are diagnosed with COVID-19? Do all the kids in each school now have to quarantine and get tested? Who is going to pay for that?
- What if a student in your kid's class tests positive? What if your kid tests positive? Does every other student and teacher need to be quarantined? Does everyone get notified who is infected and when? Or because of HIPAA regulations are parents and teachers just going to get mysterious "may have been in contact" e-mails all year long?

READERS WRITE We're still not up to speed

Until and unless these questions are answered, no school should consider opening.

Until and unless those making the decisions can articulate a reason that a delay in opening the schools will cause irreparable harm, no school should consider opening.

Karen Rupp, St. Cloud

HELL IN A HANDBASKET

But do you have a proposal?

There will always be whiners and complainers, but after reading a July 17 letter writer's comments about Minneapolis ("All this, and now nudity?"), I vividly recall a former boss who told me to never show up with a problem unless I could offer a solution. Best advice ever.

Virginia Becker, Minnetonka

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

Soucheray: Lawless people are shooting up the towns. That's not the fault of the police.

ARTICLE MCCXXXIX.

SOUCHERAY: LAWLESS PEOPLE ARE SHOOTING UP THE TOWNS. THAT'S NOT THE FAULT OF THE POLICE.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 18, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 668 words

Byline: Joe Soucheray

Highlight: In a long opinion piece in the Minneapolis Star Tribune, the authors, five Minneapolis City Council members, Jeremiah Ellison, Lisa Bender, Alondra Cano, Cam Gordon and Steve Fletcher, set forth their plan for a new Department of Community Safety and Violence Prevention. You know, what used to be called a police department. Examining their words, [...]

Body

In a long opinion piece in the Minneapolis Star Tribune, the authors, five Minneapolis City Council members, Jeremiah Ellison, Lisa Bender, Alondra Cano, Cam Gordon and Steve Fletcher, set forth their plan for a new Department of Community Safety and Violence Prevention. You know, what used to be called a police department.

Examining their words, even microscopically, the plan is so elusive as to remain unknowable. There really is no plan other than a whimsical wish for peace and justice for all. To accomplish this, we get platitudes and this statement: "As members of the Minneapolis City Council, we have the responsibility to address the persistent failures in our policing system and to propose the best possible solutions for safety, including investments in proven strategies to prevent violence. Meaningful change requires a common-sense amendment to the city charter ... we urge them (the city charter commission) to let Minneapolis residents vote on the amendment this fall."

Admirable that, a commendable goal.

An actual police department is apparently antithetical to "a just, effective and sustainable approach to public safety."

Well, the whole thing is basically a third-rate term paper that in today's academy would probably get a gold star. But it doesn't mean anything. And no proof, measurements, statistics or evidence is offered for what they even have in mind, which, again, is so elusive as to be unknowable.

There is one undeniable fact that gets one sentence in the piece. They wrote that Minneapolis communities are experiencing an uptick in gun violence that needs addressing now.

By whom?

Soucheray: Lawless people are shooting up the towns. That's not the fault of the police.

Uptick? Mode like an onslaught, in both Minneapolis and St. Paul.

Lawless people are shooting up the towns. That isn't the fault of the police. Lawless people are assaulting innocents in public places and on public transportation. That isn't the fault of the police. Boys as young as 12, maybe younger, have guns and are using them to commit robberies. That is not the fault of the police. Gangs of youth are systematically pulling off car hijackings all over both cities. That is not the fault of the police.

Young criminals with no moral or ethical clarity are ruining Minneapolis, not the police department. The police department needs reform and that will get accomplished, but the police cannot be scapegoated to hide the real problem, miserable heartless behavior.

That is never addressed by elected officials. Never. Not once has a mayor or city council member wagged a finger at a kid arrested for a gun crime and demanded of that young person an accounting of his behavior. No, the gun gets blamed, or the police get blamed, or the young person is called a victim of racism and on and on and on.

Nonsense. That is the soft bigotry of low expectations. The decline of moral and ethical integrity is an American cultural problem that runs through the entire socioeconomic gamut, from the highest place in the land to the lowest. It cannot be wished away. The absence of moral and ethical integrity and simple respect for authority and respect of fellow citizens starts in the home.

The month of George Floyd has exposed a foul police officer and the political failures in Minneapolis. The city council can propose whatever they wish and the voters will have their say. But the city council doesn't have a clue as to what the real problem is and they don't have a clue how to fix it because they cannot get into the heart of a child any more than any of us can.

Soucheray: Trust us, the Minneapolis Council said. We don't, said the Charter Commission. Soucheray: And our ability to reason is swept away. Soucheray: Those cheering and jeering have something in common. Soucheray: This progressive transfer of wealth from renters to developers and big corporations
The unfortunate truth is that we need police departments now more than we ever have.

And Lisa Bender, when I call 911, I am not calling from a place of privilege as you recently and so ridiculously stated.

It's what I pay for.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

The quiet life of Derek Chauvin before the public death of George Floyd

ARTICLE MCCXL. THE QUIET LIFE OF DEREK CHAUVIN BEFORE THE PUBLIC DEATH OF GEORGE FLOYD

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 19, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 2575 words

Byline: Serge F. Kovalski, Kim Barker

Highlight: The four teenagers drove around Minneapolis playing a game of Nerf Gun Assassin on a May evening before graduation in 2013. One of them randomly fired an orange dart out the window. It was a stupid teenager move. What happened next was deadly serious: Two Minneapolis police officers pulled up, pointed their guns at the [...]

Body

The four teenagers drove around Minneapolis playing a game of Nerf Gun Assassin on a May evening before graduation in 2013. One of them randomly fired an orange dart out the window.

It was a stupid teenager move. What happened next was deadly serious: Two Minneapolis police officers pulled up, pointed their guns at the teenagers and shouted orders laced with expletives, two of them later recalled.

Kristofer Bergh, then 17, said he kept telling himself not to move suddenly or give the police any reason to shoot him. The youth who had fired the dart was steered into their cruiser for what seemed like an hour, and the officers seized everyone's Nerf guns. One officer made a lasting impression; in fact, Bergh and another passenger said they would never forget him, nor what he said as he gave them back their guns.

"Most of you will be 18 by the end of the year," the officer said, before letting them go. "That means you'll be old enough for 'big boy jail.'"

It was Derek Chauvin, the white police officer who, seven years later, would become known around the world for putting his knee on the neck of a Black man named George Floyd during an arrest and holding it there for more than eight minutes, until he no longer had a pulse.

Floyd's death sparked protests across the country. But even as the Minneapolis police chief called Floyd's death "murder" and claimed that Chauvin "knew what he was doing," little has emerged about the 44-year-old officer, now charged with second-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter, or what in his career might have led up to an arrest so chilling in its quiet ferocity.

The roadside encounter with the four teenagers led to a complaint against Chauvin, and it reflected what both co-workers and citizens told the New York Times about encountering the officer over his 19 years with the Minneapolis Police Department: Chauvin did his job as if he were playing a role - a tough Dirty Harry on the lookout for bad guys.

The quiet life of Derek Chauvin before the public death of George Floyd

"He was overly aggressive and not understanding that we were just kids," recalled Noah McGurran-Hanson, who was in the car with Bergh and the two others, all of whom are white. "He was treating us like we had been tried and convicted."

Chauvin, his lawyer and family members have declined to talk to the Times. Yet dozens of interviews with acquaintances depict a police officer who seemed to operate at an emotional distance from those around him. Chauvin was a quiet and rigid workaholic with poor people skills and a tendency to overreact - with intoxicated people, especially - when a less aggressive stance might have led to a better outcome, interviews show.

He was awkward. Other officers often didn't like him or didn't know him. He didn't go to parties and didn't seem to have many friends. Some neighbors knew so little about him that they didn't even know he was a police officer until after his arrest. Even his wife of 10 years, a Hmong refugee and real estate agent, ended up estranged: Days after Floyd's death, she filed for divorce and asked to change her last name.

Chauvin always wanted action. He continued to pound the streets in one of Minneapolis's busiest precincts on its hardest shift, 4 p.m. to 2 a.m., long after many others his age moved to desk jobs or the day shift.

That earned him kudos. He received two medals of commendation, for tackling an armed suspect and arresting an armed gang member. He also was awarded two medals of valor, after shooting a man wielding a sawed-off shotgun and subduing a domestic-violence suspect - whom he shot and wounded in the process.

But his performance also led to at least 22 complaints or internal investigations. Only one resulted in discipline. (Bergh said his complaint was shrugged off by a sergeant who apologized for any "negative interaction.")

That is a high number compared with other officers, said Dave Bicking, a board member of Communities United Against Police Brutality, based in the Twin Cities. "His numbers should have definitely raised alarm with the department and triggered a review," said Bicking, adding that most officers might get one or two complaints in seven years.

On his off nights, such as they were, Chauvin often worked security at a nightclub.

Even on the police force, Chauvin was an outsider. He often partnered with a rookie he was training, exacting in his expectations. That was fine with veteran colleagues, who did not necessarily want to ride alongside him.

"Occasionally, he would seem a little cocky," said Lucy Gerold, a retired police commander who knew Chauvin. He was, she said, "the guy not everybody liked or wanted to work with."

Chauvin spent his early years in suburban West St. Paul, with a stay-at-home mother and a father who earned about $1,000 a month as a certified public accountant, barely enough for their small family. When

The quiet life of Derek Chauvin before the public death of George Floyd

Derek was 7, his mother filed for divorce, asking for the family home and child support for Derek and his baby sister.

His father soon asked for a paternity test of Derek's baby sister; a blood test showed he was not the father. His father ended up with the family home and shared custody of Derek. His mother married her lover. And Derek attended four elementary schools in five years.

Derek did not play sports in school - at least, not that anyone remembers. He did not have a yearbook photo for his junior or senior years. One classmate from Park High School in Cottage Grove remembered him as the student in ROTC who never talked but always held the flag. Another classmate, Scott Swanson, said Derek flew under the radar.

"I don't think he was an outcast or anything like that," said Swanson, who said he had talked to fellow classmates in recent weeks who also barely recalled him. "He was just a face in the crowd."

Weeks after graduation, Chauvin started as a prep cook at Tinucci's, a Newport restaurant 10 minutes from home. He enrolled that fall at a local technical college to study "quantity food preparation."

But Chauvin decided he wanted a uniform.

He studied law enforcement at a community college; eventually, he would also earn a Metropolitan State University degree in law enforcement. After joining the military police, he was deployed to a U.S. Army base in Germany, where he studied for the Minnesota police exam in his spare time. He did not socialize much or drink alcohol.

"He volunteered to be a designated driver for the guys who wanted to go into town at night and have a few beers," said Jerry Obieglo, a platoon sergeant who supervised Chauvin.

Back home, in September 2000, at age 24, he applied to the Minneapolis police.

From the beginning, Chauvin stood out as gung-ho. When he reported for training after the police academy, he showed up in a new white Crown Victoria outfitted to resemble a police car, recalled one officer, speaking on condition of anonymity because talking to the news media could get him fired.

Leaving work, most officers dressed casually. But Chauvin, who stood ramrod straight like he was still in the military, left in full uniform, his pants pulled higher than most people wore them, his boots polished.

"In a group setting he would never connect and stand there like a small child," the officer said. He added: "I was put off by his lack of communication skills. You never felt like he was present."

Chauvin landed in the Third Precinct, one of the city's busiest.

The biggest call of his young career came when he was 30, in 2006: Shortly after midnight, he and five other officers pursued a car driven by a man suspected of stabbing two friends. The man soon pointed a sawed-off shotgun at officers, the police said. They shot the man, fatally. Chauvin received a medal of valor.

Chauvin soon earned two letters of reprimand for his behavior on another call - his only formal discipline.

In August 2007, Melissa Borton was heading home from grocery shopping when Chauvin and a fellow officer pulled her over. Chauvin reached into the open window of Borton's minivan, unlocked her door, undid her seat belt and started pulling her out, without any explanation, she recalled. Her baby and dog were left in the vehicle.

The quiet life of Derek Chauvin before the public death of George Floyd

She said the officers put her in their cruiser and told her that they were looking for a vehicle resembling hers that had been involved in a crime. Eventually they told Borton, who was by then quite upset, that she could leave.

"When I got out, they noticed that my shirt was wet, which was from being a breastfeeding mother," Borton recalled. She could not tell who taunted her as she returned to her car. "Chauvin or the other officer rudely said, 'You probably have postpartum depression, and you need help.'"

Until he was 27, Chauvin's home address was his grandmother's suburban house in Inver Grove Heights.

But about the time he pulled over Borton, Chauvin was becoming serious with his girlfriend, Kellie Xiong.

Xiong was a survivor. Her father had been a Hmong soldier fighting Communists in Laos before the family fled in the late 1970s. After more than a year in a Thai refugee camp, the family moved to Wisconsin, sponsored by a church in Eau Claire.

Xiong married another Hmong refugee in 1991 in what she later told the Pioneer Press was an arranged marriage. She was 16. By 19, she had given birth to two sons.

She later left her husband, whom she described as abusive, and moved to the Minneapolis area to work as a radiology technician at Hennepin County Medical Center. There, she met Chauvin, who had brought someone in for a health check before an arrest, she told the Pioneer Press. He soon asked her out.

By 2008, they were planning their lives. Two weeks after Xiong filed for divorce from her first husband, Chauvin bought a new house in a new subdivision for $441,000. It was fit for a family, with four bedrooms, four bathrooms and a three-car garage.

The couple married in June 2010. From the beginning, they spread their money thin. Not only did Chauvin hold on to a townhouse he had bought in 2003, but the couple also bought a vacation home near Disney World in Florida in 2011.

Chauvin soon fell behind on fees for his townhouse. On a delinquency notice for $280 in 2013, Chauvin responded that he had paid everything and added, "So no payment is actually owed!" He faxed the response at 3:17 a.m., after finishing his shift in the Third Precinct.

By July 2014, the small debt had snowballed into a judgment of almost $8,000 because Chauvin never came to court.

Meanwhile, the Chauvins downsized. They sold their large house for almost $60,000 less than its purchase price. They bought a home a few blocks away, almost half the size.

In 2015, they appeared to toy with moving to Florida. They sold the home they had just bought. Kellie Chauvin got her radiology technology license in Florida. Derek Chauvin registered to vote there.

The quiet life of Derek Chauvin before the public death of George Floyd

But they stayed in Minnesota, living in Oakdale, where Kellie Chauvin got her real estate license in 2016. In her spare time, Kellie Chauvin continued with one passion - rescuing dogs, often caring for four at once - and found another, in beauty pageants.

Before one pageant, she described her husband as a "softy" who always opened doors for her.

But there were some awkward moments at the Mrs. Minnesota America contest in June 2018 when the husbands joined the show. A host asked Derek Chauvin, wearing an ill-fitting tuxedo and bow tie, what additional competition the women should perform. He suggested a rock-climbing wall - for the husbands.

"Well, you're not competing, I'm talking about your wife here," the host replied.

During a quiz segment, each contestant wrote down something about her husband, and the men had to guess which one described him. Derek Chauvin failed miserably, even as other husbands correctly recognized their wives' responses. Initially, Derek Chauvin thought he was the one whose wife said he liked to tell stories. But he wasn't.

A bit later, a host gave another clue: "Whoever you are, you do upside-down hanging crunches. You can do 100 at a time."

No one stepped forward.

"Uh, Derek Chauvin?" the host said.

The Chauvins often seemed to live on separate tracks.

When Kellie Chauvin took trips to help dogs - including one she rescued from Florida and named Marley - she often brought a female friend for company.

On most weekends for 17 years, Derek Chauvin worked an off-duty police gig outside the El Nuevo Rodeo nightclub, earning $55 an hour. Maya Santamaria, who once owned the club, said the Third Precinct decided which officers were assigned.

Derek Chauvin often overreacted when he saw something that bothered him, like unruly behavior around the Lake Street club, including drunk patrons congregating on the street - especially on "urban nights," when the clientele was largely Black, Santamaria said.

He often resorted to using pepper spray, she said. When she complained, she said, she usually got the same response.

"That is protocol," Derek Chauvin told her.

Floyd, by coincidence, also did security at the club, but Santamaria said she does not recall seeing them together since Floyd worked inside.

Their one known encounter came on the evening of May 25, after a corner store employee reported that Floyd had tried to pass a counterfeit $20 bill. Two rookie officers, J. Alexander Kueng and Thomas Lane, responded.

The quiet life of Derek Chauvin before the public death of George Floyd

The two failed to get Floyd into their cruiser. Derek Chauvin and another officer, Tou Thao, arrived. Chauvin had been Kueng's main training officer; Lane had relied on him for advice. (The three other officers, who were fired alongside Chauvin, have been charged with aiding and abetting in Floyd's death.)

At Chauvin's suggestion, the officers got Floyd, agitated and struggling, on the ground. Chauvin jammed his knee in the back of Floyd's neck. The rookies held his back and legs.

Body camera footage shows what unfolded:

As Floyd said he could not breathe and asked for his mother, Chauvin uttered another tough-cop line. "You're under arrest, guy," he said. "That's why you're going to jail."

Chauvin asked if Floyd was high; Lane said he assumed so. Toxicology results would later show that Floyd was on fentanyl.

"They're going to kill me, man," Floyd said a few moments later.

"Takes a heck of a lot of oxygen to say that," Chauvin replied nonchalantly.

After the remark, Floyd said he could not breathe four times and "please" three times, and then nothing. Lane, who had called for an ambulance because Floyd's mouth was bleeding, asked Chauvin whether he wanted Floyd on his side.

"No, leave him," Chauvin said. He said an ambulance was coming.

In the middle of this - of a man dying, under his knee - Chauvin checked his rookies. "You guys all right, though?" Chauvin asked.

Lane asked again if they should roll Floyd on his side. Onlookers asked if he had a pulse. "You got one?" Lane asked.

Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

"I can't find one," Kueng said.

"Uh-huh," Chauvin replied.

Kueng tried again, and again said he could not find a pulse. Still, Chauvin kept his knee on Floyd's neck for more than two minutes. He ignored the crowd, the pleas for Floyd's life, the jeers. He waited for an ambulance that showed up far too late. And only then did Chauvin stand up.

This time, not quite as straight.

Graphic

The quiet life of Derek Chauvin before the public death of George Floyd

Derek Chauvin.(Hennepin County Sheriff via AP)

The empty remains of the Minneapolis Police Department's Third Precinct in Minneapolis, July 17, 2020. The station was set on fire by protesters on June 30 following the death of George Floyd, a Black man who died in the custody of Minneapolis police on May 25, 2020. (Caroline Yang/The New York Times)

The remains of El Nuevo Rodeo, a Latin club in Minneapolis where both George Floyd and Derek Chauvin worked security, May 30, 2020. The club was set on fire by protesters following the death of George Floyd, a Black man who died in the custody of Minneapolis police. The building has since been torn down. (Caroline Yang/The New York Times)

People pay their respects and take photos on the one-month anniversary of George Floyd's death, at 38th Street and Chicago Avenue in South Minneapolis, Thursday, June 25, 2020. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Boogaloo Bois are armed - and eager for societal collapse

ARTICLE MCCXLI. BOOGALOO BOIS ARE ARMED - AND EAGER FOR SOCIETAL COLLAPSE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 19, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1B

Length: 1216 words

Byline: STEPHEN MONTEMAYOR; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: Militia-style extremists "know we have a target on us," New Brighton man says.

Body

Michael Robert Solomon had been training for this - the moment, he said, "when the [expletive] hits the fan."

As protests grew chaotic in the days after George Floyd died in Minneapolis police custody, Solomon, a 30-year-old New Brighton man, joined a cadre of others clad in military garb and carrying assault rifles. They deployed around small businesses and in neighborhoods around the city and braced for an onslaught.

Solomon was there on behalf of the "Boogaloo Bois," a loose-knit anti-government extremist movement that advocates armed revolution. Its adherents merge the in-person paramilitary activities of far-right militias with widespread mobilization on social media platforms such as Facebook. They appeared en masse earlier this year at gun rights protests in Virginia and at rallies against COVID-19 restrictions around the country. The Boogaloo Bois have since achieved greater prominence - and with it new law enforcement scrutiny - amid the unrest over Floyd's killing.

In Minnesota, references to the Boogaloo Bois appear throughout dozens of leaked secret state and federal law enforcement bulletins related to the late-May and early June rioting. The Star Tribune reviewed those bulletins and found Solomon singled out by name in one, which warned that he and others were armed and prepared to shoot police if they approached a Minneapolis home where they staged.

"We know we have a target [on us], that's why we don't meet up in big groups because we know we're probably going to get raided," Solomon said in an interview. "We know a lot of us are probably going to die."

In June, a man linked to the movement was charged with killing two law enforcement officers in California. Near Las Vegas, three alleged Boogaloo Bois were arrested for allegedly trying to firebomb a Black Lives Matter protest. But to date, none of the more than a dozen federal criminal cases filed in Minnesota linked to the riots mention the Boogaloo movement or other groups.

Boogaloo Bois are armed - and eager for societal collapse

Solomon rejects any accusation linking him or the roughly 250 Boogaloo Bois he said are in Minnesota to white supremacy. At one point during the protests, Solomon was pictured raising his fist in solidarity with several Black men wearing Black Lives Matter shirts. He insists the animus of Minnesota's Boogaloo Bois is directed at the police.

The Boogaloo Bois were one of several groups from across the ideological spectrum that were closely watched by state and federal authorities during the Floyd protests, according to more than 60 private law enforcement bulletins. The documents were made available through the massive "Blue Leaks" data dump last month by a group called Distributed Denial of Secrets, a data transparency collective.

The bulletins describe a fire hose of information about who was on the ground during the May and June civil unrest. Authorities attributed the data to informants, social media and other sources. Often, they acknowledged, the intelligence was unsubstantiated.

Bruce Gordon, a spokesman for the Minnesota Department of Public Safety - which oversaw the Multi-Agency Command Center that tracked the unrest - refused to "respond to questions based on illegally obtained documents that contain law enforcement-sensitive information."

John Elder, Minneapolis Police Department spokesman, also said he could not comment, then added: "All of this remains under investigation and things are very intertwined." The FBI, meanwhile, won't comment on "specific intelligence products," said Kevin Smith, spokesman for its Minneapolis field office. However, Smith said, "the FBI routinely shares information about potential threats to better enable law enforcement to protect themselves and the communities they serve."

According to the documents, authorities raced to confirm reports that white supremacists were planning to burn Black churches in Minneapolis. Agents also tracked the movement of both local and national Black Panther activists participating in Floyd demonstrations.

Another bulletin later described motorcycle gangs capitalizing on the unrest to move increased amounts of heroin into the Twin Cities.

The files also mentioned antifa activists, citing at least one police informant warning that antifa would use "vehicle borne improvised explosive devices" to target National Guard and other law enforcement. There have been no confirmed reports of such attacks.

Correspondence among law enforcement in Minnesota reflects the growing profile of the Boogaloo Bois as unrest spread beyond the Twin Cities. Solomon also appeared on camera in a Daily Mail news report as he and others helped guard a tobacco shop.

Solomon, who manages the maintenance division for a local property management company, called himself "an armed redneck" who joined the Boogaloo movement after dabbling in right-wing conservatism, libertarianism and militia activity. The police bulletin that named Solomon noted that he had a "III%-er" militia sticker on his truck.

In an interview, Solomon said his allegiance rested with the Boogaloo movement and that he had neglected to remove the armed militia sticker. Like many Boogaloos, Solomon also said he now recants his past support for President Donald Trump. Now, Solomon views himself as an "anarcho-capitalist."

Boogaloo Bois are armed - and eager for societal collapse

Both Solomon and experts who have tracked the movement add that it was initially miscast as an offshoot of far-right white power extremism.

"Our whole thing is, we believe in freedom and absolute liberty for everyone regardless of race, creed, sex, gender, whatever; we don't care," Solomon said.

J.J. MacNab, a fellow at the George Washington University Program on Extremism, said the confusion can distract from the movement's true beliefs and plans, particularly "accelerationism," which holds that the political order can be dismantled through increased civil disorder.

"Just because they're not white supremacists doesn't mean that they aren't antigovernment extremists wanting to take down cops and the rest of the government," MacNab said. "What they want to do is to kill cops, to kill politicians, to start chaos so that their anarcho-capitalist world can emerge. It's accelerationism. It's just not white supremacist accelerationism."

Kathleen Belew, an assistant professor of history at the University of Chicago, called the Boogaloo Bois "a new name for something that is very old," following in the footsteps of survivalist movements. It draws on some of the same paramilitary strategies deployed by other movements in trying to generate an apocalyptic war, she said, in this case against the government rather than among races.

"This movement has been carrying out paramilitary training, amassing arms, learning paramilitary tactics, appropriating military weapons and explosives and other materials," Belew said.

In Minnesota, Solomon said, Boogaloo Bois rarely gather in groups of more than 20 or 30. More common are training exercises in smaller "squads." That's what Solomon said is happening now in anticipation of another looming wave of unrest. Solomon predicts one or more of the four fired officers charged in Floyd's death will escape conviction, sparking fresh chaos.

"Round one is going to look like a trip to Disney World, and we're just trying to get ready for that," Solomon said.

Stephen Montemayor · 612-673-1755

Twitter: @smontemayor

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

ARTICLE MCCXLII. PRIMARY WILL TEST OMAR'S 1ST TERM

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 19, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1423 wordsByline: BRIANA BIERSCHBACH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Voters in Minnesota's Fifth Congressional District are being bombarded with appeals from two rival Democrats in a nationally watched primary election that, if not for its high-profile incumbent, would get only dutiful attention from party insiders.

Ads and glossy mailers are blanketing the district as millions of dollars pour in from all over the country, defying expectations in one of the nation's safest Democratic districts, which includes Minneapolis. The difference this year is U.S. Rep. Ilhan Omar, whose rocketing profile in a single term in Congress has inspired fierce loyalty - and opposition - far beyond the borders of the district.

At 37, Omar has emerged as a leading protagonist of the progressive left, earning the backing of Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, whom she supported in the Democratic presidential primaries. Her frequent criticisms of President Donald Trump have made her a popular target of national conservatives, but she's been denounced by some Jewish leaders and fellow Democrats for several past comments about the political influence of Israel.

Some of Omar's biggest critics are placing their bets - and considerable resources - on political newcomer Antone Melton-Meaux, her leading opponent in the five-way Aug. 11 primary. The 47-year-old mediation lawyer and Minneapolis resident entered the race in December with a laser-focused message: Omar is more concerned about her national profile than the needs of her constituents in Minneapolis.

"I was frustrated that she was missing votes on a regular basis," said Melton-Meaux, who frequently cites that Omar missed 40 votes in Congress during 2019. "That's 40 times in which the residents of this district have been silenced. That's Black and brown folks, that immigrants, that's union workers."

Omar declined an interview request for this article, but her campaign is combating those claims, saying she missed a small fraction of procedural votes out of the hundreds of votes she cast in Washington last year because she was doing work in the district and dealing with an illness in the family. Omar's father died in June from complications of COVID-19.

Her aides say she's authored dozens of bills and amendments in the House, 17 of which passed off the floor, more than any other member of the Minnesota delegation.

"She's a whip of the progressive caucus, she's a regional whip for the Democratic caucus, she has close relationships with [House Speaker] Nancy Pelosi," said Jeremy Slevin, Omar's campaign spokesman. "She is an organizer at heart and is someone who is a coalition builder in Congress."

But Omar's profile as one of the first Muslim women in Congress and national progressive champion has cut both ways at home, where her Twitter battles with Trump - compounded by lingering controversies about her family life - have often overshadowed her district work.

An even greater distraction came from her divorce last year from the father of her three children. She has since married a political consultant whose firm has taken in more than $1 million from her campaign, prompting a complaint to the Federal Election Commission. Those and other controversies have opened the way for her critics to say she has been less than attentive to her own constituents.

"I live in north Minneapolis and it's a community that has for far too long been neglected," said Nekima Levy Armstrong, a Melton-Meaux supporter and Black activist who runs the Racial Justice Network. "It's important for me as a resident from north Minneapolis, who is raising children in this area and who lives in this community that there's someone there who I can reach out to by phone, or reach out to or send an e-mail," she said.

It's an argument that resonates in a district that has become the epicenter of a national reckoning on race in the wake of George Floyd's killing by Minneapolis police. His death brought new urgency to race and class issues that have long simmered in the district, one of the most diverse in the state.

Attorney General Keith Ellison, who represented the district before Omar, said he's worked with her for years on issues of affordable housing, policing and racial disparities. He and others have said it's hard to criticize Melton-Meaux as a newcomer to politics. But Ellison noted that the challenger has spent more time defining what he's against than what he's for.

"His campaign is all built around not being her," Ellison said. "We know what you're not, but what are you? Nobody knows that."

The killing of Floyd has emerged a central theme in the final stretch of the race, with both candidates highlighting their experiences being Black in America. Melton-Meaux describes being detained in a room for hours as a young law student because police wrongfully accused him of a crime. Omar fled war-torn Somalia at a young age, only to be bullied and discriminated against as a Black Muslim woman in America. She has been a frequent target of death threats.

As the Black Lives Matter movement finds new energy, Melton-Meaux's opponents are criticizing him for a 2015 Star Tribune op-ed where he pushed back on protesters' anti-police chants and said the movement needed to create a bigger tent and focus on racial disparities in education, health care and the economy. In response, Melton-Meaux said the piece was written out of love for the movement and wants it to grow and "build collaborations and partnerships."

In both style and policy, the race also has become a proxy fight between the establishment and progressive wings of the party, with Omar as a major backer of Medicare for All and publicly supporting a push to dismantle the Minneapolis Police Department in favor of a new public safety agency.

Melton-Meaux said he doesn't support eliminating police, even if he agrees more funding should be moved from law enforcement to community services. And while he would support a single-payer health care bill if it came up for a vote, he prefers a system that focuses more resources on primary care.

Health care is the "top, number one" motivating issue for Geri Katz, who supports Medicare for All and said Omar has been not only a supporter but also a key organizer in pushing for the policy, Sanders' signature campaign issue.

But a strong undercurrent in the race has sprung up from foreign policy, specifically Omar's support for a Palestinian-inspired boycott of Israel, which banned her from entering the country last year. As a Jewish woman, Katz is worried about how Omar's past comments about the lobbying influence of Israel in Washington, D.C., are being used against her.

Omar apologized for several tweets last February after some criticized her for trafficking in anti-Semitic tropes, but the animosity toward her from some groups hasn't waned in the meantime. It's contributed, in part, to a $3.2 million influx of cash directly into Melton-Meaux's campaign between April and June of this year, including nearly a half-million dollars bundled by pro-Israel political action committees. Pro-Israel PAC Americans for Tomorrow's Future is also sending mailers in the district discussing Melton-Meaux's commitment to oppose racism but doesn't mention Israel.

"Calling someone who does criticize the policies of the government of Israel anti-Semitic feels like my community is being used as a club by people who don't actually care about us," Katz said.

But Shep Harris, the mayor of suburban Golden Valley, who is also Jewish, said Omar's comments have broken trust for some in the district. He's supporting Melton-Meaux's campaign, but he said whatever happens, Omar has work to do to repair those relationships.

"There are many people who are dissatisfied, disappointed, disgruntled, offended by behavior, by actions, by votes, by lack of votes," he said. "I hope the message is sent loud and clear, whether she wins or not, that she has a lot of work to do in this district."

Primary battles like the one facing voters in the Fifth could become part of the norm, said Todd Rapp, a political consultant and veteran of DFL campaigns in the state. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez, a fellow member of the progressive "Squad" with Omar, faced a well-funded primary challenger in New York last month. She handily prevailed.

"It's kind of the national story in politics, how primary elections have become a battleground of who is going to be the spiritual leader in the party," Rapp said. "What we're seeing now is the pushback on a very progressive incumbent, a pushback that's more from the center."

Briana Bierschbach · 651-925-5042

Twitter: @bbierschbach

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

Thousands have protested over George Floyd's death. These are the stories of 4 and what they're trying to change.

ARTICLE MCCXLIII. THOUSANDS HAVE PROTESTED OVER GEORGE FLOYD'S DEATH. THESE ARE THE STORIES OF 4 AND WHAT THEY'RE TRYING TO CHANGE.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 19, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1492 words

Byline: Mara H. Gottfried

Highlight: These are the stories of four people who live in or near St. Paul, and the changes they want to bring about.

Body

Thousands of people have taken to the streets to protest since George Floyd died in Minneapolis police custody on May 25.

They've chanted messages about injustice and how they want to see police reformed. Outside of the demonstrations, their work also continues in their communities.

These are the stories of four people who live in or near St. Paul - Toshira Garraway, Martín Hernández, Marsha Magdalene and Noah McCourt - and the changes they want to bring about. They include support for families of people who've died in police encounters, funding more social services and less policing, building economic opportunities for young people, and mandating training for officers on interacting with people who are autistic.

They spoke to the Pioneer Press, in their own words, which have been edited for length and clarity.

Do you know how many times I've sat on the phone this week with screaming mothers, crying because when they killed George Floyd, it only brings up what they did to our loved ones?

My main thing that I say is, "God is going to give us the justice that we deserve." And there was a God that was there when they took our loved ones away from us. That God showed the world what they were doing to Black, minority and Indigenous people here in the state of Minnesota. That God brought forth the truth for George Floyd.

Four families started Families Supporting Families Against Police Violence for people in Minnesota about two years ago. It's basically a support group. In the past, the media has lied on our stories, we have had no support as far as people in the political seats, we've had no support with funding. We only have each other.

Thousands have protested over George Floyd's death. These are the stories of 4 and what they're trying to change.

When a regular civilian on the street kills your loved one, the Crime Victims Reparations Board pays for funerals and mental health services and more. When the police kill our loved ones, we get nothing. We started a GoFundMe to take the burden off families.

We show up at protests and rallies in unity for other families. What we need is funding to address not only the families' trauma, but also the communities'.

Do you think the rioting happened because of one man? No, it was because there's been more than 400 killings by police reported to Communities United Against Police Brutality in the state of Minnesota alone since the year 2000. There's been no accountability and a whole bunch of community trauma that's gone unmet.

People on the political side don't need to be organizing for us - the families, the people that are hurting know what needs to change. They need to pass a police-reform package because they are allowing the police that hurt our loved ones to walk free.

I grew up in East Los Angeles and I'm old enough to remember the 1965 Watts Riots (which began with the traffic stop of a Black motorist) in Los Angeles. I'm old enough to remember the Rodney King beating in 1991.

People think things like that happen only in the South, but no, these are things that are happening in supposedly progressive cities, so it's a systemic problem that's been around for generations.

We've been saying, "Black Lives Matter," and people have been saying, "Well, no, there's just a few bad apples." The way that George Floyd was killed just brought clearly to light the impunity that some police departments have in doing these kinds of things and knowing that full well they can get away with it.

The West Side Community Organization board of directors (which he chairs) recently unanimously voted for a plan to support defunding the St. Paul Police Department to develop programs over the long term that are more life-affirming, for things like mental health issues, social workers rather than police in some areas. It's going to be a long-term discussion with community folks about what that's going to look like.

Schools have been defunded, public health doesn't get enough money, social services don't get enough money, but we seem to put money into the police. And it's putting a burden on police officers.

Back in the '80s, I actually applied to be an L.A. police officer because I bought into, "I'm going to be able to change things from the inside," but I couldn't qualify because my eyesight is too bad.

I've been an activist, in some way, shape or form, for almost 45 years. You can do a lot of talking, you can do a lot of lobbying with politicians, but protest and direct action - people pay attention to that, though there's always push-back from other voices. When injustice is brought down upon people, people take their anger someplace and that's when change happens.

Marsha Magdalene, 36, joins demonstrations as she works to build up young entrepreneurs.

Just like millions of people who saw the video of George Floyd, I had this feeling that makes you get up from whatever you're doing and cancel everything and go to the forefront. We marched that day and the days after. On other nights, I stood watch over businesses with my good friend who's president of the Minneapolis NAACP.

Thousands have protested over George Floyd's death. These are the stories of 4 and what they're trying to change.

I have a biracial 13-year-old son, Aniki. When I think of what's happening to Black people, I think of my child. This is just something at the forefront of what I do as a mother.

I'm trying not to cry as I'm explaining this. As a Hmong mother of a Black child, I know my son's going to be successful, but it's not that - it's the "what ifs." It's a lot that in 2020 that we are witnessing Black people being killed, especially by law enforcement, and it feels like there's nothing that we can do.

Protesting does feel like doing something, though. Who would have thought the Twin Cities would have been the place that would start the revolution in regards to police defunding, in regards to the movement of racial and social justice? Who would have thought the Twin Cities would have changed the world that now big corporations are setting aside funds to support businesses of color?

We started Ice Cream Bow Ties when Aniki was 9 because I want him to know and understand that in his lifetime and in his world, everything is very possible, even for a Black man in America.

About two weeks after George Floyd was killed, I brought Aniki to the memorial for a Yungpreneurs (young entrepreneurs) Giving Back event. We and other young people gave out over 700 cold treats and drinks. It was very emotional for him.

I think the most important thing we want to keep doing is teaching young people how to start their own business. We're going to have virtual classes.

If we can create our own economy, we can teach our young people to create their own wealth and we'll be able to build stronger communities.

Noah McCourt, 26 and founder of the Minnesota Disability Justice Network, leads protests because he wants officers to get autism training.

Several years ago, someone actually called the police on me for a welfare check in Chaska and an officer football-tackled me, and I lost two teeth in the scuffle. When you grab people who are on the autism spectrum, like I am, you can have this kind of neurological response. It's very similar to PTSD.

I got in contact after that with officer Rob Zink at the St. Paul Police Department about the autism training he was doing and I've been working to get that statewide, but we haven't been able to get it funded. Requiring autism training for officers was one of the bills proposed at the last special session.

We've been working to really give a voice to people with disabilities in the Minnesota conversation on police brutality because we live with the abysmal statistic that 54 percent of the people who are killed by police around the U.S. annually are people with mental illness and disabilities.

We also have significant disparities for social services for families with autism. It's very hard for families, specifically families of color, to be able to navigate systems. Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Something that I really stressed in my testimony before the House public safety committee is I don't know that we can just have a public safety-centric conversation on police brutality. When people are struggling and having these confrontations with law enforcement, it's not like they just ended up in the criminal justice system. Some other system has failed them, whether that's education or the social service system being difficult to navigate. I want to see a more holistic approach and bold, transformative change, rather than performative.

Thousands have protested over George Floyd's death. These are the stories of 4 and what they're trying to change.

We are still absolutely out in the streets, we are absolutely protesting because it's a valuable way to push the conversation forward. I think it's a way to measure public opinion, I think it's a way to really put some pressure on legislators.

Graphic

Families Supporting Families Against Police Violence, a group in Minnesota, gathered in unity in June 2020. (Courtesy photo)

Martín Hernández takes part in a march in Minneapolis on June 30, 2019, demanding changes to President Donald Trump's immigration policies. His wife, Donna Maeda, is in the forefront, also wearing a Los Angeles Dodgers hat. (Courtesy of Donna Maeda)

Marsha Magdalene, at center wearing a blue mask, and her 13-year-old son, Aniki Allen, wearing a white shirt at right, own Ice Cream Bow Ties and hosted a Yungpreneurs Giving Back event at the George Floyd memorial in Minneapolis on June 6, 2020. They helped hand out more than 700 cold treats and drinks. From the left, Brittany Griffin, holding her infant son; her mother, Sherrell Griffin; Brittany's daughter, 6-year-old Paige; MeeNee Thao and sons, from oldest to youngest, Alphonse, Lestat and Raphael Lor; and two of Aniki's friends, Rayvon Deramus and Walter Abrams Jr. (Courtesy of Tyrone Raino)

Noah McCourt, executive director of the Minnesota Disability Justice Network and a St. Paul resident, speaks at a protest against Bob Kroll, the president of the Minneapolis police union, on June 25, 2020. (Courtesy of Marie B. LePage)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCCXLIV.

READERS WRITE THE FORMER MAYOR'S COMMENTS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 19, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 12ALength: 1198 wordsBody

GOVERNING MINNEAPOLIS

I ranked Betsy Hodges my No. 1 in the 2017 Minneapolis mayoral election, and I commend her for admitting that we ask police to clean up after ourselves ("As mayor I saw how white liberals block change," July 12). But her statement, originally printed in the New York Times, that "last month, a veto-proof majority of the Minneapolis City Council voted to alter the city's charter to disband the Police Department" seems scurrilously inaccurate.

The hotly debated charter proposal merely aims to restrict the mayor's strong power, create an overarching office of public safety and eliminate a set minimum of the authorized force. She should know this, because many of the nine City Council members who took a walk in Powderhorn Park for their confusing and alarming pledge to defund MPD are now walking it back. If her aim was to embarrass Mayor Jacob Frey that she's a better crisis manager, two cheers! But she also false-advertised to the world that Minneapolis may have come completely unmoored, costing us millions. We'll need that revenue during our dual crises if there is any hope to enact her costly social supports.

Jim Meyer, Minneapolis

. . .

Hodges is right about one thing: "reclamation of our humanity" would be no loss.

However, it took her hundreds of words to propose a list of vague measures to make systemic change: "Creating school systems that give all children a chance, providing health care for everyone that isn't tied to employment, reconfiguring police unions and instituting public safety protocols." Intending to inspire us to a course of action, instead she resorts to accusatory language that shuts out and labels whole communities. If we hope to work together, it's time we discontinue our use of divisive name-calling. If we want to move beyond hopes and dreams, we need to unite to construct concrete plans that are sensible, reasoned and fair propositions designed to benefit all people.

Carolyn Light Bell, Minneapolis

. . .

The July 12 Neal St. Anthony article "'Business groups warn on 'defunding' " misses the point that our current, rigid Minneapolis city charter makes a meaningful discussion of police department change impossible. St. Anthony states that there is "an ill-conceived rush by some to get the Minneapolis Charter Commission to place on the November ballot an overhaul of public safety before a full airing of issues and consequences." But it's the charter language itself that keeps us in a box. The City Council wishes to change the language to grant some freedom in exploring options. As 30-year homeowners in Minneapolis, we agree with the council.

For this reason the council on June 26 unanimously put forward language to change the charter. In its present form, the charter is a barrier to vitally needed changes in city security and well-being following George Floyd's murder. Council members want voters on Nov. 3 to have a say in how the protection of Minneapolis citizens can be best improved. The new language continues to allow for a law enforcement division with licensed officers. In addition, however, it emphasizes a holistic, public-health oriented approach to violence prevention.

St. Anthony goes on to quote the business groups as saying that they want the community to come together "to reimagine policing and public safety." But City Council members suspect that a robust discussion with citizens within the rigid confines of the current city charter would be disingenuous. For example, the charter stipulates police staffing and funding at a set level per 1,000 city residents. The council and the city cannot deviate from this as it stands now. Let the voters decide if this broader conversation and reimagining can go forward.

Mary Ford, Minneapolis

THE COST OF REBUILDING

No federal aid? Good. This chaos was all on you, Minneapolitans

I applaud FEMA for denying Gov. Tim Walz's request for funds to help restore the damage done by fire, looting and vandalism during the days following the tragic death of George Floyd ("State leaders look for options as Feds refuse to help rebuild," July 12). The damage was not caused by a natural disaster but irrational human behavior exacerbated by governing ideology and political correctness apparently endorsed by Minneapolis voters. Consequently, the financial burden to rebuild is squarely with the taxpayers of Minneapolis. It is called accountability. The buck stops with Minneapolis.

W.W. Bednarczyk, Edina

PATRIOTISM

'My country, right or wrong' - but that wasn't the end of it

A July 12 letter trotted out the old saw "My country, right or wrong!" I'll complete the Stephen Decatur quote that the correspondent left out: "... May [America] ever be right. When wrong, let us make her right. But my country!"

The glory of America is a Constitution that charges its citizens to ever strive "to create a more perfect union." When the strife settles into a smug patriotism, we're indulging the uncritical celebration of Fatherland that distinguished the previous century's unspeakable evil.

READERS WRITE The former mayor's comments

The writer went on to trash Colin Kaepernick for speaking out of turn. Another great American, Ralph Waldo Emerson, summed up his moral philosophy as "to comfort the afflicted, and afflict the comfortable." I'm afraid the prevailing morality in President Donald Trump's America is, "I got mine, Jack!"

Mark Warner, Minneapolis

. . .

In regard to issues of white privilege, expectations of police and patriotism, I suggest that we might each do well to focus on gratitude rather than pride. Gratitude is one of the best nonmedical antidotes to anxiety and its sibling, fear. When considering where my forebears have come from, I want to focus on gratitude. When I acknowledge that I have benefited from white privilege, I want to learn from the reality and view it with gratitude, not a right to be defended. When I see our police force members truly protecting and serving, I want to respond with gratitude. Focusing on pride will mean that I will need to defend it because it is usually in response to a sense of shame. If I fall back on pride, it will be a losing battle. I have life and love and a place, and for that I am grateful.

Peter O. Lundholm, St. Cloud

GRAMMAR OF DESCENT, REVISITED

It's OK if you dove

A former English teacher wrote to the editor to take issue with the use of "dove" as the past tense of "dive" in the July 4 article "Pining for travel, they shift to home study," stating that it's not proper grammar, even if it's become accepted. The letter writer must also take on, among others, the 1996 issue of the Merriam-Webster dictionary, which cites its widespread usage, as well as another Minnesota writer, F. Scott Fitzgerald, who used the word in "The Last Tycoon" (published posthumously in 1941). English is a living language, and it has moved on.

Candice L. Hart, St. Paul

THE NIGHT WATCH

Just a thought before you go

There's something about being out in the dark of night. I usually just sit on my patio and stare at the stars, but sometimes I'll take a short stroll through the neighborhood when there's nobody around - not even a passing car.

The streets couldn't be safer here in Spooner. And dogs bark to keep it that way.

Eric Auburn, Spooner, Wis.

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

ARTICLE MCCXLV.

A LIFE'S WORK IN HIGH DEMAND

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 19, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 1213 wordsByline: JACKIE CROSBY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Peacebuilding Institute trains groups on exploring and healing racial traumaBody

Amid sustained protests against police violence and calls for societal change in the nearly two months since the police killing of George Floyd, there has been a growing hunger from individuals and institutions about how to begin tackling something as vast, insidious and emotionally loaded as racism.

This is the kind of work Donna Minter has been doing for more than a decade.

A licensed psychologist with a background in social work, she established the Minnesota Peacebuilding Leadership Institute to train people and organizations how to understand racial trauma and dismantle some of their old ideas.

"People need the language," Minter said. "There are so many well-intentioned white people who want to do this work and say, 'I don't know how to start talking about it.' What we give is language to help see how racial trauma fits into a historical, structural and cultural context."

More than 4,700 people have been trained in "cultural competence" and other skills over the past decade through a range of programs that last from a few hours to an intensive five-day session. Workshops focus on trauma awareness, restorative justice and resilience and self-care.

Through the years, Minter and her assistant executive director and training partner, Crixell Shell, have worked with social workers, nurses, teachers and lawyers.

They have trained those who work in battered women's shelters, AmeriCorps Vista volunteers and environmental-advocacy groups.

They have taught those involved in the prison system working on anti-recidivism efforts, and in the past year trained staff at the Minnesota Department of Human Rights.

The city of Minneapolis hired the Peacebuilding Leadership Institute to do 15 trainings between now and fall, funded by the city's Health Department and the Office of Violence Prevention.

While the institute has been working toward its mission of racial restorative justice for years, Minter and Shell believe the time is right for their work to broaden and take hold.

"Right now, we're the epicenter of what's happening in terms of a social justice movement," said Shell, who met Minter at the first training session in 2010 and immediately wanted to be part of the effort. "In response to what's been happening, people have had a lot of pain."

Requests for training have skyrocketed since May 25, when Floyd's death in Minneapolis sparked protests in Minnesota and around the world. For many, Floyd's death touched off soul-searching about institutional racism, the legacy of slavery and its ties to persistent racial disparities in housing, employment, education and wealth.

Since moving the training online in March due to the coronavirus pandemic, Minter and Shell have conducted 46 trainings on trauma awareness, restorative justice, resilience and self-care. Nearly 1,000 people have participated.

STAR training

The institute, at mnpeace.org, employs a training method known as STAR (Strategies for Trauma Awareness and Resilience). It was developed at the Eastern Mennonite University's Center for Justice and Peacebuilding in Harrisonburg, Va., with a $2 million grant after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

"Throughout human history, we've confused the idea of retribution with the idea of reconciliation," said Antony Stately, a psychologist who runs the Native American Community Clinic in south Minneapolis.

"STAR helps people understand what reconciliation looks like and asks us to think and imagine what social justice looks like," he said. "What do I need as a human being, as community, to be restored? That's what healing is."

Stately, an enrolled member of the Oneida Nation of Wisconsin, got involved with the Peacebuilding Leadership Institute several years ago when he saw the relevance in his clinical work in tribal communities.

"You are teaching people to tend to their own traumatic experiences so they can rebound or resist traumatic events. There's lots of science behind that," Stately said. "I'm not suggesting the training is a silver bullet, but it's a piece that's been missing for a long time in conversations."

Lisa Morris-Helmstetler turned to Minter and Shell for help in rooting out implicit bias and structural racism across Olmsted County, which employs about 1,400 around the Rochester area.

The impetus grew out of a 2017 initiative known as One Olmsted, which calls for health, social and racial equity.

As deputy clerk to the County Board, she sought training to begin tackling sweeping ideas, such as implementing restorative justice.

But county leaders also wanted to help create a more open workplace culture that would allow for those sometimes uncomfortable conversations between two colleagues about race and ethnic difference.

"We want to look at equity in all of our public services," Morris-Helmstetler said. "Where people are marginalized, where there are disparities. We want to hear how our services are or aren't helping, how experiences might be different from one group to the next."

Since the training in April, Morris-Helmstetler, who is white, has worked with colleagues who are Latino and Black to conduct more than half a dozen "healing circles" with employees across the county.

"A lot of people showed up, and they were willing to be vulnerable," she said. "At first it was about coping with how to move forward after George Floyd's death. People want to learn more; we're all sort of growing together."

As part of her work with the Peacebuilding Leadership Institute, Shell convenes several monthly meetings tied to a national effort called Coming to the Table.

The groups bring together descendants of those who were enslaved and descendants of slave owners to heal historical wounds of slavery.

Shell said interest in the meetings, which are free and open to the public, also has grown in recent months.

"It is a space where we can discuss issues that aren't discussed every day," Shell said. "Or if they are discussed, they create shame within us and blame between us."

New urgency

John Parker-Der Boghossian, the equity and inclusion officer at Normandale Community College in Bloomington, said he has seen the power of the healing circles play out, in conjunction with the STAR Training. He brought Minter and Shell to the college shortly after Floyd's death.

"Something is different now," Parker-Der Boghossian said. "There's a sense that we're going to do something systemic this time. And that this isn't optional."

The Peacebuilding Leadership Institute has an annual budget of about $200,000. About 30% of revenue comes from contracts with organizations, another 30% from training fees and about 20% from grants.

Its largest fundraising effort comes from Lunafest, a women's film festival normally held at the Riverview Theater in south Minneapolis. This year's virtual event will be held Aug. 26.

Even as interest rises in fighting systemic racism, Minter knows the enormity of the task.

"You can't heal institutional racism with trainings alone. Certainly not a two-hour training," she said. "It takes time and deliberate effort" to undo generations of trauma.

But she remains hopeful.

"Most people want to build peace in their lives," Minter said. "What we are doing is teaching people the tools and language and strategies to be able to know how do that."

Jackie Crosby · 612-673-7335

Twitter: @JackieCrosby

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

End of Document

Keeping the call for justice alive

ARTICLE MCCXLVI.

KEEPING THE CALL FOR JUSTICE ALIVE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 19, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 7B

Length: 57 words

Body

An organizer, above, held a painting of Elijah McClain, who died after a 2019 police encounter in Aurora, Colo., and Isaiah Edy of St. Paul, below right, used a megaphone to lead a chant as Black Lives Matter supporters marched Saturday from U.S. Bank Stadium through downtown Minneapolis.

Photos ANTHONY SOUFFLÉ · anthony.souffle@startribune.com

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCXLVII. POSARD, MARRONE, HELMUS: HOW YOU CAN FIGHT
RUSSIA'S PLANS TO TROLL AMERICANS DURING THE 2020 CAMPAIGN

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 19, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 808 words

Byline: Marek N. Posard, James Marrone and Todd Helmus

Highlight: Another presidential election is approaching, which means Russian election interference is back in the news. Maybe you've already made up your mind about your favorite candidate, and so you're immune to the social media messaging being circulated by Russian trolls - right? Not exactly. Russian trolls aren't only targeting behaviors, like pulling a voting lever. [...]

Body

Another presidential election is approaching, which means Russian election interference is back in the news. Maybe you've already made up your mind about your favorite candidate, and so you're immune to the social media messaging being circulated by Russian trolls - right?

Not exactly. Russian trolls aren't only targeting behaviors, like pulling a voting lever. They're targeting beliefs, trying to stoke tribalism and polarization. Those who think they are immune to Russian tactics could become complacent, and feed right into Russian hands.

To understand what the Russians are up to, a bit of a history lesson is in order. During the Cold War, researchers at Rand Corp. began applying game theory to national security policy. The Soviet military, in comparison, was developing its own theories, including one called reflexive control theory.

Reflexive control is, in part, the intellectual basis for current Russian efforts to more broadly interfere with U.S. elections and democracy. If you understand reflexive control then you can better understand Russian strategy - and devise ways to combat it.

The theory is mathematically dense, drawing on models from the study of graphs and abstract algebra. But the core idea is simple: The theory assumes that people live in a polarized world of cooperation versus conflict. And it describes how people make decisions based on who they view as friends or enemies - and how they think others view them. The Russians are trying to feed information to distort these views.

The end goal for these efforts is to trigger emotional reactions and drive people to ideological extremes, making it nearly impossible to build a consensus. The Russians also hope those who are not driven to extreme positions will throw up their hands in frustration and check out. The result is political paralysis.

Posard, Marrone, Helmus: How you can fight Russia's plans to troll Americans during the 2020 campaign

Here's a notional example: Suppose you and a neighbor agree that your property taxes are too high, but disagree on issues related to sensitive topics like race relations or immigration. You start seeing online memes focusing on extreme views on these topics. Those memes evoke strong reactions, painting the issue as a battle between two extremes. You begin thinking of your neighbor based on this false dichotomy. The neighbor becomes one of "them" rather than a person with whom you had some commonality. After all, it's difficult to agree on most anything when you and your neighbor view each other as racist or anti-American.

The Russian objective is to create an illusion of deep-seated divisions between people like you and people who aren't like you, so that you won't be able to agree on anything.

The Russians don't particularly care about the details of our social and political issues when they are trolling Americans. Their focus is to gin people up to be against one another regardless of their identity or political beliefs. That's why Russia tries to infiltrate groups of both Black Lives Matter and white nationalists online.

We don't know if these efforts are working, but we believe Russia is trying to divide U.S. society by seeding extremist views. And the current political environment, coupled with the nature of social media, makes combatting these efforts a bit tricky.

Short, shareable (and sensationalist) content is the currency of social networks - and it does not naturally promote nuanced conversations. Micro-targeting makes it easy to feed people customized content based on what they already like, which enables manufactured content to get a foothold with the right audience and go viral more quickly.

Everyone has the opportunity to fight Russian efforts to drive U.S. citizens to extremes before the November election. Tech firms have a responsibility to root out Russian social media content and ensure their users are who they claim to be. Political, religious and civic leaders could bring people together and help build consensus on divisive issues - like race relations, immigration, and economic inequality - that Russia may try to exploit.

Most importantly, users could be more careful about what information they share online. Don't forward content from unknown sources. Don't post content that you have not fact-checked. Be aware that even a humorous meme may have an underlying dark goal - to make you think less of another group.

Americans are less likely to have their emotions manipulated if they are aware that manipulation is the goal. Behind the veil of extreme positions are groups of people who may well have much in common. It's important to recognize that disinformation efforts targeted at emotional beliefs could further decay the national discourse.

Marek N. Posard is a military sociologist, Jim Marrone is an associate economist and Todd Helmus is a senior behavioral scientist at the nonprofit, nonpartisan Rand Corp. They wrote this column for the Los Angeles Times.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCXLVIII. 1 IN 2 BLACKS LOST JOBS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 19, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1323 wordsByline: KAVITA KUMAR; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Kimberly Jones was loving her job as a flight attendant recruiter before the coronavirus brought the airline industry to a standstill.

Savanna Thomas was weeks away from getting hired full time out of a temp job at a logistics company. And after a number of setbacks, Letajia Cutler-Cain felt she had finally found her dream job interviewing participants in medical studies.

Now they're looking for work again. While the pandemic has led to widespread job losses at levels not seen since the Great Depression, in Minnesota, it has hit Black workers the hardest.

Nearly 1 in 2 Black workers in Minnesota have applied for unemployment benefits since mid-March. For white workers, it is about 1 in 4, according to the Minnesota Department of Employment and Economic Development (DEED).

Some have returned to work as businesses have reopened, but a wide racial imbalance remains among those who are still jobless. More than one-quarter of Black workers were still making weekly unemployment claims last month compared with 9% of white workers.

"I have to get a job as soon as possible so I can keep on affording rent," said Cutler-Cain, who is taking a training course to become a coronavirus contact tracer. "I want to get back to work. That's my main goal."

The death of George Floyd has thrust Minnesota back into the national spotlight for having some of the largest racial disparities in the country in areas such as homeownership, education and poverty.

The pandemic has only exacerbated some of those inequities such as in unemployment.

Black Americans and Latinos, who are less likely to be in jobs where they can work from home, also have been contracting the coronavirus at higher rates.

1 IN 2 BLACKS LOST JOBS

In recent years, amid a growing economy and tight labor market, the state had begun to see the gap in the Black unemployment rate - which had been more than double that of white unemployment - begin to narrow.

"It is absolutely heartbreaking to see this reversed because the progress that was being made was only very partial," said Abigail Wozniak, director of the Opportunity and Inclusive Growth Institute at the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis.

One of the big reasons for the unemployment disparity in Minnesota is that Black Minnesotans are more likely to be employed at hotels, restaurants, retail, health and other service-related industries that have seen the most job losses because of stay-at-home orders and other pandemic-induced slowdowns.

"They're on the front lines of some of the jobs that have been the hardest hit by the pandemic," said DEED Commissioner Steve Grove. "We're deeply concerned about it. It's stunning to believe that if you're African American right now, there's a 50% chance you've applied for unemployment insurance."

He added that there are active discussions in his department to figure out ways to make sure services are more accessible and equitable.

"We're developing a kind of equity checklist to put in front of every program we roll out at DEED, whether it's to get people jobs or help grow business investment," he said. "There's no magic bullet, but it's got to be rooted in everything you're doing."

While not to the same extent, the pandemic also has disproportionately hurt American Indian, Latino and Asian American employment in the state. Women, younger workers and those with less education have also taken a bigger hit.

"Black people are taking the brunt of this," said Steven Belton, president of the Urban League Twin Cities. "It's very alarming to us, but not surprising. If it follows historic trends, the bounceback will be slower in the communities we serve. We're the first to be fired. We're also the last to be rehired."

Racism can seep in when employers are making these decisions, he said.

While frustrating to see, the racial disparity in layoffs and hiring is something that happens every time there is a recession, said Tawanna Black, CEO of the two-year-old Twin Cities-based Center for Economic Inclusion. It's added proof, she said, that the gains made in the last few years were not as meaningful as they could have been.

"Of course these are the individuals that are going to be left out when we've connected African Americans to those low-wage jobs - our retail sector, our services sector - as opposed to creating real economic opportunity across the entire spectrum such as that we would not expect to see such a disparate impact when we have these economic shocks," she said.

Minnesota's unemployment rate fell to 8.6% in June, down from a 9.9% record high in May. While some had initially hoped for a quicker rebound, many projections are now calling for an elevated jobless rate over a longer period of time.

A forecast by IHS Markit suggests that Minnesota's unemployment rate will improve in the coming months but will not likely return to pre-pandemic levels for at least a couple of years.

1 IN 2 BLACKS LOST JOBS

As the economy does recover, it may not return to the previous structure and some jobs may end up being permanently displaced. Judging by historic patterns, that shift will likely disproportionately affect workers of color, said Wozniak of the Minneapolis Fed.

"They are going to need to make some kind of transition to find new employment, which is going to take awhile," she said. "Those are the things that are going to feed into that longer-term widening of gaps we're starting to see right now."

Federal stimulus checks and other enhanced jobless benefits have helped cushion the blow until now for many who are out of work. While they will continue to receive regular unemployment benefits, the additional $600 a week from the federal CARES Act is set to expire this week. That fiscal cliff is expected to send an influx of unemployed workers to already busy food shelves.

"That was what was really keeping the boat afloat," Sharon Record, a 20-year-old Brooklyn Park resident, said of the extra $600 a week.

Whatever has been left over after paying the rent, car insurance and groceries, she's put toward paying for community college classes in the fall. In the meantime, she has been on the job hunt for weeks.

"Wherever I see a hiring sign, I've tried to apply," she said, listing off grocery stores, fast-food chains, car dealerships and a bank.

She's gotten only one callback so far, for a job as a bank teller. She had a second interview on Friday.

Many workforce training and job placement programs have been hustling to shift their services online during the pandemic. They're now hosting job fairs over Zoom and are rolling out digital training courses. But they've also been mindful that not all people have access to computers and Wi-Fi.

Twin Cities Rise, a job training program that works mostly with people of color, received a grant from the state so it could provide Chromebooks to participants of its courses, which are now all online. Melanie Williams, the program director, is expecting to see a big uptick in people seeking its services in the next couple of weeks as the enhanced federal benefits run out.

"It's the calm before the storm," she said.

Hilary Thomas, a job counselor with the Urban League, said many people are in a holding pattern right now waiting to see if they're going to get called back to their jobs.

"People are trying to stay above water, but there's a lot of frustration," he said. "So many things they had been building toward got yanked out from under them. Many of them will have to start from square one again."

kavita.kumar@startribune.com

612-673-4113

27% -- Minn. workers filed for unemployment

48% -- Black workers filed for unemployment

22% -- white workers filed for unemployment

1 IN 2 BLACKS LOST JOBS

UNEMPLOYMENT APPLICATIONS BY PERCENT OF WORKFORCE

About 48% of Black workers in Minnesota have applied for unemployment insurance since March, compared to 22% of white workers.

Percent of labor force who have applied for unemployment benefits since March (by race/ethnicity)

Black: 48%

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete chart.)

Source: Minnesota COVID-19 Response

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCXLIX. HOT DISH POLITICS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 19, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 2BLength: 221 wordsByline: JESSIE VAN BERKEL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Push still on for riot damage aidBody

While the Trump administration turned down a request to help rebuild the Twin Cities after the riots sparked by the police killing of George Floyd, Minnesota House Democrats are pressing for nearly $168 million in state dollars to help businesses and nonprofits damaged during the civil unrest.

But so far the GOP-led Senate hasn't matched that effort in a special session that's expected to wrap up in a few days.

Democrats and Republicans said during a committee hearing Friday they want to help communities where property was destroyed. But Rep. Barb Haley, R-Red Wing, said Republicans are concerned about using general fund dollars while there's a looming budget deficit. They also want grants to go directly to businesses, as opposed to giving the money to Minneapolis and St. Paul, she said.

The immediate relief program the DFL-led House wants is one piece of a broader $300 million PROMISE Act aimed at rebuilding the Twin Cities' riot-damaged commercial corridors.

Rep. Mohamud Noor, DFL-Minneapolis, said he is glad community members and foundations are donating to help businesses rebuild, but more assistance is crucial.

He plans to keep fighting for state money in future sessions - whether through the general fund or other sources: "We're going to come back again and again until we get something done."

JESSIE VAN BERKEL

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

HOT DISH POLITICS

ARTICLE MCCL. HOT DISH POLITICS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 19, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 2BLength: 489 wordsByline: STEPHEN MONTEMAYOR; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: BCA liaison forced to adapt quicklyBody

Biiftuu Adam's first days as the Minnesota Bureau of Criminal Apprehension's first-ever liaison to families of people who died in police encounters came amid the March outbreak of COVID-19 in the state.

The global pandemic forced Adam to conduct the highly personal and intimate work of consoling and informing traumatized families using remote technologies. Then, just two months later, George Floyd died under the knee of a Minneapolis police officer - sparking an international outcry and renewed focus on police brutality.

Adam's hiring marked the first time the BCA added a "victim, family and community relations coordinator" focused on civilian deaths by police. The state law enforcement agency put out a call for applications for the position last year - one of the first tangible initiatives to come out of a monthslong working group convened by the Department of Public Safety and the Attorney General's Office.

In an illustration of what can happen in just several months, Minnesota Attorney General Keith Ellison is now leading the prosecution in one of the state's highest-profile police brutality cases.

Meanwhile, Adam is trying to establish a new way to help families navigate the legal system and grieve at the same time.

Adam describes her role as a point person for families throughout the legal process. But she also offers emotional support and a lifeline to other services that may be needed.

"Oftentimes this is the first time that they are experiencing this trauma, and they really need to rely on me or other criminal justice professionals," said Adam, who has worked with victims of sexual assault and gun violence.

Her work with Floyd's family has been limited because most of his relatives live out of state.

HOT DISH POLITICS

Adam's parents emigrated from Ethiopia, and she was born and raised in the Cedar-Riverside neighborhood of Minneapolis. She earned criminal justice degrees from Hamline University and Arizona State - where she got her master's - and most recently worked for the Bloomington City Attorney's Office.

In an interview last year after announcing the new role, Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington said, "This is exactly what I would want to have" if he or his family were affected by a deadly encounter with law enforcement.

BCA Superintendent Drew Evans, whose agency conducts most of the state's investigations into police killings of civilians, acknowledged Adam can help the BCA fill a void.

"Sometimes [with] families who may have never had contact with law enforcement or been in a position of trauma before we talk to them, we rapidly expect them to understand," Evans said.

Adam, Evans said, can help serve as a conduit to open up lines of contact.

"There's still going to be some level of policing in our communities, and if we don't have trust in our police agencies or the work that we are doing at the BCA, then we are really failing our communities," Evans said.

Stephen Montemayor · 651-925-5048

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

Jane Prince: Difficult decisions await. Mayor and City Council need to get on them, right now

ARTICLE MCCLI. JANE PRINCE: DIFFICULT DECISIONS AWAIT. MAYOR AND CITY COUNCIL NEED TO GET ON THEM, RIGHT NOW

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 19, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 749 words

Byline: Jane Prince

Highlight: "If at any time during the fiscal year it appears probable to the mayor that the revenue available will be insufficient to meet the amount appropriated, the mayor shall report to the council without delay, indicating the estimated amount of the deficit, and recommendations as to any steps to be taken. The council shall take [...]"

Body

"If at any time during the fiscal year it appears probable to the mayor that the revenue available will be insufficient to meet the amount appropriated, the mayor shall report to the council without delay, indicating the estimated amount of the deficit, and recommendations as to any steps to be taken. The council shall take such action as it deems necessary to prevent or minimize any deficit and for that purpose it may reduce by resolution one (1) or more appropriations." - Saint Paul City Charter, Section 10.07.3

Under Saint Paul's City Charter, the mayor is required to propose the City's budget no later than Aug. 15 each year; the City Council is then required to set the budget before year's end. In a normal year, this long and painstaking process gets underway when the council starts meeting with department heads in late spring.

This is decidedly not a normal year. By late March, with the governor's stay-at-home order in place, it was clear that the City would have significant revenue shortfalls, triggering language under Section 10.07.3 (above) that required the mayor to report - and the council to act - "without delay" to "prevent or minimize deficits" in the 2020 budget.

Minneapolis predicted a 10% revenue shortfall in March, Mayor Frey and the council considered a first phase of 2020 budget cuts in June, and again earlier this month, the council and mayor met to consider a second phase of cuts.

Despite the charter language, St. Paul Mayor Melvin Carter waited until May 6 to come before the City Council, announcing preliminary projections of a 5% to 10% revenue shortfall, representing between $19 million to $32 million in cuts that would need to be made due to "dire circumstance" and representing "real fiscal challenges." He stated that his administration would work with the council and reach out to involve the community in this difficult task. Beyond that he said he had placed a "freeze on all new non-essential hires," and expressed a commitment to pursue federal and state funding to reimburse city COVID-related expenses.

Jane Prince: Difficult decisions await. Mayor and City Council need to get on them, right now

As of July 17, the City Council had neither been asked to partner on the 2020 budget deficit nor have we been included in any discussions about "recommendations as to any steps to be taken." Not only that, but in the intervening months since he addressed the council, our city experienced a second major existential crisis - the significant costs of emergency operations, public safety and public and private infrastructure damage - stemming from the tragic killing of George Floyd. While we are aware that these costs are in the process of being quantified and that federal and state grants are being sought, we have not seen a new projection on "insufficient revenues" for 2020. Adding to the fiscal stress, we learned this past weekend that FEMA has denied the governor's request for emergency clean-up funds for Minneapolis and Saint Paul.

In early April, in anticipation of the COVID financial crisis, Minnesota Gov. Tim Walz announced that he and all 24 members of his cabinet would take a 10 percent salary cut for the remainder of the year. Instead of following the governor's lead, Carter chose to quietly add a political director to his cabinet, a taxpayer-funded position that in my recollection has never before existed at City Hall.

Could there be a more important time for the mayor to be working with the City Council than when we are rushing headlong into Great Recession-era austerity, at the same time that thousands of our residents have lost jobs, lost businesses, are living in poverty, and are homeless? Seventy-seven thousand Saint Paul residents have applied for unemployment since Covid began. The City Charter and our people expect us to be putting forward our best coordinated responses to protect our city's future.

One month away from our requirement to start the work to set the 2021 budget, the Council has still not considered its emergency duties under Charter Section 10.07.3. That is simply unacceptable.

And when do our residents and business community - particularly those impacted by the COVID-19 crisis - get to tell us which budget cuts are essential and which are not? I write today to express my grave concern that the City Council's ability to do its job is being foreclosed by a basic failure to meet the constitutional responsibilities we hold under our city's foundational governing document.

Jane Prince is a member of the Saint Paul City Council. She represents Ward 7 on the city's East Side.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCCLII. TRANSIT SAFETY PROPOSALS STUCK IN NEUTRAL AT THE CAPITOL

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 19, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 994 wordsByline: JANET MOORE; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Crime on light rail, buses was increasing before ridership dropped during pandemic.Body

Months before George Floyd's death, debate stewed at the Capitol over new ways to deter rising crime on the region's trains and buses - and it didn't involve the police.

The most prominent idea involved deploying unarmed ambassadors to collect fares, connect passengers experiencing homelessness or mental illness with social services, and tamp down smoking and drinking aboard Metro Transit vehicles.

Using civilians to aid or even replace law enforcement is an experiment that Minneapolis and cities nationwide are considering following Floyd's killing by police. But the Metro Transit safety measures pitched at the Legislature, a microcosm of the broader discussion, languished once the COVID-19 pandemic hit and Floyd's death prompted civil unrest across the country.

Now the future of the transit safety initiatives in the Twin Cities is unclear.

"We were talking about a different public safety model that's very much in the news now, shifting tasks not necessarily appropriate for officers," said Rep. Frank Hornstein, DFL-Minneapolis, noting it is an "important and urgent conversation."

The experience left supporters frustrated, but even more determined to keep trying - perhaps next year.

"There are a lot of really important things in the bill that we need to get done, but we can't get anywhere," said Rep. Brad Tabke, DFL-Shakopee, a lead sponsor of the initial measure.

While the House crafted a compromise before the pandemic, the Republican-controlled Senate "has constantly talked about safety within the cities and on transit but [doesn't] want to engage in any solutions," Tabke said.

Republican leaders did not respond to several requests for comment last week.

Transit safety proposals stuck in neutral at the Capitol

Tabke worked with Rep. Jon Koznick, R-Lakeville, on an early proposal that called for the creation of transit ambassadors (or agents, as some call them) and also would have changed fare evasion to an administrative citation with an initial fine of $35, compared with $180 now.

The Metropolitan Council, which operates Metro Transit, has said only 3% of passengers cited for fare evasion pay the fine. That's because local prosecutors are loath to pursue cases over an unpaid $2 transit ticket.

Koznick favors stepped-up monitoring of light-rail trains and stations, with live-feed security cameras and public address systems to suss out crimes in real time. He also supports banning transit passengers who don't pay fines for nonpayment of fares or who commit more serious crimes on buses and trains.

A safe transit system, Koznick said, is even more critical to passengers and small businesses in neighborhoods damaged during protests. "We have to take steps now to help restore public trust and confidence in our transit system," he said.

A slimmed-down proposal pitched in June's special session that decriminalized fare evasion and embraced transit ambassadors foundered. Gov. Tim Walz included the measures in his supplemental budget, along with $3.7 million in funding. But that failed, too.

Transit ridership dropped precipitously when the pandemic hit, but before then, crime continued to rise on Twin Cities trains and buses.

Serious crime, including theft, robbery and aggravated assault, increased 27% in January and 13% in February, when compared with the same period last year, according to figures released by Metro Transit. Less serious crimes, such as fraud and vandalism, increased 105% in January and 88% in February.

The notion of unarmed ambassadors patrolling a transit system to promote safety has been tried in other places.

A recent study by the transit advocacy organization East Metro Strong explored similar programs in more than a half-dozen metro areas, including San Francisco, Seattle, Boston, Denver and Portland, Ore., and found benefits for everyone.

"Police can police more and the ambassadors can be the eyes and ears of the transit system," said Will Schroeer, the group's executive director. "People will feel more comfortable, and ridership would improve."

Dorothy Schulz, a retired captain of the Metro-North Commuter Railroad Police Department in New York, said she's "not a great believer" in the concept of unarmed transit ambassadors.

"What are they going to do if and when they're challenged?" said Schulz, professor emerita at John Jay College of Criminal Justice at the City University of New York. "It sounds good, but you may be putting people at risk because you're asking them to wield certain authority with no support to back it up."

Schulz does support ambassadors checking passengers for fares, because it would help free up police to work on more serious crimes. "Most cops hate checking tickets," she said.

Transit safety proposals stuck in neutral at the Capitol

Portland's transit agency, TriMet, recently announced a series of moves in the wake of Floyd's death, including reducing six police positions and redirecting $1.8 million to community-based public safety approaches.

Metro Transit General Manager Wes Kooistra said, "More investment in social services is absolutely needed, but this should not come at the expense of other important investments in transit safety."

If transit safety initiatives fail during the Legislature's current special session, supporters said they'll try again in 2021, but there may be more disagreement.

Following Floyd's death, Tabke says he isn't comfortable with the punitive parts of the initial proposal, particularly the clause that bans previous offenders from using public transit.

"That no longer fits where we are in our history," he said.

Janet Moore · 612-673-7752

CRIME ON METRO TRANSIT DROPS DURING PANDEMIC

Total monthly crimes

Part 1 crime

Part 2 crime

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete chart.)

Part 1 crimes are violent crimes such as aggravated assault and robbery.

Part 2 crimes are property crimes such as vandalism and vagrancy.

Source: Metro Transit Crime on buses and trains was trending up at the start of 2020, but after Gov. Tim Walz issued a stay-at-home order in late March, transit ridership declined up to 75%, and crime dropped too.

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

ARTICLE MCCLIII. KAREEM ABDUL-JABBAR: HOW TO SUSTAIN MOMENTUM FOR THE ANTI-RACISM MOVEMENT

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 20, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1274 wordsByline: Kareem Abdul-JabbarHighlight: "I hear America singing, the varied carols I hear." My old UCLA coach, John Wooden, used to quote that Walt Whitman poem often, and I've been hearing its echoes on the streets lately. The people out protesting systemic racism and vowing change are "singing with open mouths their strong melodious songs" about the America that [...]Body

"I hear America singing, the varied carols I hear."

My old UCLA coach, John Wooden, used to quote that Walt Whitman poem often, and I've been hearing its echoes on the streets lately. The people out protesting systemic racism and vowing change are "singing with open mouths their strong melodious songs" about the America that could be - that should be.

But in my 60 years of social activism, I've heard these gospel songs before and my fear is that once the spotlights go down, the sympathetic audience - now moved to tears by the chorus - simply goes home, the words to the songs quickly forgotten.

You can't be in the business of social reform without a deep reservoir of hope and faith in the general goodness of people. And some of my faith has been rewarded in recent days: City and state governments are instituting police reforms, private corporations are drawing up more inclusive policies, media companies are firing executives, actors and writers for racist or misogynistic behavior. Celebrities and politicians are making public statements in support of Black Lives Matter and other progressive organizations. Sports organizations are offering apologies for past acts of exclusion.

My optimism was further kindled when I saw dozens of police officers across the country hugging and linking arms with protesters. My father was a decorated police officer and I think he would have faced the protesters with sympathy rather than scorn. But I've felt hope like this before. And tears of hope in this country have often been replaced by tears of frustration and rage.

Civil rights activists are not here to fluff the public's conscience, nor is the cause of "equality for all" a nostalgic throwback, like efforts to recapture Woodstock. It's a matter of life and death. It's a matter of lopsided access to healthcare, of children denied equal educations and therefore unable to claim secure economic futures.

Throughout my life, I've seen these cycles of outrage, public protests and political promises. And then comes a silent slip-sliding back to the status quo until another horrific event grabs our attention again.

The cry for civil rights is like a rubber band: Intermittent passionate public support stretches it forward, despite those anchored in the past pulling it backward. It stretches and stretches until that support starts to drift away to something shinier and newer - then it snaps back. The stretching has made it slightly longer, so there's some progress - three steps forward, two back is still a step forward - but it's nowhere near what was promised. And we await another horrific act to bring the unaffected back to help us pull forward again.

This may sound a little churlish or ungrateful, but I can't help but wonder why so many organizations are expressing their outrage now, instead of last year, or the year before - or five years ago when an unarmed Eric Garner was choked to death uttering the same words as George Floyd: "I can't breathe." Why is Floyd's death suddenly a revelation, an epiphany, but Garner's wasn't? In 2015, police killed more than 100 unarmed Black people.

The NFL says Black Lives Matter, yet until recently it was still punishing players who expressed that sentiment. Target, Walmart and Facebook, among many others, are suddenly supporting BLM. It's great news that they are all stepping up, but those of us who have been at this for a long time know that the fight for equal rights is a lifelong commitment, not a summer job.

Meaningful and measurable progress for any marginalized group - people of color, immigrants, women, LGBTQ+ people, Muslims, Jews - can be achieved only when all besieged groups pull together, without waiting for or needing or having to convince others who don't face the same challenges. We want them, we welcome them, we appreciate them, but we can't need them. What the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. wrote in his "Letter From a Birmingham Jail" in 1963 still holds true:

"First, I must confess that over the past few years I have been gravely disappointed with the white moderate. I have almost reached the regrettable conclusion that the Negro's great stumbling block in his stride toward freedom is not the White Citizen's Council-er or the Ku Klux Klanner, but the white moderate, who is more devoted to 'order' than to justice; who prefers a negative peace which is the absence of tension to a positive peace which is the presence of justice; who constantly says: 'I agree with you in the goal you seek, but I cannot agree with your methods of direct action...' "

It's exhausting and frustrating trying to convince such people that systemic racism pervades all aspects of American life. It's like talking to a flat-Earther. Proof is useless. Their steadfast refusal to believe the hundreds of studies by prominent scientists reminds me of Dr. Ignaz Semmelweis, a Hungarian physician, responsible for millions of lives being saved by discovering that hospital deaths could be drastically reduced merely by washing hands with disinfectant. Most of the medical community rejected his conclusion - despite growing evidence that he was right. He was ultimately committed to an asylum, where he was beaten by guards and died 14 days later. Only after his death were his theories widely accepted.

They couldn't see germs, so they weren't real. Sound familiar? In "The Usual Suspects," character Verbal Kint says, "The greatest trick the Devil ever pulled was convincing the world he didn't exist." I'd tweak that a bit. The other greatest trick is convincing the world racism doesn't exist. We have to stop trying to roll these deliberate dullards uphill because, like Sisyphus, we'll never get them to the top of the mountain to see the possible paradise on the other side.

Where will African Americans be 90 days from now? Will people continue to believe the evidence before them even as the nation begins to reopen and protests grow smaller and less frequent, then disappear? As headlines become dominated with COVID-19's second wave, with potential vaccines and vaccine deniers, with President Trump's delusions, Joe Biden's gaffes, and celebrity missteps, will there still be any mentions of systemic racism? Will real changes have occurred?

There are things we can do, benchmarks we can insist on, to keep the freedom train moving ahead. Over the past few weeks I've heard excellent suggestions for reform in our systems of justice, policing, healthcare, education and economic security, all of which give preference to white people. We have no shortage of good ideas. Now what we need is a way to measure improvement, ideally through a website to monitor proposals, manage progress, identify obstacles and centralize information for everyone to access. A user could go to this site to see what legislation is proposed to prevent police brutality, who supports it, who opposes it. We could stay informed on the implementation of solutions and know when to apply pressure. Such a website could mobilize action and focus attention on practical solutions, providing a thermometer to measure the health of social justice.

The moral universe doesn't bend toward justice unless pressure is applied. In my seventh decade of hope, I am once again optimistic that we may be able to collectively apply that pressure, not just to fulfill the revolutionary promises of the U.S. Constitution, but because we want to live and thrive.

Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, a recipient of the Presidential Medal of Freedom and the NBA's all-time leading scorer, is the author of 16 books, including, most recently, "Mycroft & Sherlock - The Empty Birdcage." He wrote this piece for the Los Angeles Times.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Minnesota lawmakers advance police accountability measures 8 weeks after Floyd's death

ARTICLE MCCLIV. MINNESOTA LAWMAKERS ADVANCE POLICE ACCOUNTABILITY MEASURES 8 WEEKS AFTER FLOYD'S DEATH

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 20, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1142 words

Byline: Sarah Mearhoff

Highlight: Minnesota lawmakers approved a slate of police accountability measures overnight, eight weeks after George Floyd was killed at the hands of Minneapolis police.

Body

Expand

Minnesota lawmakers approved a slate of police accountability measures overnight, eight weeks after George Floyd was killed at the hands of Minneapolis police.

The Minnesota House of Representatives by a 102-29 vote late Monday, July 20, and the Senate on a 60-7 vote early the next day, advanced a series of changes to the state's policing laws including the creation of a new unit to investigate police deadly force incidents, banning police chokeholds and warrior training creating a new system of arbitration to weigh police deadly force encounters. The approvals clear a path to Gov. Tim Walz's desk for his signature.

Lawmakers worked for weeks in secret meetings to strike a compromise on the proposal after the Legislature abruptly ended its work last month without reaching deals on most of their top policy priorities. And advocates, families affected by police violence, law enforcement groups and others shared their perspective with lawmakers in an effort to shape the plan.

The Senate closed out the special session before a local jobs and projects bill could pass the Legislature, again deferring funding on a set of public construction projects. House Republicans blocked the measure from passing there after they said their concerns weren't adequately considered.

Rep. Carlos Mariani, D-St. Paul, said that Monday night's policing bill - reached after weeks of closed-door negotiations between Democratic and Republican leadership - was "not the bill that (he) wanted." Several weeks ago, the Democratic-led House passed what Mariani called a "more robust" police accountability package, but legislators in the Republican-controlled Senate said it went too far. So the House rolled back their language, and the Senate bumped up theirs to reach Monday's agreement.

Minnesota lawmakers advance police accountability measures 8 weeks after Floyd's death

Despite not going as far as he had hoped, Mariani said Monday's is "a good bill" that "creates a modern accountability framework of law that will help to end the type of police brutality that killed George Floyd in May."

On May 25, former Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin knelt on Floyd's neck for nearly nine minutes as Floyd said he couldn't breathe and bystanders called for help. Bystander video of the incident sparked a national call for changes in the way states handle police officers who act out. Chauvin faces second-degree murder and manslaughter charges in Floyd's killing.

Mariani said Floyd's death sparked outrage across the Twin Cities and Greater Minnesota, as well as the entire United States. Protesters took to the streets to proclaim, "We can't breathe."

"What they're asking for is actually pretty basic and that's what this bill asks of our policing and of our citizenry in the state of Minnesota and that is: that we should be held accountable," Mariani said. "Everyone should be held accountable. Our police should certainly be held accountable."

On the other side of the aisle, Rep. Brian Johnson, R-Cambridge, said Monday night's final bill was "a lot better" than earlier versions. He said he still had some concerns, largely with one of the package's provisions for a new community relations advisory council.

The council, per the bill, is to consist of several leaders of Minnesota state law enforcement organizations, as well as community members, legislative appointees and advocates. Johnson said that makeup leaves out residents of Greater Minnesota.

Johnson added that law enforcement officers have already clashed with similarly composed boards already in existence, and that he had a "feeling that his board is going to be the same way."

"They're going to have to do things the metro way," Johnson said, "which doesn't work in Greater Minnesota. It doesn't work at all."

For some Democrats, the bill package simply did not go far enough. Sen. Jeff Hayden, D-Minneapolis, said the bill package was a step forward, but only a small step that doesn't come close to rectifying racism and police brutality in the state. He said he believed that had lawmakers held a more transparent process to form the omnibus, it would better represent what Minnesotans of color actually hope to see in police reform legislation.

"George Floyd was murdered eight blocks from where I live and it could have easily been me," Hayden said. "That has been the reality for too many Black people for too long - not just in Minnesota but across the entire nation."

Hayden ultimately voted in favor of the bill. Sen. Patricia Torres Ray, D-Minneapolis, however, was one of seven senators to vote no on the bill.

"I cannot go back to my community - to the activists that have worked with me, to the families, to the relatives, to the mothers of all the Black men who have died in the hands of the police - and tell them that this bill actually responds today to their calls for justice," she said. "Some members may vote for this because it's all we could do right now. But this is not good enough."

Under the proposal, police use of chokeholds and warrior training would be banned and an advisory panel of stakeholders would be created to advise the Minnesota Board of Peace Officer Standards and Training.

Minnesota lawmakers advance police accountability measures 8 weeks after Floyd's death

The measure would boost training in dealing with people in a mental health crisis and with Minnesotans with autism and create within the Bureau of Criminal Apprehension a new unit charged with investigating instances of police deadly force, criminal sexual conduct and conflict of interest by peace officers. The unit would make its findings public and available to be viewed. And the state would bring on six arbitrators selected and trained to review police deadly conduct incidents.

The Legislature adjourned its special session without passing a local jobs and projects bill, a tax bill or a supplemental state budget. House Republicans blocked a $1.9 billion total plan from advancing to the Senate, saying they weren't consulted and wanted to reconsider the governor's emergency executive powers as a condition of approving a bonding bill. Walz calls special session next week to consider 30-day extension of pandemic powers Minnesota's primary is Tuesday. Here are key east metro races to watch. Voters, GOP lawmakers plan lawsuit over Walz's mask mandate at polling places State Patrol cancels police academy class 'due to lack of funding' Minnesota will close 2 prisons to prepare for budget shortfall. Other agencies face holes, too.

"Our governor is legislating, that's what he's doing," House Minority Leader Kurt Daudt, R-East Gull Lake, said. "Our constitution doesn't allow that but he's doing that and you don't care."

Democrats said Republicans didn't bring forward genuine counteroffers in legislative negotiations and equated the move to prevent the bill's passage to a "stickup." Lawmakers could again consider a borrowing proposal to fund local projects next month if the governor again seeks to extend the state's peacetime emergency.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

In Wisconsin, Biden's political moderation could find favor in the battleground state

ARTICLE MCCLV. IN WISCONSIN, BIDEN'S POLITICAL MODERATION COULD FIND FAVOR IN THE BATTLEGROUND STATE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 20, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1549 words

Byline: Astead W. Herndon

Highlight: ADAMS, Wis. - Nate Zimdars, a Democratic candidate for the Wisconsin state Assembly, arrived at the VFW lodge in Adams after marching in the local Independence Day parade, ready to meet voters at an annual outdoor chicken cookout called the "Chic Nic." Although the event was hosted by the local Republican Party, Zimdars was far [...]

Body

ADAMS, Wis. - Nate Zimdars, a Democratic candidate for the Wisconsin state Assembly, arrived at the VFW lodge in Adams after marching in the local Independence Day parade, ready to meet voters at an annual outdoor chicken cookout called the "Chic Nic." Although the event was hosted by the local Republican Party, Zimdars was far from nervous being behind enemy lines. He was eager.

The county flipped from blue to red in 2016, Zimdars noted, which meant it could flip again. Plus, national Democrats had done him a favor: They chose former Vice President Joe Biden for the top of their ticket.

"Biden comes across as someone who's moderate and has experience on both sides of the aisle," Zimdars said. "My close family and friends, who are a little more on the Republican side of the fence, said if Biden became the nominee, they would vote for him."

Such persuasion is at the core of Biden's campaign strategy, designed to bring together moderates, older adults, working-class voters across races and former supporters of President Donald Trump. The approach has helped him jump out to an early lead in polling, both in national surveys and in swing states like Wisconsin, where Trump won by fewer than 23,000 votes in 2016. It has also helped Biden fend off attacks from Trump, who has sought to cast Biden as a radical progressive despite his lengthy career as a moderate lawmaker.

But if Biden hopes to maintain his advantage as November draws near, Wisconsin Democrats like Zimdars have some advice, akin to the famous medical principle of "do no harm" or the cautionary words of the hit HBO series "The Wire": "Keep it boring."

In Wisconsin, Biden's political moderation could find favor in the battleground state

Being politically milquetoast is Biden's appeal, they said, driving his ability to attract progressives in Milwaukee, moderates in suburbs like Waukesha and more rural voters in places like Adams County, one of the 22 counties in the state that voted for Trump after backing President Barack Obama in 2012.

They don't lament that Biden is not a historic candidate like Obama or Hillary Clinton, or that he lacks bumper-sticker progressive policies like Sens. Elizabeth Warren and Bernie Sanders; they're grateful for it.

After the 2016 election, Clinton was lambasted for running a risk-averse campaign that seemed to rely on voters finding Trump's conduct inherently repugnant. Four years later, facing a changed electoral landscape, many Wisconsin Democrats think Biden can win the state with that exact playbook.

Biden is "the perfect candidate for this area at this time," said Matt Mareno, chair of the Waukesha Democratic Party.

"Trump's whole rallying cry was that he was an outsider coming to fix the establishment, and now he is the establishment," Mareno said. "We're seeing more and more college-educated white voters leaving him, and we're seeing more seniors leave him. We're seeing that coalition just completely dissolved down to the very core base of his support."

Several characteristics inform Biden's strategy, including his lengthy career as a bipartisan legislator, Trump's panned response to the pandemic and Biden's identity as an older white man, the type of politician easily categorized as "presidential."

There are a range of ways Biden can build a general election coalition in a battleground state like Wisconsin.

He could focus on winning back voters in low-population areas, where Clinton suffered big losses in 2016.

He could build on recent Democratic efforts to target the college-educated white voters that Trump has, at times, repelled, particularly in suburban counties like Waukesha, Ozaukee and Washington, where Clinton outperformed Obama but also lost some votes to third-party candidates.

Or he could seek to motivate reliable Democratic voters like young people, Black voters and Latino voters in Milwaukee, the Democratic stronghold where voter turnout was down significantly in 2016.

Biden's advisers said he will seek to both appeal to persuadable voters and motivate the party's base, mimicking the successful campaign of Sen. Tammy Baldwin of Wisconsin, a progressive who won reelection in 2018 by an eye-popping 10 points. Biden led Trump by 11 points in Wisconsin in a poll by the New York Times and Siena College last month, and more recent polling from other battleground states like Pennsylvania has been even better for him.

Rep. Mark Pocan, a Democrat who represents Madison, said Biden's campaign had already outpaced Clinton's in terms of investment in and attention to Wisconsin. Pocan said the Clinton campaign "took the purple state for granted," citing both a lack of visits and financial support for down-ballot candidates.

"Donald Trump came and lied to us, but at least he showed up," he said, calling the Democrats' losses in 2016 a "duh moment" for the party. It was Democratic voter drop-off across Wisconsin - not big Republican turnout - that most helped Trump win there, he said.

In Wisconsin, Biden's political moderation could find favor in the battleground state

"When one candidate doesn't campaign and the other one does, you would expect that you might get the results that we got," Pocan said. "But no one will ever make that mistake again."

This does not mean that Biden has avoided skepticism from core Democratic constituencies like young people and progressive minority voters - the same groups that frequently needled Clinton and backed Biden's rivals in the primary.

In fact, the same polls that show Biden securely ahead of Trump also find Biden with tepid numbers among young people and minority voters. His favorability rating decreased in a recent survey by NBC and the Wall Street Journal, driven by shifts among younger Democrats.

At a protest in Milwaukee in support of Black Lives Matter this month, Larissa Gladding, 23, said she viewed voting for Biden as the unfortunate cost of beating Trump.

"It doesn't even feel like it's an election about young people or he wants the young vote anymore," she said, adding that she planned to vote for Biden anyway.

Dominique Tonneas, 24, who was interviewed at a fireworks show in Muskego and who plans to vote for Trump in November, said Biden's age and long career meant he wouldn't bring a new perspective to the table. She said she planned to vote for Trump, who is only a few years younger, because she preferred his economic policies.

What is already clear: The last several months, which have featured the largest protest movement in U.S. history and a pandemic that continues to kill thousands and upend the country's social and economic fabric, have forced Biden and Trump to adjust the structure and the message of their campaigns.

Sue Schaetzka, who attended the Chic Nic in Adams, said she voted for Trump in 2016 and planned to do so again in November. But she said the events of the past few months, and particularly the nation's response to the coronavirus, had changed the way people in her social circles felt about the president.

Schaetzka was unsure Trump could win the state again this year, particularly against a Democrat like Biden.

"With everything that's going on with COVID, I know some people are rethinking," Schaetzka said.

"People just like Biden more than they like Hillary," she added. "I don't know if it's her past and all that, but they didn't trust her."

At the protest in Milwaukee, young liberals said they planned to vote for Biden, but the exact things that help him appeal to people like Schaetzka are what makes them grudging, even resentful, supporters.

They portrayed Biden as too moderate ideologically and as a doddering elder personally, a critique that mimics the "Sleepy Joe" moniker Trump has sought to popularize.

Diarelis Rodriguez, who marched in the protest, said she understood the young people who saw Biden and Trump as two sides of the same coin.

"Biden is part of the problem. He helped with the War on Drugs and doesn't really understand the issues we need him to," said Rodriguez, 18. "The people I talk to don't want to vote because they don't want to participate in a corrupt system."

In Wisconsin, Biden's political moderation could find favor in the battleground state

But Rodriguez still said she planned to vote for Biden in November, though both she and Gladding wished he embraced more activist rhetoric on matters of racial equality and defunding police.

There's a reason he has not. Twenty miles away, leaders of the Waukesha Democratic Party said they recently fielded a phone call from a skeptical voter who said she wanted to vote for Biden, but she was worried Democrats were becoming hostile to police officers.

A volunteer named Scott Prindl called the woman back. Prindl, 65, said the woman had family in law enforcement, and he does also. During the phone call, he explained the Black Lives Matter movement and its goals, as he saw them.

"The real Black Lives Matter protests are the ones who are peaceful," Prindl, who is white, assured the woman over the phone. "It's outsiders who are coming in and wreaking havoc," he said, alluding to the destructive political groups that protesters said turned some of the demonstrations violent.

The woman was comforted. She will be voting for Democrats in November, she said, and for Biden over Trump.

Simon Cowell has surgery for broken back after bike accident Virtual fundraising is a jackpot for some nonprofits. For others, it's a financial blow. Shooting near Mears Park injures 1 Sunday night Trump's end run around Congress raises questions US tops 5 million confirmed virus cases, to Europe's alarm

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Chief Axtell 'disappointed' as Mayor Carter seeks $9M cut from St. Paul police budget

ARTICLE MCCLVI. CHIEF AXTELL 'DISAPPOINTED' AS MAYOR CARTER SEEKS \$9M CUT FROM ST. PAUL POLICE BUDGET

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 20, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 905 words

Byline: Sarah Horner

Highlight: Mayor Melvin Carter has asked Police Chief Todd Axtell to prepare to cut $9.2 million in spending from St. Paul's police department as the city looks to offset the "significant" damage the coronavirus pandemic has done to the city's budget. Axtell told his staff about the request in an email circulated Friday, noting that while [...]

Body

Mayor Melvin Carter has asked Police Chief Todd Axtell to prepare to cut $9.2 million in spending from St. Paul's police department as the city looks to offset the "significant" damage the coronavirus pandemic has done to the city's budget.

Axtell told his staff about the request in an email circulated Friday, noting that while he understands the tough times facing the city he is nonetheless disappointed in the mayor's request.

"I know this is a hit to our collective soul, especially given the crime trends we're seeing, the ever-increasing calls for service and the needs of the city. I shared with the Mayor my disappointment and urged him to reconsider," Axtell wrote in the email, which a police spokesman shared Monday with the Pioneer Press.

Reaching the target would undoubtedly mean cuts to both sworn and civilian positions "at all ranks," Axtell continued.

The dollar figure may be large, but it amounts to the same percentage that departments citywide have been asked to explore eliminating given the current financial realities facing cities across the country, Carter said Monday afternoon.

Besides losing revenue, the city has had to increase expenses in order to respond to the dual crises of the pandemic and racial unrest gripping the country, he said.

Carter emphasized it's still early in the city's budget planning process. He characterized what's been asked of departments as a "budget exercise" each has been instructed to complete as he prepares his budget proposal for the city council next month.

The council votes on a final budget in December.

Chief Axtell 'disappointed' as Mayor Carter seeks $9M cut from St. Paul police budget

"It's pretty premature to cry wolf that there is some proposal already out there or requirement already out there," Carter said. "That said, I think most people are familiar with what COVID-19 has done to our economy, and to our local businesses and families, and can probably understand that the city is no different."

The mayor said the final budget likely will "require significantly challenging decisions to be made in every single city department."

"The only difference between police and everyone else in this budget exercise is that their starting budget is so much larger than every other city department, so their target reduction as a raw number is large, but it's the same percentage as everyone else," Carter said.

The police department gets about $106 million of the city's $340 million general fund budget. The figure is $37 million higher than the budget for fire services, the next largest department.

Still, Carter is asking for a larger spending cut than the $7 million the police department was told last month to expect.

The city projected in May that revenues for the year would come in 5 to 10 percent short because of the pandemic.

For the police, $9.2 million is almost 9 percent of this year's budget.

DEFUND POLICE?

Carter's request also comes amid a local and national conversation, brought about by George Floyd's May 25 death in Minneapolis police custody, about defunding or abolishing local police departments in response to systematic racism and police brutality against people of color.

Although a majority of Minneapolis City Council members have announced support for disbanding that city's police department, that's not the case in St. Paul, where just two council members have spoken favorably of the idea.

City Council President Amy Brendmoen said Monday that she is open to discussing ways to transfer certain responsibilities from the police to community organizations and social service partners. And she commended the work the city and police have already done to that end.

"We are really ahead of the curve and we should continue to make those reforms and changes, and if that means switching funding from police to other services and other partners, then I am definitely for looking to do that if it makes sense moving forward," she said.

While reiterating that the $9.2 million ask is not about defunding police, Carter said he believes cities "overly rely" on police to respond to problems policing isn't designed to address. He said he'll continue to work to "build out a data-driven and evidence-based approach to public safety."

Carter added that while he's concerned about cutting police at a time when St. Paul is experiencing rising gun violence, he said the local trend mirrors a national one that requires more than just law enforcement to curb. Shooting near Mears Park injures 1 Sunday night North St. Paul man killed in crash after fleeing Dakota County sheriff's deputy Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Cleric

Chief Axtell 'disappointed' as Mayor Carter seeks $9M cut from St. Paul police budget

assaulted outside Bloomington mosque; police searching for suspects U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities

Axtell told staff he is hopeful the deep cuts won't come to fruition.

"I'm hopeful because this is my eighth budget cycle as either the chief or assistant chief, and the initial projections normally change throughout the process. I'm hopeful because our community will get a chance to weigh in on the issue. And ultimately, the final budget is approved by the City Council, whose constituents know the value of the work you do," he wrote.

A community group called Root & Restore St. Paul recently began an online petition calling for Carter and the council to cut $20 million from the police department. The group has been working since 2018 to highlight that nearly one-third of the city's general fund is spent on policing.

Graphic

St. Paul Police Chief Todd Axtell. (John Autey / Pioneer Press)

St. Paul mayor Melvin Carter speaks about a spate of gun violence during a news conference at St. Paul City Hall on Monday, Oct. 21, 2019. (Mara H. Gottfried / Pioneer Press)

St. Paul City Council Chair Amy Brendmoen, center, talks at a meeting in St. Paul City Council chambers Wednesday, Sept. 18, 2019. (Jean Pieri / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Wisconsin Capitol board agrees to restore 2 statues toppled by protesters

ARTICLE MCCLVII. WISCONSIN CAPITOL BOARD AGREES TO RESTORE 2 STATUES
TOPPLED BY PROTESTERS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 20, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 864 words

Byline: Todd Richmond

Highlight: MADISON, Wis. - The board that approves state Capitol repairs overwhelmingly agreed Monday to restore two statues that protesters ripped down last month during a wild night of demonstrations against racist police last month. The state Capitol and Executive Residence Board voted unanimously to repair statues of Col. Hans Christian Heg, a Wisconsin abolitionist killed [...]

Body

MADISON, Wis. - The board that approves state Capitol repairs overwhelmingly agreed Monday to restore two statues that protesters ripped down last month during a wild night of demonstrations against racist police last month.

The state Capitol and Executive Residence Board voted unanimously to repair statues of Col. Hans Christian Heg, a Wisconsin abolitionist killed in combat during the Civil War, and a woman embodying the state's Forward motto.

"We've got to fix this stuff," Republican state Sen. Luther Olsen, a member of the board, said. "It's just a dirty rotten shame this stuff had to be defaced and damaged but that's the world we're living in so let's get it fixed."

Photos the state Department of Administration provided to the board show protesters broke off a leg and tore the head off the 9-foot-6-inch tall Heg statue. Other photos show the 7-foot Forward statue was scratched and dented and one of its fingers was broken off.

DOA is still compiling a cost estimate for restoring the statues, Veltum told the board. She noted that Heg's head is still missing and the agency plans to replace it by recasting the head of another Heg statue in the town of Norway. The Wisconsin Historical Society plans to start a fundraising drive to raise $50,000 to cover the insurance deductible for damage protesters caused to the statues, the state Capitol grounds and the Capitol building, she said. The board signed off on that effort unanimously as well.

Heg was a Norwegian immigrant who became an outspoken abolitionist, serving in the 15th Wisconsin Regiment during the Civil War. He was killed at the Battle of Chickamauga in 1863. His statue, funded by donations from the Norwegian Society of America, had stood outside the state Capitol since 1926.

Wisconsin Capitol board agrees to restore 2 statues toppled by protesters

Protesters tore the statue down and dumped it in a nearby lake during a demonstration against police racism on June 23. They also tore down Forward on the other side of the Capitol. Protesters attacked state Sen. Tim Carpenter as he filmed them with his cellphone. Video shows Carpenter collapsing on the Capitol lawn after the beating.

The protest was one of a series of demonstrations that shook downtown Madison after the death of George Floyd, a Black man who died on Memorial Day after a white Minneapolis police officer pressed his knee into his neck for nearly eight minutes. The violence on June 23 erupted after Madison police arrested a Black protester who was entering downtown businesses wielding a baseball bat.

Why protesters targeted two statues with no racist history remains unclear. Some demonstrators said they ripped them down because they represent a false reality of racial equality in Wisconsin.

Heg's great-great-grandson, James Heg, of Chelan, Washington, sent a letter to Gov. Tony Evers days after that statue fell asking the state to restore it.

"I'm pretty happy right now," James Heg said in a telephone interview Monday. "(The unanimous vote) was quite gratifying. I was pushing on an open door."

"He's an admirable guy," another great-great grandson, Christopher Heg, said of the abolitionist during a telephone interview from his home in Seattle on Monday. "He deserves recognition."

DOA said in materials provided to the board that the statues could be restored to their existing pedestals by spring. Several board members cautioned the department not to move too quickly and to develop a plan to protect the sculptures. If the statues go up again too soon protesters could tear them down again, they warned.

"I would hate to see us recast statues and nine months later watch them get dragged down the road again," Born said.

Carpenter, a Democrat, and Republican state Rep. Hutton introduced a bill last week that would make defacing a statue a felony. The bill sparked a bitter Twitter battle between Carpenter and Nada Elmikashfi, a Black Sudanese immigrant running for an open state Senate seat representing Madison. Elmikashfi tweeted Thursday that the bill was "absolute (profanity)" and he's trying to block "our civil rights movement."

Carpenter, who is white, responded Friday that Elmikashfi doesn't have a "clue" and that he's a Black ally.

The board also considered a request Monday from Michael Johnson, one of Madison's leading Black activists, to erect a statue of Vel Phillips on the Capitol square but took no action. Democratic state Sen. Fred Risser, the board chairman, stressed that the board can only approve or reject projects, not initiate them.

Evers sent the board a letter Monday saying he supports the idea. DOA Secretary Joel Brennan told the board that the department is working with Phillips' family and other stakeholders on a formal proposal.

Phillips was the first woman and first Black member of the Milwaukee Common Council. She was also the state's first Black judge as well as its first female and first Black secretary of state.

Wisconsin Capitol board agrees to restore 2 statues toppled by protesters

Wisconsin Dells water park closes for season after coronavirus sickens 2 employees GOP leader wants Wisconsin Senate to strike down mask order Wisconsin's Democratic governor endorses Biden for president Wisconsin Republicans 'stand ready' to kill governor's mask requirement Wisconsin governor orders masks statewide amid virus surge

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Deal near on MN police accountability bill? Senate GOP leader says agreement reached on outlines of measure

ARTICLE MCCLVIII. [DEAL NEAR ON MN POLICE ACCOUNTABILITY BILL?
SENATE GOP LEADER SAYS AGREEMENT REACHED ON OUTLINES OF MEASURE](#)

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 20, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 653 words

Byline: Steve Karnowski

Highlight: Legislative leaders had a tentative agreement Monday on the outlines of a police accountability bill, the top Republican in the Minnesota Senate said, but lawmakers struggled with the details into the night and chances appeared even dimmer for a $1.8 billion public construction projects package that had yet to win the necessary GOP support in [...]

Body

Legislative leaders had a tentative agreement Monday on the outlines of a police accountability bill, the top Republican in the Minnesota Senate said, but lawmakers struggled with the details into the night and chances appeared even dimmer for a $1.8 billion public construction projects package that had yet to win the necessary GOP support in the Democratic-controlled House.

Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, R-East Gull Lake, said he planned to adjourn the special session by midnight if there was no agreement on the projects bill, also known as a bonding bill. He said a deal was mostly up to the House.

"It's basically today or it's not going to happen," Gazelka said as lawmakers returned to the Capitol to resume their second special session of the year after several days of behind-the-scenes negotiations.

Gazelka said he and Democratic House Speaker Melissa Hortman, of Brooklyn Park, had a "tentative agreement" on the policing bill, "but we are still working through the language - that's always the tricky part."

He was right. Hope for quick action faded as talks continued behind closed doors through the day, making it likely that any debate would last late into the night. The final bill language still had not been publicly released by Monday evening.

Democratic House Majority Leader Ryan Winkler of Golden Valley, told lawmakers before a recess early Monday afternoon that the House floor debate could begin around mid-afternoon. But that time came and went with no public announcements. When the Senate took a break in the late afternoon, Republican Senate President Jeremy Miller, of Winona, told senators that he had no guidance to give them on when they might be called back.

Deal near on MN police accountability bill? Senate GOP leader says agreement reached on outlines of measure

The bill is a response to the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police on Memorial Day, and the leader made it clear that it omits some of the more controversial ideas proposed by Democrats.

Gazelka declined to give many details but said the tentative deal included bans on chokeholds and "warrior training" for officers, as well as a new advisory council under the state board that licenses law enforcement officers, and changes in arbitration rules. He said it does not include anything that would dismantle or defund police departments, expand voting rights for convicted felons or give the attorney general responsibility for prosecuting officer-involved shootings.

Bonding bills require a three-fifths majority to pass both chambers and must pass the House first. So some Republican votes are necessary for the bill to clear the House. But GOP House Minority Leader Kurt Daudt, of Crown, told reporters that no Republicans would vote for the bonding bill as it stood Monday. Daudt said his caucus was shut out of the negotiations with House Democrats, Senate Republicans and Democratic Gov. Tim Walz.

The bonding bill includes a business tax break on equipment purchases sought by Republicans that would benefit farmers as well as small businesses damaged in the unrest that followed Floyd's death.

Walz had to call the special session to give lawmakers a chance to rescind the emergency powers he's been using to respond to the coronavirus pandemic. House Democrats blocked a GOP effort to void those powers.

The session also gave legislators another chance to pass the bonding bill and policing measures, which they were unable to agree on during last month's special session. If the governor decides in the coming weeks to extend his emergency powers again, he'd have to call another special session.

Walz calls special session next week to consider 30-day extension of pandemic powers Minnesota's primary is Tuesday. Here are key east metro races to watch. Voters, GOP lawmakers plan lawsuit over Walz's mask mandate at polling places State Patrol cancels police academy class 'due to lack of funding' Minnesota will close 2 prisons to prepare for budget shortfall. Other agencies face holes, too.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Minneapolis police investigate death of man found in burned-out Lake Street store

ARTICLE MCCLIX. MINNEAPOLIS POLICE INVESTIGATE DEATH OF MAN FOUND IN BURNED-OUT LAKE STREET STORE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 20, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 255 words

Byline: Nick Woltman

Highlight: Minneapolis police are investigating after a man's body was discovered in a burned-out Lake Street pawnshop, which was looted and set ablaze during the riots that followed the death of George Floyd. Officials from the Minneapolis police and fire departments, the Minnesota State Fire Marshal Division and the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and [...]

Body

Minneapolis police are investigating after a man's body was discovered in a burned-out Lake Street pawnshop, which was looted and set ablaze during the riots that followed the death of George Floyd.

Officials from the Minneapolis police and fire departments, the Minnesota State Fire Marshal Division and the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives were sifting through the rubble of Max It Pawn on Monday morning when they discovered the remains, according to an MPD news release.

The man's identity and the cause of his death will be released by the Hennepin County medical examiner in coming days.

The pawnshop, which stood about two blocks east of the MPD's 3rd Precinct headquarters, burned down on May 28. Montez Terriel Lee, 25, of Rochester, Minn., was charged in June with starting the fire.

Now this pawn shop at Lake Street and 28th Avenue is burning down. pic.twitter.com/G6LydHsqP0

- Nick Woltman (@nickwoltman) May 29, 2020

Minneapolis firefighters battled the blaze initially, but the building was destroyed.

MPD detectives are handling the investigation into the man's death, the department's news release said.

Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Minneapolis police investigate death of man found in burned-out Lake Street store

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

National Guardsman who served during Minneapolis unrest dies in head-on crash. 'He had great potential,' his sergeant said.

ARTICLE MCCLX. NATIONAL GUARDSMAN WHO SERVED DURING MINNEAPOLIS UNREST DIES IN HEAD-ON CRASH. 'HE HAD GREAT POTENTIAL,' HIS SERGEANT SAID.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 20, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 801 words

Byline: Deanna Weniger

Highlight: A Minnesota National Guardsman who was stationed in Minneapolis during the recent riots was just getting started when his life was cut short in a head-on collision in Washington County on Thursday. Spc. Samuel Leedom, 20, of Oak Park Heights, was driving north on Manning Avenue in West Lakeland Township about 6:30 p.m., doing deliveries [...]

Body

A Minnesota National Guardsman who was stationed in Minneapolis during the recent riots was just getting started when his life was cut short in a head-on collision in Washington County on Thursday.

Spc. Samuel Leedom, 20, of Oak Park Heights, was driving north on Manning Avenue in West Lakeland Township about 6:30 p.m., doing deliveries for DoorDash.

According to the Washington County sheriff's office, Leedom, who was driving a Nissan Sentra, crossed over the center lane into oncoming traffic and collided head-on with a dump truck near 22nd Street. The crash remains under investigation.

"My son touched so many people. He's an amazing boy," his mother, Heidi Leedom, said through tears Monday. She said the news of his death has been like a bad dream from which she can't wake up.

She thought maybe her son was in trouble when a Washington County sheriff's deputy pulled up in front of her house Thursday night.

"I said, 'What's wrong? Is it Sam?' I remember he said, 'I'm so sorry to say this, but your son passed away in an accident,'" she said. "I went numb and then I dropped. I don't remember anything after that. I didn't believe him. I said I wanted to see him."

Leedom was born March 30, 2000, at Lakeview Hospital in Stillwater to Heidi and Christopher Leedom.

"I remember his hair was so thick and curly like his mama," she said. "He hated it."

National Guardsman who served during Minneapolis unrest dies in head-on crash. 'He had great potential,' his sergeant said.

He attended St. Croix Catholic School, Oak Heights Elementary School and graduated from Stillwater High School in 2018.

He loved the outdoors and played several sports. His parents divorced when he was young, and his mother's boyfriend, Bobby Bischoff, taught him how to hunt. He shot his first deer with a bow and arrow at age 13. His grandfather Jack Terhaar took him on several road trips to see the United States, and Bischoff's mother, Susan Bischoff, was his adoptive grandmother who always baked him banana bread.

He leaves behind a half brother, Jady Wright, 25, and a half sister Mackenzie Leedom, 13.

Leedom loved shooting guns and knew he wanted to be in the military one day, his mother said.

At age 17, he enlisted in the Minnesota National Guard and went through boot camp. He graduated from high school in 2018 and completed his training at Fort Leonard Wood in Missouri that summer. He served with the Guard in the 34th Military Police Company in Stillwater while also working a factory job. Due to COVID-19, he had recently been laid off from his job, so he took up the DoorDash position as temporary work, his mother said.

His family and his instructors at the Guard described him as someone who never met a stranger and didn't mind hard work.

"He'd be the life of the party," his mother said. "He's got that million-dollar smile. He's a jokester, a smart ass. He touched everybody."

"He was not one to sit down," said Sgt. Brad Anderson. "He was striving to become a leader. He wanted to be a leader in the worst way."

According to Capt. Troy Davidson, commander of the 34th Military Police Company, Leedom "recently answered the call to state active duty in support of the civil unrest in the Twin Cities. Samuel's presence in our formation will be severely missed."

Heidi remembers the day he got the call to go work in Minneapolis when violence erupted following the Memorial Day death of George Floyd in police custody.

"The adrenaline I could see on my kid's face, the excitement, being leery of what he was going to be going into," she said. "I said, 'Drive safely.' He stayed until the middle of June."

Anderson had been impressed with Leedom's easygoing way with people and his eager commitment to serving his country.

"He was a very social kid," Anderson said. "He lit up a room. He loved to talk to people. He continuously asked to be able to train in different aspects. He never hesitated. He was up and ready to go at a moment's notice. He had great potential."

Leedom's mother found that when her son joined the Guard she inherited a family.

"The Guard has been so amazing," she said.

National Guardsman who served during Minneapolis unrest dies in head-on crash. 'He had great potential,' his sergeant said.

The Hall Family Foundation will be hosting its Veterans Honor Annual Golf Classic on Aug. 8 at White Eagle Golf Course in Hudson, Wis. The foundation told Heidi Leedom they plan to use $10,000 of the funds raised as a scholarship in Leedom's name to go toward the education of a new recruit.

Leedom's unit is set to ship out to Cuba Aug. 10. But before they go, they'll say goodbye to him during a closed memorial service Aug. 9 at the Stillwater Armory.

Minnesota cities, counties scramble to keep businesses afloat by dishing out CARES Act grants Need a pedal-push? Rentals offer chance to try out electric bikes 'Mending' traveling art exhibit features works dealing with anxiety of pandemic, death of George Floyd Lower St. Croix Valley man helps spur creation of new park area in Afton Washington County Attorney resigns from state commission

Graphic

Samuel Leedom, 20, of Oak Park Heights, was killed Thursday, July 16, 2020 in a head-on crash in West Lakeland Township. He was a member of the Minnesota National Guard and served in the 34th Military Police Company, Third Platoon, First Squad in Stillwater. (Courtesy of the Leedom family)

Samuel Leedom, 20, of Oak Park Heights, was killed Thursday, July 16, 2020, in a head-on crash in West Lakeland Township. He was a member of the Minnesota National Guard and served in the 34th Military Police Company, Third Platoon, First Squad in Stillwater. (Courtesy of the Army National Guard)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCCLXI. READERS WRITE ANOTHER CONSEQUENCE OF COVID

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 20, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 10ALength: 1275 wordsBody

IMMUNIZATIONS

As the world awaits a vaccine for COVID-19, vaccination rates for preventable childhood diseases have plummeted in Minnesota and across the country. In May, state health officials reported a staggering 70% drop in measles vaccinations given, compared with one year ago. Unless we reverse this troubling trend, we could find ourselves fighting vaccine-preventable disease outbreaks this fall alongside COVID-19 and influenza.

We have a good idea why immunization rates have dropped. Parents are hesitant to take their children to the doctor; some have lost jobs and/or health insurance coverage; and some clinics needed to close or scale back services. But many pediatricians' offices have taken significant measures to ensure patient safety, such as designating separate locations or times of day for well-child and sick-child visits, requiring face masks for staff and patients, and even establishing drive-up sites for vaccinations. These efforts are commendable and should give parents the assurance they need to access critical preventive services for their children.

Childhood diseases like measles can spread rapidly if immunization rates drop below the crucial number required for herd immunity. If we've learned anything from COVID-19, it's that protecting on another from infectious disease depends on our individual and collective efforts. We don't know how long it will be until a safe and effective COVID-19 vaccine is available, but we do know there are safe and effective vaccines at our disposal to protect our children and our communities from measles, whooping cough and many other illnesses. I implore parents to get their children's immunizations up to date to ensure the pandemic does not usher in epidemics of vaccine-preventable diseases in our communities.

Catherine London, Minneapolis

FIFTH DISTRICT RACE

The money and motivations backing Omar, Melton-Meaux

A common theme of recent articles (such as "Omar challenger draws big money," July 15), op-ed pieces and letters to the editor regarding Antone Melton-Meaux's challenge to U.S. Rep. Ilhan Omar in the Fifth

READERS WRITE Another consequence of COVID

District primary is that supporters of Melton-Meaux say little or nothing about their reasons for supporting his candidacy, other than that he's running as a Democrat and that he's not Ilhan Omar.

I know why I've voted for Omar in 2018 and 2020. I did so because, like her, I believe that health care, food, shelter and education are human rights. Like her, I believe that human rights should form the foundation of the foreign policy of the United States (anyone who wants to know where Rep. Omar is coming from when she advocates for the human rights of Palestinians and Yemenis should view her Feb. 13, 2019, questioning of the infamous Elliott Abrams regarding his activities in Central America during the Reagan administration - it's on YouTube).

Like Rep. Omar, I believe that the climate emergency requires the comprehensive and equitable approaches that comprise the Green New Deal. Like Omar, I believe that fundamental changes in policing are urgently needed and must involve the federal government as well as states and municipalities.

Omar's critics fault her for being insufficiently "focused on the Fifth," as if a $15 minimum wage, Medicare for All, free public universities, and guarantees of food and housing would not benefit residents of the district. Those who allege that Omar has not used her time in Congress effectively might want to take a look at the Homes for All Act that she introduced, a massive program designed to ensure housing for all Americans. I stand with Ilhan because she is my voice in Congress.

Clifford Kashtan, St. Louis Park

...

In "Omar challenger draws big money," the reasons given for Antone Melton-Meaux's successful fundraising is due to outside groups angered at Omar's anti-Semitic tropes, not-infrequent attacks on the president and her criticism of lobbying groups in politics.

What the article doesn't mention is that people in the Fifth District are disgusted with her because she speaks in platitudes, with no realistic policy suggestions. Last month her response at a rally immediately after the George Floyd murder was not a voice of calm, but "the Minneapolis Police is rotten to the root ... dismantle it ... allow for something beautiful to rise." Well, amid an increase in violence, we are now seeing what dismantling could look like.

Omar also creates more problems for Biden and the Democratic Party when, as our congresswoman, she proclaims "transform every aspect of American society." Is that what the people of the Fifth District and our nation want rather than thoughtful, measured changes? At the same time, we hear nothing about her working on our behalf to get funding from the federal government to build the Southwest light-rail line or from FEMA, as Gov. Tim Walz has tried to do, to help rebuild Minneapolis.

These are the reasons many in the Fifth are supporting Melton-Meaux, who will work for our district and not use the position for personal fame.

Deborah Deutsch, Minneapolis

...

Hypocrisy and self-interest have led Melton-Meaux to attack Omar as a "divider" and lean on corporate interests and conservative donors to oust her. To one of his supporters who took offense to the idea that he has Republican donors because they are not one, facts are facts. Melton-Meaux has taken millions of dollars of corporate money and high-dollar donations, including from Republican donors, and your donations do not change that fact. To the detractors of Ilhan Omar who are not willing to let her apologize for her mistakes, but are willing to support Melton-Meaux, who thinks the assistance of our African-immigrant communities is focusing on Africa instead of the Fifth District, please take a moment to think about which candidate is really the divider in this primary.

READERS WRITE Another consequence of COVID

Paul Villerius, Minneapolis

. . .

The July 13 counterpoint "Big money is behind challenges to Omar" has the politics of a vote for Omar backward. I believe that President Donald Trump is an existential threat to this country. His dishonesty has been demonstrated repeatedly. Yet I am a relatively small, three-figure donor to Antone Melton-Meaux, otherwise uninvolved in his campaign. I've never met him. But he appears to be a dream candidate to represent Minneapolis in Congress.

I have very much hoped that the only prominent person lacking integrity on the ballot would be the president. But Rep. Omar has demonstrated that she cannot pass the most basic tests of integrity. Her lack of interest in representing the interests of Minnesota in Congress is demonstrated by her miserable voting record. It is she, not Melton-Meaux, who is the president's ideal candidate. Over and over, her actions and statements give the president fodder for attacks on all Democrats. That, in addition to his demonstrated record of community service, is why I support Melton-Meaux.

Peter Lancaster, Minneapolis

. . .

In the DFL primary for the Fifth Congressional District, Omar's number of missed votes has become an issue. To set the record straight, here are the facts from GovTrack.us. In 2019, Rep. Omar missed 40 of 701 votes and tied for seventh among all 87 freshman House members for the most missed votes. Among her "Squad" colleagues, Ayanna Pressley, D-Mass., missed 14 votes in 2019; Rashida Tlaib, D-Mich., seven; and Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez, D-N.Y., only two. Omar's fellow Minnesota freshmen Democrats, Angie Craig and Dean Phillips, had perfect attendance. Voters in the Fifth who expect their representative to represent them when the House takes votes have an alternative: Antone Melton-Meaux.

David Aquilina, Richfield

Load-Date: July 21, 2020

ARTICLE MCCLXII. REFORMS COULD SHAPE CHIEF'S FATE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 20, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1044 wordsByline: LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

While Minneapolis city leaders decide what their Police Department should look like in the post-George Floyd era, the fate of a popular police chief also hangs in the balance.

Although Eighth Ward Council Member Andrea Jenkins and seven of her colleagues pledged last month to replace the city's police force with a "transformative" public safety system, they admitted they didn't have "all the answers about what a police-free future looks like."

Among the lingering questions is the fate of Medaria Arradondo, the city's first Black police chief. On a City Council wracked by Floyd's death at the hands of police, views differ about what the future may bring.

"In my vision, yes, I see Chief Arradondo as part of a public safety continuum in the city of Minneapolis," said Jenkins, the council vice president. "One of the things that people continue to talk about is that we need police officers that are from the community. Well, our police chief is from the community and understands the realities of Black life, the racism that exists in police culture and in the broader society."

But some of her colleagues could go a different route. They say the chief's fate will depend on a proposed charter amendment that eliminates the requirement to maintain a police force. If the amendment passes, some council members said they could envision a new department that may not include officers and could be led by someone without a law enforcement background.

In interviews, the 12 council members all said they respect Arradondo's vision for the department and agree he should be involved in the conversation about its future. But much depends on the makeup of a new agency.

Council Member Alondra Cano said she supports the chief, but that "the system that we've given him to lead is broken."

Reforms could shape chief's fate

Cano, who chairs the council's Public Safety Committee, said she's looking for a clean break. "We don't want anybody who's a licensed police officer to lead that new department," she said. "I'm not interested in replacing one Police Department with a different Police Department."

One of the strongest voices for doing away with the Police Department is Council Member Steve Fletcher. He opposed Arradondo's request for 400 more officers. But he said he respects Arradondo's vision for what public safety could be.

"He's not diminished in my eyes for having tried to reform a department that probably wasn't reformable," Fletcher said. "I'm certainly not scheming to get rid of him."

The chief's backers say that Arradondo - who got the job when his predecessor, Janeé Harteau, was ousted following an earlier police killing - has made important reforms since taking over as the city's top cop, but that he can't be expected to change the department's 150-plus-year culture in a matter of years.

Last week, the Minneapolis Charter Commission held the first of two public hearings on the police proposal, with most of some 100 speakers voicing support for putting the proposed amendment on the November ballot. Meanwhile, some members of the council expressed ambivalence about Arradondo.

"At the end of the day, whatever ends up happening, is the chief interested in that? And at the time is he the best fit for that? And I don't think we have the best answers for that," said Council Member Andrew Johnson.

A shocking increase in gun violence has added yet another layer of complexity to the debate. But Arradondo still appears to have support among some council members who favor a reconfigured department.

One leading council proponent of disbanding the police force, Jeremiah Ellison, said his concern isn't the chief's leadership, but rather a culture of unaccountability within the department that too often lets bad cops off the hook. It's this culture, Ellison says, that he and his colleagues are trying to end by calling for a drastic rethinking of the department's structure.

"That only supports Rondo (the chief's nickname), that doesn't hurt him in any way," said Ellison, whose ward covers parts of north Minneapolis.

Phillipe Cunningham, another North Side council member, also voiced support for Arradondo, saying he believes the chief "is the right leader to help us reshape law enforcement's role in public safety." But, he added: "To support someone and to support their leadership, it doesn't mean unquestioning, unconditional support."

Council Member Linea Palmisano said that in her view, Arradondo should be an integral part of whatever form public safety takes in the city's future.

"Any successful endeavor is going to require cooperation with our chief," Palmisano said, adding, "I do imagine that some of these things will end up being less in his control than before."

Lisa Goodman, one of the longest tenured council members, said that she has never shied away from criticizing past chiefs, but that she "strongly" supports Arradondo.

Reforms could shape chief's fate

"He is the right person to lead whatever public safety function we have going forward," said Goodman, who has kept a far lower profile in the debate over disbanding or defunding the Police Department.

Council President Lisa Bender said she has "full confidence" in Arradondo's ability to lead the department "as it exists today." But she added that the proposed new safety department may well take the city in another direction altogether.

"It may be that the leader of that work in the future would not be someone from law enforcement - it would be someone from a more holistic public safety background," she said.

Council Member Cam Gordon said he worries about "muddying" the debate around policing with talk of the chief's future. He doesn't want to turn the decision into a referendum on Arradondo, a well-regarded police executive and lifelong Minneapolitan. "He's the chief - nobody's talking about removing him right now, and we can be open-minded about what the future brings," Gordon said.

Council Member Jeremy Schroeder said a lot depends on Arradondo's "commitment to change."

Council Member Kevin Reich, like many of his colleagues, suggested it may just be too early to tell.

"Right now, I would consider Chief Arradondo a pivotal player in the changes that we are making," Reich said. "I could absolutely foresee him playing a strong leadership role. ... But so much of that is to be determined."

Libor Jany · 612-673-4064

Load-Date: July 21, 2020

ARTICLE MCCLXIII.

SUBURBS IN THE EXURBS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 20, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 948 wordsByline: CHRIS RIEMENSCHNEIDER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: A cineplex parking lot in St. Michael offered ample room for fans to rattle their bones and swim noodles.Body

As one of the Twin Cities' most storied rock bands took the stage in St. Michael on Saturday night, posters hanging behind the stage for "Sonic the Hedgehog," "Call of the Wild" and other winter movies told the story of the gig's odd location - and the unusually long wait for it.

"It's been five [bleeping] months since I stood on a stage!" Chan Poling yelled to a parking lot laced with 250 socially distanced fans in lawn chairs.

For Poling's band, the Suburbs, and its audience outside the 15-screen St. Michael Cinema, live music was temporarily alive and well, and ... well, pretty darn weird.

Still shuttered after four months without films, the exurban movie house - 40 minutes northwest of Minneapolis off Interstate 94 - is the latest venue on the outskirts of the Twin Cities, with equal parts ingenuity, desperation and chutzpah, to start hosting concerts in the era of COVID-19.

Live music isn't new to St. Michael Cinema. In 2015, the cineplex began hosting concerts inside a big, 200-plush-seat theater that it redubbed Le Musique Room, which sounds a tad cooler than Screen 15. (A note on the website rhetorically translates the fancier name to "the Music Room.")

"It's for older folks like me who want more comfort and high fidelity with their concerts," Le Musique Room manager Tom Pickard explained between bands on Saturday.

After successfully selling music fans on a space more accustomed to buttered popcorn than amplified guitars - the Suburbs and many other veteran Twin Cities acts had already played inside - Pickard and his crew now have to convince audiences they could enjoy a concert safely outside in 2020.

They made a decent case for it Saturday.

Suburbs in the exurbs

The crowd that turned out for the 6:30 p.m. show was less than a quarter the size of a typical Suburbs audience at downtown Minneapolis' First Avenue (where the band last performed on Valentine's Day) or the Minnesota Zoo amphitheater (among the many summer gigs the band had to cancel).

Fans who bought tickets had to wade through a waiver online asking if they had any COVID-19 symptoms. They were also urged to bring lawn chairs to help ensure proper spacing.

Masks were not required, but most attendees wore them anyway, especially when they walked up to "Le Bar" - "the bar" - or entered the building to use the spacious restrooms.

To help create the mandated 6-foot spacing in front of the stage - housed under a covered atrium outside the front door - organizers handed out swimming pool noodles upon entry.

In the end, though, the noodles wound up being used more as dancing props than safety tools.

"It's my foam dancing partner," Mary Bridges of Anoka quipped after shaking her noodle during the Suburbs' fifth song, "Music for Boys."

(Later on, Poling missed a good opportunity in not substituting "noodles" for "bones" in the even more up-tempo fan favorite "Rattle My Bones.")

Watching from lawn chairs near the back, St. Michael residents Mark and Julie Borowiak said they would consider attending one of the 15 other upcoming concerts outside their neighborhood theater, which include Chris Hawkey, GB Leighton, Mick Sterling, and tributes to Queen, Tom Petty and Led Zeppelin.

"People are being respectful and keeping their distance," Mark Borowiak said. "It's pretty easy to protect yourself."

While the Borowiaks loved the location, at least a few attendees wondered why concerts like this always seem to be on the outskirts of the metro area. The other most prominent outdoor concert series to pop up post-quarantine are the ones outside Crooners Supper Club in Fridley and in a strip-mall parking lot in Burnsville (the Relief Sessions).

"It's weird there aren't other options in town," said Kathy Bardwell of New Hope, "but I'm just happy to be at a rock 'n' roll show, period."

As for the musicians, they didn't seem to mind the site, and they applauded the safety practices there.

"I was pretty nervous about it," admitted Jay DeHut, drummer for opening band Kiss the Tiger, "but it's outside on a breezy night, and everyone is social-distancing. It wound up being a lot of fun."

It also wound up being quite emotional for Kiss the Tiger's singer Meghan Kreidler, who broke into tears between songs while talking about the pandemic and the racial turmoil since George Floyd's death.

"I am joyful to be here but also sad and angry at the world," Kreidler said. "It's an immense privilege to use music as a vehicle."

Poling and his crew mostly let their music do the talking and healing, including a couple new tunes thrown into the mix from a new Suburbs album they've been working on during quarantine. The band also had to cancel many shows last summer and fall while the singer recovered from oral surgery.

Suburbs in the exurbs

"We were ready for it when this offer came up," Poling said offstage. "It's outdoors with lots of room, so we thought we'd try it as long as people in the audience feel comfortable and safe.

"It's an experiment," he conceded, "but I'm just glad to finally be playing again."

The hard question remains, though, when and where the band will get to play again.

Chris Riemenschneider · 612-673-4658

@ChrisRstrib

Le Musique Room's outdoor concerts

July 23: Xpedition tribute to Journey, Kansas, Styx.

July 24: Crown Jewels tribute to Queen.

July 25: Born to Run: Mick Sterling tribute to Bruce Springsteen.

July 31: Zed Leppelin.

Aug. 1: Girls Just Wanna Have Fun, by Ladies of the 80's.

Aug. 7: Daisy Dillman tribute to CSNY.

Aug. 8: Tom Petty tribute band Free Fallin'.

Aug. 12-13: Fabulous Armadillos tribute to the Eagles.

Aug. 15: GB Leighton.

Aug. 27: Mick Sterling tribute to Billy Joel.

Aug. 28: Chris Hawkey Band.

Location: St. Michael Cinema, 4300 O'Day Av. off I-94.

Tickets and info: 612-314-9199 or goexit205.com.

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

ARTICLE MCCLXIV.

TENSIONS RISE WITH RUSSIA AND CHINA

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 20, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 10ALength: 732 wordsHighlight: Washington's approach to Moscow and Beijing must get more focus in the presidential race.Body

On Thursday, the United States, United Kingdom and Canada alleged that hackers tied to Russian intelligence agencies are targeting Western entities working on a coronavirus vaccine.

A day before, in just the latest sign of Sino-American tension, it was reported that the Trump administration was mulling a travel ban for members of the Chinese Communist Party, as well as their families.

These events are just the most recent episodes in a series of intensifying divisions between the U.S. and its two major geopolitical rivals, Russia and China. There are other, equally fraught fractures factoring into the divides.

With China, this includes several trade-related disputes, as well as Beijing's bellicose approach to its own citizens in Western China and Hong Kong. Abroad, Chinese troops recently had deadly clashes with Indian forces along a disputed border, and the nation continues its historic hostility to Taiwan, as well as more recent aggression in the South China Sea, where China's maritime claims were officially declared unlawful by the State Department last week. Adding to the martial tensions are technological fissures, reflected in the U.K.'s joining the U.S. in banning China's Huawei from use in the developing 5G wireless network.

Ongoing U.S.-Russian divisions can be seen in several issues, including enduring election interference. Meanwhile, lethal militarism in Ukraine, Crimea, Syria and elsewhere, as well as allegations of Russian bounties on U.S. forces in Afghanistan, strain Washington-Moscow ties.

Add to that arms control, which has been spinning out of control in recent years. "The framework we inherited from U.S.-Soviet competition is practically gone," Eugene Rumer, a former national intelligence officer who is now the director of the Russia and Eurasia Program at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, said during a webinar last week. If so, the U.S. and Russia "will be in an unrestrained, unrestricted arms race with a host of new technologies entering the strategic stability equation. That will be likely be highly destabilizing."

Stabilization on this or other issues with Russia and China might not be able to rely on formerly reliable Cold War constructs. The three nations are "not part of a dynamic triangle, where the U.S. can play one off the other," said Aaron David Miller, a senior fellow at Carnegie. "The Sino-Russian partnership is a good deal more than an access of convenience, and one of - if not the - principle adhesives in that relationship is an effort to check U.S. influence regionally and globally."

This adhesive is based on two factors, said Susan Thornton, a former diplomat who is now a senior fellow at Yale Law School. Economics, with the Chinese the "unbalanced driver of the train, which may be a bit uncomfortable for Russia," as well as "the convergence of attitudes of the two governments about what the West and the U.S. is doing." In this component, the Kremlin is more the driver, Thornton said.

The pandemic may be global, but the U.S. political debate about it is mostly domestic, especially because of President Donald Trump's reckless response to the crisis. Other vital stateside issues - including one literally originating here at home with the death of George Floyd - like social justice are appropriately paramount to voters.

But foreign policy should not get eclipsed in the campaign, and the debate must go beyond who's "soft" on China and Russia to who's smart about them.

That means recognizing reality. The U.S.-Russia bilateral relationship is "the worst since the Cold War," said Rumer. Likewise, the U.S.-China bilateral relationship has devolved to "managed enmity," said Evan Feigenbaum, vice president for studies at Carnegie. "The two sides are not only not working together, they are actively obstructing each other and doing it without some guardrails."

Fortunately, the U.S. has some longstanding alliances to better respond to the Russian and Chinese challenges. Unfortunately, many of these relationships are severely strained because Trump has either not tended to them, or tended to alienate these allies through unproductive provocations.

The U.S., said Feigenbaum, has "an attitude but not a strategy." Now, more than ever, voters should consider both the president's and presumptive Democratic nominee Joe Biden's strategy, and not just attitude, on responding to Russia and China.

Load-Date: July 21, 2020

ARTICLE MCCLXV.

THRIFT STORES REOPEN - WITH RESTRICTIONS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 20, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 677 wordsByline: JOHN EWOLDT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: But four Salvation Army stores closed permanently in greater Minnesota because of the COVID pandemic.Body

Minnesotans can finally bring the piles accumulating in garages and storage rooms to thrift stores without an hourslong wait.

Nearly all of the thrift and secondhand stores are now reopened after stay-home restrictions surrounding the coronavirus forced them to shutter from March to late May.

And they now report a more steady flow of traffic to drop off items. Those that have been open are reporting stronger sales than last year but with fewer customers, so several are offering sales to increase business.

One has expanded. Habitat for Humanity ReStore in New Brighton added 50% more space after a neighboring business vacated.

"Due to COVID, we couldn't really plan for a gangbusters grand reopening with a brass band and balloons," said Pete O'Keefe, ReStore director.

The Minneapolis ReStore reopened later because of minor damage from protests in the area. Both stores are discounting everything 20% through Labor Day.

Representatives at Goodwill, Arc's Value

Village and Salvation Army, the largest of the Twin Cities nonprofit thrift stores, report that wait times for drop-off in the past week rarely exceeded 15 minutes.

"Our epic donations surge has leveled out now and donors can expect 15-minute max wait at Richfield, and just a few minutes at New Hope and Bloomington donation doors," said Molly King, marketing manager for Arc's Value Village stores.

Thrift stores reopen - with restrictions

Many retail shops, including thrifts, have been slow to reopen as they navigate mandated safety precautions for customers and employees. And donating is not as easy as before, with limits on hours and merchandise accepted.

Old School by Steeple People in Minneapolis opened last week but reduced its hours and accepts donations only on Wednesdays.

Assistance League Thrift Shop in Richfield reopened Wednesday with shorter hours. It also will likely not accept donations until August because the store is overstocked after being closed in the spring.

The store also has other precautions. With permission, customers' hands are sprayed with sanitizer upon entering.

"We're being overly cautious," said shop manager Dana Badgerow. "We're an all-volunteer organization and to keep our volunteers safe, we're only doing two-hour shifts."

Tech Dump in Golden Valley, which accepts used electronics to recycle or resell at little or no cost, now accepts only credit cards. No cash is accepted at the store, which saw record drop-offs in June.

St. Vincent de Paul in St. Paul is back in business, but not the Minneapolis store. Manager Julene Maruska estimates it will be back in August, but she remains tentative. Donations are also on hold.

"Things change week to week, but as of now we aren't taking any donations," she said. "We've suspended our pickup service too, but hope to resume in August. Call ahead because my crystal ball is not functioning right now."

Half-Price Books is limiting the amount of items brought in to sell because of a smaller staff and quarantine requirements.

In May, donors sat in their cars for up to two hours and lines of cars snaked around the block at Arc's Value Village. The store is still trying to manage drop-offs. They are accepted only from 10 a.m. to 1 p.m. daily.

The Goodwill store on University Avenue in St. Paul is still closed after damage caused by rioting after the police killing of George Floyd on Memorial Day. It's expected to reopen in mid-August, according to Brent Babcock, chief sales and marketing officer for Goodwill Easter Seals Minnesota.

As in the retail sector as whole, several thrift stores will not reopen because of the economics of COVID-19. This follows the closure of several secondhand stores in the past few years, including Savers in Minneapolis and Bloomington, Valu Thrift in St. Paul and the Arc's Value Village location in St. Paul.

The Salvation Army, which operates 10 Twin Cities locations, has decided not to reopen its locations in Cloquet, Morris, Faribault and Fairmont. "We couldn't see a way to profitability in those stores after COVID," said Dan Furry, communications director for the Northern Division.

John Ewoldt · 612-673-7633

Load-Date: July 20, 2020

ARTICLE MCCLXVI.

HENNEPIN COUNTY JUDGE LIFTS GAG ORDER IN GEORGE FLOYD CRIMINAL CASE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 21, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 670 wordsByline: Mohamed Ibrahim

Highlight: A Hennepin County judge on Tuesday lifted a gag order in the criminal case against four former officers charged in death of George Floyd, but said he would take under advisement a news media coalition's request to make body camera footage more widely available. In announcing his ruling, District Court Judge Peter Cahill said he [...]

Body

A Hennepin County judge on Tuesday lifted a gag order in the criminal case against four former officers charged in death of George Floyd, but said he would take under advisement a news media coalition's request to make body camera footage more widely available.

In announcing his ruling, District Court Judge Peter Cahill said he agreed with defense attorneys' arguments that a gag order would be unfair to their clients and limit their ability to defend against negative publicity.

Cahill also said the gag order wasn't working, adding that certain parties were attempting to "tiptoe around the order," and some media outlets spoke to anonymous sources. The judge said attorneys would still be subject to Minnesota court rules relating to pretrial publicity and professional conduct.

Also on Tuesday, Cahill ruled that he would not hold the lead prosecutor in the case, Attorney General Keith Ellison, in contempt of court as two defense attorneys requested. Cahill determined that a statement Ellison made when he announced that additional attorneys would be assisting the prosecution was innocuous and did not violate the gag order.

Floyd, a Black man who was handcuffed, died May 25 after Derek Chauvin, a white police officer, pressed his knee against Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes as Floyd said he couldn't breathe. Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and manslaughter. Three other officers who were at the scene, Tou Thao, Thomas Lane and J. Kueng, are charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and manslaughter. All four officers were fired.

Police body camera videos were filed with the court this month by Lane's attorney, Earl Gray, as part of a request to have Lane's case dismissed. Gray said he wanted the videos to be made public- prompting Cahill to issue the gag order barring attorneys and parties from discussing the case.

Cahill made the videos available for in-person, by-appointment viewing only.

Leita Walker, an attorney for the news media coalition which includes the Associated Press, and Gray both argued Tuesday for wider dissemination of the body camera footage. Walker said making the footage widely available would not further harm the court's effort to impanel a jury because the public already has access to bystander video, transcripts of the footage and reporting by press who watched the videos.

"This case has international interest. To expect every member of the media to fly to Minneapolis and schedule an appointment ... during quarantine is a de facto sealing," Walker told the judge.

Speaking to reporters after the hearing, Walker said: "The media coalition's view is that there's a lot of stuff already out there and the public is entitled to a complete picture ... the media can only report a full story if it's able to see everything and talk to both sides."

Gray argued in court that the news media has been unfair to his client, and body camera footage would clear up some misrepresentations. He alleged the body camera footage shows Floyd stuffed counterfeit bills in his car seat and put drugs in his mouth. Two AP writers who viewed the body camera footage at the courthouse last week did not see Floyd put drugs in his mouth, as Gray described.

Assistant Attorney General Matthew Frank argued for the prosecution that releasing the body camera footage could have a negative impact on impaneling an impartial jury.

The issue of whether audio and visual coverage of the trial will be allowed was also discussed at the hearing. The defendants' attorneys made no objection. Frank said prosecutors will weigh in on that issue later.

Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Graphic

Former Minneapolis police officers, from left, Derek Chauvin, Tou Thao, Thomas Lane and J. Alexander Kueng

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Body found in ruins of burned pawnshop

ARTICLE MCCLXVII.

BODY FOUND IN RUINS OF BURNED PAWNSHOP

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 21, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 548 wordsByline: LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Tip led to search, months after building was set ablaze during riots.Body

Authorities found the charred body of a man in the wreckage of a south Minneapolis pawnshop, nearly two months after the building was torched in the rioting that followed George Floyd's death.

Investigators from the Minneapolis Police Department, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and the state fire marshal's division were acting on a tip when they discovered the body Monday morning in the rubble of Max It Pawn, at 2726 E. Lake St., according to Police Department spokesman John Elder.

"The body appears to have suffered thermal injury and we do have somebody charged with setting fire to that place," said Elder, adding that city homicide detectives had taken over the investigation. He said that the victim's identity would be released by medical examiners after an autopsy is completed, along with the precise cause and manner of death.

The site is several blocks east of the shuttered Third Precinct police station, the epicenter of the protests that broke out after Floyd's death May 25 under the knee of a since-fired city police officer. That officer, Derek Chauvin, is charged with second-degree murder and manslaughter, and three other officers at the scene, J. Alexander Kueng, Thomas Lane and Tou Thao, are charged with aiding and abetting Chauvin.

Details about the circumstances and timeline of the case remained hazy Monday, but a police news release suggested that the man died in the blaze that destroyed the building on May 28.

A 25-year-old Rochester man, Montez Terrill Lee, was federally charged last month with arson in connection with the fire.

According to the criminal complaint against Lee, ATF investigators received video from an anonymous source of an arson that occurred at the pawnshop. In the first clip, a masked man, later identified as Lee, is seen pouring liquid from a metal container throughout the pawnshop. A second video shows Lee standing in front of the burning pawnshop saying "[Expletive] this place. We're gonna burn this [expletive] down."

Body found in ruins of burned pawnshop

Ashlee Sherrill, a spokesperson for the ATF, said that she couldn't comment on what remained an open case. The agency has opened dozens of arson investigations into incidents that occurred during the unrest.

"The ATF is continuing to work these arson investigations across the Twin Cities and following up on these leads as they become available," she said.

Several days after that fire, firefighters scoured the remains of a nearby liquor store after witnesses reported that someone inside hadn't made it out when the building was torched. But their search didn't turn up anything. It wasn't clear whether the two reports are connected, as the apparently missing man from the liquor store was never identified publicly.

If the death is ruled a homicide, it would be the city's 36th of the year - compared with 18 at this time last year.

It would also be at least the second fatality connected to the riots. In the first, John Rieple, 59, the owner of Cadillac Pawn at 1538 E. Lake St., was arrested after shooting and killing a man outside of his business, but was later released. No charges have been filed. Relatives of the victim, Calvin "Chuck" Horton Jr., 43, has cast doubt on the initial account that Horton was killed while looting the store.

Libor Jany · 612-673-4064 Twitter: @StribJany

Load-Date: July 21, 2020

ARTICLE MCCLXVIII. MINNEAPOLIS POLICE EXPERIENCE SURGE OF DEPARTURES IN AFTERMATH OF GEORGE FLOYD PROTESTS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 21, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1639 words

Byline: John Eligon

Highlight: Minneapolis Police Experience Surge of Departures in Aftermath of George Floyd Protests

Body

MINNEAPOLIS - Nearly two months after four of its officers were charged with killing George Floyd, the Minneapolis Police Department is reeling, with police officers leaving the job in large numbers, crime surging and politicians planning a top-to-bottom overhaul of the force.

Veteran officers say that morale within the department is lower than they have ever experienced. Some officers are scaling back their policing efforts, concerned that any contentious interactions on the street could land them in trouble. And many others are calling it quits altogether.

"It's almost like a nuclear bomb hit the city, and the people who didn't perish are standing around," Officer Rich Walker Sr., a 16-year Minneapolis police veteran and union official, said of the mood within the department. "I'm still surprised that we've got cops showing up to work, to be honest."

Many American police departments have faced challenges in retention and recruitment in recent years amid growing criticism of police abuses. But the woes in Minneapolis and elsewhere have only grown since May, when Floyd was killed after the police detained him.

Nearly 200 officers have applied to leave the Minneapolis Police Department because of what they describe as post-traumatic stress, said Ronald F. Meuser Jr., a lawyer representing the officers. The prospect that a department of about 850 could lose about 20% of its force in the coming months has prompted major concern.

Already, about 65 officers have left the department this year, surpassing the typical attrition rate of 45 a year, Chief Medaria Arradondo told the city council during a meeting last week. Dozens of other officers have taken temporary leave since Floyd's death, complicating the staffing picture.

Minneapolis' police force has long had a troubled relationship with the community. Excessive force complaints against Minneapolis officers have become commonplace, especially by Black residents. African Americans account for about 20% of the city's population, but they are more likely to be pulled over, arrested and have force used against them than white residents.

Minneapolis police experience surge of departures in aftermath of George Floyd protests

Cmdr. Scott Gerlicher, head of the Special Operations and Intelligence Division, wrote in an email to supervisors this month that, "Due to significant staffing losses of late," the department was "looking at all options" for responding to calls, including shift, schedule and organizational changes.

The email, a copy of which was obtained by The New York Times, also said the department would not "be going back to business as usual." The guiding principle going forward, Gerlicher wrote, would be to "do no harm," and he highlighted potential reforms, including, "Looking for reasonable and safe alternatives to police services in some areas."

"Front line supervisors play the most critical role in making meaningful changes," he wrote. "Don't take this lightly."

With fewer officers to patrol, some of those on the streets find themselves stretched thin and working longer hours. Complaints about the lack of support from politicians, community members and even department commanders are part of the daily conversation in precincts and squad cars.

For years, police departments nationwide have faced a workforce crisis, according to a report published last year by the Police Executive Research Forum. In a survey of more than 400 departments nationwide, the forum found that 63% of them saw a slight or significant decrease in the number of applicants over the previous five years, 41% had growing staff shortages and nearly half reported that officer tenures were decreasing.

The current climate differs from six years ago - when the police killing of Michael Brown in Ferguson, Missouri, sparked national unrest - in that the demands are not just to reform police departments, but to get rid of them, said Chuck Wexler, executive director of the forum.

Many activists see an overdue reckoning for an institution that they say has long gotten away with brutalizing people of color with impunity.

"Policing as an institution has largely been untouchable, despite the many, many, many failings that are cultural," said Jeremiah Ellison, a Minneapolis City Council member who supports defunding the police. "Here we are in a moment where people all over the country are saying, 'No, no, no, no, no, we are interested in real accountability.'"

Instead of embracing change, Ellison added, the police are saying, "You're picking on us, you don't know how hard our job is and we're going home."

Several officers in Minneapolis said they felt like they all were being stereotyped because of Derek Chauvin, the white former officer who knelt on Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes before Floyd died.

"If anything has the propensity to have a violent interaction, we already know we're judged before they even hear the facts," said Walker, whose stop of a motorist 11 years ago led to a lawsuit that the city settled for $235,000 after several responding officers punched and kicked the driver in an episode captured on video.

To Sasha Cotton, director of the Office of Violence Prevention in Minneapolis, there is a cruel irony to officers saying they feel stereotyped. Her office regularly works with Black men and boys to try to keep them out of violence.

Minneapolis police experience surge of departures in aftermath of George Floyd protests

"Our officers are experiencing what so often our young men and boys, who we service through the program, say they feel," she said. "They feel like they are being judged based on the behavior of some of their peers."

Minneapolis officers say that much of their frustration is rooted in uncertainty over what comes next. A majority of city council members have pledged to defund the Police Department, and they are currently in the process of trying to replace the agency with a new public safety department.

Many officers say they feel like city leaders and some residents have turned their backs on them, making them less inclined to go "above and beyond what they need to do," said Walker, the union official.

"Cops have not been to the work level of before, but it's not a slowdown," he added. "They're just not being as proactive because they know they're not supported in case something bad happens."

Officers said they were also concerned about their job security.

Sgt. Anna Hedberg, a 14-year Minneapolis police veteran and board member of the Minneapolis Police Federation, the union representing officers, said a colleague recently told her he had another job opportunity. He has been on the force for six years, but it takes 10 years to be fully vested in his pension, so he was unsure whether he should leave.

Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police Attorney for fired Minneapolis officer says Freeman should be removed from George Floyd case "I told him to leave because he's not happy," Hedberg said.

The tensions between the city and its Police Department come as crime is on the rise. There have been 16 homicides since June 1, more than twice as many as during the same period last year. Violent crime is up by 20% compared with the same stretch a year ago. Experts say there are many reasons for the spike, not just police staffing levels.

For one senior officer on leave because of PTSD symptoms, the problems started when he could not sleep after long nights of work during the unrest following Floyd's death. Eventually he got headaches, he said, and lost his appetite and desire to do anything.

"We were stepchildren. We were abandoned," said the officer, who asked that his name be withheld because he was not authorized to speak to the media.

He saw a therapist, who told him he should take time off. He is torn about whether he will return.

"I'm coming back to chaos," he said. "I'm coming back to no leadership. I'm coming back to an administration that doesn't care about the officers. I'm coming back to a City Council that doesn't want us here. I'm coming back to a family, or a community, that doesn't want me here. Why do I want to come back to that?"

Many officers are on edge in part because they believe that Arradondo and other senior department leaders have not provided clear direction to the rank and file, Hedberg said.

Minneapolis police experience surge of departures in aftermath of George Floyd protests

"They're waking up the next day: 'Is it going to be the day I get transferred? Is it the day my unit's going to be dissolved?'" she said. "People are concerned about it."

John Elder, a spokesman for the department, said in an email: "We have not heard those complaints; in fact I have received compliments from staff about the support from the front office."

While many officers express anxiety about the future, Officer Charles Adams III said he supported the efforts of Arradondo, the first Black officer to lead the force.

Although Adams has felt unsupported by the community and demoralized at times - especially after he was removed from his job as a school resource officer when the school district ended its contract with the Police Department - he said thoughts of leaving the force never crossed his mind.

"Now is not the time for us to run away," said Adams, a 19-year veteran and native of the city's predominantly Black North Side.

"I'm a Black face. I can be out there," he added. "I wear blue, but let's talk: 'What do you want to see done? How can I help you?' I think it's my opportunity to give people what they've been asking for."

Shooting near Mears Park injures 1 Sunday night North St. Paul man killed in crash after fleeing Dakota County sheriff's deputy Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Cleric assaulted outside Bloomington mosque; police searching for suspects U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCLXIX.

FACING FEDERAL AGENTS, PORTLAND PROTESTS FIND NEW MOMENTUM

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 21, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1239 wordsByline: Gillian FlaccusHighlight: PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) - Mardy Widman has watched protests against racial injustice unfold in her hometown of Portland, Oregon, for more than seven weeks but stayed away because, at age 79, she feared contracting the coronavirus.

Body

PORTLAND, Ore. - Mardy Widman has watched protests against racial injustice unfold in her hometown of Portland, Oregon, for more than seven weeks but stayed away because, at age 79, she feared contracting the coronavirus.

But that calculus changed for Widman when President Donald Trump sent federal law enforcement agents to the liberal city to quell violent demonstrations - a tactic he's said he'll use for other cities. On Monday, a masked Widman was in the street with more than 1,000 other Portlanders - a far larger crowd than the city had seen in recent days, as it entered its eighth week of nightly protests.

"It's like a dictatorship," Widman, a grandmother of five, said, holding up a sign that read: "Grammy says: Please feds, leave Portland."

"I mean, that he can pick on our city mostly because of the way we vote and make an example of it for his base is very frightening," she said.

Far from tamping down the unrest, the presence of federal agents on the streets of Portland - and particularly allegations they have whisked people away in unmarked cars without probable cause - has given new momentum and a renewed, laser-sharp focus to protests that had begun to devolve into smaller, chaotic crowds. The use of federal agents against the will of local officials has also set up the potential for a constitutional crisis - and one that could escalate if Trump sends federal agents elsewhere, as he says he plans to do.

Federal forces were deployed to Portland in early July, and tensions have grown since then: first, on July 11, when a protester was hospitalized with critical injuries after a U.S. Marshals Service officer struck him in the head with a round of what's known as less-lethal ammunition.

Facing federal agents, Portland protests find new momentum

Then, anger flared again over the weekend after video surfaced of a federal agent hitting a U.S. Navy veteran repeatedly with a baton while another agent sprays him in the face with pepper spray. Principal Deputy Director of the Federal Protective Service Richard Cline said at a news conference Tuesday that the officers were members of the U.S. Marshals, and the Department of Justice inspector general is investigating.

Crowds in Portland had recently numbered fewer than 100 people but swelled to more than 1,000 over the weekend - and they are once again attracting a broader base in a city that's increasingly unified and outraged.

Federal agents again used force to scatter protesters early Tuesday and deployed tear gas and rubber bullets as some in the crowd banged on the doors of the Mark O. Hatfield Federal Courthouse and attempted to pull plywood off the shuttered entryway. The courthouse, which has been a focus of protests, is now covered with graffiti and boarded up, with only thin slits in the plywood to be used as peepholes.

The Portland Police Bureau said in a statement that some protesters lit fires in the street and tried several times to light fires at the courthouse doors.

"It is time for the Trump troops to go home and focus their attention on other activities," Oregon Gov. Kate Brown, a Democrat, said on MSNBC.

State and local authorities, who didn't ask for federal help, are awaiting a decision in a state lawsuit that seeks to restrain the federal agents' actions. State Attorney General Ellen Rosenblum said in court papers that masked federal agents have arrested people on the street, far from the courthouse, with no probable cause and whisked them away in unmarked cars.

The federal government faces another lawsuit, filed Tuesday in federal court by The Western States Center, two state representatives and others who argue federal agents violated protesters' 10th Amendment rights because they engaged in police activities that are designated to local and state governments.

On Tuesday, federal agencies defended their agents' actions in Portland, while detailing the tactics they said had been used against them. According to the Justice Department, some in the crowd outside the courthouse this weekend used radio frequency jammers and shot pellet and Airsoft guns to injure officers. The department is also investigating "suspicious devices" outside the courthouse that could have caused "serious harm to those in the building," spokesperson Kerri Kupec said.

Some of the demonstrators also tried to barricade federal officers inside the courthouse and attempted to set the building on fire, Kupec said.

In a news conference in Washington, acting Department of Homeland Security Secretary Chad Wolf said agents have been assaulted with lasers, bats, fireworks, bottles and other weapons and "yet the city of Portland takes little to no action."

Wolf said the agency has clear authority to protect government property and detain people suspected of threatening personnel or damaging that property. He disputed that unidentified agents have arrested people, noting they have the word "police" on their uniforms and added that officers wear camouflage, as they do when they work on the border.

"These police officers are not storm troopers, they are not Gestapo. That description is offensive," Wolf said.

While federal authorities can enforce federal laws on federal property, state and local officials say the agents have operated beyond their jurisdiction. Constitutional law experts said federal officers' actions are "unprecedented" and a "red flag" in what could become a test case of states' rights as the Trump administration expands federal policing.

US tops 5 million confirmed virus cases, to Europe's alarm Harleys everywhere, masks not so much: Sturgis draws thousands Shops closed, beaches deserted as Isaias nears the Carolinas Navy investigates video of dogs attacking Colin Kaepernick fill-in The mystery of why some with virus don't get sick

Homeland Security plans to deploy about 150 of its agents to Chicago to help local law enforcement deal with a spike in crime, according to an official with direct knowledge of the plans who was not authorized to speak publicly and spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity. The Trump administration also sent more than 100 federal law enforcement officers to Kansas City, Missouri, to help quell a rise in violence after the shooting death of a young boy there.

For days after the death of George Floyd - a Black man who died after a white Minneapolis police officer pressed a knee into his neck - protests against racial injustice in Portland attracted thousands and were largely peaceful, though smaller groups vandalized federal property, local law enforcement buildings, and have clashed violently with local police.

Portland police used tear gas on multiple occasions until a federal court order banned its officers from doing so without declaring a riot. Now, anger is building as federal officers deploy tear gas.

As crowds have swelled again in Portland, most prominent among them now are the Wall of Moms and PDX Dad Pod, self-described parents who have shown up each night since the weekend by the hundreds, wearing yellow T-shirts and bicycle helmets and ski goggles for protection and carrying sunflowers.

Some wielded leaf blowers Monday night to help disperse tear gas as they marched down a major downtown street and joined up with several hundred Black Lives Matter protesters in front of the federal courthouse.

"It's appalling to me, and it's a unifying thing. Nobody wants them here," said Eryn Hoerster, a mother of two children, ages 4 and 8, who was attending her first nighttime protest.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCCLXX. FEDERAL AGENTS, LOCAL STREETS: A 'RED FLAG' IN OREGON

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 21, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1265 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) - Federal officers' actions at protests in Oregon's largest city, hailed by President Donald Trump but done without local consent, are raising the prospect of a constitutional crisis - one that could escalate as weeks of demonstrations find renewed focus in clashes with camouflaged, unidentified agents outside Portland's U.S. courthouse.Body

By GILLIAN FLACCUS

PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) - Federal officers' actions at protests in Oregon's largest city, hailed by President Donald Trump but done without local consent, are raising the prospect of a constitutional crisis - one that could escalate as weeks of demonstrations find renewed focus in clashes with camouflaged, unidentified agents outside Portland's U.S. courthouse.

Demonstrators crowded in front of the U.S. federal courthouse and the city's Justice Center late Monday night, before authorities cleared them out as the loud sound and light of flash bang grenades filled the sky.

State and local authorities, who didn't ask for federal help, are awaiting a ruling in a lawsuit filed late last week. State Attorney General Ellen Rosenblum said in court papers that masked federal officers have arrested people on the street, far from the courthouse, with no probable cause and whisked them away in unmarked cars.

Trump says he plans to send federal agents to other cities, too.

"We're going to have more federal law enforcement, that I can tell you," Trump said Monday. "In Portland, they've done a fantastic job. They've been there three days, and they really have done a fantastic job in a very short period of time."

Constitutional law experts said federal officers' actions in the progressive city are a "red flag" in what could become a test case of states' rights as the Trump administration expands federal policing.

"The idea that there's a threat to a federal courthouse and the federal authorities are going to swoop in and do whatever they want to do without any cooperation and coordination with state and local authorities is extraordinary outside the context of a civil war," said Michael Dorf, a professor of constitutional law at Cornell University.

"It is a standard move of authoritarians to use the pretext of quelling violence to bring in force, thereby prompting a violent response and then bootstrapping the initial use of force in the first place," Dorf said.

Homeland Security was planning to deploy about 150 of its agents to Chicago, according to an official with direct knowledge of the plans who was not authorized to speak publicly and spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity.

They were expected to stay in Chicago at least two months and could be deployed to other locations at some point, the official said. Homeland Security said in a statement that the department does not comment on "allegedly leaked operations."

The ACLU of Oregon has sued in federal court over the agents' presence in Portland, and the organization's Chicago branch said it would similarly oppose a federal presence.

"This is a democracy, not a dictatorship," Oregon Gov. Kate Brown, a Democrat, said on Twitter. "We cannot have secret police abducting people in unmarked vehicles. I can't believe I have to say that to the President of the United States."

The Department of Homeland Security tweeted that federal agents were barricaded in Portland's U.S. courthouse at one point and had lasers pointed at their eyes in an attempt to blind them.

"Portland is rife with violent anarchists assaulting federal officers and federal buildings," the tweet said. "This isn't a peaceful crowd. These are federal crimes."

Top leaders in the U.S. House said Sunday that they were "alarmed" by the Trump administration's tactics in Portland and other cities. They have called on federal inspectors general to investigate.

Trump, who's called the protesters "anarchists and agitators," said the DHS and Justice Department agents are on hand to restore order at the courthouse and help Portland.

Nightly protests, which began after George Floyd's death at the hands of Minneapolis police, have devolved into violence.

The Trump administration's actions run counter to the usual philosophies of American conservatives, who typically treat state and local rights with great sanctity and have long been deeply wary of the federal government - particularly its armed agents - interceding in most situations.

But Trump has shown that his actions don't always reflect traditional conservatism - particularly when politics, and in this case an impending election, are in play.

One prominent Republican, Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky, who is from the libertarian-leaning flank of the party, criticized federal policing.

"We cannot give up liberty for security. Local law enforcement can and should be handling these situations in our cities but there is no place for federal troops or unidentified federal agents rounding people up at will," Paul said in a tweet Monday.

The protests have roiled Portland for 52 nights. Many rallies have attracted thousands and been largely peaceful. But smaller groups of up to several hundred people have focused on federal property and local law enforcement buildings, at times setting fires to police precincts, smashing windows and clashing violently with local police.

Portland police used tear gas on multiple occasions until a federal court order banned its officers from doing so without declaring a riot. Now, concern is growing that the tear gas is being used against demonstrators by federal officers instead.

Anger at the federal presence escalated on July 11, when a protester was hospitalized with critical injuries after a U.S. Marshals Service officer struck him in the head with a less-lethal round. Video shows the man, identified as Donovan LaBella, standing across the street from the officers holding a speaker over his head when he was hit.

Court documents filed in cases against protesters show that federal officers have posted lookouts on the upper stories of the courthouse and have plainclothes officers circulating in the crowd. Court papers in a federal case against a man accused of shining a laser in the eyes of Federal Protective Service agents show that Portland police turned him over to U.S. authorities after federal officers identified him.

Mayor Ted Wheeler, who's has been under fire for his handling of the protests, said on national TV talk shows Sunday that the demonstrations were dwindling before federal officers engaged.

"They are sharply escalating the situation. Their presence here is actually leading to more violence and more vandalism. And it's not helping the situation at all," Wheeler said on CNN's "State of the Union."

"They're not wanted here. We haven't asked them here," Wheeler said. "In fact, we want them to leave."

Indeed, crowds of demonstrators had begun to dwindle a week ago, and some in the liberal city - including Black community leaders - had begun to call for the nightly demonstrations to end.

But by the weekend, the presence of federal troops and Trump's repeated references to Portland as a hotbed of "anarchists" seemed to give a new life to the protests and attract a broader base.

On Sunday night, a crowd estimated at more than 500 people gathered outside the courthouse, including dozens of self-described "moms" who linked arms in front of a chain-link fence outside the courthouse. The demonstration continued into Monday morning.

"It seems clear that there were at least some federal crimes committed here," said Steve Vladeck, a constitutional law professor at the University of Texas. "But the notion that a handful of federal crimes justifies a substantial deployment of federal law enforcement officers ... to show force on the streets is, to my mind, unprecedented."

"Federal law enforcement," Vladeck said, "is not a political prop."

Associated Press writer Colleen Long in Washington contributed to this report.

Follow Gillian Flaccus on Twitter at <http://www.twitter.com/gflaccus>.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCLXXI.

MN HOUSE DECLARES RACISM A PUBLIC HEALTH CRISIS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 21, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 680 wordsByline: Sarah MearhoffHighlight: Nearly two months after George Floyd died while being arrested by Minneapolis police, the Minnesota House of Representatives has declared racism a public health crisis. By a 82-40 vote on Monday, the House passed House Resolution 1, which declares racism a public health crisis and promises that the House will study the issue and pass [...]Body

Nearly two months after George Floyd died while being arrested by Minneapolis police, the Minnesota House of Representatives has declared racism a public health crisis.

By a 82-40 vote on Monday, the House passed House Resolution 1, which declares racism a public health crisis and promises that the House will study the issue and pass legislation in order to "actively participate in the dismantling of racism."

While the Legislature remained gridlocked through Monday evening on proposals for police accountability to address racial disparities in policing, HR 1 was the one piece of legislation addressing racism that made it across the finish line since Floyd died on May 25. Rep. Rena Moran, DFL-St. Paul, said Monday that HR 1 is dedicated to civil rights giant and "the conscious of Congress" U.S. Rep. John Lewis, D-Georgia, who died Friday.

Rep. Ruth Richardson, DFL-Mendota Heights, said on the floor Monday that, "Behind the mask of 'Minnesota nice' lies some of the nation's widest and deepest disparities."

She told the House that economically, Minnesota ranks 50th in the nation for median income equality, and 49th in home ownership equality between Black and white Minnesotans. Even prior to the COVID-19 pandemic - which, itself, has infected and killed a disproportionate number of Black Americans - and resulting economic fallout, she said Black unemployment in Minnesota was double that of white Minnesotans.

Minnesota also ranks at the bottom in the nation for educational achievement gaps between white students and students of color, and Indigenous and Black children are 10- and eight-times more likely to have school disciplinary records than their white peers, respectively.

And in addition to COVID-19's toll on Minnesotans of color, Richardson said health outcomes are vastly different for between white and non-white Minnesotans. In maternal health, Black mothers are three- to four-times more likely to die during pregnancy or childbirth than white mothers. 60 percent of these deaths are preventable, she said. And across all genders and age demographics, Indigenous and Black Minnesotans have the highest excess death rates of all populations in the state.

MN House declares racism a public health crisis

"Racism is literally killing our communities," Richardson said. "Racism is a public health crisis just as COVID-19 is a public health crisis. And just as we as a body confronted the crisis of COVID head-on with reforms and legislation, we too should be confronting the deadly impacts of systemic racism."

Rep. Ron Kresha, R-Little Falls, acknowledged the existence of racism, but said he didn't support Monday's resolution because he said it is "impossible" to encapsulate the broad issue of racism in one resolution. He also said he thought HR 1 divides the House, rather than unites.

"One of the best solutions to combating racism is to have conversations and build shared experiences allowing people to realize the challenges, difficulties and obstructions that exist," he said. "This resolution is forcing an opinion based on words. This resolution is forcing members to decide whether they agree with all the words on a page, rather than how to actually solve the real-world issue."

Moran said that what the resolution does is take the first step in acknowledging the presence of racism in Minnesota and, "If we are going to prevent this racism from living in this state, from living within the state, we must first acknowledge that racism is real."

"It is the root of all of the great disparities we see in our state, within our systems," Moran said. "And we must, and you must, be better listeners of those impacted by racism to legislate and make better opportunities that lift up all of us."

Walz calls special session next week to consider 30-day extension of pandemic powers Minnesota's primary is Tuesday. Here are key east metro races to watch. Voters, GOP lawmakers plan lawsuit over Walz's mask mandate at polling places State Patrol cancels police academy class 'due to lack of funding' Minnesota will close 2 prisons to prepare for budget shortfall. Other agencies face holes, too.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCCLXXII.

READERS WRITE DIVERSITY TRAINING WON'T REBUILD LAKE STREET

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 21, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 6ALength: 1201 wordsBody

RACISM

Rather than focusing on the challenging task of rebuilding the devastated commercial corridors of East Lake Street and West Broadway, the Minneapolis City Council has spent crucial time crafting a resolution declaring racism a "public health emergency" ("Council calls racism health crisis," front page, July 18). Apparently, the council believes that the city's appalling racial disparities could be magically erased if only its citizens would cast off their retrograde attitudes.

But would the council members concede that many Twin Cities suburbs are less racist than their very diverse and progressive city? Because some of the most measurable disparities, such as high school graduation rates, are vastly worse in Minneapolis than in suburbia. But I highly doubt people in those communities are more open-minded and committed to equality than the citizens of Minneapolis.

It would be very hard to find a city in America as racially "woke" as Minneapolis. In some of the wealthiest neighborhoods, Black Lives Matter signs are more numerous than dandelions. Further, I'd bet that more people in those same neighborhoods are currently viewing and discussing the documentary "13th" than binge-watching "Downton Abbey" reruns.

So maybe the Minneapolis City Council should put some effort into attracting businesses to the city that offer living wages, training and upward mobility for residents on the lower rungs of the economic ladder. I know that's not as exciting as taking on the 400-year-old American problem of racism, but economic empowerment will likely improve more lives and knock down more barriers than any diversity training course.

Jerry Anderson, Eagan

MINNEAPOLIS POLICE

So much for Chief Arradondo

READERS WRITE Diversity training won't rebuild Lake Street

In "Reforms could shape chief's fate" (front page, July 20), several City Council members suggest there is a leadership role for Chief Medaria Arradondo in the new department of community safety proposed in the city charter amendment. They are at best misleading the public. The charter amendment is clear. The head of the new department "will have non-law enforcement experience in community safety services, including but not limited to public health and/or restorative justice approaches." Doesn't sound like the chief!

At least Council Member Cam Gordon is honest when he says he doesn't want to turn the charter decision into a referendum on the chief. He knows the chief is popular and he knows the chief will not be the leader if the charter amendment passes. The proponents of the amendment have disqualified the chief as a leader and don't want to admit it - another example of the pervasive continuing political malpractice by the council. Do the hard work of reimagining the police force before asking the public to approve a vacuous, feel-good proposal. The current proposal is a step back, not a way forward.

Hart Kuller, Minneapolis

...

Two observations regarding the potential charter amendment: The council might get more public support if 1) the amendment specifically required the establishment of a police force in a Division of Law Enforcement Services (and perhaps the council could retain the ability to make it as big/small as necessary) and 2) the amendment provided the option for the director of the new department of community safety to have only law-enforcement experience.

I suspect a majority of voters would feel a lot more supportive if the council would simply commit to a functional need for at least a few police officers. And why place a limit on the requirements for the director? The council will have final approval.

The council is making this sell to the public harder than it needs to be.

Tom McDonough, Eagan

...

Council Member Jeremiah Ellison's comments in Saturday's article "1 in 4 Mpls. cops seeks disability" (front page, July 18) are reprehensible. He states that "our police force express a deep resentment of our city."

How does he know this and what proof does he have? Later he states that officers are "making claims of harm that they themselves caused" and "rushing to find their way out of their obligation to our constituents in a myriad of ways." These comments are especially outrageous because he offers no evidence to support his accusations. The anti-police sentiment on the City Council is reckless and reflects a very poor understanding of the dangers of a police officer's job.

Nat Robbins, Minneapolis

ARRESTS

The start of a spy novel? Nope. Just a night in Portland.

READERS WRITE Diversity training won't rebuild Lake Street

Unmarked vans driving silently through the city at night, filled with federal officers in military garb. They pull over, grab people off the street and hustle them away without verbal or written explanation, to say nothing of due process.

Sound like a news report of some foreign, authoritarian government using its secret police to harass and intimidate its citizens? You would be correct, except that it is our government law enforcement operating in our own country. Regardless of your political leanings, the recent Gestapo tactics in Portland, Ore., should send a shiver up your spine ("House leaders 'alarmed' by tactics," July 20). This is not what America stands for, nor how we expect law enforcement to do its job, even if they are Homeland Security agents and U.S. marshals in disguise, and especially if they are operating in a city where the local government does not want them.

Dictatorial and autocratic behavior should be especially unnerving to those of you who find something as basic as having to wear a mask during a pandemic to be a major assault on your personal liberty. Imagine how you would feel if you, or one of your family members, were scooped up by federal "secret police" one night. I encourage you all to write to your state senators, and especially the White House, to protest this gross violation of our American civil rights and our personal freedom.

George K. Atkins, Minneapolis

ADVICE

If there's a problem, just say so

A reader generously shared "the best advice" she ever got ("But do you have a proposal?" Readers Write, July 17). Her former boss told her to "never show up with a problem unless you could offer a solution." Well, my experience is that's the worst advice ever, and if her boss worked for me, he would be due for a serious talk.

I was well into my career as a product development and design leader when I learned we had a problem with one of our medical products. I urged our quality assurance manager to bring it to the management committee so they would be fully informed and could take appropriate action - a recall, a notice, whatever. He refused, saying he was under orders to never bring a problem to them without offering a solution. (I know this sounds like a bad joke, but, sorry, there is no laugh line at the end.) Of course I just went around him.

Just think, a medical product with a problem and letting it proliferate among doctors and patients until it's comfortable enough to confront. A down-home analogy: Do announce that the potluck Tater Tot casserole is burning, even if you don't know how to turn off the crock pot. Simple stuff. Common sense. It applies across the board, from a flat tire to police misconduct.

Ron Carlson, Lake St. Croix Beach

We want to hear from you. Send us your thoughts here.

Load-Date: July 21, 2020

Family wants charges in Lake Street pawnshop shooting; prosecutors seek witnesses

ARTICLE MCCLXXIII. FAMILY WANTS CHARGES IN LAKE STREET PAWNSHOP SHOOTING; PROSECUTORS SEEK WITNESSES

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 21, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 510 words

Byline: The Associated Press

Highlight: The family of a man fatally shot at a Minneapolis pawnshop during protests over the death of George Floyd demanded charges in his death Tuesday. Saying they want justice, family members of Calvin Horton Jr. held a news conference the same day that Hennepin County Attorney Mike Freeman said prosecutors need to know what happened [...]

Body

The family of a man fatally shot at a Minneapolis pawnshop during protests over the death of George Floyd demanded charges in his death Tuesday.

Saying they want justice, family members of Calvin Horton Jr. held a news conference the same day that Hennepin County Attorney Mike Freeman said prosecutors need to know what happened in the minutes surrounding the fatal shooting of Horton on the evening of May 27. The shooting happened two days after a handcuffed Floyd, who was Black, died after a white Minneapolis police officer pressed his knee against Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes.

Horton was shot in the torso in or near Cadillac Pawn while protests over Floyd's death began to turn violent with gunfire, arson, and people breaking into businesses and stealing whatever they could carry.

The Lake Street pawnshop owner was arrested the night of the shooting, was held in the Hennepin County Jail for several days and released pending further investigation.

Horton's family on Tuesday joined civil rights attorney Ben Crump, who represents most of Floyd's family members, and activists at a news conference demanding charges against the pawn shop owner.

Crump said Horton's family has gotten "no answers" from government officials about his death, despite dozens of calls. Horton, who would have turned 44 on Tuesday, left behind his mother and seven children, including 8-year-old twin sons.

"His life matters to all of his children, each and every one of them, his entire family. So we're here to declare that Calvin Horton's life matters," Crump said, before leading people in a chant of "Calvin Horton's life matters."

Family wants charges in Lake Street pawnshop shooting; prosecutors seek witnesses

"We're absolutely heartbroken," Horton's daughter, Cadaezhah Horton, 20, said. "And we're left to feel as if we're the ones in prison. We want justice for my dad, and we aren't going to stop until we see it."

"The only thing I want is justice," said Horton's mother, Mae Roberts. "Nothing is being done for my son."

Freeman said that so far authorities have only one witness who saw part of the encounter and have not found any surveillance camera video showing what happened.

"We need the help of anyone who was in or around Cadillac Pawn at the time of the shooting," Freeman said. "We need to know what happened several minutes before the shooting and then the shooting itself."

The scene was chaotic that night, with many people in and around the pawnshop, Freeman said. Some of those people pelted police officers as they tried to render first aid to Horton and attacked them with objects as they tried to investigate the crime scene, he added. The officers retreated and investigators were unable to safely return until the next day.

Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Deal reached on police reform

ARTICLE MCCLXXIV.

DEAL REACHED ON POLICE REFORM

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 21, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 820 wordsByline: BRIANA BIERSCHBACH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The Legislature reached a deal on a sweeping package of police accountability measures Monday night following two months of touch-and-go negotiations after the killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody.

The deal, one of the most substantial changes to the state's criminal justice system in years, includes a statewide ban on chokeholds and neck restraints - such as the one used on Floyd - and a prohibition on warrior-style training for officers. It enhances data collection around deadly force encounters, requires officers to intervene and creates a new state unit to investigate such cases. The proposal boosts funding for crisis intervention training, creates a panel of expert arbitrators to handle police misconduct cases and establishes incentives for officers to live in the communities they police.

Final votes were expected late Monday or early Tuesday.

The hard-fought agreement came after weeks of legislative impasse that had already derailed another special session in June - one that was initially called to review Gov. Tim Walz's extension of his emergency powers. But the continuing outrage over Floyd's killing kept up the pressure on the only divided legislature in the nation to find common ground when Walz extended the state of emergency again in July.

"We've never stopped working on this, whether we were in session or out of session. That's something we all felt was important," said Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, R-East Gull Lake.

Democrats' original policing proposal went further, including provisions to restore voting rights for felons and giving the responsibility for prosecuting deadly force cases to the attorney general's office. Republicans in the Senate said they insisted that the final deal wouldn't adopt any language being considered in Minneapolis to dismantle police departments, despite final deal wouldn't adopt any language being considered in Minneapolis to dismantle police departments, despite the fact that there was no provision in the DFL bill to do so.

Deal reached on police reform

They pushed deal-making and votes late into the night Monday, after Senate Republican imposed a deadline of midnight to either pass a deal or go home empty-handed.

"Some of us believe that you can always do more, but members this is a good bill," said Rep. Rena Moran, DFL-St Paul. "This is a beginning, this is not the end."

But in the push to get a deal on policing passed in time, other issues on legislators' to-do list fell to the wayside. A $1.35 billion package of construction projects failed in the House early Tuesday morning, after Republicans in the House criticized the package for spending too much and including too little of their input. Bonding bills require a supermajority to pass in both chambers, meaning leaders need buy-in from members of the minority parties.

The House and Senate majority "caucuses and the governor's office negotiated it without us, and that is not a good solution to earning votes from our caucus," said House Minority Leader Kurt Daudt, R-Crown. But he suggested that lawmakers might have another chance in August, when the Legislature is expected to return to review another potential extension of Walz's emergency powers.

Even as legislators worked furiously behind the scenes to strike a deal on policing, the two parties' contrasting priorities on racial disparities and the pandemic were evident throughout the day Monday. House Democrats passed a resolution declaring racism a public health crisis, manifesting in health, economic, educational and other disparities between Black and white Minnesotans.

"The COVID-19 pandemic and the senseless murder of George Floyd have shined a light on the historical and contemporary injustices that are still embedded in our society," said Ruth Richardson, DFL-Mendota Heights, the sponsor of the resolution.

Meanwhile, Republicans in the Senate pushed their own symbolic resolution urging Walz to allow school districts to make their own decisions on if - and how - they should reopen for classes in the fall. The administration has said it will make decisions on whether to resume in-person classes in the fall or continue with distance learning or a hybrid of the two.

"One person cannot know the entire state of Minnesota," said Sen. Carla Nelson, R-Rochester. "Every school building, over 2,000 school buildings, over 300 school districts, over 100 charter schools, one person cannot determine how best students can be educated during this time of pandemic."

Lawmakers are facing another automatic special session in mid-August if Walz chooses to extend his emergency powers for another 30 days.

Briana Bierschbach · 651-925-5042 Twitter: @bbierschbach

SWEEPING CHANGES

More funding for crisis intervention training.

Statewide ban on chokeholds and neck restraints.

Prohibition on warrior-style training for officers.

New state unit to investigate cases of deadly force.

Incentives for officers to live where they police.

Deal reached on police reform

Load-Date: July 21, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCLXXV.

FAMILY OF MAN SLAIN DURING RIOT GETS LAWYER

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 21, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 338 wordsByline: DAVID CHANEN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Man was shot in Mpls. by pawnshop owner.Body

Civil rights attorney Ben Crump announced Monday that he is representing the family of a man shot to death by a pawnshop owner in Minneapolis in the aftermath of the officer-involved homicide of George Floyd.

Calvin Horton was shot outside Cadillac Pawn by John Rieple after two days of arson, looting and protesting that followed Floyd's killing by police on May 25. Horton's was the only death resulting from the civil unrest following Floyd's death.

Rieple, of Galesville, Wis., was arrested but hasn't been charged. He said that Horton was a looter, and the case remains under investigation, said Police Department spokesman John Elder.

Neither police nor county prosecutors have publicly described Horton as a looter, though they acknowledge that it was one of the theories they are investigating.

Horton's family and community activists scheduled a news conference for Tuesday afternoon in front of the pawnshop at 1538 E. Lake Street. A vigil will follow from 6 to 8 p.m. The family will be demanding that charges be filed against Rieple and that police release any surveillance of the incident.

In a statement, Crump said family and activists have video from social media showing that Rieple was safely in his business while shooting out into the crowd. Horton died of shotgun wounds of the chest and upper extremities, according to the Hennepin County Medical Examiner.

Crump also represents Floyd's family. Four Minneapolis police officers have been charged in his death.

Horton's 44th birthday would have been Tuesday. A GoFundMe campaign has been established to help support Horton's seven children.

Horton lived in the Twin Cities, but had no permanent address, according to family members. He was unemployed and received Social Security disability payments, they said.

Family of man slain during riot gets lawyer

Rieple started Cadillac Pawn in 1990. At one time, he owned a pawnshop and a jewelry store in Winona and, in 2002, a business called Mainstream Firearms and Marine, also in Winona. He also once operated a pawnshop in La Crosse.

David Chanen · 612-673-4465

Load-Date: July 21, 2020

End of Document

Homeless camp cleared away

ARTICLE MCCLXXVI.

HOMELESS CAMP CLEARED AWAY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 21, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 798 wordsByline: MIGUEL OTAROLA; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: About 20 people were arrested as one of two sites in Powderhorn Park was shut down.Body

Police and heavy equipment cleared out what was left of the east homeless encampment at Minneapolis' Powderhorn Park, forcing campers to pack up and find a new place to live.

Park Board Superintendent Al Bangoura issued an eviction notice to the encampment Friday, just days after the board voted to cut down on the number of tent camps in local parks. The notice gave campers 72 hours to leave, parks spokeswoman Dawn Sommers said.

All but two to three campers had left the encampment Monday, with the holdouts refusing to leave, Sommers said. A couple dozen people showed up as the site was being cleared and about 20 people were arrested, she said.

The site had become a source of contention in the neighborhood. Homeowners across the street from the park were alarmed and infuriated by numerous reports of sexual assaults, drug use and fights at the eastern encampment. Volunteers who were a constant presence at the camp had pulled back in recent days and had begun taking campers who no longer felt comfortable there to other locations.

Last week, the Park Board voted to allow Bangoura to disband any encampment that posed a documented risk to health and safety, as outlined by an executive order passed by Gov. Tim Walz for the coronavirus pandemic.

"This has just risen to an unacceptable level," Sommers said Wednesday.

The first residents of the camp migrated to Powderhorn from their shelter in a former Sheraton hotel in the aftermath of the riots following the killing of George Floyd by police. As the encampment grew on the northwest corner of the park, some moved to form another on the east side.

There were about 310 tents at the eastern encampment near its peak two weeks ago, and 150 as of last week, according to the Park Board.

As of 5 p.m. Monday, no tents were left, Sommers said.

Homeless camp cleared away

Earlier in the day, the remaining residents were bringing down their tents and tossing their belongings into shopping carts and wheelbarrows. Some packed their bags into cars. Others mingled in the shade.

Connie Dunkley doused her head in water next to her partner, Mudryll Holley, and their belongings. Holley was blinded and paralyzed in a car accident three years ago, so Dunkley disassembled and packed everything by herself.

"I didn't want nobody to help me, because I want to make sure I know where everything is when I go to another site and unpack," she said. She did not want to say where they were going.

The pair, homeless for the past three months, had lived in Powderhorn for two weeks. Dunkley said it was sad to see and hear of people overdosing, sexually assaulting others and fighting over items.

"It got very bad," she said. "We were able to keep to ourselves. We weren't bothering nobody, nobody was bothering us."

A cleanup crew contracted by the Park Board was at the park Monday picking up needles and other trash. One crew member used a skid-steer to tear down a cluster of tents and toss them into a garbage truck. They would do a more thorough sweep of the area Tuesday, Sommers said.

Police officers monitored from the sidelines, and a bus waited by the curb to move people out. A teepee that had once stood on the grounds as a symbol of Native American land was nowhere to be seen.

Many of the encampment's residents had already moved out to other city parks or other shelter.

"This was about as peaceful as I could expect," said Park Board Commissioner Londel French, who was at the park. "We were asking people to leave for a week, almost a whole week. Nobody just found out today they would be moving."

Now volunteers or nonprofits will have to apply for permits to establish encampments, and the Park Board will review the applications based on select criteria. There will be up to 20 designated encampments with up to 25 tents each, according to the board's resolution.

People were already having difficulty certifying existing sites; volunteer Kat Eng said an attempt to permit one in Logan Park was turned down by the Park Board because it was near a school, and that campers would also get an eviction notice.

The encampment on the northwest side of Powderhorn Park, where a man was shot last week, was not disbanded.

Douglas Ellis was one of the last holdouts at the eastern encampment. Homeless for six months after moving back to Minneapolis from Grand Portage, he had been at Powderhorn for about two weeks.

The encampment had plenty of food, camping gear and other donated items, but it was still accompanied by violent crime and drug use. There was another one, by 26th Street and 13th Avenue, that he thought he would check out next.

He never expected life at Powderhorn would last for long.

"They just made us leave, that's all," he said. "Like every other place we've been to."

Homeless camp cleared away

Staff writer Ryan Faircloth contributed to this report. Miguel Otárola · 612-673-4753

Load-Date: July 21, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCLXXVII.

HONOR LEWIS AND PASS VOTING BILL

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 21, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 6ALength: 613 wordsHighlight: Senate should back and Trump should sign a renamed John R. Lewis Voting Rights Act of 2020.Body

A 65-foot mural in Atlanta reflects the larger-than-life legacy of U.S. Rep. John Lewis, the civil-rights icon who died of pancreatic cancer on Saturday.

In many places across the country, flags were flown at half-staff for the man who made "good trouble" advocating for a righteous cause. On Capitol Hill, Lewis' congressional colleagues honored the Georgia Democrat on Monday, with lawmakers across party lines lining up to televise or tweet their condolences and respect. From the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue, President Donald Trump called Lewis a "civil rights hero." And soon, an announcement of funeral plans will further detail how Congress, and by extension the country, will pay homage to the life and legacy of the social-justice giant.

But beyond the remembrances, what his fellow lawmakers, the president, and everyday citizens shouldn't forget is that Lewis didn't rest on his well-deserved laurels but forever fought to advance them, and that his life's work of advocating for equality is not complete.

To take another step, the Senate and Trump should support the Voting Rights Advancement Act, which the Democrat-controlled House passed in 2019.

The Senate, with Republicans in the majority, has failed to act on the bill. Trump hasn't backed it either, and in fact at every turn seems to want to backtrack on the progress Lewis and the other giants of his generation fought so hard to achieve.

On Sunday, Trump cast doubt on whether he would accept the results of November's election. In an interview with Fox News' Chris Wallace, Trump said, "You don't know until you see," seeming to hold his options open on the efficacy of the election. His criticism has focused on mail-in voting - an election method he and his family, as well as several states, have used with no evidence of any significant meddling.

Particularly during a pandemic, where voters and poll workers may literally have to risk illness or even death in order to exercise their constitutional right, this common-sense solution should be available to all Americans.

Honor Lewis and pass voting bill

And beyond the current coronavirus crisis, the state of voting rights is in a crisis itself, with persistent, pernicious efforts at disenfranchisement, especially toward people of color - a disgrace at any time, but especially now, amid nationwide protests over the killing of George Floyd and the nationwide mourning for Lewis.

Many Democratic lawmakers have embraced the idea of renaming the voting-rights bill the John R. Lewis Voting Rights Act of 2020. "That's the way to do it," Rep. James Clyburn, D.-S.C., said on CNN on Sunday. Clyburn, a Black lawmaker who has built upon the bravery of Lewis, added that "words may be powerful, but deeds are lasting."

Powerful words from two previous presidents - one Republican, one Democrat - speak to the need for deeds to continue. Former President George W. Bush said in a statement that "America can best honor John's memory by continuing his journey toward liberty and justice for all."

America "is a constant work in progress," former President Barack Obama said in a statement. "What gives each new generation purpose is to take up the unfinished work of the last and carry it further - to speak out for what's right, to challenge an unjust status quo, and to imagine a better world."

Thanks to Lewis, Obama concluded, "we now all have our marching orders - to keep believing in the possibility of remaking this country we love until it lives up to its full promise."

America will not achieve its full promise unless it ensures voting rights. It should do so in a bill rightfully renamed for Lewis, which would truly honor a man who seemed to stand as tall as that banner in Atlanta.

Load-Date: July 21, 2020

Proposal would end police staffing rule

ARTICLE MCCLXXVIII.

PROPOSAL WOULD END POLICE STAFFING RULE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 21, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3B

Length: 421 words

Byline: LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: Charter Commission to collect feedback at Monday public hearing.

Body

The Minneapolis Charter Commission on Monday advanced its own proposal for changing the city's Police Department: eliminating the minimum staffing requirement, but otherwise leaving the charter intact.

The move sets the stage for competing ballot questions in November, as the city debates how to remake policing in Minneapolis after George Floyd's death.

The city charter, which serves as its constitution, currently says the city must maintain a police department and the council must "fund a police force of at least 0.0017 employees per resident."

During a special meeting Monday afternoon, Commissioner Al Giraud-Isaacson unveiled a proposal that would delete that minimum funding language from the charter.

"The charter is not a place, in my opinion, for deciding how large city departments should be," Giraud-Isaacson said.

The proposal would still keep the requirement to have a police department, but would give the mayor and City Council wider latitude in determining its size, he said.

The court-appointed commission voted 14-1 to set a public hearing to collect feedback on the measure. The hearing will begin at 5 p.m. Monday.

The only person who voted against that effort was Commissioner Dan Cohen, who said he thought the Charter Commission has a "legal and a moral obligation to uphold the strong Minneapolis police force."

The commission could decide unilaterally to send the measure to voters. The City Council and mayor would decide how the question appears on the ballot, but they cannot change the amendment itself.

The commission faces an Aug. 21 deadline for adding measures to the Nov. 3 ballot.

Proposal would end police staffing rule

The commission is also reviewing a proposal introduced by five City Council members. The proposal would remove the requirement to have a police department and replace it with a community safety department - which may or may not include licensed police officers. Those staffing decisions would be made by the mayor and council in separate processes.

The commission could issue a recommendation on whether that proposal should head to the ballot, or offer its own substitute proposal. The City Council would not be required to follow the commission's recommendation.

The commission could also decide to take an additional 90 days to review the measure, preventing it from heading to the ballot this year. A public hearing on the council's proposal is set to begin at 6 p.m. Tuesday.

Depending on the actions of the commission and City Council, both proposals could end up on the November ballot.

Liz Navratil · 612-673-4994

Load-Date: July 21, 2020

ARTICLE MCCLXXIX.

PRO'S BUSY SUMMER IS PANDEMIC CASUALTY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 21, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 6CLength: 468 wordsByline: JERRY ZGODA; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Minnesota PGA section Player of the Year in 2019 for the 17th time in his long career, Edinburgh USA pro Don Berry earned an exemption into this week's 3M Open because of that.

He also had hoped to play in the Senior PGA Championship, the U.S. Senior Open and the PGA Professional Championship that qualifies its best for the PGA Championship in August in San Francisco.

Then the coronavirus pandemic hit and the Senior PGA and Senior Open were canceled as was the PGA Professional Championship not once but twice.

The PGA Tour also significantly rescheduled its season and adjusted its qualifying rules. It limited the number of Monday qualifiers from four to two and rescinded an exemption for the local PGA section's best player so players with limited tour-card status had a better chance to qualify each week.

Berry understands, but ...

"It's still a bummer," said Berry 58, who has 24 state major title and 250-some tournaments overall. "It was going to be a fun summer, but it hasn't turned out that way."

Berry played in the 1992 U.S. Open, the 1998 Hawaiian Open and four PGA Championships, including 2002 at Hazeltine National Golf Club when he made the cut and played with Tom Watson on Sunday in the final round. He also played the 3M Championship on the Champions Tour four times.

He could have attempted to still qualify for the 3M Open but declined. He said he'll try to qualify for the PGA Champions' Sanford International in Sioux Falls, S.D., in September if that is played.

Hunting birdies and eagles

Tommy Fleetwood, Paul Casey, Will Gordon and defending 3M Open champion Matthew Wolff will play in a nine-hole scramble for charity on TPC Twin Cities' back nine streamed live from 2 to 4 p.m. Wednesday.

Pro's busy summer is pandemic casualty

They'll be seeking birdies, eagles and aces to benefit Twin Cities organizations - including the Lake Street Council, Urban Ventures and YWCAs of Minneapolis and St. Paul - working in areas impacted by the pandemic and unrest that followed the killing of George Floyd. Birdies are worth $50,000, eagles $100,000 and hole-in-ones $150,000.

There's also five team challenges worth $50,000 each. Actor Josh Duhamel and Viking Kyle Rudolph will play their parts in an event carried on PGA Tour Live and simulcast on social-media channels for Golf Channel, GolfTV and PGA Tour.

Etc.

- Featured pairings for the first two rounds of the 3M Open include threesomes of Fleetwood, Dustin Johnson and Tony Finau; Wolff, Max Homa and Branden Grace; Bubba Watson, Pat Perez and Casey; and Brooks Koepka, Keith Mitchell and Charles Howell III. Tee times will be announced Tuesday.

- Jake Kneen from White Lake, Mich., and Calgary's Aaron Crawford each shot 8-under-par 63s on Monday at Victory Links to qualify for this week's event. Both are on the Canadian Mackenzie Tour. Ted Purdy also was added to the field.

Load-Date: July 21, 2020

St. Paul weighs $9.2M cut to police

ARTICLE MCCLXXX.

ST. PAUL WEIGHS $9.2M CUT TO POLICE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 21, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 848 wordsByline: EMMA NELSON; LIZ SAWYER; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The proposed cut would mean eliminating jobs, Chief Todd Axtell said.Body

St. Paul Mayor Melvin Carter has asked his Police Department to trim more than $9 million from its 2021 budget.

In an e-mail to employees, St. Paul Police Chief Todd Axtell said the proposed $9.2 million cut will mean eliminating jobs, both sworn officers and civilians, "at all ranks."

"I know this is a hit to our collective soul, especially given the crime trends we're seeing, the ever-increasing calls for service and the needs of the city," Axtell wrote. "I shared with the Mayor my disappointment and urged him to reconsider."

Axtell's e-mail was first reported by KSTP. In an interview Monday, Carter said city leaders haven't made any final decisions on the proposed 2021 budget. His annual budget address is scheduled for next month, and community members will have an opportunity to give feedback online.

"This economy is going to require us to make some really hard decisions, because we can only spend the money that we have," Carter said. "And frankly, I anticipate bringing forward a budget that I would likely never propose under any other circumstances."

Every year, the mayor asks each department to develop a plan to meet proposed budget targets - an exercise that often includes figuring out how to make cuts. This year, St. Paul is already facing a multimillion-dollar 2020 budget shortfall due to unexpected expenses and revenue losses related to the COVID-19 pandemic.

City leaders will have to figure out how to fill that gap while also mapping out a lean 2021 budget. They are considering a range of cost-saving measures, including continuing discretionary spending and hiring freezes, leaving positions vacant as employees leave or retire and tapping emergency reserves.

Council President Amy Brendmoen said in an interview that the mayor's office is also negotiating a salary freeze in union contracts, which would save money on salary costs across departments. The mayor's goal is to keep the 2021 property tax levy increase as low as possible, which the council would support, she said.

St. Paul weighs $9.2M cut to police

For police, the belt-tightening could mean unprecedented layoffs of active duty officers - a measure city officials have avoided for more than 20 years.

"It's uncharted territory for us," said St. Paul Police Federation President Paul Kuntz, who called the $9 million figure "staggering" for one department to absorb. "It makes everybody less safe. It puts the citizens at risk. And it puts cops, who are asked to do more and more with less and less, at risk."

Per the police union's contract, any reduction in staffing would be based on seniority, meaning that younger and more diverse officers from recent recruiting classes would be among the first to go.

The potential cuts come amid a troubling surge in gun violence in the capital city, where reported firearm discharges have more than doubled when compared to this time last year. The first two weeks of June were particularly violent, as shots-fired calls quintupled from 2019.

At least 110 people have been shot in St. Paul this year, including 18 fatally. Homicides are on track to surpass 2019's record high in shooting deaths.

The Police Department has a more than $100 million budget this year - the largest of any city department - including about 780 full-time employees. Carter cut five sworn officer positions from the budget in 2020, after adding nine in 2019.

The City Council also approved a $1.7 million community-first public safety budget - which Carter proposed in November after several violent months that brought the city's homicide total to a 25-year high - but the programs it's intended to pay for have been slow to roll out.

The proposed cut comes as people across the country, spurred by George Floyd's killing in May by Minneapolis police, are calling for local governments to defund or dismantle police departments. But while the Minneapolis City Council is moving forward with a proposed charter amendment that would allow major changes to their city's police force, St. Paul council members have shown little appetite for doing the same.

Brendmoen said cuts to the police budget won't necessarily mean that services will disappear - rather, they might move to another department or take a different form. Police IT work could move into the Technology and Communications department, she said, or routine traffic stops could be done by someone who's not a sworn officer.

"I know the police have said to all of us that they can't do it all either," she said, "so I think that they would welcome some relief as well."

In his e-mail, Axtell said he's hopeful that the final 2021 budget won't include the full $9.2 million in cuts to his department. He noted that initial projections often change, that residents can weigh in and that the City Council will approve the final budget.

"But I can't make any promises, other than to support you and to be a tireless advocate for our department and the safety of the city," Axtell wrote. "Don't lose hope. Instead, remember that I believe in each and every one of you. Keep doing what others won't. And know that I'm so damn proud of you."

St. Paul weighs $9.2M cut to police

Emma Nelson · 612-673-4509.

Load-Date: July 21, 2020

End of Document

Taxi driver fatally shot trying to halt crime

ARTICLE MCCLXXXI.

TAXI DRIVER FATALLY SHOT TRYING TO HALT CRIME

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 21, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 4BLength: 255 wordsByline: RYAN FAIRCLOTH; LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Minneapolis homicide detectives searched Monday for a man they say fatally shot a taxi driver who had confronted two men breaking into his cab, officials said.

The victim was shot about 4:30 p.m. 1000 block of 22nd Street East.

The surrounding community has been rattled by violence in recent days, including the slaying of a man last week that sent an area hospital into lockdown and a double shooting at nearby Peavey Park.

On Monday, police responded to the scene after receiving multiple 911 calls about shots fired in the area. When they arrived, they found the victim unconscious and without a pulse. They resuscitated him before he was taken to a nearby hospital with "grave injuries," according to MPD spokesman John Elder.

The man, whose age and identity weren't released, died some time later at HCMC, Elder said.

A preliminary police investigation determined that the victim had come upon the two men as they tried to break into his taxi and chased after them as they fled on foot. As the suspects fled, one of them allegedly turned back and shot at the victim, striking him once.

It was the city's 36th homicide of 2020 - twice as many as it had at this time last year, according to Police Department records. That tally doesn't include the death of a man, whose charred body was found in the wreckage of a South Side pawnshop that burned nearly two months ago in the riots that followed George Floyd's death.

No arrests had been made as of Monday evening in the fatal shooting of the taxi driver.

RYAN FAIRCLOTH AND LIBOR JANY

Load-Date: July 21, 2020

ARTICLE MCCLXXXII.

THE END OF A VENERABLE STRIP MALL

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 21, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 973 wordsByline: NICOLE NORFLEET; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Midway Shopping Center's demise was accelerated by looting, fire after Floyd killing.Body

Mary Lau wasn't sure what she would keep and what she would throw away. Sporting a baseball cap and mask late last week, Lau helped direct workers as they carried out what remained in her closed Peking Garden restaurant.

For about 15 years, Lau has served authentic Chinese dishes out of a corner of the Midway Shopping Center in St. Paul, but she and other tenants are being forced to move out after the buildings were damaged by looting and fire following the Memorial Day killing of George Floyd and the landlord's subsequent termination of their leases.

It is an abrupt end for the Midway Shopping Center, which for more than 60 years has served customers at the busy intersection of University and Snelling avenues.

The strip mall was already on its way out, part of a plan to redevelop the land into a mixed-use district following the opening of Allianz Field.

Still, for the diverse array of tenants and neighborhood advocates, the Midway Shopping Center's demise marks the end of an era for a retail destination that has been a community linchpin.

"It was perfect for us," Lau said, about her restaurant space. "It is so sad to see it disappear."

Fences and a dumpster blocked the main entrance of the former Peking Garden on Thursday. A table covered with ruined chair covers and sashes sat outside of its boarded-up windows as tubs of wrapped plates and cups were piled up waiting for a destination. Workers had to toil in the dark since the power to the building had been shut off.

When the spread of the coronavirus forced restaurants to shut their doors to diners in the spring, Peking Garden continued to stay open for takeout. Lau had big plans to fully reopen, but Floyd's death at the hands of Minneapolis Police ignited protests and riots throughout the Twin Cities that left hundreds of businesses damaged.

The end of a venerable strip mall

Peking Garden sustained smoke damage, but Lau said she thought she would make repairs. Late last month, the strip mall's New York-based property owner, RD Management LLC, informed tenants their leases were being terminated and they would have to be out of their spaces by mid-July. Some business owners said they have been granted extensions.

Thien Do, owner of Thien's Cajun Boiling Seafood, had been attracted to open his restaurant at the Midway Shopping Center in 2018 because of the diversity of the area and the central location. He emigrated four years ago from Vietnam to further pursue his passion for food.

"It was always my dream to come to the United States and open a seafood restaurant," Do said.

His small restaurant had suffered minor smoke damage. On Monday, he was back at his cleaned-out restaurant and tying up loose ends. Do said he is in search of a new site.

"It's so all of a sudden," he said. "We don't know where to go."

The Midway Shopping Center has been a melting pot of businesses since it was built at the site of old streetcar barns. The $6 million shopping center was advertised as a "complete one stop retail center" with "everything you need or want."

The 40-store center even had a map depicting its strategic location between Minneapolis and St. Paul.

Stores that called the strip mall home then included G.C. Murphy Co., Walgreen drugstore, the Piggly Wiggly supermarket (Klein Super Markets) and F.W. Woolworth Co.

While large chains such as Foot Locker and Family Dollar have more recently occupied prominent spots at the center, a more diverse set of small-business owners such as Do and Lau also moved in over the years, a reflection of the continued growth of minority-owned businesses along University Avenue.

The Applebaum family has been a staple of the Midway Shopping Center for decades. The family ran its Big Top Liquors flagship at the strip mall for more than 40 years. Twin Cities grocer and family patriarch Sid Applebaum founded Rainbow Foods and operated one of the grocery stores at the center.

"We are committed to this corner," said Nancy Rosenberg, one of Applebaum's daughters who is co-owner of Big Top. "This is the corner where we built our business."

A couple of years ago, Big Top moved from its longstanding location to the former Perkins restaurant to make way for Allianz Field. During the riots, Big Top was heavily damaged by fire, and the family is now looking at options including finding a new location.

"It was a very sad way to end this era," Rosenberg said.

The Snelling and University intersection, one of the busiest in the metro area, sees about 59,000 vehicles and is close to a Green Line light-rail stop.

"It's done so much for the business community," said Chad Kulas, executive director of the Midway Chamber of Commerce, about the shopping center. "It's done so much for residents."

Kulas reflected on shopping at the center for groceries and attending events at the Midpointe Event Center on the backside of the mall.

The end of a venerable strip mall

"This is more than a shopping center," said City Council Member Dai Thao, who has been in contact with some of the tenants. "This is a destination."

While Thao said the timing for tenants who have to move out is "unfortunate," he said the new plan for the space is a big opportunity for the city.

Parts of the shopping center, including the Rainbow Foods and Midway Pro Bowl, were demolished in 2017 to make room for Allianz Field.

The future vision for the shopping-center site and land around the soccer stadium includes a massive mixed-use development with office, retail, residences, entertainment, hotel and green space. In the fall, a groundbreaking is scheduled for retail space and two apartment towers.

Despite the circumstances, departing tenants of the Midway Shopping Center said they would remain positive.

"I think life will still go on," Lau said, adding she does not know where she will reopen. "I'm sure when we go, we'll come back stronger."

Nicole Norfleet · 612-673-4495

Twitter: @nicolenorfleet

SEE MICROFILM OR PDF FOR MAP.

Load-Date: July 21, 2020

ARTICLE MCCLXXXIII.

TRUMP'S SHOW OF FEDERAL FORCE SPARKING ALARM IN CITIES

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 21, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1331 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: WASHINGTON (AP) - President Donald Trump is using the Department of Homeland Security in unprecedented ways as he tries to bolster his law and order credentials by making a heavy-handed show of force in cities around the nation in the lead-up to the November elections.

Body

By COLLEEN LONG, BEN FOX and JILL COLVIN

WASHINGTON (AP) - President Donald Trump is using the Department of Homeland Security in unprecedented ways as he tries to bolster his law and order credentials by making a heavy-handed show of force in cities around the nation in the lead-up to the November elections.

His plan to deploy federal agents to Chicago and perhaps other Democratic-run cities where violence is spiking represents Trump's latest effort to use an agency that was created after the Sept. 11 attacks to thwart terrorists to instead supplement local law enforcement in ways that bolster his reelection chances.

Trump has already deployed Homeland Security agents to Portland on the grounds of protecting federal buildings from protesters, drawing intense criticism from local leaders who say the federal presence has only exacerbated tensions rather than promoting public safety.

"This is precisely the type of tyrannical deployment of power that the Founding Fathers were specifically worried about," said Jeffrey A. Engel, director of Center for Presidential History at Southern Methodist University.

Under Trump's latest plan, yet to be publicly announced, about 150 Homeland Security Investigations agents would go to Chicago to help local law enforcement deal with a spike in crime, according to an official with direct knowledge of the plans who spoke on condition of anonymity because they weren't authorized to speak publicly.

Those agents, who are generally used to investigate human trafficking, drugs and weapons smuggling, are expected to stay in Chicago at least two months, according to the official. It's not clear exactly when they would arrive or how their mission would play out, but they would work under the Justice Department.

Trump's show of federal force sparking alarm in cities

White House Press Secretary Kayleigh McEnany said no one had been sent to Chicago yet. She added, "The bottom line is that this president stands with law and order, which leads to peace."

In a tweet Sunday, Trump blamed local leaders for a growing spate of violence in cities like Chicago that has left dozens dead, including young children. He added a dire warning that "The Radical Left Democrats, who totally control Biden, will destroy our Country as we know it," referring to Democratic rival Joe Biden.

Trump has also intervened in other cities, including Washington, D.C. In the protests following the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis, Trump deployed U.S. National Guard troops and federal law enforcement officials from agencies including U.S. Customs and Border Protection and the Drug Enforcement Administration to patrol the city.

The show of force came to a head when federal authorities in riot gear dispersed crowds from Lafayette Square across from the White House, where the president then posed with a Bible in front of a church.

The Chicago plan appears to be an extension of a separate operation in which the administration sent more than 100 federal law enforcement officers to Kansas City, Missouri, to help quell a record rise in violence after the shooting death of a young boy there. The Justice Department doesn't have the manpower to surge agents to high-crime areas, so it is borrowing from Homeland Security.

Chicago Mayor Lori Lightfoot was at first highly resistant, but her tone changed after she and members of her administration, along with Police Superintendent David Brown, talked with officials about the government's plan.

"I've been very clear that we welcome actual partnership," Lightfoot said. "But we do not welcome dictatorship. We do not welcome authoritarianism, and we do not welcome unconstitutional arrest and detainment of our residents. That is something I will not tolerate."

The comments from Lightfoot, a former federal prosecutor, slightly deescalated a days-long war of words with Trump over violent crime in the city, which has seen 414 homicides this year, compared with 275 during the same period in 2019.

Throughout his presidency, Trump has leaned on Homeland Security to carry out his political objectives, including cracking down on illegal immigration and slowing legal immigration applications. The 240,000-person agency manages border security as well as natural disasters and the Transportation Security Administration.

But with the border largely shuttered because of the coronavirus and the number of illegal crossings plummeting, Trump is now using the department to combat crime and demonstrations demanding justice and racial equality.

While the protests have largely been peaceful, Trump and his allies in conservative media have portrayed the cities as out of control as he tries to contrast himself with Biden and make the case to voters - especially the suburban women who turned against Republicans in the 2018 midterms - that failing to elect him for a second term will lead to lawlessness.

Critics say the federal forces have stoked tensions, creating new images of violence that could lead frightened viewers to vote for Trump.

Trump's show of federal force sparking alarm in cities

Homeland Security first jumped into the federal response to the Floyd protests in May as some demonstrations erupted into sporadic violence around the country. But effort shifted into high gear over the July Fourth weekend as Homeland Security agents and officers from at least a half a dozen components of the sprawling organization were arriving in Portland.

Protesters there have been staging nightly demonstrations since May in a section of downtown that includes the federal courthouse, forcing most businesses in the zone to close.

Acting Homeland Security Secretary Chad Wolf said federal personnel have been assaulted with lasers, bats, fireworks, bottles and other weapons and "yet the city of Portland takes little to no action." Wolf said the people committing the vandalism should not be considered legitimate protesters.

But former Homeland Security officials say they've seen nothing like the Portland deployment, which has included using highly trained Border Patrol agents to confront protesters outside the downtown courthouse, without the cooperation or consent of local law enforcement or government officials.

"Urban policing and crowd control and civil unrest isn't something that is in their wheelhouse," said Gil Kerlikowske, a former commissioner of U.S. Customs and Border Protection under President Barack Obama. "It's not something they are trained for. It's not something they have any experience or expertise in."

Arrests made by federal officers over the July Fourth weekend and several days after were for relatively minor offenses not typically prosecuted in federal court, including misdemeanor assault and disorderly conduct. Officials have accused some demonstrators of assaulting federal officers, by shining lasers in their eyes or other means, and said at least one person was detained with the ingredients for a pipe bomb.

John Cohen, a former senior DHS official under Obama and President George W. Bush, said such a high-profile presence of federal agents without local support created the risk of escalating the situation, and that appears to be what happened.

The protests have grown in recent days, particularly after federal officers in unmarked vans and with generic "police" patches last week detained several people on downtown streets without identifying themselves - a move some critics have compared to kidnappings.

"If the public begins to perceive that they are being partisan in how they operate, they lose credibility, and if they lose credibility, they lose public trust," said Cohen. "And for a security or law enforcement organization, the loss of public trust can be fatal."

David Lapan, a retired Marine colonel who served as Homeland Security press secretary as well as a public affairs officer for the Defense Department, said he worried about a blurring line between military and law enforcement that "creates the impression the military is being used to suppress the public."

AP writers Michael Balsamo in Washington and Katherine Foody in Chicago contributed to this report.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Trump's show of federal force sparking alarm in cities

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCLXXXIV. GAG ORDER LIFTED IN OFFICERS' CASE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 22, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 854 wordsByline: STEPHEN MONTEMAYOR; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Judge has not ruled on motion for broad release of body-camera videosBody

The judge overseeing the criminal cases against four ex-police officers charged in the May 25 killing of George Floyd vacated his previous gag order Tuesday that restricted comments by lawyers and others associated with the cases.

Hennepin County District Judge Peter Cahill acted in response to objections to the gag order by the defendants and a coalition of news media organizations, including the Star Tribune, that are also seeking the release of body camera footage recorded during Floyd's deadly encounter with police. Cahill did not rule Tuesday on motions seeking the release of the videos, which are currently viewable by the public only by appointment.

Cahill also rejected a defense request that he sanction the Minnesota attorney general's office for violating the gag order. Assistant Attorney General Matthew Frank, in a brief filed Tuesday before the motions hearing, called the request for sanctions a ploy to smear prosecutors.

Cahill lifted the gag order moments into Tuesday's 50-minute hearing after briefly polling all parties on whether anyone agreed that the order should stay in place. No one raised a hand. Cahill noted that his order could have been more narrowly drawn and agreed with defense arguments that restricting defendants from talking unfairly kept them from responding to negative publicity.

"Finally, and most importantly, the gag order didn't work," Cahill said, adding that "if anything it may have exacerbated the issue" by causing parties to "tiptoe" around in their public statements while leading the news media to rely on anonymous sourcing.

The four defendants in the case are Derek Chauvin, charged with second-degree murder and manslaughter, and Tou Thao, J. Alexander Kueng and Thomas Lane, who are charged with aiding and abetting him. Chauvin is still in custody at the state prison at Oak Park Heights and appeared via Zoom teleconference for Tuesday's hearing. The other three men appeared in court alongside their attorneys and sat spaced apart while wearing face coverings. None of the defendants spoke in the courtroom.

Much of Tuesday's hearing centered on motions from defense attorneys and a media coalition, which besides the Star Tribune includes Minnesota Public Radio, the Associated Press, local TV stations WCCO, KMSP, KARE and KSTP, and the New York Times Co. The media outlets are seeking immediate release of two videos recorded by Lane's body camera during the officers' encounter with Floyd.

Lane's attorney, Earl Gray, filed the videos earlier this month as evidence supporting his motion to dismiss charges against Lane. Under state law, the filing made the videos public data.

At present, the videos can only be viewed by appointment at the Hennepin County Government Center, which the media coalition's motion argues violates state laws governing access to public records, court rules and the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. Attorney Thomas Plunkett, who represents Kueng, is also seeking broad release of the footage.

Leita Walker, an attorney for the media coalition, told Cahill that the public already has access to the bystander videos, as well as transcripts of the videos that she said contained inconsistencies. Cahill expressed concerns about limiting pretrial publicity that could taint a potential jury pool, at times asking the parties for input on how he can mitigate such publicity in a case that has garnered intense international attention.

"I completely fail to see how letting them see the full picture, including the official video taken by the police officers that are now on trial, moves the needle, your honor," Walker said.

Speaking after the hearing, Walker added: "The media can only report the full story if it can see everything and talk to both sides."

Gray, who first filed the videos in his motion to dismiss charges against Lane, argued Tuesday that articles in the Star Tribune have been "substantially unfair" to his client, including one that carried the headline: "Body camera: Cop draws gun at start."

Gray said the video actually showed that Floyd was "stuffing counterfeit bills down his seat before he showed his hands." He alleged that Floyd also had "swallowed drugs" as Lane approached the vehicle.

"It's probably one of the main reasons he died," Gray added. "It's from the fentanyl overdose and that is not out there because we can't get the full video to the public."

Frank responded that Gray was attempting to "try the case through the media" and that his account was a "misleading version of what the facts are."

Though Cahill has declined to allow video and audio recordings of the pretrial hearings in the case, he continues to mull whether to allow live broadcasting of the trial itself, scheduled to begin March 8. All four defense attorneys say they want the trial to be broadcast and Cahill on Tuesday gave Frank less than a week to file a brief outlining the state's position. Cahill noted that live coverage of the trial could allow for public access at a time in which social distancing measures limit how many people can be in a courtroom during the COVID-19 pandemic.

Stephen Montemayor · 612-673-1755

Load-Date: July 22, 2020

Gag order lifted in officers' case

End of Document

Roseville teens keep making Black Lives Matters signs despite thefts, vandalism

ARTICLE MCCLXXXV.

ROSEVILLE TEENS KEEP MAKING BLACK LIVES MATTERS SIGNS DESPITE THEFTS, VANDALISM

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 22, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 507 words

Byline: Emma Harville

Highlight: Inspired by protests they attended following George Floyd's death in May, 19-year-old Carrie MacDonald and her 14-year-old sister Grace painted a Black Lives Matter sign for their front lawn in Roseville to show solidarity. Within a few days, Carrie said, their hand-painted sign was removed and stashed in nearby bushes. Unfazed, the sisters painted a [...]

Body

Inspired by protests they attended following George Floyd's death in May, 19-year-old Carrie MacDonald and her 14-year-old sister Grace painted a Black Lives Matter sign for their front lawn in Roseville to show solidarity.

Within a few days, Carrie said, their hand-painted sign was removed and stashed in nearby bushes.

Unfazed, the sisters painted a bigger sign and planted it deeper in the ground. Three times within the next week, they said, dead raccoons were left in front of the sign, which itself was later stolen.

"We had anticipated and prepared for negative reactions, and we prepared for [the signs] to get defaced, probably stolen, maybe trashed," Grace said. "We definitely did not prepare for people to go out and kill raccoons and put them in front of our signs."

Raccoons have been used in racist images and songs since American slavery, which Grace said "added an extra layer of hatred to it."

With the help of their father, Angus MacDonald, the sisters built and painted a third sign with even stronger posts. They also made several lawn signs for their neighbors, who offered to show their support.

This time, someone spray painted over the sign, distorting the words "white silence is violence" and obscuring the first word in "Black Lives Matter."

On the morning of July 13, Angus said, police notified him that another dead raccoon had been found, hung from a nearby telephone pole with a long spike hammered through its mouth.

Angus said that since the incidents, neighbors have put up their own signs, offered to help identify suspects and even have bought surveillance equipment for the family.

Roseville teens keep making Black Lives Matters signs despite thefts, vandalism

Shooting near Mears Park injures 1 Sunday night North St. Paul man killed in crash after fleeing Dakota County sheriff's deputy Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Cleric assaulted outside Bloomington mosque; police searching for suspects U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities

And, on Sunday, hundreds showed up for a "Roseville Rejects Racism" march in response to the stolen and vandalized signs.

"[The march] went through our neighborhood," Carrie said. "It felt really great to see so many people in the Roseville area showing support for this movement."

Just two of the signs Carrie and Grace made for their neighbors still are standing; the rest have been stolen or damaged. Carrie said they will continue to make signs, installing them with concrete if necessary.

Roseville police say they cited a 55-year-old Roseville man for misdemeanor property damage after he admitted to damaging a sign he found offensive. Police continue to look for other possible perpetrators.

"We will not tolerate crimes motivated by bias or hate," the police said in a statement last week. "As the police department continues its investigation, we are committed to seeking justice and preventing any further trauma to our community."

Anyone with information is asked to call Roseville police at 651-792-7008 or submit tips online at www.cityofroseville.com/3194/Crime-Tips.

Graphic

A Black Lives Matter sign created by 19-year-old Carrie MacDonald and her 14-year-old sister Grace of Roseville was recently vandalized.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Derek Chauvin, officer in George Floyd death, charged with felony tax fraud in Washington County

ARTICLE MCCLXXXVI. DEREK CHAUVIN, OFFICER IN GEORGE FLOYD DEATH, CHARGED WITH FELONY TAX FRAUD IN WASHINGTON COUNTY

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 22, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 709 words

Byline: Sarah Horner, Nick Woltman

Highlight: The former Minneapolis police officer charged with murder in George Floyd's death now faces several felony counts of tax fraud. The Washington County attorney's office on Wednesday said it had filed nine counts of aiding and abetting tax fraud against Derek Chauvin, 44, and his wife, Kellie May Chauvin, 45, following an investigation by the [...]

Body

The former Minneapolis police officer charged with murder in George Floyd's death now faces several felony counts of tax fraud.

The Washington County attorney's office on Wednesday said it had filed nine counts of aiding and abetting tax fraud against Derek Chauvin, 44, and his wife, Kellie May Chauvin, 45, following an investigation by the Minnesota Department of Revenue and Oakdale police.

Department of Revenue investigators began looking into the Chauvins' finances in June and discovered the Oakdale couple had failed to file their state income tax returns in some cases and filed fraudulent returns in others, prosecutors said.

The criminal conduct allegedly dates back to 2014 and continued into 2019.

Investigators maintain the couple knew they were breaking the law based on their tax filings from previous years and "multiple correspondences" sent to them by state tax officials in 2019 and 2020.

The couple also reportedly failed to pay sales tax on a vehicle they purchased in the state.

MORE: Read the tax fraud charges filed against Derek Chauvin and his wife

Derek Chauvin is in custody on the charges in the Floyd case. Kellie Chauvin, who filed for divorce after Floyd's death, was not in custody Wednesday.

Washington County Attorney Pete Orput said the case should serve as a reminder to other citizens of the importance of following tax laws.

Derek Chauvin, officer in George Floyd death, charged with felony tax fraud in Washington County

"When you fail to fulfill the basic obligation to file and pay taxes, you are taking money from the pockets of citizens of Minnesota," Orput said. "Our office has and will continue to file these charges when presented. Whether you are a prosecutor or police officer, or you are doctor or a realtor, no one is above the law."

The charges against the Chauvins allege they failed to file income tax returns with the state of Minnesota for the years 2016, 2017 and 2018, and that they failed to report and pay taxes on tens of thousands of dollars they earned for work outside their primary occupations between 2014 and 2019.

In addition to his full time job as a Minneapolis police officer, Derek Chauvin worked part-time as a security guard at a handful of local bars and grocery stores. Kellie Chauvin, who works as a real estate agent for Eden Prairie-based RE/MAX Results, also operates a photography business called KC Images.

Although the Chauvins filed tax returns with the Department of Revenue in 2014 and 2015, the couple failed to report income they received from some of Derek Chauvin's off-duty security work and from Kellie Chauvin's photography business.

After they were contacted by investigators in June, the Chauvins filed returns for 2016, 2017, 2018 and 2019, but they again failed to report this extra income to the Department of Revenue.

During the six years in question, investigators estimate Derek Chauvin earned nearly $96,000 for his security work at the El Nuevo Rodeo bar alone. In Kellie Chauvin's bank records, investigators found that she had deposited 340 checks from her work for KC Images totaling more than $66,000, the charges say.

In addition to the income tax fraud alleged in the criminal complaints against the Chauvins, prosecutors detail the couple's 2018 purchase of a BMW automobile for $100,231 from BMW of Minnetonka.

The Chauvins, who also own a home in Windermere, Fla., listed this property as their primary residence on their contract for purchase with the dealership and registered the vehicle in Florida, the charges say.

Shooting near Mears Park injures 1 Sunday night North St. Paul man killed in crash after fleeing Dakota County sheriff's deputy Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Cleric assaulted outside Bloomington mosque; police searching for suspects U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities

During an interview with investigators, Kellie Chauvin admitted their house in Oakdale is the couple's primary residence, adding that they claimed Florida residency because it saved them about $389 in taxes on the BMW purchase, the charges say.

All told, prosecutors say the couple owes the state of Minnesota nearly $38,000 in taxes, late fees and fraud penalties.

In convicted on all nine counts against them, the Chauvins also face up to 45 years in prison and $90,000 in fines.

Graphic

Derek Chauvin, officer in George Floyd death, charged with felony tax fraud in Washington County

Derek Chauvin.(Hennepin County Sheriff via AP)

Kellie Chauvin in Oakdale on Friday, June 1, 2018. Chauvin, 43, was vying to be the first Hmong Mrs. Minnesota America. (Jean Pieri / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Family of man shot during unrest wants charges filed

ARTICLE MCCLXXXVII.

FAMILY OF MAN SHOT DURING UNREST WANTS CHARGES FILED

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 22, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 798 wordsByline: MATT MCKINNEY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Plea comes as authorities search for witnesses to pawnshop slaying.Body

The mother of a man shot to death during citywide unrest in the wake of George Floyd's death said Tuesday that she wants justice for her son, Calvin L. Horton Jr.

That means criminal charges filed against the store owner who killed him, said Mae Roberts, of Little Rock, Ark.

The death of Horton on May 27 occurred two days after Floyd was killed by police, prompting protests, arson and looting along East Lake Street. The details of the shooting remain a mystery, but authorities allege that Horton was shot by Cadillac Pawn & Jewelry owner John Rieple outside the store. Rieple was arrested and then released without charges as the investigation continued.

"This shouldn't be," Roberts said. "The only thing I want is justice. Nothing is being done for my son."

Her plea came on the same day that police and prosecutors said they want to hear from anyone who was in or near the pawnshop just before or immediately after the shooting. The office of Hennepin County Attorney Mike Freeman said investigators have located just one witness who saw part of the incident and have yet to find any surveillance video connected to the shooting.

Standing near the spot along East Lake Street where Horton died, Roberts and Horton's children made their case Tuesday with the help of their attorney, Ben Crump, who is also the attorney for Floyd's family.

Crump said Horton's family doesn't believe the official account of his death. The Hennepin County medical examiner reported that Horton was shot in the chest and upper extremities, but Horton's family said that after seeing the body, they believe he was shot in the back. The family says they have social media evidence that Rieple was safely inside his store when he shot at the crowd outside, striking Horton, said Crump.

"If we allow business owners to shoot Black people for protesting for Black Lives Matter, then what kind of message are we sending to the world?" said Crump.

Horton, who grew up in Minneapolis from about the age of 10, had seven children, all of whom attended the news conference. His daughter Cadaezhah Horton, 20, said the family is heartbroken that Rieple is still free. Cadaezhah Horton said she saw social media video of her father lying dead on the street but didn't realize at first that it was him.

"His life mattered to me and my six brothers and sisters," she said, adding that her youngest brothers, 8-year-old twins Caven and Calvon, don't understand what happened. "They just know their dad is gone and that's it."

Horton's family planned to hold a 6 p.m. vigil and march Tuesday starting at Cadillac Pawn at 1538 E. Lake St. Tuesday would have been Horton's 44th birthday.

Civil rights attorney Nekima Levy Armstrong, who spoke after Crump, said Horton's death is like many other cases in Minneapolis in which Black victims are treated differently from white victims.

"As African Americans living here, we have tried to tell the public, we have tried to tell people who work in and outside of the system, that we have two different justice systems, one for Black people, one for white people, both separate and unequal," said Levy Armstrong.

She called for the end of Freeman's term as Hennepin County Attorney and said Gov. Tim Walz and Attorney General Keith Ellison should take over the Horton case. Ellison has stepped into the prosecution of four former police officers charged in Floyd's killing.

The side of the pawnshop facing East Lake Street remains boarded up. The shop suffered significant damage and was looted on the night Horton was killed. Rieple, 59, of Galesville, Wis., could not be reached Tuesday for comment.

Freeman's office issued a statement Tuesday outlining some of the investigatory challenges police faced immediately after the shooting.

"The scene was chaotic that night, with many people in and around the pawnshop," the statement says. "Some of those people pelted police officers as they tried to render first aid to Mr. Horton, and attacked them with objects again after the ambulance left and they tried to investigate the crime scene. The officers retreated and investigators were unable to safely return to the crime scene until the next day."

Freeman said authorities want to hear from anyone who was in or near the pawnshop from shortly before Horton was shot until immediately afterward. Those with information about the shooting are asked to contact CrimeStoppers at 1-800-222-8477 or at crimestoppersmn.org.

Rieple opened Cadillac Pawn in 1990. While the Star Tribune generally does not identify people who have not been charged with a crime, it is doing so with Rieple because his identity as the owner of the pawnshop and his involvement in Horton's death have been widely publicized.

Staff writers Paul Walsh and David Chanen contributed to this report.

Matt McKinney · 612-673-7329

Family of man shot during unrest wants charges filed

Load-Date: July 22, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCLXXXVIII. MLB PLAYERS TO WEAR PATCHES FOR RACIAL JUSTICE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 22, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 4CLength: 821 wordsByline: LA VELLE E. NEAL III; PHIL MILLER; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Major League Baseball is set to announce Wednesday that teams on Opening Day will wear patches on their uniforms calling for racial justice in the United States, according to several sources with knowledge of the plan.

Two patches under consideration say "Black Lives Matter" and "United For Change," though it is not clear if the decision to wear them will be left up to individual players or teams.

MLB's decision to have players wear patches comes after several weeks of dialogue with many of its Black players, who expressed a desire to make a statement during the start of a season that has been delayed by the coronavirus pandemic.

As of Monday night, not every team was behind the idea of wearing the patches, but dialogue will likely continue right up until first pitches are thrown across the league.

Some Twins players also have discussed taking a knee during the national anthem when they play the White Sox in their opener in Chicago on Friday night. The Twins play the Cubs in an exhibition game Wednesday night.

The decision to call attention to racial justice comes after a tumultuous spring and summer during which protests and rioting have occurred following the deaths of Black men and women killed by law enforcement in recent years.

But the killing of George Floyd while in Minneapolis police custody on May 25 led to nationwide and international protests and riots. Floyd's death fueled demand for police reform, and the sports world has responded in speaking out against racial injustice. Athletes in both hemispheres have taken a knee and have raised a fist in the air during pregame ceremonies in support of the cause.

The owners of the Twins, the Pohlads family, have announced they will donate $25 million to fight racial injustice.

MLB players to wear patches for racial justice

"Black people have experienced oppression and racism for far too long in this country," Bill Pohl said in a team statement at the time. "We condemn racism in all its forms, and we are firmly committed to this work beyond this seminal moment in our country's history."

Kneeling before the anthem has been a hot-button topic in the United States ever since NFL quarterback Colin Kaepernick took a knee before a preseason game in 2016. Some have decried the action as anti-military or anti-America; others understood it's meant to protest social issues. The gesture still could divide clubhouses.

Decisions to make

The Twins don't know yet whether Byron Buxton's sprained left foot and Jake Odorizzi's stiff back will keep them out of this weekend's season-opening series in Chicago. But those discomforts have probably had an effect on the Twins' roster decisions.

Thirty-three players flew to Chicago, where the Twins will play an exhibition game at Wrigley Field on Wednesday, then open the Twins' 60th season against the White Sox on Friday night. Manager Rocco Baldelli and President of Baseball Operations Derek Falvey are not required to turn in the team's 30-man Opening Day roster until 11 a.m. Friday, and the status of Buxton and Odorizzi could cause them to wait until the deadline.

Buxton has not played since being driven off the field on a cart on June 13, though Baldelli has not ruled him out for this weekend. But his status almost certainly means that backup outfielders Jake Cave and LaMonte Wade Jr. will initially make the team, in case Buxton cannot play for a few days. Putting Buxton on the injured list would sideline him for 15 days, which the Twins won't want to do if it appears he can be ready before that.

Odorizzi, too, was too sore to make his final tuneup intrasquad start Saturday, but putting a pitcher on the injured list now means he must be idled for 10 days. To avoid that, the Twins figure to start the season with a 16-man pitching staff that will include three extra starting pitchers - Randy Dobnak, Devin Smeltzer and Lewis Thorpe, any one of whom could fill in for Odorizzi. It also means Matt Wisler, an offseason waiver claim who has 57 major league starts, is likely to open the season with the Twins, to back up that long-relief role.

"We're in a pretty good spot, where we don't have too many decisions right now," Baldelli said Monday. But he said the Twins would "stay a little more conservative right now than we normally would" in roster construction.

Bailey starts vs. Cubs

Homer Bailey will be on the mound Wednesday in a familiar place: Wrigley Field, where he has started 11 games during his big-league career. Bailey, who is 5-4 in the iconic park but hasn't won there since April 20, 2014, will make his final appearance before his regular-season Twins debut, presumably next week in Target Field.

Bailey will be followed by relievers Zack Littell and Tyler Clippard in the 6:05 p.m. game, which will be televised by Fox Sports North.

MLB players to wear patches for racial justice

The Cubs have dropped a pair of exhibition games against the White Sox, 7-3 on Sunday in Wrigley Field and 5-3 Monday in Guaranteed Rate Field. Wednesday's game will be the Twins' only exhibition.

Load-Date: July 22, 2020

End of Document

Read the tax fraud charges filed against Derek Chauvin and his wife

ARTICLE MCCLXXXIX.

READ THE TAX FRAUD CHARGES FILED AGAINST DEREK CHAUVIN AND HIS WIFE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 22, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 102 words

Byline: Pioneer Press

Highlight: Washington County prosecutors have filed tax fraud charges against former Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin and his wife. Prosecutors filed the tax fraud charges against Chauvin, 44, and his wife, Kellie May Chauvin, 45, on Wednesday, following an investigation by the Minnesota Department of Revenue and Oakdale police. Chauvin was the officer filmed with his [...]

Body

Washington County prosecutors have filed [tax fraud charges against former Minneapolis police officer \[Derek Chauvin\]\(#\)](#) and his wife.

Prosecutors filed the tax fraud charges against Chauvin, 44, and his wife, Kellie May Chauvin, 45, on Wednesday, following an investigation by the Minnesota Department of Revenue and Oakdale police.

Chauvin was the officer filmed with his knee on George Floyd's neck. He's been charged in Floyd's Memorial Day death with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and manslaughter. Kellie Chauvin filed to divorce her husband shortly after Floyd's death.

Read the tax fraud charges below.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

After George Floyd's death, MN police training programs aim to do better on race

ARTICLE MCCXC. AFTER GEORGE FLOYD'S DEATH, MN POLICE TRAINING PROGRAMS AIM TO DO BETTER ON RACE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 22, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 663 words

Byline: Josh Verges

Highlight: The latest high-profile death of a Black man in police custody has law enforcement training programs across Minnesota searching for ways they can do better. Since soon after George Floyd's May 25 death, a work group from the Minnesota State college and university system has been meeting weekly to consider changes for its 22 schools [...]

Body

The latest high-profile death of a Black man in police custody has law enforcement training programs across Minnesota searching for ways they can do better.

Since soon after George Floyd's May 25 death, a work group from the Minnesota State college and university system has been meeting weekly to consider changes for its 22 schools that churn out 80 percent of the state's licensed peace officers.

Derek Chauvin, the former Minneapolis police officer who knelt on Floyd's neck and who is charged with Floyd's murder, attended three of those schools.

"We know we're a big piece of this," said Ron Anderson, Minnesota State's senior vice chancellor of academic and student affairs.

Michael Birchard, associate vice president for equity and inclusion at Inver Hills Community and Dakota County Technical colleges, said he felt disappointed in himself following Floyd's death, so he wrote a call to action to the dean who oversees the law enforcement programs.

A group quickly formed with a goal of transforming their training, he said.

Tia Robinson Cooper, provost and vice president of academic affairs at Inver Hills, said they want students to understand racial equity issues, including implicit bias, and develop a public service mind-set before they enter law enforcement careers.

To instill that mind-set, first-year law enforcement students will be required to take a course where they engage in service learning.

After George Floyd's death, MN police training programs aim to do better on race

Anderson said the system's training programs have examined themselves following previous police killings of people of color. What's different this time, he said, is they're inviting input from the broader community.

Minnesota State University, Mankato, for example, held its fourth public forum Wednesday on reforming its training program. The school expects to recommend changes to its program by Oct. 1.

The higher education system also is being pushed by its chancellor, Devinder Malhotra, who has made diversity, equity and inclusion a priority.

"We have a responsibility to ensure that these programs also directly address issues of racism and social justice, producing graduates who are culturally competent (and) are able to equitably respond to all of those whom they are charged to serve and protect, regardless of skin color, national origin or identity," Malhotra told the Minnesota State Board of Trustees on Wednesday.

This fall, faculty from all 22 schools will come together for a deep dive into their curriculum and teaching practices, viewed through an equity lens.

That group, too, is being asked to suggest changes to the Board of Peace Officer Standards and Training, which administers the officer licensing exam and generally determines what training programs must teach.

Minnesota State also has a goal of recruiting and retaining more faculty of color for the programs.

"If we're going to teach a culturally responsive program, we need to also have faculty who can do the same," said Sherrise Truesdale-Moore, an associate professor of corrections at Mankato.

Truesdale-Moore said she studied at two historically black colleges and universities and much of what she learned is missing from Mankato's program. Shooting near Mears Park injures 1 Sunday night North St. Paul man killed in crash after fleeing Dakota County sheriff's deputy Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Cleric assaulted outside Bloomington mosque; police searching for suspects U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities

Minnesota State trustee Jerry Janezich raised the concern that officers discard what they've learned in school once they are hired.

"Once students leave us and go into individual departments, things tend to break down," he said.

Anderson said the schools can try to address that on the front end by emphasizing to prospective students that law enforcement is a public service career and later through conversations about leadership, entering the workforce and interacting with communities.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Charred piles of rubble remain 2 months after riots. Midway businesses find clearing debris no easy task.

ARTICLE MCCXCI. CHARRED PILES OF RUBBLE REMAIN 2 MONTHS AFTER RIOTS.
MIDWAY BUSINESSES FIND CLEARING DEBRIS NO EASY TASK.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 22, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 681 words

Byline: Isabel Saavedra-Weis

Highlight: In the days after rioters torched his 100-year-old St. Paul pharmacy, Jim Stage vowed to rebuild and his customers quickly rallied around him. Two months later, his store remains a pile of charred rubble.

Body

In the days after rioters torched his 100-year-old St. Paul pharmacy, Jim Stage vowed to rebuild and his customers quickly rallied around him. Two months later, his store remains a pile of charred rubble.

The remnants of burned businesses continue to dot the Midway neighborhood struggling to get back on its feet after the unrest that followed the death of George Floyd. The challenges at Lloyd's Pharmacy show how clearing up the damage - let alone rebuilding - will be no easy task.

So far, buildings devastated by fires have been razed by the city using emergency funds from the Ground Service Maintenance Fund, according to the city of St. Paul. Now, it's up to the property owners to decide what to do with the rubble.

Stage got authorization from the city to start clearing the rubble from his property last week. But Ramsey County put a halt to the removal.

Stage's original contractor did not have the proper credentials to demolish a building with asbestos, so the operation was put on pause until they hired someone who did, according to county officials.

"When a structure destroyed in a fire wasn't tested for asbestos prior to the fire, then you have to assume asbestos exists in the debris," said Michael Reed from the Ramsey County Environmental Health division.

The new contractor will cost Stage around $60,000, and won't be covered by his insurance. And the longer it takes to straighten out the details, the longer his property remains a pile of debris.

"People in our community have been totally patient and understanding," he said. "I'm understanding too, but we can't rebuild until the debris pile is removed."

NO EASY TASK

Charred piles of rubble remain 2 months after riots. Midway businesses find clearing debris no easy task.

Fees for commercial demolitions vary, and normally cost more than residential demolitions, which average between $15,000 to $20,000. Although the city can pay for demolitions in the case of an "unremedied nuisance ordinance," the full cost of the demolition ultimately falls on the property owner, according to city officials.

"Normally, if a building burns down, it's a rapid process of helping them move forward," said Suzanne Donovan, marketing and public relations manager for the city of St. Paul.

But given the economic implications of the coronavirus pandemic, these are extraordinary circumstances, she said. Property owners may need more time to decide on their next steps.

"The Department of Security and Inspections and the Department of Planning and Economic Development have been reaching out to businesses to talk one-on-one," Donovan said. "The city has been very sensitive to their individual processes."

That process is helping groups better support the businesses damaged during the unrest, said Chad Kulas, director of the Midway Chamber of Commerce. The chamber has used the information to advocate for Midway businesses in legislative meetings and create funds for businesses that are under-insured.

MOVING FORWARD

Here's a list of heavily damaged properties and how the owners plan to move forward:

Lloyd's Pharmacy

Address: 720 N. Snelling Ave. Status: Pending demolition permit to remove rubble, property owner expressed intentions to rebuild.

Enterprise

Address: 1161 W. University Ave. Status: No demolition permit, property owner expressed intentions to rebuild.

NAPA, Bolé and Subway

Address: 1271 W. University Ave. - 490 N. Syndicate St. Status: No demolition permit, property owner expressed intentions to clean up themselves.

Boost Mobile, Sports Dome

Address: 1499 W. University Ave. - 1505 W. University Ave. Status: No demolition permit, currently working with Department of Security and Inspections to phase construction plan.

Speedway

Address: 2051 Grand Ave. Status: Has active demolition permit issued July 14 to remove rubble. Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Charred piles of rubble remain 2 months after riots. Midway businesses find clearing debris no easy task.

Graphic

An aerial photo of the remains of the Sports Dome sporting goods store, top, and Big Top Liquors, bottom, on University Ave. in St. Paul on Tuesday, June 9, 2020. (John Autey / Pioneer Press)

Jim Stage, right, owner of Lloyd's Pharmacy, talks with long-time customer Sterret Morrison at the remains of his business in St. Paul on Monday, June 1, 2020. The St. Paul institution, on the corner Snelling Ave. and Minnehaha Ave., was looted and burned in violent protests Thursday, May 28, part of the reaction to the death of George Floyd, a black man who died after being restrained by Minneapolis police officers on May 25. (John Autey/ Pioneer Press)

A Green Line light rail train pulls out the Snelling Ave. station on Tuesday, July, 21, 2020 near the rubble of the former Sports Dome store in St. Paul. Rubble still remains at the Midway business, across the street from Allianz Field, almost 2 months after it was damaged during rioting following the death of George Floyd on May 25 while being detained by Minneapolis police. (John Autey / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

MN Legislature approves police accountability measures. Here's what the bill will do.

ARTICLE MCCXCII.

MN LEGISLATURE APPROVES POLICE ACCOUNTABILITY MEASURES. HERE'S WHAT THE BILL WILL DO.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 22, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 654 words

Byline: Steve Karnowski

Highlight: A broad slate of police accountability measures passed by the Minnesota Legislature early Tuesday includes a ban on neck restraints like the one that was used on George Floyd before his death in Minneapolis. Other changes include: A ban on chokeholds and so-called warrior-style training, which critics say promotes excessive force. It imposes a duty [...]

Body

A broad slate of police accountability measures passed by the Minnesota Legislature early Tuesday includes a ban on neck restraints like the one that was used on George Floyd before his death in Minneapolis.

Other changes include:

A ban on chokeholds and so-called warrior-style training, which critics say promotes excessive force. It imposes a duty to intercede on officers who see a colleague using excessive force. It changes rules on the use of force to stress the sanctity of life. It makes changes in arbitration rules affecting police unions. Officers will get more training on dealing with people with mental health issues and autism. The measure also creates a new advisory council for the state board that licenses officers.

"This is a really a great bill, but it is only a first step," Democratic House Speaker Melissa Hortman, of Brooklyn Park, said at a news conference. "It paves the way for transformational change, but it doesn't bring about transformational change."

Democratic House Majority Leader Ryan Winkler, of Golden Valley, told reporters that Minnesota will "continue to live in a powder keg" as long as its racial inequities in health, education, income and policing continue to exist.

"It is vitally important for the world to see us pass this legislation," Winkler said. "Of course, it's more important to protect the lives of people in our state. But Minnesota, I think, has suffered a severe reputational hit in the world. And it's because we have revealed the truth of our state, which is that we are among the worst when it comes to racial equality. And that cannot continue."

MN Legislature approves police accountability measures. Here's what the bill will do.

Passage came after nearly two months of difficult negotiations that followed Floyd's death May 25 and the ensuing unrest that spread around the world over police brutality and racism. The Black man was restrained face down in the street while handcuffed and with three officers holding him down, including a white officer who had a knee to Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes.

The Republican-controlled Senate sent the bill to Democratic Gov. Tim Walz on a 60-to-7 vote early Tuesday before adjourning the special session. The House approved the package 102-29 just before midnight. Walz said he plans to sign it.

"George Floyd's death brought the need for meaningful police reform into sharp focus for Minnesotans across the state," the governor said in a statement. "After decades of advocacy by communities of color and Indigenous communities, the bipartisan passage of these measures is a critical step toward justice."

Republican Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, of East Gull Lake, told WCCO Radio that the final package included a "number of really good things" from both parties and was backed by law enforcement groups.

Walz had to call the special session, the second in as many months, to give lawmakers a chance to rescind the emergency powers he's been using to respond to the coronavirus pandemic. The House Democratic majority last week blocked a GOP effort to void those powers, just as it did in June. Lawmakers then turned their attention to policing.

Walz calls special session next week to consider 30-day extension of pandemic powers Minnesota's primary is Tuesday. Here are key east metro races to watch. Voters, GOP lawmakers plan lawsuit over Walz's mask mandate at polling places State Patrol cancels police academy class 'due to lack of funding' Minnesota will close 2 prisons to prepare for budget shortfall. Other agencies face holes, too. A number of community groups gathered Tuesday to criticize the efforts as "watered-down" and a "deep disappointment."

"Not only was the legislation disappointing but it included harmful elements such as additional funding for the Bureau of Criminal Apprehension to continue their practice of poor quality investigations that cover up police deadly force incidents," stated Michelle Gross, President of Communities United Against Police Brutality.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

$1.8B bonding bill stalls in House

ARTICLE MCCXCIII.

\$1.8B BONDING BILL STALLS IN HOUSE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 22, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 936 wordsByline: TOREY VAN OOT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

A major public infrastructure package projected to create thousands of construction jobs around Minnesota faces an uncertain fate after the Legislature ended a special session Tuesday without agreement on a $1 billion-plus borrowing bill.

The collapse of the multiyear bonding bill was the third failed effort since the end of a regular Legislative session in May that was clouded by the coronavirus pandemic. Another special session in June, dominated by the police killing of George Floyd, also ended without a deal.

Lawmakers in the divided Legislature came together again late Monday night to pass sweeping police reforms in response to the death of Floyd and other Black men in encounters with police. Leaders in both parties praised the bipartisan effort to reach agreement on a police accountability measure, which Gov. Tim Walz is expected to sign later this week. But support for a $1.8 billion borrowing package failed to materialize, despite leaders' assurances that both sides were close to a deal in recent weeks. Political jockeying over Walz's use of executive powers during the pandemic, combined with differences over some of the building projects, sank the bonding bill before a self-imposed deadline to adjourn the weeklong special session.

House Republican Leader Kurt Daudt, who conditioned support for the bonding bill on ending Walz's emergency powers, left open the possibility of a deal next month when the Legislature is expected to return to review another potential extension of the peacetime emergency. "We'll be back here in three weeks and we can try again," he said in a House speech early Tuesday.

But construction industry and union groups backing the bonding bill say the continued inaction could again delay, or eventually doom, needed infrastructure improvements that could foster economic development and create jobs during the pandemic.

"They know the impact this is going to have and they did nothing anyway," said Jason George, business manager for the building trades union Operating Engineers Local 49. "That rises to disgust to me."

$1.8B bonding bill stalls in House

Walz and top leaders in the DFL-controlled House and the GOP-led Senate had pledged to make bonding a priority. But a revised proposal failed Monday amid continued opposition from the House GOP minority. Unlike other spending measures, the long-term borrowing bill requires a supermajority vote, meaning Republican votes were needed.

As the collapse of the bonding bill became evident early Tuesday, both sides cast blame. Walz blasted House Republicans for being "willing to walk away from the best economic thing we could do." He noted that majority leaders in both chambers negotiated a deal without tying the bonding bill to the coronavirus dispute.

"I think it's incredibly unfortunate, the idea we can't lift the highway in Henderson so it doesn't flood every year because I'm ordering masks for long-term-care facilities," Walz said. "That's part of dealing with the pandemic. I need to do that."

Daudt, R-Crown, blamed Democrats for packing the bill with "poison pills" they knew his GOP caucus wouldn't support, including language related to a light-rail transit expansion and a train to Duluth. "There were zero discussions with our caucus all day Monday, signaling that Democrats simply aren't serious about reaching a compromise," he said in a statement.

But Daudt's GOP counterpart in the Senate, Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, signaled support for the bonding bill, even though senators did not get a chance to vote on it.

Gazelka said the bill contained a "lot of good provisions," including money for wastewater infrastructure and $600 million for roads and bridges. "Both sides would say there was something in there they didn't like," Gazelka said in an interview Tuesday with WCCO Radio. "Welcome to divided politics. You don't get everything you want."

George, from Local 49, said while there was blame to go around, he remained "deeply disappointed" with the House Republicans' opposition, which blocked the bill in the lower chamber.

"Last night, with a good bonding bill in front of them, in my opinion, they chose to fight with the governor instead of create jobs," he said. "And that's something I just don't understand."

Legislators are likely to return to the Capitol for another special session in mid-August, if Walz extends his use of emergency powers. But a previously planned sale of government bonds in August complicates prospects for a deal, according to Walz, because the new borrowing could jeopardize the financing for projects that have already been approved.

A spokesman for Minnesota Management and Budget said given those plans and federal securities law, the "next opportunity for the Legislature to make any changes to the budget, including a bonding bill, must wait until late September when this blackout period ends."

And leaders in both parties fear that negotiations in any September session could be complicated by the November elections, when all House and Senate seats are up for grabs.

"We've tried two to three times on the bonding bill and the tax relief," Gazelka told WCCO. "At this point, it very may well be that we come in and we continue to advocate to get rid of the governor's emergency powers and then just ... close up. Now we're aiming for the regular session in January."

$1.8B bonding bill stalls in House

House Speaker Melissa Hortman, D-Brooklyn Park, struck a similar tone. She said Senate Republicans indicated to her that Tuesday was the last chance for a deal this year.

"It may be much more difficult to get along and get things done as we move into the heat of the campaign season," she said.

Torey Van Oot · 651-925-5049

Load-Date: July 22, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCXCIV.

CREDIT LEGISLATURE FOR POLICING REFORMS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 22, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 6ALength: 515 wordsHighlight: There's more work to do, but DFLers and Republicans made notable progress.Body

The Minnesota Legislature should be commended for the hard work, broad inclusion and compromise that has resulted in significant police accountability measures.

The package delivers on a statewide ban on both chokeholds and neck restraints of the type that were used in the arrest that ended in George Floyd's death. It's true a number of departments already had banned such holds, but the legislation applies the ban across every jurisdiction, and gives it the force of law. In addition, so-called warrior training can no longer be offered by departments and cannot count for education credits for officers. Such training teaches officers to view every situation in terms of maximum threat and can encourage overly aggressive responses.

The state also will launch a statewide database of deadly force incidents. DFL House Speaker Melissa Hortman said Tuesday that the database will go a long way toward showing trends and creating information to be used for further improvements in accountability.

Another needed tool for the good officers on the streets - and there are many - is a statewide duty for them to intervene when a colleague's policing gets overly aggressive. Again, some departments, such as Minneapolis, already had such a requirement, but it wasn't always followed. Now officers can intercede knowing they are backed by the full force of law, and that they risk a violation if they fail to act.

The bill also will create a state investigative unit to look into deadly force incidents, bringing a needed credibility to the results.

One of the toughest obstacles to better accountability has been a system of mandatory arbitration that made it difficult for police chiefs to get rid of rogue officers. Arbitration remains, but with a much-needed change: a rotating panel of experts will be used, curbing the perverse incentives of the current system, where arbitrators who landed too often on one side were less likely to be employed.

Hortman said the Legislature's work does not end here. "It's not nearly enough, but it is a considerable step forward," she said. "This is just a start." Community members, victims' families, business leaders and a number of law enforcement agencies themselves all contributed to this effort. Not everyone will agree on the merits of these proposals. Some are already criticizing the efforts. That's to be expected and, indeed, can keep the pressure on to make good on future reforms.

Credit Legislature for policing reforms

On a disappointing note, the Legislature failed to reach a compromise on what was to have been a bonding bill of about $1.8 billion. Efforts by Hortman and Republican Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka were not enough to surmount continued intransigence by House Republicans, where Minority Leader Kurt Daudt has needlessly linked capital improvements to ending Gov. Tim Walz's emergency powers to deal with the COVID-19 pandemic.

Minnesotans should be outraged that such gamesmanship has cost the state and its citizens a needed bill that could have produced jobs and infrastructure projects in every corner of the state. Minnesotans have a right to expect better.

Load-Date: July 22, 2020

Fleetwood savored family time in hiatus

ARTICLE MCCXCV.

FLEETWOOD SAVORED FAMILY TIME IN HIATUS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 22, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 6CLength: 647 wordsByline: JERRY ZGODA; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Seven weeks after the PGA Tour returned from its three-month coronavirus shutdown, world 12th-ranked Tommy Fleetwood is restarting himself at this week's 3M Open in Blaine.

He hasn't played since the Players Championship was canceled after its first round in March. He chose to remain at home in England with his family until now.

After a two-week quarantine in the Hamptons on Long Island, Fleetwood is back after more than four months away. He'll spend the next nine weeks resuming his PGA Tour season.

He watched his 2-year-old son, Frankie, grow, tried unsuccessfully to learn how to cook and called it all "beautiful family time."

"I've never spent four months sleeping in the same bed all at once for a very, very long time," Fleetwood said during a Tuesday videoconference at TPC Twin Cities.

"The time we had together has been something that probably we'll never get again."

He timed his return to play the 3M Open before next week's World Golf Championship in Memphis and the PGA Championship in San Francisco the week after that.

He spent part of his time at home watching the PGA Tour resume.

"Eventually, it was always going to be my turn to come out," Fleetwood said. "One of the great things about the tour is that no matter how long you've been away, everybody says, 'Hey,' like they saw you yesterday."

He finished third at Honda Classic in March and missed the cut at the Arnold Palmer Invitational before the Players was canceled.

He said he has played "quite a lot" of golf without tournament conditions and without trying to post a score.

Fleetwood savored family time in hiatus

"It'll be interesting coming back to see if I can continue that rhythm," Fleetwood said.

"I'm definitely not going to use time off as any kind of excuse if I don't play well because I feel like I've had a lot of good practice and playing time."

· Fleetwood's cooking experiments during his lockdown at home apparently failed.

"I realized first of all, I'm not good at it," he said, "and second of all, I didn't really enjoy it. So it was like lose-lose.

"Chicken Milanese, I did a very poor effort on. That was when I decided to leave the career as a chef."

Pairings to watch

Fleetwood's featured pairing with Dustin Johnson and Tony Finau tees off 7:30 a.m. Thursday and 12:40 p.m. Friday. Brooks Koepka, Keith Mitchell and Charles Howell III tee off at 7:20 a.m. Thursday.

Bubba Watson, Paul Casey and Pat Perez go off at 12:40 p.m.

There's a Minnesota connection with Tim Herron, Tom Lehman and former Gopher Erik van Rooyen playing together at 8:10 a.m. Thursday.

Others with that state connection: Troy Merritt, formerly of Spring Lake Park High and Winona State, at 12:40 p.m., two-time Minnesota State Am champ Tom Hoge at noon and Gophers golfer Angus Flanagan at 2 p.m.

Gently ...

PGA Tour players, caddies, officials and staff continue to be tested regularly inside their protective "bubble" for coronavirus.

Koepka was asked Tuesday if he is accustomed to the nasal swabbing yet.

"It depends who does it," he said. "Gentle Steve, I guess one of them's got a nickname. So, yeah, you try to find him."

Bringing light

The PGA Tour last month resumed its suspended season by setting aside an open 8:46 a.m. tee time the first morning in Texas that included a moment of silence for George Floyd, whose killing by Minneapolis police on Memorial Day sparked unrest and protests calling for racial justice worldwide.

On Thursday, the 3M Open will be played 22 miles from where Floyd was killed.

"Well, it's tragic," Koepka said. "I mean, it's pathetic what happened. To see somebody's life go and then you watch it multiple, multiple times, it's tough. I get chills right now just even thinking about it. What happened is uncalled for.

"If there's anything good, we're starting to see change. As a world, as people, we need to continue to grow and I think we're at least bringing light to it now.

"Racism is a big issue and I think we're on our way now."

Fleetwood savored family time in hiatus

Load-Date: July 22, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCXCVI.

LACK OF PAY STOPS STREET OUTREACH

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 22, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 653 wordsByline: LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Crime prevention work in troubled neighborhoods has been put on hold.Body

Organizers of several Minneapolis crime-prevention groups have temporarily stopped doing street outreach because they say the city hasn't paid them in weeks, even as gun violence continues to rise.

The groups - including We Push for Peace and a coalition of ministers and gang members organized by Rev. Jerry McAfee that helped guard North Side businesses during the riots that followed George Floyd's death - had been working with the city to combat crime, particularly in the Third and Fourth police precincts. Under the direction of the Office of Violence Prevention, the groups started patrolling some of the most troubled neighborhoods, talking to gang members and trying to defuse tensions among rival crews before they erupt.

But Trey Pollard, founder and CEO of We Push for Peace, said that promised payments from the city have yet to materialize. Pollard said the group has cut back its outreach, since most of its workers rely on a steady paycheck.

"They can't continuously keep putting their lives in jeopardy out there, and walking around from 9 o'clock at night to 3 o'clock in the morning," he said. "It's been a month now, and we have yet to receive a payment - you can't expect us to keep doing the work."

This comes amid an exceptionally violent year in Minneapolis, which has seen homicides double from this time in 2019 and shootings jump roughly 70%. In the most recent homicide, a taxi driver was fatally shot on the South Side after police say he confronted two men breaking into his cab.

Fourth Ward Council Member Phillipe Cunningham said the surge speaks to the need for investing in community-based violence intervention initiatives, while adding that he still sees a need for police in certain situations. He said his office is working to speed up the outreach payments and hopes the situation will be resolved soon.

"That's one of the reasons that I want to make sure that people get paid in an expedited time, because they have to take care of their families and they have rent, or whatever the case may be," Cunningham told

Lack of pay stops street outreach

several dozen Folwell residents who gathered Monday to discuss crime and drug dealing. "And it's easier to fall back into the life if they don't get paid in an expeditious time frame."

In a follow-up interview Tuesday, Cunningham blamed the lapses on the city's inefficient process for paying contractors, but he stressed that the work of reducing crime hadn't stopped.

"The city has a responsibility to pay people who are doing high-risk work that requires a special level of expertise and rare skill, for them to be paid in a time frame that matches a fact that this is their livelihood, and that they have rent, mortgages and families to take care of," he said. "I do not want folks to focus their frustration on community organizations that say it's not fair for us to work for the city and not be paid in reasonable time frames."

Spokespeople for the city and the Police Department either didn't respond to questions about the delayed payments or declined to comment on Tuesday.

Lisa Clemons, a former Minneapolis police officer who started an organization called A Mother's Love, said that such oversights send the message the city doesn't value the work of those who sometimes put their lives on the line. Even groups like hers that have a longstanding relationship with the city face a mountain of bureaucratic red tape before they can get paid, she said.

"So for them to have to wait to be paid to do this work, where they're already struggling and starving, that's just sad," said Clemons.

Quantrell Urman started the outreach and mentoring group Turf Politics last year but says he's never applied for funding from the city on principle.

"I understand those guys' frustration," he said. "Who wouldn't want money out there? It's dangerous, they're going to places the city can't go, they're doing things the city can't do."

Libor Jany · 612-673-4064 Twitter: @StribJany

Load-Date: July 22, 2020

Minnesotan confirmed as new director of Army National Guard

ARTICLE MCCXCVII.

MINNESOTAN CONFIRMED AS NEW DIRECTOR OF ARMY NATIONAL GUARD

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 22, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3B

Length: 431 words

Byline: PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

The U.S. Senate confirmed the head of the Minnesota National Guard to lead the Army National Guard's forces nationally.

The promotion of Maj. Gen. Jon Jensen to director of the Army National Guard gives him responsibility for overseeing all programs and policies for roughly 350,000 soldiers in all 50 states, three territories and the District of Columbia.

In a statement released Monday night after the voice vote confirming President Donald Trump's nomination, U.S. Sen. Amy Klobuchar, D-Minn., said, "Our nation will benefit from his leadership and decades of experience and commitment to those serving in the National Guard. We are grateful for the Major General's commitment to service members and their families, whom he has supported through numerous deployments, as well as his work to help Minnesotans through several natural disasters."

The rise to the national post also means a third star for Jensen, who has served as Minnesota's adjutant general since November 2017, leading 13,000 citizen soldiers and airmen operating in 62 locations throughout the state.

Jensen has been the Guard's top officer in Minnesota during the state's most challenging times in many years.

In late May, the Guard offered free COVID-19 testing in Minneapolis and five other locations across the state.

Soon afterward, more than 7,000 members of the Guard were called up for duty after George Floyd's death on May 25 while in police custody in Minneapolis. Their duties ranged from street patrols to preparing food to handling logistics.

Early this month, Jensen took on past problems of sexual assault and harassment among Guard members. He said the Guard needs to make information about reporting sexual assault more readily available, speed investigations when allegations surface and change military code to make it easier to enforce rules against such conduct.

Minnesotan confirmed as new director of Army National Guard

Jensen ordered an assessment, and in April 2019, the Guard reported its sexual assault numbers publicly for the first time.

Jensen succeeds Lt. Gen. Daniel Hokanson, who also was confirmed Monday by the Senate as the next chief of the National Guard Bureau. That promotion comes with a seat on the president's Joint Chiefs of Staff.

An Iowa native and Northwest Missouri State University graduate, Jensen has served in the Guard for 37 years. He has been deployed to Kuwait, Bosnia and twice to Iraq while serving with the 34th Infantry Division. He commanded the division before becoming his state's adjutant general.

A replacement for Jensen as Minnesota's adjutant general awaits a nomination from Gov. Tim Walz.

Paul Walsh · 612-673-4482

Load-Date: July 22, 2020

ARTICLE MCCXCVIII.

NEW BE THE MATCH CEO AMY RONNEBERG FACES DONOR, BORDER CHALLENGES IN COVID-19 PANDEMIC

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

July 22, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 992 words

Byline: Carrigan Miller

Body

Amy Ronneberg was named CEO of Be The Match last month, taking over the largest bone marrow registry in the world during a time when the health care world's attention was fixed just about anywhere else.

Be The Match, which is operated by the National Bone Marrow Registry, is based out of Minneapolis and is the largest nonprofit in the Twin Cities. It connects people fighting cancer with bone marrow donors all around the world.

A cancer survivor herself, Ronneberg brings a personal touch to leadership at the organization where she's worked as chief financial officer since 2013.

She was named a Business Journal CFO of the Year in 2016 for her efforts to save money at Be The Match, a move that helped the organization reduce the cost of a bone marrow transplant by 5% in one year.

New Be The Match CEO Amy Ronneberg faces donor, border challenges in Covid-19 pandemic

Ronneberg sat down with the Business Journal last month to discuss how Covid-19 has impacted the nonprofit's work and how Be The Match makes giving marrow a unique experience for donors.

The conversation has been edited for length and clarity.

Amy, you've worked for Be The Match since 2013 and you were the acting CEO for months. How important is a sense of continuity for Be The Match? I think it is important with any organization. Now, more than ever, there's so much disruption in our lives. Then you put in the senseless killing of George Floyd and the civil unrest that has taken place since then and it's a lot to take for anybody. Now you throw on top of it a change in your leadership, that's a lot.

How has Covid-19 affected what you do? Covid has had a significant impact on our operations. If you think about Be The Match, we register donors. The best donor is a young donor, about 18 to 25 or 18 to 35, so we do a lot of our recruitment on college campuses. When Covid hit and college campuses shut down, we had to go fully online. And it's a lot more challenging to tell the story online. Especially in diverse areas, we tend to be able to tell that story far better when we have that face-to-face. Twenty-five percent of U.S. patients receive product from another country and 25% of U.S. donors, their product is going to another country. So you can imagine that week of March 11 when the president announced shutting the borders, that had a significant impact on us. Now, we did receive a waiver from the director of the CDC; it's the only waiver that's been provided throughout the country with a blanket exemption. Our product is actually moved by couriers, so volunteer couriers who go through extensive training.

You can't just bubble wrap it and put it in the mail. Yeah, unfortunately it doesn't work that way. With the number of commercial flights that ceased, it became really challenging to move in a timely manner. Be The Match has had to get innovative. We've been saying a lot lately we've been making the impossible, possible. We're being told by countries, "There's no way you're able to land a plane in our country." Three days later, we have a plane landing in that country.

Why is there so much international travel? We are an international organization. There are about 50 registries in the world we work with. As a patient, when your doctor searches for a donor, it automatically searches the whole world. We have access for every search to 35 million donors worldwide. The reason that's important is because HLA matching is much more complicated than, say, a blood-type matching. HLA comes from both your mom and dad and their ancestry. In my case, both of my parents are from Eastern Europe, the Poland area. It's very possible that my best match might be someone from Poland.

So simplifying your supply chain isn't really an option? It isn't. Obviously, life would be easier if you could just have a supply chain in the United States, but lives are at stake here. The only way for us to meet the needs of the patients in the United States is to be an international organization.

What else has changed because of Covid? We've had to do a lot of recruitment online. Our organization has done an amazing job of quickly pivoting to a campaign called Couch2Cure. We had well over 50,000 donors register through that campaign.

Anything else? The amount of work for us to do the same thing has increased about 20 times. Previously, we would have a courier trip planned and there wouldn't be any issues there. Now, that courier trip may need to move four, five, six times because airlines are canceling flights. That has increased our workload, but our overall procedures and the number of patients who have had a bone marrow transplant has gone down a bit during this time. We are starting to see it increase, but in certain pockets of the country. As you can imagine, for many weeks, New York really had a significant decline in transplants that were taking place. We're starting to see that change. I think we're going to see, as this pandemic continues, certain parts of the country are going to be pulling back because they need the beds for Covid patients, and other parts of the country will surge because they have a backlog in transplants. Our belief is we'll probably end the year slightly down.

New Be The Match CEO Amy Ronneberg faces donor, border challenges in Covid-19 pandemic

How much is slightly down? Year-over-year we're probably going to end up about 5% less, because at the end of the day, cancer doesn't care about Covid. It still happens. What we've found is if a patient has the opportunity to wait a month or two, that some areas are pushing that transplant back slightly.

CEO, Be The Match

Age: Turning 47 in early August

Education: Bachelors, accounting, University from Wisconsin-Eau Claire; MBA, Capella University

Family: Married; two girls, Isabelle (10) and Hadley (8); two black labs, Harper and Hershey

Hobbies: I love running and working out with friends at OrangeTheory, reading, traveling (at least previously) with our family, watching sports (especially the Packers and Cubs) and painting.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: July 22, 2020

Police reform bill seen as only a step

ARTICLE MCCXCIX.

POLICE REFORM BILL SEEN AS ONLY A STEP

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 22, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1228 wordsByline: JENNIFER BJORHUS; TOREY VAN OOT; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Legislation includes restrictions on chokeholds and neck restraints.Body

Minnesota's historic police reforms drew varied reactions Tuesday, from mild enthusiasm to disgust, with a common refrain: The state still has a long way to go.

A compromise product of a divided state Legislature, the package of policing changes was welcomed as a step in the right direction - but one that falls far short of the sort of transformational change demanded after the police killing of George Floyd.

Attorney and activist Nekima Levy Armstrong called the final product "a slap in the face" to Black Minnesotans. And even one police group said the reforms didn't go far enough. Andy Skoogman, executive director of the Minnesota Chiefs of Police Association, said he wanted to see deeper changes to the arbitration process that so often overturns decisions on police discipline.

The bill includes restrictions on chokeholds and neck restraints - such as the one used on Floyd - and a prohibition on warrior-style training for officers.

It enhances data collection around deadly force encounters, requires officers to intervene and creates a new state unit to investigate such cases. The bill boosts funding for crisis intervention training, creates a panel of expert arbitrators to handle police misconduct cases and establishes incentives for officers to live in the communities they police.

Its passage came after weeks of legislative impasse that had already derailed another special session in June - one that was initially called to review Gov. Tim Walz's extension of his emergency powers. But the continuing outrage over Floyd's killing kept up the pressure on the only divided legislature in the nation to find common ground when Walz extended the state of emergency again in July.

"We've never stopped working on this, whether we were in session or out of session. That's something we all felt was important," said Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, R-East Gull Lake.

Police reform bill seen as only a step

Walz is expected to sign the measure into law Thursday.

"No piece of legislation is perfect and I wouldn't view any as the end," Walz said. "As our society changed, and as this issue became apparent, we were able to move. I think it's pretty amazing we moved some of these issues around [the Peace Officer Standards and Training] Board, around chokeholds, around warrior training. ... We were able to pass that."

Walz said the first text he got after the proposal passed early Tuesday was from family members of people killed by police, who wanted to "express their deep disappointment that it didn't go far enough."

"The emotion of being glad to see us come together and move significant reform but also the sense of frustration, and in many cases anguish, from some of these families that they didn't get what they wanted to see in this bill, I think that behooves us to continue to work together," he said.

Minnesota Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington said he, too, considers Minnesota's police changes a work in progress.

"When I look at the laws that have been passed in other states for police reform, most of it comes down to banning chokeholds and some duty to intervene, Harrington said. "I think this is far broader and goes far deeper than that. I think we did really good work."

"My hat is off to both sides, the Senate and the House, for coming to the finish line," he said.

State Rep. Rena Moran, the DFL co-chairwoman of the People of Color and Indigenous (POCI) Caucus at the Legislature, said lawmakers did the best they could under difficult circumstances. There's more work to be done, she said.

"We had to work with a Republican Senate that is pretty much police friendly," Moran said. "That's the reality of where we are here in the state of Minnesota."

"It is only the beginning," Moran said. "It is not the end."

Steven Belton, president and CEO of the Urban League Twin Cities, said he's grateful a compromise was struck, but greater reforms are needed. For example, he said, the bill did not include a requirement that law enforcement officers carry their own personal liability insurance - something that he said creates an incentive for officers to check themselves.

"In a way, this legislation represents the low-hanging fruit," Belton said. "We've richer, higher fruit that needs to be harvested."

But he said the bill is better than nothing: "As my daddy used to say, 'It's better than a poke in the eye, son.' "

"We'll be back in subsequent legislative sessions," he said, "pushing for more and deeper reform."

Julia Decker, policy director for ACLU of Minnesota, expressed her disappointment that the bill didn't require an independent prosecutor, such as the attorney general, to handle officer-involved deaths.

"We certainly hope that the Legislature recognizes this to be the beginning, and not the end," Decker said.

Police reform bill seen as only a step

Some of the most heated reaction came from Communities United Against Police Brutality (CUAPB), an advocacy group that has worked for decades on policing issues. The group protested outside the governor's residence Tuesday to voice its disappointment with the package of reforms.

In an interview, CUAPB President Michelle Gross called the measure a "mediocre bill" with "a lot of extra garbage that we don't need."

"It doesn't doing anything substantial to end violent policing," Gross said. "The legislators, frankly, are frightened of the law enforcement lobby."

Gross said the bill failed to include many of the 44 recommendations her group has pushed, such as requiring that police release body camera footage to families of victims within 48 hours, and ending the civil statute of limitations on wrongful death to give families more time to file a lawsuit.

Armstrong, founder of the Racial Justice Network, a grassroots civil rights organization, agreed that the reform measure is "very weak" and pointed out that the chokehold language isn't a ban because it allows an exception "to protect the peace officer or another from death or great bodily harm."

"We consider it to be watered-down legislation, and a mere fraction of what they could have done to begin to address the systemic nature of police violence and abuse that permeates far too many police departments in Minnesota," Armstrong said in an interview.

"The Legislature should not be patting themselves on the back for doing the bare minimum. It shouldn't have taken two special sessions to get this watered-down bill," she said. "It's a slap in the face, especially to Black residents in the state of Minnesota."

Other reform-minded Minnesotans also found the bill lacking. Abigail Cerra, a former public defender and member of the civilian-led Police Conduct Oversight Commission, said she cannot speak for the commission, but said the bill should have changed public records law to make police discipline more transparent. Currently, only misconduct complaints that are sustained are made public, making it impossible for the public to find out about incidents that lead to many complaints. Many complaints result not in discipline but in "coaching." And since that isn't classified as discipline, those cases are not made public.

But she praised the POCI Caucus at the Legislature for "tenacious leadership and advocacy" on the reforms. "They could have let it drop and they didn't," she said.

Staff writer Briana Bierschbach contributed to this report.

Jennifer Bjorhus · 612-673-4683 · jennifer.bjorhus@startribune.com

Torey Van Oot · 651-925-5049 · torey.vanoot@startribune.com

Load-Date: July 22, 2020

ARTICLE MCCC. U.S. SENATE CONFIRMS HEAD OF MINNESOTA GUARD TO NATIONAL POST

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 22, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 217 wordsByline: Nick WoltmanHighlight: The U.S. Senate on Monday confirmed Maj. Gen. Jon Jensen as director of the Army National Guard. Jensen had spent nearly three years as adjutant general of the Minnesota National Guard when he was tapped for the national post in May by President Donald Trump. Sen. Amy Klobuchar called Jensen "an excellent choice to lead [...]"Body

The U.S. Senate on Monday confirmed Maj. Gen. Jon Jensen as director of the Army National Guard.

Jensen had spent nearly three years as adjutant general of the Minnesota National Guard when he was tapped for the national post in May by President Donald Trump.

Sen. Amy Klobuchar called Jensen "an excellent choice to lead the Army National Guard" in a statement after Monday's vote.

"We are grateful for the Major General's commitment to servicemembers and their families, whom he has supported through numerous deployments, as well as his work to help Minnesotans through several natural disasters," she said.

An Iowa native, Jensen has served in the the Army National Guard for more than three decades and has completed several overseas deployments.

Most recently, Jensen oversaw the deployment of National Guard troops on the streets of the Twin Cities during the unrest that followed the death of George Floyd.

He was named adjutant general of the Minnesota National Guard by Gov. Mark Dayton in 2017.

Joe Arpaio defeated in what's likely his last political race Vote-by-mail worries: A 'leaky pipeline' in many states Last-ditch virus aid talks collapse; no help for jobless now Trump bans dealings with Chinese owners of TikTok, WeChat Ohio gov tests negative after positive result at Trump visit

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

U.S. Senate confirms head of Minnesota Guard to national post

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCC. CHAUVIN, WIFE FACE FELONY TAX CHARGES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 23, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 984 wordsByline: PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Pair failed to report $460K in income, filing says.Body

The fired Minneapolis police officer charged with killing George Floyd was charged along with his wife Wednesday with felony tax crimes dating back to 2014 that allege failure to claim more than $460,000 in income - at least $96,000 of that in his off-duty security work.

Derek Chauvin and Kellie Chauvin, of Oakdale, were each charged by summons in Washington County District Court with nine felony counts of aiding and abetting false or fraudulent tax returns or failing to file returns.

From 2014 to 2019, the Chauvins underreported $464,433 in joint income and owed a total of $21,853 in taxes, according to the charges. With interest and late filing and fraud penalties, they owe $37,868, the complaints said.

Derek Chauvin, 46, remains jailed on second-degree murder and manslaughter charges in connection with the death of Floyd while in police custody on May 25. Three other ex-officers, Thomas Lane, J. Alexander Kueng and Tou Thao are charged with aiding and abetting Chauvin.

Kellie Chauvin, 45, who has filed for divorce since her husband was charged, was not available for comment.

County Attorney Pete Orput said the investigation of the two "was in the works well before" Derek Chauvin was charged with Floyd's death in late May.

Orput said state Department of Revenue officials contacted his office in June with what they found, and "they were sending [Chauvin] letters last year" about no returns being filed, "and they got no response."

Then, when Derek Chauvin came under worldwide attention for his role in Floyd's killing, revenue officials "read the guy's name and realize this is their guy," Orput said.

The county attorney called the Chauvins' tax troubles "run of the mill, but it just happens to be the [police officer] sitting in Oak Park [Heights prison]. ... The guy owes us money, and I want to collect. I don't care about his other problems."

Chauvin, wife face felony tax charges

The filing includes a litany of allegations. Among them, prosecutors say the Chauvins bought a new BMW X5 in January 2018 for $100,230 from a Minnetonka dealership and registered the SUV in Florida - they own a condo in Windermere, outside Orlando - and paid $4,664 in taxes in that state.

However, the vehicle was serviced 11 times in Minnetonka and never in Florida, investigators say they found. Kellie Chauvin told investigators they opted for Florida because it was less expensive. The taxes due on the SUV had it been registered in Minnesota were $5,053.

Court records do not list an attorney for either of the Chauvins. Derek Chauvin's criminal attorney, Eric Nelson, said he knows nothing about the tax allegations.

The counts and their dates are identical for the Chauvins. There are six involving aiding and abetting allegations of false or fraudulent returns starting with the 2014 tax year. The others allege not filing taxes for 2016, 2017 and 2018.

The charges document various sources of income for the couple. The complaints said that between 2014 and 2019, Derek Chauvin made between $52,000 and $72,000 annually as a police officer. He also worked off-duty security nearly every weekend in that time at El Nuevo Rodeo dance club, Cub Foods, Midtown Global Market and EME Antro Bar on E. Lake Street.

During that span, Chauvin failed to pay taxes on nearly $96,000 he earned from El Nuevo Rodeo alone, investigators estimated.

Beginning in June 2019, he routinely worked off-duty at EME Antro Bar on weekends from 11 p.m. to 2:30 a.m. after his MPD shift and was paid $250 in cash each night, said investigators, who located no corresponding tax papers.

On June 25, state revenue investigators searched the Chauvins' Oakdale home, which was mostly empty. They recovered a box of tax documents, financial information and work schedules. Investigators also searched the home of Derek Chauvin's father, an accountant who prepared their 2014 and 2015 tax returns based on information they provided him. The father said he filed an extension to do their 2016 returns, but that they never provided him with the information to complete them.

Kellie Chauvin, also known as Kellie Xiong and who worked as a real estate agent and ran a photography business, told investigators that she had not prepared the returns because "it got away" from her, the complaints said. She was accompanied by an accountant who provided income tax returns for 2016 to 2019, but they appeared incomplete or estimated, the complaints continued.

The complaints also said that on June 26, one day after their Oakdale home was searched, Kellie Chauvin called Derek Chauvin at the prison where he is being held. She told him during the recorded call that their unfiled tax returns were being investigated.

She allegedly told her husband that she was meeting with someone about "[20]16 to now." He then suggested using "who we have used to handle for many years."

She responded, "Yeah, well, we don't want to get your dad involved, because he will just be mad at me, I mean us, not doing them for years."

Also Wednesday, Kellie Chauvin's attorney requested that their divorce file be sealed, citing "constant harassment from the public."

Chauvin, wife face felony tax charges

"The circumstances surrounding Respondent's incarceration has resulted in rage and violence throughout the community directed at both Petitioner and Respondent," the filing said, adding that financial information and a Social Security number were hacked, resulting in attempts to secure cash advances for tens of thousands of dollars.

"Allowing public access of this file will allow further harassment of Petitioner and not allow any privacy in this matter," the filing said. "In addition, allowing public access will allow the public and media to have notice of when hearings occur and will allow the general public to know the whereabouts of each party during the proceedings. Such access will negatively affect the parties from a safety standpoint."

Staff writer Jennifer Bjorhus contributed to this report.

Paul Walsh · 612-673-4482

Load-Date: July 23, 2020

End of Document

POLICING

ARTICLE MCCCII. POLICING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 23, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 11ALength: 861 wordsByline: ANDREW M. LUGER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Charter change is reckless, unnecessary // We can, and must, reform policing without it.Body

She was 12 years old, the victim of a broken home. She heard about a man who could make her life better. Instead, he gave her drugs and alcohol, brutalized her and sold her to men for money.

Officers from different departments worked night and day to rescue her from her trafficker. While I served as U.S. Attorney, my office prosecuted him and she was the central witness. After she stood up to her trafficker, she left the witness stand and hugged those who had saved her.

I became a prosecutor in 1989, seeking justice on behalf of the community and victims of crime like that young girl. I worked with officers who prevented the bombing of a mosque, talked kids out of gangs and stopped heroin trafficking on the streets of Minneapolis. I have hundreds, if not thousands, of stories that begin with tragedy and end with the heroic efforts of law enforcement.

I have seen the best our police can do.

But I have also seen the worst. I investigated the Metro Gang Strike Force, and discovered an agency rife with corruption and a culture that trampled on civil rights. I have investigated heartbreaking officer-involved shootings of unarmed African American men, spending hours with their families and friends.

And then, like all of us, I watched the brutal killing of George Floyd. Right before our eyes.

The question before our city is what to do about it.

In the weeks since George Floyd's death, civil rights leaders, protesters, business leaders, police officers and local and national policing experts have been saying the same thing: We need transformational change in the Minneapolis Police Department, change that takes systemic racism head-on, change that goes to the very culture of the department.

For the most part, they also agree that we need a Police Department. A department that keeps us and our neighbors safe from vicious hate crimes, traffickers and gun violence. But also a department that serves all of us with dignity and respect for human life. A department that reimagines what policing is in Minneapolis going forward; a department that reflects our progressive values of inclusion and equality.

POLICING

We can have that department. First, given the broad consensus that now exists, we can take this on together as a community. Second, we are not alone. Communities around the U.S. have made great strides before us. And the people who have accomplished this progress, from Camden, N.J., to Eugene, Ore., are ready to help.

But we face a stark choice: Act on our unity now, or engage in a divisive battle over a ballot initiative that questions whether we need police at all, an initiative that will lead to bitterness and division.

Our City Council has pledged to do away with the police department. In order to do so, they need to pass a referendum removing the requirement that Minneapolis have a department. The Minneapolis Charter Commission should reject this gambit. It is ill-timed during a pandemic and national election, and it will divert us from the tough work we should focus on right now.

On these pages, the council has claimed that we cannot have systemic change without removing the charter provision that requires a Police Department; one overseen by the mayor ("Five City Council members: Our case for changing the charter," July 16.)

But the support for this startling conclusion is lacking.

To the contrary: All of us, the council included, want to find ways to engage mental health professionals and others to respond to 911 calls. Nothing in the charter prevents us from doing this.

All of us, the council included, want to confront systemic racism and a culture that has allowed so many unarmed African American men to die at the hands of the police. We can accomplish this from the top down and the bottom up now without changing one word of the charter.

Indeed, through tragedy and suffering, we now have something few cities have ever seen - a consensus. If you listen, you will hear civil rights leaders, community members, business leaders and, yes, police officers say the same thing: They respect our chief, and want to make systemic change together. After days of protest, anger and frustration at the brutal killing of George Floyd, Minneapolis Police officers wrote a heartfelt letter telling the community: We are with you. Joining the chorus for change, the officers ended their letter with "We are with you moving forward. We want to work with you and for you to regain your trust."

Imagine: Officers, civil rights leaders and activists and business leaders who all want the same thing while preserving the existence of the police department. And a City Council that says no.

This is a time to say yes, and to get to work. We should seize on this opportunity to bring about transformational change, building on the consensus that arose out of the tragic death of George Floyd. And we can do it now, without the distraction of a referendum that will needlessly divide us.

The Charter Commission should reject the distraction of the proposed referendum. Let's build on our unprecedented consensus now, and get the police department we want and deserve.

Andrew M. Luger is a Minneapolis attorney and former U.S. attorney for Minnesota.

POLICING

Load-Date: July 23, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCIII. TWINS' ROSTER FOR OPENING DAY INCLUDES BYRON BUXTON

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 23, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 525 wordsByline: Betsy Helfand

Highlight: CHICAGO - When the Twins begin their season here Friday night, Byron Buxton will be with them. Whether he plays is yet to be seen, but the dynamic center fielder, who is rehabbing from a sprained foot, worked out in St. Paul on Wednesday and then was scheduled to join his teammates in Chicago. Buxton's [...]

Body

CHICAGO - When the Twins begin their season here Friday night, Byron Buxton will be with them.

Whether he plays is yet to be seen, but the dynamic center fielder, who is rehabbing from a sprained foot, worked out in St. Paul on Wednesday and then was scheduled to join his teammates in Chicago.

Buxton's inclusion was the biggest final question for the 30-man roster, which was finalized Thursday along with the three-man taxi squad. Though Buxton will be on the 30-man roster, the Twins also opted to include outfielders LaMonte Wade Jr. and Aaron Whitefield, a somewhat surprise addition who could be called upon to serve as a pinch runner or defensive replacement.

Teams will begin the season with 30 players on their roster. After two weeks, that number will go down to 28, and two weeks later, it will be at 26, where it will remain for the rest of the season.

Twins manager Rocco Baldelli announced Wednesday night that Jake Odorizzi would begin the season on the injured list with back soreness. That paved way for Randy Dobnak, Devin Smeltzer and Lewis Thorpe to make the team out of camp. The Twins might opt to have one of them make a spot start or might be able to skip the fifth spot in the rotation the first time through and then slide Odorizzi back in when he is ready to return.

In addition to Odorizzi, Willians Astudillo also will begin the season on the injured list. Astudillo tested positive for COVID-19 and has not yet rejoined his teammates. Once he is cleared, he will need a ramp-up period to get ready for the season.

Jorge Alcala, Tomas Telis and Caleb Thielbar comprise the three-man taxi squad.

The Twins will honor frontline health care workers, those who have been lost to COVID-19 and George Floyd at their home opener on Tuesday night against the Cardinals at Target Field.

Twins' roster for Opening Day includes Byron Buxton

Nine health care workers will join together to throw out the ceremonial first pitch in a pre-recorded video. The Twins will have North Minneapolis native Jovonta Patton record the "Star-Spangled Banner," and Sounds of Blackness perform "Lift Every Voice and Sing," the Black national anthem.

Twins swept by Royals, drop fourth straight game Twins make pitching move; stick with 16 pitchers Royals hand Twins their third straight loss Twins adjust as MLB tightens COVID-19 protocols Charley Walters: Twins picked up a gem in Kenta Maeda

An in-memoriam video will honor Twins minor leaguer Ryan Costello, who died this past offseason, COVID-19 victims and Floyd. A graphic of Floyd will be unveiled on the outfield wall, where it will remain for the entire season. An in-game moment of silence will take place at 8:46 p.m. - a nod to the amount of time former Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin knelt on Floyd's neck.

The team also will play a message from the Players Alliance, a nonprofit organization made up of more than 100 Black current and former professional baseball players, to show their support for the Black Lives Matter movement.

And the Twins will pay homage to their past, in this their 60th season in Minnesota, with video recordings of former players.

The team will begin its season with no fans in attendance at Target Field.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCIV. TWIN CITIES YMCA FACES QUESTIONS ON INEQUALITY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 23, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 1010 wordsByline: KELLY SMITH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The Y's CEO vows to take new steps, including listening sessions and an advisory team, in response to allegations.Body

Leaders of the YMCA of the Greater Twin Cities are taking a harder look at diversity and inclusion as the organization with a long history of outreach to communities of color suddenly faces scrutiny of its own practices from within.

The board at the Douglas Dayton YMCA in downtown Minneapolis sent a note to the general board last week urging the Y, one of Minnesota's largest nonprofits, to address "what appears to be deep seated and systemic racism in our organization."

The YMCA joins a growing number of nonprofits, businesses and universities taking a fresh look at improving diversity and inclusion. The Twin Cities YMCA is the third-largest YMCA in the U.S., with 30 locations in the metro, southeastern Minnesota and western Wisconsin, and $168 million in annual revenue.

"I am committing the Y to respond with real, sustainable action that carries into the future, and to create a space that employees, members, and the community can be proud of," CEO Glen Gunderson said in a statement this week.

The note on behalf of 25 board members at the Douglas Dayton YMCA, which was obtained by the Star Tribune, was sent to the larger board of the Y, made up of more than 50 prominent Twin Cities leaders - from HealthPartners CEO Andrea Walsh to Summit Orthopedics CEO Adam Berry. Michael Klingensmith, publisher of the Star Tribune, is also on the board and wasn't contacted for this article.

Board chairman Ravi Norman of Norman Global Enterprises, the former CEO of Thor Construction, said in a statement that organizations and industries across the country are re-examining their role in fighting systemic racism.

Twin Cities YMCA faces questions on inequality

The YMCA is no different, he added, saying that "we are welcoming this opportunity to rise to the occasion of the moment and ensure that we are creating an environment rooted in equity, inclusion and universal human dignity."

The YMCA touts its racial equity work, opening its Equity Innovation Center in Minneapolis last year.

But the note from the Douglas Dayton YMCA board pointed to an anonymous Instagram account called "Black at the YMCA," which launched June 24 to share anonymous stories of discrimination at YMCAs across the U.S. - from Seattle to Boston. Many posts, though, zero in on the Twin Cities' Y.

The Douglas Dayton YMCA board said in its letter that conversations with staff show that the social media concerns aren't isolated incidents, and they asked the general board to hire a third-party investigator to look into racism and discrimination toward YMCA staff and better diversify the board to reflect the community, among other actions.

An interview request with the person or people behind the "Black at the YMCA" Instagram account was declined before they blocked a reporter. The account has published more than 200 posts since the end of June - a month after the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police set off a renewed nationwide discussion of racism and inequity.

The anonymous allegations about the Twin Cities YMCA ranged from the staff, leadership and membership being majority white to inappropriate comments by leaders.

The YMCA declined an interview request on the allegations, saying that the organization can't comment on anonymous posts that haven't been vetted.

The YMCA declined to release membership or staffing demographics but added that "the demographics of our staff are consistent with the demographic makeup of the communities we serve." The nonprofit also declined to say if any formal discrimination complaints had been filed internally.

In the past two years, the Minnesota Department of Human Rights has closed one case alleging racial discrimination against the YMCA, but the department didn't find probable cause in that case.

The department can't disclose if any other complaints have been filed that are still open.

Next steps

In an e-mail to employees last Thursday, Gunderson said that the Y will conduct listening sessions and a survey, review all policies and create a "CEO Equity Advisory Team" with Black and American Indian employees, and other people of color, to provide an "unfiltered communication channel" to identify and eliminate barriers to equity and inclusion.

He said in the staff note that the organization is committed to increasing diversity in recruiting and hiring, will expand resources at its Equity Innovation Center to its own employees and add training on how to better address concerns.

He said that the Y supports Black Lives Matter, posting signs at each facility, and will provide Black Lives Matter and PRIDE pins for employees to wear.

Twin Cities YMCA faces questions on inequality

"Frankly, I am encouraged by the powerful sense of reckoning that is emerging, with calls for racial justice in our communities and in our nation," Gunderson wrote.

On June 26, an employee at the Maplewood YMCA anonymously posted on Instagram that Gunderson had made a joke referencing "build the wall."

Gunderson commented on the post, which was verified by the YMCA, saying that he doesn't recall the specific words in the conversation, but he made a mistake and objects to the U.S. border wall.

"I have hope that this is our time to build an anti-racism culture where all can thrive, once and for all," he wrote. "I am committed to see it through at our Y."

Budget woes

The scrutiny comes at a difficult time financially for the Y during the COVID-19 pandemic because it, like many nonprofits, relies on in-person programs or events for revenue.

Closures of camps, fitness centers and child care programs have led to a 30% drop in revenue this year for the Y. Some of its 82,000 members canceled or paused memberships, or stopped child care, during the closures. The Y furloughed 90% of its more than 6,000 employees.

On Wednesday, 146 part-time and full-time staff were laid off. Another 3,428 employees remain on furlough.

"All of us must break down old paradigms and eradicate systematic racism to advance human dignity for all," Gunderson said in a video, announcing the cuts, adding that the Y is "reimagining" its sites and not reopening some as fitness centers. "This is painful," he said.

Kelly Smith · 612-673-4141

Load-Date: July 23, 2020

ARTICLE MCCC.V. OTHER VOICES: JOHN LEWIS LEFT US A BETTER AMERICA

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 23, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 454 wordsByline: Dallas Morning NewsHighlight: Right now, America needs heroes. And we have one for the ages in John Lewis. His life of sacrifice in the name of the larger principles of freedom and equality and his career of service to his country are emblems of the better America we hope to be and the better America we can become. [...]Body

Right now, America needs heroes. And we have one for the ages in John Lewis.

His life of sacrifice in the name of the larger principles of freedom and equality and his career of service to his country are emblems of the better America we hope to be and the better America we can become.

In remembering him, we should remember that the struggle for equality is an enduring human struggle, that it will not come cheaply nor easily, that the path can be dangerous and the pain very real, and that it will almost certainly never be over.

We can remember too, though, that it can be rewarded - that things can get better - and that Lewis' sacrifice, along with those of the Freedom Riders and so many advocates for reform, bequeathed to us a better nation, where we more fully, if still imperfectly, embrace the individual dignity of each American and extend in law the protection of their basic human rights.

Lewis, who died at 80 Friday, had his skull cracked with a billy club as a young man to help bring us to this place where we are. And even as violence was done upon him, he rejected violence in return. The undeniable moral authority that he carried on the Edmund Pettus Bridge in Selma, Ala., in 1965 was the authority that finally mattered.

In considering his legacy, we must also consider the work that remains. Poverty, imprisonment and other legacies of slavery and codified racism still track our country. Lewis supported the marches in opposition of police violence against Black Americans and considered them an extension of his work as a young man.

We also hope, as we memorialize his life and all he did as a protester, organizer and congressman, that we don't fail to recognize the truth that his work mattered because it made a real difference in our country and in improving the lives of Black Americans. The America that John Lewis died in is not the same America he was born into as the child of sharecroppers. It is not the same America that disenfranchised Black Americans as a matter of law and denied them basic human rights.

Other voices: John Lewis left us a better America

That better America is an America we must work toward every day. The struggle is renewed over and over in each of us as individuals and in all of us as a society.

John Lewis has died. But in a good and ever better America, John Lewis will live forever.

- The Dallas Morning News

Will Bunch: From 9/11 to Portland, it was inevitable 'Homeland Security' would be turned on the American people Sunday Bulletin Board: Way back in '83, 20 bucks was a pretty penny for an old-timey picture! Letters: We need more good police, not fewer Leah Mirakhor: How James Baldwin spoke to immigrants like me Soucheray: Trust us, the Minneapolis Council said. We don't, said the Charter Commission.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Portland's mayor tear-gassed by US agents as protest rages

ARTICLE MCCCVI. PORTLAND'S MAYOR TEAR-GASSED BY US AGENTS AS PROTEST RAGES

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 23, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 928 words

Byline: Associated Press

Highlight: PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) - The mayor of Portland, Oregon was tear-gassed by U.S. government agents as he stood outside a federal courthouse during another night of protests against the presence of federal police sent by President Donald Trump to quell the city's ongoing unrest.

Body

By GILLIAN FLACCUS

PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) - The mayor of Portland, Oregon was tear-gassed by U.S. government agents as he stood outside a federal courthouse during another night of protests against the presence of federal police sent by President Donald Trump to quell the city's ongoing unrest.

Mayor Ted Wheeler, a Democrat, appeared slightly dazed and coughed and said Wednesday night it was the first time he'd been tear-gassed.

He put on a pair of goggles someone handed him and drank water but did not leave his spot at the front of the protest and continued to take tear gas as the demonstration raged - with protesters lighting a large fire between protective fencing and the Mark O. Hatfield Federal Courthouse amid the pop-pop-pop sounds of the federal agents deploying tear gas and stun grenades into the crowd.

It wasn't immediately clear if the agents knew Wheeler was among those in crowd when they used the tear gas.

Earlier in the night, Wheeler was mostly jeered as he tried to rally demonstrators who have clashed nightly with federal agents but was briefly applauded when he shouted "Black Lives Matter" and pumped his fist in the air.

In a tweet Thursday, Trump referred to Wheeler as the "Radical Left Mayor of Portland, who last night was booed & shouted out of existence by the agitators & anarchists."

Wheeler has opposed federal agents' presence in Oregon's largest city. He has faced harsh criticism and his presence wasn't welcomed by many demonstrators who yelled and swore at him.

Portland's mayor tear-gassed by US agents as protest rages

"I want to thank the thousands of you who have come out to oppose the Trump administration's occupation of this city," Wheeler told hundreds of people gathered downtown. "The reason this is important is it is not just happening in Portland ... we're on the front line here in Portland."

Wheeler has been accused by critics including city council members of not reining in local police who used tear gas multiple times on protesters before federal agents arrived early this month in response to nearly two months of nightly protests since George Floyd was killed. And city business leaders have condemned Wheeler for not bringing the situation under control before the agents showed up.

Department of Homeland Security acting Secretary Chad Wolf denied that federal agents were inflaming the situation in Portland. He told "CBS This Morning" on Thursday that Wheeler legitimized criminality in the city by going to the front of the crowd of demonstrators where the fires were lit and people were trying to pull down the protective fence.

Wolf said Wheeler had cited violence in the city before federal officers arrived.

Wheeler did not participate in lighting any of the fires or attempting to tear down the fence and was surrounded by his security team when he was gassed.

Earlier, protesters held signs saying "Tear Gas Ted" in reference to the Portland Police Bureau's use of the substance before federal agents arrived. As Wheeler left the protest zone about 12:40 a.m. Thursday, one person shouted that he should be there "every single night."

Less than an hour after Wheeler left, the Portland Police Bureau declared there was a riot at the site and threatened to use tear gas but officers never did and made no arrests.

In a statement later Thursday, police said the crowd threw Molotov cocktails, lit fires in a park and in trash cans and released hundreds of gallons of water from fire hydrants.

Before he was tear-gassed, Wheeler was criticized for cutting the local police budget and for not assigning Portland police to protect protesters from federal agents.

Wheeler's appearance in the protest zone came hours after state attorneys for Oregon urged a judge to issue a restraining order against agents deployed to tamp down on the protests.

The arguments came in a lawsuit filed by Oregon Attorney General Ellen Rosenblum, who accused federal agents of arresting protesters without probable cause, whisking them away in unmarked cars and using excessive force. Federal authorities have disputed those allegations.

The lawsuit is part of the growing criticism of Trump's order that sent the federal agents to Portland and pending orders for them to head to Chicago and Albuquerque, New Mexico, to fight rising crime.

Trump's move has deepened the country's political divide and has potentially set up a constitutional crisis months ahead of the presidential election. Democratic mayors of 15 cities have condemned the use of federal officers in a letter to the U.S. attorney general.

The court hearing focused on the actions of the more than 100 federal agents responding to protests outside the Portland courthouse.

Portland's mayor tear-gassed by US agents as protest rages

The motion asks U.S. District Judge Michael Mosman to command agents from the Department of Homeland Security, Customs and Border Patrol, Federal Protective Service and U.S. Marshals Service to immediately stop detaining protesters without probable cause, identify themselves and their agency before arresting anyone, and explain why an arrest is taking place.

On Thursday, a judge is expected to hear arguments in a legal challenge that the American Civil Liberties Union filed on behalf of journalists - including a freelance photographer for The Associated Press - and legal observers who say they were targeted by Portland police while documenting demonstrations.

The ACLU filed a lawsuit Wednesday on behalf of volunteer medics who have been attending to injured protesters.

Wheeler, 57, a sixth-generation Oregonian was born and raised in Portland and attended local public schools.

Follow Gillian Flaccus on Twitter at <http://www.twitter.com/gflaccus>.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCVII.

CITIZEN PATROLS WON'T GET CITY FUNDS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 23, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 953 wordsByline: LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The Minneapolis City Council briefly considered diverting money from police to citizen patrols, with the council's public safety chairwoman suggesting an armed group as one that could potentially benefit.

During a budget meeting last week, Council Member Alondra Cano proposed cutting $500,000 from the Minneapolis Police Department for the citizen groups.

She described it as an effort to "respond to the hundreds of people who have formed their own community safety patrol systems to keep their blocks and their neighborhoods safe in this time of deep transition."

She and nine of her colleagues voted in favor of adding the provision to the 2020 budget. On Wednesday, after residents and reporters contacted city officials seeking details about the proposal, the council walked it back.

The change reveals how the City Council is struggling to come up with alternatives to the Minneapolis Police Department, even as a majority has vowed to end it. Council members and city staffers have, at times, found themselves unclear about what various proposals mean, even after they have voted on them.

"We need transparency from the council now more than ever, especially when we're moving really quickly like this," said Council Member Linea Palmisano, chairwoman of the budget committee, who isn't one of the council members who want to end the police. "Vague cuts that get hammered out behind closed doors instead of in the open where people can hold you accountable is dangerous. If my colleagues want to reduce the police force, we should take a vote on that."

While they are tasked with trying to find ways to cut money from their $1.6 billion budget to deal with the coronavirus pandemic, many council members are responding to conflicting demands from the public about overhauling the city's approach to public safety after George Floyd's death.

During a roughly five-hour meeting Wednesday, some residents urged the council to fulfill its promise to end the police. Many of them repeated a call, pushed by activist groups, to cut $45 million from the Police Department's roughly $184 million budget.

Citizen patrols won't get city funds

"As I have conversations with those in my community, there is a deep-seated distrust of this council regarding its willingness to follow through with protecting Black lives and our communities in general," said Dylan Cheever, one of about 60 people who called in to offer public comment Wednesday. "The proposed budget will only further that distrust, especially after so many of you committed to much larger actions."

Others asked the council to slow down and provide more details before pushing through significant changes.

"As we move forward in this process, I urge and beg the City Council to have a plan, to establish a strategy," said Adam Barrett, who also called into the meeting. "Right now, myself and people like me can't get behind $600,000 or $45 million in cuts because there is no strategy and there is no plan in place. We don't know what will replace the Police Department and how much it will cost."

When Mayor Jacob Frey unveiled his plan for trimming from the budget earlier this month, he said he hoped to save larger conversations about the future of public safety for the 2021 budget talks, which kick off next month.

Last Friday, council members got their first chance to counter.

That's when Cano introduced her proposal "to provide training, technical assistance, supplies and implementation of paid community safety patrols" of "crime hot-spots and homeless encampments throughout the city."

Cano said she knew of a group that operated in south Minneapolis and noted "we've heard a lot of amazing things about the Freedom Riders on the North Side."

Her office confirmed this week that is meant to be a reference to the Minnesota Freedom Fighters, who recently switched their name from the Minnesota Freedom Riders. A representative for the group did not return a message this week.

In a video with alternative media site Unicorn Riot, some members of the group described their work as an effort to provide protection to the community during marches, protests and other similar scenarios.

Pictures of the group posted on social media show some carrying rifles.

Last Friday, City Council members voted to add funding for the patrols to the 2020 budget proposal, except for Palmisano and Lisa Goodman.

At Wednesday's public meeting, after questions from Goodman and others about how such patrols would work, council members deleted the community patrols from the budget proposal.

Now the council wants to take $1.1 million from the Police Department budget to support a "Cure Violence" program.

Council Member Phillippe Cunningham said the program uses "interrupters" to try to stop cycles of violence.

"We're asking for street outreach with community-based folks who have credibility with the folks who have the guns, are shooting the guns, and these folks have the rare skills and the credibility to be able to influence these folks to put the guns down and stop the shooting," Cunningham said. "That is an incredibly rare skill that we do not value enough as a city."

Citizen patrols won't get city funds

Cunningham noted that these are different from citizen patrols and the "interrupters" won't be armed while they're working.

"There's a space for that, the Freedom Fighters. I'm grateful for their work and their leadership in the community," Cunningham said. "They have a role, but what we're talking about here is an evidence-based model that folks are going out and de-escalating. They're mediating conflicts."

Eleven council members voted to replace the patrols with that new program in the budget. Council Member Kevin Reich did not vote on the issue.

The City Council is scheduled to vote on the final budget Friday.

Liz Navratil · 612-673-4994

Load-Date: July 23, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCVIII.

TWINS UNDECIDED ABOUT RACIAL INJUSTICE PROTEST

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 23, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 5CLength: 356 wordsByline: LA VELLE E. NEAL III; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

With more teams around the league taking a knee during the national anthem to protest racial injustice, the Twins have yet to decide on what they will do, if anything, before their season opener Friday against the White Sox in Chicago.

Twins righthander Jose Berrios, who will start the opener opposite of Chicago righthander Lucas Giolito, said the club continues to discuss a possible response.

"We [haven't] decided yet," Berrios said before the Twins' 4-3 loss to the Cubs at Wrigley Field on Wednesday. "We want to support each guy on our team, around the world. We need to decide. Yeah, we are talking about it."

Several Giants players and coaches, led by manager Gabe Kapler, took a knee before their game Monday against the Athletics. Reds star Joey Votto joined three other teammates who knelt before Cincinnati's game on Tuesday against Detroit.

Athletes around the world have taken a knee before games in protest following the killing of George Floyd by Minneapolis police on May 25. Major League Baseball announced Wednesday that it will stencil "Black Lives Matter" behind pitchers' mounds on Opening Day, and teams will be allowed to wear either a BLM patch or one that says, "United for Change."

Teams are deciding if they want to support the cause in other ways, such as kneeling before games. New bench coach Mike Bell, whose brother, David, manages the Reds, said he has spoken with his brother for hours about the issue and is proud of him for how he has supported his players.

"As a team, we just are looking to support everyone, to care about everyone, to love everyone around them," Mike Bell said. "We understand it's an important issue. The thing that's been most encouraging to me is that we've shared a lot of deep conversations, emotional conversations at times. What it shows me is how much everybody cares about one another, the community, the issues that are going on in the world."

Whatever the Twins decide to do Friday, Berrios said, it should be done in unison.

Twins undecided about racial injustice protest

"If you want to do that, we need to do it like a team, all together," Berrios said. "That's why we [haven't] decided yet. We're still talking about it."

Load-Date: July 23, 2020

End of Document

Minnesota governor signs police accountability bill. A deeper look at what law does.

ARTICLE MCCCIX. MINNESOTA GOVERNOR SIGNS POLICE ACCOUNTABILITY BILL.
A DEEPER LOOK AT WHAT LAW DOES.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 23, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1239 words

Byline: Mohamed Ibrahim

Highlight: Gov. Tim Walz on Thursday, July 23, signed into law the most substantial set of policing law reforms that Minnesota has seen in years following the killing of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police.

Body

Gov. Tim Walz signed a police accountability bill into law Thursday that includes a ban on neck restraints like the one that was used on George Floyd before his death in Minneapolis, though some activist groups say the legislation falls short.

The bill, passed by the Legislature earlier this week, also bans chokeholds and fear-based or "warrior-style" training, which critics say promotes excessive force. It imposes a duty to intercede on officers who see a colleague using excessive force and changes rules on the use of force to stress the sanctity of life.

"This bipartisan piece of legislation moves us toward a critical step towards criminal justice reform," Walz said at a Thursday news conference. "These critical reforms are long overdue - they are meant to strengthen transparency and community oversight."

The measure also creates a new advisory council for the state board that licenses officers, makes changes in arbitration rules affecting police unions and requires more training on dealing with people with mental health issues and autism.

The bill passed after nearly two months of difficult negotiations that followed Floyd's death on May 25 and the ensuing unrest that spread around the world over police brutality and racism. Floyd, who was Black, was killed when a white officer held his knee to Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes as he was handcuffed and restrained by three other officers holding him down.

Members of the People of Color and Indigenous (POCI) Caucus led the policing reform efforts at the Capitol, speaking with community members and law enforcement before drafting the legislation they introduced last month. POCI Caucus member and House public safety committee chairman Rep. Carlos Mariani said the legislation is the first step in preventing what happened to Floyd and Philando Castile, who was killed by a St. Anthony police officer four years ago.

Minnesota governor signs police accountability bill. A deeper look at what law does.

"The construction of this law and its passage is a powerful acknowledgment of our collective failure in the past, of our failure to (Floyd and Castile) and countless others who have been wrongfully harmed at the hands of peace officers," Mariani said. "We have to start with that acknowledgment, otherwise we'll continue to do what we've always done."

Discussions on police accountability legislation dominated the June special session a few weeks after Floyd's death, but lawmakers weren't able to reach a deal on which reforms to include in the bill. Going into this month's special session, Democratic House Speaker Melissa Hortman said restoration of felon voting rights and giving the Minnesota attorney general's office primary jurisdiction over prosecuting police officers were two issues that were taken off the table in negotiations with the GOP-controlled Senate.

Michelle Gross, president of local advocacy group Communities United Against Police Brutality, called the reforms in the bill "low hanging fruit" and said the legislation is not nearly as comprehensive as the group had hoped.

"The autism training we thought was an important thing to have ... and we also like the fact that it bans fear-based training (which) is something we've been working on for quite a long time now," she said. "But so much of what we wanted was not even given a second glance."

Gross' group, along with other local advocacy organizations, introduced eight policing reform bills during the special session - two of which were included in the package passed earlier this week. The legislation includes requiring police carry their own liability insurance, ending the statute of limitations for a wrongful death civil suit and allowing families of those killed by police to see body camera footage 48 hours after their death. POCI Caucus members at the news conference Thursday pointed to the statute of limitations issue as a disappointment when it failed to materialize in the final package.

Walz, a Democrat, is expected to call the Legislature back to the Capitol in August to extend his peacetime emergency powers as the coronavirus pandemic continues indefinitely. Gross said they will be back with more reforms to prevent lawmakers from moving on from police reform - a process that she said is far from over.

"For every special session that they might have, we will be there demanding change," she said. "And once the regular session starts next year, we will be there again, with our bills, demanding change."

As for the proposals that did become law in Minnesota, here's a look at what they do:

Beginning immediately, chokeholds, restraints tying limbs together behind a person's back and warrior-style training will be banned in Minnesota. Law enforcement agencies will be required to set up guidelines for de-escalation and intervening in excessive force situations, with and without deadly use of firearms. The law states that officers have a "duty to intercede and report" should a fellow officer be using excessive force. The state will set up an independent Use of Force Investigations Unit within the Bureau of Criminal Apprehension to investigate all officer-involved deaths in the state, plus criminal sexual assault allegations made against officers. The law also establishes an Officer-Involved Death Review Board within the Department of Safety, "responsible for identifying the root causes of the death and making recommendations for reforms to reduce the number of future officer-involved deaths." The governor will appoint a pool of arbitrators that can review grievances and review plans to discipline, discharge and terminate officers if needed. The law adds to the state's Peace Officer Standards and Minnesota governor signs police accountability bill. A deeper look at what law does.

Training (POST) Board four citizen members and establishes a Police-Community Relations Council. The 15-member council including state law enforcement leaders and community members and activists will advise the POST Board "on all matters related to police-community relations," review state data on officers' uses of force and recommend discipline for officer misconduct. The POST Board will have to accept the council's discipline recommendations unless they override them with a two-thirds majority vote. Law enforcement agencies will have to notify the POST Board if an officer is discharged or resigns during a use-of-force investigation, or after an investigation has been completed. And the board will consider suspending or revoking an officer's license if they are terminated for violating use of force policies. Law enforcement agencies will be required to submit to a research group, selected by the Department of Public Safety, reports and information about use of force incidents, misconduct incidents and complaints against officers. The group will organize, store and monitor the data. Officers will undergo additional training in crisis response and management, cultural diversity, mental illness and autism. The bill also extends the duration for the state's Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women Task Force to continue working through June 2021.

This report includes information from the Forum News Service.

Health officials say these MN districts can reopen schools. So, why won't they? Walz calls special session next week to consider 30-day extension of pandemic powers 2020 Minnesota Governor's Pheasant Opener postponed due to coronavirus Voters, GOP lawmakers plan lawsuit over Walz's mask mandate at polling places Walz renews pitch for federal aid in cleanup in aftermath of George Floyd unrest

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCX. BROWN, BREEN: RIGHTING THE MILITARY'S ROLE IN OUR DEMOCRACY

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 23, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 839 wordsByline: Anthony Brown and Michael BreenHighlight: The killing of George Floyd and the subsequent protests have compelled a righteous reckoning. Facing pressure from a large and diverse movement of Americans, many of our country's institutions are facing up to their role in perpetuating racial injustice. This reckoning should extend to our nation's armed forces. Congress has both the capacity and responsibility [...]Body

The killing of George Floyd and the subsequent protests have compelled a righteous reckoning. Facing pressure from a large and diverse movement of Americans, many of our country's institutions are facing up to their role in perpetuating racial injustice.

This reckoning should extend to our nation's armed forces. Congress has both the capacity and responsibility to ensure that the military, often a leader on racial equality since President Truman desegregated it in 1948, continues to set an example for the country.

While one of us serves in Congress and the other leads a human rights organization, we both wore the uniform of our country as Army officers. We led soldiers into battle and lost some of them in combat. It is because of our commitment to the military that we wish to see it even more faithfully reflect our country's ideals.

The most straightforward issue at hand is the rechristening of military bases currently named for Confederate leaders. Surely it is not too much to ask that the nomenclature of the military align with its mission. The purpose of the American military is to protect all of us, not the legacies of a small group of traitors.

For a nation founded on ideas, symbols are substance, whom we choose to memorialize speaks to what values we honor. Our military should celebrate those who fought for freedom, not those who led the effort to tear our country apart in the name of chattel slavery and white power. There's no non-racist reason that our armed forces should be shackled to the symbolism of the Confederacy.

Both the U.S. House and U.S. Senate version of the annual defense policy bill contain amendments that would rename bases. Each amendment passed in committee with bipartisan support, yet President Donald Trump says he will veto the entirety of the legislation based on this issue. The question is whether Republicans will side with the president or with racial progress.

A more complex problem: Military culture and weaponry have crept into American civil society, especially policing. The rise of the "warrior cop" has obscured the crucial distinction between the police and the military. As more police officers see themselves as commandos and more police forces resemble occupying armies, Black people pay the heaviest price, sometimes in blood.

With the support of Congress, our cities and states should institute training that teaches police to respect communities' cultures and to problem-solve rather than treat every interaction as a potential confrontation. In Washington state, for instance, Sheriff Sue Rahr (retired), executive director of the state's Criminal Justice Training Commission, has pioneered an approach that sees police as guardians, not warriors.

When political leaders consider our public square "battle space" and threaten to use active-duty military to quell protests, something has gone terribly wrong. In places where political leaders capriciously use the military against domestic unrest, major human rights problems arise - and public support for the military suffers.

While President Trump's threat to use military force against American protesters triggered widespread opposition, the problem of militarized policing remains. In the upcoming debate over the defense bill, Congress will vote on a crucial element of any solution: ending the Defense Department's 1033 program. Organizations meant to serve the public shouldn't be equipped like combat units, with M4 carbines and armor-piercing ammunition, grenades and launchers, mine-resistant ambush-protected vehicles, armed drones, or anything from the federal supply class of banned items.

Yet through that program, the military gives these weapons of war at minimal or no cost to police departments around the country. The program also transfers military equipment and weaponry to agencies like Customs and Border Patrol (CBP) and Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE). If we are serious about making law enforcement more just and our immigration system more humane, restricting and ultimately scrapping the 1033 program should be a top legislative priority.

Those are two vital steps Congress can take. There are others, from reforming the Insurrection Act to restricting military deployments to the southern border and combating white nationalism among service members. Such steps would strengthen the military as well as the country.

The military is among the most respected institutions in American society, and rightly so. Congress should both leverage and enhance the military's reputation by making sure it bolsters democracy at home. As the movement sparked by tragedy demands justice, Congress can put the military where it belongs: out of policing and on the forefront of progress.

Anthony Brown is a member of Congress representing Maryland's 4th District and served as an aviator and judge advocate general in the United States Army. Michael Breen is the president and CEO of Human Rights First, and a former officer in the United States Army. They wrote this column for the Baltimore Sun.

End of Document

St. Paul police debut truck armed with ice cream, video games, bike helmets

ARTICLE MCCCXI. ST. PAUL POLICE DEBUT TRUCK ARMED WITH ICE CREAM, VIDEO GAMES, BIKE HELMETS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 23, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 783 words

Byline: Sarah Horner

Highlight: Think of it as an ice cream truck on steroids, but the treats are free and the driver wears a badge. Armed with a video gaming system, basketball hoop, bike repair station and coolers stocked with cold treats and beverages, the St. Paul Police Department's new "bike truck" hit the streets Wednesday for its maiden [...]

Body

Think of it as an ice cream truck on steroids, but the treats are free and the driver wears a badge.

Armed with a video gaming system, basketball hoop, bike repair station and coolers stocked with cold treats and beverages, the St. Paul Police Department's new "bike truck" hit the streets Wednesday for its maiden voyage, according to Sgt. Jason Bain, the brains and heart behind the project.

Bain and his colleagues hope the latest addition to the department's fleet will have a decidedly different effect from squad cars when residents see it roll into their neighborhoods.

"This is about having fun and just reaching our kids, reaching the community with a positive message that we are here to talk to you, to get to know each other," he said.

Bain envisions kids challenging officers to gaming competitions on the truck's big-screen TV, and 5-year-olds playing three-on-three basketball on the 7-foot hoop.

The 23-foot 2019 Ford E-450 also is equipped with a bike maintenance station that will enable officers to repair flat tires, broken chains or other minor issues ailing kids' bikes. In addition to ice cream treats and water, staff will pass out helmets to kids who need them, Bain said.

The $81,000 vehicle was paid for by the Otto Bremer Trust, not city funds.

A bicycle officer since 2002 and a proud helmet evangelist, Bain says teaching bike safety is a big part of the truck's mission. He says far too many kids ride without them.

"The most important part of a person's body is their brain ... so if I can prevent just one little head, one little brain from getting hurt, that will be a win," he said.

St. Paul police debut truck armed with ice cream, video games, bike helmets

The project was inspired by the Bike Cops for Kids program in Minneapolis, which was started in 2009 by a couple of school resource officers who missed contact with kids during the summer months. They persuaded Children's Hospital to donate helmets, then hauled them to various neighborhoods in trailers hitched to bikes, handing them out to kids and promoting bike safety.

St. Paul brought the concept across the river in 2017, and it was wildly popular, Bain said, but its reach was limited by the department's inability to get to some neighborhoods. The truck fixes that problem, he said.

The department planned to debut the truck during St. Paul's annual St. Patrick's Day parade, but then the coronavirus arrived.

They've taken the past few months to create plans for safely operating the truck and interacting with the community during the pandemic. Officers will be masked and gloved, for example, and masks will be available for community members. The gaming station also will be washed between plays.

One remaining concern is that it'll draw too big a crowd, Bain said, which is why the city plans to hold smaller, pop-up events in various neighborhoods.

While not ideal, Bain said the timing - two months since George Floyd's death in Minneapolis - is perfect in some ways.

"We are dealing with protests all the time. People want to defund the police. OK, fine, but we still need to connect and talk with our community because we are still going to be here, it's just a matter of in what form," Bain said. "We can't just go into our own cocoons and only deal with ourselves ... otherwise we create a straight us versus them mentality, and we can't live like that."

Shooting near Mears Park injures 1 Sunday night North St. Paul man killed in crash after fleeing Dakota County sheriff's deputy Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Cleric assaulted outside Bloomington mosque; police searching for suspects U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities

"We have to get back out there and build our trust back," he continued. "Some of our discussions might be jovial ... and others might be more difficult, but I believe our entire department ... (is) ready and willing to have those discussions."

The truck's first planned stop Wednesday evening was Fourth Street East and Bates Avenue, where gunshots have been reported recently. Bain said he expects the truck will make about three appearances in various neighborhoods each week, with a focus on those heavily impacted by crime.

Chief Todd Axtell sung the truck's praises Wednesday.

"Our greatest hope is that families will come out to get to know our officers along with the kids and have some fun," he said. "Anytime you can have meaningful and authentic engagement between the community and our police, it pays dividends for years to come."

Besides police officers, the department's Law Enforcement Career Path Academy cadets will help staff the truck, Axtell said.

"We want to make sure that our future officers get to know the community before they police it," he said.

St. Paul police debut truck armed with ice cream, video games, bike helmets

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

City, county plan three new shelters to relieve wave of homelessness

ARTICLE MCCCXII.

CITY, COUNTY PLAN THREE NEW SHELTERS TO RELIEVE WAVE OF HOMELESSNESS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 23, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1B

Length: 579 words

Byline: MIGUEL OTAROLA; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: One built for Native Americans could open by the end of the year.

Body

The city of Minneapolis and Hennepin County will use federal coronavirus aid to help open three new homeless shelters and fund other measures for emergency housing, as many people continue to sleep overnight in local parks.

The shelters would be exclusive to three groups - women, Native Americans and the medically frail - and opened in partnership with the state and social service organizations. A City Council committee is scheduled to advance more than $8 million in CARES Act funding for the shelters Thursday.

Andrea Brennan, interim director of the city's community planning and economic development department, detailed the plans Wednesday during a briefing by department leaders.

"All three projects are a response to the significant increase in homelessness that has occurred locally since the beginning of the COVID-19 pandemic and subsequent economic turbulence," Brennan said. "We strongly believe that encampments, especially large encampments, pose serious safety risks."

Homeless individuals and families have camped across the city in the midst of the coronavirus pandemic, and later at parks after the killing of George Floyd. Earlier this month, 45% of people living at Powderhorn Park identified as Native American.

Officials have repeatedly expressed that those settlements can become dangerous and unsustainable. On Monday, one of two large encampments in Powderhorn was cleared by the Minneapolis Park and Recreation Board, which has urged other branches of government to find permanent housing for those who have taken refuge in parks.

Last week, a Hennepin County Board committee advanced $3.5 million in CARES funding for the American Indian Community Development Corporation (AICDC) to turn three buildings near the intersection of Cedar and Franklin avenues in south Minneapolis into a shelter. That shelter would have at least 50 beds for Native Americans and could open as early as this fall, according to documents.

City, county plan three new shelters to relieve wave of homelessness

The county will also purchase a vacant school at 2220 N. 16th Av. from Minneapolis Public Schools in north Minneapolis to create a year-round shelter for homeless women. The shelter could have up to 50 beds and open by February.

The city is also partnering with Catholic Charities to renovate a former nursing home at 1007 E. 14th St. into a 167-unit housing complex for the elderly, medically frail and veterans. There would be 59 units for homeless adults and 30 medical beds for homeless people who were discharged from hospitals, according to documents. The project could be open by fall of 2021.

"These shelters all respond to what has been identified as gaps in our homeless response system," Brennan said.

Earlier this month, the city and county also began accepting proposals for more immediate solutions to provide housing and outreach for homeless people. They will draw on up to $9 million in CARES funding. The deadline for these proposals is Friday; the city and county will evaluate them Aug. 3.

"We wanted to have a really short turnaround for the [request for proposals] because if something is ready to go, we want to get it going," Brennan said.

There are still open shelter beds across the county, said David Hewitt, the director of the county's Office to End Homelessness. Those include 50 private rooms for families with children, and 40 to 50 beds for single adults each night, he said.

Families with children who are homeless can find shelter rooms by calling Hennepin County at 612-348-9410.

Miguel Otárola · 612-673-4753

Load-Date: July 23, 2020

Letters: How many more missed opportunities in Minneapolis?

ARTICLE MCCCXIII.

LETTERS: HOW MANY MORE MISSED OPPORTUNITIES IN MINNEAPOLIS?

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 23, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1434 words

Byline: Letter Writers

Highlight: Lost opportunities and revenue On his July 2 radio show, Dave Ramsey announced the cancellation of his "Smart Conference," which was scheduled to be at Target Center in Minneapolis on Nov. 7. He cited the defunding of the police and lack of security as reasons. He does not want to put his people in an [...]

Body

On his July 2 radio show, Dave Ramsey announced the cancellation of his "Smart Conference," which was scheduled to be at Target Center in Minneapolis on Nov. 7.

He cited the defunding of the police and lack of security as reasons. He does not want to put his people in an unsafe situation.

Those who have been through the Dave Ramsey "Financial Peace" course know how valuable and life changing this information can be.

This was an opportunity for many people, of all races and income levels, to learn how to get out of debt, make wise every-day financial decisions, and hear other renowned speakers pertaining to life and money.

This was also an opportunity for hundreds of local people to work the event in concessions, maintenance, custodial capacities, ushers, parking attendants, etc.

The decisions of the Minneapolis City Council and the general anti-business climate in our state right now have just cost Minneapolis hundreds of thousands of dollars in lost revenue and job opportunities.

This is just one event ... how many more will follow?

Jeff Pedro, Roseville

I've always enjoyed Joe Soucheray's posts but never more than I did after reading his column in Sunday's paper ("Lawless people are shooting up the towns"). Good for you, Joe for having the courage to use your public platform to address the major problem in our society today. Until respect and morality return, I'm afraid we as a nation are doomed.

Letters: How many more missed opportunities in Minneapolis?

This lawlessness is prevailing because it has been allowed to, with no courage coming from our governor or other high officials to address the real problem here. The only courage I'm seeing today is ironically coming from law enforcement, the very people who are criticized and vilified, and who are expected to maintain peace and order while being spat upon and assaulted, and can only be allowed to turn the other cheek. I would like to think that we Minnesotans are better than this, but until our leaders display some courage and address these problems head on, I'm afraid nothing will change - just more intimidation, disrespect, destruction and lawlessness. And by the way, instead of talking about retraining the police, maybe parents should START training their children to respect people and property.

Larry Geisen, Oakdale

I saw a news story about a southwest Missouri summer camp where they gave every child a Covid-19 test on arrival. The test results didn't come back for a week and when they did two children had tested positive.

Then they did a retest and the results were 42 were positive after the second test. They then sent everyone home.

That should give us some idea how back to school would work.

I also saw on the local news that private Minneapolis schools are going to have in-person classes in the fall. If they test students after two weeks the test results should give a very good indication how safe that would be for the children from public schools to attend in-school classes.

Tom Kapsner, White Bear Lake

The U.S.'s 19-year war in Vietnam cost the lives of 72,000 American soldiers. By comparison, less than six months into the novel coronavirus pandemic, over 141,000 Americans have lost their lives to the virus, and the end is nowhere in sight. The U.S., with roughly 4.25% of the world's population, currently accounts for a whopping 26.5% of the world's casualties.

We have a president who has abdicated responsibility for combating this virus, and instead has used the pandemic as yet another tool with which to divide this nation. He has turned over responsibility to individual states for procuring whatever resources they need to fight this pandemic, while at the same time putting up roadblocks to prevent them from doing so. Rather than uniting behind the scientists in his own administration, and listening to their advice and following their recommendations, he has undermined and attacked them. Something as simple as wearing a face mask and practicing social distancing have become political statements due to Trump's posturing.

In Minnesota, Gov. Waltz and his team have done an admirable job, so far, of managing an extremely difficult situation. Some hard choices have been made along the way, and Waltz and his team have made every effort to be transparent and forthcoming in explaining the rationale for those decisions. No question, more difficult decisions lie ahead. But, now it seems that several Republicans have sued the governor for using the executive powers granted to him by bipartisan vote at the outset of this pandemic. What kind of nonsense is this?

Letters: How many more missed opportunities in Minneapolis?

This pandemic is far from over. With the number of new cases steadily rising and reaching a one-day record of more than 75,000 on July 16, this is not the time to throw caution to the wind. As a nation we must all pull together to beat this pandemic. When Walmart, Target, Best Buy, Menards, and numerous other businesses can see the necessity for mandating mask-wearing in their stores, it should tell us something. It's time to set aside political differences, and follow the recommendations of the experts: wash your hands, wear a mask in public, and keep appropriate social distancing. Please.

Hans Mouritzen, St. Paul

We need more owners

The Twin Cities has always wrestled with prospects for future growth. Some treat the prospect of higher urban density per square mile with contempt while others embrace it. The fact of the matter is the Twin Cities is not getting any smaller unless we collectively want to transform into the next Cleveland or Detroit.

It can be hoped that riots inspired by George Floyd's murder will not scare away community builders and urban developers. For that reason, urbanity is something that should be embraced, not fought. It is an inexorable process. Metropolitan cities do two things: grow or decline. Rather than reminiscing on better days long past, why not embrace the future with an evolutionary mindset?

It is true, we need more property owners in our communities, not absentee landlords and neglected renters. Higher population densities should not be instantaneously associated with increased demand for rental properties. Why is the taxpaying public not lobbying builders and developers to build more opportunities for home ownership through subsidized rent-to-own programs through their elected officials?

Why are we not witnessing a surge in the construction of publicly financed townhome condominiums for demographically challenged communities of color? Why have we not made a commitment to return home ownership as a prospect for working classes over the demographically privileged? People are generally more inclined to care about their communities when they own a direct part of them.

Growth requires investments in public infrastructure. Lessening our dependence on automobiles will attribute creative renditions to mass transit through the expansion of light rail, reintroduction of the street car and exploring the possibility of expanding Metro Mobility para-transit to under-served communities.

The Twin Cities has long grown accustomed to thinking big and acting small. Now is the time to reverse this trend so we can start practicing what we preach.

Omar Alansari-Kreger, Richfield

No statues, no names

Letters: How many more missed opportunities in Minneapolis?

Due to the recent removal of only certain statues and sculptures, in total fairness to every persons sensitivity, ALL statues and sculptures should be removed from ALL public properties.

Each state should set up a agency that is responsible for the systematic removal process. Not one group or groups should be shown any favoritism. The removed icons can be stored in a warehouse for educational purposes only. This approach will encompass the sensitivities of every person in the U.S. No favoritism, no discrimination, no exceptions, every issue of every person is addressed. The ACLU and all legal groups will agree that this approach treats everyone fairly and is non-discriminant.

The next sensitivity that needs to be addressed is to remove any and all names from any public facility. Just remove the names and replace them with address numbers.

The only remaining issue that will need to be addressed will be the tradition of naming school, college, and professional athletics. I am sure that the politicians and activists can come to an easy, non-discriminant, non-offensive policy that treats everyone equally.

Dave Wilhelmy, Siren, Wis.

Letters: We need more good police, not fewer Hey, State Fair ticket scalpers: you're tainted! Letters: Mayor and governor point fingers but expect the federal government to pay? Letters: Is it the most-rigged election ever, win or lose? Letters: What's the St. Paul budget plan?

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCXIV.

MYSTERY AND BEAUTY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 23, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 10ALength: 352 wordsBody

When an out-of-town guest arrives for a visit, it's an occasion to think about how the life we live might come across to someone who has been away for a while - say, 6,800 years.

What will the visitor think of what we've done with the place?

One night last week, the Comet Neowise appeared to be hanging motionless in the sky over Lake Nokomis, devoid of either opinion or activity. Away from city lights it might be visible to the naked eye, but in south Minneapolis we needed binoculars.

James Flaten, associate director of NASA's Minnesota Space Grant Consortium, says we should all get out there and see Neowise. "People should take advantage of this opportunity," he said. "You don't know when you'll have another one."

The ancients assigned supernatural meaning to the appearance of a comet, but of course we know better. So what if there was a comet in the sky when Jerusalem was destroyed, or the Normans invaded England, or the assassinated Julius Caesar was awaiting his designation as a god? Those were primitive times, and there was always something dire going on. Not like today.

But try telling that to the Venerable Bede, a monk and historian who lived in England about 1,300 years ago. Bede wrote that a comet meant a change in leadership, or a plague. Or hot, windy weather. Or a war.

If Bede were available to debate the point today, he might ask us about COVID-19, climate change and Donald Trump's re-election campaign. He might even challenge us to explain George Floyd's death and the events that followed it. Bede and his colleagues through the ages may have understood something we don't: that the appearance of a comet, invoking the beauty and mystery of the universe, may be giving us an opportunity to ponder something bigger and more meaningful than ourselves.

A comet is the natural world - make that the natural cosmos - asserting its longevity, in contrast to the eyeblink of our existence. How are we spending the short time we have? There were people in Minnesota the last time Neowise visited, and perhaps even the time before that. Whether we'll be here the next time is anybody's guess.

Load-Date: July 23, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCXV.

SKYWAY RESTAURANT STRATEGY FROM D. BRIAN'S, CARDIGAN DONUTS, BROTHERS DELI: HANG ON

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

July 23, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 739 words

Byline: Dylan Thomas

Body

Ever stroll the Minneapolis skyways on a Sunday in the dead of winter? That's what a typical weekday in the once-bustling city core feels like during the coronavirus pandemic, said Doug Sams, owner of D. Brian's Deli.

"There's very few skyway businesses open, and there's very few people downtown," Sams said.

He said it has been that way for four months now, since the middle March, when a massive shift to remote working cleared out downtown offices. The skyway-level restaurants that remain open are playing a waiting game, clinging to hope that they can stay in business until their customers return - maybe after Labor Day, maybe sometime next year.

Minneapolis-based D. Brian's Deli Corp. is a group of seven Twin Cities restaurants, including three Minneapolis skyway locations. The US Bancorp Center location at 800 Nicollet Mall is the only one of the three to remain open through the pandemic, operating on a skeleton crew of three workers instead of its usual 12.

Skyway restaurant strategy from D. Brian's, Cardigan Donuts, Brothers Deli: Hang on

"We've been running at about 10% of normal sales. It hasn't changed at all (since March), and I don't think it's going to change until there's a vaccine and people come back," Sams said, adding that D. Brian's catering business is experiencing a similar slowdown.

He described a Paycheck Protection Program loan from the U.S. Small Business Administration as "the only lifeline that has really made a difference." Sams predicted the fate of many skyway businesses will be decided in negotiations with their landlords.

"Only the landlords can decide which restaurants are going to permanently close and which ones are going to reopen once the vaccine is available," he said.

Sams expects to see a wave of skyway business closures, and he's not the only one. Over in the skyway of the 50 South Sixth building, home to The Brothers Deli, owner Jeff Burstein predicted many skyway businesses won't survive without additional government assistance or rent forgiveness - not just the deferred payment plans being presented to many commercial tenants.

"So far the landlord has been very willing to do whatever they can to make sure Brothers stays in business," Burstein said.

Burstein said he's hoping another 10%-15% of the downtown worker population returns after Labor Day. That could be enough to get him by until there's a vaccine.

He said Brothers used to see 175 to 250 customers walk through the door every weekday. Now it's closer to 20 or 30, and Burstein has just two employees behind the counter instead of 10. He's doing about 15% of the catering business he had pre-pandemic.

Justin Bedford, co-owner and general manager of Cardigan Donuts, located in City Center, said a quick pivot to curbside pickup and delivery at the start of the pandemic - along with a PPP loan - kept the doors open and more than 20 employees on the job. Cardigan, which previously shuttled donuts through the skyways, expanded its delivery zone to a 20-mile radius and turned baristas into delivery drivers.

Except for a brief pause during the unrest that followed George Floyd's killing by a Minneapolis police officer, Cardigan has kept its skyway shop open for takeaway. Bedford said third-party delivery services, which used to account for 5%-7% of overall sales, are now closer to 30%.

Bedford said Cardigan is "averaging a solid 50%-60% of sales, year over year," but added that an increase in delivery orders eats away at the donut shop's margins.

He said the pandemic is going to change the dynamic for skyway restaurants. Those that come out the other end will likely have far less competition, at least for a while.

They may also have a smaller downtown daytime population to serve. It's widely predicted that remote working will become more commonplace in the post-pandemic environment, and some workers may make a permanent shift to working from home.

Bedford noted that skyway commercial spaces are often marketed based on office occupancy rates and foot traffic, two numbers that could fall in the post-pandemic environment. Lease rates could fall, too.

Skyway restaurant strategy from D. Brian's, Cardigan Donuts, Brothers Deli: Hang on

Sams said it should at least help bring supply and demand for downtown commercial spaces back into balance. He said skyway commercial lease rates "have to be at an all-time high now," but predicted they wouldn't stay there for long.

"So, I do think when we get back to normal there's going to be an upside," he said.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: July 27, 2020

End of Document

'There's somebody in there!'

ARTICLE MCCCXVI.

'THERE'S SOMEBODY IN THERE!'

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 23, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1B

Length: 689 words

Byline: ERIC ROPER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: Witnesses recall cries for help from pawnshop where body was found this week

Body

At the height of the riots following the Minneapolis police killing of George Floyd, bystanders were frantically trying to save someone trapped in a burning pawnshop.

The Max It Pawn store at 2726 E. Lake St. was one of dozens of buildings leveled by the fires that blazed throughout Minneapolis during the riots in late May. But the discovery of a man's body amid the rubble this week - nearly two months later - marks the second known death from the unrest.

People had been looting the pawnshop on May 28 before someone lit it on fire, according to federal charges. As smoke began billowing out of the building, a man called inside to see if anyone was still there, recalled Lucas Anderson, a film producer from Minneapolis whose friend was shooting footage of the scene.

"All of a sudden he starts yelling, 'There's somebody in there! There's somebody in there! We've got to get them out of there!' " said Anderson, 27.

The windows were boarded up, so Anderson and several others tried in vain to pull down the plywood panels to clear the smoke and see inside. They shined flashlights inside the small open window and told the person to crawl toward them.

"I thought I heard them say, 'We can't find our way out. We don't know where to go,' " Anderson said. "And then that's when we pulled out the flashlight. And we said, 'Try and follow the flashlight. See if you can open your eyes and look for the flashlight.' "

The group spent 15 or 20 minutes scrambling to help whoever was trapped inside, with little luck.

"Then eventually we stopped hearing the cries for help inside," Anderson said.

When firefighters arrived, Anderson told them that someone was inside the building.

'There's somebody in there!'

Fire Department spokesman Bryan Tyner said people in the area were shouting to firefighters that there may be someone inside the building. It is standard protocol to search for victims when buildings are on fire, he said, and crews entered the side door of the pawnshop and attempted to search it.

"The building was fully involved upon their arrival," Tyner wrote in an e-mail. "Crews went in as far as they could but the fire conditions combined with the roof condition prevented crews from getting through the structure."

Caleb Spike, 19, of Maple Grove had been observing the scene around Lake Street and Hiawatha Avenue when he arrived at the burning pawnshop - several minutes before firefighters got there.

He observed people going in and out of a door on the back side of the building, despite thick smoke inside. As the fire spread and consumed several plywood panels, a woman standing beside him shook her head.

"She [said], 'I don't think that man came out. I just don't think that man came out,'" Spike recalled.

Today a pile of rubble, mangled metal and other debris remain at the site where Max It Pawn stood. Crews on Wednesday were using skid steers to help clear the lot.

After receiving a tip, city, state and federal officials combed through the wreckage on Monday, where they discovered the body. The dead man's identity and cause of death have not been released.

It was not the first time the pawnshop fire scene had been examined, said Ashlee Sherrill, a spokeswoman for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF). Sherrill said ATF and other government officials have examined more than 150 scenes looking for the origins and causes of the fires.

"ATF and our partners have returned to a number of these fire scenes based on evidence and information that continues to be developed through the investigative process," Sherrill said.

Montez Terriel Lee, of Rochester, was charged last month with setting the fire at Max It Pawn. A federal complaint says a video shows Lee pouring liquid around the pawnshop before the fire.

Representatives for the building's owner and Max It Pawn did not respond to messages seeking comment.

The other death during the rioting occurred at a different pawnshop, Cadillac Pawn, about a mile west on Lake Street. The victim in that incident, Calvin L. Horton Jr., was shot. The pawnshop owner accused of shooting him was arrested but released without charges.

Eric Roper · 612-673-1732

Twitter: @StribRoper

Load-Date: July 23, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCXVII.

RACHEL MARSDEN: AMERICA BORROWS FROM CHINA'S PLAYBOOK IN DEALING WITH PROTESTERS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 24, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 802 wordsByline: Rachel MarsdenHighlight: VANCOUVER, British Columbia - The Department of Homeland Security was created in the wake of the 9/11 attacks as a daycare center to encourage the FBI and CIA to play nice and share terrorism intelligence with each other instead of hoarding it. But Homeland Security has a new focus these days under President Donald Trump. [...]

Body

VANCOUVER, British Columbia - The Department of Homeland Security was created in the wake of the 9/11 attacks as a daycare center to encourage the FBI and CIA to play nice and share terrorism intelligence with each other instead of hoarding it. But Homeland Security has a new focus these days under President Donald Trump.

Formally, the new role is to guard federal property, such as statues and courthouses, from protesters. In practice, it means grabbing American citizens off the street and shoving them into unmarked vans.

Outfitted in what looks like surplus gear from a Pentagon spending spree, the estimated 2,000 officers from a patchwork of agencies - the Coast Guard, the Federal Protective Service, Customs and Border Protection, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and the Transportation Security Administration (the folks who frisk you at airport security) - are now being dispatched by Attorney General William Barr to protest flashpoints around the country.

It's not exactly a stretch for Homeland Security, created to combat terrorism, to now be combating protesters. Antifa are the new jihadists.

"The United States of America will be designating ANTIFA as a Terrorist Organization," Trump tweeted on May 31. This administration sees antifa in every protest - so it believes it has cause to treat each protest as a potential terrorist threat.

As someone based in France who has spent a dozen years enjoying cool beverages through the straw of a gas mask while observing protest dynamics, it's clear that only a small fraction of protest participants are antifa or black bloc anarchist types who are just there to break things. Not that they shouldn't be dealt with, but it's far too convenient to tar everyone with the same extremist brush and dismiss the legitimate concerns of protesters.

Rachel Marsden: America borrows from China's playbook in dealing with protesters

When protests occur in non-allied countries, the U.S. government rarely sees any paid agitators or terrorists - only victims of a "regime." Without knowing whether there are paid agitators in protests in Hong Kong, Russia, Iran or Venezuela, America brands all of these protesters as freedom fighters.

While domestic troops from Homeland Security clash with Portland protesters, Oregon's attorney general, Ellen Rosenblum, "filed a lawsuit in Federal District Court accusing the federal agents of engaging in unlawful tactics and seeking a restraining order," according to the New York Times. Meanwhile, Barr has been criticizing Chinese leadership for trying to get a handle on the unrest in its own country.

After months of Hong Kong protests against the Chinese government, Beijing was fed up with a piece of its territory being dominated by popular revolt. Protesters apparently felt empowered by the "one country, two system" autonomy granted to Hong Kong when it was handed back from the United Kingdom in 1997.

Much like Trump branded antifa a terrorist group - a formality that facilitates investigations into the group's possible foreign or domestic funding sources - the Chinese government closed the Hong Kong loophole that makes it vulnerable to foreign interference by passing new Hong Kong security laws aimed at punishing crimes of subversion, terrorism, secession and collusion with foreign forces, now punishable with sentences as severe as life in prison.

Beijing is handling domestic unrest in much the same way Barr wants to manage protests in the U.S. states, sending in federal troops in unmarked gear. But when China does it, it's unacceptable to Barr.

"As its ruthless crackdown of Hong Kong demonstrates once again, China is no closer to democracy today than it was in 1989, when tanks confronted pro-democracy protesters in Tiananmen Square," Barr said in a speech last week.

If the U.S. is allowed to crack down on terrorism, shouldn't other nations be able to do the same? Of course, there's the argument that some countries could use the fight against terrorism as a pretext to label political opponents as terrorists. But isn't that what's happening with protesters in the U.S., who are all being tarred with the antifa brush?

The U.S. government is hardly in a position to criticize another country's exploitation of the war against terrorism, having cited questionable national security threats as a bogus pretext for everything from fruitless foreign invasions to massive global data dragnets - you know, the kind of data collection that Barr has been warning that China might do with Huawei 5G technology.

Barr's domestic antiterrorism tactics are no different than the Chinese government's tactics in Hong Kong. The fact that Barr and the Trump administration are even attempting to pass judgment - let alone economic sanctions - is a farce.

Rachel Marsden is a columnist, political strategist and host of an independently produced French-language program that airs on Sputnik France.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

PROPOSED BALLOT QUESTION

ARTICLE MCCCXVIII. PROPOSED BALLOT QUESTION

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 24, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 9ALength: 884 wordsByline: JACKIE CHERRYHOMES; F. CLAYTON TYLER; TIM BAYLOR; DON SAMUELS; SONDRA SAMUELS; TOM HOCH; MARK ADDICKS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Minneapolis needn't change its charter to change policing // City Council members haven't done the hard work of developing specific and actionable reforms.Body

Our city is reeling from serial tragedies. The death of George Floyd was a searing event and a stark reminder of the deeply rooted systemic racism we must eliminate from the culture of the Minneapolis Police Department (MPD). The destruction of livelihoods and needed services along Lake Street and West Broadway compounded the horror. And now, our community is enduring an alarming spike in senseless gun violence that has overwhelmingly claimed African Americans as its victims.

At stake is the future of our city, which faces an almost existential crisis. From our perspective, communities of color have been doubly victimized. We've had to endure episodes of flat-out police racism and excessive force. At the same time, our communities have been victims of crime well beyond our share of the population.

We depend on an imperfect police force lest we have an even worse situation. Solving this crisis will take awesome persistence, serious discussion, bold thinking and follow-through. It is imperative that we reform and reinvent our approach to effective and just public safety for all our citizens.

Unfortunately, the City Council's response to this crisis is a proposed charter amendment that will solve nothing. The council wants to eliminate the current MPD and transfer to itself the mayor's authority over law enforcement.

In reality, beyond bumper sticker slogans and announcing a new bureaucracy, the council has not done the hard work of designing a specific and actionable new public safety system to replace the current one. They haven't told us what comes next, let alone shown us that it will work.

All we know is that the council plans to remove the mayor's authority to run whatever (if any) law enforcement operation replaces the current MPD. They want to create a new bureaucracy run by a bureaucrat answerable to council members. Simply put, the council's proposal makes 13 council members and one bureaucrat accountable for law enforcement instead of the mayor and the police chief.

PROPOSED BALLOT QUESTION

In the real world, of course, having 14 people "accountable" means nobody is really accountable.

Interestingly, two years ago the council proposed the same idea. The Charter Commission quite properly delayed putting it on the 2018 ballot. The council had 24 months to put it on the 2020 ballot but waited until now to insist that it appear. It does seem that some council members are using the current crisis as a cover for rushing an ill-formed idea to the November ballot.

The fact is that the mayor and City Council can enact and enforce significant reforms without changing the city's charter. Frankly, major police reform has not been a city priority for quite some time, perhaps because reform costs money. What we need now is hard thinking, political will and wise use of resources.

More community policing and giving the mayor and the police leadership the authority to discipline and sanction officers without having decisions routinely overturned by arbitrators are just the beginning. Some reforms the city can implement unilaterally. Others may require changes in state law. None require changes to the charter.

We are also concerned that the council proposal eliminates the job of our current chief and makes him ineligible to oversee the newly imagined public safety department. If anything, given Chief Medaria Arradondo's highly regarded ethics, compassion, ability and experience, the council should give him the resources he needs to expand the MPD's community outreach efforts. This is essential if we truly want to shrink the "warrior mentality" that we all know afflicts too many officers.

We share everyone's bottom line: to change the culture of the Minneapolis Police Department. But changing the Minneapolis charter is not the place to start. It may be necessary at some point, but only after the architects of the current proposal can tell the voters what the new system will actually look like and whether it will actually work.

The council hurried its proposed charter amendment to the Charter Commission with no extended discussion and not one public hearing. So now it's up to the commission to initiate a detailed and inclusive discussion of how to transform the MPD into an agency that reflects the best values of all our Minneapolis residents. If that means waiting until next year to change the charter, so be it.

It is false to assert that it's the city's charter preventing transformative change to the MPD. Yes, the voters have a right to vote on major changes to the city's charter. But city leaders have an obligation to give the voters the chance to make an informed choice. The proposed amendment only gives the voters a choice between doing nothing or giving the City Council a blank check to "defund the cops" and eliminate the mayor's role in running law enforcement.

That is not a path for transforming the law enforcement culture of Minneapolis.

Jackie Cherryhomes is former president of the Minneapolis City Council. Don Samuels is a former City Council member, former Minneapolis school board member and CEO of Microgrants. Sondra Samuels is CEO of the Northside Achievement Zone. F. Clayton Tyler is a criminal-defense attorney. Tim Baylor is a North Side business owner. Tom Hoch is former CEO of the Hennepin Theatre Trust. Mark Addicks is a Minneapolis resident.

Load-Date: July 27, 2020

PROPOSED BALLOT QUESTION

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCXIX.

MINNEAPOLIS COUNCIL SHIFTS POLICE MEDIA DUTIES TO CITY STAFF

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 24, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 883 wordsByline: Amy Forliti

Highlight: The Minneapolis City Council voted Friday to shift police media duties from the Police Department to city staff in what one council member called a move to improve trust, amid calls for changes in policing after George Floyd's death. The change was approved 9-3. Some council members wanted more time to consider the move, while [...]

Body

The Minneapolis City Council voted Friday to shift police media duties from the Police Department to city staff in what one council member called a move to improve trust, amid calls for changes in policing after George Floyd's death.

The change was approved 9-3. Some council members wanted more time to consider the move, while journalists said they worried it could make it harder and take longer to get information.

The vote came as the city revised its budget to address a $156 million revenue dip due to the coronavirus pandemic. The shift in media duties won't affect the city's bottom line, but was seen as emblematic of a struggle over the future of policing in Minneapolis, where a majority of council members favor replacing the current department with a different kind of public safety agency. Overall, the City Council members redirected more than $1 million from a $193 million police budget Friday.

Council Member Steve Fletcher said the communications change is part of the larger process of examining whether functions currently handled by the Police Department could be done by someone else. Some council members also cited erroneous information given out by police after Floyd's death: In an initial statement, spokesman John Elder said Floyd "appeared to be suffering medical distress" after he resisted arrest and was handcuffed.

Cellphone video recorded by a bystander showed Floyd pleading for air as a white officer, Derek Chauvin, pressed his knee into the Black man's neck for nearly eight minutes and people nearby urged officers to help him.

Elder has told the Associated Press that the initial description came after he was briefed by supervisors, and that he had not had time to review body camera video.

Minneapolis council shifts police media duties to city staff

Lisa Goodman, a council member who voted against the change, said it "almost feels like it's retaliatory" against Elder, whom she said thought he was giving correct information.

"This is hardly transformational change," she said, repeating a phrase used by council members who have said they want to significantly remake the department.

Fletcher conceded the change was small, but added: "People are asking us to do change. People are asking us to do this work, and I think it's very important that we move forward."

Suki Dardarian, managing editor at the Minneapolis Star Tribune, told one council member in an email that it's important to have city spokespeople who are trusted, credible, understand the subject matter and appreciate the need for transparency. When it comes to law enforcement, those spokespeople need to be accessible at all hours.

In an interview with the AP, Dardarian said she was concerned about revamping the city's communication structure when so much is at stake, and fears the move will make transparency more difficult and decrease access to timely information. She said journalists work to track down information from multiple sources, including authorities, to get the truth.

"If we don't have the information to begin with, it's hard to really seek the truth," she said.

The board for the Minnesota Chapter of the Society of Professional Journalists sent City Council members a letter discouraging the move, saying it was also concerned about access, and that placing the media position under city direction "would further erode public trust."

Fletcher, who said there was a "pattern of inaccuracy" in information coming from the Police Department, said he was committed to ensuring access to reporters and was "convinced this is a move that can move us forward, rather than backward."

When later asked to elaborate on other inaccuracies, Fletcher pointed to a June night in which multiple people were shot in a popular nightlife area. Police initially reported that one person died in that shooting, but later learned the fatality was from a separate shooting in another location, citing confusion when multiple shooting victims went to the same hospital.

Fletcher said rushing out information stoked fear in the community, and narratives that dramatize situations do the public a disservice.

Police Chief Medaria Arradondo, who opposed the change, released a statement saying the department has been lucky to have Elder help serve as the face and voice of the department, and the media position has helped the agency build relationships.

When previously asked to address the information about Floyd's death, Elder told the AP the Police Department realized its initial statement was inaccurate hours later when the bystander video surfaced. By then, state investigators took over and Elder said he didn't have authority to send out a correction.

"I will never lie to cover up the actions of somebody else," Elder told the AP.

Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and manslaughter. Three other officers - Thomas Lane, J. Kueng and Tou Thao - were charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and manslaughter. All four officers were fired.

Minneapolis council shifts police media duties to city staff

Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police Attorney for fired Minneapolis officer says Freeman should be removed from George Floyd case

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Roseville man accused of threatening to burn neighbors homes 'while you sleep in it' over Black Lives Matter signs

ARTICLE MCCCXX. ROSEVILLE MAN ACCUSED OF THREATENING TO BURN NEIGHBORS HOMES 'WHILE YOU SLEEP IN IT' OVER BLACK LIVES MATTER SIGNS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 24, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 389 words

Byline: Nick Woltman

Highlight: A Roseville man is accused of threatening his neighbors who displayed Black Lives Matter signs outside their homes in the wake of George Floyd's death. Kevin Jay Karjalahti, 49, was charged Thursday with three counts of making threats of violence, according to a criminal complaint filed in Ramsey County District Court. If convicted, he faces [...]

Body

A Roseville man is accused of threatening his neighbors who displayed Black Lives Matter signs outside their homes in the wake of George Floyd's death.

Kevin Jay Karjalahti, 49, was charged Thursday with three counts of making threats of violence, according to a criminal complaint filed in Ramsey County District Court. If convicted, he faces up to 15 years in prison and $30,000 in fines.

Karjalahti was arrested Wednesday and his first appearance before a judge is scheduled for Friday.

"I want to thank Minnesota Bureau of Criminal Apprehension and the Roseville Police Department for their special diligence in pursuing this case to the point where we can seek justice for the victims in this case," Ramsey County Attorney John Choi said in a news release. "Members of our community should be able to express their feeling about issues that are important to them without the fear of threat or reprisal."

Between May 30 and June 1, a handful of homeowners along Fernwood Avenue in Roseville and St. Paul reported to police that they received handwritten, profanity-laced notes demanding they remove Black Lives Matter signs from their yards.

Three of the notes threatened to burn down the occupants' houses if the signs stayed up.

"Your neighbors are sick of riots and your SJW (social justice warrior) Sh-t," one note read. "Your 'Bullsh-t Matters' comes down or you and your Home will Burn real Quiet While you Sleep in it!"

The notes were discovered in the days after the unrest that followed Floyd's death at the hands of Minneapolis police, during which dozens of Twin Cities buildings were burned.

Roseville man accused of threatening to burn neighbors homes 'while you sleep in it' over Black Lives Matter signs

Investigators submitted the notes for fingerprint analysis to the Minnesota Bureau of Criminal Apprehension, which matched prints found on the notes to those on file for Karjalahti, according to the charges against him.

During an interview with police on July 22, Karjalahti denied any knowledge of the notes, even after being confronted with the fingerprint evidence, the charges say.

Karjalahti's wife, however, allegedly admitted her husband wrote the notes because he was "frustrated after the city was destroyed during the civil unrest."

A spokesman for the Ramsey County attorney's office said it does not appear this case is related to other instances in which Black Lives Matter signs were vandalized or stolen from Roseville homes.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

John Kass: Something grows in the big cities run by Democrats: an overwhelming sense of lawlessness

ARTICLE MCCCXXI.

JOHN KASS: SOMETHING GROWS IN THE BIG CITIES RUN BY DEMOCRATS: AN OVERWHELMING SENSE OF LAWLESSNESS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 24, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 944 words

Byline: John Kass

Highlight: President Donald Trump is sending federal law enforcement into the big cities run by Democratic mayors, where murder and gang shootings are out of control and where once vibrant downtown areas are on their way to becoming ghost towns. And naturally, the Democratic mayors, backing Joe Biden, are on the defensive, upset that the president [...]

Body

President Donald Trump is sending federal law enforcement into the big cities run by Democratic mayors, where murder and gang shootings are out of control and where once vibrant downtown areas are on their way to becoming ghost towns.

And naturally, the Democratic mayors, backing Joe Biden, are on the defensive, upset that the president might win political advantage, even as the mayors feud with their own police departments, as the violence rises in their towns, as children are gunned down.

But these Democratic cities are also where left-wing billionaire George Soros has spent millions of dollars to help elect liberal social justice warriors as prosecutors. He remakes the justice system in urban America, flying under the radar.

The Soros-funded prosecutors, not the mayors, are the ones who help release the violent on little or no bond.

In Chicago, Philadelphia, San Francisco, St. Louis and elsewhere, it is the mayors who are the faces of their cities, not the prosecutors.

And the mayors properly take the heat as the violence spikes.

How do the people process all of the politics, amid those stories counting the dead and wounded?

Politicians speak with their tongues. Taxpayers don't hold news conferences. But they do vote with their feet. And they leave.

The mayors play to their base, condemning Trump publicly for federal overreach, even as their overwhelmed police departments welcome all the help they can get.

John Kass: Something grows in the big cities run by Democrats: an overwhelming sense of lawlessness

Chaos is indeed a ladder.

If Trump truly wants to help the cities, he might privately call the mayors and ask them about the prosecutors backed by Soros.

These prosecutors are among the few politicians in America who have delivered on their promises. They promised to empty their jails through the social justice warrior policy of "decarceration." They also help give repeat, violent criminals little or no bond when arrested.

And in many of the violent cities, the prosecutors have delivered on their promises, not to keep the violent in jail, but to let them out.

In Democratic Chicago, for example, the Soros prosecutor is Cook County State's Attorney Kim Foxx. In her 2020 campaign, she reportedly received at least $2 million from a Soros-backed political action committee.

Foxx doesn't have a stellar legal reputation. Her office is under investigation for how it handled that Jussie Smollett fiasco. But she'd like to climb the ladder and become a U.S. senator.

She's the protege of Cook County Democratic boss Toni Preckwinkle, the president of the Cook County Board. And Cook County Chief Judge Tim Evans is on the Preckwinkle social justice warrior team too.

Foxx announced years ago she wouldn't aggressively prosecute shoplifters. This preceded a wave of shoplifting gangs violently hitting the boutiques on North Michigan Avenue, long before looting and unrest grew out of the George Floyd protests.

And Lori Lightfoot takes the heat. She'll have to decide whether to call Foxx out herself, or just keep taking that heat.

Foxx put out a memo on June 30 reinforcing her wokeness, informing Chicago's City Hall and police that she will not prosecute "peaceful protesters."

In the hours after the Floyd protests here, many were arrested on charges of disorderly conduct and curfew violations. These are tools used by mayors to compel order in cities.

But Foxx doesn't see it that way. She sides with the woke.

A recent Chicago Tribune investigation found that of 162 offenders arrested and charged with felonies before the Floyd protests - and who were bailed out by liberal social justice warrior groups - more than 1 in 5 were charged with new offenses.

Other Soros-backed prosecutors in other cities play a similar game.

They won't anger their base when they release violent offenders back into poor neighborhoods to commit other violent acts on poor people. The left is their base. This is what they want, what Soros paid for.

In Democratic cities across America, the shootings increase, the murder rates soar, and street gangs are emboldened. Meanwhile, the angry white woke world, with their Black Lives Matter allies, continue to attack public monuments to Western culture. And police.

John Kass: Something grows in the big cities run by Democrats: an overwhelming sense of lawlessness

This all leads to scenes such as the one in Chicago the other day, with cops trying to protect a statue of Christopher Columbus in Grant Park, overwhelmed by a large, angry mob. Dozens in the crowd carried black umbrellas to hide their identities, as they dumped cases of frozen water bottles on the ground. And the mob threw them like bricks at the heads of officers.

Lightfoot, nationally famous for her anti-Trump commentary, was somewhat measured about federal agents coming to Chicago. And the other day she was incensed at what she termed a "coordinated attack" on cops at the Columbus statue.

At least 49 police officers were injured and 18 required hospital treatment after the rage at the Columbus statue, where those frozen bottles, along with rocks and fireworks, were thrown at them.

I suppose this is the place where I'm supposed to adopt newspeak and characterize the mayhem as "mostly peaceful protests." But no.

If you're a Democrat, you might worry that Trump will score political points by sending federal agents to the violent cities.

If you're a Republican, or an independent with a new police scanner app on your cellphone, waiting for your firearm owners permit in the mail, you might say it's about time.

And if you're trapped in one of the violent urban neighborhoods, you're hoping that your children won't be killed as they sit on your front porch.

You can see that something is growing in the big cities:

An overwhelming sense of lawlessness.

John Kass is a columnist for the Chicago Tribune. His e-mail address is jskass@chicagotribune.com

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCXXII.

RALLY DECRIES FEDERAL OFFICERS IN PORTLAND

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 24, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 5BLength: 331 wordsByline: ERIN ADLER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Activists gathered in downtown Minneapolis, with many predicting a presence here as well.Body

Several hundred people gathered in front of the federal courthouse in Minneapolis on Thursday evening to protest the use of federal officers in Portland, Ore., where sometimes violent rallies against police brutality have been going on for weeks.

Activists from more than a dozen groups, including Black Lives Matter Minnesota, the Council on American-Islamic Relations and the National Lawyers Guild, expressed concern that Minneapolis could experience the same federal presence soon - something they would vehemently oppose.

Sam Martinez, an organizer from the Twin Cities Coalition for Justice 4 Jamar, said he helped coordinate the rally just over 24 hours ago and was pleased with the turnout.

"This is not something we do regularly, but it's good to know people are ready ... to defend the community," Martinez said. "It just shows that Minneapolis, it was the epicenter, and we're not going anywhere."

Among the sculpted mounds of green grass in front of the courthouse, leaders of various groups decried police brutality and racial injustice.

Several people who said their loved ones were killed by police officers spoke emotionally.

Attendees held cardboard signs and fabric flags reading "Silence is violence," "Feds in Portland, proving our point" and "Demilitarize the United States."

Latahvoni Smith, who described herself as a spoken-word artist and new mother, shared two poems with the crowd.

In one, she decried police violence against people of color.

"I'm a little girl, but I have a big voice," she said, referencing her height.

Rally decries federal officers in Portland

Misty Rowan of the Anti-War Committee asked the crowd if it was prepared to protest if federal officers arrived. She also said she wanted to give the crowd hope.

"It is our job to take this opportunity, take this momentum, and run with it," she said.

Following the speeches, the group marched around downtown.

"Black lives, they matter here," marchers chanted, walking or riding their bikes through the otherwise quiet streets.

Erin Adler · 612-673-1781

Load-Date: July 27, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCXXIII.

SEEING RACISM AS A PUBLIC HEALTH CRISIS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 24, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 8ALength: 456 wordsHighlight: The symbolism is welcome but must produce meaningful public policy.Body

Several of Minnesota's largest local governments have declared that racism is a public health emergency. But what exactly does that mean, and what impact can those declarations have on discrimination, racism and public health?

Since early July, the Minneapolis and St. Paul city councils and Ramsey and Hennepin county boards have approved similar resolutions. They've joined numerous U.S. cities and counties as part of a national reckoning on race, sparked by the killing of George Floyd while in Minneapolis police custody.

Adopting the declarations, local officials say, is a first step to toward officially acknowledging racism, then developing policies to end it. In Minneapolis, council members listed multiple actions, including having a racial advisory committee review the city charter and other policies, reforms to criminal justice and public safety and doing annual reports on the health of residents of color.

City leaders also directed the establishment of a long-term funding source for youth programs and financial support for small businesses and housing to "reverse and repair the harm experienced" by residents of color.

"Systemic racism is among the greatest long-term threats our city and nation are facing, and the last two months have made that reality painfully clear," Mayor Jacob Frey said in a statement. "For Minneapolis to be a place where everyone can live and thrive, we must recognize this crisis for what it is and approach policymaking with the urgency it deserves."

Disturbing disparities between whites, Blacks and other people of color in Minnesota have been well-documented, including in a 2019 Star Tribune news analysis of U.S. census data. Black people have higher rates of poverty, unemployment and health problems, as well as lower educational achievement and homeownership. State data show that Black people and other people of color are at higher risk of severe consequences of COVID-19.

People of color are also significantly more likely to be involved in use-of-force incidents involving law enforcement and to experience prejudice in their professional and personal lives, which in turn leads to stress - a major factor in conditions such as heart disease and high blood pressure. Some of the nation's leading medical organizations have also released statements highlighting racism as a public health threat.

Seeing racism as a public health crisis

Acknowledging the damage done by racism is a critical step in improving the lives of all Americans. Yet the declarations will be nothing more than symbolic without effective action.

The challenge ahead for state and local leaders is to find new solutions while also protecting the resources needed to sustain current programs as budgets are stretched in the contracting coronavirus economy.

Load-Date: July 27, 2020

End of Document

Dorsey & Whitney chief on growing Black attorney ranks and moving back to the office

ARTICLE MCCCXXIV.

DORSEY & WHITNEY CHIEF ON GROWING BLACK ATTORNEY RANKS AND MOVING BACK TO THE OFFICE

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

July 24, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 582 words

Byline: Patrick Rehkamp

Body

Bill Stoeri took over as managing partner of Dorsey & Whitney in January 2019 - and year two has been wild compared to year one.

Stoeri has had to navigate remote working and sagging financials due to the economic slowdown and respond accordingly to the death of George Floyd while in Minneapolis police custody.

As the leader of the largest law firm headquartered in Minneapolis, Stoeri is planning for the future on several fronts. He recently spoke with the Business Journal about what the firm has done and what some of its plans are going forward. The conversation has been edited for length and clarity.

Financially, how is the firm doing? What business lines are doing well and which ones are soft? We had our best year financially in 2019, so we came into the year strong. However, there's no question the pandemic will have a negative impact on the legal business. Once the pandemic started, we anticipated a slowdown and have been tracking it pretty carefully. In general, we're in line with our revised expectations. Labor and employment, financial restructuring and health care have all been strong. Some areas of litigation have been strong. We're just waiting for the courts to proceed opening, and a lot of litigation is piling up and ready for release. The ones that have been down are emerging companies, real estate and trademark.

Dorsey & Whitney chief on growing Black attorney ranks and moving back to the office

The firm has announced two rounds of compensation cuts. Are more on the way? We took the steps we thought were necessary for the whole year. However, nobody knows how this will all play out. We don't anticipate anything further.

The firm recently ended a roughly 40-year relationship with the city of Minneapolis to provide legal assistance in the prosecution of misdemeanor cases. How did that come about? It was my call and our policy board unanimously supported it. Concerns about the program had been arising before George Floyd. We were looking at ending it anyways, but I wouldn't say it was an easy decision.

In the wake George Floyd, a slew of diversity issues have risen to the surface. What is the firm doing in response? Externally, we've done a lot in the wake of this. We've ramped-up minority business assistance and supported businesses damaged from the riots. Our foundation set up $50,000 matching grants. Internally, I have been focused on this since I took over. Our management committee is now half female and a quarter of the board is people of color. All that being said, we need Dorsey and the legal community here to increase the hiring of Black attorneys. We also need to work on retention and promotion of Black attorneys. A big part of it is to create a culture of understanding. There's no magic bullet. These are deep-seeded issues that need to be approached from the ground up.

When will the firm go back into the office? We are somewhat back. If an employee has a need or a special desire, they can go back in. Right now, about 20 to 40 people [out of about 600] are in the office. We'll see what happens in the fall. Frankly, if schools open back up, it might be easier for people not to come in.

It's been reported that remote working has been better than anticipated. Do you think the firm will need less commercial real estate in the future? Yes. I'd rather invest in technology than real estate if I can. I do think it's important for younger employees to still come in and learn from older attorneys.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: July 27, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCXXV.

WALZ SIGNS LANDMARK BILL ON POLICE REFORM

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 24, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1180 wordsByline: TOREY VAN OOT; BRIANA BIRSCHBACH; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Twenty-five days after George Floyd's death by Minneapolis police, top lawmakers in Minnesota's divided Legislature came together in a third floor Capitol conference room for their first substantive talks on police reform.

House Democrats, led by members of the People of Color and Indigenous Caucus, had put forward a far-reaching list of proposals, from use-of-force restrictions to voting rights for felons. Senate Republicans, wary that the House plan went too far, countered with an offer that included some, but not all of the DFL ideas.

Offers traded throughout the long night went nowhere. At dawn the following morning, June 20, the Legislature adjourned at loggerheads, ending an inconclusive special session. Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka said the sides appeared "a session away" from agreement.

Fast forward to Thursday, and Gov. Tim Walz was signing a bill ushering in some of the most substantial changes to law enforcement and police accountability in a generation, sweeping legislation that cleared both chambers with broad bipartisan support. The new law, which takes effect Aug. 1, includes bans on chokeholds and warrior-style trainings, a duty for officers to intervene in misconduct, and changes to provide more data and independent oversight on police matters.

Walz called it "meaningful legislation that will impact our communities in a positive way" and "a critical step toward criminal justice reform."

But for weeks, that step was far from certain, even amid waves of protests - some of them violent - spreading from Minneapolis to around the globe, following the viral video of Floyd's death.

"It seemed pretty bleak," said Rep. Rena Moran, a St. Paul Democrat at the center of the negotiations. "I thought that maybe we'd get one or two or three provisions."

Walz signs landmark bill on police reform

Reaching a hard-fought compromise brought together a diverse array of lawmakers and advocates, including law enforcement groups, the business community and the families of other Minnesotans killed over the years by police. Mounting public pressure, especially from legislators representing communities of color, and personal relationships between top lawmakers from opposing parties, finally pushed the deal over a finish line that many thought they'd never reach.

"So many people worked very hard, especially [POCI] Caucus members," said House Majority Leader Ryan Winkler, DFL-Golden Valley. "It was a team effort all around. Many law enforcement groups, including police unions, came forward to compromise. We had broad support from the business community and from both sides of the aisle."

Talks appeared to stall after the first special session. But around the July 4 weekend, with another special session coming up, more serious negotiations resumed.

Democrats and Republicans agreed on some elements of a package, but a gulf remained on key issues, including adding more citizen oversight to the state police licensing board. "We had partisan differences, we had philosophical differences, we had differences between different constituencies, all engaged on the sidelines to bring this matter at least up to a public discussion," said Republican Sen. Warren Limmer, chairman of a judiciary committee. "There were times when we just had to go back to our corners and reconsider and think about each other's thoughts and different ways to approach the goals."

Over a month of stop-and-start negotiations, the two sides exchanged at least 16 offers, according to House Speaker Melissa Hortman. At one point, Moran said she feared disagreement over a single word in one provision - "apparent" - could torpedo the whole deal. But amid rising frustration, she sensed a genuine desire to reach a deal.

"We had a sense of the importance of this work, recognizing that we hear the moans and groans and the cries from the community across the state ... and across the country," Moran said.

Personal relationships, including a strong working dynamic between Hortman and Gazelka, pushed legislators back to the table when negotiations became strained. Close work between Gazelka and Rep. Carlos Mariani, a St. Paul Democrat helping lead the DFL's effort, added another layer of trust.

Major police groups were brought into the process, offering input and draft language. Moran and Brian Peters, a former Brooklyn Park police commander who heads the Minnesota Peace and Police Officers Association, developed a bond over months working together previously on a deadly force working group where they shared stories about their families and experiences.

"He understood where I was coming from as I talked about police officers, as I talked about the community, as I talked about the need for a stronger relationship," Moran said. "Those things are not happening unless we are engaging each other, unless we are at the table with each other."

The influence of the deadly force working group, led by Department of Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington and Attorney General Keith Ellison, went beyond building personal relationships. Bloomington Police Chief Jeff Potts, past president of the Minnesota Chiefs of Police Association, said the group's discussions and recommendations "helped in the process to getting us to where we are today."

Walz signs landmark bill on police reform

The pressure wasn't just coming from activists. It also was coming from the business community. In June, the Minnesota Business Partnership and more than 80 chief executives in the state sent a letter to lawmakers calling for police accountability legislation.

"The George Floyd killing really touched a nerve for everyone," said Charlie Weaver, executive director of the Minnesota Business Partnership. "Their employees were telling them, enough is enough. We expect action, we expect you to lead on this."

As the July special session neared, negotiators on both sides sensed they were getting closer. Hortman and Gazelka kept talks moving behind the scenes. But as they ironed out the details, internal hurdles within each majority caucus remained. Moran worked with the POCI Caucus and community activists who wanted to see even bigger changes. Convincing them to accept a pared-down package, she said, was "one of the hardest conversations I've probably had in my tenure." Some Senate Republicans remained unconvinced that any changes were needed, Limmer said.

Friday, four weeks to the day after the first negotiation fizzled, Walz facilitated a conversation with Gazelka and the families of individuals who died after deadly encounters with police. Gazelka said the exchange, his second meeting with families, helped change his mind on some proposals.

"They make a compelling case for things that really, totally changed their lives," he said.

"I heard a lot of precious tears from where they are coming from. You have to take every piece of an issue, and that was one piece."

By 10 p.m. Monday, facing a self-imposed midnight deadline, the final language was rolled out and cleared by wide margins in both chambers.

"This is the beginning of the work that we set out to do," Moran said. "It is not the end."

Torey Van Oot · 651-925-5049

Briana Bierschbach · 651-925-5042

Load-Date: July 27, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCXXVI.

JAMELLE BOUIE: THE BORDER WAR IN PORTLAND

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 24, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1363 wordsByline: Jamelle BouieHighlight: Something dangerous is taking shape within the Department of Homeland Security. We got our first glimpse of it last week in Oregon, when unidentified federal agents clad in camouflage and tactical gear descended on Portland, beat and tear-gassed protesters and pulled others into unmarked vehicles for arrest and questioning. Apparently cobbled together using personnel from [...]Body

Something dangerous is taking shape within the Department of Homeland Security.

We got our first glimpse of it last week in Oregon, when unidentified federal agents clad in camouflage and tactical gear descended on Portland, beat and tear-gassed protesters and pulled others into unmarked vehicles for arrest and questioning.

Apparently cobbled together using personnel from Customs and Border Protection, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the Transportation Security Administration and the Coast Guard, these "rapid deployment teams" are formally tasked with securing federal buildings from graffiti and vandalism in tandem with the Federal Protective Service, which is ordinarily responsible for the job. But they're being used to suppress protests in what appears to be an election year gambit by the Trump administration to create images of disorder and chaos on which the president can then campaign. "This political theater from President Trump has nothing to do with public safety," Kate Brown, the Democratic governor of Oregon, said last week, "Trump is looking for a confrontation in Oregon in the hopes of winning political points in Ohio or Iowa."

The official tasked with coordinating all this action, the acting secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, Chad Wolf, is an enthusiastic participant, casting protesters as "violent anarchists and extremists" in order to justify what's been done to them. "The city of Portland has been under siege for 47 straight days by a violent mob while local political leaders refuse to restore order to protect their city," Wolf said. "This siege can end if state and local officials decide to take appropriate action instead of refusing to enforce the law."

On Sunday, Wolf's deputy, Ken Cuccinelli (whose official title is "Senior Official Performing the Duties of the Deputy Secretary for the Department of Homeland Security"), told NPR that Homeland Security would be taking these tactics nationwide. Wolf affirmed this, telling Fox News that his agency can act with or without local cooperation. "I don't need invitations by the state, state mayors or state governors to do our job," he said. "We're going to do that, whether they like us there or not." President Donald Trump likewise vowed to send federal law enforcement agents to several more cities, amid reports that a Portland-like force was headed to Chicago.

There's more. In addition to its rapid deployment teams, the Department of Homeland Security has also authorized domestic surveillance of Americans on the basis of the president's June executive order on the protection of statues and monuments. Writing for the Lawfare blog, the legal scholars Steve Vladeck and Benjamin Wittes explain that the "animating premise" of the new rules "is that the threat to monuments and statues is a homeland security threat warranting intelligence analysis and collection by federal officials." The administration, they continue, is using the "cover of minor property damage" to "justify intelligence gathering against ordinary Americans" for "peacefully protesting their government."

The United States is no stranger to the use of military or quasi-military force against protesters. During the Whiskey Rebellion, a tax revolt of farmers and distillers in western Pennsylvania that culminated in 1794, President George Washington raised a federal militia to meet insurgents in the field. To break the Pullman Strike of 1894, during which workers shut down rail traffic in much of the country, President Grover Cleveland deployed federal troops to Chicago, sparking a confrontation that ended in the deaths of 30 workers. And in 1932, under orders from President Herbert Hoover, Gen. Douglas MacArthur confronted the Bonus Army - a group of World War I veterans who camped out in Washington, D.C., petitioning the government for their promised bonuses for military service - with infantry, cavalry and tanks.

The difference lies less in the acts themselves than in the ways these events developed. Use of military force against strikers and protesters is certainly controversial, but for the most part it unfolds along clear lines of responsibility and involves powers expressly granted to the president. As the example of Washington and the Whiskey Rebellion demonstrates, it was part of the constitutional design. Trump's internal security force was, by contrast, created out of public view, using loopholes and expansive interpretations of the law. The reason Customs and Border Protection can be used to police a protest in Portland is, for example, because the Department of Homeland Security can supplement law enforcement from one agency with personnel from another.

There are other elements beyond the fact of its existence that make the emergence of an internal security force extremely troubling. As a candidate, Trump actively cultivated both the leadership and the rank-and-file of the border police and ICE. In turn, they gave him his support - unions for both agencies endorsed Trump for president. Under his leadership, these agencies have shown themselves to be deeply simpatico with the administration's draconian approach to immigration at the southern border, with aggressive action against migrants, asylum-seekers and unauthorized immigrants.

A secretive, nationwide police force - created without congressional input or authorization, formed from highly politicized agencies, tasked with rooting out vague threats and answerable only to the president - is a nightmare out of the fever dreams of the founding generation, federalists and antifederalists alike. It's something Americans continue to fear and for good reason. It is a power that cannot and should not exist in a democracy, lest it undermine and destroy the entire project.

Democrats, thankfully, seem to recognize this. "We live in a democracy, not a banana republic. We will not tolerate the use of Oregonians, Washingtonians - or any other Americans - as props in President Trump's political games," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi on Saturday, in a joint statement with Rep. Earl Blumenauer of Oregon. "The House is committed to moving swiftly to curb these egregious abuses of power immediately."

But rhetoric isn't enough. The House must act and act now. In addition to holding hearings and investigations - including eliciting testimony from Wolf and other officials - Democrats should condition final passage of its Homeland Security appropriations bill on a complete halt to operations in Portland and other cities and the dissolution of the response force. Should Democrats find themselves in control of both legislative branches and the White House next year, they should also use the opportunity to amend the relatively obscure Federal Vacancies Reform Act, which Trump has used to install loyalists in high-level positions without Senate confirmation.

There's also the issue of the Department of Homeland Security itself. Since its creation in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, the department has been criticized for its size, scope and waste. "It goes without saying that I observed up-close the dysfunction, turf battles, and inherent limitations in an entity that does so much," Matt Mayer, a Homeland Security official under George W. Bush, wrote in 2015. Report after report - from congressional oversight committees, from the Government Accountability Office - show an agency practically defined by waste and dysfunction. And if the Trump years have shown anything, it is that the agencies within DHS, and especially ICE and CBP, are in desperate need of root-and-branch reform or some other fundamental change.

Should Trump fail to win reelection, perhaps the way to prevent a replay of the abuse in Portland is to dismantle the institution behind it. Just as local communities do not need militarized police officers, the federal government does not need an alphabet soup of militarized law enforcement agencies, as well as the cultures of prejudice and brutality that have gone along with them. If and when we close the book on Trump, perhaps we should use the opportunity to close the book on Homeland Security, too.

Jamelle Bouie writes a column for the New York Times.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

17-year-old boy is city's 37th homicide victim of 2020

ARTICLE MCCCXXVII.

17-YEAR-OLD BOY IS CITY'S 37TH HOMICIDE VICTIM OF 2020

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 24, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 5BLength: 157 wordsByline: LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

A 17-year-old boy was shot to death Thursday evening on Minneapolis' South Side, the city's 37th homicide of the year.

Police responded to a report of shots fired just after 6 p.m. in the area of Chicago Avenue and E. 35th Street, several blocks north of the George Floyd memorial site.

Officers arrived to find the boy suffering from at least one gunshot wound and started CPR, according to police and scanner traffic reports.

He was taken to a nearby hospital, where he died, according to a police spokesman.

His name wasn't immediately released.

The shooting continued a violent stretch dating back to the unrest after Floyd's death. At least 274 people have been struck by gunfire so far this year - a total that exceeds all of 2019 and is about 56% higher than the five-year average of shooting victims for this time of the year.

Of the 37 homicides so far this year, 10 have occurred in July.

No one has been arrested in the teen's death.

LIBOR JANY

Load-Date: July 27, 2020

Longtime NBA player Arron Afflalo leading bid to buy Timberwolves

ARTICLE MCCCXXVIII.

LONGTIME NBA PLAYER ARRON AFFLALO LEADING BID TO BUY TIMBERWOLVES

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 24, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 633 words

Byline: The Associated Press

Highlight: An ownership group led by longtime NBA player Arron Afflalo is putting together an offer to buy the Minnesota Timberwolves, two people with knowledge of the bid said. The people spoke to the Associated Press on condition of anonymity Friday because the deal was still in the process of being submitted. The group will consist [...]

Body

An ownership group led by longtime NBA player Arron Afflalo is putting together an offer to buy the Minnesota Timberwolves, two people with knowledge of the bid said.

The people spoke to the Associated Press on condition of anonymity Friday because the deal was still in the process of being submitted. The group will consist of two to five individuals with a net worth of more than $10 billion. According to the people, Afflalo's group will submit the bid no later than this weekend.

Timberwolves owner Glen Taylor, who bought the club in 1994 to keep it from moving to New Orleans, has put the franchise up for sale on the condition it remain in Minnesota. Taylor has hired a merchant bank, The Raine Group, to broker talks. There are multiple groups interested, the 79-year-old Taylor said earlier this week. He also owns the WNBA's Minnesota Lynx.

The Timberwolves have a lease at the city-owned Target Center that lasts through 2035. A $140 million renovation project on the arena was finished in 2017. In the latest sports franchise valuations from Forbes business magazine, the Timberwolves ranked 28th out of the 30 NBA teams, but still at $1.375 billion, albeit before the pandemic began.

Basketball hall of famer Kevin Garnett announced he's part of one group trying to buy the team he starred for from 1995-2007. Garnett and Taylor had a falling out after his return to the Timberwolves in 2015. Garnett told The Athletic in an interview earlier this year that he doesn't "do business with snakes," but on Twitter this week Garnett said he looks forward to trying to work with Taylor to "achieve my dream" of NBA ownership.

Minnesota Vikings owners Zygi Wilf and Mark Wilf were recently contacted about their interest in buying the franchise. According to a person with knowledge of that situation, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the confidential nature of the negotiations, the Wilfs had back-and-forth conversations about a potential acquisition, but those talks are not active.

Longtime NBA player Arron Afflalo leading bid to buy Timberwolves

The people familiar with Afflalo's group said the team won't be relocated. The 34-year-old Afflalo would be the face of the group, with venture capitalist Brock Berglund spearheading the financing. The only Black primary owner in the NBA now is Michael Jordan in Charlotte, N.C.

It's a diverse group seeking to place minorities in positions of power and uplift the community in the wake of the death of George Floyd, the handcuffed Black man who died after a Minneapolis police officer pressed a knee into his neck for nearly 8 minutes.

Known for his defensive tenacity, Afflalo played in 762 games over a dozen years for Detroit, Orlando, Denver, New York, Sacramento and Portland. His career earnings from NBA salaries topped $58 million, according to Basketball Reference.

Afflalo was drafted 27th overall in 2007 by the Pistons, where his first coach was the late Flip Saunders and who started Afflalo in the first game of his rookie season. Saunders' son, Ryan, is the current coach of the Timberwolves.

A native of California, Afflalo helped UCLA advance to the national title game during the 2006 NCAA tournament before falling to Florida. One of the iconic images of the tournament was when Afflalo stopped his celebration after his team beat Gonzaga to console Adam Morrison, who was lying on the floor in tears. The gesture was hailed as a picture of sportsmanship.

Glen Taylor exploring sale of Timberwolves and Lynx; Kevin Garnett wants to buy, Wilfs are 'serious candidate' Afflalo was also featured in a song by Grammy Award-winning hip-hop artist Kendrick Lamar. In the song "Black Boy Fly," Lamar wrote: "I used to be jealous of Arron Afflalo. He was the one to follow. He was the only leader foreseeing brighter tomorrows."

Lamar and Afflalo went to the same high school in Compton, Calif.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCXXIX.

TCF UNROLLS $1B SMALL-BUSINESS LOAN COMMITMENT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 24, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 400 wordsByline: NEAL ST. ANTHONY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The company will concentrate on assisting minority- and women-owned businesses.Body

TCF Financial stepped up its commitment to minorities in the wake of the George Floyd killing and related demonstrations.

CEO Craig Dahl, who merged TCF with Detroit's Chemical Financial Corp. in 2019, on Thursday announced a $1 billion loan commitment to minority- and female-owned small businesses over five years. The company will also spend $10 million to assist lower-income home buyers during the period.

The commitment grew out of a denunciation of discrimination by Dahl and TCF Chairman Gary Torgow following Floyd's death at the hands of police in Minneapolis on May 25.

"Minority-owned and women-owned small businesses have historically had a more difficult time obtaining loans," Torgow said in a statement. "As a bank committed to strengthening individuals, businesses and communities, we are inspired to help these business owners create wealth and pursue their dreams."

In an interview, Dahl said Chemical Financial already was investing in the small-business revitalization of Detroit, and with TCF will accelerate the new loan programs.

The small-business loans of up to $1 million will focus largely on Detroit, Minneapolis-St. Paul, Chicago, Cleveland and Grand Rapids, Mich.

The home-loan program will include up to $3,000 to help cover closing costs for customers who earn less than 80% of local median income, or who purchase homes in a lower-income neighborhoods. TCF plans to fund 750 grants in 2020, compared to nearly 300 grants in 2019.

"We wanted to make sure that if we took action that we would really make a mark," said Dahl, who also works out of offices in the Twin Cities."This is not a Detroit-only initiative."

TCF unrolls $1B small-business loan commitment

Minorities make up 80% of the Detroit population and about a quarter of the Twin Cities population. TCF runs the third-largest bank in Minnesota after Wells Fargo and U.S. Bank, both of which have also announced plans to expand lending to Black- and other minority-owned businesses.

"We recognize that access to funds for a down payment is the single largest hurdle to homeownership," Dahl said. "As communities recover from the COVID-19 pandemic, we recognize that we can make a difference."

Dahl said that TCF plans to fund the minority-loan initiative in part with revenue it made on the Paycheck Protection Plan forgivable loan program. The Small Business Administration funded the loans and paid banks a 5% fee for originating them.

Neal St. Anthony · 612-673-7144

Load-Date: July 24, 2020

End of Document

RACIAL JUSTICE

ARTICLE MCCCXXX. RACIAL JUSTICE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 25, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 7ALength: 888 wordsByline: KATHERINE KERSTEN, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: THE NEW RELIGION? // The "woke" movement is built on shows of "right thinking" and Puritan-style intolerance.Body

Since the death of George Floyd, a movement that condemns America as "systemically racist" has convulsed our public consciousness. Sixty years after the Civil Rights Act of 1964 - and despite decades of affirmative action, massive social welfare spending and a two-term Black president - we are told that "white supremacy" deforms America today, as it has throughout history.

The movement to eradicate "white privilege" manifests in demands to defund police and in the toppling of statues - not only of Confederate generals, but of figures such as Theodore Roosevelt, Ulysses S. Grant, even George Washington.

Educational, business, media, nonprofit and entertainment institutions have taken up the "systemic racism" mantra with breathtaking speed, issuing statements declaring their virtue and right thinking.

Yet something is profoundly amiss in the frenzied movement that has America in its grip. This movement elevates passion over reason and dogma over data. It contemptuously rejects, and attempts to silence, calls for objective analysis as self-evidently racist.

In the process, it requires adherents to turn a blind eye to its stark inconsistencies. For example, while its votaries blocked Interstate 94 and torched whole neighborhoods in the name of justice for Floyd, who died at the hands of police, they are silent about the rain of gunfire and soaring death toll from Black-on-Black violence in Minneapolis since then. As of Friday, the city had had 37 homicides in 2020 - nearly twice as many as this time last year - and at least 274 people have been shot, nearly a 60% increase. Nationally, about 90% of Black murder victims are killed by other blacks, where the race of the killer is known, according to the FBI.

What is unfolding before our eyes is a new secular religion. For all its claims of "inclusivity," this new faith is deeply intolerant. It has roots in the American past that would likely surprise its adherents: the Puritan era of our nation's earliest religious zealots. Progressives are now engaged in doing theology without God. "Woke is the new Saved," in the words of commentator John Zmirak.

RACIAL JUSTICE

Parallels abound. One of Puritan theology's core tenets is "innate depravity" - the doctrine that humans are inherently wicked as a result of original sin. The woke faith preaches an updated version: America's original sin is white supremacy.

For white people, "having racist assumptions is inevitable," according to Robin DiAngelo, author of the bestselling book "White Fragility." "Straight white men have been involved in a witness protection program" that "absolves them of their crimes," she declares.

The Puritans divided humans into the saved and the damned, the saints and the sinners. The woke faith does the same, classifying people as either oppressors (white) or victims (nonwhite).

The new faith's adherents view themselves as the "elect," redeemed, as it were, by a predestined grace. They are convinced they possess a higher truth, and are committed to imposing it on others.

Like their Puritan forebears, the woke faith's adherents believe that heretics - whose false doctrine imperils the larger community - must be rooted out. Dissenters must be humiliated, shunned and branded with Hester Prynne's scarlet "A" of shame.

Yet the new faith does offer a way for white Americans and other sinners to find salvation. To join the righteous, they must confess their sins - "check their privilege" - beg forgiveness, do penance and vow to become an "ally" of the oppressed.

Today, a Puritan-inspired witch-hunt mentality is ablaze all around us, bent on destroying the reputations and livelihoods of those who show the slightest hesitation to profess true doctrine. "Bigot and hater" are the new "witch and wizard," as commentator Mary Eberstadt has observed.

The list of heretics fired or compelled to resign grows every day. It includes a New York Times editor who dared to publish an opinion piece - reflexively branded as racist - by U.S. Sen. Tom Cotton; Grant Napear, the Sacramento Kings announcer, who tweeted that "ALL LIVES MATTER...EVERY SINGLE ONE!!!"; and leaders of the Poetry Foundation, who issued a statement denouncing systemic racism that some deemed too vague.

"Forced conversions" to the new faith are also becoming commonplace. Drew Brees, the New Orleans Saints quarterback, first criticized athletes' kneeling during the national anthem and then issued a groveling apology. Dan Cathy, CEO of Chick-fil-A, sought absolution for past sins by shining the shoes of a Black rapper. Politicians kneel in repentance and whites in tony neighborhoods display a "Black Lives Matter" sign on their lawn.

What explains this lightning-speed capitulation? For many young people - restless after the COVID-19 lockdown and often knowing little of history or religion - conversion to the woke faith can be part of a search for meaning in our post-Christian society. For corporations, professing "solidarity" with the new religion is good business.

But for the movement's leaders, this secular faith offers much more. Its goal is to dismantle as irredeemably racist the sinful nation in which we live and to build - in the Puritan phrase - a new City on a Hill, made in their own image.

Katherine Kersten is a senior policy fellow at the Center of the American Experiment. She is at kakersten@gmail.com

RACIAL JUSTICE

Load-Date: July 29, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCXXI.

MEMBERS OF THE TWINS TAKE A KNEE TO PROTEST RACIAL INEQUALITY

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 25, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 648 wordsByline: Betsy Helfand

Highlight: CHICAGO - Twins manager Rocco Baldelli conducted his pregame Zoom press conference wearing a Black Lives Matter shirt. Many members of his team were sporting the same T-shirt during batting practice. With both teams lined up pregame, a video from the Players Alliance, a collection of current and former Black baseball players, played on the [...]

Body

CHICAGO - Twins manager Rocco Baldelli conducted his pregame Zoom press conference wearing a Black Lives Matter shirt. Many members of his team were sporting the same T-shirt during batting practice.

With both teams lined up pregame, a video from the Players Alliance, a collection of current and former Black baseball players, played on the big screen, voicing a plea for unity and change and then a short message narrated by Morgan Freeman played. Both teams held the same single black cloth, and the Twins' manager, along with reliever Zack Littell, knelt on one knee.

Baldelli remained kneeling while the national anthem played, joined by members of his team, to silently protest racial inequality. Baldelli was joined by bench coach Mike Bell and first base coach Tommy Watkins as well as outfielders Byron Buxton, LaMonte Wade Jr., Aaron Whitefield and pitchers Taylor Rogers, Trevor May, Sergio Romo and Tyler Duffey in kneeling during the anthem.

"From an organizational standpoint, from ownership on down, credit to them and everybody in the organization that we support everyone's individual right to express themselves and do it in a peaceful manner and a healthy manner," president of baseball operations Derek Falvey said. "I think there's nothing more that's representative of being here in this country and in this community and in this environment than having the ability to express your individual convictions. I think our players did and did it in a really respectful manner as Rocco did as well. I think it was a powerful moment and a powerful tribute on a lot of levels to starting off this season using our platform appropriately."

Baldelli said before the game that team has been having conversations about the topic in the wake of George Floyd's death in police custody in Minneapolis in May, and the team has had many active participants in that discussion. No matter what decision his players made, Baldelli said, they would support it.

Members of the Twins take a knee to protest racial inequality

After the game, Baldelli said the moment had allowed players and coaches a chance to express themselves in a meaningful way. He said the moment meant a lot to him and he was happy to have been a part of it.

"We support every one of our players and our staff in every way. Our guys are there for each other. Of course, every person is different and has a different mindset when asked different questions. But everyone has been open to talking about it," Baldelli said pregame. "I've found that the more you look around and the more you converse with people, the more that you find a lot of common ground on a lot of different things, on a lot of different topics. And I find that a very beautiful thing."

The Twins' team owners, the Pohlad family, announced a $25 million commitment to racial justice causes in the Twin Cities in June, and the Twins have made plans to honor Floyd during Tuesday's home opener.

Twins swept by Royals, drop fourth straight game Twins make pitching move; stick with 16 pitchers Royals hand Twins their third straight loss Twins adjust as MLB tightens COVID-19 protocols Charley Walters: Twins picked up a gem in Kenta Maeda

The Twins plan to pay homage to Floyd by unveiling a picture of him on the outfield wall that will remain all season. They also plan to stop the game at 8:46 p.m. for a moment of silence. That time signifies the amount of time that former police officer Derek Chauvin knelt on Floyd's neck.

"We've shared a lot of deep conversations, emotional conversations at times. What it shows me is how much everybody cares about one another, the community, the issues that are going on in the world," Bell said Wednesday. " ... The word unity gets thrown around a lot. You can look at someone standing somewhere or kneeling, but ultimately unity is what's in each person's heart, and what they stand for. The physical action isn't nearly as important as what's in each person's heart."

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCXXXII.

GUN VIOLENCE ECLIPSES USUAL SPIKE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 25, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 1181 wordsByline: LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Surge in Minneapolis since George Floyd's death comes amid debate over the future of policing.Body

At least 275 people have been victims of gunfire in Minneapolis so far this year, eclipsing the entire annual totals of all but two of the past 10 years, according to Police Department records.

Gun violence tends to spike in the city every year during the hot summer months, but this year's surge in shootings dating back to the unrest after the death of George Floyd is worse than usual.

MPD records show that 269 people were shot in Minneapolis in all of 2019 - a grim milestone that the city reached on July 20 this year. The shooting tally is also nearly 60% higher than the five-year average for this time of the year, records show.

The city's 37 homicides have also nearly doubled from this time last year.

Victims were mostly concentrated in the Fourth and Third precincts. They included a 14-year-old girl who was grazed by a wayward bullet while she lay in bed and a taxi driver who was killed when he confronted two men breaking into his cab.

The recent upswing in violence has factored into a fierce debate over the future of policing in Minneapolis, as elsewhere, sparked by Floyd's death and the ensuing riots: Some law enforcement groups and their supporters have cited the spiking gun violence as reminiscent of the "Murderapolis" era of the mid-90s, while activists argue that the recent bloodshed is proof that the existing public safety system isn't working.

On Friday, the City Council adopted a revised 2020 budget that cuts roughly $1.5 million from the MPD's $193 million budget - most of which was to be diverted to the Office of Violence Prevention, which may use the money to fund a program patterned after the Cure Violence program that uses trusted "messengers" to mediate street conflicts and persuade high-risk youth to take a different path.

Meanwhile, police officials and community leaders have been searching for solutions to the problem.

Gun violence eclipses usual spike

Around the time of the unrest, the department combined several investigative units to form the Gun Violence Response Unit, which is focused on getting weapons off the streets and applying pressure on gangs that authorities say are driving most of the violence. The strategy has paid off in some ways, with court filings showing that authorities are close to solving several recent shootings, including the June 21 running gun battle in Uptown in which more than 70 rounds were fired and 11 people were injured. Investigators have identified at least one of the suspected gunmen involved, a member of the FreeShotz gang, thanks to an informant's tip. Police say they are also on track to top last year's total of 946 recovered guns.

Department brass have reshuffled staff to beef up the patrol division, although some in the department argue those efforts have fallen short of covering all the staffing gaps created by recent departures.

Police Chief Medario Arradondo and Mayor Jacob Frey have sought help dealing with the crime spike from federal law enforcement agencies including the FBI, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the Secret Service.

Kyle Loven, a former FBI agent, said in an earlier interview that it's not uncommon for "local police chiefs and sheriffs" to partner with the feds, who can add considerable manpower and crime-fighting technology.

"The FBI has a lot of technology at its disposal that it can bring to bear to assist local departments," said Loven, who left the bureau after 22 years to join a Minneapolis-based digital forensics firm.

Some activist groups on Friday expressed their disappointment that the proposed cuts fell far short of the $45 million they had sought.

"With our communities facing a pandemic, an economic crisis, and an unreformable police department, we demanded a major budget cut from MPD, and funding to meet our communities basic needs. The Mayor and the Council need to move much, much faster on their commitments to transformative change. Justice cannot wait another year," Sheila Nezhad of Reclaim the Block said in a news release.

Community groups such as Racial Justice Network and Communities United Against Police Brutality have accused the council of acting hastily and recklessly in announcing their desire for abolition, without offering any specific plan on how to deal with the violence that continues to affect poor, ethnically diverse neighborhoods.

Statistics show that the 275 shooting victims through Thursday are higher than any other yearly total over the past decade, with the exception of 2017 and 2016, when 280 and 341 people were shot, respectively. The most recent year for which comprehensive data were available was 2006, when the city logged 339 shootings.

Other cities have experienced a similar rise in shootings, notably Chicago and New York. Nationally, the COVID-19 pandemic has had an uneven effect on crime, although several large cities have seen upticks in violence since the unrest that followed Floyd's death.

Some criminologists say the causes are unchanged - inadequate housing, systemic racism, poverty and other forms of neglect, coupled with a seemingly bottomless supply of illegal firearms. Adding to that combustible mixture is the pandemic and the unrest following Floyd's death, they say.

Gun violence eclipses usual spike

Additionally, authorities say that violent crime tends to escalate around this time of the year, not only because warmer weather is drawing more people outside, but because the summer months have so many death anniversaries of slain high-profile gang members.

Many of the victims have been young Black males, such as Elijah Whitner, 20, who was gunned down July 10 near Farview Park in a shooting that also left his pregnant girlfriend seriously injured.

In another example, a 17-year-old boy was shot outside a South Side convenience store Thursday, blocks from the Floyd memorial site, after what police say was a struggle with a longtime rival.

Jamar Nelson had left the store minutes earlier and was driving past when he saw the boy lying on the ground and stopped to help, thinking at first that he may have overdosed. But as he got closer, he noticed the blood pooling around the body and immediately started to perform CPR with the help of a bystander. Nelson said the boy briefly regained consciousness but ended up dying in his arms before paramedics arrived.

Nelson, who is part of the street outreach group A Mother's Love, recounted the episode tearfully Friday, saying that the boy reminded him of his own son who is about the same age.

"That was somebody's baby, and at that point, he was my baby, you know, holding that boy," he said. "I had to call my son, and he said, 'I'm at work and I can't talk right now,' and I said, 'I just wanted to tell you that I love you.' "

Libor Jany · 612-673-4064 · @StribJany

GUNSHOTS IN MINNEAPOLIS JUMP IN JUNE

At least 275 people have been victims of gunfire in Minneapolis so far this year. Over 80% of those were Black.

Total homicide and non-fatal gunshots by month

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete charts.)

Race of gunshot victims

Black 82%

Native American 5%

White 8%

Unknown 4%

Note: Does not add up to 100% due to rounding

* Through July 20

Source: Minneapolis Police Department

Load-Date: July 29, 2020

Gun violence eclipses usual spike

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCXXXIII.

COUNCIL TRIMS POLICE BUDGET

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 25, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 923 wordsByline: LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Minneapolis is poised to cut $1.5 million from the city's Police Department - and elected officials are promising more substantial changes in the coming months.

The City Council approved the changes Friday morning when they signed off on a larger effort to reduce the city's $1.6 billion budget to deal with financial losses from the coronavirus pandemic. While the cuts amounted to less than 1% of the Police Department's budget, the bulk of the money will be shifted to pay for trained civilians who work with families, crime victims and others to interrupt the cycle of violence.

Mayor Jacob Frey said he will approve the cuts to this year's spending and that he plans to unveil larger changes next month. "The 2021 budget is the appropriate budget for deeper structural change, and that will be the direction for the budget I propose," Frey said. "It will include a well-thought-out vision for MPD."

That vision is still under development, he said.

Meanwhile, plans to reshape the city's approach to public safety after the police killing of George Floyd are moving forward on several fronts.

Some City Council members are pushing a plan that would end the requirement to maintain a Police Department and instead have a wider community safety department - which could employ police officers but wouldn't be required to do so. Frey has blasted that idea, saying it's too vague.

The Charter Commission, meanwhile, is considering a plan that would keep a Police Department - but eliminate the requirement to maintain a specific force size based the city's population.

As the city's leaders move forward, they'll have to balance conflicting messages from residents, with some saying change isn't happening quickly or drastically enough and others urging them to move more slowly.

They also have to figure out how to support a police force whose members are increasingly frustrated with City Hall as they respond to a deluge of calls during an abnormally violent summer.

Council trims police budget

John Elder, a spokesman for the Police Department, said they are still trying to understand the impact of the cuts.

"Everything's on the table," Elder said. "We have core responsibilities as a law enforcement agency, and our responsibility is to meet those necessities."

The funding for Elder's own job got transferred out of the Police Department and into the city's main communications office after the council voted 9-3 to approve the move.

A spokesman for Frey's office said they do not believe the cuts will impact 911 service.

The cuts represent a small portion of a larger effort to balance the city books, primarily by relying on cash reserves, furloughs and, potentially, some layoffs.

When they approved the 2020 budget last fall, the city's elected leaders included $193 million for the Minneapolis Police Department. The city estimates it will save about $8.6 million as a result of a citywide hiring and wage freeze implemented earlier this year to offset the effects of the pandemic.

The budget approved Friday by the City Council calls for transferring $1.1 million from an MPD fund that is used for salaries to the Office of Violence Prevention for a program called Cure Violence.

When shootings happen, trained workers go out in the community and to the hospitals "to cool down emotions and prevent retaliations - working with the victims, friends and family of the victim, and anyone else who is connected with the event," Sasha Cotton, director of the Office of Violence Prevention, said in a statement this week.

The workers try to stay in touch with the parties, sometimes for months, and track big changes like arrests and releases from prison, in hopes of mediating potential conflicts before they escalate into violence again, Cotton said.

In addition to that change, money will also be taken out of the Police Department to fund programs helping people with HIV and AIDS and to promote "healthy living" in low-income housing, among other efforts. In some cases, the precise sources of those cuts are unclear, leaving them up to the discretion of the police chief.

The cuts fell far short of the $45 million some activists sought. The divisions in the community over the scope of changes have played out on the council as well.

Linea Palmisano, chairwoman of the budget committee, repeatedly urged her colleagues to be precise in their proposals so they could evaluate the full trade-offs of any cuts or transfers.

Council Member Steve Fletcher said he feared the repercussions of not acting quickly.

"As a city, we have been oriented toward doing change in a way that is extremely cautious. We weigh the costs of unintended consequences of changes extremely heavily in our calculations," Fletcher said. "We weigh the costs of unintended consequences of sitting still extremely lightly in our calculations."

In some areas, the council has been able to find common ground. Members agreed to set aside $100,000 to begin planning a memorial for Floyd. They approved a separate measure to begin transferring some theft calls to the city's 311 department. That department already takes about 4,600 police reports each year, for issues ranging from car break-ins to stolen credit cards or lost property, according to city spokeswoman Sarah McKenzie.

Council trims police budget

The council and Frey also committed to soliciting a year of public feedback on what the future of public safety should look like in Minneapolis. They were scheduled to receive an outline for those plans on Friday, the same day the council approved the cuts. That presentation was postponed to Aug. 6.

Liz Navratil · 612-673-4994

Load-Date: July 29, 2020

End of Document

Faces in the crowd still have a place

ARTICLE MCCCXXXIV.

FACES IN THE CROWD STILL HAVE A PLACE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 25, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 5C

Length: 527 words

Byline: PHIL MILLER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: Images of ex-Twins and other 'celebrities' will fill seats, add atmosphere at Target Field.

Body

There won't be any fans watching the Twins play at Target Field this season, at least not for a while. But some famous faces will be visible in the stands anyway.

The Twins will populate their seats behind home plate with giant 4-foot-tall heads seeming to watch the game.

TV viewers will be able to pick out the faces of legendary Twins players and other local and perhaps national celebrities; more than 80 such heads, which are commonly used as free-throw "distractions" by students in some college basketball arenas, have been readied for Opening Day thus far.

"We wanted to do something fun to fill that space," said Matt Hoy, Twins senior vice president for operations. "We're still working out exactly how it will look," and whether the faces will change over time or remain the same, he said.

The Twins rejected a plan to turn that space into a revenue generator like the Dodgers', which was unveiled on ESPN's broadcast Thursday night. The Dodgers allowed fans to buy seats - at $299 apiece - in the Dugout Club directly behind home plate at Dodger Stadium and have their own cardboard-cutout likenesses installed in those spots.

Fans will notice a few other changes to Target Field starting Tuesday, too, some more subtle than others. Open-air awnings have been erected behind each dugout to allow players who are not in the game to sit in the stands, socially distanced.

It's possible the Twins' extra players, who work out daily at the St. Paul Saints' CHS Field in case they are needed later by the major league team, will be invited to attend games and sit nearby, since they are tested for the coronavirus every other day.

Like most MLB teams seeking to generate revenue or fulfill sponsorship agreements, the Twins have covered several sections of outfield seats with tarps bearing large logos of prominent Twins sponsors

Faces in the crowd still have a place

(including the Star Tribune). In the left field upper deck, an enormous 53-foot-long printed photo mosaic, featuring more than 3,000 Twins fans, will be displayed on the Home Run Porch in section 331.

Large red letters spelling out TWINS are being installed at the edge of the grassy Gate 34 plaza behind the right-field seats, and will be visible from much of the ballpark.

And on the flagpoles atop the right-field scoreboard and ad boards, the Twins will fly huge pennants commemorating the franchise's six World Series appearances - including, new for this year, the Washington Senators' 1924 World Series title, and their 1925 and 1933 AL championships.

The field itself won't look much different, although like all MLB stadiums, an MLB logo and "BLM," for Black Lives Matter, will be visible in the dirt on the back of the pitcher's mound.

There will be no organ music from Sue Nelson this season, but PA announcer Adam Abrams will be on duty.

Many of the thousands of juniper plants that make up the batter's eye above the center field wall have been replaced, too, after some died over the winter. As an experiment in preparation for the still-scheduled NHL Winter Classic between the Wild and Blues on New Year's Day, the grounds crew left the plants in place during the offseason to see how they would fare in the Minnesota cold.

Load-Date: July 29, 2020

PICK SIX

ARTICLE MCCCXXXV. PICK SIX

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 25, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 6ELength: 332 wordsByline: JON BREAM; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Pick Six is a half-dozen cool things in music, from two points of view.

Jeff Larson of Rochester:

1 Jesse Colin Young, July 4th. Without official fireworks, we discovered some great musical skyrockets on television, notably with Young on CNN. The Youngbloods founder reprised "Get Together" backed by the excellent preteens known as "Little Kids Rock" (these kids are a revelation).

2 "Bob Dylan Gems at the Bitter End," YouTube. I believe the singers are either in the cast of "Girl From the North Country" or otherwise on Broadway. It was great to hear Dylan gems like "All Along the Watchtower" coupled with "Tight Connection to My Heart" and "Slow Train Coming" tied soulfully with "License to Kill." Great gems indeed and some of the best singing anywhere.

3 Ringo Starr, AXS TV. This ever-charming lad celebrated his 80th birthday with some good cheer, worthy fundraising ("Water Aid," "Black Lives Matter," et al.), and lots of musical guests - Sheila E., Joe Walsh, Gary Clark Jr., Sheryl Crow and Sir Paul McCartney, who, with Ringo, made "Helter Skelter" dangerous again.

Chris Riemenschneider of the Star Tribune:

1 Anderson .Paak, "Lockdown." A darkly grooving epic like this one by the Los Angeles-area singer/rapper - with its references to riots, unemployment, police shootings, etc. - wouldn't normally be a contender for the song of summer. But this is far from a normal summer.

2 The Chicks, "Juliana Calm Down." Not to downplay all the fiery songs directed at her ex-husband and other dumb white men on her band's long-awaited album "Gaslighter," but the standout track might be this tender mantra of a song that the incomparably voiced Natalie Maines seems to be singing to herself.

3 "Palm Springs" soundtrack. There's not actually a formal soundtrack available from Hulu's sleeper hit comedy starring "SNL" alum Andy Samberg, but playlists are floating around the internet with its fun mix of desert-breezy hidden gems by Khruangbin, John Cale, Los Straitjackets and even Genesis.

PICK SIX

Load-Date: July 26, 2020

End of Document

STREETSCAPES

ARTICLE MCCCXXXVI. STREETSCAPES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 25, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 961 wordsByline: FRANK EDGERTON MARTIN, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: How race has shaped our urban environsBody

Special to the Star Tribune

Neighborhoods and the buildings in them are cultural expressions of the people who built and shaped them over time. In the Twin Cities, African Americans, Indigenous people, Jews and others were often denied the opportunity to design, build, work and even live in certain areas.

In the unrest following the killing of George Floyd, it's time to take a hard look at who has the power to shape our environment today.

We talked with three nationally recognized Black architects about practicing architecture in Minnesota: James Garrett Jr., the owner and managing partner at 4RM+ULA architects in St. Paul; Mohammed Lawal, CEO and principal architect at LSE Architects in Minneapolis; and Brazilian-born Damaris Hollingsworth, owner of Design by Melo. The conversation has been edited for brevity and clarity.

Limited urban exposure

To Garrett, many of the buildings and streetscapes in the metro area are uninviting for many of the people who live here.

"A major reason," he said, "is that the majority of architects and people in charge of the built environment - from city officials to planners and designers - are not from cities.

"Their formative years were often spent in bastions of homogeneity, such as small towns and newer suburbs, where there were few people of color or recent immigrants."

A limited exposure to urban living accounted for mistakes like the 1970s closing of Nicollet Avenue at Lake Street, then a thriving neighborhood, to build a suburban-scaled Kmart.

STREETSCAPES

Garrett, Lawal and Hollingsworth also said that design for public housing projects often isolated people in their apartments and that public art in the cities often had little local or cultural references.

They also said they felt the need to speak out after Floyd's death.

"I've been exhausted and talking a lot," said Garrett, who has been part of stories in national architecture magazines, podcasts and social media posts.

"Each one of us is a firm owner," Lawal added. "We understand the importance of our voices as business leaders. But we must nurture more minority-led architecture firms to expand our impact."

A fresh approach

The practice of architecture is imbued with so many white cultural norms and procedures that most people never question them.

For example, architects who are working on public projects are generally required to facilitate "public participation" and get local input in shaping the design. But Garrett, Lawal and Hollingsworth agreed that the process, determined by largely white firms, doesn't work well for people of color.

Public participation events for new libraries, schools and parks tend to adhere to a strict schedule, beginning and ending on time. But for audiences who have felt left out for generations, that is not the best approach.

"For public project meetings, I tell my clients that if you're asking me to lead this event, I reserve the right to stay as long as people have questions," said Lawal.

When he was designing the award-winning Sumner and Webber Park libraries in Minneapolis, Lawal stayed well into the night at several meetings until every voice was heard.

Hollingsworth questioned the value of formal public participation, arguing that public meetings don't work for people who have hourly jobs or children.

"Public comment sessions are often poorly promoted," she added, citing a recent St. Paul project in the Rondo neighborhood where announcement fliers appeared in neighbors' doors the night before the event.

In their practices, all three architects said they strive to talk directly with people in neighborhood settings such as barber shops, churches, mosques and senior living centers.

"That's why I de-emphasize the importance of all this public meetings foolishness and lift up the significance of other means of engaging," Garrett said. "People who attend public design input sessions tend to be older, whiter and wealthier. They have the time on their hands."

A largely white profession

There are fewer registered Black architects in the state than there were 20 years ago, said Lawal. Today, there are only 18.

In relatively homogenous states like Minnesota, reasons for this disparity include a lack of role models, access to mentors and the cost of attaining an architecture degree.

STREETSCAPES

In 1992, Lawal founded the Twin Cities chapter of the Architectural Youth Program to introduce minority high school students to architecture. The program included visits to design offices, building tours and personal mentoring. In its 17 years, about 1,000 students went through the program and several became architects.

"Our real goal was to raise their sense of potential," Lawal said. "To encourage these kids to explore career options and to go to college."

Yet, despite such efforts, the profession remains largely white.

"A lot of Minnesota firms say they want to become more diverse, but claim that it's difficult to find talented, BIPOC architects here," Garrett said. "I respond, 'Then go look outside the state. ... There are a number of quality architecture programs at historically Black colleges and universities.' I can name dozens of people whose talent could be recruited to come here - and make a great impact."

Garrett acknowledged that "after George Floyd's murder, many larger design firms are talking more about equity and offering to do pro bono work in underserved, poor communities. But will they still care four months or four years from now?"

Lawal added, "We live with a history of structural racism that's been around for 400 years. Diversifying who gets to shape the built environment is going to take a much deeper structural change than talk of good intentions from our profession."

Frank Edgerton Martin, a landscape historian and writer, has written for Landscape Architecture and other magazines.

Load-Date: July 26, 2020

Twins reliever Trevor May aims to be an ally in fight for social justice

ARTICLE MCCCXXXVII.

TWINS RELIEVER TREVOR MAY AIMS TO BE AN ALLY IN FIGHT FOR SOCIAL JUSTICE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 25, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 671 words

Byline: Betsy Helfand

Highlight: CHICAGO - Twins reliever Trevor May watched as protests over racial inequality took place outside his window in Minneapolis in the wake of George Floyd's death. Knowing baseball was coming back soon, he decided participating might not be "the smartest move to make" with the potential of COVID-19 risks. There was shame and guilt attached [...]

Body

CHICAGO - Twins reliever Trevor May watched as protests over racial inequality took place outside his window in Minneapolis in the wake of George Floyd's death. Knowing baseball was coming back soon, he decided participating might not be "the smartest move to make" with the potential of COVID-19 risks.

There was shame and guilt attached to that decision, he said, and it was important to May, who had heard a quote from Tigers outfielder Cameron Maybin about looking for allies, to show that he was one. May aimed to do that Friday night when he knelt during the the national anthem.

"That was my way of saying, 'I'm here. I'm at your disposal. I recognize your suffering and the things that I'll never have context for, no matter how much I try. But I'm going to just continue trying,'" May said. "I want to get to a point where in this country, we feel like the people directly affected by this system and these policies, they feel like they don't need to kneel anymore. I think I have a role to play in that. I think that everyone has a role to play in that."

May, along with teammates Byron Buxton, LaMonte Wade Jr., Aaron Whitefield, Taylor Rogers, Sergio Romo and Tyler Duffey, and manager Rocco Baldelli and coaches Mike Bell and Tommy Watkins knelt on Friday.

More and more conversations have sprung up within the clubhouse about racial inequalities in the United States, and they're conversations that May welcomes. He said the fact that everyone is thinking and listening is step one and has been an encouraging and hopeful sign to him.

"We're living in a time where empathy is sometimes more publicly going by the wayside, but we're all brothers in this clubhouse, and it's definitely not by the wayside here. It's been really eye-opening," May said. "There's a lot of things and soul searching that I've realized about my life. Most people consider themselves thinking or being a certain way, and to have that shaken is hard. Things that you've done in your past that just weren't OK and you didn't know at the time, things of that nature, and we're having those conversations and having those realizations in real time now, and these guys mean a lot to me."

Twins reliever Trevor May aims to be an ally in fight for social justice

A quicker ramp-up period and the introduction of the three-batter minimum - relievers must face three batters upon entering the game or finish off an inning - likely will play a big role in how bullpens are deployed this season, especially in the early going.

The Twins used May, Tyler Clippard, Tyler Duffey and Cody Stashak to lock down Friday's 10-5 Opening Day win, and Zack Littell, Devin Smeltzer and Matt Wisler pitched on Saturday. Twins relievers have been anticipating a slightly heavier workload near the beginning of the season with starting pitchers not fully stretched out, and Baldelli said he wasn't necessarily opposed to using pitchers in back-to-back games.

Twins swept by Royals, drop fourth straight game Twins make pitching move; stick with 16 pitchers Royals hand Twins their third straight loss Twins adjust as MLB tightens COVID-19 protocols Charley Walters: Twins picked up a gem in Kenta Maeda

"I think we will see some guys going back-to-back games early for us. Will it be every guy? Maybe not initially, especially guys that are maybe going up-and-down and things like that," Baldelli said. "Then again, it's going to come down to the individual, because some guys are certainly capable of a lot more than others at this point."

Rich Hill, who the Twins pushed back from starting on Saturday, threw a bullpen instead, and reports came back positive. The 40-year-old veteran is scheduled to start against the Cardinals on Wednesday night at Target Field against St. Louis righty Miles Mikolas. ... Homer Bailey will make his Twins' debut on Tuesday night for the team's home opener against Carlos Martinez. ... Baldelli said Byron Buxton, who is making his way back from a sprained foot, is aiming to be ready for the home opener, and if he's not ready by Tuesday, it probably wouldn't be more than a day or two later than that.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Trump's policing is an abuse of power

ARTICLE MCCCXXXVIII. TRUMP'S POLICING IS AN ABUSE OF POWER

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 25, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 6A

Length: 535 words

Highlight: Federal force wasn't requested by cities and isn't the norm in the United States.

Body

President Donald Trump's ad hoc assemblage of a federal police force to send to the cities of his choice - without collaborating with state and local officials - is an overreach of power with political overtones and should be stopped.

In the case of Portland, it happened over the objections of both the mayor and Oregon governor. Other cities threatened with such action also have objected.

A key question is whether the federal officers are there to quell violence or inflame it. From the needless camouflage uniforms - they are not on the battlefield, after all - to their aggressive tactics, these agents seem to think they are at war. And who are the combatants? Some troublemakers, to be sure, but many who simply are exercising their right to protest, including phalanxes of middle-aged women wearing T-shirts that say "Summoned Mama," a reference to George Floyd's dying call-out to his dead mother.

As often is the case, the Trump administration presents mixed messages rather than a coherent, strategic plan. Acting Homeland Security Secretary Chad Wolf, faced with serious pushback, has painted Portland as an extraordinary case, with a level of violence and threat to federal sites that warrant his assemblage of Border Patrol and Customs agents - many untrained in quelling civil unrest - and U.S. marshals.

Trump, on the other hand, was candid about his true purpose. At a recent news conference, flanked by his Attorney General William Barr, he vowed that Portland was just the start of federal deployments to cities across the country, including Seattle, Albuquerque and Chicago. Seattle officials have already objected, while Chicago Mayor Lori Lightfoot is attempting to negotiate terms of engagement. "I've drawn a very, very sharp line," Lightfoot said in a recent TV interview. "We are not going to agree to or accept anything like what's happening on the streets of Portland We're not going to have unnamed federal agents patrolling our streets, pretending to be the police, sweeping people off and denying them of their constitutional rights. That is not going to happen in Chicago."

But why is it happening at all? Police powers are reserved to the states under the Tenth Amendment. Trump should not, under the legal pretext of protecting federal property, march in to "dominate" cities to bolster his new "law and order" stance. He's even named his campaign - "Operation Legend."

Trump's policing is an abuse of power

In Minneapolis, hundreds of protesters gathered Thursday to signal their concern over potential federal involvement. Mayors of 16 cities signed on to a letter stating that "The unilateral deployment of these forces into American cities is unprecedented and violates the fundamental constitutional protections and tenets of federalism."

The one restraint exercised came from a district court judge, who has blocked federal forces in Portland from attacking, arresting or dispersing journalists attempting to cover the events.

The federal government has intervened before on occasion. But this is different. Trump has assembled what essentially is a federal police force, stitched together from agencies under his control, that he can deploy at will. That has not been the norm in this country, nor should it be.

Load-Date: July 29, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCXXXIX.

U STUDENTS CONFRONT RACISM IN ACADEMIA

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 26, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 840 wordsByline: RYAN FAIRCLOTH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Graduate classmates want more diversity in staffing and studies.Body

Graduate school students at the University of Minnesota are pressuring faculty to respond to the nation's racial reckoning by improving the academic climate and diversifying their departments and curriculum.

Students in three departments at the U let out their long-simmering frustrations with faculty in open letters following the May 25 killing of George Floyd by Minneapolis police. They are calling on professors and department heads to update curriculum to address systemic racism and create a learning environment that is welcoming to all students, not just those who are white.

"What we see is faculty members getting tenure, becoming full professors, moving up the ladder ... whereas what we're experiencing is behavior from those faculty that is incredibly problematic that has gone unaddressed for years," said Joy Hamilton, a Ph.D. candidate in the U's Communication Studies Department.

Hamilton and other communication studies graduate students are pushing for several changes within their department: They want administrators to prioritize hiring people of color for tenure-track positions and they want faculty to come up with plans to "combat anti-Blackness in their classrooms," among other things. The Communication Studies Department, they say, has long favored white students for preferred teaching assignments and research assistantships.

If their demands aren't met, the students threatened in their open letter to warn prospective graduate students and faculty hires of the department's "inability to create an equitable, anti-racist environment."

Department Chairman and Prof. Robert Walter Greene said faculty have since committed to inviting more Black and Indigenous speakers to research seminars, increasing graduate student representation at faculty meetings, and prioritizing candidates of color for open teaching positions.

The action by University of Minnesota students coincides with ongoing protests and discussions over racism and inequality that have taken place across the country since Floyd's death. Students in the Minnesota State system of public universities and community colleges have also pressured leaders to update their law enforcement programs using an "anti-racism and equity-focused lens."

Sociology students at the U called on faculty to review their curricula in early June after learning that two of the officers charged in Floyd's death were former undergraduates in the department. In a joint statement, sociology students expressed "disbelief, anger and disappointment" in response to a department message urging them to direct any media inquiries about past students to public relations staff.

"The murder of George Floyd has brought to light our department's complicity in systemic racism and anti-Blackness," the students' statement said.

The Sociology Department issued a statement a few days later, conveying regret that its initial message to students "was not clear" and "caused additional harm." The department wrote in its statement that it will develop strategies to support students of color and review curricula to ensure it "challenges systemic racism, anti-Blackness, and state violence."

In the U's Ecology, Evolution and Behavior department, graduate students say they have grown frustrated by "persistent instances of discriminatory behavior and racism," according to an open letter. The department does not have a sufficient system for students to anonymously report harassment or racism, the students say, which makes it difficult to hold faculty accountable.

Students have asked faculty to participate in a series of mediated discussions about racism in academia. They also want the department to establish a task force on diversity, equity and inclusion and are asking the larger College of Biological Sciences to hire a diversity and inclusion officer - a position that exists in other U colleges.

"Faculty are uniquely positioned to be leaders in these efforts," the students' letter said. "Faculty - especially tenured faculty - are relatively permanent members of the EEB community with much greater power, security, and institutional knowledge."

Associate Prof. Emilie Snell-Rood is working with Ecology, Evolution and Behavior leaders to address student concerns. The department recently held a mediated Zoom listening session on racism with more than 125 students, faculty and staff. These open discussions will continue, Snell-Rood said, and faculty will soon begin meeting in small groups to increase their own awareness of racism.

The department is also working to establish the requested task force and is joining students' call for the hiring of a diversity and inclusion officer in the college, she said.

"I think in general we have been dismayed to hear from the students that our graduate program, it's not experienced by all of them as a welcoming and nurturing environment," Snell-Rood said. "We join with the students in recognizing that racism is a significant problem in the field and in science and academia."

Ryan Faircloth · 612-673-4234

Twitter: @ryanfaircloth

Load-Date: July 29, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCXL IN THE ASHES OF THE THIRD

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 26, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 1698 wordsByline: JENNIFER BJORHUS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The police station's destruction is celebrated, decried, ponderedBody

Charred, boarded up, spray painted and fenced off, the abandoned Third Precinct station sits at E. Lake Street and Minnehaha Avenue in Minneapolis - Stars and Stripes still flying - as a nation comes to grips with what the fall of the police station means.

Home to the four Minneapolis officers involved in killing George Floyd, an unarmed Black man, the complex was a focus of the explosive protests. When it went up in flames on May 28, there was shock and disbelief.

"It was like watching your house burn down," said retired Minneapolis police officer Val Goligowski, who worked in the station for more than two decades.

The destruction of a police station is unprecedented in modern U.S. police history. The last time one was destroyed appears to have been in the New York Draft Riots of 1863, when a deadly race riot erupted targeting African Americans, said University of Nebraska policing historian Samuel Walker.

In interviews, people described what the fall of the Third meant to them: a deep betrayal of trust, a loss of control, a symbol of change and a breaking point.

"We're done backing down. We're [done] rolling over. We're done dying," said protester Queen Jacobs.

In a 1985 Star Tribune article about the opening of the new Third Precinct building, it was hailed as state-of-the-art station, designed to be more inviting. It had skylights and an atrium and resembled a middle school. It was supposed to be a new day in policing.

"We want to break down the stereotyped police station atmosphere that people are afraid to come into," then-Deputy Police Chief Bob Lutz said at the time. Then-Precinct Capt. Al Pufahl called the new station "a symbol of law enforcement" that "says something to people who will be working in and around it."

Today, the future of the building itself is uncertain. But what its fall meant is distinct to many.

In the ashes of the Third

Queen Jacobs, 26, protester

Jacobs, a north Minneapolis swim instructor, said the killing of George Floyd moved her to protest for the first time in her life. She protested for about eight days straight, she said, getting tear gassed, Maced and flashbanged.

It was about midnight, Jacobs said, when she finally got to the Third Precinct on May 28. It was already ablaze, and she stood in shock with the crowd watching the flames leap. Jacobs, who is Black, described the experience as "liberating."

"I think we all felt a sense of strength and community, and of a piece of what our ancestors went through, and when they were able to be liberated," she said. "We showed them, by physically removing them from what should be their safe place. We can't go outside and be safe, so why should they be able to hide in that building with all their weapons?"

"If they don't want to hear us asking and begging to be treated like humans ... if they can't treat us like humans ... then I am not going to be quiet, and I'm not going to be peaceful, and they're going to hear me one way or another."

Joey Sandberg, 55, retired MPD sergeant

Sandberg, a native of south Minneapolis, spent 31 years in the Third Precinct before retiring in 2018. He picked the precinct and chose to stay, he said, "to work in the community I grew up in." He watched the station burn on television at his house.

"That was my home for 31 years. I did the very, very best I could do in police work to serve my people," he said. "To see that go up in flames like that was very hard for me to take."

Sandberg said he remains troubled by Mayor Jacob Frey's order for officers to evacuate the precinct as protesters continued the onslaught.

"I couldn't sleep that night. I was just fuming," he said. "I could not believe that the politicians would just do this. That's not just a building to us, it's a symbol of pride for us."

The officers remaining at the Third that night felt completely abandoned, he said. "A lot of them feel like they were left for dead."

"I gave my heart and soul to that precinct," he said. "To see those people cheering and throwing rocks ... it almost seemed like all the work I did for 31 years was for nothing."

James Works, 47, resident near Third Precinct station

There is no love lost between Works and the Third Precinct. Works, who is Black, is a food delivery driver who works along Lake Street. Over the years officers have repeatedly pulled him over, he said, without good reason and harassed him.

In 2017, he went to the police station to take the matter to a supervisor but was tossed out and cited for trespassing. A lawyer got the ticket dropped, Works said, and obtained bodycam footage from inside the station. It shows one officer referring to Works using an expletive.

In the ashes of the Third

Still, Works said the station house should not have been destroyed. He's a veteran, he said, and feels strongly about law and order. He watched it burn from his apartment.

"Even though I have issues with the police, I feel like they shouldn't have given up the police station," Works said. "They should have stood their ground. Once you take down a police station, anything goes."

"We still need to uphold the law," said Works, who said his father is a deputy sheriff in Georgia. He called the station house a symbol - not of authority, "but of what we stand for, like law-abiding citizens."

Burning down a precinct station doesn't change the department's culture, he said.

"They're going to be right back there with the same officers doing the same stuff," he said, and we "got nowhere."

Juno Choi, 41, business owner

Choi and the other co-owners of Arbeiter Brewing say they have no idea how their startup was spared from damage. The brewery, which sits in a brick building a few doors down from the Third Precinct station, hadn't even opened yet when the protests began.

The first two days, they stood guard. On the third, they boarded up and went home, not knowing what would be left the next day. Choi said he felt torn between protecting the business and joining in the protests.

"We don't exactly know why our building did not burn down," said Choi. "I think it had a lot to do with luck."

The deserted station represents more than a Minneapolis precinct, he said. "It has become sort of symbolic of police brutality and systemic racism across the country. It was really a protest about what's been going on all across the nation for a long, long time."

It's also a constant reminder now, said Choi, of why his group wanted to start their brewery: to create a gathering space for people to talk, exchange ideas and build their community. With a bit more luck, that will start happening next month, after Arbeiter Brewing's grand opening.

Jacob Frey, 39, mayor of Minneapolis

To many, Frey's decision to evacuate the Third Precinct station is the moment he lost control of the city. Gov. Tim Walz the next day called the city's handling of the riots an "abject failure." But Frey says he'd had several conversations with Walz earlier and that the governor had never disagreed with the Third Precinct strategy in those conversations.

"There will be things I look back on and wish I would have done differently, but the decision regarding the Third Precinct is absolutely not one of them," he said. "If I had ordered the chief to hold the precinct at all costs, hand-to-hand combat would have been inevitable. There was a possibility of serious injury or even death."

Frey said he and Police Chief Medaria Arradondo were united on a strategy with three goals: to preserve life, to protect property in other neighborhoods and to de-escalate the situation. "The route we took accomplished all three," Frey said.

In the ashes of the Third

"There were no good options on the table," he said. "Imagine what would have happened to our city if either an officer or a member of the public was killed. The crisis we would have experienced would have dwarfed even what we saw."

Jennifer Starr Dodd, 36, emergency relief worker

Holy Trinity Lutheran Church, about two blocks from the Third Precinct station, still operates the emergency relief program it started during the protests when the neighborhood lost its grocery stores. A recent Wednesday finds site manager Starr Dodd coordinating volunteers under a shade tree as families line up.

In the charred police station, Starr Dodd sees the pain and injustice people of color have experienced. She also sees hope.

"People aren't going to be quiet anymore," she said. "People are moving forward. They're going to fight and protest until there is justice for all. It represents the hope to end police brutality, a clean slate."

"I think of it as the Pentecost," she said, referring to the Christian holiday following Easter when the Holy Spirit visited the followers of Jesus and flames appeared. "It's like a holy anger. The spirit came and it was a great fire, and everybody changed in that moment of Pentecost. I see the burning of the Third Precinct as the same. It changed everyone, whether they like it or not."

Melanie Majors, 53, executive director, Longfellow Community Council

At first, Majors said, the destruction shocked her. It wasn't the buildings, she said. What she saw was destroyed jobs and investments, loss of access, loss of visitors to the neighborhood and a destroyed sense of safety.

"Later," Majors said, "I thought this place [the Third Precinct station] right there made this community a target, and what does that mean for the future?"

"You've got four officers now who have been charged, and no one knows what those outcomes are going to be," she said.

"If there are outcomes that are really offensive to the community, and the Third Precinct is still in greater Longfellow, then that makes the area a target again. We just got past this crisis period. If we will be a target again in the future, what message would that send to those who A) want to rebuild and B) who have invested in the rebuilding?"

Majors said outrage over police treatment of Black people isn't new for her. She said her father, who was Black, was brutalized by Minneapolis police through the 1970s. She has seen outrage come and go.

Majors said she fears that once the outrage passes, people trying to make changes will "hit the political and financial wall."

"The symbol keeps people's eyes open, but I don't know that they provide for sustained change over time."

Jennifer Bjorhus · 612-673-4683

Load-Date: July 29, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCXLI.

LYNX FINISH STRONG TO WIN SEASON OPENER

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 26, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 582 wordsByline: Mike CookHighlight: Her team outplayed for the better part of three quarters Sunday, Crystal Dangerfield gave the Minnesota Lynx a much-needed spark. The team's second-round draft pick scored seven of her 10 points in the fourth quarter, Napheesa Collier added nine of her 11 in the final five minutes, and the Lynx rallied to beat Connecticut 77-69 [...]Body

Her team outplayed for the better part of three quarters Sunday, Crystal Dangerfield gave the Minnesota Lynx a much-needed spark.

The team's second-round draft pick scored seven of her 10 points in the fourth quarter, Napheesa Collier added nine of her 11 in the final five minutes, and the Lynx rallied to beat Connecticut 77-69 in the season opener for both teams.

"Crystal changed the game," said coach Cheryl Reeve.

Minnesota (1-0) opened the fourth quarter on a 12-2 run for a 62-59 lead. It outscored Connecticut 27-12 in the frame.

The stretch included four quick points by Dangerfield - a steal and layup followed by a drive - a 3-pointer from Shenise Johnson and was capped by a reverse layup from Collier, last season's WNBA Rookie of the Year.

"We really fed off her energy," said Collier, who played with Dangerfield for three years at the University of Connecticut. "It felt good to be back in Storrs for a little bit."

Dangerfield, whose 3-pointer sparked a late 10-0 run to secure the win, acknowledged having success with Collier is "fun," but she knows there's more.

"The chemistry that we built over the last weeks of training camp, there was a look in everyone's eyes ... and we were able to pull out to a lead and get the win," she said.

Reeve said the plan was not for Dangerfield to see significant minutes, but the game situation dictated the move: "We were looking for something different at the guard spot and she made the most of it."

Lynx finish strong to win season opener

Starting guards Johnson and Lexie Brown finished with 13 and four points, respectively, but were a combined 5 for 19 shooting with one assist. Brown had three turnovers.

Collier missed her lone first-half shot attempt, and sat much of the second quarter with foul trouble. She fouled out late.

"I had to push my own frustrations aside and just keep going and fight through it," Collier said.

Steady throughout was Sylvia Fowles. The center finished with 17 points, 18 rebounds and four blocks. Her 16 defensive rebounds tied her Lynx single-game record.

Fowles also tied assistant coach Rebekkah Brunson for the most rebounds in team history in a season's first game, and is now six rebounds (3,350) behind Brunson for the most in league history.

Plus, the 13-year veteran was vocal at halftime.

"She doesn't usually get that way, so we know when she does we are really messing up," Collier said. "It happened because we had a really bad first half. We didn't do anything that we set out to do. ... Syl getting mad, I think kind of sparked us a little bit and made us kind of wake up and get our heads out of our butts."

Alyssa Thomas had 16 of her 20 points in the opening half as the Sun led 37-28 at the break.

Minnesota made more free throws (10 of 11) than baskets (9 for 28), included 0 for 8 from outside the arc, in the opening 20 minutes.

The Lynx also committed 11 of its 14 turnovers and struggled to play good transition defense.

Social justice

Before the game, Lynx and Connecticut players wore shirts with "Black Lives Matter" on the front and "Say Her Name" on the back. Coaches sported them during the contest.

Players from both teams also stood shoulder to shoulder for silence in 26 seconds to honor 26-year-old Breonna Taylor, who was killed in March when Louisville police executed a no-knock search warrant.

"It felt really powerful," Collier said. "We as athletes are trying to use our platform to enact change and do whatever we can to bring attention to this issue. ... I thought it was nice we got to honor Breonna Taylor that way."

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Apparel businesses weighed down by extra-large inventories

ARTICLE MCCCXLII.

APPAREL BUSINESSES WEIGHED DOWN BY EXTRA-LARGE INVENTORIES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 26, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1D

Length: 1102 words

Byline: JOHN EWOLDT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

The switch to "quarantine style" clothes - sweats and T-shirts and occasionally a "zirt," a stylish shirt to throw on before Zoom meetings - is yet another hit to apparel stores, already a suffering sector before the coronavirus pandemic.

The result is a glut of inventory, especially late winter and spring clothing, rampant discounting and retailers needing to reinvent their assortment as consumer preferences change. The disruption also created a windfall for companies such as Eagan-based Proozy.com, built as an e-commerce clearance store for excess, unsold inventory.

"Apparel retailers have seen a world of pain, nearly as much as travel and entertainment," said Beth Perro-Jarvis of Ginger Marketing in Minneapolis. "They were wobbly going into the pandemic because we're over-retailed. Everyone's selling a white T-shirt, blue blazer and jeans."

The result of stay-at-home orders that closed brick-and-mortar locations, along with the style shift, has accelerated financial issues for the industry.

Last week, Ascena Retail Group - which owns Ann Taylor, Lane Bryant and Justice - filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy. It joined such players as Brooks Brothers, Neiman Marcus and J.C. Penney.

Nearly 25,000 retail stores are expected to close by the end of the year, according to Coresight Research in New York. Nearly 60% of the closures are expected in U.S. malls.

Yet specialty stores, including those based or located in the Twin Cities, are also feeling the pinch, both in terms of sales dollars and reacting to the change in preference.

"Customers used to come in regularly to the stores, but without that traffic, retailers have to let them know what's new in the store and why they need it," said Kevin Quinn of Styled Retail, a consultant based in western Wisconsin.

Apparel businesses weighed down by extra-large inventories

Hubert White in the IDS Center has closed and reopened twice, first because of the pandemic stay-at-home order and then because of unrest following the Memorial Day police killing of George Floyd.

"Or sales are nowhere near normal," said Bob White, president of the 104-year-old men's store. "The two worst retail scenarios right now are indoor malls and downtown retail. The IDS Tower is probably only 5 to 10% occupied now."

Plus, the store serves professionals, many of whom are working at home and dressing down.

Natalie Sudberry, owner of Style Niche in Rosemount, has done what she could this year. She quickly put up an e-commerce site when the state's stay-at-home order came down. She pushed curbside pickup with regular customers.

But not nearly as much inventory as expected moved.

"The amount we had left over from winter definitely weighed on us," Sudberry said.

Rather than putting it on clearance racks when her store reopened in May, she put new summer merchandise out, trying to draw customers back in.

She plans to clear out the winter leftovers with a preseason clearance in August. "We'll start the season with a bang-up blowout event with everything marked "$10, $15, $20 or $30."

It looks like Edina-based Evereve, which has 90 stores in 26 states, will close only one store because of the pandemic and has moved ahead with five new planned stores this year, said Mike Tamte, co-founder and co-CEO.

Still, like for other retailers, it has been a bad year.

"We lost about $8 million in eight weeks, $150,000 a day," Tamte said. "We'll probably have sales of about $120 million this year. Without COVID, it probably would have been about $200 million."

Evereve launched "Dressing Room to Go" in which a stylist picks 12 to 15 items based on a customer's preferences. After pickup, the customer has 48 hours to try the outfits and return items not wanted before being charged.

"It was created for COVID for the customer who wants to skip the store but still have the guidance of a stylist," Tamte said.

Jason Hammerberg, founder of Eden Prairie-based Hammer Made men's sport shirts, has seen sales decline about 30% since the pandemic and has had to try to get consumers buying where he can.

For example, the store pre-pandemic sold a lot of ties, but he found a way to transform an out-of-favor product - men's ties - into an item that fits the times.

"We took the fabric that an Italian neckwear company made for us and shifted it from ties to a pocket square that's also a face mask," he said.

The silk mask is worn over a cotton mask, and it has sold out online and in the nine Hammer Made stores across the country, four of them in the Twin Cities. The retailer recently got in the second shipment of the masks.

Apparel businesses weighed down by extra-large inventories

Yet Hammer Made and other retailers still need to deal with the switch to casual styles.

"Everyone is feeling price pressure on unsold inventory," said Rob McGovern, chief executive of consumer-data company PreciseTarget in Washington D.C. "Holding your ground on price can be risky these days."

Hubert White is discounting high-end brands Zegna and Brunello Cuccinelli 30%, which rarely go on sale except at the end of the season.

Reddit's message boards are lighting up with consumers sharing major markdowns. Macys.com had 85% off suits for women and men last week. J. Crew recently had a flash sale with dresses under $20 and men's tech pants for $24.50.

Eagan-based Proozy.com, an apparel clearance site, found itself in the right place at the right time since the pandemic.

"The new hot product isn't our niche," said Proozy founder Jeremy Segal. "We deal with the C-Suite to move older [brand name] inventory."

The company just had its three biggest months since it was founded five years ago. Sales are up 400 to 500%, which means Proozy will likely end the year with $140 million in sales, Segal said.

Proozy sells brand-name overstock from previous seasons at 50 to 90% off, including tees, shorts, joggers, shoes and hoodies from Nike, Under Armour, Adidas, Oakley, Ray Ban and Reebok.

Proozy has added other customers this year because of overstocks or canceled orders caused by the pandemic, including Nordstrom, Kohl's, Costco, Sam's Club, T.J. Maxx, Dick's Sporting Goods and Sierra Trading Co., Segal said.

Sales for Proozy, a made-up name that sounded like "Google" to Segal, have been so strong for so long that Segal is looking to expand in the Edina area. The 65,000-square-foot location would house more warehouse space but also be a step similar to those taken by Amazon and other successful e-commerce businesses - a clicks-to-bricks retail store.

Segal hopes to have it open by the holidays.

"I used to believe we could be a $500 million company in five years, but COVID has expedited that," he said. "Now I think we can do it three years. We're in complete shock and feeling blessed."

John Ewoldt · 612-673-7633

Load-Date: July 26, 2020

Freedom Fighters celebrate a personal milestone

ARTICLE MCCCXLIII.

FREEDOM FIGHTERS CELEBRATE A PERSONAL MILESTONE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 26, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3B

Length: 82 words

Body

Randy Chrisman, center, celebrated with Mayor Newz, left, and their fellow Minnesota Freedom Fighters as it was announced he'd been promoted from intern to full member of the group during a meet-and-greet Saturday outside Cub Foods on West Broadway. The Freedom Fighters formed during the George Floyd protests to offer neighborhood safety patrols and provide security during protests. The event offered a chance to engage with community members.

ANTHONY SOUFFLÉ · anthony.souffle@startribune.com

Load-Date: July 30, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCXLIV.

HOT DISH POLITICS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 26, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 2BLength: 491 wordsByline: BRIANA BIERSCHBACH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Dealmaking thrives in darknessBody

Minnesota lawmakers repeatedly said the eyes of the world were on them in the two months that followed George Floyd's killing by Minneapolis police.

But in the end, only a handful of eyes saw a sweeping package of police accountability proposals crafted in response to his death before legislators approved it in the dead of night.

In some ways, it's a tale as old as politics: closed-door deal making, secretive horse trading and last-minute lobbying in smoke-filled rooms. Whenever former DFL Gov. Mark Dayton retreated into sensitive negotiations with Republicans in the Legislature, they instituted a "cone of silence," a joke both parties recycled legislative session after legislative session.

There's always some excuse for it, too. Lawmakers can't speak freely in the public eye, meaning they would never actually reach a compromise. Deadlines, like those set in the middle of the night, are the only way to put pressure on lawmakers to get the work done.

This time, it was the COVID-19 pandemic that complicated things. The public health crisis forced the Capitol to mostly shut down to the public in March. Then, the unrest that followed Floyd's death on May 25 made the building a target for destruction. Barricades still surround the Capitol, and State Patrol troopers are on constant watch.

Even reporters, who are supposed to get access to news conferences, struggled to navigate the tight security and inform the public about what lawmakers were debating.

"A big part of it is the COVID-19. It does bother me that the press cannot be more engaged. It's hard for them to get in the Capitol," Senate Majority Leader Paul Gazelka, R-East Gull Lake, told WCCO the morning after adjourning the second special session of the summer. "We try to do more on Zoom, but Zoom is not the same."

HOT DISH POLITICS

House Speaker Melissa Hortman, DFL-Brooklyn Park, blamed Republicans for adjourning the first special session of the summer in June - triggered by Gov. Tim Walz's extension of his emergency powers - forcing negotiations to go behind closed doors. Ideally, she said, differences on policing bills would have been worked out in public Zoom hearings with members of both chambers.

"It takes two bodies that are willing to do it that way," she said.

But even Zoom hearings were almost nonexistent during the July special session, called as Walz extended his emergency powers for another 30 days.

Instead, lawmakers set a midnight deadline to finish their work on Monday and retreated behind closed doors until nearly 11 p.m. They emerged with a sweeping package of proposals to change policing in the state, from banning most chokeholds and warrior-style training to a requirement for officers to intercede in cases of excessive force.

Some had been debated in public hearings weeks earlier, but others were entirely new creations, hatched in private. Within a few hours, while most Minnesotans were sleeping, lawmakers passed the deal and sent it off to Walz's desk.

Load-Date: July 30, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCXLV.

LOOTED BUSINESSES LAMENT DELAY IN AID

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 26, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1350 wordsByline: JEFFREY MEITRODT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Two months after the death of George Floyd, construction crews are few and far between in the riot-torn neighborhoods of Minneapolis and St. Paul.

A handful of workers can be seen installing new windows and Sheetrock, but most of the activity involves big companies with deep pockets like Target and Speedway.

Hundreds of small businesses that were torched and looted in the days following Floyd's death remain boarded up. While some buildings have been torn down, the rubble remains. On Chicago Avenue, where Floyd was killed, the mood is more funereal than commercial. At the front of one burned-out shop, someone has planted flowers in a scorched steel girder.

A few doors down, Kaltuma Hassan stands in the wreckage of her grocery store and wonders if anybody is going to help her rebuild. Like her neighbors, Hassan is frustrated by the failure of state lawmakers to pass legislation that would have put much-needed cash in the hands of struggling business owners.

"If they want to help us, what are they waiting for?" asked Hassan, who won't be able to rebuild Bismillah Grocery without assistance because her insurance policy will cover just $100,000 of her $500,000 loss. "It makes you angry. It is destroying our chance."

Though Democrats have proposed giving small business owners as much as $300 million to cover uninsured damage, Republicans have blocked the legislation from moving forward, citing concerns over the size of the bailout as well as the role local officials played in the disaster. Some key Republican leaders said they won't support the rebuilding effort unless local officials in Minneapolis and St. Paul contribute to the program.

"It is not outrageous to think that Minneapolis should have skin in the game," said state Rep. Jim Nash, a Republican from Waconia who serves as assistant minority leader in the House. "They clearly have their fingerprints on what happened. So they should not look solely to the state for help."

Looted businesses lament delay in aid

The mayors of Minneapolis and St. Paul said they will do what they can to help small business owners, but they said the scope of the losses dwarfs their ability to cover much of the damage. Gov. Tim Walz has told federal officials that property damage is expected to exceed $500 million, making the Twin Cities riots the second-costliest act of civil unrest in the nation's history.

"The notion that the Twin Cities did this to ourselves is patently false," said St. Paul Mayor Melvin Carter. "We literally had people drive two or three hours to come and start fires in the Twin Cities."

Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey has come under intense fire from GOP lawmakers, who accuse him of mishandling the crisis. At recent hearings at the State Capitol, Minneapolis police officers testified they could have done more to protect the city if local officials hadn't tied their hands.

Frey said the police did everything they could to protect store owners, but he said there were simply too many calls to handle.

"A crisis is no time for pointing fingers, and it is not a good approach in the aftermath of a crisis either," Frey said.

Hassan was trying to protect her store from rioters when a group of eight men attacked her at her back door. One of the robbers hit her on the head with his gun. She was robbed of $7,000.

While she was recovering in the hospital, her store was looted and set on fire. Like other business owners who were notified of a break-in by their private security contractors, Hassan immediately called the police.

"They said they can't help until morning," Hassan recalled. "When I got there, there was nothing left. The whole building had collapsed."

Store owners said their concerns about public safety didn't end with the riots. At El Chuchi Market on Lake Street, which was looted during the protests but reopened a week later, owner Luis Tamay said he is tired of being one of the few entrepreneurs to reopen in his neighborhood. Tamay said crime levels have returned to where they were seven years ago, when he first opened a restaurant next to his corner grocery. The restaurant was destroyed in the rioting.

"We see people breaking into cars and making graffiti every night," said Tamay, who watched as glass workers installed $50,000 worth of new windows at his store last week. "We need more security."

Tamay said he would like to reopen his restaurant on Lake Street, but he isn't sure if his landlord will rebuild. His restaurant was uninsured, so Tamay has raised more than $107,000 in charitable donations through his GoFundMe account. Other riot-damaged businesses have taken the same approach, with varying levels of success.

"I think a lot of people have the money to reopen, but they don't want to," Tamay said. "It's not safe yet."

Republican lawmakers said the Minneapolis City Council's move to disband the police department is contributing to that anxiety and fueling a wave of departures. A union lawyer has said that nearly 200 out of 850 officers are currently seeking disability status.

Looted businesses lament delay in aid

"I think business owners look at that and say, 'Why the hell should I go into Minneapolis and rebuild my business if it isn't going to be safe,' " said Sen. Scott Newman, a Republican from Hutchinson who oversaw the recent hearings on the riots.

Newman and other Republicans said they are willing to support financial aid for small business owners hurt by the riots when the Legislature reconvenes in August, but they urged owners to explore other options first, including seeking help from private foundations as well as the city councils in Minneapolis and St. Paul.

"Rural Minnesotans look at this and say, 'This is a man-made disaster created by years of poor policy and weak and ineffective leadership,' " said Rep. Barb Haley, a Red Wing Republican who is working on her own relief program for small business owners in the Twin Cities. "So until those entities come to the table, it is a challenging discussion for outstate Minnesota."

Haley said one idea for helping riot-damaged businesses is to provide up to $100 million in quick cash while owners wait for their insurance checks. She said some owners may have to wait as long as a year for their money, since many of their records may have burned when their shops were destroyed.

"I think it is incumbent on all of us to support these business owners," Haley said. "Minneapolis ... is the center of our economic region. It is an economic engine that we have to restore."

Frey said he is already working with local foundations to raise money for small businesses, but he declined to say how much money he hopes to raise through the effort. "It will be sizable," he said.

The presidents of the city councils in Minneapolis and St. Paul said they have already contributed several million dollars to small businesses hurt by the pandemic. They declined to commit to any additional funding for riot-damaged businesses.

"St. Paul has an annual budget of $600 million, so this is beyond the scope of what a city the size of ours can manage on its own," said Amy Brendmoen, president of the St. Paul City Council.

Democratic lawmakers said Republicans may regret requiring riot aid contributions from the Twin Cities, noting they haven't made similar demands when rural towns sought assistance after a tornado or other disaster.

"I am fine with the idea of Minneapolis and St. Paul kicking in direct aid as a part of this package, but then that would apply to everyone who seeks disaster assistance from the state," said Ryan Winkler, a Golden Valley Democrat who serves as House Majority Leader. "That is the new standard then. ... The fact is, they want Jacob Frey to suffer for what happened, but there are a lot of ways for him to be accountable."

Small business owners, meanwhile, said this is the wrong time for partisanship.

"Anybody who drives down Lake Street nowadays is going to see a war zone," said Ali Barbarawi, who is rebuilding his dental practice on Chicago Avenue. "We have to make a decision: Are we going to leave it like this? Rubble? And have people get scared of what they see and move away? Or are we going to fix this as soon as possible?"

Looted businesses lament delay in aid

Load-Date: July 29, 2020

End of Document

May, Buxton both determined to show support for justice

ARTICLE MCCCXLVI.

MAY, BUXTON BOTH DETERMINED TO SHOW SUPPORT FOR JUSTICE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 26, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 6C

Length: 663 words

Byline: LA VELLE E. NEAL III; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

CHICAGO - Here are two stories about two Twins players who were determined to show their support in the fight against racial injustice before Friday's season opener.

Righthander Trevor May headed straight for the Twin Cities from Florida after baseball shut down in March because of the COVID-19 pandemic. The native of Washington state was in town during the death of George Floyd and the resulting protests and riots.

"Watching protests out my window," May said Saturday, "and knowing the season was going to start soon and not really - knowing for my job that being down there probably wasn't the smartest move to make, just for me moving forward - but there was some shame and some guilt attached to that for me and my wife and my family. It's something I feel strong about."

May and his teammates have had many serious and difficult conversations about current events, touching upon subjects that normally don't take place in a clubhouse. But it's allowed May to see different sides of his teammates.

"Just like any other workplace. The common adage with politics, religion and money. You usually don't go into those," May said. "Only go in those with your closest friends and your family, right? So this kind of gets into a more serious nature of things, but it's phenomenal that I think guys are really, really open to have the conversations, and you're hearing things from guys that you've never heard before and that is kind of the key. That is the point of this whole thing, is to have the conversations and to listen to stories and to get some context."

And May joined several of his teammates and coaches Friday in kneeling in the name of justice and equality during the national anthem. He then was the winning pitcher in the Twins' season-opening 10-5 victory over the White Sox.

Meanwhile, center fielder Byron Buxton - as it turned out - did not join teammates in Chicago to play. The plan is for him to debut sometime during the upcoming homestand.

May, Buxton both determined to show support for justice

Buxton, recovering from a left midfoot sprain, made the drive into town Friday just so he could be part of the pregame activities.

"I think Buck made the decision and wanted to make the decision to drive down to be with his teammates on Opening Day," said Derek Falvey, Twins president of baseball operations. "Having just made that drive as well, it's not too bad. It's pretty quick. You can get down here pretty quickly and he wanted to be down here for his teammates, for Opening Day for baseball, but also for being a part of what transpired pregame, something that he felt really strongly about and wanted to make that trip."

Buxton was with Taylor Rogers and LaMonte Wade Jr. along the first base line when they all knelt during the anthem. Buxton came to the park Saturday to get treatment and work out. And the Twins are confident that he will enter the lineup sometime next week, perhaps Tuesday's home opener.

But they were supportive of him driving 400-plus miles to make his statement.

"It was a very, very important day for a lot of people," said manager Rocco Baldelli, who also knelt during the anthem. "I know it was exceptionally important for Byron to be there on Opening Day with us, to be with his teammates, to take part in the pregame ceremonies."

Hill back on hill

Lefthander Rich Hill was scratched from Saturday's start so he could get a couple more days of rest before making his Twins debut. The Twins acknowledged Wednesday that the 40-year-old was feeling a little sore and needed the extra time.

Hill played catch Friday and threw in the bullpen Saturday and told the Twins he felt good.

So Hill is scheduled to start on Wednesday vs. St. Louis at Target Field. Homer Bailey will start Tuesday's home opener.

Remembering Costello

The Twins are wearing a black patch with white "RC" letters in honor of minor league infielder Ryan Costello. The 23-year-old Connecticut native, who was to play in the Australian Baseball League over the offseason, was found dead in his New Zealand hotel room in November.

Load-Date: July 30, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCXLVII.

READERS WRITE DISTANCE FROM SHORE MAY NOT HELP

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 26, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 10ALength: 1108 wordsBody

WAKEBOARDING

The July 19 article about wakeboarding ("Making waves") did not adequately describe the downside of the practice. If you are located on the shoreline near where surfers are repeatedly going back and forth wave-bombing you, it's awful. If you live in a protected cove or such, you may not realize what your neighbors have to endure - like waves that bowl over kids playing in shallow water, soil erosion that kills trees, damage to moored boats and docks, loons abandoning their eggs and nests, and the incredibly loud music. Lakeshore owners and associations need to band together to help control this.

Most of these wave problems are already illegal, but hard to enforce. Focusing new laws on the distance from shore as a measure of how bad the waves are may not help much. The reason is that these boats are highly engineered to create "perfect waves," which carry on quietly across the lake with remarkably little deterioration for easily 1,000 feet! A 300-foot limit may not be sufficient.

I recommend that legislators consider banning or limiting the use of the ballast tanks these boats use. These tanks hold hundreds of gallons of water to sink the stern and make higher waves. Also, emptying and refilling them with lake water risks spreading aquatic invasive species from lake to lake. These tanks are the difference between wake boats and all others that makes them so destructive. Perhaps research and legislation on the use of the ballast tanks would be most effective.

John Graber, Minneapolis

. . .

To add to the information in the wakeboarding article, as residents on a small lake in a northern suburb we have experienced the safety and shoreline erosion concerns caused by the massive wakes created by wakeboard boats. The size of their wake capsizes kayaks, paddle boards and canoes and makes fishing and pontooning a rock 'n' roll adventure.

Wakeboard boats are very expensive, and their effect is to allow their privileged owners to access the lake while effectively limiting other lake users because the wake size threatens their safety. Added to the safety concern is the immense shoreline erosion caused by these massive wakes. Wake boats may be fun for a very few, but the reality is that they greatly affect lake usage by many others while impacting the lake environment.

READERS WRITE Distance from shore may not help

Debra and Wayne Eck, New Brighton

FIFTH DISTRICT RACE

Let's have a rule about where the campaign money can come from

The July 19 article regarding Minnesota's Fifth Congressional District's upcoming primary ("Primary will test Omar's 1st term") noted that "millions of dollars from all over the country" are flowing into the district. I find this very problematic, and I do not feel it is right for anyone other than Fifth District residents to be having a say in the race. While it may concern others, they do not live there.

A good step toward voting reform would be to allow campaign contributions to come only from those who can vote for you. Or, put another way, a person can contribute only to a candidate who will be on their ballot. I should not be allowed to donate money to, say, a Senate candidate in Kentucky if I live in Minnesota. They do not represent me. Whoever wins the primary and likely goes on to be the representative of the Fifth District should go to Washington for the people of their district, and nobody else. Or at least that is the way it is supposed to be.

Chris Bradshaw, Columbus

THE COST OF REBUILDING

An out-of-towner sees Minneapolis only as he wishes to see it

Leave it to someone from Edina to care less about what happens in Minneapolis ("No federal aid? Good. This chaos was all on you, Minneapolitans," Readers Write, July 19). The writer is accurate to say that the damage was not caused by a natural disaster. That was as far as it goes. The state has its part in the terror the Third Precinct inflicts. The state's citizens were the majority of looters and destroyers, not the city's. And this last one is important: Minneapolis is the state's economic engine, not its drain. Why are you so intent on destroying it? Because it doesn't meet your political vision?

Susan Bloyer, St. Louis Park

PAYCHECK PROTECTION PROGRAM

Would well-off private schools kindly return the money?

A July 20 article reported on how various organizations had received Paycheck Protection Program grants for use in their organizations. One company, 75F, had decided to return the $600,000 that had been awarded to it. The president and board felt that since they had just received $18 million in growth capital, it was incorrect to receive the grant.

The same article mentioned that two private schools, Breck and Blake, each had received $5 million from their grant requests. Both are among the more elite private schools in the state. It would appear that the students who attend these schools come from well-established families with the financial resources to pay for the student expenses of the school.

READERS WRITE Distance from shore may not help

From information on the schools' websites, many of the personnel on their boards have high-level positions and may have knowledge of what it takes to obtain grants as well as the resources to better complete the application process.

Many if not all private and public schools in the state are struggling right now, not only with how to set up education plans for the future due to the coronavirus but also with having the financial resources to pay for the education.

The board and leadership of 75F saw that it was correct to return the grant to the federal government. My recommendation is that the boards and leadership of both Breck and Blake do the same. How about it?

Rich Gruenhagen, Chaska

STYLE AND USAGE

Uppercase 'Black' but lowercase 'brown'? That's half a good decision

First off, let me say I am white. And, privileged. I have watched as events have unfolded in Minneapolis and around the country since the death of George Floyd. It has been concerning to me.

A Sunday news article " Primary will test Omar's first term," speaks about the challenges the first-term congresswoman faces in her Fifth Congressional District battle.

My concern falls on page two of the story (paragraph five). It refers to a statement by Omar's challenger, Antone Melton-Meaux: "That's Black and brown folks, that [sic] immigrants, that's union workers."

The Star Tribune has professed a need to change black to Black in your pages since Floyd's death, which is commendable (editor's note, July 2). However, why does a group that also is oppressed, Hispanics, just get the designation of "brown"? No caps?

You can't pick winners or losers. You have to treat all afflicted groups by the same metrics on your newspaper pages.

Don Leathers, Austin, Minn.

Load-Date: July 29, 2020

Teen will keep pushing for mural

ARTICLE MCCCXLVIII.

TEEN WILL KEEP PUSHING FOR MURAL

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 26, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3B

Length: 666 words

Byline: KIM HYATT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: St. Anthony voted down a Philando Castile tribute at City Hall, but Semhar Solomon is undaunted.

Body

Organizing a rally for Philando Castile on the four-year anniversary of the night he was killed by a St. Anthony police officer was the catalyst of Semhar Solomon's activism.

The 16-year-old entering her senior year at St. Anthony High School isn't backing off her goal of getting a Castile mural painted at City Hall, despite the St. Anthony City Council recently denying her proposal on a 4-1 vote.

While Solomon plans her next course of action, a massive mural that she and several friends created for the rally earlier this month on the anniversary of Castile's death is moving around the city.

The six sheets of painted plywood, inspired by artwork depicting George Floyd, reads "Rest in Power Philando Castile & many more," with an image of Castile smiling.

A long list of people have volunteered to host the plywood mural until a new one would go up on the side of City Hall. Its first stop was across the street from the home of Council Member Jan Jenson, who opposed the Castile mural. He felt it's meant to spite the police department, which is adjacent to the City Hall and community center building where Solomon wants to paint the mural.

Mayor Randy Stille said at the July 16 council meeting that public facilities must remain "neutral." An unintended consequence of the mural, he said, could be to affect the mental health of officers.

"I think we do need to be supportive of our police department," he said. "Common sense tells me that daily punishment of the police when they walk in that door [is] not a good thing."

But Solomon said the mural wouldn't be anti-cop, and dozens of residents who voiced support for the mural said it's about honoring Castile's life.

An online petition has garnered more than 3,000 signatures backing the mural. Solomon plans to start a resident petition and discuss the mural with police. She has raised money for supplies and upkeep.

Teen will keep pushing for mural

Existing policy bars such a mural from city-owned property, according to City Manager Mark Casey.

"There are no facilities named after or otherwise pay tribute to any individual," he said in an e-mail, adding that the city doesn't accept gifts that come with naming conditions.

Resident Sandi Sherman said applying the policy to the mural proposal is "a big stretch" because no one is donating money or asking for a building to be renamed.

"We are asking for a piece of art - art that reflects something that happened to our community ... as a way to acknowledge, to memorialize and as a way to heal," she told the council. "

Council Member Bernard Walker, who cast the only vote for the mural, said he's open to amending policy and working with the community to come up with a solution, since most residents he's heard from support the mural.

"We don't simply say, 'No, let's move on.' That to me is like a slap in the face," he said. "If this is reflective of the community, then we have a policy that is incongruent with sentiments of the community."

Solomon said getting city approval for public art shouldn't be this difficult, but that any fight for justice creates division. "The mural is going to represent the face of change in St. Anthony that's long overdue," she said.

The six-panel mural will continue moving around St. Anthony before Solomon gives it to Castile's mother, Valerie, for permanent display at the Philando Castile Peace Garden in Falcon Heights. The memorial off Larpenteur Avenue marks the spot where St. Anthony police officer Jeronimo Yanez fatally shot Castile during a traffic stop in 2016.

Yanez was acquitted of all charges and signed a separation agreement with St. Anthony. But Solomon said the city hasn't done enough to acknowledge the tragedy and allow the community to heal.

"A man got murdered by our police department. We should not be turning away, white people should not be turning away because it makes them uncomfortable. They should be facing it and using it to change," Solomon said. "It's just making a horrible situation into something graceful and beautiful."

Kim Hyatt · 612-673-4751

Load-Date: July 30, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCXLIX.

TIPS FOR MAINTAINING MENTAL HEALTH DURING THE PANDEMIC: MINDFULNESS, ROUTINES, LESS JUNK FOOD

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 26, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 529 wordsByline: Bob ShawHighlight: A side effect of the coronavirus - anxiety - is spreading even faster than the disease itself. Sue Abderholden, executive director of the state's chapter of the National Alliance on Mental Illness, or NAMI, says the signs are everywhere of mental health under siege. In March, when the virus first arrived in force in the United [...]Body

A side effect of the coronavirus - anxiety - is spreading even faster than the disease itself.

Sue Abderholden, executive director of the state's chapter of the National Alliance on Mental Illness, or NAMI, says the signs are everywhere of mental health under siege.

In March, when the virus first arrived in force in the United States, calls to a crisis hotline jumped fivefold, according to the federal Substance Abuse Mental Health Services Administration. NAMI's website, namimn.org, has seen a surge of interest.

Experts like Abderholden always have recommended social contact as a way to promote mental health. But during the pandemic, that advice can be fatal. So, they've been forced to find new ways to promote emotional and psychological well-being.

Abderholden answered the following questions for the Pioneer Press on July 15:

What is the state of Minnesota's mental health? Mental health is not so great right now.

How is coronavirus harming mental health? With COVID, there is great uncertainty. We were told at first it would be only a few weeks. Now we are told months. It has more people on edge.

If people isolate themselves, what's the result? They miss graduations, birthdays and wedding parties. They will experience grief.

Is it tougher for single people? Everyone is struggling. Look at parents, who are at home but also working. They worry about catching COVID and giving it to their families.

Then there is the economic collapse, which hurts people who aren't even sick. That affects everyone.

Tips for maintaining mental health during the pandemic: mindfulness, routines, less junk food

Does the killing of George Floyd make it worse? Oh, yes. That adds to the sense of angst and hopelessness. If you are a person of color, your distress is even higher.

What do you recommend? Practicing mindfulness. Be mindful of your breathing. Be mindful of what you have. Before you get out of bed in the morning, name three or five things you are grateful for. Put your mind in a positive space.

That's not easy, after you see the daily news. Frankly, you should limit that. Limit how much news you consume.

I am stuck inside all day. What should I do in my own home? Create a schedule, and stick to it. Create some normalcy. Also, limit the junk food. Simon Cowell has surgery for broken back after bike accident Morikawa delivers great shot in quiet moment to win PGA Trump's end run around Congress raises questions US tops 5 million confirmed virus cases, to Europe's alarm Trump orders more unemployment pay, a payroll tax deferral

What new approaches have you introduced? We have free classes for workplaces, families, teachers, teenagers and farmers. We have classes on stress eating, suicide prevention, and minority mental health. We have links to online and in-person support groups. We have movie discussion groups. We have a class summarizing the 2020 legislative session.

When you connect on a computer, what do you do? You can play games. My daughters and I play Bananagrams together. Or you can watch a TV show together, then comment on it.

Are there any substitutes for face-to-face contact? You can have Zoom calls, where you can actually look at someone. But don't sit there and say, 'How are you doing today?' Have other things to talk about.

Graphic

Sue Abderholden, executive director of the National Alliance of Mental Illness in Minnesota (Courtesy photo)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Prosecutors in George Floyd's death now say they may revisit audio-visual coverage of ex-cops' trials

ARTICLE MCCCL. PROSECUTORS IN GEORGE FLOYD'S DEATH NOW SAY THEY MAY REVISIT AUDIO-VISUAL COVERAGE OF EX-COPS' TRIALS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 27, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 437 words

Byline: The Associated Press

Highlight: Prosecutors said Tuesday they may revisit the issue of audio-visual coverage of the trials of four former Minneapolis police officers charged in the death of George Floyd. The Minnesota Attorney General's Office did not offer a reason Monday when it opposed allowing cameras in the courtroom for the former officers' trials. But in a filing [...]

Body

Prosecutors said Tuesday they may revisit the issue of audio-visual coverage of the trials of four former Minneapolis police officers charged in the death of George Floyd.

The Minnesota Attorney General's Office did not offer a reason Monday when it opposed allowing cameras in the courtroom for the former officers' trials. But in a filing Tuesday, Assistant Attorney General Matthew Frank said that while the prosecution supports a public trial, prosecutors are concerned that live audio and visual coverage in the courtroom "may create more problems than they will solve."

Audio-visual coverage could alter the way attorneys present evidence, subject participants to heightened media scrutiny - distracting from the trial - and may intimidate some witnesses, Frank wrote, reiterating points made last month by Minnesota Attorney General Keith Ellison.

"Testifying in public is challenging enough; live audio and visual testimony could potentially deprive the State of the testimony of certain witnesses," Frank wrote. But he said the issue perhaps can be revisited as trial approaches.

Derek Chauvin and three other former officers are scheduled to go on trial in March. Under Minnesota court rules, a judge can allow the recording and reproduction of criminal proceedings if both sides consent. Hennepin County Judge Peter Cahill has yet to rule on the matter, but the state's position - unless changed - makes it unlikely that he will allow cameras at trial.

Last month, Cahill ruled that cameras would not be allowed during pretrial proceedings, after prosecutors objected.

Floyd, who was Black, died May 25 after Chauvin, who is white, pressed his knee against the handcuffed man's neck for nearly 8 minutes. Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter. J. Kueng, Thomas Lane and Tou Thao are charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and manslaughter. All four officers were fired after Floyd's death.

Prosecutors in George Floyd's death now say they may revisit audio-visual coverage of ex-cops' trials

Defense attorneys have said they would be open to audio and visual coverage of the trials, saying the recordings are necessary to guarantee the officers get a fair trial - especially during a pandemic when public access to the courtroom is restricted.

Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Graphic

Former Minneapolis police officers, from left, Derek Chauvin, Tou Thao, Thomas Lane and J. Alexander Kueng

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCLI. HAGEDORN GETS CORPORATE BLOWBACK FROM BLM COMMENTS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 27, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 754 wordsByline: Matthew StolleHighlight: One corporation has asked for its donation back and another has pledged to no longer give to Republican U.S. Rep. Jim Hagedorn of Rochester over comments he made last month, saying Black Lives Matter and its "army of rioters" were at war with America and "Western culture." Tech company Intel this week asked the Hagedorn [...]Body

One corporation has asked for its donation back and another has pledged to no longer give to Republican U.S. Rep. Jim Hagedorn of Rochester over comments he made last month, saying Black Lives Matter and its "army of rioters" were at war with America and "Western culture."

Tech company Intel this week asked the Hagedorn campaign to return the $4,000 it donated in 2018 and pledged to refrain from future campaign donations to the first-term congressman, according to news sources.

UnitedHealth Group has made a similar promise, saying it regrets its past contribution to his re-election campaign, which has amounted to $7,500, news sources say.

"We were unaware of these egregious and hurtful statements attributed to Rep. Hagedorn and they in no way reflect the values of our company," UnitedHealth Group said in a statement.

The corporate blowback comes a month after a Facebook post by Hagedorn that some praised as a defense of Western culture and Christian values and others criticized as tone deaf to the larger cause espoused by Black Lives Matter of ending racism and police brutality.

Hagedorn's post came in response to Twitter comments by activist Shaun King, who is aligned with the Black Lives Matter movement, after he called for images depicting Jesus as white to be torn down. He said such images are a form of white supremacy.

In reply, Hagedorn denounced BLM as a "radical movement" that is "orchestrated and growing. We must never let them take power. We must stand up and defend our country, our nation's identity, our Judeo-Christian values and our American way of life."

Hagedorn gets corporate blowback from BLM comments

The debate over Black Lives Matter and what it stands for comes after the killing of George Floyd on May 25 while in Minneapolis police custody, a videotaped event that shocked people and sparked global demonstrations calling for an end to institutionalized racism. Some of those demonstrations have turned violent.

The actions, including those that have occurred in Rochester and smaller surrounding towns and cities, have brought together a range of ethnic and racial groups in defense of BLM's goals.

Hagedorn is running against DFL challenger Dan Feehan, who lost to Hagedorn by a little more than 1,300 votes in 2018.

The revelation that Intel was seeking a refund was first publicly reported by Popular Information, a progressive news website.

On Wednesday, Popular Information posted a story noting that Hagedorn's 1st Congressional District is not far from where Floyd was killed. It said his rhetoric and history of "racist, sexist and homophobic screeds" were at odds with the values of racial justice and equality espoused by many of his corporate donors, including U.S. Bank, Intel and Best Buy.

It then proceeded to contact these businesses, seeking comment on why they had donated to Hagedorn's campaign. Intel was the only one to seek a refund.

"Several weeks ago, a national Black Lives Matter organizational leader encouraged the destruction of images of Jesus Christ and Christianity because, in his view, they represented white supremacy," Hagedorn said in a statement released to the Post Bulletin on Friday.

"I publicly responded by calling on the American people to reject such violence and destruction and stand up for America, our history, culture and the values we hold dear that make us the greatest country in the world. We are one nation, under God. I have and will continue to fight for liberty and equal justice under the law for every citizen of our country, no matter their race, religion or background, while rejecting extremist political rhetoric and tactics."

Brian Evans, the DFL Party's communications director, said there was no surprise that former supporters were "fleeing Hagedorn's campaign" after "he used hateful rhetoric to slander people working towards racial justice and equality."

Minnesota's primary is Tuesday. Here are key east metro races to watch. 300,000 Minnesotans should mail their primary ballots 'ASAP.' Or vote in person. State Patrol cancels police academy class 'due to lack of funding' Burnsville police: Nothing found following bomb threat at U.S. Rep. Angie Craig's office Minnesota will close 2 prisons to prepare for budget shortfall. Other agencies face holes, too.

"Instead of trying to unite Minnesotans around solving our shared problems, Congressman Hagedorn is hurling vile and inflammatory insults meant to divide communities for his political gain," Evans said. "Minnesotans should expect so much better from our political leaders, especially in times of crisis."

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCCLII. AD AGENCIES MAKING A NEW PITCH FOR DIVERSITY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 27, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 1207 wordsByline: DEE DePASS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

In the wake of George Floyd's killing and nationwide protests that followed, 32 Minnesota ad agencies have promised to disclose their racial employment data and hire more people of color in the hopes of having a staff that more closely reflects society's diversity.

In the last few weeks, Fallon, Carmichael Lynch, Colle McVoy, Padilla, Periscope, Solve and other advertising and marketing mavericks joined the #CommitToChange effort led by 600 & Rising, the newly formed nonprofit that is shining a spotlight on the persistent lack of Blacks, Hispanics, Asians and Indians in advertising.

According to the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, the percentage of ad managers who are Black shrank from 0.8% in 2010 to 0.7% last year. The percentage of Asians rose from 2% to 7%, while Hispanics, at 9%, and Native Americans, at 1%, stayed the same.

Desperate for change, two Black advertising executives from Minnesota and New York founded 600 & Rising and published an open letter to the industry last month. They asked ad agencies to publicly release their race employment data and improvement plans.

The letter, which now has 3,000 signatures, has helped convince many ad agencies to pledge to release race numbers and improve hiring and training. Similar racial equity efforts are brewing in law firms and media outlets.

For ad firms, "We're at 90 agencies nationwide right now and 32 in Minneapolis. That is a pleasant surprise," said Nathan Young, president and co-founder of 600 & Rising and Group Strategic director at Periscope in Minneapolis.

Until now, agencies were unwilling to disclose race data, he said. That's changing since George Floyd's killing by police and public outcries to end systemic racism.

"Now, some [agencies] said 'We want to make sure that at least 50% of the people we hire are people of color or that 50% of the applicants are.' Others are investing in internships programs. We left it up to the ad agencies making a new pitch for diversity

agencies to make their own commitments," said Young, one of 179 employees to walk out of Periscope earlier this month, when the Wisconsin parent company, Quad, ordered workers to remove any references to the phrase Black Lives Matter on social media posts.

The walkout prompted an apology from the firm's CEO, the release of employment data (showing 16 employees of color, including four Blacks out of 179 total workers) and a promise to conduct diversity training and hire more people of color.

#CommitToChange advocates at advertising and marketing firms that represent brands like 3M, Target, Land O'Lakes, Walgreens, Subaru, and the Minnesota Twins, said having an inclusive creative team can make ads richer with input that represents larger segments of the population.

"What gets measured gets action. It's an act of courage and transparency to share with the world where we are today," said Mike Caguin, chief creative officer at Colle McVoy and board chairman of the BrandLab, an internship program designed to introduce students of color to the ad industry. "When George Floyd was killed, everyone here was deeply affected by that. Much like the rest of the world, we took a look in the mirror ... [Joining #CommitToChange] is about how we can contribute to making our community and industry better than we are today."

For a decade, Colle McVoy worked with the BrandLab nonprofit to hire high school and college students of color as interns and introduce them to advertising careers. But there is more to do, Caguin said.

A week ago, Colle McVoy posted on Twitter that 90% of its 240-member Minneapolis staff was white. The company website now states a promise. "We will recruit more BIPOC [Black, Indigenous, people of color] employees at all levels across the agency. We will mentor, champion and advance BIPOC employees into senior roles . . . We will conduct more anti-racism training for managers and the agency."

Carmichael Lynch CEO Marcus Fischer said his Minneapolis firm will soon post its racial makeup on Instagram. People of color comprise 12% of all its workers. "But if we look around the office? It is not where we want to be. It is not reflective of the population," Fischer said. Black employees represent 1.7% of all workers. Whites comprise 87.7%.

After a decade of financing BrandLab internships, mentoring and working with ADColor and the American Advertising Federation's Mosaic Center for Multiculturalism, more initiatives are in the works to boost recruiting and retention.

"Like every agency, we have always been committed but our efforts are woefully short," Fischer said. "What Nathan [Young] and #CommitToChange have done is a great thing, because it is forcing a level of transparency and accountability."

Dorion Taylor, who worked at three Twin Cities ad agencies before becoming a director at Carmichael Lynch, said there has been some progress. But the industry is "still horrifically behind. You went from being able to count the people of color from one hand to two hands in advertising. That's a low, low percentage," said Taylor who left the agency in November to become a marketing manager at Pohlads Cos.

He wants more diverse leadership in advertising and marketing and meaningful career development.

ad agencies making a new pitch for diversity

"Not seeing others like me in any higher roles? It didn't give me a lot of hope that there really was opportunity for me for advancement," Taylor said. "A lot of agencies can probably tout they hired a person of color, but they have not done a good job of developing [leaders]. That is a huge problem."

And nationally, said Christopher Boulton, an associate communications professor at University of Tampa who wrote his doctoral dissertation on race in advertising.

"Despite four decades of seeking to 'expand the pipeline' of Black employees through small, targeted scholarships and internships, advertising maintains a Black/white labor gap that is 38% larger than the labor market in general," he said.

Change will require firms to make their race numbers public. "To me, that single demand will make the most impact. So [product makers] can see if their ad agency is being hypocritical," Boulton said. "The hope is that the exposure will shame advertisers into firing bad actors."

Young agreed. "It's the public pressure that has been compelling these agencies to act. We've had decades and decades to fix this problem."

Soon 600 & Rising plans to ask product makers to follow the lead of diversity trendsetters like General Mills and Verizon. "They already have diversity requirements," for their creative teams, sometimes requiring that 20% of the team be comprised of people of color, Young said.

Fischer at Carmichael Lynch said his goal is more than numbers. Retention is just as important as hiring.

"The industry as whole has high turnover," he said. "So making sure that our culture is welcoming and inviting to everyone is important, so they want to be part of [the company] and feel they can bring their full selves."

Dee DePass · 612-673-7725

National Data

Advertising leaders - 2019 race data from the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics-Household Data Survey

Total number of advertising managers in U.S. 55,000

Racial make up of advertising managers across the U.S.

White 89.5%

Black 0.7%

Asian 7.0%

Hispanic/Latino 9.0%

Source: U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics

SEE MICROFILM OR PDF FOR CHART.

Load-Date: July 27, 2020

ad agencies making a new pitch for diversity

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCCLIII. COUNTERPOINT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 27, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 11ALength: 416 wordsByline: LOUIS HOFFMAN, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: These former leaders tried to reform MPD // And they failed. It's time to try something entirely new.Body

I just read former U.S. attorney Andrew Luger's commentary on the proposed charter amendment to eliminate the requirement for a police department ("Charter change is reckless, unnecessary," July 23).

A week ago I read Downtown Council CEO Steve Cramer's stark warning that, overnight, Minneapolis has become an undesirable place to do business ("Business groups warn on defunding," July 15). I'm not normally one who would advocate something revolutionary like throwing open the door to abolishing the Minneapolis Police Department. But I've lived here for nearly 42 years and, finally, I wonder: What exactly does it take to reform the Minneapolis Police Department?

My answer: The department is beyond redemption. The MPD can't be reformed. If there's going to be meaningful change, if the people of Minneapolis are going to feel protected and served, it won't be by a "reformed" MPD. Because we've tried reform for decades and it doesn't work.

It's time to start fresh with something new. That requires letting the people vote on amending the City Charter and having a citywide conversation.

After a revolving door of chiefs and many attempts at "reform," the stark truth is that nothing has changed. Black men and people of color are still being brutalized and killed by the MPD at a much higher rate than white people. The only reason the death of George Floyd is different is that it was recorded on a cellphone camera.

In the time since, we've been reminded that 93% of MPD's officers don't live in Minneapolis. We've heard Sgt. Anna Hedberg recoil in horror at the very thought of going "to Cub Foods with my two beautiful little girls." She doesn't feel the need to bring them into "that kind of danger." We see a quarter of the department's officers suddenly file for disability. We hear them wail about feeling unappreciated and unsupported. We hear once-respected civic leaders raise the alarm against anarchy.

COUNTERPOINT

I'm not a huge fan of the current City Council. But they at least have the clarity to understand that there are deeply ingrained systemic problems in the Minneapolis Police Department and that tidying things up around the edges won't work because it's never worked. And they have the courage and honesty to do something about it.

The proposed charter amendment leaves many unanswered questions. So it's high time we have a communitywide conversation to answer them. That conversation requires amending the charter so that everything's on the table.

Louis Hoffman lives in Minneapolis.

Load-Date: July 30, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCCLIV. THE POWER OF THE MOMENT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 27, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1305 wordsByline: JEAN HOPFENSBERGER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The Rev. Edrin Williams, pastor of one of the most racially diverse churches in the Twin Cities, quickly launched an emergency food distribution center when rioting after the death of George Floyd destroyed neighborhood stores. Now he's taken on another role as well: dispensing food for thought to white faith leaders grappling with how to combat racism.

"I get calls nearly every day from around the country and even one from Switzerland," said Williams, of Sanctuary Covenant Church in north Minneapolis. "They ask, 'What should we be doing?' "

The national spotlight on racial inequities has injected new energy and placed new demands on African American religious leaders, long at the forefront of civil rights movements. Many are orchestrating their largest-ever food relief projects, fielding outreach from allies, working to quell community tensions and exploring new strategies to combat racial injustice.

A group of Twin Cities Black pastors has been discussing a proposal with Gov. Tim Walz to create a Minnesota "social compact" that would forge new investments and public policies to begin erasing racial inequities. Wayman African Methodist Episcopal Church in Minneapolis is preparing to launch a project to transform one Minneapolis public school into a culturally appropriate model for Black achievement.

Minnesota's evangelical community has created what it hopes will be a $1 million fund to support African American churches. Many Black pastors are in demand for speaking and consultation. And, for the first time, their food programs are attracting armies of white volunteers.

"There's something special happening at this moment," said Williams. "People are seeing the [racial] barriers who haven't seen them before. There's a captive audience."

Bishop Richard Howell of nearby Shiloh Temple International Ministries marveled that while participating recently in a panel before largely white religious leaders, the first question directed to him was, "What is systemic racism?"

THE POWER OF THE MOMENT

"There's an openness to hearing us - finally - in a manner we haven't seen before," said Howell. "I've been preaching 40 years, and I've never seen our friends listen to the facts, and the painful facts, of African American history. We have an opportunity to share what we know with those who don't."

Whether it's just a flash of racial consciousness, or something deeper, is the big question, he said.

Surge of white volunteers

On a recent Friday, Williams stood in front of about 90 volunteers in his church parking lot. Wearing shorts, a T-shirt and face mask, he bowed his head and said a prayer moments before hundreds of neighbors streamed in to pick up groceries and other goods.

With the Cub Foods across the street still boarded up, they stopped at tents with signs announcing what was inside - apples, carrots, diapers. It's a massive undertaking created in just two months, assisted on the ground mainly by white volunteers from cities and suburbs.

How to tap that surge of support - from individuals, religious groups, businesses and philanthropy - and harness it to tackle institutional racism is a topic of great discussion. While grateful for the support, many Black faith leaders worry that volunteers leave with no greater understanding of the racial inequities that shaped the community they're serving.

That understanding, along with deeper personal relationships in the Black community, are needed to become strong allies for change.

"If George Floyd hadn't taken place, we wouldn't have these relations," said the Rev. Runney Patterson of New Hope Baptist Church in St. Paul. "We've had some in the past, but they fizzled out. I tell [white] pastors, 'Don't come here just to feel good.'... My hope is we can build real relationships and be intentional about it."

Building bridges

Bridging such divides has long been a mission of the Rev. Richard Coleman of Wayman AME Church. He oversees a monthly Bridge of Reconciliation luncheon for pastors and community leaders - of different races - focused on supporting north Minneapolis.

During this month's Zoom meeting, Coleman announced that his church and the Minneapolis nonprofit Hope United CDC planned to organize a network of community partners to help transform one Minneapolis school into a model for academic achievement by offering training for cultural competencies, curriculum, mentors and other services.

The project would mark Wayman's 101st anniversary.

"With the moment, the killing of George Floyd, we wanted to pick something big and significant that can really make a difference," Coleman said. "There's a lot of energy right now. To deal with the problems in the Black community requires a systemic approach, and I believe we are in that space now."

The Rev. Alfred Babington-Johnson, CEO of the Stairstep Foundation in Minneapolis, also hopes to seize the moment. He and other clergy involved in His Works United, an ecumenical collaboration of African American religious leaders, have been talking with Walz and staff about a sweeping proposal to address racial disparities in housing, health, wealth and education.

THE POWER OF THE MOMENT

It is designed to have Black-led organizations develop the capacity to address their community's issues, he said.

Sitting at his desk, Babington-Johnson pulled up a PowerPoint slide listing about a dozen Black-led organizations behind the plan, including the Minnesota Black Chamber of Commerce and the Phyllis Wheatley Center in Minneapolis. Community supporters include the Minneapolis Regional Chamber of Commerce, Greater Metropolitan YMCA and Minneapolis St. Paul Regional Economic Development Partnership.

"We're having some very hopeful conversations with government, with corporate leadership," said Babington-Johnson. "What we have is the opportunity to be of service, because the whole society is riveted" by the inhumanity surrounding Floyd's death.

Other Black clergy are forging different paths. The Rev. Stacey Smith, senior pastor at St. James AME Church in St. Paul, typically isn't orchestrating protest marches. But she felt compelled to organize a clergy march last month, during which hundreds of faith leaders prayed silently while walking the streets of Minneapolis and St. Paul where violence had erupted.

The idea took shape on a Sunday night, when she began e-mailing invitations. By Tuesday morning she found herself walking past Floyd's memorial - in the largest march of faith leaders in memory.

"It was an outpouring unlike anything I've seen," she said.

Smith's church already is running a food program. Now she'd like to offer counseling and support for people suffering from trauma, whether from the COVID-19 pandemic, poverty or racism. She had considered the idea earlier but is convinced now is the time.

African American churches are getting support from other corners. Transform Minnesota, the umbrella group for Minnesota's evangelical Christians, was planning to raise money to support African American churches suffering financially because of COVID-19. That idea kicked into high gear after Floyd's death. It launched the One Fund with a goal of raising $1 million before the anniversary of Floyd's death on May 25, said Carl Nelson, CEO of Transform Minnesota.

"It's one way to tangibly respond to the disparities we're now talking about," Nelson said.

As faith leaders look ahead, they remain hopeful, but guarded, about the prospects for societal change.

They recall that police killings of other Blacks nationally and locally, including Jamar Clark in 2015 in the Twin Cities, have ignited public attention and mobilized communities. But the outcry subsided.

"These things have been cyclical," said Babington-Johnson. "The difference this time is that folks are becoming aware of the inhumanity [confronting Blacks] in different and deeper ways - and the need for society to change."

Jean Hopfensperger · 612-673-4511

Load-Date: July 30, 2020

Ivanka Trump visits Duluth outdoor gear maker; mining protesters gather

ARTICLE MCCCCLV.

IVANKA TRUMP VISITS DULUTH OUTDOOR GEAR MAKER; MINING PROTESTERS GATHER

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 27, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1006 words

Byline: Adelle Whitefoot

Highlight: DULUTH, Minn. - White House senior adviser Ivanka Trump visited Duluth on Monday morning for the signing of a pledge by a local business to expand programs that educate and train American workers over the next five years. Trump was joined at Duluth Pack by U.S. Secretary of Interior David Bernhardt and U.S. Rep. Pete [...]

Body

DULUTH, Minn. - White House senior adviser Ivanka Trump visited Duluth on Monday morning for the signing of a pledge by a local business to expand programs that educate and train American workers over the next five years.

Trump was joined at Duluth Pack by U.S. Secretary of Interior David Bernhardt and U.S. Rep. Pete Stauber. Duluth Pack owners Tom Sega and Mark Oestreich signed the Pledge to America's Workers during a media event in the Canal Park store.

"It is a great pleasure to be here and in Duluth and to see firsthand an unbelievable example of American excellence in manufacturing," said Trump, daughter of President Donald Trump. "The president started the Pledge to America's Workers two years ago. He wanted to call upon the private sector to join forces with the government to invest in the skills of all Americans and to provide an on-ramp to opportunity, and to ensure that employers are making the commitment to their most valuable asset, which is the American worker."

Duluth Pack, which sells outdoors and camping gear and accessories, joins more than 430 companies and organizations countrywide that have signed the pledge, which contributes to over 16 million new education and training opportunities, according to the Trump administration. The pledge commits those who sign to expanding programs that educate, train and reskill American workers, from high school to near retirement, for jobs that need to be filled but lack qualified workers, according to WhiteHouse.gov.

The pledge was created in 2018 after President Trump signed an executive order establishing the National Council for the American Worker. This was pre-pandemic, when unemployment rates were low and companies were often struggling to find workers to fill open positions.

Ivanka Trump visits Duluth outdoor gear maker; mining protesters gather

"This investment is more important than ever, as so many people have been disconnected from the workforce and are experiencing tremendous vulnerability and fear thinking about their path forward," Ivanka Trump said Monday.

Trump left immediately following the signing, while Bernhardt and Stauber remained to answer media questions pertaining to the pledge and Twin Metals copper-nickel mining project in northeastern Minnesota.

Duluth Pack is known for making packs for visitors to the Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness. The Trump administration has returned leases to Twin Metals that the Obama administration rescinded. Critics of the mining project say it would pollute the Boundary Waters.

Duluth Pack has recently been criticized by the public due to the signing of the jobs pledge with the Trump administration and hosting Ivanka Trump. When asked by Forum News Service if they support Twin Metals and how they reconcile signing a pledge with an administration that is advancing this project, Oestreich declined to comment.

Bernhardt told a story of his teenage son receiving a small Duluth Pack backpack when he was in elementary school. The backpack, a camp souvenir, is still used by his son today.

"Everything has to go through a process and there's going to be a lot of rigor associated with it," Bernhardt said of the Twin Metals project. "So we'll go through the process and the cards will end up being what they are, but we will not sacrifice clean air or clean water for economic development."

During the media event Monday, protesters could be heard chanting and yelling outside the Duluth Pack store. About 50 people gathered in support of the Boundary Waters, Black Lives Matter and missing and murdered Indigenous women. Others stood outside the store to protest how the Trump administration has handled the COVID-19 pandemic.

Dressed in plague doctor costumes, Allen Richardson and Scot Bol, both of Duluth, wheeled a coffin across the street with a skeleton holding a sign reading: "Is there a pledge to America's workers for 140,000 plus Americans killed by COVID-19?" Richardson said the old theater props were "lying around for occasions like this."

"I think it is ridiculous that they are here to promote a pledge to American workers when it's the Trump administration's malice that has killed up to 140,000 American workers," Richardson said. "Where is the pledge for the Americans who have died of COVID?"

Another protester, Marlana Benzie-Lourey, of Kerrick, Minn., said it was difficult for her to see a company she has supported for more than 30 years host someone whose goal isn't to "protect what we have here."

"I've always been proud of this company. Not anymore," said Benzie-Lourey, who has bought Duluth Pack products and gifted them to her family as Christmas presents for years. "I don't know what I will do with the packs I have. Maybe tear the labels off, but that's not much of a statement. Maybe donate them?"

Sitting on the curb and holding a sign with a loon and the words, "No copper mine," Judy Derauf, of Duluth, shared similar views.

Ivanka Trump visits Duluth outdoor gear maker; mining protesters gather

"I think it is disingenuous for Duluth Pack to be hosting this event," said Derauf, who returned from a Boundary Waters trip two weeks ago. "As a company that promotes Boundary Waters travel, how can they support this administration that supports things that put the Boundary Waters at risk?"

After Trump left Monday, some protesters stayed and banged on the front doors of Duluth Pack shouting obscenities. A man, who asked to remain anonymous, cut a Duluth Pack badge in half and placed it on the window sill of the store.

"Personally, I hope they (Duluth Pack) get some heat for this," Andrew Slade, Great Lakes program director for the Minnesota Environmental Partnership, said. His office is adjacent to Duluth Pack.

After leaving Duluth, Ivanka Trump and Bernhardt headed to the grand opening of the missing and murdered Native American cold case office in Bloomington.

Minnesota's primary is Tuesday. Here are key east metro races to watch. 300,000 Minnesotans should mail their primary ballots 'ASAP.' Or vote in person. Voters, GOP lawmakers plan lawsuit over Walz's mask mandate at polling places. Burnsville police: Nothing found following bomb threat at U.S. Rep. Angie Craig's office

Graphic

Duluth Pack's Mark Oestreich (left) and Tom Segal sign the Pledge to America's Workers on Monday as U.S. Rep. Pete Stauber, presidential adviser Ivanka Trump and Secretary of the Interior David L. Bernhardt watch. Companies that sign the pledge commit to expanding programs that educate and train American workers. (Steve Kuchera / Forum News Service)

Scot Bol adjusts a sign hanging on a coffin he and Allen Richardson, both of Duluth, wheeled across the Duluth Pack storefront in Canal Park. "It's like a plague that we have no leadership here in America," Bol said. "We need unity to defeat this (COVID-19)." (Samantha Erkkila / Forum News Service)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Help for businesses burned in Twin Cities riots is slow in coming

ARTICLE MCCCLVI.

HELP FOR BUSINESSES BURNED IN TWIN CITIES RIOTS IS SLOW IN COMING

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

July 27, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 371 words

Byline: Mark Reilly

Body

Two months after riots tore through business districts in Minneapolis and St. Paul, much of the debris still hasn't even been cleared. And help that businesses say they need from the state has stalled once again in the Minnesota Legislature.

The Star Tribune reports on the rising frustration among business owners who are trying to rebuild after their buildings were damaged or destroyed in the nights following the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis Police custody. The Legislature ended a second special session this summer without a major relief package for communities; Republicans blocked a $300 million, DFL-backed bill to cover uninsured damage, saying it was too large and that local governments should contribute more to the effort, though they said they'd consider legislation again the next time the Legislature convenes.

The federal government also rejected a plea from Minnesota Gov. Tim Walz for aid, saying the damages - estimated at $500 million - was "within the capabilities of the local and state governments." City governments say they're tapped out.

Help for businesses burned in Twin Cities riots is slow in coming

That leaves business owners with not much help at all. Insurance will cover some of the damage, but not all. Several businesses have turned to crowdfunding to raise cash to reopen. Luis Tamay, owner of El Chuchi Market (damaged in the unrest) and restaurant 1 Sabor Chuchi (which burned down), has raised more than \$100,000 that way and is working to repair the store. He's not sure if the landlord will rebuild the restaurant building however, and he tells the paper the neighborhood still has security concerns that may keep entrepreneurs from coming back.

Apart from the money issues, businesses are also contending with regulatory hurdles. Jim Stages, the owner of Lloyd's Pharmacy on University Avenue, which burned down, is still trying to clear debris from the site, the Pioneer Press reports. He got approval from the city, but Ramsey County blocked the work, saying the contractor didn't have the proper credentials to handle buildings with asbestos. A new contractor will cost Stages an extra $60,000, which won't be covered by insurance.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: July 28, 2020

End of Document

St. Paul school board elects Jim Vue to fill vacant seat

ARTICLE MCCCLVII.

ST. PAUL SCHOOL BOARD ELECTS JIM VUE TO FILL VACANT SEAT

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 27, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 424 words

Byline: Josh Verges, Emma Harville

Highlight: In a 4-2 vote, the St. Paul school board on Monday elected Jim Vue to step in for Marny Xiong, who died in June from COVID-19. The board interviewed 10 out of the 16 who applied for the short-term appointment over a videoconference meeting. Three of those who applied were former board members. Because the [...]

Body

In a 4-2 vote, the St. Paul school board on Monday elected Jim Vue to step in for Marny Xiong, who died in June from COVID-19.

The board interviewed 10 out of the 16 who applied for the short-term appointment over a videoconference meeting. Three of those who applied were former board members.

Because the vacancy occurred more than 90 days before Election Day, state law required the board to appoint someone to fill the seat for the rest of this year.

Voters will decide Nov. 3 who will serve the final year of Xiong's term. While the school board asked that applicants seeking the short-term appointment not also run in the November special election, Vue voiced intentions to also run in November during his interview.

In his interview, Vue said in this position he hopes to listen to students, parents, teachers and staff while tackling current issues the school faces, like the coronavirus pandemic and conversation about racism following the death of George Floyd.

"The ability to grieve for the loss of the way of life before COVID-19, the ability to grieve for the over-policing and killing of Black lives, the ability to grieve for Marny, for example - will be essential to the fellowship toward the changes we must face this year and in the coming years," Vue said during his interview.

The school district released the short-term applicants' names Monday, six days after the deadline to apply. They included former board members Jon Schumacher, Keith Hardy and Mary Doran.

St. Paul school board elects Jim Vue to fill vacant seat

The others were Vue, Jenne Nelson, A. Ray McCoy, Carl Johnson, Samakab Hussein, Beatriz DeSantiago, Kevin D. Marquardt, Abu Nayeem, Eduardo Wolle, Libby Starling, Longkee Vang, Anne Kelly and Holly Windingstad.

The board narrowed down their nominees to Hardy, McCoy, Schumacher and Vue before selecting Vue in the final vote.

"I'm hopeful for the folks who were not selected, that they will stay engaged with our district," board member Steve Marchese said. "This is a tough time for us on the board and I think it's been a hard month for all of us, so I appreciate that in this tough time with COVID and the loss of our chair that you came forward and said you wanted to participate with us."

Health officials say these MN districts can reopen schools. So, why won't they? St. Paul school board votes to start year with distance learning St. Paul school board not ready to approve distance learning for all students St. Paul superintendent calls for full-time distance learning this fall St. Paul Public Schools leaning toward online-only start to school year

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCLVIII.

READERS WRITE COMPELLING CRITIQUE THAT WAS NOT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 28, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 6ALength: 1286 wordsBody

KATHERINE KERSTEN

Respectfully, Star Tribune readers of all ideological and political stripes deserve better than Katherine Kersten's "Racial justice: The new religion?" (Opinion Exchange, July 25). Kersten's piece sought to cast all who believe Black lives matter as self-righteous, unthinking dogmatists. In truth, it is Kersten (and the Star Tribune's opinion editors) who could stand to be a bit more thoughtful. Plenty of compelling critiques have been written of some of the phenomena Kersten seems to dislike - Robin DiAngelo's "White Fragility," "woke capitalism," "cancel culture." Kersten's piece isn't among them. It was a muddled and incurious screed, put forth to comfort Kersten and those of her ilk who remain reflexively hostile to the very concept of "systemic racism" even in the aftermath of George Floyd's death.

Incredibly, although Kersten herself makes a purely theoretical argument - proponents of racial justice are like 16th-century Puritans - she has the gall to tell us it is the proponents of racial justice who are scared of data and objective analysis.

Well, here's some data: In Minneapolis, Black people make up 19% of the population yet are the subject of 66% of police uses of force. In Minnesota, 65% of white fourth-graders are reading proficient, compared to 31% of Black fourth-graders. In Minnesota, the median income of Black households is 48.8% that of white households.

These are just a few examples of what people are referring to when they talk about "systemic racism." The Star Tribune should publish informed, diverse perspectives on the issue. But please: Do better than Katherine Kersten.

Eric Barstad, Minneapolis

...

Before I clicked on the headline "Racial justice: The new religion?", I knew what the byline would be. Kersten's white-makes-right diatribes are as predictable as they are inflammatory.

READERS WRITE Compelling critique that was not

The Star Tribune publishes much better conservative commentary by D.J. Tice. I rarely agree with Tice, but his columns are thought-provoking. And his thoughts are clearly his own, rather than talking points from think tanks and political campaigns.

It's time to give Kersten a rest. At the risk of giving her a talking point, how about finding some regular commentators who are Black, Indigenous or people of color?

Ben Weiss, St. Paul

. . .

In her commentary, Kersten attempts to draw a direct line from what she calls the "movement to eradicate 'white privilege' " back to a Puritan-era tenet she identifies as " 'innate depravity' - the doctrine that humans are inherently wicked as the result of the original sin." To bolster her argument, she includes quotes from conservative Catholic commentators John Zmirak (" 'Woke' is the new 'saved' ") and Mary Eberstadt (" 'Bigot and hater' are the new 'witch and wizard' ").

I am surprised that as Kersten criticizes young people for "often knowing little history or religion" in her article, she seems ignorant that the Puritan-era belief she ties to "a secular faith" - that everyone is born sinful - is not solely Puritan but in fact at the root of much of Christendom. And that according to Christian doctrine, absolution is found in recognizing and confessing one's sins followed by attempting to do better, although in Christian belief, Godlike perfection is not possible.

In attempting to "do better," the vast majority of white adherents to Black Lives Matter and the "woke movement" Kersten describes are in actuality practicing Matthew 7:12, the Golden Rule, which states "So in everything, do to others what you would have them do to you, for this sums up the Law and the Prophets," although there is a realization that the perfection of this ideal may not be possible in this world.

Kersten's recitation of affirmative action reforms of the last 60 years as proof of all white America has done to improve race relations in this country rings hollow, considering six decades is but a small fraction of the 400 years of white supremacy built into our institutions. Indeed, all the malaise she decries - toppling of the statues of American presidents and the increase of "Black-on-Black" violence - are attributable to weak support for quality public education and lack of opportunity in marginalized communities, especially hard-hit by the current pandemic.

Kersten should recognize the Golden Rule. I just wonder how she wishes she would have others do to her.

Michael Riddle, Coon Rapids

SOCIAL UPHEAVAL

Nuanced, contradictory, fixable

Two people painted over portions of a "Black Lives Matter" mural on a California street. Supporters of the mural, along with many public officials, demanded that this couple be brought to justice. Yet these same groups offered little apparent objection following the desecration or destruction of statues of national anthem composer Francis Scott Key, former slave and abolitionist Frederick Douglass, Union General Ulysses S. Grant or President George Washington. Let's acknowledge that contradiction.

READERS WRITE Compelling critique that was not

Some supporters of indiscriminate destruction of statues wonder how anyone can attach importance to statues and monuments - after all, they're just metal and stone. My response to that must echo their own: Why do they attach importance to destroying those metal and stone monuments if they're so unimportant? Let's acknowledge the symbolism for both sides.

Regarding police reform, we must learn from the past and do a better job in law enforcement, but not just because of the relatively modest numbers of cops killing unarmed Black people. According to the Washington Post, that total was 14 for 2019. Data from Statista shows that the number of Black people killed by cops, both armed and unarmed, was 235 for 2019. There are other measures relevant to determining a need for better policing. We should focus on those as well. And as we're improving law enforcement, let's work to find other even more significant causes of our cultural and racial tensions - they're there. Let's unite and get busy finding and fixing.

Steve Bakke, Edina

. . .

I recall Seamus Heaney, the Irish Nobel laureate, saying that when confusion and conflict rule the day, it's a good time to hear from a poet.

This is such a time, and I think it good advice. So let's hear from Heaney himself. In his verse adaptation of a Sophocles play titled "The Cure at Troy," he has the following oft-quoted lines:

History says, Don't hope

On this side of the grave,

But then, once in a lifetime

The longed-for tidal wave

Of justice can rise up

And hope and history rhyme.

These words straddle the cavernous gap between optimism and despair. They acknowledge the persistence of evil in the human experience but refuse cynicism about it. One application for Heaney was the end of violence in Northern Ireland through negotiation between centuries-old enemies. It wasn't theoretical for Heaney. He grew up a Catholic amid the violence and had friends and family members murdered. (See his poem "The Strand at Lough Beg.") And he admits to not knowing how long this will last.

In our present time of confusion and conflict, we face a question: Is now a time when "hope and history" might "rhyme"?

I am not sure it is. There is a persistent streak of foolishness from all corners in our collective reactions to the killing of George Floyd. And yet there is also wisdom and hope. I am not one of those who thinks nothing has changed for Black Americans in the last 60 years. But I do believe not nearly enough has changed. It feels to me like the stage is set for a more quantum rather than incremental change. Which will depend, of course, on our collective actions rather than our collective words.

This poet has increased my hope. I'm pulling for a rhyme.

READERS WRITE Compelling critique that was not

Daniel Taylor, St. Paul

We want to hear from you. Send us your thoughts here.

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCLIX.

BARR DEFENDS AGGRESSIVE FEDERAL RESPONSE TO PROTESTS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 28, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1112 wordsByline: Associated Press

Highlight: WASHINGTON (AP) - Attorney General William Barr defended the aggressive federal law enforcement response to civil unrest in America as he testified for the first time before the House Judiciary Committee, pushing back against angry, skeptical Democrats who said President Donald Trump's administration is unconstitutionally suppressing dissent.

Body

By MARY CLARE JALONICK, MICHAEL BALSAMO and ERIC TUCKER

WASHINGTON (AP) - Attorney General William Barr defended the aggressive federal law enforcement response to civil unrest in America as he testified for the first time before the House Judiciary Committee, pushing back against angry, skeptical Democrats who said President Donald Trump's administration is unconstitutionally suppressing dissent.

The hearing, held Tuesday as the late civil rights icon John Lewis lay in state steps away outside the Capitol, highlighted the wide election-year gulf between the two parties on police brutality and systemic racism in law enforcement. Massive protests have sparked unrest across the nation following the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police, and calls for police reform are growing louder.

But Barr said "violent rioters and anarchists have hijacked legitimate protests" and argued the violence taking place in Portland, Oregon, and other cities is disconnected from Floyd's killing, which he called a "horrible" event that prompted a necessary national reckoning on the relationship between the Black community and law enforcement. But he also said there was no systemic racism in law enforcement.

"Largely absent from these scenes of destruction are even superficial attempts by the rioters to connect their actions to George Floyd's death or any legitimate call for reform," Barr said of the Portland protests.

The hearing marks Barr's first appearance before the committee after 18 months in office, bringing him face-to-face with the panel that voted last year to hold him in contempt and is holding hearings on what Democrats say is politicization of the Justice Department under his watch. But little new ground was uncovered; fuming Democrats often used their five minutes to lay out their frustrations and cut Barr off as he attempted to answer questions.

Barr defends aggressive federal response to protests

The hearing comes during a tumultuous stretch in which Barr has taken actions cheered by President Donald Trump but condemned by Democrats and other critics. Among them: the Justice Department's decision to drop the prosecution of former Trump administration national security adviser Michael Flynn and Barr's urging for a more lenient sentence for Trump ally Roger Stone, a move that prompted the entire trial team's departure. Trump later commuted the sentence entirely.

The top Republican on the panel, Ohio Rep. Jim Jordan, used his opening statement to show an eight-minute video that spliced together images of violence by protesters around the country.

Democrats retorted with a video of their own of more peaceful protesters, shown by Rhode Island Rep. David Cicilline.

"We fought for democracy, for the right to speak freely and you are attempting to take that away," Cicilline told Barr. "What's worse, you're doing it for the sole purpose of furthering the president's political agenda and generating footage for Trump campaign commercials."

Committee Chairman Jerry Nadler said the Trump administration had "twisted the Department of Justice into a shadow of its former self," serving the powerful before average Americans.

Nadler said Barr had "aided and abetted" Trump's worst impulses and excoriated him and the Justice Department for turning a blind eye to necessary reforms to police departments, for dismissing Black Lives Matter protests and for flooding streets with federal agents to stop protesters.

Under combative questioning, Barr acerbically defended himself but revealed little new information about his motivations or the Justice Department's recent actions on policing or otherwise.

His testimony underscored his department's ongoing effort to differentiate between increasing violence in some cities and Floyd's death, which has led to state charges against four officers and is under investigation by federal authorities. Massive but peaceful demonstrations followed Floyd's death in May.

The attorney general acknowledged that Floyd's death struck a chord in the Black community because it reinforced concerns Black people are treated differently by police. But he condemned Americans who he says have responded inappropriately to Floyd's death.

"As elected officials of the federal government, every member of this committee - regardless of your political views or your feelings about the Trump administration - should condemn violence against federal officers and destruction of federal property," Barr said.

Civil unrest escalated in Portland after federal agents were accused of whisking people away in unmarked cars without probable cause; the people were detained and later released. And in Washington, D.C., peaceful protesters were violently cleared from the streets by federal officers using smoke bombs and pepper balls last month before a photo op by Trump in front of St. John's church.

Barr defended the broad use of law enforcement power to deal with the situation, noting that protesters had earlier set fire to the church and "it was total consensus that you couldn't allow that to happen so close to the White House." The department's internal watchdog has opened investigations into use of force and other tactics by agents in Washington and Portland.

Barr defends aggressive federal response to protests

He also said the force was used because the protesters would not disperse from the area when law enforcement officials were trying to move back the security perimeter, a decision made the night before. When pressed on details, he pointed to the investigations.

The use of pepper spray was warranted, even if peaceful protesters were also harmed, he said.

Beyond the federal response to the demonstrations, Barr was pressed in detail about his intervention in the Flynn and Stone cases, both of which arose from special counsel Robert Mueller's Russia investigation. Democrats criticized him for partly taking into account Stone's health and age, 67, and said those standards haven't been used in other similar cases.

Barr said he told the acting U.S. attorney that "we are going to leave it up to the judge" and that he ordered the revised recommendation to be filed when the prosecutors submitted an initial recommendation calling for a sentence of seven to nine years.

"And even though I knew I would get a lot of criticism for doing that, I think at the end of the day my obligation is to be fair to the individual," Barr said.

Barr also addressed Trump's assertions on Twitter that the 2020 presidential election will be "rigged." Asked by Louisiana Rep. Cedric Richmond if that could be the case, Barr said "I have no reason to think it will be." Barr also said he agrees with the nation's intelligence agencies that Russia interfered in the 2016 election, despite Trump's reluctance to embrace that point.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCCLX. A HOME OPENER LIKE NO OTHER

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 28, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 1CLength: 1065 wordsByline: PHIL MILLER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: No fans, plenty of worry as baseball back at Target FieldBody

If players draw energy from their cheering fans, if home-field advantage is derived, as some statistical studies suggest, from the pressure a loud, noisy crowd imposes on umpires, then COVID-19 and the elimination of ticket-holders has rendered Target Field impotent. Welcome to neutral-site baseball, right?

Quite the opposite, Rocco Baldelli figures.

"There's actually more ability to relax and breathe" at home now, the Twins manager said after experiencing five days in Chicago to open the brief 2020 season. "You're not on the go, you're not in different environments, you're not moving around constantly on buses and things like that. It eliminates a little stress for guys."

Considering his players were so stressed, they managed to score only an American League-high 27 runs on White Sox turf, it's easy to wonder whether they will even notice the surroundings Tuesday, the 60th home opener in Minnesota Twins history.

But this will be a home opener unlike any other, and not just because the paid attendance against the Cardinals is guaranteed to be 0.

For one thing, the Twins surely understand now how tenuous this season is, given Monday's news that more than a dozen Miami Marlins players and staff members had tested positive for the coronavirus during a weekend road trip to Philadelphia. No Twins regular has been infected since the active roster arrived for camp at the beginning of July, but there's no guarantee, and perhaps little chance, that their tests will remain 100% negative throughout the season.

Then again, there were plenty of moments over the past four months in which it appeared unlikely games would ever take place in Target Field in 2020.

"You talk to some people and they're hopeful and they make you feel good, and then you turn on the news and it's like, 'Oh man, I just hope we put on a uniform again at some point,' " bench coach Mike Bell said.

A HOME OPENER LIKE NO OTHER

"Obviously, a lot of it wasn't even about the game. It was about what families were going through with COVID. A lot of people struggling emotionally, mentally with different things."

Not only are the Twins mindful of the pandemic that has reduced the 2020 season to a nine-week hiccup - a group "first pitch" will be performed virtually by nine medical professionals who have treated COVID-19 victims for months - but they are also sensitive to the worldwide movement that was triggered by the horrific killing of George Floyd just 50 blocks away.

"Responsibility. That's the word I've been thinking about," Twins President of Baseball Operations Derek Falvey said of his franchise's obligation to memorialize Floyd. "You'll see some focus on that. You'll see some things that are reflective of that. For all of us who live here in the Twin Cities, we want to focus on what we've experienced in our local communities. Our players feel it, our staff does."

Fans will see it, too, in a graphic that will be displayed on the outfield wall throughout the season, and also when the game is halted at 8:46 p.m. - Floyd died May 25 after a Minneapolis police officer knelt on his neck for eight minutes, 46 seconds - for a moment of silence in his memory.

There will be plenty of other Opening Day traditions observed, too, even an Air Force flyover above an empty ballpark.

"I think the environment is going to be a lot of fun and maybe a little different from some of the games we have played so far on the road," Baldelli said. "Just a little more going on, and some real life in the ballpark."

Ultimately, the game will become the focus. Homer Bailey will make his Twins and Target Field debut, Josh Donaldson will make it his new home, and though there won't be any cheering to welcome them, beyond the generic prerecorded kind piped in over the public address system, the game - played at a ballpark where the Twins have won 56% of the time over the past three seasons - will settle into something approximating normal.

"That's what I noticed in Chicago - it's really strange, how quiet it is, but you get used to it and after a couple of innings, you're like, 'OK, this is just what it's going to be. This is all we can do, really,' " Falvey said.

"It will be nice to be in our home park, in familiar surroundings. I expect that will help. Not exactly normal, but nothing feels normal this year."

TWINS HOME OPENER HIGHLIGHTS

Opponent: St. Louis Cardinals

Game time: 7:10 p.m.

TV, radio: FSN, 830-AM

Spectators: None, as MLB games are being played with no fans because of the ongoing coronavirus pandemic.

Pregame elements: All will be prerecorded using proper safety protocols, the team announced.

A HOME OPENER LIKE NO OTHER

Ceremonial first pitch: Nine frontline health care workers will join to throw the first pitch together: Berhane Gebre-Egziabher (an environmental services staff member at Hennepin County Medical Center), Catherine Gonzalez-Klang (an interpreter at HCMC), Richard Gray (a doctor at HCMC), Sophia Kim (a doctor at North Memorial Health Hospital), Dee Matara (a registered nurse at Methodist Hospital), Andrew Olson (a hospitalist at M Health Fairview Bethesda Hospital), Laurie Taylor (a lab technician at Lakeview Hospital), Vanessa Tschetter (an ICU nurse at M Health Fairview Ridges Hospital) and Kaila Vang (a progressive care nurse at Regions Hospital).

Anthems: "The Star-Spangled Banner" will be performed by Gospel artist Jovonta Patton. "Lift Every Voice and Sing" will be performed by Grammy Award winners Sounds of Blackness.

Moment of silence: For Twins minor leaguer Ryan Costello, who died in November in New Zealand of natural causes at age 23; victims of COVID-19; and George Floyd, who was killed on Memorial Day.

George Floyd Memorial: The team will unveil a memorial graphic on the outfield wall and will have an in-game moment of silence at 8:46 p.m. The time signifies the 8 minutes, 46 seconds Floyd had his neck compressed by a police officer before dying.

American flag raising: World War II veteran Alvin Donahoo, 101, of Spring Park, Minn.

Flyover: Pending final approval, the flyover will feature two C-130s from the Minnesota Air National Guard's 133rd Airlift Wing.

Seventh-inning stretch: Staff Sgt. Jeffrey Nicholls of Duluth will perform "God Bless America."

Target Field fan mosaic: The team plans to debut a 53-foot-by-38-foot printed photo mosaic featuring the likenesses of more than 3,000 Twins fans. The completed mosaic will cover Section 331 of the U.S. Bank Home Run Porch.

Website: twinsbaseball.com

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

'Umbrella man,' seen on viral video breaking windows in Minneapolis, is suspected by police to be white supremacist

ARTICLE MCCCCLXI. 'UMBRELLA MAN,' SEEN ON VIRAL VIDEO BREAKING WINDOWS IN MINNEAPOLIS, IS SUSPECTED BY POLICE TO BE WHITE SUPREMACIST

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 28, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 857 words

Byline: Sarah Horner

Highlight: Investigators suspect the "Umbrella Man" seen smashing out windows at an Auto Zone store following George Floyd's death is a 32-year-old white supremacist who sought to "incite violence," according to a search warrant affidavit.

Body

Investigators suspect the "Umbrella man" seen in video phone footage smashing out windows at an Auto Zone store on Minneapolis' East Lake Street in the days following George Floyd's death is a 32-year-old white supremacist who sought to "incite violence," according to a search warrant affidavit.

In the search warrant affidavit filed Monday in Hennepin County District Court, arson investigator Erika Christensen of the Minneapolis Police Department wrote that an anonymous tip received by police indicates the man to be the person on video seen breaking windows.

The man is a member of the Hell's Angels motorcycle gang and a "known associate of the Aryan Cowboys," according to Christensen.

The affidavit describes the Aryan Cowboys as a "known prison gang out of Minnesota and Kentucky."

As of Tuesday, the man had not been arrested or charged in connection with the incident.

UMBRELLA MAN

In the video footage captured of the incident, a man dressed all in black - in black gloves, a black mask and carrying a black umbrella - is seen using a hammer to break the windows of Auto Zone's storefront on May 27. Floyd died while in Minneapolis police custody on May 25.

In the video footage, the so-called "Umbrella man" is approached by several people. While it's unclear what was said, body language of those involved suggests they were trying to stop his conduct, the affidavit said.

It was later determined that the same man spray-painted the words, "free (expletive) for everyone zone" on the store's front doors, according to the affidavit.

'Umbrella man,' seen on viral video breaking windows in Minneapolis, is suspected by police to be white supremacist

'CREATED AN ATMOSPHERE OF HOSTILITY AND TENSION'

The store was looted and set ablaze shortly thereafter, marking the incident as a turning point in the unrest that followed the officer-involved fatality, Christensen wrote.

"This was the first fire that set off a string of fires and looting throughout the precinct and the rest of the city. Until the actions of the ... 'Umbrella man,' the protests had been relatively peaceful. The actions of this person created an atmosphere of hostility and tension," Christensen wrote. "(I) ... believe ... this individual's sole aim was to incite violence."

Christensen said she spent "innumerable hours" combing social media trying to determine the "Umbrella man's" identity but was unsuccessful.

She also spent about two weeks working on the case with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives' National Response Team.

EMAIL TIP

The effort stalled until about a week ago, when Minneapolis police received a tip via email that suggested the 32-year-old was the suspect, the affidavit said.

Christensen researched the email and was able to contact the sender. The sender stated that she had learned of his involvement from another person who wanted to stay anonymous because the individual feared him, the affidavit said.

The person reported that the man is a member of Hell's Angels who wanted to "sow discord and racial unrest" by breaking the store's windows and writing on the doors.

SUSPECTED INVOLVEMENT IN STILLWATER INCIDENT

Christensen later learned that the man was involved in a racially-motivated incident that took place in Stillwater on June 27, according to the affidavit.

In that case, a Muslim woman was reportedly "racially harassed by a group of motorcycle club members wearing Aryan Cowboy leather vests," the affidavit said.

The man was reportedly photographed with the group.

After looking at his driver's license photo and several booking photos, and comparing them to the "Umbrella man," Christensen said she observed a "striking resemblance in the eye, nose, bridge and brow area" between the two. She also noted that both appear to have a "slight variation in their left eyebrow" and that their height appears roughly the same.

RUMOR ABOUT 'UMBRELLA MAN' PROVEN UNTRUE

In the days of the riots in Minneapolis, a social media rumor - proven untrue - claimed the "Umbrella man" was a St. Paul police officer.

St. Paul police later released evidence that the officer was in St. Paul at the time of the incident at Auto Zone on East Lake Street.

'Umbrella man,' seen on viral video breaking windows in Minneapolis, is suspected by police to be white supremacist

"This type of disinformation can jeopardize the officer's reputation and safety and chip away at the trust this police department has worked so hard to build with its community," St. Paul Police Chief Todd Axtell said in a statement at the time.

SEARCH WARRANT

Christensen filed the search warrant to request the man's cellphone records from Sprint, including "subscriber information and cell tower locations where the phone might be pinging off for the date of May 27, 2020 to further ascertain the identity of 'Umbrella man.' "

The man's criminal record includes gross-misdemeanor-level domestic assault and terroristic threats and misdemeanor-level fifth-degree assault. North St. Paul man killed in crash after fleeing Dakota County sheriff's deputy Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Cleric assaulted outside Bloomington mosque; police searching for suspects U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities Minneapolis man sentenced to 33 years in prison for sex-trafficking young women and girls out of massage parlor

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCLXII.

COMMISSION'S POLICING PLAN REBUFFED

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 28, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 896 wordsByline: LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: At public hearing, most say they don't back the panel's proposal, which differs from the Minneapolis council's.Body

A small group of residents urged the Minneapolis Charter Commission late Monday to hold off on advancing their own proposal that would eliminate the minimum staffing requirement for the city's Police Department.

Speaking during a virtual public hearing Monday night - the first and only one on the commission's proposal - people offered varying reasons for not wanting it on the ballot in November.

Some prefer a different proposal, crafted by some on the City Council, that would replace the Police Department with a broader community safety department. Others feared both proposals were premature and required more thought.

The court-appointed commission must decide Wednesday night whether to put its proposal before voters on Nov. 3. It has more time to decide whether it wants to weigh in on the City Council's proposal or use its procedures to block it from the ballot this year. The commission will likely decide how it wants to handle that proposal at its Aug. 5 meeting.

The charter, which serves as the city's constitution, has become a focal point of discussions as residents and elected officials debate how to remake policing following George Floyd's death in police custody.

Monday's hearing drew a smaller crowd than prior meetings, where closer to 200 people signed up to discuss the council's proposal. The controversial proposal crafted by five Minneapolis City Council members would eliminate the requirement to maintain a Police Department. The community safety department that would replace it could include police officers but wouldn't be required to do so.

One caller, Shannon Puechner, urged the commissioners to let the council's proposal proceed instead of their own. She said she watched years ago when police shot a mentally ill man after her family called for help.

Commission's policing plan rebuffed

"After his death, reforms were promised," Puechner said, "but it has been 15 years and the tragic situation has not changed. Reform is a failure."

Others, including former Mayor Sharon Sayles Belton, said they feared the council's proposal wasn't ready for the ballot this year.

"The City Council has not presented a plan, a plan for the Minneapolis Police Department," she said. "They presented a resolution. My final remark is that the general outline of the vision that they put on this table does not constitute a plan that is ready for a public vote. The matter should be on the ballot next year, during an election cycle when everyone in the city is focused on municipal elections."

One of the few people who said he wanted the chance to vote on the commission's proposal was North Side resident Jeffrey Strand, who said he believed recent budget negotiations showed that the mayor and council already have wide authority over the Police Department.

Strand said he supports removing the minimum funding requirement but feared the council's proposal is "vague."

"I do support re-engineering public safety in Minneapolis, but it must be thoughtfully and planfully developed, not rushed," Strand said.

The remarks offered during Monday's public hearing represent a small slice of the feedback charter commissioners and elected officials are receiving from residents. People have submitted thousands of written comments; some have been released by the city and others are still under review to ensure they don't include private data.

The proposal up for discussion Monday night was written by Charter Commissioner Al Giraud-Isaacson after residents and some of his fellow charter commissioners raised concerns about the City Council proposal.

The measure crafted by Giraud-Isaacson would leave the charter largely intact. The city would still be required to maintain a Police Department, but the charter wouldn't contain language mandating its size. Decisions about staffing levels would be made by the mayor and City Council during separate processes.

When he introduced the measure last week, Giraud-Isaacson described it as a "simple, clear, understandable and straightforward ballot question."

If the charter commissioners want Giraud-Isaacson's measure to appear on the ballot this year, they will need to work quickly. There is a tight Aug. 21 deadline for adding items to the ballot.

But because of some additional processes that need to unfold, the commissioners would likely have to decide Wednesday whether they want to put it on the ballot. They have scheduled a meeting for 4 p.m. that day.

The commissioners can unilaterally decide to put a measure on the ballot. The City Council and the mayor, however, would get to choose how the question is worded when voters see it at the polls.

At the same time they're debating what to do with Giraud-Isaacson's proposal, the commissioners are also weighing the proposal sent to them by the City Council. The commissioners will likely decide by their Aug. 5 meeting how they want to proceed on that measure.

Commission's policing plan rebuffed

They could offer a recommendation to approve or reject it, or offer a substitute charter amendment. The council would not be required to follow their advice.

The commissioners could also invoke their right to take additional time to review the measure, overshooting the deadline for adding it to the ballot this year. A public hearing on that proposal will begin at 6 p.m. Tuesday.

Depending on which actions the Charter Commission and City Council take, it's possible both items could end up on the November ballot.

Liz Navratil · 612-673-4994

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCCLXIII. MEDIA SEEK TO UNSEAL CHAUVIN DIVORCE PROCEEDINGS - CORRECTION APPENDED

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 28, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

 Correction Appended

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1B

Length: 605 words

Byline: CHAO XIONG; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: Former Minneapolis cop and his estranged wife filed the motion to protect themselves from harassment.

Body

A coalition of local and national media partners is asking a judge to unseal court documents in the divorce proceedings of former Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin, who is charged with killing George Floyd.

A motion filed by the coalition Monday in Hennepin County District Court said the U.S. Constitution gives the media and public access to every stage of judicial proceedings, including divorces, and that the court sidestepped protocol in presumably sealing the divorce documents.

"This is a case of utmost public concern," said the motion filed by attorney Leita Walker. "That is a reason for more transparency, not less. Indeed, it would be nothing short of absurd to grant the parties to this case more privacy than the average divorce proceeding," she wrote.

The coalition includes the Star Tribune, the Associated Press, CBS News, WCCO-TV, KSTP-TV and other Hubbard Broadcasting Inc. properties, KARE 11, the New York Times Co. and the Minnesota Coalition on Government Information.

Kellie Chauvin filed for divorce in late May, days after her husband was charged with killing Floyd on May 25 by kneeling on his neck for several minutes during an arrest.

Kellie and Derek Chauvin filed a joint motion Wednesday asking a judge to seal their divorce case, making the existence of any proceedings or court documents invisible to the public.

Their filing argued that "rage and violence" have been directed at both of them, that several credit cards were opened in Derek Chauvin's name and that both of their financial accounts were hacked, leading to attempts to secure cash advances for tens of thousands of dollars.

Media seek to unseal Chauvin divorce proceedings - Correction Appended

"Allowing public access of this [divorce] file will allow further harassment of [Kellie Chauvin] and not allow privacy in this matter," said the Chauvins' filing.

They also argued that publicizing hearings in the case would make Kellie and Derek Chauvin's whereabouts known and "negatively affect the parties from a safety standpoint."

The move came the same day they were both charged in Washington County with felony tax crimes dating back to 2014. They allegedly failed to report more than $460,000 in income.

Sometime Friday, their divorce case became unavailable in the state's public court system, presumably because a judge had granted the Chauvins' request.

The media coalition argued that the Chauvins cited "only cursory proposed findings" to justify sealing the case and that the court failed to provide the public and media an opportunity to be heard on the matter before the case disappeared from the public section of the electronic docketing system.

Case law and precedent have imposed a high threshold for sealing divorce cases, the coalition noted.

"That the divorce proceedings may be an attempt to shield the couple's assets from criminal forfeiture or from recovery by the Floyd family in their civil lawsuit serves only to increase the public interest in those proceedings," the coalition argued. "Likewise, the probability that this case will involve information relevant to the felony tax fraud charges filed against the couple makes transparency in the proceedings all the more important."

The motion noted that the Star Tribune previously successfully moved the court to unseal the divorce files of the late musician Prince Rogers Nelson and Manuela Testolini, and the files of Attorney General Keith and Kim Ellison.

State case law has found that divorce filings should be public and that sealing them is an "extraordinary deviation," the motion said. Other measures can be taken to protect Kellie Chauvin, such as security at court hearings, the coalition argued.

Chao Xiong · 612-270-4708

Correction

This article about the divorce filings of former Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin and his wife, Kellie Chauvin, should have said the case is in Washington County District Court.

Correction-Date: July 29, 2020

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

Dems slam Cowboys for Trump boss for 'back to Africa' video

ARTICLE MCCCXLIV.

DEMS SLAM COWBOYS FOR TRUMP BOSS FOR 'BACK TO AFRICA' VIDEO

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 28, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 583 words

Byline: Associated Press

Highlight: RIO RANCHO, N.M. (AP) - Democrats and civil rights leaders in New Mexico are denouncing the leader of the Cowboys for Trump group after he posted a social media video calling for some Black athletes to "go back to Africa."

Body

By RUSSELL CONTRERAS and MORGAN LEE

RIO RANCHO, N.M. (AP) - Democrats and civil rights leaders in New Mexico are denouncing the leader of the Cowboys for Trump group after he posted a social media video calling for some Black athletes to "go back to Africa."

The 35-minute speech from Otero County Commissioner Couy Griffin on Facebook live attacked Black NFL players who support standing before games for "Lift Ev'ry Voice and Sing" - traditionally known as the Black National Anthem - as a gesture of solidarity against racial injustice.

"They want to destroy our country," Griffin said of the Black athletes and supporters of the song. "I got a better idea, why don't you go back to Africa and form your little football teams over in Africa and you can play on a(n) old beat-out dirt lot and you can play your Black national anthem there. How about that?"

Griffin also offered to give people of color what he called a "101" lesson on racial identity and said anyone who does not identify as "American" first or opposes the Second Amendment right to bear arms should leave the U.S. or "go home."

Griffin said he recorded the speech from a southern New Mexico mountaintop after fasting for three days as he contemplates the nation's political fate as the November election approaches.

New Mexico Speaker of the House Brian Egolf tweeted late Monday that Griffin's comments were racist and that he should resign his Otero County Commissioner seat.

"Nothing that happened on that mountain had anything to do with God," Egolf wrote. "You are a racist. You need to resign. To invoke the Lord in defense of your disgusting statements is the antithesis of the teachings of Christ. Shame on you."

Dems slam Cowboys for Trump boss for 'back to Africa' video

U.S. Rep. and Democratic Senate candidate Ben Ray Luján called on Democrats and Republicans to denounce Griffin.

"In a racist rant that Commissioner Couy Griffin posted, he says African-Americans should go back to Africa, Mexican Americans should go back to Mexico, and Chinese Americans should go back to China. This racist and hateful language does not reflect the values we know that New Mexico was built on," Luján said.

Devont'e Kurt Watson, a member of the Black Lives Matter movement in Albuquerque, said the "back to Africa" comment showed Griffin didn't see Black citizens as Americans who have a right to protest. "What we are doing is very American," Watson said.

Mike Curtis, spokesman for the Republican Party of New Mexico, declined comment on Griffin's comments in the video.

Griffin in an interview with The Associated Press defended his comments and said he was speaking out against a double standard that he says only holds white people responsible for racist behavior. He conceded that he may have poorly chosen his words that by suggesting that some Blacks go "back to Africa."

Griffin plans to attend a Wednesday appearance by President Donald Trump in the Texas portion of the Permian Basin oil region that stretches into New Mexico. He considers Trump a friend.

Cowboys for Trump hasn't disclosed how many members it has but a dozen or so supporters have showed up at campaign events around the country.

Earlier this month, an arbitrator ruled Cowboys for Trump must register as a political committee in New Mexico and pay $7,600 in fines for not filing expenditure reports. The group has refused to disclose its records.

Lee reported from Santa Fe, New Mexico

Russell Contreras is a member of The Associated Press' Race and Ethnicity Team. Follow him on Twitter at: <http://twitter.com/russcontreras>

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Photos: Empty stands, masked players as baseball returns

ARTICLE MCCCCLXV.

PHOTOS: EMPTY STANDS, MASKED PLAYERS AS BASEBALL RETURNS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 28, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 207 words

Byline: Associated Press

Highlight: A cardboard cutout of Tommy Lasorda at Dodger Stadium. The shouts of Tom Hanks hawking hot dogs at the Oakland Coliseum. A shot of Cubs pitcher Jon Lester sitting in the bleachers at Wrigley Field.

Body

A cardboard cutout of Tommy Lasorda at Dodger Stadium. The shouts of Tom Hanks hawking hot dogs at the Oakland Coliseum. A shot of Cubs pitcher Jon Lester sitting in the bleachers at Wrigley Field.

With every pitch, with every swing, with every inning in empty parks across the majors, this looks, sounds and feels like the most bizarre season in big league history.

"Going to be 2020 coronavirus baseball," Yankees star pitcher Gerrit Cole said.

Players wearing masks. Social distancing in the dugout. New rules. A skewed, 60-game season.

Plus, another sign of the times: Salutes to the Black Lives Matter movement, with players kneeling before and during the national anthem.

All of this against the backdrop of barren ballparks - no spectators allowed. Some teams are putting cardboard cutouts with fans' faces into the box seats. You can have your dog's likeness in the stands, too.

To make up for the stadium silence, clubs are piping in artificial crowd noise. It sounds like cheering, sort of. Perhaps the most unique audio effect is in Oakland: Hanks sold peanuts there as a teen, and the A's are blending his voice into the vendor track.

John Shipley: Can baseball go the social distance? The Loop - Nipsey Russell's 2020 Baseball Preview

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCCLXVI.

MAR: MINNEAPOLIS MARKET STILL STRONG

Finance and Commerce

July 28, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 BridgeTower Media All Rights Reserved

FINANCE & COMMERCESection: NEWSLength: 267 wordsByline: Brian JohnsonBody

To paraphrase Mark Twain, the death of the Minneapolis housing market has been greatly exaggerated. That's the upshot of a new Minneapolis Area Realtors report, which found that the city's housing market has remained steady amid the recent civil unrest that damaged hundreds of Minneapolis businesses and sparked cries for police reform.

Since the George Floyd protests, "there have been several misleading claims that Minneapolis residents are fleeing the city," MAR 2020 President Linda Rogers said in a statement. "Utilizing data from NorthstarMLS, MAR conducted a thorough analysis of the housing market and the data clearly shows otherwise."

The report "Minneapolis Housing Market: Are Homeowners Fleeing the City?" portrays a surprisingly robust Minneapolis housing market as measured by the number of days a home stays in the market, seller activity, prices and other metrics.

In June, for example, homes for sale in Minneapolis sold in 5.9% fewer days compared to June 2019. Other cities saw double-digit increases in days on the market, the report said.

In addition, Minneapolis sellers are still getting their full list price, and showings in Minneapolis have been comparable to other cities, according to the report.

"It is evident that Minneapolis properties are in high demand, with buyers snapping up available homes," Rogers said. "Buyers are still very interested and committed to living in the city."

MAR officials will discuss the report during an Aug. 6 webinar. More information is available at <https://www.mplsrealtor.com/events/>.

MAR: Minneapolis market still strong

Load-Date: August 3, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCLXVII.

REAL-LIFE ISSUES, REAL ENTERTAINMENT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 28, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 740 wordsByline: CONNIE NELSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Robb Armstrong tackles racism, classism, homelessness and bullying, and he does it quite deftly - in a comic strip.

But "Jump Start," which is celebrating its 30th year of syndication, isn't a polemic. Instead, the strip - which revolves around Joe and Marcy Cobb and their middle-class Black family - is by turns heartwarming, silly and laugh-out-loud funny.

"Jump Start" has run in the Star Tribune's weekday comics pages for years. It's now part of the Sunday lineup. We took this opportunity to talk to Armstrong about being a cartoonist, dealing with racial disparity in comics and the "Peanuts" character that bears his name.

The conversation has been edited for length and clarity.

Q: You got "Jump Start" syndicated shortly after you graduated from college. It was one of the first strips by a Black man about a Black family. Now you've reached a big milestone. What's it like?

A: I have wanted to get to this point since I was 3. I remember being asked what I wanted to do, and I said, "I want to be in the papers just like Snoopy."

Q: I've read that Charles Schulz, the creator of "Peanuts," was a friend and a supporter of yours.

A: I met him after I'd been in syndication for about a year. I sent him an original strip and flew out to California to see him. He told me, "You're onto something. What you have here are great characters, characters who stand for something, characters who can stand the test of time."

Q: Looks like he was right. Your strip is running in more than 300 newspapers. But "Jump Start" isn't a remake of "Peanuts," is it?

A: Charles Schulz was an inspiration to me and an icon. But I had to do what I had to do. I didn't want the strip to be saccharine or glowing.

I wanted it to be as close to reality as the form allows. It gets very real.

Q: How so?

A: Both of my main characters are on the front lines. Joe is a cop and a Black man. His wife, Marcy, is a very dedicated nurse and a mom. These are not costumes just slapped on them. I have a connection to these characters that makes me test them, push them, find their failures.

Q: How do you show their failures?

A: Joe is narrow-minded when it comes to criminals. He takes the "once a criminal, always a criminal" approach. Because of his looks, his [older white] partner Crunchy is profiled as being a racist cop.

Q: The strip is based in real life, and partly on your life. But it's often, well, funny. There isn't a sense of anger, of outrage.

A: That's not what this world needs. My friends don't need to hear how outraged I am. I have to be part of the cure. I created a cop who actually believes in protecting and serving others. I can make this happen [in a comic strip] even if I never see it in real life.

Q: Have the protests over the death of George Floyd affected the strip?

A: This is a flash point that I have to handle correctly. I didn't want to go all crazy, but I knew I would deal with police reform. In early August, the department will be going through police reform. Joe is going to be way more disgruntled under the reform than Crunchy.

Q: That's a bit unexpected.

A: You see prejudice in "Jump Start," but when you do, it's Joe being prejudiced against an ex-con.

Q: As a fan of the strip, I admire your multiracial cast of characters. But it's so large, I can't keep their names straight.

A: I'm probably the only one who can. There are over 30 characters in "Jump Start." In my new book ["On a Roll!: A Jump Start Treasury"] that's coming out in October, I put in a family tree.

Q: You feature a lot of kids, including Joe and Marcy's four. How do they function in the strip?

A: They represent not just childhood, but the hopefulness that comes with being a child. They have their own dreams, their own hopes, their own ideas of how the world they live in should be.

Q: You have some tough-kid characters as well, Willarbee, Percival and Cross, who are often foiled in their attempts to bully. What's their role?

A: Bullying is a hovering menace, and that's why I show them as shadows, not as cartoon characters. We're not afraid of what happens to us, we're afraid of what could happen to us.

Q: Oh, and that "Peanuts" character? Which one is named after you?

A: The Black dude, Franklin. He didn't have a last name. One time, Charles Schulz called me up and asked if Franklin could have my last name.

Real-life issues, real entertainment

I didn't think about it at the time. But when Franklin turned 50, I did an interview about it, and it made me realize what an honor it was.

@StribCNelson

Load-Date: July 28, 2020

End of Document

Suspects sought in carjackings, robberies

ARTICLE MCCCCLXVIII.

SUSPECTS SOUGHT IN CARJACKINGS, ROBBERIES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 28, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 449 wordsByline: LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: No arrests had been announced in series of crimes in Minneapolis.Body

Minneapolis police are looking for suspects they say are behind a weekslong spree of armed carjackings and robberies across the city, including one episode Sunday in which a father was dragged a short distance as he tried to stop a man from stealing his vehicle with his wife and child inside.

The mother and child escaped, but the father suffered serious injuries in the incident Sunday afternoon in the northeast Second Precinct, and was brought to a hospital for surgery, police said. His condition wasn't immediately known on Monday.

Detectives are trying to determine whether the would-be carjacking was the work of a robbery crew they believe has been responsible for dozens of armed stickups over the past three weeks, most of which occurred in the Third and Fifth precincts on the South Side, although some reports have also surfaced downtown. No arrests had been announced.

Police said that the incidents follow a familiar pattern: Victims are approached by three or four men, often wearing face masks, and ordered to turn over their vehicles or possessions at gunpoint; the suspects typically flee in a car with no plates.

The spree started about three weeks ago and has included dozens of incidents, ranging from purse-snatchings to car thefts to robberies. In one recent episode, a motorist was driving in south Minneapolis when he was "boxed in" by several suspects, who pulled him out of the driver's seat and assaulted him, before taking his car, police say.

On Sunday, suspects stole a running car with a dog inside from a gas station in the Lowry Hill East neighborhood while the owner was inside paying; the dog was found a few blocks away, but it wasn't clear whether the vehicle was recovered. The same day, a woman was reportedly accosted by five suspects, between the ages of 14 and 16, and had her purse stolen while she was walking in the area of W. 31st Street and S. Blaisdell Avenue - about a block west from the Fifth Precinct police station. The suspects were said to have fled in a gray, newer model Camry with no plates.

Suspects sought in carjackings, robberies

The spree comes amid a surge in crime, particularly shootings, since the police killing of George Floyd and the unrest that followed two months ago, which itself has become part of a fierce debate around the future of policing in the state's largest city.

Citywide, the number of robberies has jumped about 35%, to 886 compared with 657 at this time last year, according to Police Department statistics.

In the Third Precinct, armed stickups have more than doubled, while such crimes have gone up about 47% in the Fifth Precinct, which covers the city's mostly affluent southwestern corner, statistics show.

Libor Jany · 612-673-4064 Twitter: @StribJany

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

End of Document

Wild defenseman Matt Dumba nominated for King Clancy Memorial Trophy

ARTICLE MCCCCLXIX.

WILD DEFENSEMAN MATT DUMBA NOMINATED FOR KING CLANCY MEMORIAL TROPHY

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 28, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 614 words

Byline: Dane Mizutani

Highlight: Wild defenseman Matt Dumba has been nominated for the King Clancy Memorial Trophy, which goes annually to the player who best exemplifies leadership qualities on and off the ice and who has made a significant humanitarian contribution to his community. While former fan favorite Jason Zucker took home the honor last year, and deservedly so, [...]

Body

Wild defenseman Matt Dumba has been nominated for the King Clancy Memorial Trophy, which goes annually to the player who best exemplifies leadership qualities on and off the ice and who has made a significant humanitarian contribution to his community.

While former fan favorite Jason Zucker took home the honor last year, and deservedly so, Dumba is equally as deserving this year based on his philanthropic endeavors over the past year.

"I was very honored," Dumba said. "It's awesome. I don't really have words for it. Just happy to be a part of something like that."

He most recently launched an initiative to help rebuild Lake Street in Minneapolis following George Floyd's killing at the hands of a former Minneapolis police officer. He partnered with the Lake Street Council, specifically, and will match donations up to $100,000. In addition, the Wild and the NHL each donated $50,000 to Dumba's initiative to help rebuild Lake Street.

He also is actively involved in the newly created Hockey Diversity Alliance, an independent organization started by minorities who play professional hockey. In that, he has been joined by San Jose winger Evander Kane and former NHL player Akim Aliu, who will serve as the co-heads, and an executive committee that includes Detroit defenseman Trevor Daley, Buffalo winger Wayne Simmonds, Philadelphia winger Chris Stewart and recently retired NHL player Joel Ward. The mission of the coalition is to eradicate racism and intolerance across the sport.

Dumba is actively involved in other organizations, too, including Athletes Committed to Educating Students (ACES). He has been a mentor for the past few years, committed to bettering the lives of youth in the Twin Cities community. He also donated $5,000 to ACES during Give to the Max Day this year and made an additional donation to families impacted by COVID-19.

Wild defenseman Matt Dumba nominated for King Clancy Memorial Trophy

The finalists for the King Clancy Memorial Trophy will be announced in early August and the winner will be revealed during the conference finals. The winner will receive a $25,000 donation to benefit a charity or charities of his choosing.

SOUCY EXCITED

No player benefited from the shutdown more than Wild defenseman Carson Soucy. After dealing with a nagging wrist injury a few months ago, he has fully recovered heading into the restart.

"It's definitely exciting that we have this chance to finish what we started," he said. "Just knowing that I get a chance to finish this season and we have a chance to make a run in the playoffs here is exciting."

Even more exciting for Soucy is the fact he undoubtedly will slot into the bottom pairing on a regular basis. That has pretty much been set in stone with fellow defenseman Greg Pateryn out indefinitely.

Wild goaltender Devan Dubnyk vows to return better next season Was that the final game for Wild captain Mikko Koivu? 'It's still too early' Five Wild storylines heading into a pivotal offseason Wild's season ends abruptly as Canucks score 11 seconds into overtime Wild star Kevin Fiala laments 'stupid penalties' in Game 3

"It's been a long time off for everyone," Soucy said. "Just to get that comfortability and that timing back for the first game. Just trying to get comfortable playing with (Brad Hunt) again. Hopefully we pick up right where we left off when the team was rolling toward the end of the season."

KAPRIZOV UPDATE

It's still unclear when exactly top prospect Kirill Kaprizov will arrive in Edmonton.

While the Wild were forced to leave an open spot for him in their 52-member traveling roster, Kaprizov still hadn't arrived as of Tuesday afternoon.

Asked regularly about Kaprizov's situation over the past week, coach Dean Evason has provided few details.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Police say 'Umbrella Man' aimed to incite violence

ARTICLE MCCCLXX.

POLICE SAY 'UMBRELLA MAN' AIMED TO INCITE VIOLENCE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1167 wordsByline: LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

A masked man who was seen in a viral video smashing the windows of a south Minneapolis auto parts store during the George Floyd protests, earning him the moniker "Umbrella Man," is suspected of ties with a white supremacist group and sought to incite racial tension, police said.

A Minneapolis police arson investigator said the act of vandalism at the AutoZone on E. Lake Street helped spark a chain reaction that led to days of looting and rioting. The store was among dozens of buildings across the city that burned to the ground in the days that followed.

"This was the first fire that set off a string of fires and looting throughout the precinct and the rest of the city," Sgt. Erika Christensen wrote in a search warrant affidavit filed in court this week. "Until the actions of the person your affiant has been calling 'Umbrella Man,' the protests had been relatively peaceful. The actions of this person created an atmosphere of hostility and tension. Your affiant believes that this individual's sole aim was to incite violence."

Police identified "Umbrella Man" thanks to a tip that came via e-mail last week, Christensen said.

The Star Tribune could not independently verify the police account, which has so far only surfaced in the search warrant, and isn't naming the man because so far he has not been charged with a crime. The man, who has a criminal history that includes convictions of domestic violence and assault, did not respond to messages seeking comment. Spokespersons for the Minneapolis Police Department and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, which is also involved in the investigation, declined to comment.

Floyd's death under the knee of a since-fired police officer set off protests that spread around the world and stirred widespread reckoning over racial injustice. Derek Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder and manslaughter, and three of his former colleagues also at the scene, J. Alexander Kueng, Thomas Lane and Tou Thao, have been charged with aiding and abetting Chauvin.

Police say 'Umbrella Man' aimed to incite violence

At least two people died in the subsequent riots, which eventually spread as far as north Minneapolis and South St. Paul, and caused roughly $500 million in damage. Authorities have since charged a handful of people with arson-related crimes.

A widely shared livestream video from May 27 - two days after Floyd's death - showed the man walking casually along the front of the former site of AutoZone at E. Lake Street and Minnehaha, breaking out its windows with a 4-pound sledgehammer, prompting some protesters to confront him and demand that he stop. Before that, police say, the man, clad head to toe in black and carrying a black umbrella, had spray-painted "free [expletive] for everyone zone" on the double front doors.

At the time, activists seized on the footage as proof that outside "provocateurs" were trying to derail what had been a mostly peaceful demonstration. But others on social media pointed out that at least some looting had gone on before the video surfaced.

Christensen wrote in the affidavit that she watched "innumerable hours" of videos on social media platforms to try to identify "Umbrella Man," to no avail. Investigators finally caught a break when a tipster e-mailed the MPD identifying him as a member of the Hells Angels biker gang who "wanted to sow discord and racial unrest by breaking out the windows and writing what he did on the double red doors," she wrote.

Police have also connected the 32-year-old man to a widely publicized incident in Stillwater late last month, in which a Muslim woman was confronted by men wearing white supremacist garb.

A subsequent investigation revealed the man was also an associate of the Aryan Cowboy Brotherhood, a small white supremacist prison and street gang based primarily in Minnesota and Kentucky. Several of its members were also present at the Stillwater incident.

Andy Shoemaker, a former St. Paul police officer who has investigated criminal motorcycle gangs, said the Aryan Cowboys are relatively new with loyalties to the Hells Angels, who operate across the state.

"They're another group that's basically a farm system, a minor league for the Hells Angels," he said, adding the Angels occasionally recruit members from some of these offshoot clubs.

The weeks that followed Floyd's death brought dozens of reports of racially motivated assaults against minorities and minority-owned businesses.

Leaked intelligence briefings show that federal authorities were monitoring the movements and online activity of white nationalists and other extremist groups that descended on the city during the riots. The president of the Hells Angels summoned 75 members of the Aryan Cowboy Brotherhood to the help protect the club's headquarters in north Minneapolis, according to an intelligence memo, which surfaced in June as part of a massive trove of leaked law enforcement documents dubbed "Blue Leaks." A club member later posted a warning to protesters on Facebook saying that while the Angels agreed with the anti-law enforcement message, any protests that reached the clubhouse or "any of our neighborhoods" would be "met with a very unfriendly welcome party."

Another leaked memo suggested that local biker gangs were taking advantage of the unrest to step up their drug trafficking in the metro area, and that bikers "associated with white racially motivated violent extremists" had discussed inciting riots while posing as members of the anti-fascist group Antifa. It wasn't immediately clear from the leaked materials whether any of these threats materialized.

Police say 'Umbrella Man' aimed to incite violence

After the protests began, footage of "Umbrella Man" roared around social media, prompting speculation about the man's identity. One persistent rumor argued "Umbrella Man" was an undercover St. Paul police officer seeking to incite violence, a claim apparently based on a tweet citing information from a woman who claimed to have once been married to the officer.

In response, St. Paul police released time-stamped surveillance videos showing that the officer was in St. Paul at the time of the incident, and Police Chief Todd Axtell released a statement scolding social media users for spreading misinformation that could "jeopardize the officer's reputation and safety and chip away at the trust this police department has worked so hard to build with its community."

Justin Terrell, executive director of the Council for Minnesotans of African Heritage, said conversations around Floyd's death and the ensuing riots are important, but they often fail to account for the persistence of structural racism.

"I think at the end of the day, we need to start dealing with those issues, because I think this 'Umbrella Man,' he is a rotten piece of fruit at the farthest branch of the tree, [but] we've gotta get to the roots," Terrell said. "I think we have to do the work to get there, which America has never done, and Minnesota sure hasn't."

Staff writer Chao Xiong contributed to this report.

Libor Jany · 612-673-4064

Twitter: @StribJany

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCLXXI.

JAMELLE BOUIE: TRUMP DOESN'T SPEAK FOR THE 'SILENT MAJORITY'

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1144 wordsByline: Jamelle Bouie

Highlight: President Donald Trump believes he represents the "silent majority" of the country against a dangerous, radical minority. He says as much on Twitter, frequently yelling "SILENT MAJORITY" at his followers. Accordingly, his campaign for reelection has tried to appeal to this "majority" with displays tailored to its perceived interests. Because Trump believes that this silent [...]

Body

President Donald Trump believes he represents the "silent majority" of the country against a dangerous, radical minority. He says as much on Twitter, frequently yelling "SILENT MAJORITY" at his followers. Accordingly, his campaign for reelection has tried to appeal to this "majority" with displays tailored to its perceived interests.

Because Trump believes that this silent majority is protective of Confederate statues and other monuments, he marked Independence Day with a speech on July 3 denouncing "angry mobs" for "defacing our most sacred memorials" and "unleashing a wave of violent crime in our cities." Because he also believes that this silent majority fears integration and diversity, he has issued constant warnings to the "suburban housewives of America" that Joe Biden, the former vice president who is his opponent in the election, will destroy their neighborhoods with affordable housing. "People have worked all their lives to get into a community, and now they're going to watch it go to hell," he said last week. And because he believes that this silent majority is hostile to protests against police brutality, he has deployed federal law enforcement officers to Portland and other cities to suppress "anarchists" and generate "law-and-order" images for his campaign.

Unfortunately for Trump, there's quite a bit of distance between his perception and our reality. Most Americans support efforts to remove Confederate statues and monuments; most Americans welcome racial and ethnic diversity and few believe their communities should be less diverse; and most Americans are supportive of the Black Lives Matter movement and protests against police brutality - 67%, according to the Pew Research Center.

There is a silent majority in this country, and it is arrayed against a radical, extremist minority. But it stands against Trump, not the other way around. He and his allies are and always have been in the minority, acting in ways that frighten and disturb the broad middle of the electorate. And as long as

Jamelle Bouie: Trump doesn't speak for the 'silent majority'

Trump cannot see this - as long as he holds to his belief in a secret, silent pro-Trump majority - he and his campaign will continue to act in ways that diminish his chance of any legitimate victory in the 2020 presidential election.

It's worth unpacking the phrase "silent majority." It dates back to a speech given in late 1969 by Richard Nixon defending the Vietnam War at a moment when anti-war sentiment was on the rise. "As president of the United States," Nixon said, "I would be untrue to my oath of office if I allowed the policy of this nation to be dictated by the minority who holds that point of view and who try to impose it on the nation by mounting demonstrations on the street." He continued: "And so tonight, to you, the great silent majority, my fellow Americans, I ask for your support."

Nixon's basic view of American politics was that the country was divided between a disruptive, countercultural left (enabled by feckless, liberal elites) and a broad middle of Americans who craved order and stability. Less than a month before that speech, he convened a secret group he called the "Middle America Committee," tasked with reaching a "large and politically powerful white middle class" that is "deeply troubled, primarily over the erosion of what they consider to be their values." These Americans, in the view of the committee, felt that they had "lost control of a complicated and impersonal society which oppresses them with high taxes, spiraling inflation and enforced integration."

Nixon identified with that middle - he spoke directly to its fears and anxieties about race, crime and rapid cultural change, as well as its resentments toward those groups (like the Black Power or women's liberation movement) that might try to overturn the existing social order.

And he could do this, in part, because the "the great silent majority" within Middle America shared a similar position in the social and economic landscape of the country. They were nearly all white (of varying ethnic origins); some were college-educated but the vast majority were not; they had left the cities for the suburbs, part of the "white flight" that transformed the built environment of the country.

The silent majority of 1969 was a singular grouping of Americans. The silent majority of 2020 is not. It is diverse, made up of many millions of Black, Hispanic and Asian Americans as well as whites. It is still largely working and middle-class, and it still lives in the suburbs, but those suburbs are also more diverse and heterogeneous. This "silent majority" isn't as worried about crime and disorder - violent crime is still near a 30-year-low - but it is concerned with economic security and the rising cost of housing, health care and education. Faced with protests against police brutality, this "silent majority" wants reform and sees racism as a serious problem for the country. And in the midst of a deadly pandemic, it wants the federal government to take control and manage the crisis as best as it can, rather than try to wish it away.

What the silent majority doesn't want are spectacles like the crackdown in Lafayette Square or the current operation in Portland. What it doesn't want are endless displays of cruelty for its own sake. Although this silent majority has no uniform view of how to handle issues like immigration, it stands against the hostile rhetoric and draconian policies of the present administration.

To Trump and his allies, the country is filled with "shy" supporters just waiting for the right time to reveal themselves; they think they can rally this public to their side with a violent demonstration of "law and order." They think they can run the Nixon playbook again, not realizing that to the broad middle of the country, they are the ones who represent the politics of division, disruption and disorder.

Jamelle Bouie: Trump doesn't speak for the 'silent majority'

Or maybe they do realize it. Last week, Trump issued a memorandum directing Wilbur Ross, the commerce secretary, who oversees the Census Bureau, to exclude immigrants in the country illegally from the final report for the purposes of apportionment in the House of Representatives. Like last year's blocked attempt to add a citizenship question to the census, this would reduce representation for states and localities with heavy immigrant populations - legal or otherwise - shifting power to more rural, more white, more Republican areas of the country.

This is not the move of a president who believes his party holds a majority of the country. It is the move of a president who knows he is in the minority, who knows his coalition cannot win a fair fight for future political power.

The silent majority of the country is against Trump, his allies and his would-be successors. He is trying to build a world where that doesn't actually matter.

Jamelle Bouie writes a column for the New York Times.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCCLXXII.

TWINS' BYRON BUXTON RETURNS TO LINEUP

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 539 wordsByline: Betsy Helfand

Highlight: Byron Buxton is back. Just over two weeks after spraining his left foot, the Twins' center fielder returned to make his 2020 debut on Tuesday night during the team's home opener at Target Field. Buxton had made the trip to Chicago on his own and was with the team on Opening Day, but he returned [...]

Body

Byron Buxton is back.

Just over two weeks after spraining his left foot, the Twins' center fielder returned to make his 2020 debut on Tuesday night during the team's home opener at Target Field.

Buxton had made the trip to Chicago on his own and was with the team on Opening Day, but he returned to Minnesota ahead of his teammates to continue getting at-bats and workouts in with the group training in St. Paul.

"The energy that we always talk about when he's out there and patrolling center field and doing his thing, and getting on base and making things happen - it's a big pick-me-up for guys," manager Rocco Baldelli said. "Sometimes it's hard to put your thumb exactly on why that is, why certain players have that. But one thing we know and anyone knows that's spent time with Buck, played with him, coached him, is that he has it."

Buxton, always an elite defender, was having his best career year offensively in 2019 before a shoulder injury and subsequent surgery cut his season short. The Twins know how important a healthy Buxton is to their lineup and since he missed much of camp, Baldelli said they will assess him after the game to determine his playing schedule.

"We will probably treat this first week a little bit differently than you normally would in the middle of a long season," Baldelli said. "We'll evaluate him continuously and keep talking with him."

BIG HEADS

Missing Target Field? Want to come watch a Twins game?

Twins' Byron Buxton returns to lineup

While the Twins can't let actual fans into the stands at this point, they've come up with a new plan to let fans into the park: Fans can buy a "big head," (a picture of their face) to be placed in the lower-level seats.

The Twins began their season with "big heads," of Twins legends, from Rod Carew to Kirby Puckett to Torii Hunter and beyond, behind home plate. For $80, fans can purchase a 2.5-foot "big head" of their own. The offer is available to season-ticket holders for half off.

Each "big head," will be given back to fans after the season ends. The cutouts are limited in quantity.

GORDON UPDATE

Nick Gordon, the Twins' first-round draft pick in 2014, still has not reported to the Twins' alternate site camp in St. Paul after testing positive for COVID-19.

Gordon, who president of baseball operations Derek Falvey said had been showing symptoms, is now feeling fine but still has not been cleared to rejoin his teammates.

"There are some protocols as to when you would test and subsequently test from an onset of symptoms and then from whenever symptoms do stop, so he's in that protocol," Falvey said. "Our doctors and medical staff are taking care of him."

BRIEFLY

The Twins honored former minor leaguer Ryan Costello, who passed away this offseason, COVID-19 victims and George Floyd, among others, during their pregame ceremony. ... New elements in the ballpark include coverings so players can social distance instead of sitting in dugouts, advertising on outfield seats and signage that reads, "Justice for George Floyd," and "Black Lives Matter. United for Change." ... Tuesday marked the beginning of a stretch where the Twins will play 36 games in 37 days. ... Miles Mikolas, the Cardinals' scheduled starter for Wednesday will miss the rest of the season and undergo forearm surgery.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCLXXIII.

EX-MINNEAPOLIS COP ARGUES FOR DROPPED CHARGES IN FLOYD DEATH

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 271 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: A second former Minneapolis police officer charged in the death of George Floyd will seek to have the charges against him dismissed.

Body

A second former Minneapolis police officer charged in the death of George Floyd will seek to have the charges against him dismissed.

Defense attorney Robert Paule filed a motion Wednesday saying Tou Thao will ask the judge to dismiss the charges at a hearing on Sept. 11. An attorney for former officer Thomas Lane, Earl Gray, also has filed a motion saying he will argue to dismiss the charges against his client.

Paule said he will argue that the charges against Thao are not supported by probable cause. Prosecutors must prove that Thao knew former officer Derek Chauvin and others were going to commit a crime and "intended his presence or actions to further the commission of that crime," Paule said in his motion.

Paule said Thao's body camera video will show the lack of probable cause. Thao, 34, was seen in cellphone video standing near a crowd of bystanders as Chauvin pressed his knee to Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes on May 25 even after Floyd, who was Black, pleaded for air.

Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and manslaughter. Thao, Lane and another officer, J. Kueng, are charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and manslaughter. All four officers were fired. Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Graphic

Ex-Minneapolis cop argues for dropped charges in Floyd death

Tou Thao. (Courtesy of the Hennepin County Sheriff's Office)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCCLXXIV. TWINS AVOID COVID COMPLACENCY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 7CLength: 608 wordsByline: PHIL MILLER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The Twins on Tuesday received results of their first COVID-19 tests since returning from Chicago, and all were negative. That's both a relief and an affirmation, especially in light of the Miami Marlins' 17 positive tests this weekend that already have put Major League Baseball's nine-week pandemic season in jeopardy.

"Proud probably is the right word. I think our guys from the get-go have taken this really seriously," Twins President of Baseball Operations Derek Falvey said. "We've gone through a travel trip, we've gone through some exposure in another location outside of here at Target Field, and so far, so good. Now we need to continue to be vigilant, though. We can't become complacent."

Even the strictest rules, the most vigorous enforcement, however, can be foiled by a highly contagious virus, which the Twins understand. "Obviously we've seen that now, what is possible and what could happen," manager Rocco Baldelli said. "So far, we've been fortunate. [The road trip] turned out OK for us. Doesn't mean that things couldn't change, but that's why we stay vigilant."

The Marlins' positive tests in Philadelphia will keep the team idle for at least a week, and forced shuffling of other teams' schedules as well. So far, MLB intends to continue playing, but further outbreaks could imperil those plans.

"I'm certainly concerned. ... I'm concerned first and foremost for the health of all their players and staff," Falvey said. "We need to take a step back, learn from what transpired, what we can gather from travel protocols."

Gordon still out

Twins 2014 first-round draft pick Nick Gordon suffered some symptoms of the coronavirus after testing positive early this month, and he has not yet been cleared to take part in the team's daily extra-player workouts in St. Paul.

Twins avoid COVID complacency

Gordon, brother of Mariners infielder Dee Gordon, tested positive at his Florida home and never reported to Twins' summer training camp. He has recovered and is feeling good again, but has yet to fulfill the two-negative-tests requirement to take part in workouts, Falvey said. Is there a chance, given that the season is only nine weeks long, that Gordon, might be told not to report?

"It may come to that, but we're not there yet," Falvey said. "... We're still planning on having him here."

Long stretch begins

Tuesday's home opener is the first of a stretch of 36 scheduled games in 37 days for the Twins, a daunting stretch that closer Taylor Rogers said the team is built for.

"It gives us a little bit of ease mentally," Rogers said, citing the trio of backup starting pitchers on the current roster. "Similarly with our position players, Marwin [Gonzalez] is a huge advantage to have - letting him play every position and give each guy a day off here and there. Jake Cave has been playing well to start the year, to give the guys in the outfield a day off."

Added Baldelli: "We're as prepared as you could possibly be. MLB gave us all a good leg to stand on with the expanded [30-player] rosters, which really does help. I would say that 36 games in 37 days is daunting if you look at it like that, but frankly, if you start looking ahead too far, you can go astray. Our guys know, we worry about today, we focus on today."

Justice for Floyd

The Twins debuted several new looks at Target Field, most notably a "Justice for George Floyd" sign on the right field wall that will remain there all season. A moment of silence was held at 8:46 p.m. in Floyd's memory, timed to reflect the 8 minutes, 46 seconds that a Minneapolis police officer knelt on his neck.

Near the memorial to George is another new sign on the outfield wall: Black Lives Matter / United for Change.

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCLXXV. MINNEAPOLIS PANEL REJECTS REFERENDUM ON ELIMINATING MINIMUM POLICE STAFFING REQUIREMENT

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 406 wordsByline: Jeff BaenenHighlight: The Minneapolis Charter Commission on Wednesday rejected sending voters a referendum on eliminating a minimum staffing requirement in the city police department. The 15-member commission voted 8-6 against putting the proposal on the November ballot, with one member absent. The proposal was an alternative to a more aggressive change in the city charter that would [...]Body

The Minneapolis Charter Commission on Wednesday rejected sending voters a referendum on eliminating a minimum staffing requirement in the city police department.

The 15-member commission voted 8-6 against putting the proposal on the November ballot, with one member absent. The proposal was an alternative to a more aggressive change in the city charter that would lead to dismantling the Minneapolis Police Department in the wake of George Floyd's death.

Commissioner Greg Abbott said removing the 60-year-old provision in the charter that requires a minimum police force based on Minneapolis' population would be a first step toward police reform and would remove the charter as a barrier.

"It removes a mistake," said Abbott, who voted for putting the amendment on the ballot.

But opponents said the commission was moving too fast on the recently proposed amendment and that it could wait until 2021. They also argued that some neighborhoods in Minneapolis were seeing a spike in crime and that the city needs a strong police force.

Commissioner Dan Cohen said he believes if Minneapolis voters approved either amendment, the result would be "a giant self-inflicted wound."

"Crime would soar. Property values on our homes would fall. Residents both Black and white would flee the city. Businesses would close, and leave," Cohen said. "All to punish the many, the decent cops, for the horrific actions of the few in taking the life of George Floyd."

Floyd, a handcuffed Black man, died May 25 after a white Minneapolis police officer pressed his knee against Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes. Floyd's death sparked protests around the world.

Minneapolis panel rejects referendum on eliminating minimum police staffing requirement

The commission did not take up the proposal by the Minneapolis City Council to abolish the Police Department and replace it with a new agency, the Department of Community Safety and Violence Prevention. Last month the City Council unanimously advanced the proposal to change the city's charter, or constitution. Voters would need to approve the amendment.

The charter commission meets again on Aug. 5.

Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

BARRIER-BREAKING JUDGE FACES BIG CHALLENGES

ARTICLE MCCCLXXVI.

BARRIER-BREAKING JUDGE FACES BIG CHALLENGES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 948 wordsByline: ROCHELLE OLSON; CHAO XIONG; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Barnette takes the helm at an unprecedented moment for Hennepin CountyBody

Hennepin County Chief Judge Toddrick Barnette was in his second year of law school at the University of Minnesota when a client insisted on speaking to him alone, away from the professor overseeing his work at the school's clinic.

Barnette had doubts about staying in law school after his first year buried in books. But when the client, who was Black, wanted advice from him, an inexperienced Black student, and not the white professor, his desire to be an advocate was cemented.

"Even though you're in law school and he knows it, he's trusting you to handle it," Barnette said.

Now 54, the veteran public defender, prosecutor and judge has begun a two-year tenure as the chief judge of Hennepin County, making him the first person of color to hold the post. He takes the helm during unprecedented upheaval, facing the challenges of COVID-19 and a global racial reckoning sparked by the death of George Floyd, a Black man killed by four former Minneapolis police officers.

"He walked into a job with more on his table than probably any other chief in ... decades, if not ever," said his longtime friend, Ramsey County District Judge JaPaul Harris.

Barnette will oversee the state's busiest judicial district, which has a maximum of 63 judges and saw 460,000 cases last year. He took over July 1 and he understands the moment.

"This is the time for us to really understand what our role is and what the community needs is to walk in here and feel like they're being heard," Barnette said, adding that "Black Lives Matter" is not complicated. "It's: Treat me like a person," he said. "Treat me like that person over there."

Barnette said he will push for more diversity in hiring.

"People at the counter should see people who look like them," he said.

BARRIER-BREAKING JUDGE FACES BIG CHALLENGES

Barnette will oversee the legal machinations leading up to and eventually the trial of the former officers charged in Floyd's death outside Cup Foods on May 25. He's made it a point to be present at every hearing to troubleshoot logistics so that judges, attorneys, court staff, defendants, news media and the public experience as few disruptions as possible.

He appointed a longtime colleague - Judge Peter Cahill - to preside over the cases. Cahill was the chief deputy in the Hennepin County Attorney's Office in 2004 and recruited Barnette from the public defender's office to work for the county attorney. Cahill said Barnette had the qualities he was looking for: "good demeanor, good work ethic and good judgment."

Harris, who is Black, got to know Barnette about 10 years ago, and said his election as chief judge was a long time coming. "It's important to have Black and brown voices at the leadership table," Harris said.

There are 17 Black judges in the state, Harris said, adding that they face the challenge of shouldering the expectations of the Black community while navigating misperceptions in the workplace.

"It's a duality," he said. "You're trying to make sure that you continue to represent and speak to the concerns of the [Black] community, and do that in a way that you can also be an effective judge."

Barnette, a native of Washington, D.C., was raised by a single mother and his grandmother. His father was in federal prison in Sandstone for much of his youth. "As a public defender, the people that I saw were like the people in my family, just a different name, a different state," Barnette said.

The judge met his wife, Gretchen Hoffman, when they were law clerks in the Hennepin County Public Defender's Office, where she still works. They have two minor children.

Barnette served two years in the County Attorney's Office before then-Gov. Tim Pawlenty appointed him to the bench in 2006.

His law professor Steve Simon, who oversaw his clinic work and was passed up by the client who confided in Barnette, said he has the people skills to manage egos in the courtroom. "Todd is a mensch with sechel," he said, using Yiddish to describe wisdom, integrity and common sense.

Barnette has handled high-profile cases, including the murder trial of a 21-year-old in the random shooting of a bystander near Block E in 2006, and the trial of a man who was convicted of killing three people at a Brooklyn Park home day care in 2012.

His work goes beyond the courtroom. For the last 15 years he has been a mentor to students at the University of St. Thomas School of Law, where for the past three years he's been an adjunct professor.

Assistant Hennepin County Attorney Jabari Barner was a second-year law student at St. Thomas when he e-mailed Barnette an invitation to the Black Law Students Association's annual event.

Barnette couldn't attend, but he hired Barner for a two-year clerkship in his office and invited him to family Christmas parties. "He's a consummate professional and somebody I look up to," Barner said.

As Barnette's clerk from 2014 to 2016, Barner saw the judge run a friendly yet professional workplace.

Barnette was "always smiling, always has a positive attitude," Barner said. "But when it comes down to business ... he can turn it on."

BARRIER-BREAKING JUDGE FACES BIG CHALLENGES

Before Barnette came to Minnesota for law school, his connection to the state was the occasional childhood trips to Sandstone's federal prison to visit his father. His chambers at the Hennepin County courthouse reflect someone now rooted in the community: He displays the nameplates of many retired colleagues, and their pictures intermingle with pictures of his family, friends and former clients.

No one needs to see diplomas or certificates, Barnette said.

"If the changes that we need to make in our system are going to happen," he said, "why not have me at the forefront for criticism or success?"

rochelle.olson@startribune.com 612-673-1747

chao.xiong@startribune.com 612-270-4708

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

End of Document

Forget analytics, aesthetic Arraez should hit leadoff

ARTICLE MCCCLXXVII.

FORGET ANALYTICS, AESTHETIC ARRAEZ SHOULD HIT LEADOFF

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 1C

Length: 677 words

Byline: JIM SOUHAN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

Before the first pitch of their home opener, the Twins hit all of the right notes, honoring former members of the organization and big-league luminaries who had passed, saluting front-line workers and paying homage to George Floyd and Black Lives Matter.

The Twins made only two mistakes. They had two military planes conduct a flyover ... of an empty ballpark.

And they didn't bat Luis Arraez leadoff.

The modern Twins brain trust is not easy to second-guess. The front office has built an elaborate and well-staffed analytics department. The manager, Rocco Baldelli, won 101 games in his rookie season and was named American League Manager of the Year.

After the Twins beat the Cardinals 6-3 on Tuesday night, Baldelli's record as a big-league manager is 104-62.

When devising a lineup, Baldelli considers player comfort, analytics, deep analytics, deeper analytics and at least three Ouija boards. So I'm not saying Baldelli is wrong to bat Arraez seventh in the lineup - just that even supercomputers need tuneups once in a while.

I'd bat Arraez leadoff every game, for the rest of his Twins career.

Tuesday, in the smallest of sample sizes, Arraez offered a demonstration of his unique leadoff skills, including savvy, attitude, combativeness and bat control.

He led off the bottom of the second. The Twins had threatened but not scored in the first. Cardinals starter Carlos Martinez started Arraez with a fastball for a strike.

Forget analytics, aesthetic Arraez should hit leadoff

Seven pitches later, Arraez, having worked the count full, blooped a single to right. He scored on Byron Buxton's grounder to third, sliding headfirst across the plate to beat a throw home from shortstop Paul DeJong.

That's what a leadoff hitter should do, even in the age of home-run records and bouncy baseballs.

Baldelli has favored Max Kepler and Mitch Garver as his leadoff hitter, and both have produced. That's why lineup debates aren't all that consequential. If the manager gets his best hitters the most at-bats, he's doing his job. And last year Kepler and Garver were the two Twins who greatly exceeded power expectations.

Player comfort matters, and Kepler hit a career-best 36 homers last year while looking quite comfortable in the leadoff spot.

But even in the launch-angle era, there remains value in a leadoff hitter who wears down pitchers and gets on base. Last year, Arraez had the best on-base percentage of any Twins regular, at .399. Kepler's was .336. Garver's was .365.

And if your lineup is stacked with power hitters, why not let your best on-base performer get on base before the homers fly?

"It's definitely something that we've talked about," Baldelli said. "We spend a lot of time discussing our lineup, and we do it as a group sometimes, we get everyone together.

"There are a lot of people who would be in favor of seeing him at the top and watching him do his thing.

"The guy has tremendous at-bats. Luis does everything right in the batter's box, and he has since the first day he got here. That being said, Max Kepler also is a fantastic option to bat leadoff."

The only consensus necessities in the lineup are having Nelson Cruz and Josh Donaldson bat somewhere in the first four slots.

My favored lineup, when facing a righthanded pitcher, would be: Arraez (lefthanded hitter), Donaldson (righthanded), Polanco (switch hitter), Cruz (RH), Kepler (LH), Garver (RH), Sano (RH), Rosario (LH) and Buxton (RH).

Of course, with Kepler and Garver batting leadoff last year the Twins set a big-league record for home runs, and there is some comfort in the ability to take a 1-0 lead after one batter.

"It's refreshing to see," Donaldson said. "I've been on some teams that have strictly relied on the home-run ball. This team has the ability to do that. We also have the ability to create some runs without just the home-run ball."

Even if the deepest analytics disagree, Arraez should bat leadoff for the sake of aesthetics. No Twin stages a drama in the batter's box quite the way Arraez does, with attitude and style.

Jim Souhan's podcast can be heard at TalkNorth.com. On Twitter: @SouhanStrib.
jsouhan@startribune.com

Forget analytics, aesthetic Arraez should hit leadoff

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

End of Document

Take me out near the ballgame

ARTICLE MCCCCLXXVIII. TAKE ME OUT NEAR THE BALLGAME

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 773 wordsByline: ROCHELLE OLSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: For a few fans, just being close to the home opener was worth the trip.Body

A tiny crew of cheerfully dedicated Twins fans showed up Tuesday at Target Field for the 2020 home opener - despite being locked out of the ballpark because of the pandemic.

Two hours before the 7:10 p.m. game time, Luke Widbin and Nathan Heerts had front-row seats with no view of the game.

"We're going to stay here as long as we legally can," said Widbin, a 31-year-old baseball coach at Northwestern University-St. Paul, who popped open a portable chair along with former Northwestern pitcher Heerts, 25, of Minneapolis.

They set their chairs outside the metal gates surrounding shuttered Gate 34, Target Field's downtown-facing entrance near the fan-favorite catcher's mitt sculpture. Translucent images of Twins players wrapped the gates, blocking a clear view of the field.

In a normal year, the Twins would have played their first home game in late March or early April. The ballpark plaza would have been buzzing with fans in knit caps and jackets buoyed by baseball's promise of spring, summer and a pennant race. They would have arrived around midday to eat and drink in bars surrounding the ballpark.

But this is not a normal year and there was only a trickle of fans in downtown Minneapolis taking in the opener. Many popular bars were shuttered. Gluek's had a "Black Lives Matter" board across its door and a "Rest in Power George Floyd" sign on the big front window. Kieran's Irish Pub patio on Block E, normally spilling over with fans on big game nights, was closed.

As people work from home during the pandemic, downtown Minneapolis is a much quieter place these days, and the ghost-town feel carried over into Tuesday night. Not only did COVID-19 force Major League Baseball to delay its opening until last week, the 60-game season carries the caveat that fans can't watch the game at the ballpark.

Take me out near the ballgame

The LED sign above the closed Twins ticket windows encouraged fans to "stay home when able," and to "wear a mask."

Just before the start of the game, the crowd outside the gate had swelled to about two dozen. On a grassy area near the Target Field LRT station, about 40 people were waiting to watch the game on a big screen.

Listening for the bats

But some fans weren't entirely dissuaded.

Tony Voda, a 36-year-old reinsurance analyst from Plymouth, put on a Twins cap, face mask and T-shirt and biked down to Target Field.

"Me and a buddy have gone to every home opener since 2010. So we're meeting here, then watching the game at home," he said.

Voda noted the contrast with the "party atmosphere" of Target Field's 10 previous openers.

"It's not [a party], which is also a good thing because everyone's taking it seriously," he said, referring to the pandemic.

Greg Rotunda, who wore a Brad Radke jersey and a Twins cap, drove in from Carver with wife Christy and three kids, Morgan, 11, Cameron, 9, and Teagan, 6, to also keep his opening-day streak alive.

"I just wanted to come down to say I was here at some point during the day," Rotunda said, adding that he, too, has been to every Target Field home opener.

He looked around and pondered the moment. "It's weird. It's different," he said. "It's nice that they're playing again but it is kind of sad to have an opening day and not be able to go to the game."

Nearby, Emily Clausman stood in her whimsical hot dog headpiece to record a video for her social media page.

"I'm a super fan but I would never want baseball at the expense of anyone's health or life," she said. "Today is just another reminder we're in this together."

Season-ticket holders Rick and Ronna Gerber of Circle Pines had purchased more-expensive seats this year that were closer to the field. They drove in hours before game time to load up on new caps and shirts with their son Erik, who was visiting from Riverside, Calif. They planned to pick up dinner and gather at home to watch the game with other family members.

"It makes me sadder now that I'm down here," Rick Gerber said. "We should be sitting in there on a nice summer night watching the game."

From outside Target Field, there was no clear view into the ballpark.

But hours before game time, bats could be heard hitting balls during practice, just what the coach and his former pitcher were hoping for.

Take me out near the ballgame

"Maybe we'll at least hear some of the sounds and we'll just enjoy a nice night," said Widbin, who was wearing the cap of the Twins' opponent this evening, the St. Louis Cardinals. Widbin said the Twins and Cards are his two favorite teams.

Heerts, a full-on Twins fan, was relaxed despite the obstructed view of the field. "We'll listen to it on the radio and experience it as best we can," he said.

Rochelle Olson · 612-673-1747

Twitter: @rochelleolson

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCLXXIX.

2 WOMEN CHARGED WITH BEATING WISCONSIN STATE SENATOR DURING MADISON PROTESTS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 365 wordsByline: The Associated Press

Highlight: MADISON, Wis. - Prosecutors on Wednesday charged two women, including a high school social worker, with attacking a Wisconsin state senator during a chaotic night of violence outside the state Capitol last month. Kerida O'Reilly, 33, and Samantha Hamer, 26, were each charged with one count of being a party to substantial battery, a felony [...]

Body

MADISON, Wis. - Prosecutors on Wednesday charged two women, including a high school social worker, with attacking a Wisconsin state senator during a chaotic night of violence outside the state Capitol last month.

Kerida O'Reilly, 33, and Samantha Hamer, 26, were each charged with one count of being a party to substantial battery, a felony punishable by up to $10,000 in fines and three-and-a-half years in prison, online court records show.

Both women were arrested Monday after they turned themselves in to police. They were scheduled to make initial court appearances on Wednesday afternoon.

O'Reilly's attorney, Nathan Otis, said in an email to The Associated Press that it will become clear that she didn't commit any crime, and that the lack of evidence will become clear as the case progresses.

In a separate email to the AP, Hamer's attorney, Adam Welch, said his client is "absolutely not guilty" and that prosecutors' case against her "is shockingly thin."

Investigators believe the women attacked Democrat Tim Carpenter during June 23 protest outside the state Capitol, one of a series of protests in downtown Madison that took place after the May 25 death of George Floyd in Minneapolis.

The protest that night was sparked by the arrest of a Black man who shouted at downtown restaurant customers through a megaphone while carrying a baseball bat. Protesters also toppled two statues outside the Capitol and threw a Molotov cocktail into a government building.

Paramedics treated Carpenter, but he decided against going to the hospital.

2 women charged with beating Wisconsin state senator during Madison protests

O'Reilly is a physical therapist and Hamer is a social worker with the Mount Horeb School District. She was listed on the district's website as a resource for high school students and their families who need help dealing with emotional distress and other issues. The district placed Hamer on leave on Monday.

Wisconsin Dells water park closes for season after coronavirus sickens 2 employees GOP leader wants Wisconsin Senate to strike down mask order Wisconsin's Democratic governor endorses Biden for president Wisconsin Republicans 'stand ready' to kill governor's mask requirement Wisconsin governor orders masks statewide amid virus surge

Graphic

Kerida O'Reilly, left, and Samantha Hamer are shown in these two July 27, 2020, booking photos provided by the Dane County (Wisc.) Sheriff's Office. Prosecutors charged both women Wednesday, July 29, 2020, with battery in connection with an attack on Wisconsin state Sen. Tim Carpenter, during a protest against police racism outside the Wisconsin state Capitol in Madison, on June 23. (Dane County Sheriff's Office via AP)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ACLU sues over wounding of protesters in Minneapolis

ARTICLE MCCCLXXX.

ACLU SUES OVER WOUNDING OF PROTESTERS IN MINNEAPOLIS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 762 wordsByline: PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The lawsuit says officers often fired without warning, inflicted severe bruising and damage from tear gas.Body

Leading law enforcement figures in Minnesota were sued Tuesday on allegations that officers violated protesters' civil rights when they wounded them during the late-spring unrest in Minneapolis following the death of George Floyd while in police custody.

The suit filed in U.S. District Court in Minneapolis names as defendants Minneapolis Police Chief Medaria Arradondo, state Department of Public Safety (DPS) Commissioner John Harrington, State Patrol Col. Matthew Langer and Minneapolis Police Federation President Bob Kroll.

The suit filed by the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) and a Twin Cities law firm lists four Minneapolis plaintiffs - Nekima Levy Armstrong and husband Marques Armstrong, Terry Hempfling and Rachel Clark - but is requesting class-action status, which could lead to many more joining.

Messages were left for all the defendants late Tuesday morning seeking their response to the suit. None has addressed the specific allegations, but the DPS said in a statement that it "defends and supports citizens' constitutional right to First Amendment expression when exercised in a lawful and nonviolent manner."

This is at least the third federal lawsuit against law enforcement in connection with the protests. In early June, the ACLU sued seeking a temporary restraining order to prevent officer misconduct directed at the news media. The suit said officers threatened, assaulted and, in several cases, arrested members of the media, even after they identified themselves as journalists.

In mid-June, freelance journalist Linda Tirado alleged in her suit that officers blinded her in one eye with a nonlethal projectile fired at her despite her declaring in words and documentation that she was a member of the news media.

ACLU sues over wounding of protesters in Minneapolis

According to Tuesday's suit, Minneapolis police and the patrol used unnecessary and excessive force to suppress the free speech rights of protesters with tear gas, pepper spray, foam bullets and other devices.

The officers often fired without warning and inflicted injuries to the four named plaintiffs that remain two months later, the suit says, listing severe bruising and vocal difficulties from the tear gas as among the afflictions.

"No one should face tear gassing, foam bullets or pepper spray while exercising their right to peacefully protest," Teresa Nelson, legal director for the ACLU in Minnesota, said in a statement released in concert with the suit's filing. "That law enforcement here followed their typical pattern of using indiscriminate force rather than respecting the First Amendment, especially following the brutal murder of George Floyd by four of their own, is disgraceful and an affront to our Constitution."

Levy Armstrong, a civil rights lawyer and activist, added in her own statement: "As one of the protesters who was teargassed, I still feel the lingering effects of such a strong chemical agent. We are participating in the lawsuit to protect our First Amendment freedoms of speech and the right to peaceably assemble in protest."

The suit details what the Armstrongs say they endured while at the Third Precinct police station at E. Lake Street and S. Minnehaha Avenue on May 27 during their second day of protesting:

Early that evening, officers on the precinct roof sprayed tear gas into the crowd without warning that reached the Armstrongs while they were peacefully demonstrating.

Nekima Levy Armstrong felt tingling and burning in her throat and chest, while both struggled to breathe. Since that encounter, her voice has yet to return to normal, and she has had "lingering lung issues."

Hempfling was in the same area on the same day, the suit says, and was struck on the back of her right arm by "a rubber bullet and/or less-lethal munition fired by the MPD," according to the suit.

On May 29, a few hours after a statewide curfew went into effect, Hempfling and Clark were confronted by officers near the Fifth Precinct station at E. 31st Street and S. Nicollet Avenue. Within a minute or two of a dispersal order being issued, the Minneapolis police fired tear gas and nonlethal munitions at the women.

Hempfling was hit four times: twice on her back and once each on her breast and thigh. The bruising has remained for two months. Clark was hit on one arm, a hip and an ankle. Her bruises also have yet to heal.

The lawsuit seeks a declaration that this police conduct violated the First, Fourth and 14th amendments to the Constitution, an injunction against similar actions by law enforcement in the future and unspecified compensation for damages and attorneys' fees.

Paul Walsh · 612-673-4482

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

After pro-police billboards defaced with graffiti in Twin Cities, sponsors offer $10K reward

ARTICLE MCCCCLXXXI.

AFTER PRO-POLICE BILLBOARDS DEFACED WITH GRAFFITI IN TWIN CITIES, SPONSORS OFFER $10K REWARD

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 418 words

Byline: Mara H. Gottfried

Highlight: A handful of billboards in support of law enforcement have been vandalized in the Twin Cities, including one that was altered with graffiti in Minneapolis to say "Shoot Our Police" rather than "Support Our Police."

Body

A handful of billboards in support of law enforcement have been vandalized in the Twin Cities, including one that was altered with graffiti in Minneapolis to say "Shoot Our Police" rather than "Support Our Police."

The Center of the American Experiment is offering a $10,000 reward for information that leads to the prosecution and conviction of the person or people responsible, John Hinderaker, the president of the Golden Valley-based conservative-leaning think tank, said Tuesday.

The center launched a public awareness campaign last week, saying it is seeking "to inform Minnesotans of a dramatic increase in violent crime in the Twin Cities and give law enforcement supporters a voice in the public debate over the role of police in our communities."

The 38 billboards put up in the greater metro area include headlines from local media reports, such as, "Multiple shootings in metro area overnight." A billboard with that message in the area of Marshall and Snelling avenues in St. Paul was altered with graffiti to say "Multiple police shootings," and an expletive about police was added underneath.

A Center of the American Experiment staff member talked to an officer Tuesday to file a police report. The group is quickly replacing the vandalized billboards, Hinderaker said.

A poll of 500 registered Minnesota voters, commissioned by the center in June, found 85 percent have confidence in police. The organization posted a petition at SupportMNpolice.com and Hinderaker said thousands of people have signed it.

"We're hearing every day from many, many people who are appalled at these extreme leftists who are committing these acts of vandalism," he said.

After pro-police billboards defaced with graffiti in Twin Cities, sponsors offer $10K reward

Is the sentiment in the Twin Cities about policing different from what the center found in the poll elsewhere in Minnesota?

Hinderaker said the only places they "found any significant support for the idea of 'defunding' the police" - which has come up since the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody - was in Minneapolis and St. Paul.

"If you go into the suburbs, that is an overwhelmingly unpopular concept," he said.

North St. Paul man killed in crash after fleeing Dakota County sheriff's deputy Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Cleric assaulted outside Bloomington mosque; police searching for suspects U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities Minneapolis man sentenced to 33 years in prison for sex-trafficking young women and girls out of massage parlor

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

As caterer Chelles' Kitchen pauses for pandemic, Healthy Roots Institute sprouts in its place

ARTICLE MCCCLXXXII. AS CATERER CHELLES' KITCHEN PAUSES FOR PANDEMIC, HEALTHY ROOTS INSTITUTE SPROUTS IN ITS PLACE

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 618 words

Byline: Iain Carlos

Body

Chelles' Kitchen's main revenue source, catering for events, was decimated in March when Covid-19 struck.

Nonetheless, owner Lachelle Cunningham still had clients contacting her for delivery, hungry for the soul food fusion cuisine on which she'd built her reputation over the past decade. Perhaps delivery could keep her afloat during the pandemic.

Those hopes were crushed when the West Broadway Avenue kitchen Chelles' rented for operation shut its doors during the pandemic. At that point, the prospects of receiving a license to use another kitchen from a bogged-down Minnesota Department of Health looked dim.

The abrupt pause on Chelles' Kitchen is a significant blow to the Twin Cities catering scene. Cunningham's comfort food has been featured at events held by prominent names like the Blue Cross Foundation, YWCA St. Paul, CareerForce, MEDA, the Minnesota Department of Health, and the cast of the 2014 film "Dear White People." And there aren't many caterers anywhere that can pull off collard greens and sweet potato ramen.

As caterer Chelles' Kitchen pauses for pandemic, Healthy Roots Institute sprouts in its place

Chelles' is "taking a nap," but Cunningham is confident it'll wake back up eventually, she said. In the meantime, she's pivoted to focus on another of her ventures, Healthy Roots Institute, an educational service providing lessons on how to run a food-centered business, cooking and how to use food for physical and spiritual healing.

She's already established clientele for cooking and business lessons, and she has experience in teaching both. She taught a food business course at the Neighborhood Development Center and worked as a culinary instructor at St. Paul College in 2018. Cunningham's food business knowledge is highly sought after - she's recently consulted for TRIO Plant-based and Breakfast Bar of Minnesota, both in Minneapolis, and the soon-to-open POCO Mexican Restaurant in Mahtomedi.

Cunningham's goal is to develop a website so she can teach courses online and acquire a physical location where she can teach courses sometime during the next couple of years. While Healthy Roots Institute won't be designed to exclusively serve cooks and entrepreneurs of color, she hopes it will diversify the Twin Cities food scene.

"The business of food is, to me, a bigger piece of healing and social justice," Cunningham said. "Because teaching people how to be empowered as entrepreneurs and really build their businesses and get the business acumen they need is to me another level of social justice and impact that I can make."

Though delivery didn't work out for Chelles' Kitchen, Cunningham did service some big delivery orders since Covid-19 struck: She made hundreds of meals for the community during the uprising that followed the killing of George Floyd. Much of the food went to residents who'd been displaced from the Sheraton Hotel and residents who'd taken up refuge at Powderhorn Park, she said.

The death of George Floyd and the fires and protests that followed took an emotional toll on Cunningham, both because the police killing of a black man was a tragedy and because many of the areas hit hardest during the riots are where she made many of her childhood memories.

As Cunningham develops Healthy Roots, the Twin Cities' recent social uprising spotlights the importance of its mission to empower black entrepreneurs in the food industry.

"Specifically Black-owned food businesses are few and far between and have only really been starting to pick up in the past couple of years," Cunningham said. "I want to continue the work of helping other businesses, specifically Black-owned food businesses be able to get established and be successful."

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: July 29, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCCLXXXIII. CORRECTIONS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 2ALength: 59 wordsBody

An article on page B1 Tuesday about the divorce filings of former Minneapolis police officer Derek Chauvin and his wife, Kellie Chauvin, should have said the case is in Washington County District Court.

A listing on page D2 Monday should have said Castllake has acquired some convertible debt this month in Nevada Copper Corp. It is not acquiring the company.

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCCLXXXIV.

CHARGES ADDED IN KILLING OF A PREGNANT WOMAN

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 5BLength: 473 wordsByline: PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

A longtime criminal was in court Tuesday on charges that he fatally shot a woman who was six months pregnant with their child but still gave birth to a girl weighing less than 2 pounds.

Zachary V. Robinson, 27, of St. Paul, was booked into the Hennepin County jail Monday night ahead of a court appearance on second-degree murder and other charges in connection with the shooting on July 5 of Leneesha H. Columbus, 27. Bail was set at $1.5 million, and he's due back in court on Aug. 25.

Columbus was shot during an argument while sitting in an SUV near the memorial to George Floyd, who died on May 25 while being detained by police.

Paramedics took her to HCMC, where she gave birth that night before being pronounced dead from a gunshot to her upper torso despite the lifesaving efforts of bystanders, the charges filed on July 8 noted.

With an additional count added last week to account for the newborn's critical state, Robinson now stands charged with second-degree intentional murder, first-degree assault on an unborn child, second-degree assault and being a felon in possession of a firearm.

The amended complaint filed on July 23 spelled out in detail the precarious medical condition of the infant and revealed that she weighed 31½ ounces at birth about six months into the pregnancy.

"The baby victim suffers from hypotension, neonatal seizures, neonatal jaundice, had a successful cardiopulmonary resuscitation, and continues to suffer from respiratory distress in critical condition," the charging document read. "Withdrawal of medical treatment would result in organ failure and/or fatal deterioration."

A GoFundMe page established to help the family with expenses said on July 21 that the baby "is growing very healthy. Her heart is strong." The girl is named Leneesha, in her mother's memory, said Markisha Hester, Columbus' sister.

A man who had been "working in a peacekeeping role" at the memorial to Floyd confronted Robinson about shooting the woman, the complaint said. Robinson then shot the man in the right foot, the charges noted.

Charges added in killing of a pregnant woman

Tips received by police described Robinson as the newborn's father and Columbus as his wife, according to the charges.

Robinson has a long and violent criminal history in Hennepin County that dates back at least to when he was 15 years old. He's been convicted on five counts of assault in connection with two cases, and he has cases pending on other assault and firearms possession allegations in the county.

In addition, Hennepin County prosecutors charged Robinson with first-degree riot for his role in a June 14 gun battle in north Minneapolis during which one man was fatally shot in the head.

The conflict began at Broadway Pub & Grille, and the gunfire erupted soon afterward, with most shots fired outside the 4th Street Saloon two blocks west of Broadway Pub.

Paul Walsh · 612-968-2483

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

End of Document

Happy to be back home

ARTICLE MCCCCLXXXV. HAPPY TO BE BACK HOME

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 1CLength: 776 wordsByline: PHIL MILLER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Bailey, Donaldson impress despite an absence of fansBody

The Twins' two most expensive free-agent acquisitions last winter cost a combined $99 million, though it's a rather lopsided split. In their first game in their new home park, those investments, both big and small, began paying dividends.

Homer Bailey, the $7 million righthander, gave up two runs over five innings in his Minnesota debut, and Josh Donaldson, who will collect the other $92 million (at least), drove in two runs with a sacrifice fly and an opposite-field home run as the Twins won their Target Field opener for the fourth consecutive season, 6-3 over the St. Louis Cardinals on Tuesday.

"Yeah, that's probably the first of many," manager Rocco Baldelli said of Donaldson, the 2015 AL MVP who started the season with only one hit in 10 at-bats - albeit with four walks - in Chicago. "He always has a lot of energy, so you can never really tell if it's extra energy or just normal. But I'll tell you, he's had really good at-bats throughout."

No. 3 hitter Jorge Polanco also provided his first home run of the season, crushing a Carlos Martinez pitch onto the vacant right-field plaza to cap a five-run second inning, and the Twins improved to 3-1 in this long-delayed 2020 season.

The Twins battered Martinez, who is returning to the St. Louis rotation after serving as closer last year, with six hits in the first two innings, and Donaldson ended Martinez's night two innings later by lifting a middle-of-the-plate fastball onto the overhang in right field.

"Using the whole field at it, too. That right field porch can definitely be your friend if you stay on the ball and drive it that way, and that's what we get to see," Baldelli said. "It's nice."

It was the 11th Target Field homer in Donaldson's career, but the first that produced cheers by the home crowd.

Happy to be back home

Wait, no it didn't. Target Field was eerily empty, as it figures to be throughout this nine-week season. It probably made sense that the most memorable noise of the night was a moment of silence. The game was halted in the fifth inning at 8:46 p.m., to memorialize George Floyd and the 8 minutes, 46 seconds that ended his life.

"I felt like it was different," Donaldson said. "I think it was needed."

The Twins' 60th home opener in Minnesota began with plenty of ceremonies, remembrances and demonstrations, including Baldelli, six players and a coach kneeling during the national anthem, all of it for a television audience instead of a live one. Then the game began and quickly settled into the pattern of the Twins' season-opening series with the White Sox: Big inning early, and little chance of change in the outcome as the game wore on.

With no fans, none of the usual trappings of Opening Day - bunting draped over the upper decks, teams lined up for introductions, even an Air National Guard flyover - were needed, but the Twins gamely staged them anyway. During the game, however, each pivotal moment was greeted only by fake and faint cheers.

There is a home-run siren in the ballpark to fill some of the silence this year, but that addition was lost on Donaldson.

"I honestly don't remember hearing it," he said. "I was pretty excited running around the bases, but I'll listen for it next time."

There was no siren for St. Louis' two homers, just a stunned oh-no stillness. In the case of Tyler O'Neill's fifth-inning blast off Bailey, his only real mistake of the night, it was in awe of the 438-foot trajectory into the seats above the bullpens.

In the case of Byron Buxton's not-quite-a-catch of a Tommy Edman's eighth-inning homer off Trevor May, it was a hold-your-breath moment as he lay in the dirt at the base of the wall. Buxton was unhurt, but angry that he mishandled the catchable fly ball.

"He's going to want to make the play every time. Not almost every time. Every time," Baldelli said. "He expects to make every play. ... Like, that's who he is. He may be the best outfielder in the world."

GAME 4 OF 60

IMPACT PLAYER

Josh Donaldson, Twins

Make yourself at home: A single, a sacrifice fly, and an opposite-field home run in his first Target Field game with the Twins.

BY THE NUMBERS

33 Runs scored by the Twins in four games, tying them with the Rays for most in the majors.

1970 The lone season the Twins scored more runs (34) in their first four games than this one.

11 Career home runs by Donaldson in Target Field, 10 of them as an opponent.

Happy to be back home

ON DECK

After newcomers Kenta Maeda and Homer Bailey recorded victories in their Twins debuts, Rich Hill gets his chance in the finale of two-game series. Miles Mikolas had been scheduled to start for St. Louis, but instead he will miss the season because of forearm surgery; Daniel Ponce de Leon will start instead.

PHIL MILLER

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCCLXXXVI. MN LABS TESTED BY SUPPLY SHORTAGE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1304 wordsByline: JEREMY OLSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Minnesota reported its busiest stretch of COVID-19 diagnostic testing ever last week, but health leaders warned of delays in results because of national supply shortages that have temporarily reduced the state's daily testing capacity.

Mayo Clinic's national reference lab in Rochester is down to about 11,000 COVID-19 tests per day from a capacity of about 20,000, though it is prioritizing Minnesota samples, and HealthPartners' daily capacity has dropped from 2,000 to as low as 1,200.

Delayed results are frustrating for people waiting to find out if they're infected and have exposed others, or if their employers won't let them work without a rule-out test, but they are unavoidable right now, said Dr. Mark Sannes, a HealthPartners infectious disease specialist.

"As the burden of COVID-19 has really ramped up across the southern United States, the consumption of testing reagents has ramped up with it," he said. "There really is a finite supply of that nationwide. ... We are not able to get everything we're asking for."

Providers are taking steps to increase capacity and minimize wait times. The University of Minnesota recently gained accreditation for its veterinary diagnostic lab - one of the largest in the nation - to test COVID-19 samples. It can now perform 180 human COVID-19 tests per day.

Mayo switched to heavier use of its in-house COVID-19 test, which is slower but isn't as reliant on equipment that is in short supply. Waits that were 72 to 96 hours two weeks ago are now down to 24 to 48 hours in many cases.

Officials with the Minnesota Department of Health are monitoring the delays closely, because they can hinder the state's ability to track the spread of the COVID-19 outbreak and warn people of their infections before they expose others.

MN labs tested by supply shortage

"That concerns us deeply," said state Health Commissioner Jan Malcolm, "because it does compromise our ability to help people isolate and quarantine quickly enough to have the full effect on mitigating the spread."

The state on Tuesday reported 52,281 infections confirmed through diagnostic testing of the virus that causes COVID-19, and 1,580 deaths. Hospitalizations on Tuesday crept up to 294 - with 138 of those patients needing intensive care.

The state only reported 9,076 diagnostic test results on Tuesday, but totals on that day of the week have been lower as they reflect reduced sample collections on weekends.

Last week was the first in the pandemic in which the state reported results for more than 100,000 diagnostic tests, which check for the virus in nasal or throat samples.

Even so, retired physician Mark Carter of Eagan said his family had trouble this week locating testing for his 17-year-old granddaughter, despite her fever and respiratory symptoms that make COVID-19 a suspicion.

CVS had no availability and her Allina Health doctor initially discouraged testing until the family pressed the health system to get her scheduled, Carter said.

"She was told all sorts of things like she wasn't sick enough to be tested. That's ridiculous," he said. "The spectrum of disease is just enormous."

Positivity rate rises

The state hasn't backed off its current broad testing guidance, which allows for the testing of people who have been exposed to COVID-19 cases but haven't developed symptoms. People with asymptomatic infections are still at risk to spread the virus to others at greater risk of COVID-19 complications.

The statewide positivity rate of COVID-19 tests has risen to nearly 5%, which Malcolm said is an early warning threshold that the spread of the virus is increasing.

Rising case rates in southern and western states over the past month eventually led to more hospitalizations and deaths. Minnesota only reported four deaths on Tuesday, though, and hasn't reported 10 or more deaths since July 2.

The state is prioritizing testing for certain populations, and for universal testing of workers and residents in long-term care facilities with outbreaks. Health officials earlier this month also discouraged testing for rule-out purposes before allowing workers to return to their jobs or children to participate in sports or camps.

"Even for individuals who have had COVID we are not recommending a test-based strategy for returning to work or any activity," said Kris Ehresmann, state infectious disease director. People are clear to return to activities 10 days after symptom onset, as long as they don't have a fever or any symptoms for three straight days, she said.

Mayo has not changed its recommendations to its clinicians on who should be tested, but it is discouraging them from clogging up their lab with low-priority tests that would delay results, said Dr. Bobbi Pritt, Mayo's chair of clinical microbiology.

MN labs tested by supply shortage

"Providing a result several days after the specimen was obtained just doesn't do anyone any good," she said. "When we cannot provide the turnaround time that we want, we have been limiting the tests that we are doing."

'All hands on deck'

Problems are episodic depending on which commercial testing platforms labs use, because those systems require the use of their own equipment and chemical reagents. Current shortages of supplies for the Hologic Panther system are affecting turnaround times for HealthPartners and Mayo.

Mayo is buying three new test platforms that will diversify its capacity and make its lab less sensitive to shortages from any one supplier. That addition next month will increase Mayo's capacity to as many as 30,000 COVID-19 diagnostic tests per day.

The U's addition of the vet lab to COVID-19 testing offers the same benefit, because its testing platform is different from the one used by the medical school.

The lab is handling its usual responsibilities such as surveillance of poultry or swine herds, and diagnosing outbreaks at individual farms, but it can divert more resources if needed to handle more COVID-19 tests, said Jerry Torrison, vet lab director.

"It's all hands on deck, let's solve this problem together," he said.

M Health Fairview prioritizes testing for select patients such as those undergoing surgeries, partly because of the complications that could occur during their recoveries if they were infected. The U affiliate has set up test clinics in high-need areas as well, including after the mass protests over the police killing of George Floyd in May.

North Memorial Health has two walk-up sites for asymptomatic and symptomatic people, and it is reporting a turnaround time of three to seven days for results. Further delays are possible given the national spread of COVID-19 and testing demands, though, said spokesperson Katy Sullivan.

Allina has maintained rapid turnaround of tests at its own lab, but sends most samples to external labs that are experiencing delays, said Heather Dawson, Allina's vice president for lab services.

The health system analyzes lags in test results and contacts multiple labs to decide where to send samples. Dawson said demand has shifted toward asymptomatic people with individual exposure risks and away from people whose infections could have occurred during mass protests.

"We're far enough past those," she said, "that we feel we are kind of switching out one population for another."

Jeremy Olson · 612-673-7744

TRACKING CORONAVIRUS

Minnesota cases, daily change*

52,281 -- Total cases

480 -- July 28 new cases

MN labs tested by supply shortage

Minnesota deaths, new daily

1,580 -- Total deaths

4 -- July 28

NOTES: The Minnesota Department of Health did not update numbers on July 4.

*Chart data is a net count of new confirmed cases minus previously announced cases that were removed by MDH on that date.

U.S. cases, new daily

4,303,813 -- Total cases

59,179 -- July 27

U.S. deaths, new daily

148,450 -- Total deaths

1,696 -- July 27

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete charts.)

Note: U.S. data lags a day behind Minnesota

Sources: New York Times, Minnesota Dept. of Health

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCLXXXVII. MN TOBACCO AGE INCREASES TO 21 ON AUG. 1

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 600 wordsByline: Katrina ProssHighlight: Starting Saturday, Minnesotans must be at least 21 to buy tobacco products, including vapes and e-cigarettes. The Tobacco 21 law makes Minnesota consistent with federal and local tobacco laws and aims to keep tobacco products away from youth and schools. It was passed by the Legislature and signed by Gov. Tim Walz in May. The [...]Body

Starting Saturday, Minnesotans must be at least 21 to buy tobacco products, including vapes and e-cigarettes.

The Tobacco 21 law makes Minnesota consistent with federal and local tobacco laws and aims to keep tobacco products away from youth and schools. It was passed by the Legislature and signed by Gov. Tim Walz in May.

The federal government increased the age Americans can purchase tobacco products from 18 to 21 in December. The state passing its own law should clear up confusion among retailers, said Laura Smith, senior public affairs manager with ClearWay Minnesota, a nonprofit working to reduce tobacco use.

A main goal of the new law is to prevent young people from starting to smoke and becoming addicted to tobacco products, said Sen. Carla Nelson, R-Rochester, who has been advocating for increasing the age to 21 for years. Research shows the brains of younger people are more susceptible to addiction.

"It's to stop the start. The vast majority of addicted smokers started under the age of 21," Nelson said. "If we can delay the start of smoking to past 21, we will have fewer addicted smokers."

The law prohibits Minnesota retailers from selling tobacco and e-cigarette products to those under the age of 21, enforceable by a $300 penalty on first offenses and more subsequently.

Some legislators said the bill didn't go far enough, saying young adults who buy or possess tobacco products underage should be penalized if they are caught, similar to the state's under-21 alcohol laws. An effort to add such penalties were rejected as others argued young people should be deterred from tobacco with education, not legal punishment, and retailers should ultimately be held responsible for their sales.

MN tobacco age increases to 21 on Aug. 1

"The reality is, they don't need to have a criminal record because of this. We can say, 'Let's as a community empower our local jurisdictions to address the issue,' " said Rep. Heather Edelson, DFL-Edina.

Several said the bill went too far, arguing that if a legal adult can get married, buy a house or serve in the military, the state shouldn't prevent them from smoking or vaping, the Forum News Service reported.

After years of trying, the effort to raise the tobacco age gained steam after more than 70 lung injuries and three deaths in Minnesota were reportedly linked to vaping last year. Then the 2019 Minnesota Student Survey found rates of vaping have jumped among middle and high school students, with a quarter of 11th-graders saying they had used e-cigarettes in the previous month.

Last week, the Minnesota Department of Health sent out an alert regarding 11 more cases of lung injuries due to vaping. While most of these cases were tied to THC, or tetrahydrocannabinol, the main ingredient in marijuana, lawmakers said it's another issue that needs to be addressed.

"There's a lot more we can do; we're not done," Smith said.

Several other new laws will go into effect Aug. 1, including:

A new law making changes to police training and use of force, in light of the killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody on Memorial Day. Officers will also get more training on mental health. The marriage of minors will be prohibited. Previously, 16- and 17-year-olds could get married with the consent of a parent or guardian.

This report includes information from the Forum News Service.

Simon Cowell has surgery for broken back after bike accident Morikawa delivers great shot in quiet moment to win PGA Trump's end run around Congress raises questions US tops 5 million confirmed virus cases, to Europe's alarm Trump orders more unemployment pay, a payroll tax deferral

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

New traveling music festival kicks off Thursday at the State Capitol

ARTICLE MCCCLXXXVIII. NEW TRAVELING MUSIC FESTIVAL KICKS OFF THURSDAY AT THE STATE CAPITOL

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 217 words

Byline: Ross Raihala

Highlight: A new festival will kick off at 3 p.m. Thursday at the State Capitol and travel to four other outdoor spaces in the Twin Cities. The Minneapolis Revitalization Festival started as an online auction and has grown into "a diverse and expansive celebration of art, music, community, diversity, kindness and inclusion." The fiscal sponsor for [...]

Body

A new festival will kick off at 3 p.m. Thursday at the State Capitol and travel to four other outdoor spaces in the Twin Cities.

The Minneapolis Revitalization Festival started as an online auction and has grown into "a diverse and expansive celebration of art, music, community, diversity, kindness and inclusion."

The fiscal sponsor for the festival is local nonprofit Invent Minnesota. Proceeds will go to artists, a fund for children whose families have experienced police violence and organizations that are committed to rebuilding Minneapolis in the wake of George Floyd's death.

Thursday's festival includes stops at the Walker Art Center at 4 p.m., Nicollet Mall at 4:30 and Juxtaposition Arts at 5. It wraps with a performance at the corner of West Broadway and Dupont in North Minneapolis. Performers include the Hurst Family Experience, Mari Harris, Dave Dvorak, Don Strong, Travla and other local musicians.

Events continue in August with a three-day online auction featuring the work of more than 50 artists from around the world, including a painting by Sharon Stone and works by Minnesota artists Ta-coumba Aiken, Christopher Harrison and Ellie Bryan. The festival, which runs Aug. 4 through 6, also includes speakers, workshops and a film festival.

For further details, see inclusivi-tee.com.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Oregon governor says US agents will start leaving Portland

ARTICLE MCCCLXXXIX.

OREGON GOVERNOR SAYS US AGENTS WILL START LEAVING PORTLAND

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 841 words

Byline: Associated Press

Highlight: PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) - Federal agents who have clashed with protesters in Portland, Oregon, will begin a "phased withdrawal" from the city, Gov. Kate Brown said Wednesday.

Body

By GILLIAN FLACCUS and JONATHAN LEMIRE

PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) - Federal agents who have clashed with protesters in Portland, Oregon, will begin a "phased withdrawal" from the city, Gov. Kate Brown said Wednesday.

Acting Homeland Security Secretary Chad Wolf said in a statement the plan negotiated with Brown over the last 24 hours includes a "robust presence" of Oregon State Police in the downtown of the state's largest city.

"State and local law enforcement will begin securing properties and streets, especially those surrounding federal properties, that have been under nightly attack for the past two months," Wolf said.

Agents with the U.S. Customs and Border Protection and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement will begin leaving the city's downtown area on Thursday, Brown said. Federal Protective Service agents - who are always posted at the Mark O. Hatfield Federal Courthouse - will work alongside state police to guard the exterior of the courthouse and a limited number of other federal agents will remain inside the courthouse, she said.

Wolf said that although federal agents will leave the downtown area, they will maintain a presence in Portland "until we are assured that the Hatfield Federal Courthouse and other federal properties will no longer be attacked and that the seat of justice in Portland will remain secure." If conditions in Portland "improve significantly," then the U.S. government will reassess its staffing levels in the city, he said.

Portland Mayor Ted Wheeler applauded the end of what he called "an illegal occupation" in a lengthy Twitter post, saying the news came on the same day that the City Council would vote on whether to refer a major police reform initiative to voters in November.

"The federal occupation of our community has brought a new kind of fear to our streets. Federal agents nearly killed a demonstrator, and their presence has led to increased violence and vandalism in our downtown core," he said. "The work of reform deserves our community's full and complete attention, and I know that Portlanders will stay engaged."

Oregon governor says US agents will start leaving Portland

Before departing Wednesday for a trip to Texas, President Donald Trump insisted federal troops would not leave Portland until local authorities "secured their city."

"Either they're gonna clean up Portland soon, or the federal government is going up, and we're gonna do it for them," he said.

The announcement was an abrupt about-face from just two days earlier, when the U.S. government said it might send more federal agents to Portland instead.

The U.S. Marshals Service and Department of Homeland Security had been weighing this week whether to send in more agents. The marshals were taking steps to identify up to 100 additional personnel who could go in case they were needed to relieve or supplement the deputy marshals who work in Oregon, spokesman Drew Wade said.

Brown, who worked with Vice President Mike Pence on the withdrawal, cautioned Wednesday that the departure of the Border Protection and immigration agents may not immediately resolve the conflict at the courthouse. Protests have roiled Portland for more than two months since the death of George Floyd, a Black man who died after being pinned at the neck by a white Minneapolis police officer.

Like many other protests nationwide, they sought to highlight and call for an end to racial injustice, but they had increasingly focused on federal property even before the U.S. agents arrived.

"I have grown increasingly concerned at the nightly confrontation between local community members and federal officers. We need to recognize that the protests in Portland are not solely about the federal presence," Brown said.

Many protesters want to see the Portland Police Bureau defunded and are angry that officers used tear gas on protesters multiple times before the federal government arrived and tensions escalated further. Brown said the departure of the federal agents was a chance to address that anger and begin to make improvements in community policing.

"I will work with community leaders and elected officials to take bolder action to reform our police practices - including those of the Portland Police Bureau. We need to get this right," she said.

The nightly Portland protests often spiral into violence as demonstrators target the U.S. courthouse with rocks, fireworks and laser pointers. Federal agents respond with tear gas, so-called less-lethal ammunition and arrests.

Protesters have tried almost every night to tear down a fence erected to protect the building, set fires in the street and hurled fireworks, Molotov cocktails and bricks, rocks and bottles at the agents inside. Authorities this week reinforced the fence by putting concrete highway barriers around it.

Demonstrators near the courthouse Wednesday were met before dawn with tear gas, pepper balls and impact munitions fired by agents, the Oregonian newspaper reported.

Oregon governor says US agents will start leaving Portland

Lemire reported from Washington.

Follow Gillian Flaccus on Twitter at <http://www.twitter.com/gflaccus> and Andrew Selsky at <https://twitter.com/andrewselsky>.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Panel might slow police proposal

ARTICLE MCCCXC.

PANEL MIGHT SLOW POLICE PROPOSAL

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 922 wordsByline: LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Charter Commission group recommends keeping it off Nov. ballot.Body

A working group of the Minneapolis Charter Commission voted Tuesday to recommend keeping a police reform measure off the November ballot - an indication that the commission could slow down the movement to dismantle the police department.

The full commission is scheduled to vote Wednesday on the proposal, but the 4-2 vote of its working group signaled that some members of the commission feel the push to change the city's charter is moving too fast.

The proposal, brought by Commissioner Al Giraud-Isaacson, was widely described as the simpler of two measures up for consideration as the city debates how to remake policing following George Floyd's death. Giraud-Isaacson's proposal would remove the requirement to maintain a minimum police force based on the city's population, but leave intact the requirement for a Police Department.

"I'm going to assume that taking more time on my amendment, it probably means that we're going to do the same thing with the City Council's proposal, so I'm opposed to that," he said.

The debate about how to change policing has centered on the city's charter - which serves as its constitution - and it has raised fundamental questions about how the city should be governed. It has also challenged the commission, which is made up of 15 volunteers appointed by a judge. It generally takes months to debate proposals but is now tasked with evaluating them in just over a month.

Some have questioned whether the Charter Commission truly reflects the community it is meant to serve. The Charter Commission Chairman, Barry Clegg, said at least three of the 15 commissioners describe themselves as people of color. The 12-member City Council has three Black council members and one Latina council member.

The City Council wants Minneapolis voters to consider its own proposal, which eliminates the charter's requirement for minimum police staffing and replaces the department with a new safety agency.

Panel might slow police proposal

But all such changes have to go through the Charter Commission, which can't stop the council's measure but could delay the process beyond the deadline for adding items to this year's ballot.

Giraud-Isaacson offered his proposal as a possible compromise after some people said the City Council's amendment went too far.

On Tuesday, he urged his fellow commissioners to recommend his proposal. He said he understood their desire to do more research on the measure before it heads to voters. But, he added, "As a person of color and as a member of the LGBTQ community, that's something that we hear a lot when we are advocating for a change, or for rights."

He said it took decades for LGBTQ people to get assurances that they wouldn't be able to be fired from a job, solely because of their sexuality or gender identity. "It's not the right time," they were told over and over again, he said. "These are the things that we hear a lot when we're trying to make change, so I struggle with that while understanding the complications of these amendments."

Another commissioner, Jill Garcia, also offered thoughts, but because she is not a member of the work group, she could not vote Tuesday on Giraud-Isaacson's proposal. She will be allowed to vote when the commission convenes Wednesday.

Garcia said she has grown frustrated with some people who have tried to - falsely - paint the court-appointed Charter Commission as an all-white body. Giraud-Isaacson's remarks, she said, "added to the complexity of the whole picture that I am wrestling with as a person of color."

Unlike Giraud-Isaacson, Garcia feels the commission should save this question for next year's ballot. She said she feared that conversations hadn't included enough input from Medaria Arradondo, the city's first Black police chief. She said she thought it might be helpful to have a more thorough examination of the Police Department and the police union. And, she said she believes there is plenty that the mayor and City Council can do to change policing without first changing the charter.

"Having a plan, having conversations on multiple levels to prepare for this on the ballot next year, when it is a municipal-focused ballot and the City Council members are also up on the ballot, I think is a very appropriate coalescing of both council members and this ballot question," Garcia said.

Her comments echoed those of some of the work group members who raised concerns about putting Giraud-Isaacson's proposal on the 2020 ballot.

Charter Commissioners Andrew Kozak, Matt Perry, Lyall Schwarzkopf and Clegg voted against recommending the measure. Giraud-Isaacson and the work group chairwoman, Andrea Rubenstein, voted in favor.

Similar divisions have played out in the community, where people's thoughts on police reform do not always fall predictably along racial, geographic or gender lines.

Some people who support abolishing the city's Police Department have identified the Charter Commission as an obstacle. Others, who fear the proposals are advancing too quickly, are asking the commission to act as a safety net.

The commission will have until Aug. 5 to decide what it wants to do with the council's measure. Minnesota law dictates that the commission can offer a recommendation to approve or reject a proposal brought by the council, or offer a substitute in its place. The council is not bound by their recommendation.

Panel might slow police proposal

The commission could also invoke its legal right to take additional time to review the measure, ending its chances for getting on the ballot this year. Both items could come up again in 2021.

Liz Navratil · 612-673-4994

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCXCI.

PPE SALES 3M'S SILVER LINING FOR Q2

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 733 wordsByline: MIKE HUGHLETT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: But the Maplewood-based company still ended up posting double-digit declines.Body

3M reported double-digit declines in second-quarter sales and profits, falling short of Wall Street forecasts, as coronavirus-induced economic distress continued to dog the giant manufacturer.

Still, Maplewood-based 3M on Tuesday posted a nice increase in sales for personal protective equipment - a small silver lining from the coronavirus outbreak - while the company's overall revenue trends have been improving so far in the third quarter.

July sales have risen in the low single digits over the same time last year, and the improvements are "broad-based," the company said.

Investors reacted to 3M's results Tuesday by pushing its stock down $7.91 or nearly 5%. It closed at $155.33.

"While our results were significantly impacted by the global economic slowdown, we executed well, managed our costs and delivered another quarter of robust cash flow," said CEO Mike Roman in a statement. "We are taking actions to navigate near-term challenges."

3M posted second-quarter adjusted earnings of $1 billion, or $1.78 per share, down 16% from the same time last year. Stock analysts on average were forecasting profits of $1.80 per share.

3M's second-quarter sales tallied $7.2 billion, down 12% year-over-year, and a notch below Wall Street expectations of $7.3 billion.

With its array of industrial products, 3M is often seen as bellwether for the U.S. economy and an indicator of global economic trends, too.

For instance, as global auto production has fallen by 45% this year; 3M's sales to that industry dropped by 44%.

Meanwhile, the COVID-caused surge in elective surgery and dental cancellations have socked 3M's health care sales; the company's "oral solutions" business was down nearly 60% in the second quarter.

Some 3M businesses were helped by COVID-19 - biopharma, cleaning products and particularly N95 respirators. N95 masks are the gold standard for filtering out particles - like viruses - and 3M is the leading U.S. producer.

3M's global production of N95s and other respirators hit nearly 800 million in the first half of 2020. About half of that was distributed in the U.S., primarily to health care providers and the Federal Emergency Management Agency, 3M said.

The company reiterated that it's on track to meet its U.S. and global goals for N95 production. Yet for U.S. health care providers, that won't be enough as the COVID-19 menace keeps rolling. "Demand continues to far outpace what the industry can supply," Roman told stock analysts in a conference call Tuesday.

3M expects that respirator sales will add 3 to 3.5% to organic revenue growth during the third quarter.

The company's third quarter has started out decently, with sales picking up in several business sectors and regions, notably China.

"It's adding up everywhere a little bit and that is making a difference," Roman told stock analysts. "I am encouraged by what I see," though he cautioned it's "still early days in the third quarter."

Indeed, 3M said Tuesday that it "continues to believe it is prudent not to provide guidance." The company earlier this year withdrew financial guidance due to uncertainties caused by COVID-19.

Not surprisingly given the auto-manufacturing slump, 3M's transportation and electronics business was hit hardest during the second quarter. Its sales of $1.9 billion were down 21% over the same time last year, while its operating income fell 35% to $382 million.

While sales of 3M's N95 masks boomed, the company's overall safety and industrial business saw a 9.2% decline in revenue to $2.7 billion. Still, the division's operating income was down only 1.6% to $636 million.

In health care, 3M posted sales of $1.8 billion, down less than 1%, though the segment's operating income fell 37% to $306 million.

3M's fourth major business segment, consumer, experienced a 6.2% decline in sales to $1.2 billion, while its operating profits fell 4.8% to $287 million.

In the call with analysts, Roman noted George Floyd's recent death at the hands of Minneapolis police, saying it "was jarring for all 3Mers, especially our African American employees." The company plans to "accelerate inclusion and diversity."

"While we have made good progress in recent years, we have much more to do," he said. "At the same time, we are working with other companies on actions that will make a difference here in Minnesota, and we have made initial investments as part of these efforts."

Load-Date: July 29, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCXCII.

STRUGGLING MERCHANTS, INSURERS BATTLE OVER PANDEMIC COVERAGE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1118 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: Restaurants, bars and other merchants struggling to stay afloat during the coronavirus pandemic are desperately reaching out for a lifeline from insurers that in turn contend they are being miscast as potential saviors.Body

By MICHAEL LIEDTKE

Restaurants, bars and other merchants struggling to stay afloat during the coronavirus pandemic are desperately reaching out for a lifeline from insurers that in turn contend they are being miscast as potential saviors.

Shutdowns and crowd restrictions imposed by state and local governments to limit the spread of the virus have resulted in more than $1 trillion in estimated losses so far for thousands of rapidly sinking small businesses.

That has prompted a flood of claims under business interruption insurance policies that have been almost universally rejected for a variety of reasons, including boilerplate provisions inserted by insurers after the SARS outbreak in 2003 to exclude disruptions caused by virus and bacteria.

"This is an existential threat," said John Houghtaling, a New Orleans attorney who is representing restaurants and other businesses seeking about $8 billion in losses that he estimates they will suffer during the pandemic. "A lot of people who did the right thing and bought this coverage thinking they would be thrown a lifeboat if disaster struck are now being told, 'Sorry, let the Coast Guard come and get you instead.'"

So many lawsuits have been filed against insurers in the U.S. that a Thursday hearing has been scheduled before a federal judicial panel in Washington to decide how to manage them all in the months - and possibly years - ahead. The panel's review involves more than 200 federal complaints in addition the other lawsuits filed in state courts by the owners of meat-and-potato cafes as well as some of the nation's best-known and most exclusive restaurants, such as the French Laundry in Napa Valley's wine country and California cuisine pioneer Chez Panisse in Berkeley, California, which sued its insurer, AMCO, for breach of contract earlier this month.

Struggling merchants, insurers battle over pandemic coverage

"The servers, cooks, farmers, ranchers and other hard-working people in the Chez Panisse family are seeing their livelihoods in jeopardy because AMCO has declined to live up to its responsibilities," said Alice Waters, Chez Panisse's owner.

President Donald Trump weighed in on the thorny issue in April when he told reporters that he suspected many insurers were dodging their obligations. "You have people that have never asked for business interruption insurance (payments) and they've been paying a lot of money for a lot of years for the privilege of having it," Trump said. "And then when they finally need it, the insurance company says, 'We're not going to give it.' We can't let that happen."

Although sympathetic to their policyholders' plights, insurers say most business interruption policies were designed to cover shutdowns caused by catastrophes such as hurricanes and terrorist attacks while excluding pandemics that cause widespread losses too staggering to cover, even for an industry sitting on $850 billion in reserves. Only a small number of businesses sought additional coverage that specifically includes losses caused by pandemics, said David Sampson, CEO of the American Property Casualty Insurance Association, an industry trade group.

Even so, Lloyd's of London has estimated the insurance industry still will pay out $107 billion in pandemic-related claims, more than the combined amounts doled out after the terrorist attacks in September 2001 and Hurricane Katrina in 2005. Besides businesses that bought special coverage, the claims include payouts to major sporting and entertainment events that bought cancellation policies coverage, such as the Wimbledon tennis tournament that is collecting about $140 million under its pandemic policy. Insurers also are paying workers' compensation claims for employees who get sick on the job.

"This popular meme out there that the insurance industry isn't paying for losses is just not true," Sampson said.

But the claims insurers are paying only a small fraction of the $231 billion to $431 billion in monthly losses piling up at U.S. businesses with fewer than 100 employees, according to the industry's estimates.

At that rate, insurers would have no money left to cover non-pandemic claims for auto accidents, home fires and even damages to businesses during the protests across the country since George Floyd died at the hands of Minneapolis police in May, according to industry consultant Robert Hartwig of the University of South Carolina's risk and management center.

The denial of business interruption coverage is also hurting bars across the country, many of which haven't been able to offer pick-up or outside dining like restaurants have. The Ivy Room, which also offers live music during normal times its Albany, California, venue, has had to lay off most of its 20-employee staff since March and is now raising money from community donations while it fights its insurer over its business interruption claim.

"Everything is so uncertain that we really don't know what we are going to do," said Summer Gerbing, one of the Ivy Room's co-owners.

Meanwhile, lawmakers in California and several other states have drawn up legislation that would force insurers to cover the business interruption losses that have piled up since March - a requirement that, if imposed, the industry is already vowing to fight as unconstitutional.

Struggling merchants, insurers battle over pandemic coverage

The dispute boils down to whether business interruption policies can be applied to instances when there is no physical damage or destruction to a restaurant or store that is being prevented from conducting business as usual.

In one of the first decisions issued on that question earlier this month, a Michigan state judge sided with an insurer's rejection of a claim for $650,000 for two months of losses that Nick Gavrilides said he suffered at two restaurants, the Soup Spoon Cafe in Lansing, Michigan, and the Bistro in nearby Williamston, Michigan.

Gavrilides' lawyer, Matthew Heos, contended business interruption coverage should apply because authorities prohibited customers from physically entering the property, an assertion derided as "nonsense" by Judge Joyce Draganchuk during a July 1 hearing posted online.

"There has to be something that physically alters the integrity of the property," Draganchuk concluded in her dismissal of Gavrilides' case.

Gavrilides is now serving customers inside both restaurants but only at half capacity, a restriction that is making it difficult to stay open even though they are operating with skeletal staffs. The Soup Spoon Cafe now has 12 to 15 employees, down from 40 just before the pandemic.

"It's literally day to day for us now," Gavrilides said. "I feel let down for everybody. I thought by paying my premiums for the past 14 years and if my service was ever interrupted, I would be rescued. But I guess that isn't going to happen now."to

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Suspect accused of robbing central Minnesota bank for second time in 13 years

ARTICLE MCCCXCIII.

SUSPECT ACCUSED OF ROBBING CENTRAL MINNESOTA BANK FOR SECOND TIME IN 13 YEARS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 29, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 285 words

Byline: Forum News Service

Highlight: GARRISON, Minn. - A 51-year-old man is in custody awaiting formal criminal charges in connection with a Friday armed robbery at an east-central Minnesota bank - a bank he was convicted of robbing more than a decade ago. The suspect, James Richard Ardito, was arrested Monday at a residence in Andover, according to the Crow [...]

Body

GARRISON, Minn. - A 51-year-old man is in custody awaiting formal criminal charges in connection with a Friday armed robbery at an east-central Minnesota bank - a bank he was convicted of robbing more than a decade ago.

The suspect, James Richard Ardito, was arrested Monday at a residence in Andover, according to the Crow Wing County Sheriff's Office.

On Friday morning, a Deerwood Bank teller went to the front door to help a man, according to the sheriff's office. The suspect threatened the teller, and said to shut off the bank's alarm system. The teller was able to get away and call 911. The employee was not hurt and the suspect took an undisclosed amount of money from the bank in Garrison.

Ardito was convicted of robbing the same bank in September 2007. According to the Brainerd Dispatch, he pleaded guilty in 2009 to one count of armed robbery in federal court in Duluth.

Ardito, a resident of Coon Rapids at that time, was convicted of armed bank robbery, admitted to using force, violence and intimidation to take close to $3,000 from a teller at the bank. He also admitted he assaulted and put in jeopardy the life of another person by use of a dangerous weapon in committing the bank robbery.

In October 2018, Ardito escaped custody from a supervised halfway house in Minneapolis.

North St. Paul man killed in crash after fleeing Dakota County sheriff's deputy Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Cleric assaulted outside Bloomington mosque; police searching for suspects U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin

Suspect accused of robbing central Minnesota bank for second time in 13 years

Cities Minneapolis man sentenced to 33 years in prison for sex-trafficking young women and girls out of massage parlor

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Thao seeks dismissal of felony criminal charges

ARTICLE MCCCXCIV.

THAO SEEKS DISMISSAL OF FELONY CRIMINAL CHARGES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 30, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 332 wordsByline: RANDY FURST; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The former Mpls. officer is among 4 charged in the death of George Floyd.Body

Another of the three former Minneapolis police officers who were charged last month for failing to stop former officer Derek Chauvin from fatally restraining George Floyd by kneeling on his neck has filed a motion to dismiss two felony charges against him.

Attorneys for Tou Thao, who was seen on a bystander's cellphone video keeping people at bay while Floyd was being held down, asked Hennepin County District Judge Peter Cahill to toss the two aiding-and-abetting charges "on the grounds that they are not supported by probable cause."

The lawyers, Robert Paule and Natalie Paule of Minneapolis, argue in their three-page motion that county prosecutors had failed to show that Thao knew that Chauvin and the other officers were going to commit a crime. They also argue that prosecutors failed to show that Thao's presence or actions at the scene were done "to further commission of that crime."

The Paules wrote that they will submit evidence, including video from Thao's body camera, police training materials, and video from the bodycam of former officer Thomas Lane, 37, who also has been charged. Like Thao, Lane is seeking dismissal of the aiding-and-abetting charges. Thao lacked the required mental state required to support the charges against him, his lawyers wrote.

Floyd was killed in police custody May 25, provoking protests in Minneapolis and in many other cities across the U.S. and the world.

Thao, 37, was charged with one count of aiding and abetting unintentional second-degree murder, which carries a sentence of up to 40 years, and one count of aiding and abetting second-degree manslaughter, which carries a sentence of up to 10 years.

Former officers Lane and J. Alexander Kueng, 26 face two similar charges. Chauvin, 44, faces second- and third-degree murder charges and second-degree manslaughter. Thao's attorneys are asking for a hearing on their dismissal motion on Sept. 11. Cahill gave prosecutors until Aug. 17 to respond.

Randy Furst · 612-201-5522

Thao seeks dismissal of felony criminal charges

Twitter: @randyfurst

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

End of Document

Sano slowly regains his timing

ARTICLE MCCCXCV.

SANO SLOWLY REGAINS HIS TIMING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 30, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 5CLength: 712 wordsByline: PHIL MILLER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

When Miguel Sano cracked a second-inning double down the left-field line in the home opener against the Cardinals on Tuesday, it might have provided a bit of relief for the Twins about the status of their only player known to have come down with COVID-19.

Sano missed nearly two weeks of training camp, and though he reported no symptoms of coronavirus while he was out, and had looked healthy once he returned, he also had only a week to regain his timing at the plate, all while adjusting to a new position in the field. So it was difficult to tell whether his 0-for-8 start in Chicago - he's now 1-for-14 (.071) with six strikeouts after Wednesday - was anything more than two quiet days.

"It's getting there. He's hit some balls very hard," Twins manager Rocco Baldelli said of his new first baseman. "He's going to need some at-bats before, I'm sure, he looks at all of us and says, 'Now I'm all the way back. Now I'm 100 percent, timing-wise, and feeling good at the plate.' But that being said, he had good at-bats."

One thing Baldelli said he's definitely not worried about is Sano's physical condition. "He's in good shape. One amazing thing about Miguel, even though the COVID issues and everything, his body does hold up as well as anyone we have," the manager said. "He's a big guy [who] has dealt with some injuries. But as far as the way he holds up day to day to the baseball schedule, watching him out there when it's 95 degrees outside, he holds up as well as anyone."

Awesome Aussies

Lewis Thorpe has recovered from the bruised left knee he suffered Sunday in Chicago, and said he is ready to pitch again. Thorpe was hit by a Jose Abreu ground ball that "got me in the right spot, and it just locked up," Thorpe said, and was bruised afterward. "It hit me in a weird spot, to where I really couldn't push off on it, so that was concerning." He left the game but said the limp was gone by Tuesday, and he was available again to pitch.

Sano slowly regains his timing

Thorpe said he is enjoying having fellow Australian Aaron Whitefield as a teammate. "It's awesome. We have a bit of banter going back and forth, and I'm making him feel comfortable here," Thorpe said of the rookie outfielder. "All of Australia back home is really proud of us," he said, as evidenced by the deluge of text messages he and Whitefield receive daily.

Support for Floyd

Baldelli said the Twins' midgame interruption Tuesday at the symbolic hour of 8:46 p.m. to memorialize George Floyd "was a great moment," one he believes fulfills the Twins' obligation to lead.

"Being in Minneapolis ... I do feel like we should be ambassadors in some way for baseball," Baldelli said. "This is something we wanted to make sure we did right. We made it a point to make a meaningful acknowledgment and to share our feelings and our thoughts, and we've encouraged every one of our guys to express themselves."

A sign on the right field wall reads "Justice for George Floyd," one of the many ways the Twins have noted his death.

"We discussed many initiatives, many different ways to show our support for George Floyd's family, for the community. For the most part, we said, 'We should do them all,' and take this opportunity to make this a very meaningful one for our group and for the Twins," Baldelli said. "There's only so many times where you have a platform to bring something to somebody's attention, to bring it to the fans, to bring it to the community. This is one of those times."

Fans to get face time

The Twins originally didn't plan to sell "seats" to fans behind home plate, choosing instead to fill the spaces with large cardboard-cutout heads of several dozen of their greatest players. But they've changed that policy, now that TV viewers have seen the big faces during broadcasts.

Beginning with the next homestand on Aug. 14, the 30-inch faces will be interspersed with those of fans, who can pay $80 (or $40 for season-ticket holders) to be included, and afterward keep the giant likeness as a souvenir. More information is available at twinsbaseball.com/fanface.

Etc.

· Jake Odorizzi, on the injured list because of a sore back, was scheduled to throw a bullpen Wednesday or Thursday, but Baldelli and pitching coach Wes Johnson have not yet decided whether the righthander will make his 2020 debut during this homestand.

Load-Date: August 3, 2020

Protesters vary as much as their arrests, AP analysis shows

ARTICLE MCCCXCVI.

PROTESTERS VARY AS MUCH AS THEIR ARRESTS, AP ANALYSIS SHOWS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 30, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1177 words

Byline: Associated Press

Highlight: Sheena McFerran was two rows behind a line of police at a protest in Portland, Oregon, when she saw officers pepper-spraying a Black man.

Body

Sheena McFerran was two rows behind a line of police at a protest in Portland, Oregon, when she saw officers pepper-spraying a Black man.

"I said, 'Hell no,' so I pulled his backpack back really hard and stepped into the space he was in," said McFerran, a 34-year-old manager for the Sierra Club who's white.

Edward Schinzing, 32, was just around the corner on another night. Prosecutors say he and 30 others broke into a building with a jail and courtrooms, destroyed an office and set it ablaze.

Both were arrested. Their disparate circumstances highlight what The Associated Press found in an analysis of more than 200 arrests: even those accused of breaking the law during the liberal city's nightly rallies don't neatly fit into President Donald Trump's depiction of protesters as "anarchists and agitators."

A review of court documents, social media posts and other public records from people arrested by federal and local authorities since mid-June reveals a group whose motives are as varied as the acts leading to their arrests.

They're Black Lives Matter activists who have been in the streets since George Floyd died at the hands of Minneapolis police in May, groups of self-proclaimed parents using leaf blowers to drive away tear gas and black-clad provocateurs taking advantage of the nightly chaos that's gripped downtown Portland for over two months and led Trump to deploy federal agents in early July.

The AP found that 95% of those arrested by police and federal agents were local. The vast majority have no criminal record in Oregon. Many appear to be college students. Their average age was 28, court records show.

They're mostly charged with misdemeanors like failing to comply with a lawful order, while some face felonies like arson and assault on an officer. Most people have been released, and some have been arrested more than once for similar offenses.

Protesters vary as much as their arrests, AP analysis shows

The federal government agreed Wednesday to draw down the number of agents whose presence has swelled the ranks of the protests. Federal forces have drawn more black-clad people accused of setting fires or assaulting officers but also military veterans seeking to lower tensions and a self-titled "Wall of Moms."

"They have acted as an occupying force & brought violence," Oregon Gov. Kate Brown tweeted of the U.S. officers.

Soon before the announcement, Trump insisted agents wouldn't leave until local authorities "secured their city." He's spent weeks running Portland through the political playbook he used during the initial wave of nationwide demonstrations after Floyd's death: painting those on the streets as anarchists and seeking to tie them to Democratic rival Joe Biden.

The U.S. Justice Department and Homeland Security officials have often highlighted destructive cases like Schinzing's in their portrayal of protesters. The nightly unrest often follows a script: authorities declare a riot, sending hundreds of peaceful protesters home as smaller groups of demonstrators target the U.S. courthouse with bricks, laser pointers and fireworks. Federal agents respond with tear gas, stun grenades and arrests.

But AP's analysis shows many of those arrested do not fit the caricature of an anarchist bent on destruction.

Moments before her arrest, police threw McFerran, the Sierra Club manager, to the ground, yanking off her mask and binding her wrists in zip ties. She was released after eight hours in jail and faces charges of disorderly conduct and interfering with police.

McFerran, who lives in Seattle, said she started protesting in her city and in Portland almost nightly after realizing she could do more in the fight for racial justice. Until Floyd's killing, McFerran says she was a "tourist protester."

"I realized I need to be participating in this legitimately every day," she said. "I need to do this work."

McFerran said she and her boyfriend, a former Army medic, provide security services and try to act as a "shield" between protesters of color and law enforcement.

Some of those charged with more serious offenses, such as assaulting officers and destroying property, have criminal histories. Most are white, according to court records.

Schinzing, who was photographed burning papers inside the county Justice Center, was ordered detained this week by a federal judge. He faces a felony arson charge, on top of unrelated harassment and assault charges from February, court records show. His court-appointed attorney declined to comment.

Acting Homeland Security Chief Chad Wolf said federal agents have made 94 arrests in Portland since July 4.

"Our federal officers have faced assaults with Molotov cocktails, mortar-style, commercial-grade fireworks, accelerants, IEDs and other violent weapons," Wolf said at a news conference about the withdrawal of federal agents.

Protesters vary as much as their arrests, AP analysis shows

Lisa Hay, Oregon's federal public defender, said her office is representing "mothers, college students, lawyers" and others from across the state and country.

"It should concern everyone that there were arrests by unmarked police officers of Oregonians who were asking what's going on and weren't being given any answers," Hay said.

The state sued over those allegations, which the Trump administration denies, but a judge found the state did not have standing to win an immediate court order restraining the federal agents.

Some Black activists say the political fight distracts from the focus on combating racist policing.

Mac Smiff, a 39-year-old father and analyst for a utility company, was arrested on June 6 and charged with interfering with a peace officer. He's confident the charge will be dismissed, saying he got caught up as police swept through downtown after a protest.

A veteran activist, Smiff took to the streets after seeing a prominent politician talking about reducing funding for police on TV. He thought the wave of rallies following Floyd's death seemed different, more focused, but said Trump deriding protesters as violent extremists is a familiar strategy.

"If you make the blame indiscriminate, then you can make the response indiscriminate. That's just a tactic to justify using escalating force and chemical weapons against us," Smiff said. "I own my house. I'm a professional human being. I'm out here fighting against corruption and police brutality. And the response is I'm a terrorist? That's laughable at best."

He welcomed the news that the federal presence in Portland would be winding down, saying the agents were a "distraction."

"That was a side mission," he said. "We came out here to defund the police."

This version corrects the spelling of a protester's last name to McFerran, not McFarren. It also corrects that a judge found that the state did not have the standing to win an immediate court order restricting operations of federal agents in the city, not that the judge dismissed the case.

Naishadham reported from Atlanta, and Bleiberg from Dallas. Associated Press reporters Gillian Flaccus in Portland, Oregon, Lisa Marie Pane in Boise, Idaho, and AP/Report for America Statehouse News corps member Sara Cline in Salem, Oregon, contributed to this report.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Solemn by day and violent by night, future of George Floyd memorial site is an open question

ARTICLE MCCCXCVII. SOLEMN BY DAY AND VIOLENT BY NIGHT, FUTURE OF GEORGE FLOYD MEMORIAL SITE IS AN OPEN QUESTION

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 30, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1264 words

Byline: New York Times

Highlight: Still, they come - from all over the country and beyond. From New Mexico, Texas, Massachusetts. From Africa and Europe. One man even said he walked a thousand miles, all the way from Alabama, just to be in Minneapolis.

Body

By Tim Arango and Matt Furber

Still, they come - from all over the country and beyond. From New Mexico, Texas, Massachusetts. From Africa and Europe. One man even said he walked a thousand miles, all the way from Alabama, just to be in Minneapolis.

"They are coming to feel the energy and pay tribute," said Bianca Dawkins, 28, a local resident who has met many of the visitors.

Two months after the police killing of George Floyd, the four-block area of South Minneapolis where he gasped his last breaths remains a sacred space, a no-go zone for officers. There is a neatly trimmed garden, anchored by a sculpture of a raised fist. There are colorful murals and the words "I can't breathe" painted across the pavement, as well as the names of dozens of other Black people killed by the police.

At night, though, the space is increasingly a battleground, with shootings and drug overdoses. The area has had an uptick in gun violence similar to what other cities have seen in the wake of protests.

At all times, the neighborhood brims with emotion. In its totality, it feels like the raw center of America's reckoning with racial injustice.

The chaos at night has presented city officials with the challenge of how to reassert control of the space without setting off new waves of anger, all while maintaining it as a solemn place to honor Floyd. In Ferguson, Mo., where the police killing of Michael Brown set off protests in 2014, tensions were reignited when officers moved to clear out a memorial.

But in Minneapolis, at least for now, the city is moving cautiously.

Solemn by day and violent by night, future of George Floyd memorial site is an open question

"Opening up too quickly will have a devastating effect on people still mourning," said Angela Conley, a Hennepin County commissioner, who has been leading community discussions about the future of the area where Floyd was killed.

Even so, elected officials are fielding a growing number of calls from residents concerned about the violence and loud noise at night in the area, where, among several incidents, a pregnant woman was recently killed.

"What people aren't recognizing is that people who live there are having a very, very challenging time from the unlawfulness that is occurring after the sun goes down," said Andrea Jenkins, a member of the City Council whose district includes the memorial space. "There are constant gunshots every night. Emergency vehicles can't get in. Disabled people are not able to access their medications, their appointments, their food deliveries, et cetera. It's a very challenging situation."

Jenkins, who noted that the area has historically been plagued by gang violence, has also been taking a leading role in discussions over how to memorialize Floyd's killing. One proposal suggests making the garden permanent. Other ideas include a civil rights museum and renaming Chicago Avenue in honor of Floyd. Activists are finding ways to preserve the street art that was painted over the plywood boards that went up to protect businesses during the protests.

From Baltimore to Ferguson to New York, organic memorials to mark where Black men have been killed by the police have taken shape in recent years.

But time has also worn many of them away. On Staten Island, New York, there is a plaque where Eric Garner was killed by police in 2014, but a memorial with flowers and candles was set on fire a year after his death. In Baltimore, where Freddie Gray's death in a police van sparked protests, a graffiti mural in honor of him was destroyed when the housing project where he lived was torn down this year. In Ferguson last year, on the fifth anniversary of Brown's death, a memorial that had been taken down was rebuilt.

Even before the killing of Floyd, Jenkins and other activists in South Minneapolis said they had hoped to build a site to recognize the history of racial injustice in the city. "I've been talking about a museum for the last three years," Jenkins said. "My top priority is to build a center for racial healing in the city of Minneapolis because Black people have been in pain for hundreds of years."

The conversation over what to do with the space comes as many activists in the city are fighting to defund the Police Department and reimagine public safety. But that push for reform happening amid a rise in violence. Many Black residents of South Minneapolis, especially those who live near Cup Foods, the convenience store where Floyd was accused of using a fake $20 bill to buy cigarettes before he was killed, say they are caught between two emotions: anger at the police but fearful for their safety now that officers have pulled back from the area.

Dawkins lives a few doors down from Cup Foods, and on a recent afternoon was selling candy and drinks and promoting a GoFundMe campaign to raise money to avoid foreclosure. When the pandemic hit, she was furloughed from her job at Nordstrom, and her fiancé is also out of work.

But financial worries are only one thing on her mind. She has two children, including a 6-week-old baby. She says the daytime is fine, and she has met many people who have traveled to pay their respects to Floyd.

Solemn by day and violent by night, future of George Floyd memorial site is an open question

"But when the other crowd comes at night, I can't call the police, and that scares the hell out of me," she said. Dawkins pointed to a gunshot in the windshield of her car, a gold sedan.

"We have kids in this home, so I do want police to protect families," she said. "It's a hard balance. I'm happy this incident brought change, but I want to feel safe."

As the protests gained momentum in late May, Dr. Jackie Kawiecki set up a medic station near Cup Foods, administering first aid to injured protesters. Since then, she has maintained a group of medics who treat minor ailments like abrasions and heat exhaustion during the daytime.

Sunset to sunrise is very different from sunrise to sunset, she said. "My nighttime world, after sunset, I have taken care of double gunshot wounds, drug overdoses." One night a man wounded by gunfire drove a bicycle past the barricades, she said, before collapsing outside her tent and yelling: "I'm shot! I'm shot!"

After the pregnant woman was killed nearby in early July, and having dodged gunfire herself, Kawiecki limited the hours of her medic station from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m.

But residents say that nothing happening at night diminishes the atmosphere that prevails in daylight. The other day, Anna Raeker, 25, was greeting visitors to the space and directing people to a pamphlet taped to a table: "This is a space community members want to decentralize white feelings and prioritize Black pain."

"I think it's important that white people are intentional with the ways they are using this space," said Raeker, who is white.

Nearby, next to a large mural of Floyd, a local rapper, Jordan Wallingford, was taking a break from filming a music video. Wallingford, who performs under the name Haphduzn, said he at least wanted to see the garden, roundabout and raised fist sculpture stay permanently. "Because that was the spark that changed the world," he said.

Deborah Straub, who for weeks has been handing out snacks to children from the neighborhood - "free candy, free chips, free popcorn, free hot dogs," she said - said the area should be preserved.

"Leave everything the way it is," she said.

Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Graphic

FILE - Outside Cup Foods, at the intersection of 38th Street and Chicago Avenue in Minneapolis, the memorial for George Floyd is filled with flowers, signs and messages from people who came to pay their respects on June 15, 2020. Two months after the killing of Floyd, the four block area of South

Solemn by day and violent by night, future of George Floyd memorial site is an open question

Minneapolis where he gasped his last breaths remains a sacred space. (Caroline Yang/The New York Times)

FILE - Outside Cup Foods in Minneapolis, a woman visits the memorial for George Floyd on June 15, 2020. Two months after the killing of Floyd, the four block area of South Minneapolis where he gasped his last breaths remains a sacred space. (Caroline Yang/The New York Times)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCCCXCVIII.

BACKERS PRESS FOR BOTTINEAU LINE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 30, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 564 wordsByline: JANET MOORE; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The proposed Blue Line extension is delayed amid stalled talks with BNSF.Body

Supporters of the Bottineau Blue Line are calling for "meaningful action" from the governor and others to push the stalled $1.5 billion light-rail project forward.

But for now, the proposed extension of the existing Blue Line linking downtown Minneapolis to the northwestern suburbs appears stalled.

"Our patience is gone," wrote suburban mayors and community representatives along Bottineau's route in a July 23 letter to Gov. Tim Walz, federal, state and county officials, as well as the chairman of the Metropolitan Council. "We need your leadership to stand up for our communities."

The governor received the letter and "would welcome a meeting" with its authors, Walz's spokesman Teddy Tschann said Wednesday.

The Bottineau project has languished for about a year, and questions have surfaced whether a different route or transit type, such as buses, should be considered - moves that would delay the line and likely increase its price tag.

About $129 million from local and state coffers has already been spent planning the project, which has been in the works for more than three decades.

The letter's authors said the project has a heightened sense of urgency after the killing of George Floyd, which has prompted new conversations about racial equity in the Twin Cities.

They are adamant that the Bottineau line remain as planned: light-rail trains serving north Minneapolis, Golden Valley, Robbinsdale, Crystal and Brooklyn Park, some of the most impoverished and transit-dependent communities in the Twin Cities.

Any change "without community conversation is an affront to our residents," they wrote, noting "this is an example of traditional power structures ignoring communities of color and is systemic racism in action." There has been no formal response to the letter.

Backers press for Bottineau line

The project's delay is tied to stalled negotiations with BNSF Railway. About 8 miles of the line's 13-mile route would be shared with the freight giant, which is not interested in such an arrangement.

BNSF reiterated its longstanding stance Wednesday. "We are a freight railroad that moves the goods that we all use every day; we provide a vital service, particularly in these unprecedented times. The proposed Blue Line light rail project does not meet our high standards," the railway said.

But Golden Valley Mayor Shep Harris, who signed the letter, said there's been "no transparent and significant effort to push back" on BNSF.

Brooklyn Park Mayor Jeff Lunde, another signatory, said the lack of access to discussion about the Bottineau's fate "is the most troubling aspect of all this. Why are we not in the room?"

The chairman of the Met Council, Charlie Zelle, said he understands the frustration regarding BNSF's stand. The council vows to invest "in a transitway that connects people to local and regional opportunities," he said in a statement.

Hennepin County Commissioner Mike Opat, who represents several cities along the Bottineau corridor, said there's "seemingly no one who can dislodge the railroad from its unreasonable position." One resolution might involve slightly altering Bottineau's alignment to eliminate BNSF from the picture, he said.

But Blue Line Coalition organizer Ricardo Perez said years of meticulous planning involving communities along the line would be for naught if the route is changed.

"All that work would go to waste," he said.

Janet Moore · 612-673-7752

Twitter: @ByJanetMoore

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

ARTICLE MCCCXCIX. REPRESENTATION IN EDUCATION

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 30, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 11ALength: 788 wordsByline: BEN PHILLIP; HELEN BASSETT; CURTIS JOHNSON; TANYA KHAN; NELLY KORMAN; LAURA MCCLENDON; MONICA SEGURA-SCHWARTZ, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Toxic debate could block real school change // We must stop with the inflammatory language and defamation to strengthen equity and inclusion in education.

Body

The merciless killing of George Floyd launched protests affirming Black lives and prompted a public denunciation of racism across the globe. Due to the punitively unjust oppression of diverse populations, people of color and many of their white counterparts came together and took to the streets in protest. None of these actions would have happened if society had been more equitable toward people from diverse backgrounds.

As we all move forward, the Minnesota School Board Directors of Color (MNSBDOC) are committed to strengthening equity and inclusion in education, despite the hurdles that may threaten to prohibit that effort from moving forward.

By way of background on MNSBDOC, approximately one-third of the public-school pupils in Minnesota are students of color, according to a 2017 analysis by Minnesota Public Radio, while only 3% of directors are people of color. This large disparity led to the founding of MNSBDOC in 2016 by Helen Bassett and Abdi Sabrie, of Robbinsdale and Mankato, respectively.

Sabrie, the first person of color to serve on the Mankato school board, was looking for ways to connect with other board members of color who have had shared cultural experiences. Sabrie met with Bassett, a trailblazer on the Robbinsdale school board, who was elected in 2003. They formed an affinity group and joined with Latinx, Asian and Indigenous directors in 2017.

With the killing of George Floyd and the continuation of the COVID-19 pandemic, along with persistent divisiveness in America, angry discussions are firing up on social media. School districts have been feeling vilification from all sides of the political spectrum. Anger arises over many topics, both big and small.

Even those who side with us on issues of equity and inclusion have used social media to rail against districts' inability to make change at the speed of light. MNSBDOC acknowledges that people are hurting, that change is needed. Many MNSBDOC members have been working for years advocating for and influencing change.

REPRESENTATION IN EDUCATION

There is nothing wrong with pushing a school board to do the right thing or to speed up its timetable. But this should be done via e-mails, phone calls and/or at board meetings, not through an airing of grievances in the social media echo chamber.

To continue with this inflammatory language from afar creates a toxicity that will prevent other people of color from wanting to take teaching or leadership positions, at the risk of being called a "sellout" or "Uncle Tom," and being perceived as merely placating those with power and privilege.

We need to stop the rhetoric and defamation to create what longtime activist Loretta Ross described in a commentary in the New York Times as a "call-in" culture - "a call-out done with love" - that will help everyone learn and change.

Learning begins at an early age. Therefore, it is necessary to instruct our children through an anti-racist perspective to make them better prepared to live, work and play. As we continue to grow our leaders of color, our education systems are still white-centered and are led by predominantly white educators.

Layla F. Saad explains in "Me and White Supremacy": "White centering is the centering of white people, white values, white norms and white feelings over everything and everyone else." It establishes a false norm that diminishes and disregards "others," that blinds us from seeing oppression, inequality and suffering while giving us a false sense of intrinsic equality, even at the expense of marginalized white people.

This makes it even more critical to teach our youth from an anti-racist point of view.

As MNSBDOC moves forward, we will continue to foster excellence in good governance, support effective leadership, and prepare school board members from diverse communities to champion high-quality, public education for all students with a special focus on acknowledging the rich cultural and ethnic diversity of Minnesota students and families.

We all need to view everything through an anti-racist lens to change our policies and actions that continue to keep our students of color in the shadows. We must work together with the hope that our younger generation will learn from our mistakes and break the cycle of fear and negativity that permeates our society and transform it into one of love and respect.

Ben Phillip is a director of St. Anthony-New Brighton. Helen Bassett is board vice chair of Robbinsdale. Curtis Johnson is a director of Roseville. Tanya Khan is a director of Hopkins. Nelly Korman is board chair of Bloomington. Laura McClendon is a director of St. Louis Park. Monica Segura-Schwartz is a director of St. Cloud. MNSBDOC can be reached at mnschoolboarddoc@gmail.com or mnschoolboarddirectorsofcolor.org

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

Sorting through 'humongous haystack' of evidence, St. Paul police working to ID people who damaged businesses, looted them

ARTICLE MCD. SORTING THROUGH 'HUMONGOUS HAYSTACK' OF EVIDENCE, ST. PAUL POLICE WORKING TO ID PEOPLE WHO DAMAGED BUSINESSES, LOOTED THEM

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 30, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1495 words

Byline: Mara H. Gottfried

Highlight: Photos of suspects and vehicles cover the walls of a large room in St. Paul for investigators to review - but you'd likely have to multiply those images by 100 to get the full scope of the evidence they're combing through. The St. Paul Police Department's Civil Unrest Investigative Taskforce is "sorting through that humongous [...]"

Body

Photos of suspects and vehicles cover the walls of a large room in St. Paul for investigators to review - but you'd likely have to multiply those images by 100 to get the full scope of the evidence they're combing through.

The St. Paul Police Department's Civil Unrest Investigative Taskforce is "sorting through that humongous haystack" to determine who broke into buildings, who stole merchandise and who damaged property in St. Paul after the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody on May 25, said Cmdr. Axel Henry, who is leading the task force.

"The police department in St. Paul, we feel awful about what happened to Mr. Floyd, but we have a great city and we don't want to see it get treated this way," Henry said. "A lot of the businesses we've spoken to said they feel very violated - these were businesses that were put together with blood, sweat and tears - and they obviously didn't ask for this and didn't deserve it."

City officials estimate there was $73 million in damage to properties and nearly $9 million in damage to businesses' inventory and assets. The Midway area was the hardest hit, particularly on May 28.

300 CASES UNDER INVESTIGATION

The Civil Unrest Investigative Taskforce couldn't get running right away because most of the police department's investigators were pulled from their regular work to assist patrol officers in the streets during the unrest and in the weeks that followed to ensure there wasn't a return to rioting, Henry said.

The department moved eight investigators from various units, along with a crime analyst, to launch the task force about six weeks ago. Their first order of business was sorting through thousands of calls for police service and police reports from a 72-hour period beginning May 28 to determine which were duplicates, which needed reports and which were connected to incidents outside of St. Paul.

Sorting through 'humongous haystack' of evidence, St. Paul police working to ID people who damaged businesses, looted them

They identified about 300 cases - all with multiple suspects - that have elements that could lead to solving them, Henry said. Some businesses were also looted various times.

Long-time employees at the police department can't remember another investigation with a larger scope than the one that's underway.

The task force is focusing on felony-level crimes.

They're looking into people who were involved in multiple instances of vandalism or theft - "we start to figure out that many of the people that were involved in an incident at 1:30 in the afternoon on Thursday were also present at four or five incidents later in the day, so sometimes the individuals push themselves to the front of the list," Henry said.

Police attention is also focused on people who initially smashed windows to get into businesses and those who stole many valuables.

"If you went inside of a business that already had a broken window and you stole a 12-pack of pop, I don't think anybody, including the police department's really looking for you to get a felony burglary charge on your record, and those aren't really the cases that we're the most concerned about," Henry said.

Jim Segal, who owns Ax-Man Surplus on University Avenue and says their insurance claims will exceed $200,000, thinks finding the people who damaged his store throughout and stole items would be "like finding a needle in a haystack."

"There were so many people coming through the building," said Segal, whose business has reopened. "It's not like one person took a truckload of stuff, it's like hundreds of people ended up taking a truckload of stuff. People were basically carrying out handfuls of stuff."

Plus, Segal said he knows the unrest came from community members feeling mistreated, "so these are huge social issues. My property loss pales in comparison to that. I'm not going to run around chasing people who did that. If the police find them, I do think criminal activity deserves to be prosecuted, but I'm not sure what the appropriate punishment is."

WHO WERE THE PEOPLE INVOLVED?

Some of the people involved appeared to have been "caught up in the moment," while others were organized groups "that were seizing the opportunity to go around and really hit strategic spots," Henry said. Police have found people selling stolen merchandise online.

While Minneapolis police have identified a man who smashed out windows at an Auto Zone store on East Lake Street as a white supremacist who sought to "incite violence." according to a search warrant affidavit, St. Paul police so far haven't identified similar instances, Henry said.

That's not to say there weren't agitators in the groups in St. Paul.

"Some of the people that were committing crimes here were not committing crimes for profit, they were committing crimes just to damage things," Henry said.

Sorting through 'humongous haystack' of evidence, St. Paul police working to ID people who damaged businesses, looted them

Overall, more than half of the people involved in property damage and looting appear to live locally - in St. Paul or the suburbs, said Henry, though he doesn't have hard numbers yet.

VIDEOS ARE KEY TO SOLVING CASES

Videos and photos are the key to identifying suspects, along with tips from community members, Henry said. Police continue to ask people who have photos and videos to submit them to the police department.

There are thousands of hours of footage from businesses' surveillance cameras, video cameras posted on street corners and transit stops, officers' body cameras, and images the public has provided. Investigators are analyzing them to identify who was involved in looting and vandalism.

Many of those in the images are wearing masks - that could have been because of the coronavirus pandemic, to conceal their identity or both, Henry said. But finding multiple images of suspects, including when they're not wearing their masks, can help identify them.

For example, police have footage of a woman breaking the glass window of a cellphone store. She's wearing a mask and it's hard to tell who she is, but her clothes are identifiable.

About 45 minutes later, a passerby saw a woman sitting on a nearby sidewalk with a big bag, which had cellphones visible inside. She was wearing the same clothes as the woman in the video - and this time, she didn't have a mask on, Henry said. The passerby took photos of her and submitted them to police.

It's those puzzles that police say they're putting together by asking other law enforcement agencies whether they recognize suspects, or releasing photos publicly and requesting people who have information come forward.

SOME CHARGED, MORE EXPECTED

The task force's 300 cases don't include arson because, while police are assisting in those investigations, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives is the main investigating agency. That's taken a weight off St. Paul police investigators, Henry said, and led to federal charges in seven arson cases, three of which were in St. Paul.

Police are also working with the Drug Enforcement Administration on investigations into pharmacies that were broken into during the unrest - Henry said there were about six in St. Paul from which drugs were stolen.

The Ramsey County attorney's office charged 27 people, primarily for entering boarded-up buildings and for property damage, between May 28 and June 19.

More recently, the task force has arrested about 10 people, and has sent approximately 20 cases to the county attorney's office for charging review, Henry said.

Maher Safi, who manages the family-owned Midway Tobacco Outlet Plus on University Avenue, said restitution for businesses is important.

"For the people that looted and stole products, I would say instead of jailing them and costing the state millions of dollars, what they need to do is have them financially compensate the stores or the businesses

Sorting through 'humongous haystack' of evidence, St. Paul police working to ID people who damaged businesses, looted them they stole from," said Safi, who added that he thinks people should face more serious consequences if they were involved in more serious offenses.

The store, which has reopened, was remodeled earlier this year, but it was seriously damaged and people wiped out their merchandise; Safi thinks the insurance claim will top $200,000.

When cases are charged, the Ramsey County attorney's office will make restitution recommendations after consulting with the businesses that were affected, according to a spokesman for the office. Judges have the final say in ordering restitution during the sentencing phase.

The St. Paul Police Department is asking people who have photos or videos of arson, theft, looting or property damage during the civil unrest to submit them at stpaulpdmn.evidence.com/axon/citizen/public/CivilDisturbance.

People, who can remain anonymous, can also contact police with information at 651-266-5900 or SPPD-CUITF@stpaul.mn.us. North St. Paul man killed in crash after fleeing Dakota County sheriff's deputy Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Cleric assaulted outside Bloomington mosque; police searching for suspects U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities Minneapolis man sentenced to 33 years in prison for sex-trafficking young women and girls out of massage parlor

Graphic

Cmdr. Axel Henry talks to reporters about the St. Paul Police Civil Unrest Investigative Taskforce in his office in St. Paul on Thursday, July 30, 2020. (John Autey / Pioneer Press)

A classroom has been converted into an investigation headquarters, part of the St. Paul Police Civil Unrest Investigative Taskforce, seen in St. Paul on Thursday, July 30, 2020. (John Autey / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCDI. CHANCES OF COP REFORM IN 2020 DIM

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 30, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 818 wordsByline: LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Mpls. panel votes down one of two proposals.Body

The Minneapolis Charter Commission narrowly voted Wednesday to keep one police proposal off the November ballot - dimming the prospects for voters to weigh in this year on how to remake policing following George Floyd's death.

The commission voted 8-6 to block a proposal that would ask voters to remove the requirement to maintain a police force at a level based on the city's population. That was widely viewed as the simpler of two police proposals up for consideration this year.

The debate about how to remake policing - and how quickly - has divided the city. As they debated for nearly an hour Wednesday evening, it was clear the court-appointed commissioners are just as torn as the community they serve.

Some view the commission as a gatekeeper, tasked with deeply researching proposals and ensuring there wouldn't be unintended consequences before voters weigh in. Others feel the commission's role is solely to determine whether the questions are appropriate for voters - and then to trust residents to make the best decisions for themselves.

"At some point, we need to have a discussion about what our job is," said Charter Commissioner Jan Sandberg, who voted to place the measure on the ballot this year, "because some of the things I've heard in the last hour or so about what our job is with respect to this or any ballot initiative, I do not agree with. And I think we need ... to come up with some kind of consensus on that."

The commission will convene again next week to consider a more far-reaching proposal to reshape policing brought forward by the City Council.

Conversations about how to change the Police Department have zeroed in on the city's charter, which serves as its constitution, and particularly on the clause that requires the city to fund a police force of a certain size.

Since Floyd's death, activists and some officials have called for the city to end its Police Department. Others, including many alarmed by a wave of shootings and other violent crime, have called on the city to pause and first develop a more detailed plan for how to proceed.

Some commissioners who voted against placing the measure on the ballot this year argued that they felt there hadn't been enough time for public engagement while both proposals moved through an expedited process. They favored more research to ensure that people could weigh any unintended consequences before casting their votes.

Commissioner Dan Cohen, a former City Council member and one of the commission's most vocal supporters of police, said he feared that if either measure passed, "crime would soar, property values on our homes would fall" and residents "would flee the city."

"I believe that if one of these measures were to pass the voters of Minneapolis, the result would be a giant self-inflicted wound," he said.

Multiple commissioners who voted to block the measure said they felt the panel needed to consider the political climate. While a vote on this charter amendment wouldn't have directly reduced the size of the police force, it would have handed that power to City Council members who have pledged to do so.

"We wouldn't put it in a charter if we were drafting the charter anew," Commission Chairman Barry Clegg said of the minimum staffing requirement. "But it's there now and the fact is that it's become code for 'defund the police.' So I think it takes on bigger meaning than just some quirky add-on that was done 60 years ago."

Commissioners who voted to put the proposal on the November ballot argued that they must divorce their own feelings about defunding the police from the issue of whether residents should get to vote on the matter.

"I don't know that I would vote for it" if it appeared on the ballot, said Commissioner Christopher Smith. "But I don't think it's the role of this commission to stop this from going before a vote."

The lean of the commission became clear Tuesday when a Charter Commission work group voted 4-2 to recommend keeping the item off the ballot this year.

On Wednesday, eight commissioners voted to block the proposal from the ballot: Cohen, Jill Garcia, Peter Ginder, Andrew Kozak, Jana Metge, Matt Perry, Lyall Schwarzkopf and Clegg.

Voting to put the item on the ballot were commissioners Greg Abbott, Al Giraud-Isaacson, Toni Newborn, Andrea Rubenstein, Sandberg and Smith. Commissioner Barbara Lickness was absent during the vote.

The more closely watched vote will come next week, when the commission decides on an amendment written by five City Council members.

That proposal would eliminate the requirement to keep a police department. In its place, the city would have a broader community safety department that might or might not include officers.

The commission could offer a recommendation on that amendment - which the council could ignore - or it could take more time to review it, thereby missing the deadline to get on this year's ballot.

Chances of cop reform in 2020 dim

Liz Navratil · 612-673-4994

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDII. GOOD SAMARITAN SHOT HELPING ROBBERY VICTIM

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 30, 2020 Thursday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 639 wordsByline: DAVID CHANEN; LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Lyn-Lake store manager recovering from wound.Body

Piercing screams for help sent employees and customers scrambling outside the Sherwin-Williams paint store in Minneapolis' Lyn-Lake neighborhood on Tuesday afternoon.

"They put a gun to my head," yelled the woman, who said two men had just tried to rob her and take her car.

Store manager Jacob Babcock and others went after the men, who had jumped back in their car and fled. He pounded on the back window as someone inside rolled down a window and shot three times. A bullet ricocheted through his back, leaving him bleeding on the street.

Babcock, a father of two, was recovering from surgery Wednesday.

The shooting comes amid a violent trend in the city since the police killing of George Floyd on Memorial Day, with homicides doubling the pace of a year ago and a majority of the City Council voting to defund the Police Department.

Police sent out an alert Tuesday about 100 robberies and 20 car robberies in south Minneapolis in July. Last month, 11 people were shot in Uptown, a few blocks from the attempted robbery.

Police confirmed that the attempted robbery and shooting outside the store Tuesday were done by the same suspects involved in a police chase and standoff on Minneapolis' North Side this week and other robberies in the city.

The suspects in Tuesday's shooting may also be connected to the fatal shooting July 20 of a taxi driver who had confronted two men breaking into his cab, according to police.

The victim was shot about 4:30 p.m. on the 1000 block of E. 22nd Street.

The victim of the attempted robbery told her story to the Star Tribune, but didn't want her name published out of concern for her safety.

Good Samaritan shot helping robbery victim

She said she pulled into a parking lot in a nearby alley near W. Lake Street and Harriet Avenue around noon to return a can of paint.

She left her purse in the car and starting walking to the store, she said, when two men jumped out at her and held two guns to her head.

They demanded money, but she told them she didn't have a purse or cash on her. The men tried to grab her car keys but she said she let out a "bloodcurdling scream," which sent the men back into their car. She suffered large bruises on her arms.

The woman and her family have expressed their gratitude to Babcock and the others who tried to help.

"Jacob ran out of his store to assist my family member," said a man who donated $250 to Babcock's GoFundMe page. "I am humbled and awed by his selfless action."

Kristina Martin, Jacob's sister, told Fox 9 that he is in intensive care with injuries to his shoulder blade, ribs and lung.

"He has a chest tube in and then they're cleaning his gunshot wound because of the entry in back, no exit and kind of watching bullet fragments right now," she told the station.

After the car sped off, the victim of the attempted robbery said things became hazy. She said she screamed for someone to call 911.

"And at that point I was hiding under a car," she said. "I was screaming, 'Is he dead? Is he dead?' "

She had just returned to town after spending 11 days in Voyageurs National Park. She said she wants to sell her Kingfield house and say "adios" to Minneapolis. When the incident unfolded, she thought it had to be a joke.

"I was in the woods with no internet, no Wi-Fi, no news, and it felt wonderful," she said. "And 24 hours later, I had two guns pointed on my head. Resting on my temple."

Her main goal now, however, is to give thanks: "I want the good Samaritans of the Sherwin store to be recognized. The employees."

Babcock's GoFundMe page had already raised more than $20,000 by Wednesday evening.

Hundreds of people posted, including Benjamin Verhasselt, who wrote:

"Jacob has helped me and co-workers with so much in my short time with Sherwin. Jacob is the picture of integrity, and so many people are grateful for him!"

david.chanen@startribune.com

612-673-4465

libor.jany@startribune.com

612-673-4064

Good Samaritan shot helping robbery victim

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDIII. JESSICA KOPP: WE CAN ACKNOWLEDGE THAT THIS IS HARD FOR EVERYONE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 30, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 877 words

Byline: Jessica Kopp

Highlight: At four in the morning on March 13, the first teacher strike in St. Paul in over 70 years ended. With little rest, the district negotiations team who had spent days in intense, closed negotiations, after spending weeks and months in public negotiations, went right back to work continuing to plan for an anticipated closure [...]

Body

At four in the morning on March 13, the first teacher strike in St. Paul in over 70 years ended. With little rest, the district negotiations team who had spent days in intense, closed negotiations, after spending weeks and months in public negotiations, went right back to work continuing to plan for an anticipated closure of Minnesota schools due to COVID 19. This planning had started weeks before, running concurrently with both negotiations and the daily operation of the state's second-largest school district. When schools were closed the following week, we heard the phrase, "unprecedented times" a lot. We knew things would never be the same, we just didn't how different they would be.

Once schools were closed, everyone who doesn't work in and around public education learned what those of us who do have always known: schools are deeply connected to the communities they serve. Due to strong leadership and immense talent and operational capacity, Saint Paul Public Schools was well-positioned to respond immediately to community need and did so by repurposing staff duties and restructuring its nutrition services to distribute and deliver, to date, more than 6 million meals to St. Paul families. We also delivered tech devices and hotspots and enrichment activities. We provided childcare to first responders and essential workers. Educators from Early Childhood through Adult Education moved their classes online. We developed a virtual partnership-based program, Saint Paul Summer Connect, to keep our community close while we had to stay apart.

All of this proactive, compassionate planning began in late February and ran concurrently with an emotional and contentious teacher strike. What we didn't know at the time is this planning would also happen alongside our community's deep and sustained racial reckoning following the killing of George Floyd and the devastating illness and death of Board of Education Chair Marny Xiong. This planning was and is accounting for the deeply personal nature of education and the many ways our families live and work in our community. Reflection and readjustment have been present from the beginning to assess implementation and, in real time, change to meet needs in an unpredictable environment.

Jessica Kopp: We can acknowledge that this is hard for everyone

While paying close attention to the feelings connected to school closure, the team has also relied on data, best practices, and expertise from all corners of education and community to ensure not only a good start to the 2020 school year but meaningful transformation of our system of education in the future.

I am fortunate to know this team and watch them work, and the connection to Saint Paul schools runs deep among district administration staff. Many are long-time St. Paul residents, parents, aunties, and neighbors who have more than a professional stake in how this job gets done - they have personal accountability to their communities and families. No one inside of SPPS is thinking about doing enough to get by, they are thinking about how to make it better - even the best of what is possible in unusual times and whatever lies beyond. Saint Paul Public Schools demonstrated incredible leadership in the early days of the statewide school closure and has shown a remarkable ability to adapt, and it's precisely because of this track record I am confident as an SPPS parent and Saint Paul school board member that we will meet the challenges ahead.

As district plans roll out, please remember this: Most people are not interested in making a political statement with their back-to-school preference but rather, they are thinking about how to best care for their families.

The parent who says I need an in-person school option because I have to be at work to pay the bills and can't support my child at home during distance learning or who is concerned about learning loss is not a villain, nor is the parent who is fearful that in-person learning exposes members of their family to risk of illness, nor is the educator or nutrition-services worker concerned about keeping themselves and their families safe. All these things are true.

And because they are true we can choose to show love and compassion for all our neighbors who are living through the pandemic, the fight against racial injustices, personal grief and losses, and any combination of ongoing health concerns and economic anxiety.

We can acknowledge that this is hard for everyone.

We can recognize and act on our deep connection and responsibility to one another and decide to do all we can to ease burdens that may arise with what will be an imperfect and evolving back-to-school plan.

Social media victory laps or pointing to a political scoreboard has never taught one child how to read or provided families reliable access to wi-fi, so what we choose to do next and how we choose to treat one another matters a great deal.

In Saint Paul, I'm looking forward to unprecedented collaboration and extraordinary acts of love and kindness in the weeks and months ahead to support our schools. If you believe education is important, stand up and be counted. It's time to go to work.

Jessica Kopp of St. Paul is a member of the Saint Paul Public Schools board. She wrote this column from her own perspective and not on behalf of the school board.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Jessica Kopp: We can acknowledge that this is hard for everyone

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDIV. MINNEAPOLIS HOME SALES STEADY AFTER RIOTS, REPORT FINDS

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

July 30, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 308 words

Byline: Carter Jones

Body

Homes in Minneapolis are still in high demand, despite the civil unrest following the death of George Floyd while in police custody.

A report released this week by the Minneapolis Area Realtors (MAR) found there was no significant change in the Minneapolis housing market compared to surrounding cities following the death of Floyd on May 25, the ensuing riots and the police reform movement. New listings in Minneapolis and surrounding cities went down for the week ending May 30. While listings have increased since then, the number is still lower than 2018 and 2019.

"Since Mr. Floyd's death, there have been several misleading claims that Minneapolis residents are fleeing the city," said MAR President Linda Rogers. "Utilizing data from NorthstarMLS, MAR conducted a thorough analysis of the housing market and the data clearly shows otherwise."

Minneapolis home sales steady after riots, report finds

Minneapolis was the only city to show a decline in the number of days a home stays on the market. Last month, homes sold in 5.9% fewer days in Minneapolis compared to the same time last year. Meanwhile, St. Paul, Golden Valley, Eden Prairie and Minnetonka all saw double digit increases in market times.

RELATED: Read the full housing market report here

"It is evident that Minneapolis properties are in high demand, with buyers snapping up available homes," Rogers said. "Buyers are still very interested and committed to living in the city."

Minneapolis home sellers are continuing to receive 100% of their list price in June. Eden Prairie and Bloomington saw gains in their selling price, while all other cities went down.

The report concludes that even if a large share of homes went on the market, the high demand would absorb the extra listings, limiting the negative impact on values.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: July 30, 2020

Portland, Oregon, protests relatively calm after US drawdown

ARTICLE MCDV. [PORTLAND, OREGON, PROTESTS RELATIVELY CALM AFTER US
DRAWDOWN](#)

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 31, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 913 words

Byline: Associated Press

Highlight: PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) - Leaders in Portland, Oregon, caught their breath and moved forward with cautious optimism Friday after the first nightly protest in weeks ended without any major confrontations, violence or arrests.

Body

By GILLIAN FLACCUS and ANDREW SELSKY

PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) - Leaders in Portland, Oregon, caught their breath and moved forward with cautious optimism Friday after the first nightly protest in weeks ended without any major confrontations, violence or arrests.

The dramatic change in tone outside a federal courthouse that's become ground zero in clashes between demonstrators and federal agents came after the U.S. government began drawing down its forces in the liberal city under a deal between Democratic Gov. Kate Brown and the Trump administration.

As agents from U.S. Customs and Border Protection, the U.S. Marshals Service and Immigration and Customs Enforcement pulled back, troopers with the Oregon State Police took over. There were no visible signs of any law enforcement presence outside the Mark O. Hatfield Federal Courthouse, where a protest lasted into early Friday.

"Last night, the world was watching Portland. Here's what they saw: Federal troops left downtown. Local officials protected free speech. And Oregonians spoke out for Black Lives Matter, racial justice, and police accountability through peaceful, non-violent protest," Brown said in a tweet Friday.

Mayor Ted Wheeler also struck an optimistic tone but cautioned that there was much work to be done after more than 60 days of protests - and not just in cleaning up downtown Portland.

Leaders in Oregon are pushing for a raft of measures that would address systemic racism in everything from policing to housing. Those proposals could be fast-tracked for consideration in a special legislative session later this summer.

The governor also announced the creation of a Racial Justice Council to advise her on criminal justice reform and police accountability, health equity, economic opportunity, housing and homelessness, and environmental justice.

Portland, Oregon, protests relatively calm after US drawdown

"The council will examine and begin to dismantle the racist policies that have created grave disparities in virtually every part of our society," Brown's office said in a statement.

A majority of the group's members will be people of color and include state lawmakers to help get policies passed next year.

Portland's City Council also voted this week to refer a ballot measure to voters in November that would create a police review board independent from any elected official or city department.

"We need the time to heal. We need the time to allow people to come back downtown and experience the great downtown that people remember from just a few months ago," said Wheeler, a Democrat. "The mass demonstrations that we've seen over many, many weeks, those demands have been heard. The demands have been understood."

The scene outside the federal courthouse stood in sharp contrast to the violent clashes between protesters and the agents that President Donald Trump sent to Oregon's largest city in early July. Protests have roiled Portland for more than two months following the police killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis.

And while thousands have marched and rallied peacefully, Portland's federal courthouse became a target for some protesters. Smaller numbers of demonstrators tried to tear down a fence erected to protect it, lit fires at the courthouse entryway and hurled fireworks, flares and bricks at the agents holed up inside. Most nights, the agents responded by firing tear gas.

But at the protest that began Thursday night, there was little violence and few signs of confrontation as several thousand people gathered near the courthouse .

A handful of protesters pointed lights and lasers at the building, but state troopers remained inside and did not respond. Soon afterward, hundreds of demonstrators gathered about a block from the courthouse to listen to speeches, with little sign of a law enforcement presence. The mood remained calm into early Friday as the crowd dwindled to about 500 demonstrators.

In preparation for the handover from federal authorities to state troopers, the local sheriff and Portland police met and agreed not to use tear gas except in situations with a threat of serious injury or death, the mayor said.

Wheeler, who was gassed when he joined protesters outside the courthouse last week, added that tear gas "as a tactic really isn't all that effective" because protesters have donned gas masks and often return to the action after recovering for a few minutes. He apologized to peaceful demonstrators exposed to tear gas used by Portland police before federal officials arrived.

Under the deal announced by the governor, the agents will withdraw in phases. But federal officials insisted that the agents will not leave the city completely and will be kept on standby.

Portland Police Chief Chuck Lovell said he believes the new collaboration between local law enforcement agencies will be seen "as a victory in many ways."

"A lot of people came out to express their displeasure of folks from the federal government here and engaging in crowd control with members of our community," Lovell said. "So I'm hoping that on many levels that people are happy in this development."

Portland, Oregon, protests relatively calm after US drawdown

The U.S. government had arrested 94 people as of Wednesday, the most recent accounting. Since the protests began, Lovell said local police made more than 400 arrests.

Selsky reported from Salem. Associated Press/Report for America Statehouse News Initiative corps member Sara Cline contributed from Salem. Report for America is a nonprofit national service program that places journalists in local newsrooms to report on undercovered issues.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDVI. READERS WRITE NAME-CALLING CHANGES NO MINDS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 31, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 6ALength: 1294 wordsBody

RACISM

In his commentary "I am a racist. So is Katherine Kersten. She can't admit it" (July 27), Jack Nelson-Pallmeyer discusses implicit bias to broaden the definition of who is a racist. Although he does not say that all white people are racist, he does say that he is racist and that "if you are a white person reading this, odds are you are, too."

Nelson-Pallmeyer draws on critical race theory, which holds that all white people are racist. It also holds that whites who will not admit they are racist are the most racist of all, since the very act of denial proves that the person making it is racist. This is twisted logic that must be rejected.

Clearly many more people are racist than will admit to being so. However, their minds will not be easily changed by such tactics. Studies in conflict resolution show that we build bridges between people by creating situations where they can talk to each other respectfully and where those with a grievance can be heard. Such situations demand empathy and a willingness by all sides to listen.

I am sure that Nelson-Pallmeyer, being a professor of justice and peace studies, knows of this work. So, if Kersten is a racist, why would he call her such? As a peace leader, wouldn't it be more constructive for him to initiate a respectful dialogue with her about their differences? We need conflict transformation professionals to help us all learn how to communicate constructively, rather than modeling name-calling as a response to disagreement.

Ruth Henriquez Lyon, Duluth, Minn.

...

I read Nelson-Pallmeyer's opinion piece with interest. I will state at the outset that I am no fan of Kersten ("Racial justice: The new religion?" Opinion Exchange, July 25). Nelson-Pallmeyer is a professor emeritus of justice and peace studies at the University of St. Thomas. Presumably, he has spent much of his adult life striving to advance causes of social justice, and he is certainly to be commended for that. However, two things are clear, based on Nelson-Pallmeyer's argument: 1) it is virtually impossible for any white person in the United States not to be classified as a racist and 2) it is virtually impossible for any white person in the United States to do "enough" to escape this status. Under this extraordinarily broad definition, the concept of being "a racist" loses its meaning. For example, calling President Donald Trump a racist has no substantive meaning because, as a white person, he is by default a racist just as Nelson-Pallmeyer is.

READERS WRITE Name-calling changes no minds

Peter Langworthy, St. Paul

...

If you are having trouble accepting the idea that you as a white person are a racist, consider your participation in how you and the larger white majority community benefit from systemic racism. A fundamental example that feeds many of today's racial disparities is the fact that Black folks have been systematically denied the means to build capital over the entire history of this country starting 400 years ago with unpaid labor. In the last century white families benefited financially from government programs over generations that almost completely excluded Black families: Federal Housing Administration loans and the post-World War II GI bill home loans and education benefits. The individual financial stability of many white families and communities originated in systemic racist policies. And many white families and communities continue to benefit, while Black families and communities continue to suffer because of this legacy of systemic racism. And to deny that these foundations of our economy have their roots in systemic racism is, in fact, racist.

And no, our job is not to be weighed down by guilt over this, but rather to acknowledge this legacy as an example of systematic racism that white folks continue to benefit from, to teach the injustice of this history and how it shapes current economic disparities, and to work for changes that don't perpetuate these inequalities. And I believe we need to work for some type of reparations that would acknowledge the injustices of the past and serve to level the playing field for all races and communities in our country.

Carol Witte, Minneapolis

...

Nelson-Pallmeyer paints Kersten and apparently all white people as "racist." He distinguishes between "overt" racism, as displayed by militant white supremacists, and institutional racism, which includes implicit bias and all manner of sins. Apparently in his worldview, all whites are guilty of being racist simply by birth - like original sin. This is essentially the "raceology" that Kersten was assailing in her July 25 piece.

My problem with Nelson-Pallmeyer's perception of racism is that it fails to acknowledge that it is possible for nonwhites to be racist. If a Black militant hates all white people, or all Asian people, or all non-Black people, is that person a racist? Not in Nelson-Pallmeyer's universe. According to white privilege orthodoxy, racism can only be manifested by members of the dominant culture. We are thus to believe that all the problems minorities experience are the result of white oppression, and never because of their own behavior. To me, this belief that race is the primary determinant of human success or failure is in itself a racist philosophy, if you accept the Merriam-Webster definition that racism is "a belief that race is the primary determinant of human traits and capacities and that racial differences produce an inherent superiority of a particular race."

Donald Wolesky, Minneapolis

NAZI IMAGERY

Not your political ammunition

Wednesday's editorial and the comments of Steve Hunegs, executive director of the Jewish Community Relations Council of Minnesota and the Dakotas, are exactly right in condemning the couple who wore the swastika masks into that Marshall, Minn., Walmart ("Condemning hate at Minnesota Walmart"). Like the Facebook post that compared our mask mandate to Nazi Germany forcing Jews to wear the Star of David, such uses of Nazi imagery do, like Hunegs says, a historic injustice to World War II veterans and Holocaust survivors. And the editorial is correct when it concludes, quoting David Goldenberg, that "we all need to speak out" because "that's the only way you're going to put this genie back in the bottle." But I would add to this admonition: that we speak out indiscriminately, without regard to who is the one using Nazi imagery.

I would like to have seen similar condemnation when Rep. James Clyburn and Speaker Nancy Pelosi called the federal agents deployed to Portland to protect federal property "storm troopers" using "Gestapo tactics." Using such historical analogies does exactly what Hunegs and the editorial condemn - using Nazi imagery to promote a political opinion.

Ronald Haskvitz, Golden Valley

. . .

Jennifer Brooks penned the well-written article "This is us: Shoppers wearing swastikas" (July 28) rightfully vilifying the despicable behavior displayed by an obviously radicalized couple wearing swastika face masks in the Marshall Walmart. However, I question her decision to end the column with a "choose your side" rallying cry. Although I cannot fathom how anyone would choose the other side of this issue, demanding that we make a choice is exactly what led these two to believe that their actions were justifiable. Choosing a side demands allegiance, stifles debate, prohibits compromise, foments radicalism and incubates incredible stupidity in some people.

A moderate might point out that the requirement of wearing a protective face mask is not an infringement on our civil liberties and that the Constitution does not protect us from being offended. Some of us find hope in the belief that a pragmatic moderate will likely be our next president.

Dan Eittreim, Minneapolis

We want to hear from you. Send us your thoughts here.

Load-Date: August 3, 2020

Virus hits top officers in Mpls. police ranks

ARTICLE MCDVII. VIRUS HITS TOP OFFICERS IN MPLS. POLICE RANKS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 31, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1B

Length: 375 words

Byline: LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: A senior civilian staffer was also hospitalized as cases reach 24.

Body

The Minneapolis Police Department, already faced with staffing shortages from a wave of departures since the George Floyd protests, has seen a rise in the number of employees testing positive for COVID-19, including three deputy chiefs and a senior civilian staff member who were all infected around the same time.

An MPD spokesman confirmed that the department has had 24 coronavirus cases as of Wednesday and that a "vast majority" have since recovered and returned to work.

"Our sworn personnel in the chief's office are all operational and working," said spokesman John Elder, who declined to give their ranks, citing medical privacy laws.

But four sources with knowledge of department operations say that three of the department's four deputy chiefs tested positive, prompting the rest of the command staff, including Chief Medaria Arradondo, to self-isolate at home as a precaution. Another positive case was a senior civilian official who had to be hospitalized, the sources say.

The revelations come amid the continued spread of the deadly virus; state health officials on Thursday announced 745 new cases as the state passed more than 1 million diagnostic tests conducted.

The department has taken certain precautions, such as requiring officers to wear masks on all calls and screening visitors to its police stations and other department buildings. Officers are also being encouraged to take their temperatures at home and not report for work if they have a fever.

For months, the department has been largely spared the type of major outbreak that has hit other departments such as Detroit, New York City and Los Angeles, which last week had its first officer death from the virus.

Virus hits top officers in Mpls. police ranks

In Minneapolis, officers had previously been assigned protective equipment such as masks, gloves and hand sanitizer, but until recently hadn't been required to use the gear on all calls.

At the same time, department officials have been scrambling to fill staffing gaps amid rising crime, with dozens of officers leaving the force or taking temporary medical furloughs in the wake of Floyd's killing on May 25 while in police custody. Some units have been disbanded due to budget cuts related to the pandemic, officials say.

Libor Jany · 612-673-4064 Twitter: @StribJany

Load-Date: August 3, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDVIII. LETTERS: LEARN MORE ABOUT WHY PEOPLE ARE PROTESTING

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 31, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 934 wordsByline: Letter WritersHighlight: How to move forward I almost choked on my coffee when I read the July 22 letter from Jack Herrick, "One wonders how informed people are." The writer obviously has no idea why people are protesting the racism that does not allow many people in this great nation to "be successful and build a better [...]"Body

I almost choked on my coffee when I read the July 22 letter from Jack Herrick, "One wonders how informed people are." The writer obviously has no idea why people are protesting the racism that does not allow many people in this great nation to "be successful and build a better mousetrap."

Fully funding schools, providing access to health care and affordable housing, and a fair system of justice might start to close the gap between the haves and the have-nots. This is far from socialism; it is improving life for our fellow citizens.

We cannot continue to say "I got mine, you are on your own." We need to look at policies that keep the poor and underclass down. A thriving middle class and a hopeful lower class with opportunities would benefit the whole economy, and corporations would not have to resort to sleight-of-hand tricks to look good every quarter on Wall Street.

The letter writer and others who think as he does should spend time learning about the reasons why people are protesting and figuring out ways to help rather than closing their minds. Does he ever read the opinion columns in this very paper, the ones that explain how we got here and how we can move forward? John Kass has a very narrow viewpoint, which I read to stay informed. I suggest Mr. Herrick read the other opinion columns and some of the countless books that are available on the subject to broaden his knowledge.

Cynthia Spellman, Shoreview

A recent edition of the Pioneer Press reported on retribution by Intel and UnitedHealth Group for comments made by U.S. Rep. Jim Hagedorn of Minnesota; both companies intending to withdraw

Letters: Learn more about why people are protesting financial support for Rep. Hagedorn because he opined that Black Lives Matter supports the ongoing riots and that they seek to undermine our culture.

While we almost unanimously support elimination of police brutality, equal treatment under the law, equal educational and equal economic opportunity for all, those are not the only goals of BLM. Alicia Garza and Patrisse Cullors, two of the founders of BLM, are openly avowed supporters of Marxism. BLM has supported, and does support, the violent riots; it supports defunding the police even as violence against police and property regularly occurs at the nightly riots; among other radical ideas, it supports diminishing the role of the nuclear family, an institution which I believe is the greatest hope for addressing the poverty and violence in our cities.

One can support the goals of racial equality and not support the radical aspects of the BLM organization. Rep. Hagedorn's comments do not imply racism on his part or lack of sympathy and support for the fair and equitable treatment of all.

Let us put love and respect for one another at the forefront of our efforts at resolution of racial issues, yet let us be free to voice sincere points of view which differ from those required by political correctness.

On Monday Minnesota GOP Chairwoman Jennifer Carnahan sent out her Weekly Update email. In it she said, "Since June 21st, with the exception of two days, Minnesota has seen single-digit deaths due to COVID-19, with a majority of those in long-term care facilities. While we all wish for no deaths due to this disease, the statistics show we are doing well as a state."

This surprised me since Ms. Carnahan usually says the governor has failed miserably in addressing Covid-19.

Ah, then she went back to her usual attack mode, continuing with, "Last Saturday is when the mandate of wearing masks was implemented across Minnesota, based on yet another executive order from our Supreme Leader. It's time for this madman to release his powers."

Madman? Really? Well, for a madman Gov. Walz sure is doing a great job. I guess Ms. Carnahan is just confused. While she tries to figure it out, wear a mask, folks. It's the right thing to do.

K.C. Simmer, St. Paul

The politicians in St. Paul who want desperately to spend money and possibly buy votes this fall are calling this legislative session's "bonding bill" the "local jobs and projects" bill. The goal is to foster the idea that when the state of Minnesota spends money, jobs are "created."

This is a popular idea, but is simply not true. A competent economist will tell you that jobs "created" by such spending are always at the cost of jobs destroyed somewhere else. This is because the money spent by the state is taken in taxes from citizens elsewhere. If money to be spent is borrowed, its costs are imposed on future citizens. Those citizens are unable to "create" jobs with their own spending.

If state spending really did "create" jobs, then why not spend more? Why limit it to $1 billion? Why not spend $5 billion or $100 billion? It's because like any third party, the State takes a "cut" for its "help."

Letters: Learn more about why people are protesting

When the state spends on your behalf, you end up with less in the end, and let's not even talk about waste, fraud and abuse.

Sensible politicians and sensible citizens know this is a scam. State spending has a cost, and citizens pay for it. The incentive for politicians is that they get to play Santa Claus, and politicians love that. They tell us that it's 100% benefit, but it's just not true.

You can't power your sailboat forward by blowing really hard into your sail. Perpetual motion machines don't exist. Don't let the politicians tell you otherwise.

Don Lee, Eagan

Letters: We need more good police, not fewer Hey, State Fair ticket scalpers: you're tainted! Letters: Mayor and governor point fingers but expect the federal government to pay? Letters: Is it the most-rigged election ever, win or lose? Letters: What's the St. Paul budget plan?

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Periscope has had a rocky year, even by 2020 standards. What's its new president doing about it?

ARTICLE MCDIX. PERISCOPE HAS HAD A ROCKY YEAR, EVEN BY 2020 STANDARDS.
WHAT'S ITS NEW PRESIDENT DOING ABOUT IT?

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

July 31, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 545 words

Byline: Patrick Rehkamp

Body

Cari Bucci-Hulings started as president of the Minneapolis-based advertising agency July 6 with a lengthy to-do list, including navigating the upheaval the coronavirus brought to the ad industry and managing an office that had walked out en masse just days before, protesting what employees said was interference from owner Quad/Graphics Inc. over Periscope's support for the Black Lives Matter movement. In the spring Quad laid off dozens of workers, including some from Periscope. Plus there's still a pending lawsuit from a former employee claiming sexual discrimination at the agency.

She recently spoke with the Business Journal to talk about why she took the job and what will change under her leadership. The conversation has been edited for length and clarity.

The ad agency has had some issues. There's the sex discrimination lawsuit, the walkout. How are you handling this?

Periscope has had a rocky year, even by 2020 standards. What's its new president doing about it?

Well, just to be clear and fair, I cannot discuss the lawsuit. On Periscope's website, we published a four-point action plan on racial issues that are being discussed across the country. We are moving forward assertively on those points. We have also received a lot of support from Quad on this. We're working on the culture at Periscope and getting it right and really leaning into change.

Why did you take the job?

Periscope has an exceptional creative team. With Periscope and Quad taken together, it's a great integrated offering. We also have the resources to move quickly on projects and ideas.

How is business shaping up for 2020? Any more layoffs within the organization?

Business has been pretty stable as of late. We saw some early disruptions because of the coronavirus. If things stay as is, we're in a pretty solid position and won't expect layoffs. I think revenue-wise, we'll see some falloff from 2019, which was roughly $49 million.

When do you expect the office to open back up?

We're prepared to work remotely as long as need be. We're following guidelines from the Center for Disease Control and local governments. We're also watching when and if schools open. I think we're looking at the end of the year, but that's to be determined. I also think there's a bit of work-from-home fatigue.

How is coronavirus and working remotely going to change the ad industry?

I think the competition for top talent is going to change dramatically and become more fierce. As we loosen up the focus on locations, talent can come from more places. There will also be an expansion of the gig-economy in advertising.

Can a conservative printing company, like Quad, and a creative ad agency, like Periscope, ever realistically get along?

I think the lesson of what is going on in the world today is that no matter where you come from, an authentic desire for progress and collaboration are key. Quad and Periscope share the desire to innovate and transform at the pace of culture and the pace of business. It is our aligned mission and the ability to listen to varied perspectives that make that transformation possible. So yes, we are able to work together and function well. We function well now, which is how we can weather disruption and change, coming out collectively better for it.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

All eyes on this group for police reforms

ARTICLE MCDX. ALL EYES ON THIS GROUP FOR POLICE REFORMS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 31, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1A

Length: 1054 words

Byline: JESSIE VAN BERKEL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Body

A little-known police licensure board that has come under fire for letting officers escape accountability is now at the center of Minnesota's attempt to build trust in law enforcement.

The Peace Officer Standards and Training Board emerged from the reckoning that followed the Minneapolis police killing of George Floyd with a series of mandates intended to increase police accountability statewide. The Legislature tasked the board with bolstering its citizen oversight, setting a model use-of-force policy, creating a database to track officer misconduct, discouraging warrior-style training and developing autism training requirements.

Those new responsibilities are part of what interim POST Board Executive Director Erik Misselt calls a "watershed moment" for a licensing authority that has seen relatively little change since it was created in 1977. Misselt recently asked an international organization to audit the board's police education, training and regulatory processes and see how they stack up against other states.

And last week the board agreed to conduct a comprehensive overhaul of its standards and training rules.

"If you want to reform policing, you have to reform the POST Board," Board Chairwoman Kelly McCarthy said, because without the board changes, police practices in Minnesota would be local and piecemeal. "It really is the best place to make those statewide standards."

However, McCarthy said the board she helms is not in a position to ask for the public's trust. The POST Board hasn't "put our best foot forward in the past," she said, and needs to earn public trust by holding officers responsible and showing that members are addressing questions of racism in policing.

A Star Tribune investigation in 2017 found hundreds of officers had been convicted of crimes over the past two decades without losing their professional licenses. After that, the board changed its standards for which criminal offenses would prompt a reconsideration of officers' licensure.

Michelle Gross, with the advocacy group Communities United Against Police Brutality, said she is hopeful about McCarthy and Misselt's leadership. Her organization has criticized the board in the past and urged it to take a stronger role in police discipline. Currently that responsibility resides largely with the local agencies.

Gross said she was disappointed with the compromise police reforms the Legislature passed earlier this month, saying they did not go far enough.

However, she said the POST Board reforms are significant.

For police accountability advocates, one of the most significant changes was the creation of a new citizen group - the Ensuring Police Excellence and Improving Community Relations Advisory Council - that will recommend POST Board reforms. "They better get that it's a new day and we better see real changes," Gross said. "This is the state licensing agency for police, and they had damn well better step up and make some real changes here."

The POST Board reforms were among the most controversial items in the police accountability bill, said Rep. Carlos Mariani, DFL-St. Paul. Lawmakers reached a compromise on the reform package after nearly two months of debate on how to prevent another incident like that involving Floyd, a Black man who died in Minneapolis police custody.

The makeup of the advisory council was a key sticking point. Lawmakers ended up including fewer citizens and more law enforcement than Mariani wanted. He said legislators need to closely watch the work of the POST Board and ensure the new advisory council is not a paper tiger, and that its recommendations result in change.

"I'm going to be watching," Mariani said of the reviews and changes to the POST Board. "Their history doesn't give me a whole lot of confidence."

Brian Peters, executive director of the Minnesota Police and Peace Officers Association, was involved in negotiating the POST Board reforms and said they reached a good balance in the makeup of the advisory council.

"I don't want it to turn into an attack on cops. This needs to be something that is fair," Peters said.

Peters said he supports the POST Board's re-evaluation of its training and licensure processes.

"Law enforcement is notorious for not changing very quickly," he said, adding that the board needs to make sure its requirements are relevant to the times and consistent throughout the state.

The creation of a centralized database to track officer behavior was less controversial, but both McCarthy and Mariani said it could have a long-term impact. They said it could shift the board from a reactive role to proactively identifying officers with patterns of misbehavior.

"We're going to be able to make better decisions going forward. We're going to be able to spot problem officers," McCarthy said. "We're going to be able to do some prevention and not just response."

Peters said the data could also illuminate broader systemic issues in a department or among an agency's leadership.

"We're trying to fix the rank-and-file cop," he said. "But nobody is focusing on the leadership at some of these departments."

All eyes on this group for police reforms

The various sides involved with creating the Legislature's police reforms called it a first step and said more work is needed.

Misselt and McCarthy said one of their next goals for the POST Board is to work with federal and state governments to allow the board to do national criminal history checks when someone is trying to renew a license or enter a police academy.

In the near-term, Misselt said the Legislature needs to address confusion around the timeline of the start of the advisory council and the creation of the database that tracks misconduct. He hopes lawmakers straighten out those start dates during an anticipated special session in August.

Jessie Van Berkel · 651-925-5044

POST BOARD CHANGES

Expand the board, which is largely made up of law enforcement officials, from 15 to 17 members. The governor will appoint the two new members.

Add a council that will ensure that board policies and regulations protect civil and human rights and work on reforming police-community interaction.

Build and operate a database that tracks officer misconduct.

Develop an updated model policy for use of force and help agencies implement it.

Discourage "warrior-style" training.

Create a training policy for interacting with people with autism.

Load-Date: August 3, 2020

ART REVIEW

ARTICLE MCDXI. ART REVIEW

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 31, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 768 wordsByline: ALICIA ELER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Walker critiques itself in new show // Exhibit of art by women looks at inequality in the art world - and in the museum's own collection.Body

The pandemic blew up museums' exhibition schedules, delaying opening dates for months or even years, leaving artists and visitors disappointed.

The quietly powerful show "Don't Let This Be Easy," which opened Thursday at Walker Art Center, didn't meet that fate. It was pushed back only two weeks from its original opening date, in part because it draws from the center's own collection.

The exhibition features 76 works in every media by 30 women artists. Most of the works were created from the 1970s through the 1990s, with the exception of a few recent acquisitions such as Ojibwe artist Andrea Carlson's screen print tackling settler colonialism and Native histories and Christina Quarles' "Feel'd," an abstract painting confronting race, sexuality, gender and queerness.

Curators Nisa Mackie and Alexandra Nicome, who are part of the Walker's education department, have organized the show to inform without being didactic. More broadly, it looks at structural inequality in the art world, focusing on how that plays out in the Walker's collection.

The show utilizes an intersectional feminist framework, focusing on "womxn," a term that centers transgender, nonbinary and nonwhite women. It was organized as part of the Feminist Art Coalition (FAC), a platform that collaborates with arts institutions across the country on social justice and structural change.

"Don't Let This Be Easy" is about having those difficult conversations, so it's opening at a perfect time, as institutions reconsider what "equity and diversity" really means following the killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody.

ART REVIEW

The works are both familiar and surprising. Howardena Pindell's iconic "Free, White and 21" (1980), a video about racism she experienced as a Black woman in America, marks both the entrance and exit in this content-rich heavy show that jams everything into one big seventh-floor gallery space. Pindell alternates between telling stories as herself, a Black woman speaking in a deadpan manner. At one point, she talks about discrimination in hiring practices for a picture researcher position, then pivots to herself as a blonde white woman who remarks: "Don't worry, we will find other tokens!"

That woman "could be considered a 'Karen' of today," said co-curator Mackie, director of education and public programs at the Walker, referencing the current slang for an entitled, middle-aged white woman who is often racist without realizing it.

More than half the works in this show are artist books in glass cases, arranged in the middle of the gallery. One, dated 1986, feels like it could've been made last month - Adrian Piper's "My Calling (Card) #2," located under glass in the show's "Humor" section. The business card becomes a way to call out a racist comment. "Dear Friend, I am Black," the card begins. "I am sure you did not realize this when you made/laughed at/agreed with that racist remark."

The exhibition also critiques the ways that institutions form collections.

The Walker owns pioneering Postminimalist sculptor Eva Hesse's " 'Untitled,' From the Portfolio '7 Objects/69' " (1969), a brick-size sculpture made of gauze, rubber, balloon and powder that looks like a thick piece of wax or folded flesh. Mackie pointed out that while the Walker often collected such male contemporaries of Hesse as Bruce Nauman, Alan Saret and Richard Serra, the museum has only this one work of hers in the form of a small multiple.

Similarly, a collection of three mixed-media works made in the 1970s by feminist artist Ree Morton weren't acquired until 2011. Mackie discovered that during the '70s, artworks by men were collected at the time they were made, but for women it took decades longer.

"There are lots of women artists who practice their whole lives and are virtually undiscovered, or get picked up by male curators while they are in the later years of their lives and heralded as 'grandmothers,' " said Mackie. "When does a woman artist get to be famous? It's either when you're a bright young star, or when you're much older."

Works by women artists now account for 21% of the Walker's collection, Mackie said.

While this show is focused largely on works from decades ago, it's hard not to think about how so many of them feel ominously contemporary, marking histories that viciously repeat themselves.

alicia.eler@startribune.com · 612-673-4437 ·

Twitter: @AliciaEler

Don't Let This Be Easy

When: 11 a.m.-9 p.m. Thurs., 11 a.m.-6 p.m. Fri.-Sat.; 11 a.m.-5 p.m. Sun.

Timed reservation tickets required. Book at secure.walkerart.org/events

Where: 725 Vineland Pl., Mpls.

ART REVIEW

Info: walkerart.org or 612-375-7600

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDXII. BAIL-PAYING NONPROFIT HALTS SERVICES AT JAIL

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 31, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 2BLength: 593 wordsByline: PAUL WALSH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: It says Ramsey County has not taken sufficient coronavirus precautions.Body

The Ramsey County jail is under fire from a bail-providing nonprofit alleging that coronavirus-related health conditions are so dangerous inside the facility that it is halting its services for low-income inmates.

The Minnesota Freedom Fund, which gained momentum after jails in Minneapolis and St. Paul started taking in people arrested in connection with the unrest over the police-involved death of George Floyd, said it can no longer risk its staff's safety when posting bail for inmates who otherwise can't afford to do so.

Greg Lewin, executive director of the organization, said in a letter this week to Sheriff Bob Fletcher that his group suspended bailing out Ramsey County inmates on July 22 because of several troubling aspects for anyone in the space for bail transactions, which must be made in person and in cash, although bail bond companies can make electronic transactions:

- No partition between where the bail is paid and where an inmate is released.
- Tight quarters where bail is posted, which can get crowded with others there transferring money to inmates, making calls to the jail or awaiting someone's release.
- Lax enforcement of mask use by civilians and Sheriff's Office deputies.
- Prolonged exposure in the bail-payment area. Transactions run anywhere from 20 to 40 minutes.

"You'd think a jail wouldn't have to play catch-up to Trader Joe's" when providing a lower-risk environment, Lewin said Thursday, "especially when they speak the language of public safety."

Lewin said the Sheriff's Office replied to his letter and pledged to follow up. The Star Tribune also has requested a response from Fletcher or other senior staff to the fund's points.

In the meantime, Lewin said, there are at least a dozen inmates in the jail who have requested bail assistance from the fund but now are left with three options less appealing than being released as their criminal cases proceed: remain locked up, pay a bail bond company to post the bail, or plead guilty to a crime, possibly to one that would not have otherwise led to conviction.

Bail-paying nonprofit halts services at jail

Lewin suggested in his letter to Fletcher that bail transactions be moved to a safer neighboring space, where other clerical duties are conducted and inmate photos are provided. He said it compares similarly to the layout in Hennepin County.

"This change, along with appropriate signage about masks and readily available hand sanitizer, will improve conditions and will eliminate unnecessary risks for our bail payers," Lewin's letter continued.

Andy Skoogman, a spokesman for the Hennepin County Sheriff's Office, said the bail payment area receives "extra cleaning" as part of the effort to counter the spread of the coronavirus. In addition, he said, visitors lacking a mask are provided with one and there is hand sanitation in the jail's public lobby.

Lewin also told Fletcher that his organization has heard from several public defenders who are "sharing incidents of exposure to symptomatic individuals, sometimes without any warning from jail staff."

Jim Fleming, the county's lead public defender, said he's fielding complaints from his attorneys about "a breakdown in social distancing, and the lack of masks and enforcement of policies."

Fleming said he's had lawyers who have contracted COVID-19, but he's at a loss to know for sure whether the illnesses are work-related because "nobody is doing contact tracing. And I don't know how many lawyers are asymptomatic."

"We are on the front end of this," he said. "I don't want to be seen [as] sending my lawyers over a cliff."

Paul Walsh · 612-673-4482

Load-Date: August 3, 2020

ARTICLE MCDXIII. CALHOUN BEACH ATHLETIC CLUB CLOSING TO PUBLIC

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 31, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 360 wordsByline: DEE DePASS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The pandemic shutdown dealt a crippling blow to its operations; redevelopment being studied.Body

COVID-19 has claimed yet another economic victim, this time the Calhoun Beach Athletic Club in Minneapolis. It will close its doors to the public Sept. 30.

In a letter to members, club owner Aimco wrote: "The pandemic has presented additional obstacles related to membership and operations that have accelerated our plans to consider redeveloping the space. While we figure out the best way to serve our community, we've made the difficult decision to close the athletic club. ... Removing the operational and financial constraints of serving the general public allows us to focus entirely on transforming the athletic club for the better."

Sections of the 40,000-square-foot facility will remain open as a fitness center, but only for residents of the adjacent apartment building that Denver-based Aimco also owns.

The letter was sent to club members of the Uptown facility on July 27, the same day the club was expected to resume its group exercise classes. The athletic center has been open for 44 years, but the coronavirus may have proved its death knell.

"The pandemic has presented a number of obstacles, and it just didn't make financial sense to keep the club open," said Aimco spokesperson Jamie Alvarez in an e-mail

Thursday. "We're still very early in the planning phase and redevelopment of the community isn't confirmed."

In its letter to members, Aimco said that it intends to study other uses for the facility over the next few months and could ultimately decide to include a "fitness complex" in the next development. "If it does, we hope you'll choose to return to our club," officials said.

The historic Calhoun Beach Athletic Club sits adjacent to the former Lake Calhoun, named for the staunch 19th-century slavery advocate John C. Calhoun. The lake was recently re-christened Bde Maka Ska, its original Dakota name.

Calhoun Beach Athletic Club closing to public

The building was in the news last month after officials announced they will drop the name Calhoun from the apartment and the athletic club facility. The name-change decision followed the May 25 police killing of George Floyd and protests that demanded the end of racial inequities.

Dee DePass · 612-673-7725

SEE MICROFILM OR PDF FOR MAP.

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDXIV. MINNEAPOLIS CLEARS SECOND LARGE HOMELESS CAMP

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 31, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 676 wordsByline: LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The cleanup comes after a large encampment at Powderhorn Park was dismantled.Body

A week after Minneapolis officials dismantled a large homeless site at Powderhorn Park, officials cleared another encampment on the city's South Side on Wednesday.

As police looked on, residents broke down their tents and crisscrossed the encampment on a city-owned lot at E. 26th Street, between S. 15th and 14th avenues, with pushcarts piled high with clothes, pillows and other belongings. A group of social service providers and volunteers were also on the scene to provide assistance. City workers hung back for a while, before moving in to clear trash with a small front-loader.

It was the latest encampment to be cleared since an executive order passed by Gov. Tim Walz for the coronavirus pandemic. Days after the Park Board issued an eviction notice, workers joined park police officers to clear out one of the two tent camps at Powderhorn Park, which became a haven for people displaced in the aftermath of the George Floyd riots, but also picked up a reputation for trouble. About 20 people were arrested during the operation, which some critics called unnecessarily heavy-handed.

Some of those helping said that Wednesday's operation appeared a bit smoother. However, Angel Beaumaster said that camp residents were promised a bus to help in the move, but one never showed up.

"These people want to work, they're willing to work," said Beaumaster. "Maybe they're not 9-to-5ers, but they're good workers."

What started as a handful of tents at the site grew to as many as 50 in a matter of weeks, said Linda Julik, adding that its residents lived with the constant uncertainty that the encampment could be dismantled at any time.

"Every time they displace them, mentally it knocks them down another degree," said Julik, who along with her fiancé does community outreach work in the surrounding neighborhoods. "And you wonder why they stay in their [drug] addiction."

A few minutes earlier, a fire crew showed up after being called about a possible overdose.

Minneapolis clears second large homeless camp

An MPD spokesman said that on Wednesday the dispersal order was given by the city's Community Planning & Economic Development department.

In announcing the move, officials said in a statement that their goal was "for all people to gain access to permanent housing that is safe, stable and something that they can afford over the long term," pointing out that a planned "new, culturally specialized" shelter was set to open this fall.

The statement said that the city had avoided moving other encampments on its property since the pandemic started, but that in "this particular instance, the size, public health and safety concerns had reached a level where the encampment posed a serious risk to both encampment residents and surrounding neighbors."

"Encampment residents were given a week's notice that they would have to move," the statement read. "The city worked with outreach teams to try to identify housing and shelter options for as many people as possible, and to offer transportation to encampment residents."

One resident who agreed to speak about his experience if his name was not revealed, said he had "mixed feelings" about the move.

The 25-year-old man, whose nickname is "Urkel," said he understood the need to address coronavirus-related health hazards, but he added that the encampment had been "kind of like a refuge for a lot of people" with nowhere else to turn.

Officials said in their statement that the city had spent more than $70 million on affordable housing over the past two years. Earlier this week, government leaders announced plans for developing three new shelters, each targeting particularly vulnerable populations.

Earlier this month, the Park Board voted to limit the homeless tent camps that have sprung up across the city's parks, creating 20 designated sites where future encampments will be permitted. Under the resolution, no encampment can have more than 25 tents, and advocates and nonprofit organizations will have to apply for a temporary permit to legalize an encampment; those without permits would be disbanded.

Libor Jany · 612-673-4064

Twitter: @StribJany

Load-Date: August 3, 2020

ARTICLE MCDXV. RODEO-GOER TESTS POSITIVE FOR CORONAVIRUS; AG ELLISON FILES ENFORCEMENT ACTION

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

July 31, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 679 words

Byline: Christopher Magan

Highlight: People who ignored crowd limits at the North Star Stampede rodeo in Itasca County should get tested for the coronavirus if they're sick because one spectator was likely contagious with COVID-19. The rodeo was held in Effie, Minn., the last weekend of July despite executive orders from Gov. Tim Walz requiring masks and strictly limiting [...]

Body

People who ignored crowd limits at the North Star Stampede rodeo in Itasca County should get tested for the coronavirus if they're sick because one spectator was likely contagious with COVID-19.

The rodeo was held in Effie, Minn., the last weekend of July despite executive orders from Gov. Tim Walz requiring masks and strictly limiting crowd sizes. The organizers of the event apparently initially tried to comply with the rules but gave up and told would-be spectators they wouldn't infringe on their right to assemble.

Cimarron Pitzen, an administrator of the rodeo's Facebook page, wrote online that "political agendas" of the state Department of Health and the attorney general's office meant the rodeo would be held without spectators. "If people would like to come and protest against this ridiculous government over reach, feel free to do so, I will not stand in the way of peoples (sic) "Right to Assemble," Pitzen's July 22 post read.

Jan Malcolm, state health commissioner, said it was important for anyone at the event to watch for symptoms, self-isolate if they're sick and get tested. Doing so would help limit any possible spread.

The infected person attended the event between July 23 and 26. They became ill July 27, and health officials said people are generally contagious before they show symptoms.

"If you attended this event, you should consider yourself potentially exposed," Malcolm said. "We just want to get the word out, given the number of people at this event."

Effie is located in Itasca County in northern Minnesota.

Minnesota Attorney General Keith Ellison also announced Friday his office had filed an enforcement action against the rodeo's organizers. Ellison is seeking damages as high as $25,000 per violation as well as other legal remedies.

Rodeo-goer tests positive for coronavirus; AG Ellison files enforcement action

"Stopping the spread of COVID-19 is everyone's responsibility," Ellison said in a statement. "Because we take the health of Minnesota's people and economy very seriously, we take our responsibility to educate and seek compliance very seriously."

Kris Ehresmann, director of infectious disease for the state Department of Health, said it was unclear if the rodeo would have different transmission rates than mass gatherings earlier this summer after the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police. Free testing after those protests found fewer demonstrators than expected contracted the coronavirus.

"We were grateful for what we didn't see following mass gatherings," Ehresmann said. "It remains to be seen how we will see transmission play out at this event. It does give us pause, and we will continue to monitor the situation."

Minnesota recorded another 779 coronavirus cases Friday, bringing the state total to 54,463. Another six deaths were also reported, increasing the death toll to 1,600.

Those who died included a person in their late 20s with underlying health conditions and older residents ranging in age from their 70s to their 90s.

Minnesota has now tested 1,024,916 patient samples and 834,354 total patients since local testing began in March. Many of those tests are done through a partnership between the state, the Mayo Clinic, the University of Minnesota and other health care providers.

Virtual fundraising is a jackpot for some nonprofits. For others, it's a financial blow. US tops 5 million confirmed virus cases, to Europe's alarm Israeli jeweler makes a \$1.5m gold coronavirus mask Sunday coronavirus update: 9 more MN deaths, 806 more infections Minnesota cities, counties scramble to keep businesses afloat by dishing out CARES Act grants Leaders of testing efforts at Mayo and the university said they were developing localized versions of coronavirus tests in order to avoid ongoing supply chain shortages. Most tests in Minnesota take about 24 to 48 hours to get results although longer times have been reported.

The state has a cumulative test positivity rate of 5.8 percent, but positive test rates are higher in places with outbreaks including the Twin Cities metro and several rural counties where there's been spikes in cases at meat processing plants.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCDXVI. SHOOTING AT LITTLE EARTH KILLS DAD, 27

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 31, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 5BLength: 487 wordsByline: LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The homicide is the 39th of the year and continues a surge in gun violence.Body

Police searched late Wednesday for at least three suspects they say are responsible for the fatal shooting of a young father and the wounding of another man near the Little Earth housing complex in Minneapolis.

The victims were struck by gunfire just after 11 p.m. in the 2400 block of S. 18th Avenue. The surrounding complex, home to dozens of three-story townhouses, has long been the heart of the Twin Cities' American Indian community.

Officials and relatives online identified the victim as 27-year-old Billy Campbell. His death was the city's 39th homicide of the year and continued a surge in shootings since the unrest after the killing of George Floyd on May 25.

And while the pace of violence has slowed in recent days, the city's gunshot victim tally so far in 2020 has already eclipsed the entire annual totals of all but one of the past 10 years.

At least two other people were injured in separate shootings on Wednesday, including a 17-year-old boy who was struck by gunfire near Glenwood and Knox avenues.

The recent upswing in shootings has become part of a fierce debate over the future of policing and public safety in Minneapolis, as elsewhere, sparked by Floyd's death in police custody.

City leaders have sought help dealing with the crime spike from federal law enforcement agencies, including the FBI, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, as well as the Secret Service.

At the scene of the most recent homicide, officers strung up yellow police tape to cordon off parts of the street where the shooting occurred, as police searched the area.

A State Patrol helicopter joined the search for suspects a short time later, flying slow circles over the area before landing at a St. Paul airfield, according to FlightAware.com, an online flight tracking service.

Shooting at Little Earth kills dad, 27

Jolene Jones, former board president of the Little Earth Residents Association, livestreamed the immediate aftermath of the shooting. Bystanders were seen tending to a man who appeared to have suffered a gunshot wound to his arm.

Minutes into the video, Jones was told that a second victim had been found nearby, and she and others rushed over and found him facedown in a street next to the curb.

A group of paramedics and police officers appeared moments later and started cardiopulmonary resuscitation on the man, believed to be Campbell.

Another bystander's video posted online captured onlookers hugging and consoling one another next to the crime scene, their voices occasionally drowned out by a woman's cries of "He's all that I had!"

By Thursday afternoon, Campbell's Facebook page was filled with posts from family and friends, grieving for another life taken too soon. Campbell was married and had three children, ages 7, 5 and 2, according to a GoFundMe page set up by his wife.

"[Y]our smile will forever echo through my head rest up bro gone but never forgotten," one person wrote.

Libor Jany · 612-673-4064

Twitter: @StribJany

Load-Date: August 3, 2020

Xcel Energy posts profit in midst of pandemic

ARTICLE MCDXVII.

XCEL ENERGY POSTS PROFIT IN MIDST OF PANDEMIC

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

July 31, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 471 wordsByline: MIKE HUGHLETT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The Q2 results, thanks to hot weather and cutting costs, beat Wall Street expectations.Body

COVID-19's grip on the U.S. economy has sapped electricity demand at factories and offices - and Xcel Energy hasn't been spared.

Still, Minneapolis-based Xcel notched a healthy increase in second-quarter profits as hot weather and cost cutting helped offset a 7% decline in its weather-adjusted electricity sales.

COVID-19 led to lockdowns and an economic contraction that sapped energy demand of all kinds. Earlier, this week the U.S. Energy Information Administration reported energy consumption, particularly oil, in April hit a low not seen in over 30 years. Electricity consumption in April hit a 19-year low.

Xcel is by far Minnesota's largest electricity provider, and the company also has a big presence in Colorado as well as operations in New Mexico, Texas, Wisconsin the Dakotas and a small slice of Michigan's Upper Peninsula.

"Because of Xcel's size and locations, I usually consider it as a good barometer for the entire industry," said Travis Miller, a stock analyst at Morningstar.

Xcel's weather-adjusted residential electricity sales rose 5.4% in the second quarter as people worked at home instead of at the office. But that increase was more than canceled out by a 11.5% decline in commercial and industrial sales.

Still, hotter than normal weather - and a corresponding hike in power-sucking air conditioner use - helped cushion the decline in Xcel's actual electricity sales.

Overall, Xcel "continued to put up solid numbers" during the second quarter, Miller said.

Xcel reported on Thursday earnings of $287 million, or 54 cents per share, up from $238 million, or 46 cents per share, in 2019's second quarter. The company beat Wall Street forecast of 48 cents per share, with help from a lower effective tax rate during the quarter.

Xcel Energy posts profit in midst of pandemic

Xcel's second-quarter revenue tallied $2.59 billion, down a tad from a year ago, but below analysts' projections of $2.66 billion.

"Despite lower sales due to COVID-19, Xcel Energy achieved strong second-quarter results primarily due to the positive impact of weather and cost-management efforts," Ben Fowke, chairman and CEO of Xcel Energy, said in a statement. "We are on track with our financial plan and are reaffirming our 2020 earnings guidance of $2.73 to $2.83 per share."

Xcel's stock closed Thursday at $69, up 27 cents.

Fowke, in a conference call with analysts Thursday, said that Xcel has seen some improvement this month in sales of commercial and industrial electricity. "We are seeing a positive trend there."

Fowke, in the analyst call, also noted the recent death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police.

He said that as the new chairman of the Edison Electric Institute, he has asked the trade group to "focus on what our industry can do to promote racial justice and increase our commitment to advance diversity and inclusion."

Mike Hughlett · 612-673-7003

Load-Date: July 31, 2020

AP Interview: Heat's Leonard stands for anthem, explains why

ARTICLE MCDXVIII.

AP INTERVIEW: HEAT'S LEONARD STANDS FOR ANTHEM, EXPLAINS WHY

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 1, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1002 wordsByline: Tim ReynoldsHighlight: LAKE BUENA VISTA, Fla. (AP) - Meyers Leonard has a brother who served two tours in Afghanistan with the U.S. Marines. He carries a military-themed backpack, wears combat boots and has a phone loaded with Navy SEALs who are his friends.

Body

LAKE BUENA VISTA, Fla. - Meyers Leonard has a brother who served two tours in Afghanistan with the U.S. Marines. He carries a military-themed backpack, wears combat boots and has a phone loaded with Navy SEALs who are his friends.

He also makes this clear: "I absolutely believe Black Lives Matter," he said.

Still, Leonard simply could not bring himself to kneel for the national anthem.

Wearing a Black Lives Matter T-shirt over a jersey that he ordered to say "Equality," and as all other coaches and players around him knelt, Leonard stood for the playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner" on Saturday before the Heat re-opened their season by facing the Denver Nuggets at Walt Disney World.

"Some of the conversations I've had over the past three days, quite literally, have been the most difficult," Leonard told The Associated Press prior to the game. "I am with the Black Lives Matter movement and I love and support the military and my brother and the people who have fought to defend our rights in this country."

Leonard dealt with anxiety and sleeplessness for several days as he agonized over the decision. He explained his reasoning before Saturday to current teammates and several former ones, almost all of them Black - then stood near midcourt, hand over his heart, as the song blared.

"I am a compassionate human being and I truly love all people," Leonard said. "I can't fully comprehend how our world, literally and figuratively, has turned into Black and white. There's a line in the sand, so to speak: 'If you're not kneeling, you're not with us.' And that's not true.

"I will continue to use my platform, my voice and my actions to show how much I care about the African American culture and for everyone," he added. "I live my life to serve and impact others in a positive way."

AP Interview: Heat's Leonard stands for anthem, explains why

The focus of this restarted NBA season, interrupted for more than 4-1/2 months by the coronavirus pandemic, has been to continue shining light on the need for racial justice and an end to police brutality. NBA teams are kneeling, often linking arms, for the pre-recorded national anthem along a sideline where "Black Lives Matter" is painted.

Orlando Magic forward Jonathan Isaac, who is Black, stood for the anthem before his team's game Friday and opted not to wear the 'Black Lives Matter' shirt that players and coaches have donned at Disney for the pregame ceremony.

Later Friday, San Antonio coach Gregg Popovich and Spurs assistant Becky Hammon both stood for the anthem. Popovich, a graduate of the United States Air Force Academy, stood with arms at his side. Hammon draped her arms over the shoulders of fellow assistant Will Hardy and Spurs guard Patty Mills.

"I did feel a little bit of a load lifted off my shoulders when they did that," Leonard said. "Each of those individuals had their own personal reasons, just as I do."

Heat forward Andre Iguodala, a member of the National Basketball Players Association's executive committee, said he respected Leonard's choice.

"On the one hand, we're saying, 'We want you to see things from our perspective,'" Iguodala said. "But by saying that, I also have to see things from his perspective. And I can see where he's coming from."

Heat captain Udonis Haslem had multiple conversations with Leonard in recent days about his decision. Haslem has made several things clear; he originally wished to see Leonard kneel, but after those talks he came away with understanding - and vowed the Heat would support their teammate.

As the song ended, Haslem was the first to tap fists with Leonard.

"His being out there with us, as our brother, it's still showing strength, it's still showing unity, it's still showing that we're coming together for a common cause," Haslem said. "People will question, 'Why isn't he doing it their way?' Well, he's standing by us. He's supporting us. He's with us."

Haslem has seen Leonard's commitment to helping others. Leonard raised $180,000 in April by streaming himself playing video games online; that money went to causes such as Feeding South Florida, a group with which Haslem and the Heat worked closely.

Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

And Saturday, Leonard said he and his wife will donate $100,000 to a fund that helps pay the fees Floridians leaving jails or prisons must settle before they can have their voting rights restored.

"Because I've listened to Udonis and am constantly inspired by him, every single one of those dollars will go to Overtown and Liberty City, where he grew up," Leonard said, referring to two of Miami's historic Black neighborhoods. "Those two parts of Miami were most heavily impacted by COVID-19 and voter suppression."

AP Interview: Heat's Leonard stands for anthem, explains why

Heat forward Jimmy Butler also tried to make a statement Saturday, walking onto the court with a jersey without any name on the back. He unsuccessfully lobbied the NBA to play in a jersey with just a number, and had to switch into a jersey with his name before the game could begin.

Former teammates have warned Leonard that he may deal with criticism, possibly from fellow NBA players. His eyes welled with tears many times in recent days as he worked through the decision, his reaction so strong that he was shaking when he explained his choice to Heat teammates.

It was not an easy decision. It may not be popular.

But Saturday morning, a few hours before the anthem, Bailey Leonard, the former Marine, texted his brother and said "Stay true to you. Stay the course. I love you. Your family loves you. Your community loves you."

If Leonard had any doubt, it evaporated there.

"I know he's proud of me," Leonard said. "And if he's proud of me, and if my brothers on this team are with me, then I know this is what I have to do."

Graphic

Miami Heat's Meyers Leonard stands during the national anthem before an NBA basketball game against the Denver Nuggets, Saturday, Aug. 1, 2020, in Lake Buena Vista, Fla. (Kevin C. Cox/Pool Photo via AP)

Miami Heat's Meyers Leonard stands during the national anthem before an NBA basketball game against the Denver Nuggets, Saturday, Aug. 1, 2020, in Lake Buena Vista, Fla. (Kevin C. Cox/Pool Photo via AP)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCDXIX. MATT DUMBA KNEELS, NHL PUTS FOCUS ON BLACK LIVES MATTER

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 1, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 647 wordsByline: Stephen WhynoHighlight: Dumba knelt at center ice while fellow Black players Malcolm Subban of Chicago and Darnell Nurse of Edmonton each stood with a hand on one of his shoulders.Body

Minnesota's Matt Dumba on Saturday became the first NHL player to kneel during the U.S. national anthem when he did so before the opening playoff game between the Oilers and Blackhawks in Edmonton, Alberta.

Dumba knelt at center ice while fellow Black players Malcolm Subban of Chicago and Darnell Nurse of Edmonton each stood with a hand on one of his shoulders. Several teams this week stood together during the U.S. and Canadian anthems, with some players locking arms to show solidarity.

With the message "END RACISM" on the video screens around him, the Wild defenseman made a passionate speech about racial injustice on behalf of the league and the Hockey Diversity Alliance.

Dumba and a handful of other Black hockey players formed the organization in June in the aftermath of the death of George Floyd in police custody in Minnesota.

"Racism is everywhere, and we need to fight against it," Dumba said. "We will fight against injustice and fight for what is right. I hope this inspires a new generation of hockey players and hockey fans because Black lives matter, Breonna Taylor's life matters. Hockey is a great game, but it could be a whole lot greater, and it starts with all of us."

Dumba wore a Hockey Diversity Alliance sweatshirt while making the speech and kneeling. Afterward, he received support from around the hockey community.

"I think everyone in the league stands with those guys," Colorado forward Matt Nieto said. "There's just no room for racism in our sport or any sports or just in general for that matter."

J.T. Brown, who raised his right fist during the anthem prior to a game in 2017 when with the Tampa Bay Lightning, said on Twitter he applauded "this great start" from Dumba.

Matt Dumba kneels, NHL puts focus on Black Lives Matter

"Moving forward, teammates shouldn't let teammates fight this battle alone," Brown tweeted. "We always show up for each other on the ice, this shouldn't be any different."

Earlier this week, Avalanche center Nazem Kadri said standing together with Minnesota players prior to an exhibition game was a good sign of solidarity, but he called for more than just gestures.

"We're trying to make the game more diverse, and the diversity in the game doesn't happen with racism still going on, so that's an important thing for us to address," Kadri said. "As players we have addressed that. From a league standpoint, I think we'd maybe like to see a little more acknowledgement and having them address the situation and know that they stand with their players."

Asked about Kadri's comments, NHL Commissioner Gary Bettman told The Associated Press on Friday, "We're in complete agreement as to the ultimate goal."

Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

The league is made up of over 95% white players and has no people of color as coaches or general managers. The recent national debate on racism caused many of those white players to speak out about the subject.

"I've said how I feel, and other players are getting comfortable to say how they feel, as well," said Stars forward Tyler Seguin, who marched in a peaceful protest in Dallas.

When the playoffs began Saturday, one banner in Toronto's Scotiabank Arena read, "#WeSkateFor Black Lives." Arizona coach Rick Tocchet said he received a call from Vegas forward Ryan Reaves prior to the exhibition game between the Coyotes and Golden Knights about players locking arms and is glad to see the league prioritizing diversity.

"I'm all in on that stuff," Tocchet said. "I thought it was terrific. I watched all the other teams do different things. To show that awareness is terrific."

Graphic

Minnesota Wild's Matt Dumba takes a knee during the national anthem flanked by Edmonton Oilers' Darnell Nurse, right, and Chicago Blackhawks' Malcolm Subban before an NHL hockey Stanley Cup playoff game in Edmonton, Alberta, Saturday, Aug. 1, 2020. (Jason Franson/The Canadian Press via AP)

Minnesota Wild's Matt Dumba takes a knee during the national anthem flanked by Edmonton Oilers' Darnell Nurse, right, and Chicago Blackhawks' Malcolm Subban before an NHL hockey Stanley Cup playoff game in Edmonton, Alberta, Saturday, Aug. 1, 2020. (Jason Franson/The Canadian Press via AP)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Matt Dumba kneels, NHL puts focus on Black Lives Matter

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDXX. CROWDED FIELD VIES FOR EMPTY SEAT ON MINNEAPOLIS CITY COUNCIL

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 1, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 1234 wordsByline: MIGUEL OTAROLA; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Minneapolis' sole municipal election this year is a race to fill a City Council seat in one of the most diverse pockets of the city, which has been without representation since April.

Eleven candidates are running in a special election for the Sixth Ward seat, which was vacated when former Council Member Abdi Warsame resigned to lead the Minneapolis Public Housing Authority this spring. Whoever is elected would have to run again in November 2021, when all council seats are once again up for election, to keep the seat.

The Aug. 11 election is ranked choice, with voters able to select three of the listed candidates in order of preference.

The elected candidate will take office as the council contends with the coronavirus pandemic and the aftermath of the death of George Floyd, who was killed by Minneapolis police officers on May 25. The council has already had to make budget cuts and will likely see even deeper spending cuts next year.

The council is also faced with questions about how to rebuild areas devastated by riots and how to reshape policing in the city, all the while holding public meetings from remote locations.

Some of the effects of the city's turbulent year can be most deeply felt in the Sixth Ward, which includes the neighborhoods of Cedar-Riverside, Elliot Park, Phillips West, Seward, Stevens Square and Ventura Village.

Those neighborhoods include some of the highest concentrations of coronavirus cases in the city, according to data collected by the city. They also include parks where dozens of homeless people have set up camps following the pandemic and uprising surrounding Floyd's killing.

The Sixth Ward is the city's smallest and most densely populated district, where nearly 90% of residents are renters, according to a city profile. The ward has higher concentrations of Black and Latino residents and a greater unemployment rate compared with the rest of the city.

Crowded field vies for empty seat on Minneapolis City Council

The 11 candidates running for the seat are AJ Awed, Abdirizak Bihi, Michael P. Dougherty, Sara Mae Engberg, AK Hassan, Nebiha Mohammed,

Suud Olat, Jamal Osman, Alex Palacios, Joshua Scheunemann and Saciido Shaie. (Another registered candidate, Mohamoud Hassan, dropped out of the race, according to reports in Mshale, a community newspaper.)

There is a generational divide among candidates. Some, such as Bihi and Shaie, have long histories with the ward and are well-known among its East African community. Others are newcomers to local politics.

At virtual and in-person forums, the candidates have fine-tuned their positions on pressing issues.

Most support disbanding or restructuring the Minneapolis Police Department, in line with what the City Council is pursuing. They agree that addressing the surge of homeless encampments is one of the city's key priorities, as is supporting small businesses affected by the coronavirus pandemic and the riots. Most identify with the DFL Party or otherwise describe themselves as progressive.

Dougherty, director of the Thomson Dougherty funeral home in the Phillips West neighborhood, said he is running to offer pragmatic solutions as the city deals with severe budget woes. He does not support defunding the Police Department and said he would like Police Chief Medaria Arradondo to have a greater say as the department outlines its future.

"We're in crisis," Dougherty said at a League of Women Voters Minneapolis forum in July. "And I think right now, in a moment like that, we have to leave politics, ideology, out of it. We need common sense, measurable results. Pragmatism."

Bihi, director of the Somali Education and Social Advocacy Center, is touting his experience in Cedar-Riverside and serving on other neighborhood committees.

"I have two decades of experience of really doing the work, and not only that, living in the ward," Bihi said during a virtual forum Monday. "I did not move to the ward, I do not have just [an] address."

Other candidates are countering that experience, arguing that Cedar-Riverside has continued to suffer from poverty, crime, drug use and disinvestment.

"Bihi has been in the community for a long time, but at the same time it's under the watch of 20 years, going on to three decades now, that the community has been deteriorating," Awed, an independent party candidate, said at the same forum. "They're really looking for a next generation of leadership that is going to be able to bring in the policy questions that really matter."

Shaie, co-founder of the Ummah Project, a nonprofit group working with Somali youth, moved to the ward after an unsuccessful run for a state House seat representing northeast Minneapolis earlier this year. Like Bihi, she is touting her connection to the ward's residents and businesses.

The candidates are split on their views of Africa Village, a development project pushed by Warsame and Mayor Jacob Frey that would bring an indoor market, housing and other amenities to what is now a parking lot in Cedar-Riverside. While some believe it would bring in needed revenue to the area, others say they want to get more feedback from the neighborhood before moving forward.

Crowded field vies for empty seat on Minneapolis City Council

"I want to see the Riverside area to be a like an East African district, the same way as Chinatown," said Osman, who works in social services for Commonbond Communities. "Now if you walk, drive around there, it's not booming as I wish it was. And projects like this, it's [an] opportunity that comes around [once] in a lifetime."

Mohammed, a U.S. Army veteran, believed the market would bring much-needed tax revenue to the neighborhood but that other locations should be scouted.

"Cedar-Riverside is a diverse neighborhood, and I feel though that an African development market would be the best thing for our neighborhood, just not in that location," she said.

Hassan, a Minneapolis Park and Recreation Board commissioner, has received endorsements from Our Revolution Twin Cities and OutFront Minnesota, as well as Hennepin County Commissioners Angela Conley and Debbie Goettel, according to his website.

Engberg, a Humanity Forward candidate, said she is running on a campaign to defund the Police Department, set universal basic income and fully fund the city's Section 8 housing program. Palacios, who provides HIV testing and outreach for the Aliveness Project, also said they support defunding the police and learning the safety needs of different neighborhoods.

More than a fifth of the ward's 15,305 registered voters have already voted in the special election, according to city spokesperson Casper Hill. The elected candidate will likely be sworn in on the council at the end of August, he said.

The special election will be found on the back of the ballot for Sixth Ward voters. Polls will be open Aug. 11 from 7 a.m. to 8 p.m. Sixth Ward voters can find their polling location online at pollfinder.sos.state.mn.us.

Miguel Otárola · 612-673-4753

Candidates for Minneapolis City Council Ward 6 seat

Michael P. Dougherty, funeral home director

Abdirizak Bihi, Somali Education and Social Advocacy Center director

AJ Awed, Independent

Sara Mae Engberg, Humanity Forward candidate

AK Hassan, Minneapolis Park Board commissioner

Nebiha Mohammed, U.S. Army veteran

Suud Olat, former ONE Campaign congressional district leader

Jamal Osman, Commonbond Communities social services worker

Joshua Scheunemann, Green Party candidate

Alex Palacios, early intervention navigator at the Aliveness Project

Crowded field vies for empty seat on Minneapolis City Council

Saciido Shaie, Ummah Project co-founder

Load-Date: August 4, 2020

End of Document

The hike ends, but the fight continues

ARTICLE MCDXXI. THE HIKE ENDS, BUT THE FIGHT CONTINUES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 1, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 2C

Length: 326 words

Byline: BOB TIMMONS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: Atlanta woman completes 24 days on trail, then visits George Floyd memorial.

Body

On Tuesday, Crystal Gail Welcome completed her 310-mile thru-hike at the northern end of the Superior Hiking Trail. But she said her trek truly finished when she visited the memorial site for George Floyd, a Black man who died in police custody in Minneapolis.

Welcome, a writer and activist from Atlanta, set out July 4 to honor Floyd's life and bring attention to racial injustice through different means. She said it was at the end of the hike when the idea struck to drive hundreds of miles south. The night was beautiful pinks and blues. She signed the logbook and took a photo, and her partner, Demi Kapler, handed Welcome her diploma from Prescott College in Arizona.

"You did all these miles, and that's your finish," she said of her thoughts. "That's where you need to go."

Welcome, 39, recounted many encounters along the trail - almost too many at times, she said - with people who wanted to meet and talk, or tell her about their activism. "I had a lot of positive interactions," she said. She especially relished a final night at the on-trail Hazel campsite where she encountered a group of high school girls and a separate high school boy out hiking, too. The conversations were light, hitting on gear and gap years. But they were serious, too, digging into issues about racism and barriers for people of color like Welcome, who is Black.

On Thursday, Welcome met a friend she'd made on her thru-hike, and they headed to the site of Floyd's death at 38th Street and Chicago Avenue. Welcome had learned, too, of the death of U.S. Rep. John Lewis, a champion of civil rights.

Welcome started crying as she walked to the intersection and carried that grief to the Cup Foods storefront. "It was just so much," she said.

Later, Welcome left her hiking hat, trekking poles and jottings about her mission and message at the memorial. A thought echoed in her, she said: "This is where this hike ends, but not where the fight ends."

Bob Timmons · 612-673-7899

The hike ends, but the fight continues

Load-Date: August 4, 2020

End of Document

Deficit of $4.7B seen as budget erodes

ARTICLE MCDXXII.

DEFICIT OF $4.7B SEEN AS BUDGET ERODES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 1, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 444 wordsByline: BRIANA BIERSCHBACH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: A new planning estimate showed a rapid evaporation of the state's projected surplus.Body

Minnesota lawmakers are facing a potential $4.7 billion deficit in the next two-year budget as the coronavirus pandemic continues to gobble up more resources than the state gets in revenue.

Minnesota Management and Budget Commissioner Myron Frans said in a new planning estimate Friday that the pandemic has made economic conditions "extremely volatile." The revenue update, he added, "gives us more information about the budget problems we need to solve during this current biennium and the next."

The updated numbers for 2022 and 2023, coming ahead of a state bond sale, continue a stunning deterioration of the state's finances in a matter of months. A February economic forecast showed the state had a projected $1.5 billion budget surplus for the remainder of this budget cycle, which ends July 2021. But a May budget update showed the state now faces a $2.4 billion deficit this budget cycle.

"Minnesota is not alone. States across the country are facing large budget gaps during this global pandemic," Gov. Tim Walz said in a statement. "We have challenges ahead, but we will continue to make smart fiscal decisions and request aid from the federal government to help our state manage this difficult time."

Minnesota has received more than $2 billion from the federal government in coronavirus relief, but that money cannot be used to fill gaps in revenue collections. The state's total two-year budget is roughly $48 billion.

Unlike many states, Minnesota has a budget reserve that's filled automatically when revenue comes in higher than expected. Over the years, it's grown to nearly $2.4 billion, with $350 million in a cash flow account. But as the deficit grows, lawmakers are facing potential budget cuts or calls for tax increases to fill the gap. Lawmakers are constitutionally required to pass a balanced budget for 2022 and 2023 by next summer.

Deficit of $4.7B seen as budget erodes

Minnesota lawmakers adjourned the regular legislative session on May 18 without addressing the expected deficit for this budget cycle. Two summer special sessions of the Legislature, triggered as Walz extended the use of his emergency powers for the pandemic, were overshadowed by a debate over police reforms in the wake of George Floyd's death.

"Minnesota is staring down a massive budget deficit, and it will only get worse if we bury our heads in the sand and pretend it doesn't exist," House Minority Leader Kurt Daudt, R-Crown, said in a statement.

"House Republicans will fight to protect Minnesotans from harmful tax hikes," he continued. "Will Gov. Walz and Democrats work with us to protect taxpayers, or demand tax hikes to close the deficit?"

Briana Bierschbach · 651-925-5042

Twitter: @bbierschbach

Load-Date: August 4, 2020

End of Document

Greetings mailed with a mission

ARTICLE MCDXXIII.

GREETINGS MAILED WITH A MISSION

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 1, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: INSPIRED; Pg. 1INLength: 1110 wordsByline: KIM HYATT; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Pandemic-themed cards aim to brighten days and support the U.S. Postal Service.Body

Liv Lane and Liz Malanaphy don't know each other, but the two creatives are united by a common mission: Saving the U.S. Postal Service with the simple act of sending cards.

The women both designed a series of COVID-19-themed greeting cards to help others stay connected during quarantine. Like the resurgence of jigsaw puzzles and baking bread during stay-at-home orders across the country, folks with time on their hands also gravitated toward good old-fashion snail mail to pass the time.

They've been selling cards online the past few months, and despite some restrictions being lifted, customers are still interested in loading virtual shopping carts with their handmade, coronavirus-inspired creations. Some of the cards honor everyday heroes; others are humorous, like Malanaphy's toilet paper doodles with the message "Wishing you abundance and absorbency!"

But this hobby wasn't without cause. Many people started pen pal chains and stocked up on stamps because of the dire news coming out of the postal service.

The coronavirus has been a blow to the institution that predates the United States. A rescue package in the amount of $10 billion was approved by Congress after the postal service lost $4.5 billion so far this year. Recently another $25 million was approved by the House to modernize the agency's infrastructure and operations. Still, the threat of privatization lingers.

President Donald Trump remains critical of the postal service, but 91% of Americans have a favorable view of the federal agency, according to a March poll by the Pew Research Center.

On top of financial woes, thousands of carriers have tested positive for COVID-19. Some have died.

With all these pressing concerns, it may seem a bit naive to think one card could turn the course. But Lane and Malanaphy aren't the only card makers encouraging others to send a letter to a loved one and #savethepostoffice.

The hashtag has gone viral, along with #saveemailman and #mailedit, as petitions and rallies circulate across the country to support postal carriers and their service that makes vote-by-mail possible, even for the most rural areas.

"The postal service is under assault and it sort of has been for a long time. It's one of the American institutions that is still accessible and equitable for everybody," Malanaphy said. "It's more important that I think people realize."

The creative from Hudson, Wis., said it costs everyone the same to mail a letter, whether in a small town or sprawling city. And she saw what a "devastating blow" it was for neighborhoods in south Minneapolis to lose post offices destroyed during riots following the death of George Floyd.

Malanaphy said her cards may seem "trivial" in light of the protests. Before the unrest when the pandemic was the major pressing concern for households, it seemed like the best way to contribute something meaningful.

"There's still room for other stories out there. There is so much about our government, like these basic institutions - our public schools and the postal service - that were based on making sure things were equitable and still can be those avenues to help make that happen," she said. "But if we start privatizing things like the United States Postal Service, it's just going to be another thing that is out of reach for people who live in poverty. I really think there's a huge danger in privatizing these institutions ... and I feel like that was kind of the path that people are going down."

Lane, a 40-year-old artist living in Shorewood, said her involvement to help save the postal service started with a school assignment for her 12-year-old son, Truman.

The e-learning assignment was simply "do something kind." And so he thought to send a thank-you card to their postal carrier.

"He wrote a thank-you note saying he was glad that he was still doing his job even during these tough times and drew a little picture. And it was about the same time that the news was coming out about how the postal service has really been in dire straits and that people were not sending as much mail because of the pandemic," Lane said.

"We got a letter back from our mail carrier, which thrilled my kid, and it said thank you so much for having concern for me and my safety and I'm really doing my best job to keep everything clean and to deliver your mail on time. It was just the sweetest exchange."

Lane thought: "How can I help stimulate more of those kinds of exchanges and support the postal service at the same time?" Thus began her pandemic postcards.

"It's such a day brightener when you get something in the mail because it tells you that someone took the extra time to actually hand write a note to you, to look up your address, to go find a stamp for it," she said. "I wanted to give people a chance to do that, especially when everybody is in isolation."

Greetings mailed with a mission

Before the pandemic, Lane knew what it was like to be in isolation. In 2018, she was diagnosed with breast cancer. Her pandemic postcards have been the first project since then. Now in remission, she still takes precautions.

"I know a lot about isolation after having cancer," she said. "It was always so wonderful to get cards in the mail from people. I couldn't always answer a text when it came in - I just did not have the energy or focus. But when I could go to the mail pile when I had the energy and see that I had notes from people waiting for me, it was just wonderful to have that kind of connection. I can only assume that the same is true for people who are in isolation now, or maybe sick or caring for those who are sick, who are working long hours," she said.

"One of the silver linings of this pandemic is that it has reminded people about the importance of being connected in all kinds of ways and letting each other know how much we matter to each other."

Malanaphy, 53, can relate. She started making her own cards after she ran out of her personal stash of greeting cards early on in quarantine. She was sending cards to everyone - even her mother who lives nearby but couldn't visit because of coronavirus guidelines.

Her cards are not a financial boon, but that wasn't the intent. She wanted to facilitate an exchange of the written word by not only supplying cards and envelopes, but also stamps. Each set of six cards comes with six stamps from John Oliver, host of "Last Week Tonight with John Oliver." Oliver created a limited edition line of stamps to help save the postal service, with all proceeds going toward USPS.

"[It's] activism through art," she said. "Using the talents you have to contribute to the world and make it a better place."

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Kim Hyatt · 612-673-4751

@kimvhyatt

Load-Date: August 3, 2020

Mpls. fire chief retiring Oct. 2

ARTICLE MCDXXIV.

MPLS. FIRE CHIEF RETIRING OCT. 2

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 1, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 2BLength: 271 wordsByline: ZOE JACKSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Mayor Frey says John Fruetel's four decades "built a legacy in the city."Body

Minneapolis Fire Chief John Fruetel will retire from the department in October after more than 40 years of service.

Fruetel submitted his intent to retire to Mayor Jacob Frey on Thursday morning, according to Darwin Forsyth, a spokesman for the mayor. The chief also informed his command staff of his fall retirement.

During his 41 years with the Minneapolis Fire Department, Fruetel has held several positions, including firefighter, fire captain, battalion chief, duty deputy chief, deputy chief of training and assistant chief of operations, according to the department website. Fruetel has served as fire chief since March 2012.

Frey announced the retirement during a Minneapolis City Council meeting Friday.

"The word legacy gets tossed around a lot in moments like these, but over the course of four decades, 41 years, I mean it when I say that Chief Fruetel has built a legacy in the city," Frey said.

Fruetel recently faced pushback from his firefighters and the union that represents them for his response during the nights of unrest following the death of George Floyd.

The chief did not call in reinforcements from other cities, including St. Paul, even as buildings across Minneapolis burned.

Fruetel did not respond to requests for comment.

During the council meeting, Frey credited Fruetel with helping to reshape the department's approach to inclusive hiring and for shepherding advances in firefighter safety.

"Without fail, he's answered the call whenever he's needed," Frey said.

Frey will begin developing a transition plan for the Fire Department, Forsyth said.

Fruetel will serve through Oct. 2.

Mpls. fire chief retiring Oct. 2

Zoë Jackson · 612-673-7112

Load-Date: August 4, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDXXV.

A WIDE AND DEEP EXAMINATION OF SYSTEMIC RACISM

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 2, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 5ELength: 534 wordsByline: HAMILTON CAIN, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: NONFICTION: The Pulitzer Prize winner and author of "The Warmth of Other Suns" explores inequity in her sweeping, magisterial new work.Body

Special to the Star Tribune

In 2010, New York Times journalist Isabel Wilkerson published "The Warmth of Other Suns," her revelatory and fiercely imagined account of the Great Migration of African Americans out of the South, its achievement comparable to painter Jacob Lawrence's canvases on the same history. Critics lavished praise on the book, which jumped onto the New York Times bestseller list and garnered numerous literary accolades.

Wilkerson has used the intervening decade well. "Caste," her new searching, gorgeously crafted book, draws on "The Warmth of Other Suns" but moves along a more essayistic arc as Wilkerson deftly compares systemic racism in the United States to the caste networks in India and the Otherization of Jews in Nazi Germany.

She widens her aperture, illuminating the eight pillars of enduring bigotry, rulers determined to remain on top.

"Caste becomes a factor, to whatever infinitesimal degree, in interactions and decisions across gender, ethnicity, race, immigrant status, sexual orientation, age or religion that have consequences in our everyday lives and in policies that affect our country and beyond," she writes. "It may not be as all-consuming as its targets may perceive it to be but neither is it the ancient relic, the long-ago anachronism, that post-racialists, post-haters of everything, keep wishing away. Its invisibility is what gives it power and longevity." (Strikingly, Wilkerson omits the disabled from her list of caste-inflected communities.)

Wilkerson shifts back and forth between these three narrative lines, building her arguments with nuance and meticulous research. Her reporting is nimble and her sentences exquisite. But the real power of "Caste" lies tucked within the stories she strings together like pearls.

Hitler and his team studied American racism as they developed their genocidal strategies, stunned by the Yanks' efficacy and brutality. The Dalits endured centuries of abuse and stigma only to birth a potent political movement that transformed India's civil-rights laws before the denouement of Jim Crow. And Wilkerson brings the same rapier-sharp insight to race in America: horrific accounts of police violence against African Americans; young Black men lynched on the basis of mere rumors about glances at white women; white supremacists waving torches in Charlottesville; swimming pools drained and scrubbed after a single Black body dove in on a sweltering summer afternoon.

As with "The Warmth of Other Suns," "Caste" roams wide and deep, lives and deaths vividly captured, haloed with piercing cultural critique. At a turning point in race relations - fueled by a runaway global pandemic, gasoline on a dumpster fire - Wilkerson coolly makes her case, no longer content to ask for change, preferring instead to demand it. "Caste" is a luminous read, bearing its own torch of righteous wrath in a diamond-hard prose that will be admired and studied by future generations of journalists.

Hamilton Cain is the author of "This Boy's Faith: Notes From a Southern Baptist Upbringing" and a member of the National Book Critics Circle.

Caste: The Origins of Our Discontents

By: Isabel Wilkerson.

Publisher: Random House, 496 pages, $32.

Load-Date: August 2, 2020

Caryn M. Sullivan: Can we agree or disagree, or agree to disagree - and listen along the way?

ARTICLE MCDXXVI.

CARYN M. SULLIVAN: CAN WE AGREE OR DISAGREE, OR AGREE TO DISAGREE - AND LISTEN ALONG THE WAY?

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 2, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1000 words

Byline: Caryn M. Sullivan

Highlight: We're eight months into what is hands down the most bizarre year of my lifetime. With a global health crisis and ensuing economic downturn; concerns about schooling, racism, and policing; and an upcoming election, the atmosphere is swirling with uncertainty, anxiety, distrust, anger and expectation. Our life experiences shape our perspectives, ideology, and behavior. Through our [...]

Body

We're eight months into what is hands down the most bizarre year of my lifetime.

With a global health crisis and ensuing economic downturn; concerns about schooling, racism, and policing; and an upcoming election, the atmosphere is swirling with uncertainty, anxiety, distrust, anger and expectation.

Our life experiences shape our perspectives, ideology, and behavior. Through our individual lenses, we are collectively responding to current events broadcast to us in real time 24/7 through traditional and social media.

Just two months ago, George Floyd's death ignited fury and action among people who felt their voices have gone unheard, their needs unmet.

Thousands took to the streets to exercise rights Americans hold dear.

Opportunists who also took to the streets with Molotov cocktails and spray paint to create chaos and instill fear were met with weapon-wielding law enforcement personnel whose presence incited anger and fear among some and reassurance among others.

For those struggling before the 2020 tsunami struck, this moment inspires an "It's about damn time" reaction, with calls for change laced with hope, distrust, and cautious optimism.

History will judge our response.

Productive change can launch us forward with new ways of thinking, engaging and behaving.

But change can also be destabilizing and some among us aspire to such a future.

Caryn M. Sullivan: Can we agree or disagree, or agree to disagree - and listen along the way?

Curtailing lawful free speech and expression undermines the foundation on which this country was built.

Threats to defund law enforcement embolden criminals and threaten the security of all citizens.

But, meaningful, substantive efforts to improve education, employment, healthcare, housing and policing could produce a new chapter for people for whom the status quo is not working.

Individuals and organizations are stepping forward to address these needs and challenges. Will billions in donations make a lasting difference or simply placate vociferous advocates and, perhaps, assuage guilty consciences?

History will be the judge.

This tsunami is noisy and disconcerting. There's a lot of shouting going on. But are we listening?

We need to. Sharing experiences and perspectives honestly and respectfully is a critical step toward making lasting and meaningful change.

That's not to suggest it's all that comfortable, though, or that we don't need to stretch to do so.

When I first heard about my "white privilege" from one of my offspring, I instinctively pushed back. After all, we don't control our skin color.

Months later, I'm trying to hear "white privilege" as a perspective others hold, regardless of whether I share it.

That freedom to hold differing views in the same space is one of the privileges we enjoy as Americans.

And yet, tolerance is hanging on by a thread.

In some arenas, particularly academia, those who express thoughts or opinions that don't fit a certain narrative are shamed, shunned, or shut out.

Self-appointed arbiters impose their will to change others' behavior or, worse yet, silence them.

In a civilized society, we must honor certain boundaries. Otherwise, intimidation could reign; our lives and/or livelihood could be threatened.

Take an incident at West Virginia University, where the absence of historical perspective or respect for constitutional protections is particularly ironic.

During a Zoom conference call addressing how to foster a safer and more inclusive campus culture, the police chief's Blue Lives Matter flag caught the attention of some students, who expressed outrage.

The flag was a gift that honors his commitment as a first responder, the police chief explained.

Nevertheless, he apologized, noting he didn't realize the flag would be traumatic to participants on the call.

But his apology wasn't adequate.

He removed the flag from the wall of his private home.

Caryn M. Sullivan: Can we agree or disagree, or agree to disagree - and listen along the way?

That wasn't adequate, either.

University professors called for his resignation, though it appears he's still on the job.

Many of us offer glimpses of our homes to strangers as we work remotely.

Must we remove decor that might be viewed through another's screen - memorabilia, menorahs or crucifixes (even Green Bay Packer paraphernalia) to avoid offending someone and to keep our jobs?

Must we also worry about being confronted in the privacy of our own homes?

With public servants' home addresses released to cyberspace, this concern has become a reality.

A group recently gathered on the lawn and walkway of a Minnesota state senator's home, armed with bullhorns and a drum. They opened his screen door, urging him to come outside to talk. Met with silence, they threatened to ensure he wouldn't be re-elected. He and his neighbors would have no peace, they cried.

Home office and front stoops - where are the limits?

I'm thinking about our young people, tomorrow's leaders. What will the future hold for them?

When protests and civil unrest subside, action plans are rolled out and votes are cast, will life be better for them? Will their voices be celebrated or silenced?

I want them to understand how our constitutional protections distinguish our country from others.

I want them to embrace what I hope will be a universal truth: that attitude, behavior, and choices - not the color of one's skin - will chart the course for their future.

I want our young people to appreciate we're passionate and principled people who can assemble and use our voices - within limits; that we're imperfect people who will use hindsight and foresight as we make important decisions; and that we're law-abiding people who will behave as such or face the consequences.

It's up to the adults to set the example, to chart the course.

Let's be respectful; listen with our ears and our hearts; and, if need be, agree to disagree. Soucheray: Trust us, the Minneapolis Council said. We don't, said the Charter Commission. Kyle, Spencer, Kulas: We love St. Paul. Here's how to help. Banaian, Schmitz: Are 4-year degrees oversold? Not at all, even in the liberal arts. Soucheray: And our ability to reason is swept away. Bonnie Blodgett: Focus on the fruit, tomato plant!

Graphic

Caryn Sullivan

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Caryn M. Sullivan: Can we agree or disagree, or agree to disagree - and listen along the way?

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDXXVII. DUMBA AIDS NHL RETURN

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 2, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 8CLength: 571 wordsByline: SARAH MCLELLAN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Wild defenseman spoke about racial injustice and then took a knee.Body

EDMONTON, ALBERTA - The hockey was still hockey.

Connor McDavid's lightning-fast speed, Patrick Kane's stealthy shot and the cacophony of sticks and pucks and bodies crunching into the boards - all of that was on display at Rogers Place when the NHL returned Saturday with a 24-team postseason tournament after a 142-day hiatus.

The Blackhawks toppled the Oilers 6-4, the first of two clashes on the day from the Western Conference hub with another three occurring in Toronto, where the East has set up shop.

But while the season resumed to culminate like it always does, with the Stanley Cup getting paraded around the ice, the NHL relaunched after getting shut down by the coronavirus pandemic on March 12 with plenty of reminders of how the world has evolved during its hibernation.

In a surprise cameo, Wild defenseman Matt Dumba joined both teams lined up around center ice and addressed a national TV audience in Canada and the United States with a nearly three-minute speech on racial injustice.

Dumba, who helped create the Hockey Diversity Alliance earlier this summer with other pro players in the aftermath of George Floyd's death in Minneapolis police custody, spoke of how deeply rooted systemic racism is in society and of wanting kids to feel "safe, comfortable and free-minded" when they enter an arena. His message was accompanied by the words "END RACISM" on the video boards.

"Racism is everywhere, and we need to fight against it," said Dumba, who is Filipino-Canadian.

And then Dumba became the first NHLer to kneel for the U.S. national anthem, a hand from Chicago goalie Malcolm Subban and Edmonton defenseman Darnell Nurse on each of his shoulders. Dumba stood for Canada's national anthem.

"Hockey is a great game, but it could be a whole lot greater," said Dumba, wearing a Hockey Diversity Alliance sweatshirt. "And it starts with all of us."

Times are also different in the arena.

Trainers on each team's bench wore masks. Hand-sanitizing stations littered the concourse level, and benches were wiped down between periods. Media check-in consisted of a temperature reading and symptoms survey.

Most jarring, though, were the empty seats. Some were covered by tarps, embossed with "Edmonton" or "NHL." But most were abandoned, an unfamiliar sight but one that also made the purity of the game unmistakable - the impact from every pass, carom and hit floating to the rafters.

So did the chatter among players and the cheers erupting from the benches after a goal. "Come on" was the bellow after McDavid skidded along the ice following an apparent trip that was missed by the officials, the voice chiming in sounding very much like the one that belongs to Oilers head coach Dave Tippett.

But the acoustics also acted like the locals were let in.

Each team's respective goal horn blasted when someone scored, with Chicago's celebratory "Chelsea Dagger" getting plenty of airtime. The NHL's version of elevator music filled the silence during stoppages in play and at intermissions, and hype videos scrolled across the Jumbotron.

Occasionally, a "Let's Go Oilers" chant even broke out when a compilation of fans cheering appeared on the LED screens suspended from the ceiling.

It didn't help sharpen the edge that usually dominates the Stanley Cup playoffs, the bite between the Oilers and Blackhawks lacking.

Still, hockey is back, and the object of the game hasn't changed.

But the world has, and that includes the NHL.

Load-Date: August 4, 2020

Dane Mizutani: The NHL needs more players like Matt Dumba

ARTICLE MCDXXVIII.

DANE MIZUTANI: THE NHL NEEDS MORE PLAYERS LIKE MATT DUMBA

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 2, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 695 words

Byline: Dane Mizutani

Highlight: Wild defenseman Matt Dumba became the first player in NHL history to kneel for the U.S. national anthem on Saturday afternoon inside the league's bubble in Edmonton, Alberta. He did so immediately after giving a moving speech about fighting racism within the sport. It's something Dumba has faced since he was a kid and something [...]

Body

Wild defenseman Matt Dumba became the first player in NHL history to kneel for the U.S. national anthem on Saturday afternoon inside the league's bubble in Edmonton, Alberta. He did so immediately after giving a moving speech about fighting racism within the sport.

It's something Dumba has faced since he was a kid and something he knows kids continue to face in present day.

That's why on the eve of the Wild qualifying series against the Vancouver Canucks, with so many tuning in to the NHL restart, Dumba used his platform to reach as many people as possible.

He talked about racism being "a man-made creation" that some people have the privilege to ignore. He acknowledged that some people might be getting tired of hearing the message as a whole. He literally said the words "Black Lives Matter" and promised to continue the conversation regardless of the circumstance.

As for the act of taking a knee during the U.S. national anthem, Dumba eloquently explained his reasoning, adding that his only regret is not kneeling for the Canadian national anthem, too. He said he will raise his fist for both anthems throughout the NHL postseason.

"I know why I knelt," Dumba said. "It wasn't a sign of disrespect by any means. It was to shed light on the people who have lived through the injustice and oppression, especially in my home state of Minnesota. That's why I did it.

"There is a lot of light that needs to be shed on what is happening in Canada, too, and the oppression First Nations people have felt for hundreds of years," Dumba added. "I was disappointed looking back on it because I knew the reasons why I knelt. Just in the moment it happened like that."

All of it took remarkable courage from Dumba, especially given the culture surrounding the sport itself.

Dane Mizutani: The NHL needs more players like Matt Dumba

It's no secret that the NHL is a predominantly white league with a predominantly white audience. There simply aren't as many minorities in the NHL as, say, the NBA and the NFL, and because of that any mention of race is oftentimes ill-received.

Just take a look at Dumba's mentions on social media. It's a cesspool filled with some of the worst people imaginable.

Not that Dumba is fazed in the slightest. Asked for his message to the haters, Dumba smirked and replied, "Keep it coming."

"It kind of sheds a light on them and the people that follow them - their friends, their family - can see their beliefs and how they view the world and see the negative light that they're trying to shed on this," Dumba added. "For all the people who have the courage in their fingertips sitting behind that keyboard, I know half the stuff they wouldn't say to my face if I was standing right in front of them."

There have been baby steps in the right direction over the past couple of months, including Dumba helping form the Hockey Diversity Alliance, an organization founded by players of color to combat racial injustice and inequality in the sport. He rocked a Hockey Diversity Alliance hoodie during his cameo at Rogers Place on Saturday afternoon with a graphic that read "END RACISM" plastered on screens throughout the arena.

It's a start. Now the NHL needs to keep the momentum going.

To do that, the NHL needs more players like Dumba as it continues this fight. Some white players, like Sidney Crosby and Alex Ovechkin, among others, have spoken out against racism in the past couple of months

That said, the conversation as a whole has seemed to fall by the wayside with so many shifting their focus to the NHL restart.

Wild goaltender Devan Dubnyk vows to return better next season Was that the final game for Wild captain Mikko Koivu? 'It's still too early' Five Wild storylines heading into a pivotal offseason Wild's season ends abruptly as Canucks score 11 seconds into overtime Wild star Kevin Fiala laments 'stupid penalties' in Game 3

That's why Dumba's message was so important. This isn't going away anytime soon, and thus, the NHL can't lose sight of what's important.

"We are very optimistic and I believe the NHL is, too," Dumba said speaking on behalf of the Hockey Diversity Alliance. "We both know to make a substantial change in our game and in our world we have to partner with each other."

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Mustache competition passes time

ARTICLE MCDXXIX.

MUSTACHE COMPETITION PASSES TIME

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 2, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 3CLength: 537 wordsByline: JERRY ZGODA; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Quarantined five weeks now in Orlando and counting, Minnesota United players apparently will do anything to pass the time between training sessions and MLS is Back tournament games.

Even grow a cheesy mustache.

Striker Aaron Schoenfeld was the first to try, starting with the team's second game in Group D play from which it advanced to beat Columbus on penalty kicks in Tuesday's knockout round.

He was followed not long thereafter by starting goalkeeper Tyler Miller.

"It honestly just came about because of boredom," Miller said in a video conference call on Thursday. "Aaron Schoenfeld has inspired me. He had it for a few days and he was begging me each game to join him. I told him for the last game I'd do it."

Schoenfeld is living with his teammates on their own floor of a Disney resort hotel near the ESPN Wide World of Sports complex. They beat San Jose 4-1 Saturday night in a tournament quarterfinal game and will play Orlando City in Thursday's semifinal.

"I figured where else in my life am I going to have 30-plus days to be around guys and not give a [pause] what I look like?" Schoenfeld asked in an post-training interview with a club employee provided to media Friday. "Who cares? It looks like trash, but I'm rolling with it right now."

Don't color Schoenfeld's coach impressed.

"I think I'm best staying out of this one," coach Adrian Heath said in a video call. "Obviously, the players have been having plenty of fun about it. I think he'll grow it as long as we're in the tournament, so we'll see what it's like in the end."

Miller credited his new look partly for the penalty kick he saved Tuesday that helped beat Columbus in a shootout.

"I was having fun, I was enjoying playing," Miller said. "I was able to make a save and I wanted to keep the mood light and that's really what this is all about. ... Just really throw it back to the days where you're playing club soccer and there's no crowd noise and you're just playing for the love of the game."

Metanire out

Loons All-Star right back Romain Metanire was designated neither starter nor substitute Saturday night. He injured his hamstring in Tuesday's second half and was replaced for the rest of the game by midfielder Marlon Hairston.

Sidelined by his own hamstring injury since group play's second game, Kevin Molino didn't start Saturday but was available as a sub. Versatile Hassani Dotson started in Metanire's spot, and Jacori Hayes started in a midfield position for Molino.

Flexing their depth

The Loons remade their roster over the winter by adding young, athletic players experienced in MLS play and still just approaching their prime.

In Orlando's summer heat and humidity, relative newcomers Hayes, Hairston and Raheem Edwards all have played parts in their team remaining unbeaten all season. Schoenfeld has done so, too, as both starter and substitute.

"We didn't miss a beat when they came on," Heath said. "The only issue I have is wondering who to put in when we have these moments."

Movement continues

Eligible to play Saturday as a substitute, Loons veteran defender Brent Kallman wore an "End Racism" T-shirt on the sidelines while teammates and coaches wore "Black Lives Matter" shirts that they've worn as warmups throughout the tournament.

Load-Date: August 4, 2020

Repair, remodel and relocate: How three University Avenue businesses are still recovering from unrest

ARTICLE MCDXXX.

REPAIR, REMODEL AND RELOCATE: HOW THREE UNIVERSITY AVENUE BUSINESSES ARE STILL RECOVERING FROM UNREST

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 2, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 989 words

Byline: Isabel Saavedra-Weis

Highlight: It only took one night for businesses along University Avenue to be looted, vandalized and set afire. It's taking much longer for the business owners to come back from the damage. Two months have passed since the initial damage was caused in late May during the unrest following the death of George Floyd. More than [...]

Body

It only took one night for businesses along University Avenue to be looted, vandalized and set afire. It's taking much longer for the business owners to come back from the damage.

Two months have passed since the initial damage was caused in late May during the unrest following the death of George Floyd. More than 1,000 businesses in the Twin Cities metro area reported property damage, and state officials estimated $500 million in damages statewide.

Facing everything from stolen merchandise, to damaged interiors, to buildings reduced to heaps of debris, many businesses are still on the road to recovery. Here are the stories of three of them on University in St. Paul:

IRREPLACEABLE INVENTORY

On the night of May 28, Ax-Man Surplus owner Jim Segal watched from his car as people broke into and looted his store. In the end, the looters and vandals caused an estimated $200,000 in damage including stolen inventory, smashed windows and a broken security system, he said.

Ax-Man Surplus had already been closed for over a month due to Gov. Tim Walz's orders to shut down nonessential businesses during the pandemic. The store had reopened for less than two weeks before having to close for another six weeks to clean and repair.

So far, all the expenses of the physical damage are covered by insurance. But the insurance covering the stolen inventory is still in limbo, Segal said.

"The nature of our inventory makes it challenging, because surplus inventory is often not replaceable," he said.

Repair, remodel and relocate: How three University Avenue businesses are still recovering from unrest

RELATED: Piles of charred rubble from riot remain. Clearing them no easy task.

Even if the insurance ends up covering the stolen goods, Segal will still be bracing for a financial blow. The store's St. Paul location is open again, but business is slow. Annual sales are down 40 percent compared with last year due to the pandemic, he says.

"We were closed for 13 weeks, but my expenses didn't stop," Segal said. "2020 is going to be a tough year."

THE RUSH TO REMODEL

About two miles down the street at 7-Mile Sportswear Hair Depot, store owner Jin Lim estimates he lost more than $1 million in inventory when his store was looted the same night. And that doesn't even begin to cover the cost of the interior fire or water damage.

But when he temporarily closed the store on May 29, Lim received a wave of phone calls from loyal customers.

"I checked the voicemail later, and I had more than 900 phone calls asking when we would reopen the store," he said.

With high demand for his business's comeback, he started the rebuilding process almost immediately. Although the building structure was still intact, the entire interior had to be remodeled. And only 60 percent of the damage was covered by insurance, Lim says.

One month and $130,000 later, the wig and hair-extension store has new shelves and display cases. Unfortunately, only 70 percent of them were restocked when he reopened three weeks ago.

Luckily, having worked in the hair industry for the past 25 years has its perks. Since many of Lim's distributor companies know him well, they struck a deal with him - they will send him free merchandise for now. He will pay them back later when he has the money, he says.

SEARCHING FOR A NEW LOCATION

This June would've marked the third anniversary since Solomon Hailie and Rekik Abaineh opened Bolé Ethiopian Cuisine on University Avenue.

This also would've been the year they opened Bolé Express, a new grab-and-go counter attached to their sit-down-style restaurant. After a fire destroyed both of their leased properties, the restaurant owners are back at square one.

Lelna Desta, a business consultant and friend of the Bolé's co-founders, has been helping get the restaurant off the ground again. But as they try to get back in the game, they are realizing that the game looks different now, she says.

It's unclear if the property owners of their original location on Syndicate Street are planning to rebuild, so they've started to look elsewhere in St. Paul to set up shop. But it's a delicate balance to find a building that is both spacious and affordable, Desta says.

"In the back of our minds, we know the restaurant industry is struggling right now," Desta said. "We don't want to lease or buy the wrong property when we know the next six months are going to be a struggle."

Repair, remodel and relocate: How three University Avenue businesses are still recovering from unrest

Not only do they have to rebuild their location, but they have to reimagine their business model. With the coronavirus pandemic changing the way people dine out, the original Bolé dining experience is no longer feasible or financially savvy, Desta notes.

"The original concept of Bolé was not just a meal," Desta said. "People loved the ambiance, the music, the aromas, the coffee ceremony. You can't pack that up in a to-go order."

Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police As the Bolé staff try to figure out how to rebuild during a pandemic and economic recession, they hope to be up and running again before this winter. Support from the community is a driving force for their comeback.

Over \$100,000 in donations flooded to Bolé's GoFundMe page in the days following the fire. Two months later, Desta and the Bolé staff still receive countless calls from community members expressing their support and asking when the restaurant will reopen.

The Bolé staff feel a sense of responsibility to those community members, says Desta. And the restaurant owners are itching to get back in the kitchen.

"It's a really bad time to be in the restaurant business, but that's part of being a small-business owner. There is no right time," Desta said. "This is a family-owned restaurant, and their livelihood depends on this."

Graphic

Jim Segal, the owner of Ax-Man on University Avenue in St. Paul, was in his business when the store was broken into and looted earlier this year. He barricaded himself in the bathroom. His store has since reopened. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

A customer looks over the merchandise at 7-Mile Sportswear at University Ave. and Dale St. on Tuesday, July 28, 2020. (John Autey / Pioneer Press)

Dong Kyu Jeon adds labels to merchandise at 7-Mile Sportswear at University Ave. and Dale St. on Tuesday, July 28, 2020. (John Autey / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCDXXXI. PHILLIP ATIBA GOFF: OUR BRAINS ARE CONDITIONED TO BLAME BLACK PEOPLE AND BLOCK CHANGE - BUT WE CAN CHANGE THAT

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 2, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 887 words

Byline: Phillip Atiba Goff

Highlight: When I talk to officers about a police shooting, they usually ask some version of the same question: "So, what did they do?" The second half of the question - "to deserve it" - is assumed. Running the Center for Policing Equity means I work with departments that want to reduce bias and violence. Yet [...]

Body

When I talk to officers about a police shooting, they usually ask some version of the same question: "So, what did they do?" The second half of the question - "to deserve it" - is assumed.

Running the Center for Policing Equity means I work with departments that want to reduce bias and violence. Yet the assumption that victims, particularly Black victims, must have deserved their fate is deeply ingrained. Even reform-minded officers start by fitting each shooting into a story they think they've seen before: resistant suspect shot by threatened officer. If I begin telling a different story, about the violence of poverty or the fear of police brutality, officers search for the "real" reason - and change becomes an afterthought.

It's easy to pin this thinking on police. But our history of hand-wringing, inaction and ultimately forgetting after each cycle of racial violence and outrage indicates otherwise. It's not just police. It's the nation. And there is psychological science behind why.

The problem begins with how humans see and remember. We navigate the complexity of everyday life by filtering information through scenarios our brains have rehearsed - the cognitive basis for stereotypes. Most of the time, these stories serve us well. Balloons connote a party; a snake's hiss means danger.

Precisely because they are so often accurate, these mental shortcuts can literally substitute what we assume comes next for what we actually witness. In 1999, after New York Police Department officers shot Amadou Diallo 19 times, they swore they saw a gun where none existed. They may not have lied; the assumption of Black guilt may well have transformed a harmless object into a gun in the officers' minds.

Bypassing these shortcuts to witness the real version of events is mentally exhausting - like suddenly encountering a lake after living your whole life in a desert. That is why studying for exams requires focus and we feel physically tired after a day of decisions. For too many, bearing witness to Black innocence is like a polar bear in the jungle. It is new, surprising and requires work to understand what is happening.

Phillip Atiba Goff: Our brains are conditioned to blame Black people and block change - but we can change that

As a nation, we have been unwilling to do that work.

This is why the tragedies that mobilize protest can feel like an awakening. The heightened visibility temporarily overrides our cognitive defaults. This may explain why, in the wake of George Floyd's killing, the percentage of Americans who viewed his death as a sign of "larger problems" surged.

But growing up in the United States conditions most to treat extrajudicial killings of Black people as startling but natural, like lightning strikes in a distant forest. After the initial shock, our brains want to "flood fresh vision with older images." This, as Walter Lippmann wrote, is both the function of stereotypes in psychology and a blinder to the truth.

Replacing the flawed stories that flood our vision requires bearing witness longer than is comfortable for our national attention span. And so, after each tragedy, we abandon serious efforts to prevent the next one. Just when we start to see reality, our brains tell us to forget.

Following the 1967 uprisings sparked by police brutality, President Lyndon Johnson's Kerner Commission recommended targeted investment "on a scale equal to the dimension of the problems" in the communities where uprisings broke out. The next year, Americans elected Richard Nixon on a law and order platform. When violent protests consumed Los Angeles in 1992, the Clinton administration created a federal community policing program. The 1994 crime bill, a capstone of punitive policing, quickly overshadowed it.

And still, some of us are cursed with vision. Those who loved the victims have no choice but to continue bearing witness - and fighting for change that can never make them whole. In June, I had the privilege of testifying in front of Congress alongside George Floyd's brother, Philonise Floyd, who had buried his brother the day before. He implored lawmakers to make sure George would not become "another name on a list that won't stop growing."

The work required to answer Floyd's call - to bear witness until our default stories change - has always been too much for too many. So we leave the possibility of a just, equitable system of public safety incarcerated in a prison of our mind's precedent.

After George Floyd's death, Gwen Carr - the mother of Eric Garner, strangled to death by an NYPD officer in 2014 - offered simple advice to his family: "Don't forget," she said, and "fight for your loved one." Americans from all walks of life need to follow that advice: Resist the urge to forget, and fight - against the mental temptation of the familiar and for change commensurate with the injustices we have witnessed.

Our minds' default does not have to be our destiny. As cameras retreat from Minneapolis and Atlanta, we can fall back on familiar stories. We can forget, as the country has before. Or, as survivors have always done, we can refuse to look away. We can resist the lure of our minds' habits - and learn to seek a vision of justice, instead.

Dr. Phillip Atiba Goff is co-founder and chief executive officer of the Center for Policing Equity and a professor of African American studies and psychology at Yale University. He wrote this column for the Chicago Tribune.

Phillip Atiba Goff: Our brains are conditioned to blame Black people and block change - but we can change that

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

EXECUTIVE COMPENSATION REPORT

ARTICLE MCDXXXII.

EXECUTIVE COMPENSATION REPORT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 2, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 1258 wordsByline: PATRICK KENNEDY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Plenty of work ahead // Diversity in top ranks has grown just incrementally // Only four women are a part of Minnesota's top-paid executivesBody

Pledges for increased diversity in public companies have intensified since George Floyd's death on Memorial Day. Chief executives have not only given to community efforts but also said they are listening and know they need to do better in integrating staffs.

Minnesota's largest public companies have a long way to go when it comes to their leadership. Two of the 50 top-paid executives on this year's Star Tribune list are people of color. Omar Ishrak of Medtronic retired in the spring, which leaves only Gary Maharaj of Eden Prairie-based Surmodics among active chief executives.

Four of the top-paid chief executives are women: Corie Barry of Best Buy, Beth Wozniak of nVent, Shelly Ibach of Sleep Number and Vicki Holt of Protolabs.

Diversity in C-suites and boards of directors is increasing but is nowhere near mirroring the population as a whole.

In Minnesota, the inclusion of people of color is moving even more slowly than representation of women, according to Rebecca Hawthorne, professor emeritus of organizational leadership at St. Catherine University.

"Generally speaking, trends have been improving incrementally throughout the last 12 years of the research; it has been very slow," said Hawthorne, an author of the Minnesota Census of Women in Corporate Leadership.

On boards, representation is more visible. Nearly all of Minnesota's public companies have at least one woman on their board of directors.

EXECUTIVE COMPENSATION REPORT

Minnesota's largest public company, UnitedHealth Group - whose chief executive, David Wichmann, was the highest-paid executive last year with $52.1 million in compensation - lists four women, one of color, on its 17-person leadership team and three women, two of color, on its 10-member board of directors.

While some of the companies' leadership is more diverse, UnitedHealth's numbers are representative.

Plenty of evidence shows that companies that have more diverse voices on boards and in management do better financially. It's the reason some large institutional investors have pushed diversity initiatives, including State Street, the world's third-largest asset manager and a significant investor in nearly all of Minnesota's largest public companies.

The calls for diversity often become louder after events such as George Floyd's killing by Minneapolis police and the protests that have followed. Many companies across the country say his death - and those of other Black people by police - have spurred a more honest and robust conversation, from people of color speaking candidly about their experiences to internal petitions for more diversity.

The call for equal representation for women also has been yearslong, pushed by several national initiatives and groups like Catalyst.

St. Catherine has been studying the inclusion of women on the boards and in management of Minnesota public companies for 12 years. Its most recent report, the 2019 Minnesota Census of Women in Corporate Leadership, showed women held 22.9% of the available board positions at 76 Minnesota public companies, up from 14.2% in the first year of the study. The year also saw the largest net increase of female board members.

The study also showed women holding 22.7% of available executive-officer positions, the highest percentage in the 12 years, up from 15.5% in the first year of its census.

"There has been increased focus internationally, nationally and locally on issues of diversity, and gender diversity as one element of that in terms of corporate leadership, starting at the board level," Hawthorne said. "That increased scrutiny has definitely made a difference."

That pressure includes a mix of reporting requirements from governments and pressure from both investors and peer companies.

"When we have different bodies actually putting forth accountability, that does change the picture a bit," Hawthorne said. "We really didn't see that in 2008 when we started the research."

Washington state this year passed legislation requiring the public companies there to have 25% of their board members be women by Jan. 1, 2022.

California has a similar mandate, and Michigan, New Jersey and Pennsylvania have been advancing such rules. The European Union has had rules on board diversity for years.

The Fearless Girl campaign by institutional shareholder State Street is more than a statue. The investment group identified 1,384 companies across the world without any women on their boards and pressed them to include more female candidates and directors. Since the launch of the campaign, the company said 681 companies have added directors who are women, including 495 in the United States.

EXECUTIVE COMPENSATION REPORT

Shareholder proposals on company proxies also have asked fellow shareholders to support more diversity on their boards and in CEO searches.

New York City Retirement Systems submitted a shareholder proposal this year at Berkshire Hathaway asking the company to adopt a "policy for improving board and top management diversity."

It's part of a larger effort announced earlier this year by New York City Retirement Systems to get companies to consider women and people of color for board positions and in CEO searches.

Top-paid women

1. Marianne Short EVP, CLO UnitedHealth Group Inc. $9.3
2. Catherine Smith strategic advisory, fmr CFO Target Corp. $7.5
3. Corie Barry CEO Best Buy Co. Inc. $7.5
4. Shelly Ibach P, CEO Sleep Number Corp. $6.9
5. Julie Bushman EVP International Operations 3M Co. $6.2
6. Jill Wyant EVP, P-global regions Ecolab Inc. $5.5
7. Trish Walker P-services and home channel Best Buy Co. Inc. $4.8
8. Karen Parkhill EVP, CFO Medtronic PLC $4.2
9. Kamy Scarlett CHR Best Buy Co. Inc. $4.1
10. Renee Peterson CFO, treasurer, VP Toro Co. $3.2

Top-paid non-Ceos

1. Hubert Joly ExCh Best Buy Co. Inc. $64.9
2. Stephen Hemsley fmr ExCh UnitedHealth Group Inc. $51.5
3. Inge G. Thulin fmr ExCh 3M Co. $34.3
4. Steven H. Nelson fmr EVP UnitedHealth Group Inc. $18.9
5. John J. Mulligan EVP, CFO Target Corp. $18.6
6. Dirk McMahon CEO-Unitedhealthcare UnitedHealth Group Inc. $17.6
7. John Rex EVP, CFO UnitedHealth Group Inc. $13
8. Marianne Short EVP, CLO UnitedHealth Group Inc. $9.3
9. Don H. Liu EVP, chief legal and risk officer Target Corp. $7.5
10. Catherine Smith strategic advisory, fmr CFO Target Corp. $7.5

Room for improvement

EXECUTIVE COMPENSATION REPORT

At Minnesota's 50 largest public companies by revenue, 29% of the board positions are held by women. Only two companies do not have a woman on its board.

1. UnitedHealth Group 10 3
2. Target Corp. 11 3
3. Best Buy Co Inc.* 10 6
4. 3M Co. 11 4
5. Medtronic 12 3
6. U.S. Bancorp 13 5
7. General Mills Inc. 12 5
8. C.H. Robinson Worldwide Inc. 9 3
9. Ecolab Inc. 12 5
10. Ameriprise Financial Inc. 9 2
11. Xcel Energy Inc. 14 2
12. Hormel Foods Corp. 12 3
13. Polaris Inc. 10 3
14. Patterson Cos. Inc. 8 2
15. Fastenal Co. 10 2
16. Toro Co. 11 3
17. Pentair PLC 8 3
18. HB Fuller Co. 9 2
19. Donaldson Company Inc. 10 2
20. Winnebago Industries Inc. 9 2
21. nVent Electric* 9 4
22. TCF Financial 16 5
23. Deluxe 9 2
24. Vista Outdoor 10 3
25. Sleep Number* 10 5
26. Graco 10 3

EXECUTIVE COMPENSATION REPORT

27. Apogee 10 3
28. Allete 10 5
29. Tennant 9 3
30. Regis 8 2
31. Otter Tail Corp. 9 2
32. MTS Systems 7 2
33. Piper Sandler 10 3
34. Ceridian HCM 9 3
35. Bio-Techne 9 1
36. Stratasys 8 2
37. Hawkins 8 1
38. iMedia Brands 7 2
39. Northern Oil and Gas 8 1
40. Protolabs Inc. 8 2
41. Christopher & Banks 6 2
42. Tile Shop Holdings 4 0
43. SPS Commerce 7 2
44. Cardiovascular Systems 7 1
45. Digi International Inc. 6 1
46. ANI Pharmaceuticals 4 0
47. Tactile Sytems Techonology 7 1
48. Investores Real Estate Trust 8 3
49. WPT Industrial Real Estate 7 2
50. Nortech Systems Inc. 5 1

SEE MICROFILM OR PDF FOR CHART.

Load-Date: August 2, 2020

ARTICLE MCDXXXIII.

CRIME CLIMBS AS OFFICERS DEPART

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 2, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1713 wordsByline: LIBOR JANY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Minneapolis police are down at least 100 officers since the killing of George Floyd - more than 10% of the force - straining department resources amid a wave of violence and adding extra urgency to the political debate over its future.

Over the past two months, 40 cops have resigned, been fired or are in the process of leaving the force, and another 75 have taken a medical leave for post-traumatic stress disorder they say was caused by the riots that followed Floyd's death. Dozens more are expected to file for leave in the coming months.

MPD officials not authorized to speak publicly estimate the department, which is budgeted for 888 officers this year, could lose as much as a third of its workforce by the end of the year.

The shortages highlight the challenge facing the city's beleaguered police force as it faces calls for its defunding, or even abolishment.

Residents say that police are taking longer to respond to emergency calls, even as homicides, shootings and robberies have all increased by double digits from last year.

Some of that frustration surfaced during Friday's City Council meeting, when Council Member Andrea Jenkins questioned officers' apparent reluctance to enter the area surrounding Floyd's memorial at E. 38th Street and S. Chicago Avenue, a long-troubled corner that has been the site of several shootings in recent weeks.

"People in this area, they're not experiencing slow response, they're experiencing no response. They're being told that this is called a no-go zone by MPD," she said in the meeting broadcast on Zoom.

Minneapolis Police Chief Medaria Arradondo defended the department's responses near the blocked-off intersection in the meeting, explaining that officers must respond to calls, and if they don't, the reason is documented.

Crime climbs as officers depart

"In and around that intersection when a violent incident had occurred, in order for officers to try and safely get in there, that officers had to have some communication of they could meet right outside the barriers, I know there are a couple incidences where that had occurred."

Gunfire incidents soar

Though total reported crimes were down 31% in June and 4% by July's end, gunfire incidents, which tie up multiple squads, soared 224% and 166% during the same period, according to MPD records.

More recently, the city's South Side has been hit with a string of armed robberies and carjackings, which police say are the work of the same crew. The Third Precinct recorded 100 robberies and 20 carjackings in July alone.

Meanwhile, police stops are down more than 50% each of the past two months.

Department officials declined to make Arradondo or Assistant Chief Mike Kjos available for comment Friday, but a spokesman insisted that the department has enough officers on the streets to adequately patrol the city.

"Right now we have reduced numbers of sworn people due to COVID, midyear retirements and medical leaves. The vacancies are being filled by other sworn personnel," said spokesman John Elder. "Whereas we have less sworn people than six months ago, we are not seeing staff shortages on any sort of a routine basis."

The decreased staffing levels among the MPD's five precincts is a dilemma for the department, as it grapples with COVID-related budget cuts and sinking officer morale. For instance, a recent Monday night found just six officers patrolling the 14.5 square miles of the Third Precinct, according to MPD officials.

The department must constantly balance shortages, as officers call in sick or take vacation time. They do so by holding over earlier shifts, using response cars from other precincts at particularly busy times, and offering so-called "green days" - putting out a citywide bid for officers to work overtime to backfill positions.

Meanwhile, officers from disbanded units like the Police Athletic League, procedural justice and community engagement have been reassigned, with some sent back to the streets, as have former school resource officers.

Officials would not disclose which units the departures are coming from, but MPD insiders say the Second Precinct was particularly hard hit. Investigation units haven't been spared either, with the juvenile crimes unit losing several detectives in the exodus.

The deployment picture has worsened as the department tries to dig itself out of the budgetary hole it's been in since the COVID-19 pandemic struck. While a recent class of recruits hit the streets last month, another class that was scheduled to start training in August has been canceled. And with a citywide hiring freeze in effect until at least the end of the year, there are no replacements in sight.

The MPD uses a formula to figure out where to place its officers, based on such factors as the size of the precinct, time spent on each call and the number of calls for assistance, according to former Assistant Chief Kris Arneson. Precinct inspectors choose their staffing minimums at the start of each year and make small adjustments in deployment during the year, as new recruits or cadets graduate, replacing the roughly 40 to 50 officers the department loses to attrition most years.

"That puts a tremendous amount of pressure on the officers who're left to handle calls," said Arneson.

The departures come at a crucial moment for the MPD. Faced with a state investigation into its practices, several council members have put forth a charter amendment that would lead to the MPD's dismantling.

Complaints about slower response times have gone up, which police say is a direct result of patrol squads throughout the city being increasingly stretched.

In a class-action lawsuit against the city, a group of East Phillips neighborhood residents alleged that it had been deprived of adequate policing, and regularly were told to call 311, instead of 911, whenever there were shots fired but no victims.

"The City of Minneapolis is not offering equal protections in its distribution of services and funding to its low wealth neighborhoods," the lawsuit said.

After months of what they saw as neglect by City Hall and the police, Maria Gali and her neighbors blocked off their street and organized armed patrols in an effort to take back their block from the drug dealers and prostitutes who seem emboldened by the lack of police presence.

"Sometimes they showed up after one hour. Sometimes they didn't," said Gali, who isn't part of the suit. Alondra Cano, the council member who represents the area, told residents and business owners in the 2900 block of S. 18th Avenue that officers were deliberately bypassing the area to protest a proposal to dismantle the police and replace it with a new public safety system.

"And we are in the middle," Gali said. "OK, this is your battle, and you didn't ask us if we agreed to cut the police - maybe it's a good idea, but not right now. Maybe it'd be a better idea with a plan."

Leslie Bowden, born and raised in south Minneapolis, can see the Floyd memorial on 38th and Chicago from her front yard. The intersection has turned into a pilgrimage site for countless visitors, but has also long held a reputation as a hotbed for gang activity. She said she calls police as a last resort, mostly when she hears gunshots, but it seems like police rarely respond, leaving residents to fend for themselves.

"Police murdered a man in our neighborhood and then they just all fell out and left us alone to figure out our own as far as protecting our neighborhoods," she said. "You feel isolated, like you're in a war zone sometimes, but there's no one helping us."

Others have raised the possibility that officers are engaged in an unofficial work slowdown in response to the proposal to disband the department.

D.A. Bullock said that rising crime is concerning, but it shouldn't take away from the conversations around reimagining public safety.

"When crime goes down, there's not a call to reduce the number of police, because it's viewed as effective," said Bullock, a local filmmaker whose works touch on criminal justice issues. "But when crime ticks up, you have the opposite argument, saying well, we need to increase staffing because we don't have enough officers to respond to calls."

Shifting the conversation

Anika Bowie, vice president of the Minneapolis chapter of the NAACP, agreed, saying the focus should be on making long-term investments in "housing, in quality education, in access to food, in access to affordable health care."

The issue will be scrutinized anew in the current, politically charged debate around the department's future.

University of Minnesota sociology Prof. Michelle Phelps says that other cities experienced unrest after a controversial police killing not because police were being less proactive, but because a lack of community confidence created an atmosphere of lawlessness. Slower response times only further chipped away at public trust, she says, creating a "self-fulfilling cycle."

"When precincts are short-staffed, often the first things that are affected are response times, and that in turn can fuel this sense of declining legitimacy," she said.

The department's size peaked in 2008 at 916 officers, but the numbers started dropping that year as the city dealt with the recession and a hiring freeze. As far back as 2012, former Chief Tim Dolan warned the council that an aging Police Department might see retirements start to pick up in the coming years.

Arneson, who retired as assistant chief in 2017, said she believes the city will see "a slimmer MPD in the future" as certain calls, like those involving mental health and drug addiction, will out of necessity be diverted to social service agencies with the proper training to handle them.

"But I think there's a dangerous thinking to abolish or get down to where the numbers are so tight that it's hard to ensure public safety," said Arneson.

She said she recalls working out of the Fifth Precinct during the late 2000s, when the cash-strapped city was forced to lay cops off and the department's head count dropped into the mid-700s.

"It was really hard to keep crime down, to keep the community happy and to keep everybody safe," she said. "And it takes a hit on morale not to have enough officers."

Staff writers Kim Hyatt, Liz Navratil, Jeff Hargarten and Abby Simons contributed to this report.

Libor Jany · 612-673-4064 Twitter: @StribJany

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

EXECUTIVE COMPENSATION REPORT

ARTICLE MCDXXXIV.

EXECUTIVE COMPENSATION REPORT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 2, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 967 wordsByline: LEE SCHAFER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Plenty of work ahead // Racial disparity at the top reflects wide wealth gap // Only two people of color are a part of Minnesota's 50 top-paid executivesBody

Wealth inequality does not get nearly the attention it deserves, and nothing like the focus on income inequality.

It's the hand-wringing over the role played by out-of-control executive pay that has given us things like the required disclosure of the ratio of what the CEO got vs. the typical worker.

Chief executive pay that might be worth 365 times the median worker's pay is difficult to even write about without calling the whole thing absurd.

Looking at wealth is another way to think about disparity.

One of the ways you might have heard of wealth inequality lately is with the so-called wealth gap, a way to describe the chasm between the average household wealth of Black Americans and the wealth of white households. As much of the world learned in the weeks following the killing of George Floyd in Minneapolis, seemingly progressive and affluent Minnesota has a particularly bad case of this problem.

Family wealth is just net worth, the value of what a family owns after subtracting what they owe, like mortgages and car loans. Accumulated wealth can be used to fund college educations, provides a cushion for big financial or economic shocks (like the one we're now experiencing) and can help kids and grandkids get a financial head start.

The big wealth gap with Black households persists at almost every stage of life and really only closes for Black households at the bottom of the income ladder, because on average none of the lowest-income households have virtually any wealth at all.

Part of this persistent problem at first may seem a little puzzling, because even with Black families in the Top 10% by income, their net worth lags white families in the same income bracket. Yet research has shown how that happens, including that Black people are far less likely to have inherited much from a previous generation. So when measuring wealth now, family wealth back in 1980 or 1960 matters, too.

EXECUTIVE COMPENSATION REPORT

A great example of the differences here in Minnesota is with homeownership, a proven way for families to build up some wealth with enough time. The homeownership rate here in the Twin Cities metro area for white households has hung in there about 75% since 2000, but for Black families it's actually declined from an already far lower rate, slipping to just 25% as of the latest data.

Without a windfall, inheritance or rare success in business, there's really only one way to build net worth as a family, and that's simply to spend less than people make. That's obviously a lot easier to do at ever-higher levels of income.

So far this century, only upper-income families have seen their wealth grow, at least according to an analysis published this year by the Pew Research Center. Households in the middle and lower tiers of income have gone backward. The upper tier of families by income have seen their share of total wealth grow from about 60% in 1983 to closer to 80% as of the most recent data, according to Pew.

In this report, Pew defined upper income as at least twice the median household income, adjusted for household size and other factors, but call it about $141,000 in Minnesota. Just to put that $141,000 "upper income" household income into some context, the average annual pay of the executives at UnitedHealth Group, Minnesota's largest company by sales and market value, was $11.9 million.

What falls under disclosed executive pay can be complicated and doesn't always mean bigger checking-account balances right away. But it won't take many years of work at $11.9 million to have enough to ensure that the kids and grandkids will all be wealthy, too.

One outstanding example in recent history of an employee, not owner or founder, getting fantastically rich is Steve Ballmer. In 1980 he dropped out of business school to join a young software company called Microsoft for a $50,000 annual salary, eventually retiring as the CEO. His $73.5 billion in estimated net worth places him sixth on Bloomberg's billionaires ranking.

Lots of talented and hardworking people can become really good managers yet still not get promoted into executive ranks, as the path leading up narrows so much. Yet at last count there were just four Black CEOs in the companies that make up the Fortune 500, a level of representation that just rounds up to 1%.

As it turns out, the percentage of Black employees slips as you look at ever higher levels of management, as described by a McKinsey & Co. report based on 279 companies from 2018.

At the entry level of professional work, white men make up about 36% of the class and Black men just 4%. By the time careers progress to senior manager or director, terms broadly used for middle-management jobs in American corporations, the percentage held by Black men has been cut in half.

The percentage held by white men, meanwhile, has moved up to 52%.

By the time they reach the C-suite, McKinsey found, those executive jobs with "chief" in the title like chief marketing officer, more than two-thirds of those offices are occupied by white men. Meanwhile, the percentage of those jobs held by Black men is just 2%, and more like 1% for Black women.

The difference in pay between these various layers can be a lot, by the way, easily into six figures at the biggest companies between what a director gets paid and the vice president just up the organization chart.

EXECUTIVE COMPENSATION REPORT

If a career tops out as a director rather than a senior vice president, it doesn't take that long for the after-tax, cumulative difference to get well into seven figures.

Meanwhile here in Minnesota, the 50 executives on our executive-compensation list realized $378 million in total compensation last year.

As none of them are Black, that well-paid year at work for this group obviously did not have much of an impact on closing our state's persistent wealth gap.

lee.schafer@startribune.com 612-673-4302

Load-Date: August 2, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDXXXV.

PEOPLE OF COLOR BEAR BRUNT OF COVID-19

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 2, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1875 wordsByline: MARISSA EVANS; MARYJO WEBSTER; MICHAEL COREY; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

When Kirstin Johnson-Nixon tested positive for the coronavirus in May, all she could think was, "Oh, here we go."

The north Minneapolis mother of three and public school social worker had a feeling for weeks that she would get the virus. She's the lead caregiver for her two parents and is in constant contact with them. From what she knew from the news, it seemed like Black people would be most affected.

"I was thinking, 'I'm going to be positive and this could mean that we might die,' that's all I could think of at the time," Johnson-Nixon said. "I just didn't have anything else in my mind except 'Oh my God, what is this going to be like?' "

By the first week of May, Johnson-Nixon, her husband, three sons, mother and father tested positive for COVID.

Johnson-Nixon's worries were well-founded. Black and Hispanic Minnesotans are far more likely to be infected than white Minnesotans, state data show. Each group accounts for about 20% of the confirmed cases in Minnesota, but they only make up 5% and 6% of the population, respectively.

The share of cases in the Asian and Native American communities are both roughly equal to their share of the population.

State death records also show that people of color are dying from COVID at disproportionately high rates, a fact that hasn't gotten a lot of attention due to the high number of deaths among elderly, and mostly white, residents of long-term care facilities. People of color make up 63% of the deaths among adults under age 64, though they are just 16% of that population. But even among older residents, people of color account for 15% of the deaths, triple their share of the population.

Minnesota leaders of color have suffered their share of losses to COVID-19. St. Paul School Board Chairwoman Marny Xiong, the mother of Attorney General Keith Ellison and the father of U.S. Rep.

People of color bear brunt of COVID-19

Ilhan Omar have all died from the virus. Nationally, the toll of deaths and infections from the virus among communities of color has also been evident in cities such as Chicago, Detroit, Los Angeles and New York City.

On Thursday, Herman Cain, a leading Black conservative who ran for president in 2012, died after contracting COVID-19.

The chaos for the Johnson-Nixon family began when her father was diagnosed with COVID-19 on May 4. Johnson-Nixon said she, her husband and mother drove to Maple Grove two days later to get tested. Since it was around the time when clinics were giving tests only to those with symptoms, she had to lie and say they all had fevers and coughs.

Their results came back positive within days. Her mother was found days later at her home unresponsive and was taken to the hospital. Johnson-Nixon said her mother was incoherent. They thought it might be dementia but learned later that COVID can cause bouts of delirium.

Johnson-Nixon said she'd had the flu and pneumonia before, but they paled in comparison to COVID-19. She said she had a fever that felt as if it "started in my waist and went all of the way down to my feet," and she felt like she couldn't lie down in bed comfortably so she was constantly stretching and walking around her small bedroom.

She and her husband, Charles, drank cups of hot tea and looked up YouTube videos of breathing exercises to break up the mucus in their lungs.

Meanwhile, son Caleb, 17, lost his sense of smell and son Raphael, 13, had a headache and a slight fever. Her other son, Judah, 13, was tested, but the hospital could find no record of it.

COVID "made you feel at times like you're feeling better and I would try to wash my hair and then it would kind of knock me down again," Johnson-Nixon said. "I think it was a lot more severe to me than the flu was and for the psychological piece, I know people die from the flu, but I never thought I was going to die because I had the flu."

Federal, state and local public health officials warned early on in the pandemic that communities of color would be vulnerable to COVID-19 because of higher rates of chronic health issues like diabetes, heart disease, high blood pressure and obesity. COVID-19 can exacerbate some of these issues, making it harder for the body to adequately fight the viral infection, according to health experts. Also, people of color are more likely to be on the front lines as essential workers in jobs they cannot do remotely, such as in grocery stores and factories.

In the metro area, areas with a higher share of people of color are more likely to have higher COVID-19 rates, regardless of income, according to a Star Tribune analysis. For every 10 percentage point increase in the nonwhite population in a ZIP code, there are an average of 2 more COVID cases per 1,000 people.

The four ZIP codes in the metro area with the highest COVID-19 rates have populations that are at least 45% people of color. That includes two areas of Minneapolis and parts of Brooklyn Center, Brooklyn Park, New Hope and Crystal.

April Graves, a public health specialist with the Minneapolis Department of Health, said the department has been working with community groups to pull together resources to help people keep their housing and to obtain donations for food and hand sanitizer. When the unrest after George Floyd's death erupted in Minneapolis, the groups worked to pass out 50,000 masks.

People of color bear brunt of COVID-19

Knowing that vulnerable populations aren't accustomed to visiting the city's website, Graves said the city has tried to find ways to reach them - particularly young people - and educate them on the virus, including making TikTok videos that focus on mental health, feelings of isolation and encouraging social distancing. Graves said it's important for people to understand that "there's a segment of society that are living in fear of losing their life everyday."

"You may not be taking COVID seriously when you think about the chance of being shot versus catching a virus in your mind," Graves said.

Stella Whitney-West, CEO of Northpoint Health and Wellness Center, a north Minneapolis area community health office, said she and her staff had long anticipated people of color being most affected by COVID-19. More than half of the clinic's patients are Black, another 30% are Latino and another 10% are Hmong. Many are low-income and are one emergency away from losing everything.

The clinic opened a walk-in testing site last week to try to accommodate more people. It has been doing drive-up testing as well.

"People are doing the best that they can, but there's a fear and anxiety that people have that if they get sick, what is this going to mean," Whitney-West said about how COVID-19 could change the lives of the community they serve. "I think the messages they see on TV is that people get sick enough and go to the hospital that they die, they have to be put on a ventilator, that they can't breathe."

Beyond the dangers of COVID-19 is the larger systemic and institutional discrimination that communities of color face, particularly when overcoming generations of difficulty with housing, health care, food, employment and other economic issues.

Lack of access to bare necessities and space to social distance has made stay-at-home orders challenging for households where one emergency could upend their finances or housing for months. The pandemic is forcing communities of color to confront longtime fears of doctors, hospitals and medical research; also, the lack of diversity among health professionals often makes them delay care.

Even potential progress on the vaccine has been overshadowed by concern over whether medical professionals will be able to convince patients of color that the vaccine is safe. The public health community still has to overcome the distrust created by the Tuskegee experiment, when between 1932 and 1972, hundreds of Black men living with syphilis in Alabama had treatment withheld from them.

Jaime Slaughter-Acey, an epidemiologist with the University of Minnesota's School of Public Health, said that the disproportionate number of people of color dying from COVID-19 hasn't surprised her, especially with how "the insidious nature of racism would be put on display" during the pandemic.

But she said it's been heartbreaking to see the backlash to public health solutions like wearing masks and practicing social distancing. She said she initially hoped the country would have come together to mitigate the spread of the virus.

"What makes it uncomfortable, and I don't mean any offense, but white people are not forced to think about racism on a day-in, day-out basis," Slaughter-Acey said. "I think the initial stories about the pandemic around race and racism were quite jarring to people and some people probably took it as a step back in part because we don't teach people about race consciousness."

People of color bear brunt of COVID-19

"In order to move forward, Blacks, Indigenous people and people of color can't be the only ones who are conscious about what race means and how it impacts lived experiences."

For now, Johnson-Nixon's family is in recovery mode. Her mother has moved in with them and her father is in a rehabilitation center, gaining strength to walk and put his clothes on by himself and eating solid foods again. He's expected to get out Tuesday, but he'll need an oxygen tank to breathe.

Two weeks ago, he had no memory of his long hospital stay and cannot remember the home phone number they'd had for 40 years. Her children have recovered but Johnson-Nixon and her husband have been hesitant to send them outside to play lacrosse, lest they get COVID-19 again or bring it back to the house.

Meanwhile, Johnson-Nixon said she still has a cough and "feels like I'm always trying to clear my throat." Her doctor told her there's nothing they can do but find ways to keep the discomfort at bay. Johnson-Nixon has kept drinking hot tea and taking Nyquil. But she said she worries Black families are not being reached by public health messaging.

She said it's important to keep talking about COVID and how to stay safe, and she's even thought about standing outside of frequented grocery stores and shops telling anyone who will listen.

"When I see a Black family and the whole family, there might be four kids even or two kids, and no one has a mask on, I almost want to walk up to them and say, 'Do you guys know what this could mean for you if you get this virus?' " Johnson-Nixon said. "Because I see so many folks that don't have masks on, don't have gloves. ... I just feel like they're not taking it seriously."

Marissa Evans · 612-673-4280

THE HARDEST HIT

People of color in Minnesota are dying of COVID-19 at disproportionate rates .

People of color

Ages 30-64

Share of age group's COVID deaths: 63%

Share of age group's Minn. population: 16%

Ages 65-84

Share of age group's COVID deaths: 21%

Share of age group's Minn. population: 5%

Ages 85+

Share of age group's COVID deaths: 9%

People of color bear brunt of COVID-19

Share of age group's Minn. population: 3%

Source: Minn. Dept. of Health

Data as of July 27 Star Tribune

COVID-19 RATES AND RACE

The four ZIP codes in the metro area with the highest COVID-19 rates have populations that are at least 45% people of color. That includes two areas of Minneapolis and parts of Brooklyn Center, Brooklyn Park, New Hope and Crystal.

COVID-19 cases per 1,000 population by ZIP code*

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete map.)

Source: Minnesota Department of Health

Load-Date: August 4, 2020

ARTICLE MCDXXXVI.

BRITISH PAPER PUBLISHES POLICE BODYCAM VIDEO OF FLOYD ARREST

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 3, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 362 wordsByline: The Associated Press

Highlight: Hennepin County District Court is investigating how a British newspaper obtained police body-camera footage showing the arrest and death of George Floyd in Minneapolis. The Daily Mail on Monday published parts of videos from two Minneapolis police officers involved in Floyd's arrest on May 25. A Hennepin County judge last month allowed journalists and members [...]

Body

Hennepin County District Court is investigating how a British newspaper obtained police body-camera footage showing the arrest and death of George Floyd in Minneapolis.

The Daily Mail on Monday published parts of videos from two Minneapolis police officers involved in Floyd's arrest on May 25. A Hennepin County judge last month allowed journalists and members of the public to view the footage by appointment but has not yet ruled on a motion by a coalition of news organizations, including the Associated Press, seeking public access to the videos.

The newspaper's article said the videos were leaked to DailyMail.com. The website shows about 10 minutes from former Officer Thomas Lane's bodycam and about 18 minutes from former Officer J. Kueng's bodycam.

Hennepin County District Court spokesman Spenser Bickett told the Star Tribune an investigation is underway into the leak, but declined further comment.

Minnesota Attorney General Keith Ellison, whose office is leading the prosecution of the four fired Minneapolis police officers charged in Floyd's death, said he was not the source of the leak.

"We will continue to take the strictest precautions to ensure a fair trial," Ellison said in a statement.

Representatives of the Daily Mail did not immediately respond to an AP request for comment Monday.

Floyd, a handcuffed Black man, died after Officer Derek Chauvin, who is white, held his knee against Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes as Floyd pleaded that he could not breathe. Floyd's death touched off protests worldwide.

British paper publishes police bodycam video of Floyd arrest

Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and manslaughter. Lane, Kueng and another former officer, Tou Thao, are charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and manslaughter. All four officers were fired.

Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Graphic

Former Minneapolis police officers, from left, Derek Chauvin, Tou Thao, Thomas Lane and J. Alexander Kueng

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

'If not now, when?': Black women seize political spotlight

ARTICLE MCDXXXVII.

'IF NOT NOW, WHEN?': BLACK WOMEN SEIZE POLITICAL SPOTLIGHT

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 3, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 2844 words

Byline: Claire Galofaro, Kat Stafford

Highlight: MARIETTA, Ga. (AP) - The little girl ran up to her, wide-eyed and giddy.

Body

MARIETTA, Ga. - The little girl ran up to her, wide-eyed and giddy.

"Are you Charisse Davis?" the fourth grader asked.

Davis was stunned. A former kindergarten teacher and librarian, she was more accustomed to shuttling her two sons to basketball practice than being seen as a local celebrity. But now she had been elected the only Black woman on the Cobb County School Board, gaining office in a once conservative suburban community where people who look like her rarely held positions of power.

Something had changed in this place, and something had changed in her.

"I love your hair - your hair looks like my hair," the girl squealed, calling friends over.

It was a moment both innocent and revealing: Not just a child seeing herself in an elected leader, but also a reflection of the rapidly building power of Black women. It's a momentous change that could make history on a national ticket and determine the outcome of the presidential race.

Black women have long been the heart of the Democratic Party - among the party's most reliable and loyal voters - but for decades that allegiance didn't translate to their own political rise. There have been zero Black female governors, just two senators, several dozen congresswomen.

And the people representing them instead have not met their needs: Disparities in education and opportunity resulted in Black women making on average 64 cents for every dollar a white man makes. Long-standing health inequities have caused Black people to die disproportionately from COVID-19.

And countless cases of police brutality have left many Black women terrified every time their children pulled out of the driveway, fearing that they might not make it home alive.

'If not now, when?': Black women seize political spotlight

Now Black women are mobilized and demanding an overdue return on their investment. Over the last several years and across America, Black women ran and won elections in historic numbers, from Congress to county school boards.

This transformation is taking place in once unlikely places, suburban counties in the South. Places like Cobb, a rambling expanse of strip malls and subdivisions just north of Atlanta that doubled in population midway through the last century as white people fled the city. Then, slowly, families of color followed, also seeking bigger yards and better schools.

The year Charisse Davis was born, 1980, Cobb County was 4.5% African American. Now it's more than 27% Black and 13% Hispanic. Its politics caught up with its demographics: In 2016 Hillary Clinton was the first Democratic presidential candidate to eke out a win in Cobb County since Jimmy Carter, a Georgian, in 1976.

President Donald Trump's presidency, which has fueled racial divisions and appealed to white grievance, unleashed for some here an overwhelming urgency. They added their names to down-ticket ballots; they canvassed; they knocked on doors.

When Stacey Abrams, a Black progressive Democrat, ran for governor in 2018, she focused her campaign on women of color. In that election, more than 51,000 Black women in Cobb County cast ballots - 20,000 more than voted in midterm elections four year earlier.

Although Abrams lost narrowly statewide, she won Cobb County handily. Meanwhile, Lucy McBath, a Black mother whose 17-year-old son was killed by a white man who thought his music was too loud, won a congressional seat that includes part of the county, a district once held by conservative firebrand Newt Gingrich.

Charisse Davis looked at the school board members and saw no Black women, so she ran and won. Another Black woman became the chair of the county's young Republicans. Two joined the Superior Court bench. A teenager ran for class president, and she won, too.

"We've been watching from the sidelines and allowing other people to take their turns, and take these positions of power," Davis said. "Now here we are to essentially fix it."

The first county Democratic Party meeting after Trump's election was standing room only.

"It was almost like a support group. We had to be together, we had to grieve and yell," Davis said. "What happened?"

Across the county, there was soul searching over how Clinton lost white, working-class voters, but much less on why Democrats also lost some of the support of this core constituency.

Historically Black women vote in extraordinary numbers, and they don't vote alone: They usher their families, their churches, their neighbors to the polls.

But in 2016, African Americans did not turn out in the numbers the party had come to expect. For the first time in 20 years, their turnout declined in a presidential election. About 70% of eligible Black women voted in 2012 when President Barack Obama, the first Black president, secured a second term. But in 2016 that number slipped to 64%, its pre-Obama level.

'If not now, when?': Black women seize political spotlight

While there were multiple reasons for Clinton's loss, including a large defection of white voters, some saw the drop-off as a sign that Black voters had been taken for granted. Organizations sprang up across the country to motivate Black women to organize, run and win.

"We have never been at this moment," said Aimee Allison, who in 2018 founded the network She the People, which is working to turn out a million women of color across seven battleground states. "For us as a group to recognize our own political power means that we also are demanding to govern."

The power of Black voters was demonstrated when they overwhelmingly backed Joe Biden in the South Carolina primary, giving him a staggering victory that rescued his campaign and set him on a path to the nomination. Black women made up about one-third of the Democratic voters in the state and roughly two-thirds voted for Biden, according to the AP VoteCast survey.

Biden has pledged to pick a woman as his running mate, and at least six of the contenders are Black - including California Rep. Karen Bass, who said, "I think what we're looking for is representation, acknowledgement, inclusion."

Those who advocate for Black women in politics say the stakes have never been higher.

They emphasize that Trump's administration has failed to contain the coronavirus that has killed more than 154,000 Americans, a disproportionate share of them African Americans. He has responded to mass demonstrations over police violence by calling protesters thugs and encouraging law enforcement to beat them back with force.

"Given how directly Black women have been impacted by the incompetence and the malfeasance of the Trump administration, Black women are going to be at the forefront, not only giving rise to voter turnout, but also shaping the conversations that we will be having in this election season," said Abrams, whose name has also been widely circulated as a possible Biden running mate. "It has been a sea change in how vital our voices have been."

Black women can meet this moment in a way no one else can, they say: The world watched the video of George Floyd begging for his mother as he was dying under a police officer's knee.

Charisse Davis' sons, 10 and 14 years old, asked her: Why won't the officer just let him get up?

When she looks at her own sons, she sees her babies. But the older boy is now taller than she is. He likes hoodies. She worries a stranger might see him as a menace, not a boy whose mother still has to remind him to floss his teeth.

"That is the reality of being a Black mother in this country," she said.

She gets messages after school board meetings: "People like you are the problem," one said. "She's a racist," a man wrote. Another described her as "defiant," and said he had his son watch school board meetings "to see how he shouldn't behave."

She hears: You don't belong there.

'If not now, when?': Black women seize political spotlight

"You are dismantling the machine, rocking the boat, and all of those things are the way that they are by design," she said, and added that one of the high schools in the district she represents is named after a Confederate officer.

"That is what the country is built on, that is racism, that is systemic racism, that is white supremacy. It's all these things we don't talk about. But if not now, when?"

When Chinita Allen's 20-year-old son was home from college earlier this year, he and a friend went to work out at their old high school in the affluent, predominantly white part of the county where they live. He had been a football star there. But someone saw two Black men and called the police to report suspicion.

She posted her son's story on Facebook, and it rocketed around this community.

In the not-so-distant past, she might not have spoken up. A soccer mom and educator, she had long avoided talking about race, rocking the boat - until Trump won. Now she's the president of Cobb Democratic Women and leading the charge to try to turn the county totally blue.

"It's all about knowing your worth," she said. "We've always been here, like the Underground Railroad. But it's surfaced now. In a big way. It's a rail train."

Black women powered the civil rights movement, but rarely became its stars. Women like Fannie Lou Hamer, Diane Nash, Myrlie Evers, Ella Baker and Dorothy Height never held political office, but they played a critical role, said Nadia Brown, a Purdue University political science professor.

Only occasionally did their work lead to elective office, as it did when Shirley Chisholm became the first Black woman elected to Congress, in 1968, and a candidate for president in 1972.

But the landscape changed dramatically over the last several cycles. Just two years ago, five Black women were elected to Congress, four of them in majority-white districts, according to the Higher Heights Black Women in American Politics 2019 survey. Congress now has more Black women than ever before: 22 congresswomen and one senator, Kamala Harris, who is just the second to serve in that chamber and a prominent contender to be Biden's running mate.

The change has extended to state and local offices. Two black women are running for governor in Virginia, and if either of them win, she would become the nation's first Black female governor.

In Cobb County, Kellie Hill made history in June as one of two Black women elected to the Superior Court bench. When she first moved to Georgia 30 years ago, fellow lawyers assumed she was her secretary's assistant.

"I said for years, 'Maybe one day they'll be ready for me,'" Hill said. "And as exciting as it is to be the first, it's a little unbelievable that we're having a conversation about being the first in the year 2020."

Although they make up about 7.5% of the electorate, less than 2% of statewide elected executive offices were held by Black women as of November 2019. They account for less than 5% of officeholders elected to statewide executive offices, Congress and state legislatures, according to the Higher Heights survey.

'If not now, when?': Black women seize political spotlight

"Black women have done everything that America told us was going to make us successful and we're still at the bottom in terms of our return," said LaTosha Brown, co-founder of Black Voters Matter.

Black women are posting faster educational gains than any other demographic group in the U.S. - seeing a 76% jump in the number of college degrees earned over the past 20 years, but they aren't reaping the promised economic benefits. On average, Black women made 64 cents for every dollar a white man makes. But that drops to 55 cents for Black women with a professional degree compared to white men with the same level of educational attainment.

"People told us that education is key to being successful," Brown said. "What did Black women do? Black women, out of any constituency group in this country, we enter college more than any other group in this country. Then why does the wealth not reflect that?"

As a result, said Bev Jackson, chair of the Democratic Party's Cobb County African American caucus, Black women have a special resiliency: They have no safety net, so Black women just learn to walk the tightrope better.

Jackson thought about how much she wished her parents had lived to see a Black woman come so close to the Governor's Mansion. Her family's roots in Cobb County go back more than 100 years. Her parents went to segregated schools and sipped out of separate water fountains.

Once, when Jackson was a little girl, she sat down at a lunch counter because she wanted a cherry Coke. The waitress just passed her by, refusing to serve her.

Now Black women around her are daring to run, to win and to demand their leaders fix the broken system that maintains disparities in policing, health care, education, economics.

"You have taken our votes for granted for years. But guess what?" she said. "It's payback time: What are you going to do for us?"

Republicans aren't immune to this awakening.

DeAnna Harris was recently elected chair of the Cobb County Young Republicans, the first Black person in the post. To highlight local Black Republicans - the district attorney, deputy sheriff, a former state representative - she held her inaugural event at the historic African American church she attends. The crowd was diverse, she said, and she was proud of that.

She tries to make a conservative pitch to other Black voters by touting the ideals she believes in: small government, gun rights, religious freedom, anti-abortion. The response is generally something along the lines of, "but I don't like Trump."

"He's never served the role of politician, who gets up there and smiles and says all the right things and winks at the camera, and then when you turn around they stab you in the back," Harris said. Though she doesn't like his tone or his tweets, she supports Trump because of his conservative policies.

But she also believes it's imperative that Republicans broaden their base. The party should look like America, she thinks, and right now it doesn't.

'If not now, when?': Black women seize political spotlight

The Democratic Party of Georgia is confident that enthusiasm is on its side. Fair Fight Action, the organization Abrams founded, calculated that Georgia has more than 750,000 new voters who were not registered in 2018, 49% of them voters of color. And despite a pandemic and hourslong lines in some polling places, more Democrats voted in June's presidential primary than in 2008, when Obama was on the ticket.

That Democratic energy can be particularly seen in these northern Atlanta suburbs. McBath, the incumbent in the 6th Congressional District, ran unopposed and got 26,000 more primary votes than the five Republicans candidates combined. In Cobb County, almost 33,000 African Americans voted in the 2016 primary. In the 2020 primary: more than 52,000. Both of the state's Republican senators are up for election, putting Georgia on the front lines of the fight for control of the Senate.

"The 2020 election cycle is going to be key to changing the course of history in this country," said Nikema Williams, chair of the Democratic Party of Georgia, who was selected to replace Rep. John Lewis, the civil rights leader who died in July, on the November ballot. "We're a battleground in Georgia now, and Black women are leading the way."

In Cobb County, even some who can't vote themselves are determined to thwart Trump's chances of reelection. Gabby Bashizi was one of thousands of teenagers who plotted on the social media site TikTok to reserve tickets to Trump's rally in Tulsa, Oklahoma, in June, then not show up.

Trump said he expected a million fans to attend. There were about 6,000, and lots of empty seats.

"I think he's really dangerous," said Bashizi, 17. Her father is an immigrant from Congo, so it feels personal every time Trump calls immigrants criminals or Black Lives Matter protesters "thugs." "We all feel it. We all go home scared. Is it going to be me next?"

Joe Arpaio defeated in what's likely his last political race Vote-by-mail worries: A 'leaky pipeline' in many states Last-ditch virus aid talks collapse; no help for jobless now Trump bans dealings with Chinese owners of TikTok, WeChat Ohio gov tests negative after positive result at Trump visit

When she was younger she struggled to find self-worth. No Disney princesses looked like her. People touched her hair, like it was a strange curiosity. In the sixth grade, she buzzed it to the width of a bottle cap, and cried and cried.

Then she started seeing Black women ascend.

"Seeing them fight their fight on the national stage has led me to be able to fight my fight on a personal level," she said. She grew her hair out again.

Charisse Davis said that it is these young women who give her hope for a better day: They are idealistic, coming of age in a time when Black women are rising, and they can look around, see people like themselves and believe anything is possible.

She knows an 18-year-old named Audrey McNeal. McNeal ran to be the class president at her mostly white high school, and lost. She thought of a poem she once wrote about a princess envious of her brother because one day he would be king; she wanted to be powerful. She ran again, and won.

"It's about time we represent ourselves," McNeal said. Now she's a delegate to the Democratic National Convention. She's heading to Barnard College to study politics.

'If not now, when?': Black women seize political spotlight

She thinks she'll be secretary of state one day. And then, maybe, president.

Graphic

Chart shows the increase in the number of women elected into Congress since 1969, and of those, the proportion of women who are Black;

According to the 2018 VoteCast survey, more than half of Black women Democrats call themselves moderate or conservative, compared to about 4 in 10 among the rest of the party.

According to the 2018 VoteCast survey, more Black women Democrats say that gun policy and the economy are the most important issues facing the country compared to other Democrats. They are less likely to prioritize the environment.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDXXXVIII.

BLUE LINE EXPANSION PROJECT IN HENNEPIN COUNTY HITS ROADBLOCK

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 3, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 457 wordsByline: Bob ShawHighlight: The 13-mile Blue Line light rail project has hit a roadblock -- it won't be able to run on eight miles of existing rail lines.Body

The 13-mile Blue Line light rail project has hit a roadblock - it won't be able to run on eight miles of existing rail lines.

The setback will mean multi-year delays and increased costs for the $1.5 billion project, which would connect Minneapolis with Golden Valley, Robbinsdale, Crystal and Brooklyn Park.

Officials said Monday that the owner of the eight-mile stretch, BNSF Railway, will not share the track with the light-rail trains, despite four years of negotiation.

"We are frustrated and disappointed with this outcome," said a news release sent jointly by the Metropolitan Council and Hennepin County.

BNSF spokesman Courtney Wallace said that the Blue Line trains would have interfered with BSNF's freight trains.

"For several years, we have told the Met Council we are not interested in passenger service on our route in that corridor," wrote Wallace in an email. "The former proposed line for the Blue Line was not consistent with our passenger principles because it didn't protect the long-term viability of service for our current and future Minnesota freight customers on that route."

The setback means that officials will have to find a new route, replacing eight miles of rail they were hoping to use. County spokesman Kyle Mianulli said there are no estimates yet for the increased costs.

"Our goal is to keep the terminals the same, and to serve the same communities," he said.

He said that the Blue Line has already taken "15 years of planning."

Before the BNSF decision was announced, said Mianulli, the Blue Line was on track to be operational in 2024. Now, he said, it will be later.

Blue Line expansion project in Hennepin County hits roadblock

"We are absolutely optimistic we will get it done," said Mianulli.

Hennepin County Commissioner Mike Opat agreed.

"BNSF's new obstinance cannot deter our work any longer. The time to forge ahead is now," Opat said. "These cities and the region, as a whole, need this LRT project."

Officials said Monday that the cities served by the Blue Line are the most racially-diverse in the metro area, and have the highest rates of households without cars.

"People in these communities continue to be harmed by historic patterns of systemic racism that are compounded by a lack of transit and transportation infrastructure," said the news release. "Now, in the face of multiple crises disproportionately impacting communities of color, transformational investment is more urgent than ever." Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police Attorney for fired Minneapolis officer says Freeman should be removed from George Floyd case

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Dumba takes stand, followed by a knee

ARTICLE MCDXXXIX.

DUMBA TAKES STAND, FOLLOWED BY A KNEE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 3, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 8C

Length: 960 words

Byline: SARAH MCLELLAN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: Wild defenseman steps out as face of fight for racial justice with speech to NHL audience.

Body

EDMONTON, ALBERTA - A microphone clutched in his right hand, Wild defenseman Matt Dumba walked to center ice Saturday afternoon inside Rogers Place in Edmonton and exhaled.

He had just been waiting in the wings with teammates Jonas Brodin and Alex Galchenyuk and, sensing Dumba was nervous, the two tried to divert his attention elsewhere. They had music playing and were listening to him rehearse his speech.

"If you've got the nerves to handle this," Galchenyuk told Dumba, "nothing can stop you tomorrow or in this playoff run."

Once it was time to go, Dumba felt like a fighter entering the ring.

And after he took that deep breath, lifted the microphone and started to share the words he memorized Friday after piecing them together Wednesday and Thursday, Dumba became the face of hockey's fight against racial injustice.

"All the strength that it took to do it, it came from all the people who have supported me along the way," Dumba said Sunday ahead of the Wild's playoff opener later that evening against Vancouver. "My family, got to thank them, and especially the members at the [Hockey Diversity Alliance]. Hearing those guys' stories and everything we talk about has given me the courage to do the things that I've done."

Following his nearly three-minute message to a national TV audience in the United States and Canada, Dumba became the first NHLer to kneel during the U.S. national anthem.

He then stood up for the Canadian national anthem but said Sunday he regrets doing that.

"To be honest, I kind of froze up," Dumba said on a video call from the Wild's hotel. "I know why I knelt. It wasn't a sign of disrespect by any means. It was to shed light on the people who have lived through the injustice and oppression, especially in my home state of Minnesota. That's why I did it."

Dumba takes stand, followed by a knee

"I think my biggest regret is not doing it for the Canadian national anthem, as well, because there is a lot of light that needs to be shed on what is happening in Canada and the oppression First Nations people have felt for hundreds of years. I was disappointed looking back on it because, like I said, I knew the reasons why I knelt. Just in the moment it happened like that."

Dumba, who is Filipino-Canadian, said he will raise a fist for both anthems during the playoffs. He consulted with Iowa Wild forward J.T. Brown, who raised his fist during the anthem three years ago when he played for Tampa Bay.

"If I'm not in the starting lineup, I might be on the bench and if I take a knee on the bench, they might not even be able to see me," Dumba said. "I took a knee yesterday. I regret that I didn't kneel for both anthems. But I will be raising a fist for the rest of the tournament."

Some negative response

The opportunity for Dumba to speak when the NHL resumed its season after a four-plus-months break caused by the coronavirus pandemic came up over the past few weeks, and after discussing it with the league, the Hockey Diversity Alliance and its advisory group, Dumba got the green light only a couple of days before the playoffs officially kicked off in the Western Conference hub city.

His words emphasized racism as a "man-made creation" that is everywhere, and Dumba said the NHL and Hockey Diversity Alliance vow to stand up for justice and fight for what is right. The address also went viral on social media, with some of the response negative.

"Keep it coming," Dumba said. "It kind of sheds a light on them and the people that follow them. Their friends, their family, can see their beliefs and how they view the world and see the negative light that they're trying to shed on this. For all the people who have the courage in their fingertips sitting behind a keyboard, I know half the stuff you wouldn't say to my face if I was standing right in front of you."

"All that stuff is what it is. I've kind of been laughing at it because I know the people that mean the most to me, all those people have reached out to me and commended me for what I've done, and believe in me and support that."

Teammate support

When he showed up to the Wild's practice Saturday, Dumba received hugs from everyone. He's been sharing his efforts with his teammates and has felt love and support in the locker room.

Not only did Dumba help create the Hockey Diversity Alliance earlier this summer in the aftermath of George Floyd's death in Minneapolis police custody, an initiative aimed at eradicating systemic racism and intolerance in hockey, but he also launched a fundraiser to help rebuild Lake Street.

The 26-year-old remains an ambassador for Athletes Committed to Educating Students, and he was recently named the Wild's nominee for the King Clancy Memorial Trophy. This recognition is for the player who best exemplifies leadership qualities on and off the ice and has contributed to his community.

"Everyone has just jumped right on board," Dumba said. "It's been awesome to see."

Positive reinforcement

Dumba takes stand, followed by a knee

Dumba also heard from other players around the league, feedback he said meant the world to him.

Players from the Oilers and Blackhawks formed a circle around Dumba, and Edmonton defenseman Darnell Nurse and Chicago goalie Malcom Subban both placed a hand on Dumba's shoulder while he knelt.

Nurse said, "We're all fighting this same fight," and Oilers superstar Connor McDavid lauded Dumba's speech.

"Lots of things that need to change, and obviously there's been lots of the right steps taken," McDavid said, "and that needs to continue to happen."

Dumba is optimistic the Hockey Diversity Alliance and NHL will keep working together.

That's what he feels it will take to make a change in hockey and the world.

"We've got to partner with each other and find a way that we can reach the youth and grassroots programs," Dumba said, "because I think that's both of our main focus."

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

Walz renews pitch for federal aid in cleanup in aftermath of George Floyd unrest

ARTICLE MCDXL. WALZ RENEWS PITCH FOR FEDERAL AID IN CLEANUP IN AFTERMATH OF GEORGE FLOYD UNREST

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 3, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 234 words

Byline: The Associated Press

Highlight: Minnesota Gov. Tim Walz is again asking for federal help to rebuild from the unrest that followed George Floyd's death. Walz said Monday he has requested a U.S. Small Business Administration disaster declaration that would free up low-interest loans to help property owners rebuild. "We remain committed to working with the impacted communities to restore [...]"

Body

Minnesota Gov. Tim Walz is again asking for federal help to rebuild from the unrest that followed George Floyd's death.

Walz said Monday he has requested a U.S. Small Business Administration disaster declaration that would free up low-interest loans to help property owners rebuild.

"We remain committed to working with the impacted communities to restore their vitality in the wake of this damage," Walz said in a statement.

Last month Walz had asked President Donald Trump to declare a "major disaster" in a request to the Federal Emergency Management Agency because of extensive damage to public infrastructure following the death of Floyd. Floyd died on May 25 after a white Minneapolis police officer pressed his knee against the handcuffed Black man's neck for nearly eight minutes.

The federal government denied that request. The Democratic governor is appealing that decision.

Nearly 1,500 business were damaged in the Minneapolis-St. Paul area, Walz said. Current damage estimates exceed $500 million.

Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Walz renews pitch for federal aid in cleanup in aftermath of George Floyd unrest

End of Document

'Mending' traveling art exhibit features works dealing with anxiety of pandemic, death of George Floyd

ARTICLE MCDXLI. 'MENDING' TRAVELING ART EXHIBIT FEATURES WORKS DEALING WITH ANXIETY OF PANDEMIC, DEATH OF GEORGE FLOYD

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 3, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 675 words

Byline: Bob Shaw

Highlight: Some of this stuff wasn't even supposed to be art. But now it's part of the "Mending" exhibit to appear in Stillwater, Afton and Lake Elmo in coming weeks. "What I love about this show is that it's about brokenness, mending and a call to action," said Heather Rutledge, director of ArtReach St. Croix, sponsor [...]

Body

Some of this stuff wasn't even supposed to be art.

But now it's part of the "Mending" exhibit to appear in Stillwater, Afton and Lake Elmo in coming weeks.

"What I love about this show is that it's about brokenness, mending and a call to action," said Heather Rutledge, director of ArtReach St. Croix, sponsor of the mobile exhibit.

The theme ties together work dealing with the anxiety of the coronavirus pandemic, the death of Floyd and even brokenness from personal tragedies.

Called "Mending," the exhibit is contained in a small trailer. The show opened Thursday in Stillwater, and it will travel to locations in Afton and Lake Elmo through September.

Guest curator William Franklin said "Mending" is not the first coronavirus art exhibit in the world. That would be in Barcelona, Spain - the Covid Art Museum. But it could be a first in the U.S.

To assemble the show, he sought objects from 25 artists which - even unintentionally - relate to psychic damage suffered today. As a result, "Mending" is a show of art, almost-art, and stuff that never should have been art.

At the opening night party in Stillwater, art teacher Lauren Bina shrugged when she was congratulated by visitors. Her entry was created by accident - yet it is the image chosen for the show's brochures.

Bina said she was washing her favorite jadeite bowl, given to her as a wedding present. She dropped it on the kitchen floor, smashing it.

'Mending' traveling art exhibit features works dealing with anxiety of pandemic, death of George Floyd

She impulsively took a photo of the lime-green shards for Instagram. Curator Franklin spotted it, then asked her to join his show. "I said, "This is not meant to be art. It's just a picture," said Bina.

But looking at it in the exhibit now, she said, reminds her of irreconcilable loss.

Michael McColl, a high school art teacher in Fosston, Minn., brought a souvenir from Greece - a plaster and marble work representing the skull of the Greek goddess of health.

McColl explained that he recently divorced his wife of 21 years - painfully. When she moved out, she took the skull, shattered it, and mailed the pieces back to him.

In the trailer, the skull represents the brokenness of something he loved, and the brokenness of someone he loved. "To me it says, 'I am through with you and everything about you,'" said McColl.

Chloe Russell called her work, "You're Okay, You're Okay," which is how she would comfort a crying child.

It started as art that she didn't like - a small painting of dark flowers. "We don't need pretty pictures. Not now," said Russell. "That doesn't do anyone a service."

She put a cartoonish face right on top of it, frowning. Despite the reassurances of the "You're Okay" title, she said. "We still don't know if we are OK."

The exhibit includes photos, an imitation of a security camera, a pair of worn blue jeans.

Some works seem nonsensical, until explained by the artist's comments on the wall.

One is a spatula taped to a broomstick.

It is titled "I Will Protect My Children." It was made, said artist Jennifer Frisbie, by a terrified mother at the height of the riots, as a defensive weapon.

Another work is a set of three cinder blocks - nothing to look at, until artist Xavier Tavera explains they were taken from the foundation of a burned-out building after the riots.

"It is the remains of an uprising," he said.

Tavera pointed out finger-marks on the soot coating the blocks.

"It's like a blackboard, a blank slate," he said. "What is the future we want?"

The art exhibit "Mending" will be open 4 p.m. to 8 p.m. Fridays and 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Saturdays and Sundays at Afton State Park Aug. 21 to Aug. 23; and at Lake Elmo Park Reserve Sept. 4 to Sept. 6. The exact locations have yet to be determined, but look for signs. Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

'Mending' traveling art exhibit features works dealing with anxiety of pandemic, death of George Floyd

End of Document

Navy investigates video of dogs attacking Colin Kaepernick fill-in

ARTICLE MCDXLII.

NAVY INVESTIGATES VIDEO OF DOGS ATTACKING COLIN KAEPERNICK FILL-IN

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 3, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 458 words

Byline: Associated Press

Highlight: FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. (AP) - The U.S. Navy is investigating an incident in which dogs attacked a "Colin Kaepernick stand-in" during a K-9 demonstration during a 2019 fundraiser at the Navy SEAL Museum in Florida.

Body

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. - The U.S. Navy is investigating an incident in which dogs attacked a "Colin Kaepernick stand-in" during a K-9 demonstration during a 2019 fundraiser at the Navy SEAL Museum in Florida.

The Navy said in a statement posted on Twitter that officials became aware of the video on Sunday.

Kaepernick is a former San Francisco 49ers quarterback who began kneeling during the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner" before games to protest social injustice and police brutality. He played his final NFL game in January 2017. He offered support to those protesting the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police officers in May, and the NFL's commissioner has apologized for not listening earlier to players' concerns about social injustice.

The videos show four dogs attacking a man, who is wearing a red Kaepernick football jersey over heavily padded gear as people stand nearby watching. In a second video, the man is laying on the ground when he's approached by men wearing fatigues and holding rifles, saying, "On your belly." The man replies, "Oh, man, I will stand," as he rolls over, followed by laughing from the crowd.

The videos were apparently posted on Instagram last year and resurfaced over the weekend.

"The inherent message of this video is completely inconsistent with the values and ethos of Naval Special Warfare and the U.S. Navy," the statement said.

The Navy said the "initial indications" are that no active duty personnel or equipment were used in the demonstration at the "independent organization's event."

The Navy SEAL Museum is located in Fort Pierce, Florida, which is north of West Palm Beach on the state's Atlantic Coast. According to its website, the National Navy UDT-SEAL Museum is the only museum dedicated solely to preserving the history of the U.S. Navy SEALs and their predecessors.

Navy investigates video of dogs attacking Colin Kaepernick fill-in

The museum's stated main objective is the promotion of public education, with events for both children and adults. Children between the ages of 10 and 15 were recently given firsthand demonstrations on the care and training of working dogs as part of the museum's "Frogman Foundry" program. The museum is not officially connected to the Navy. It was designated as a National Museum by an act of Congress and signed into law in 2008.

This story corrects the style in the references to the Navy SEAL Museum. Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

CLINIC'S CLOSURE HITS HARD AMID PANDEMIC

ARTICLE MCDXLIII.

CLINIC'S CLOSURE HITS HARD AMID PANDEMIC

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 3, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1193 wordsByline: CHRISTOPHER SNOWBECK; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Union workers and a DFL lawmaker are calling on HealthPartners to reopen its clinic in Cedar-Riverside, a Minneapolis neighborhood that's been hard hit by the COVID-19 pandemic.

Riverside Clinic sits in one of Minnesota's most diverse communities, so its closure makes it harder for people of color to get needed care, union workers have argued since the closing was announced in early July.

The permanent shutdown, which followed a temporary closing this spring because of COVID-19, was surprising given the coronavirus spread and also troubling considering the need for health care among immigrants from Somalia and Ethiopia who live nearby, said DFL Rep. Mohamud Noor, who represents the neighborhood.

"To walk away from this clinic is what I see as the structural racism that exists in our society," Noor said during a protest outside the clinic late last week. "Closing this clinic is a shame to HealthPartners - they need to come back to reopen this clinic, to serve this community."

HealthPartners does not plan to reopen Riverside, said Nance McClure, chief operating officer of the Bloomington-based care group. McClure disagreed with Noor's claim that the closure is an example of structural racism, saying it was part of a broader move by the health system to close seven clinics in response to financial pressures and a shift of patients from brick-and-mortar clinics to online health care.

HealthPartners continues to serve diverse patients across the Twin Cities, McClure said, and is committed to closing gaps that leave people of color with worse health outcomes.

There are 25 primary care clinics within 2 ½ miles of Riverside, according to HealthPartners. The health system is now helping patients follow their health care providers to new locations or switch to care at nearby clinics.

"Our commitment to health equity is unwavering and, actually, I would say renewed, as we just look at the current events both with COVID and with the George Floyd killing," McClure said.

CLINIC'S CLOSURE HITS HARD AMID PANDEMIC

On Sunday, Minnesota reported 769 new cases of COVID-19 and eight more deaths, bringing the pandemic's toll in the state to 1,614. As in July, the August numbers are showing a relatively low number of new death reports daily and a relatively high number of new cases on a higher volume of tests.

The data from the Minnesota Department of Health also showed 302 patients hospitalized, with 149 in intensive care. The numbers are higher than what the state reported for most of July but lower than the peak for hospital demand in May.

Decline in demand

COVID-19 prompted hospitals and clinics across the country to delay many surgeries and elective procedures just as stay-at-home orders in many states kept many patients from visiting clinics. As a result, there's been an unprecedented decline in patient demand for health care.

HealthPartners and other health systems responded by temporarily closing many clinics this spring, as more patients talked with doctors through "virtual visits" and online care options.

In April, more than one-third of primary care clinics surveyed said they were laying off or furloughing staff in response to the declines, said Ann Greiner, president and chief executive of the Primary Care Collaborative, a nonprofit group in Washington, D.C. Patients have been returning to clinics this summer, Greiner said, yet a survey supported by her group in late July found anecdotal evidence of clinic closures across the country.

"We're very concerned about the loss of health care delivery infrastructure, particularly in lower-income communities, because they're much more fragile," said Dr. Georges Benjamin, executive director of the American Public Health Association. "There will be people who call up their doctor's office and, tragically, find out their provider isn't there."

The Riverside closing eliminates 70 jobs, including some for members of SEIU Healthcare Minnesota, one of the unions that organized last week's protest, which drew about 50 people.

Holly DeSouza, a nurse and union member, told the crowd gathered that she's regularly getting calls from former Riverside patients with high blood pressure or high blood sugar readings. Their health care providers have moved to clinics in the suburbs, DeSouza said, and the patients don't have the transportation to get there.

As a result, she said, some wind up getting care in the emergency department.

Minneapolis data show that Cedar-Riverside is one of 15 neighborhoods reporting more than 150 cases of COVID-19 - the highest level seen across more than 80 neighborhoods in the city.

Nearly two-thirds of residents living there are people of color, according to the Minnesota Department of Human Services (DHS). Immigrants from Somalia and Ethiopia who live in the area have relied on the Riverside Clinic for years, Noor said. He and his family, in fact, have been patients there.

Closing the clinic won't help the state solve problems with health disparities, he added.

"The loss of access to clinical care in communities with large portions of people of color is especially concerning," DHS said in a statement last month.

CLINIC'S CLOSURE HITS HARD AMID PANDEMIC

Working with nearby clinic

HealthPartners says it agrees with DHS and is working to help patients. The health system says it's talking with People's Center Clinic, located less than a quarter-mile from Riverside, to help patients switch to that location if it's convenient.

For those who want to stay with HealthPartners, the health system has three clinics within 2.5 miles of Riverside, McClure said, and two others within 5 miles. HealthPartners is talking with individual doctors, nurse practitioners and physician assistants about where they want to relocate, McClure said, adding that some have opted to move about 4 miles to the Como Clinic in St. Paul.

About 14,000 patients per year received primary care services at Riverside, she said, and the number has been declining in recent years. Originally, the clinic was a large specialty center for HealthPartners patients at a time when the health system directed patients to nearby Fairview Riverside Hospital for inpatient care.

The clinic no longer has a close relationship with the nearby hospital, McClure said, and many specialty services have been moved to other centers around the region.

"The business context of why Riverside just is a location that doesn't really fit with us, the way that it did back at its inception in the late 1980s, has nothing to do with health equity," McClure said. "Our commitment to health equity remains every bit as strong."

Christopher Snowbeck · 612-673-4744

TRACKING CORONAVIRUS

Minnesota cases, daily change*

55,947 -- Total cases

769 -- Aug. 2 new cases

Minnesota deaths, new daily

1,614 -- Total deaths

8 -- Aug. 2

NOTES: The Minnesota Department of Health did not update numbers on July 4.

*Chart data is a net count of new confirmed cases minus previously announced cases that were removed by MDH on that date.

U.S. cases, new daily

4,628,478 -- Total cases

58,183 -- Aug. 1

U.S. deaths, new daily

CLINIC'S CLOSURE HITS HARD AMID PANDEMIC

154,909 -- Total deaths

1,054 -- Aug. 1

(See the page PDF or microfilm for the complete charts.)

Note: U.S. data lags a day behind Minnesota

Sources: New York Times, Minnesota Dept. of Health

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDXLIV.

ILHAN OMAR CHALLENGER TARGETS HER CELEBRITY

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 3, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1306 wordsByline: Steve Karnowski, Mohamed IbrahimHighlight: Antone Melton-Meaux carried a pointed message to the voters he courted at the city's largest Somali market: I want to focus on the work, not being famous.Body

As Democrat Antone Melton-Meaux meandered through racks of headscarves and clouds of spice and pepper, he carried a pointed message to the voters he courted at the city's largest Somali market: I want to focus on the work, not being famous.

There's no missing the target of the dig: Rep. Ilhan Omar. Omar, a liberal Democrat, made history two years ago as the first Somali-American elected to Congress and went on to make countless headlines for making controversial statements on Israel, for tangling with President Donald Trump and for a personal life that became tabloid fodder.

All the attention has helped make Omar a progressive star, but it's also drawn criticism and a surprisingly strong primary challenger in Melton-Meaux. The Black attorney and mediator is raising millions in anti-Omar dollars and shaking up what was expected to be an easy race.

The heated primary is playing out in a city already wrestling with racial divisions and political identity. Melton-Meaux has drawn support from some traditional Democrats uncomfortable with Omar's style - highlighting a generation gap that has dogged Democrats this year. He's raised big money from pro-Israel groups with strong support in the city's first-ring suburbs. And his bid has prompted a fight for votes in the Black and Somali-American communities, each roiled by this summer's uprising over George Floyd's death.

"She has been ineffective in Washington because she is divisive, and she's focused on her celebrity," Melton-Meaux said.

Omar dismisses the criticism, along with Melton-Meaux, who she said is simply the beneficiary of deep-pocketed opponents who want to take her down.

"This campaign really isn't about whether Ilhan is doing the work," she said. "It's about how effective we've actually been and how people don't want that effectiveness to continue."

Ilhan Omar challenger targets her celebrity

Omar, 37, ordinarily would be expected to crush any opponent in the Aug. 11 primary in the heavily Democratic Minneapolis-area district. The former refugee from Somalia gained fame as one of the first two Muslim women elected to Congress and as a charter member of "The Squad" of four progressive freshmen women of color.

But she quickly got into trouble with comments about Jews, money and Israel that even fellow Democrats denounced as anti-Semitic and led to apologies. Omar also became a favorite Twitter foil for Trump, who last year basked when supporters at a political rally chanted of Omar, "Send her back!"

She came under renewed scrutiny when she split up with her husband, then married her Washington political consultant, Tim Mynett, months after denying that they were having an affair. Conservatives raised ethical questions and filed a federal complaint over Omar's campaign paying Mynett's firm more than $1 million for advertising, fundraising and other services, but the law doesn't prohibit such an arrangement.

Melton-Meaux's fundraising haul has bankrolled a $1.4 million TV ad buy and an extensive mail campaign that attacks Omar on ethics. He's also pledged to focus on the district's needs and on not missing votes, as Omar did 40 times last year. (She says many were due to the death of a family member and that most were procedural.) He said that when she does vote, it isn't always in the district's interests, citing her vote against the U.S.-Mexico-Canada trade deal.

Melton-Meaux seemed to find some support for his message during a July visit to what should be prime Omar turf - a mall filled with shops catering to the city's large Somali American community.

Khadra Hassan told Melton-Meaux that her tiny clothing store in the Karmel Mall has been devastated by the coronavirus pandemic, and complained that the government doesn't have a plan for helping small businesses like hers survive.

"The situation is the same all around you, with all of us," she told him. A campaign aide promised to get back with Hassan on how she could seek help. Later, Hassan told a reporter that Melton-Meaux might get her support.

"We are looking for the person who's going to most help us and come back to the community and focus on the things that we need on the ground," she said through an interpreter. "And then we will make our decision. But right now we need an active person who's willing to work for what's happening right here in the district."

Trump's end run around Congress raises questions Trump orders more unemployment pay, a payroll tax deferral Joe Arpaio defeated in what's likely his last political race Vote-by-mail worries: A 'leaky pipeline' in many states Last-ditch virus aid talks collapse; no help for jobless now Melton-Meaux raised over $3.7 million by June 30, most of it from big contributors, including over $530,000 from two political action committees that back Israel, NORPAC and Pro-Israel America.

Jeff Mendelsohn, executive director of Pro-Israel America, recalled Omar's allegation that U.S. politicians supported Israel because it was "all about the Benjamins," and her suggestion that American Jews have divided loyalties.

The local Jewish community appears split, with many younger politically progressive Jews supporting Omar while others have endorsed Melton-Meaux.

State Sen. Ron Latz, a Democrat who is Jewish and has sometimes been critical of Omar, backs Melton-Meaux in part for what he sees as a more balanced perspective on Middle East issues than the pro-Palestinian Omar.

"She seems to have found a way to restrain herself for some number of months now," he said. "But I think that restraint has been externally imposed. We clearly know her personal inclinations because she kept saying things that were offensive to the Jewish people until the reaction got so hot that she felt she had to quiet herself down."

Omar has some critics within the African American community, including civil rights attorney Nekima Levy Armstrong, who said Omar hasn't paid enough attention to the heavily Black neighborhoods of north Minneapolis.

"She hasn't built strong relationships with the people who live in north Minneapolis, and she hasn't spent the time here to learn about the issues that impact us, or working to craft solutions to the challenges that we face," she said.

Omar raised nearly $3.9 million through June 30, mostly from far more small donors than Melton-Meaux, and still enjoys the support of most Democratic heavyweights. Omar pointed out the party considers her district "the engine of voter turnout for our state" and is counting on her network in November to quash Trump's dream of carrying Minnesota.

Charlie Rounds, 64, an LGBTQ advocate in Minneapolis, said he hadn't decided between Omar and Melton-Meaux. But he said the argument that Omar cares more about fame than service doesn't wash with him. He saw the outside money against her as Islamophobia.

"I don't think that was Rep. Omar's choice, I don't think she set out to be a star," he said. "It's because she's a Muslim woman and there's a lot of people that just are going to do anything to defeat her because she's Muslim - we have to look at that reality."

Nour Ali, 37, a Somali American who works in the Minneapolis Public Schools system, said he's committed to Omar.

"She does care about the real issues that's going on, she always speaks her mind and she's always available," he said. "She was at the protests talking about police brutality, that's something that shows she is relating to the people and she cares about the cause and connected to the people." Minnesota's primary is Tuesday. Here are key east metro races to watch. 300,000 Minnesotans should mail their primary ballots 'ASAP.' Or vote in person. State Patrol cancels police academy class 'due to lack of funding' Burnsville police: Nothing found following bomb threat at U.S. Rep. Angie Craig's office. Minnesota will close 2 prisons to prepare for budget shortfall. Other agencies face holes, too.

Graphic

Rep. Ilhan Omar, D-Minn., participates in a panel during a Jan. 31, 2020, campaign event for Bernie Sanders in Clive, Iowa. (AP Photo/Marcio Jose Sanchez, File)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDXLV.

SUBURBS ADVANCE POLICING MODELS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 3, 2020 Monday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1092 wordsByline: MARA KLECKER; KIM HYATT; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Brooklyn Center, Brooklyn Park began reform in 2005.Body

As Twin Cities suburbs look for ways to foster trust between law enforcement officers and communities of color in the wake of George Floyd's death, some are looking to a long-standing model that began years ago in the north metro.

Formed with new immigrants in mind, the Joint Community Police Partnership began in 2005 in Brooklyn Center and Brooklyn Park, two of the most diverse cities in the state. Since then the partnership has gained national recognition and grown into a collaboration with Bloomington, Crystal, Hopkins, Richfield and St. Louis Park, as well as Hennepin County.

The goal remains the same: develop communication and understanding between officers and diverse residents. Each police department has an embedded community liaison, and police officials meet monthly with a Multicultural Advisory Committee (MAC) made up of residents.

The committees of volunteers have advised police on body camera policies and helped them understand consulate ID cards carried by immigrants. They've helped inform hiring practices and crafted more inclusive interview questions. And they've organized community events to bring officers into diverse spaces.

The members have also advised on ways to educate immigrants about local law enforcement and helped resolve cultural misunderstandings as simple as staying in the vehicle when pulled over by an officer - something that many Liberian immigrants, for example, had thought was disrespectful.

As the model moves into more suburban cities, against the backdrop of calls for police reform, leaders and committee members hope to see more engagement from residents, particularly African Americans.

"This work has to involve both sides," said Elba Guille Garza, a Latina real estate agent who has served on Bloomington's MAC for three years. "We need to know how the police department works and they need to understand how our community works."

Suburbs advance policing models

Woodbury last year launched a similar advisory committee, and Roseville formed one this summer. Maplewood recently reached out to the partnership's leaders for guidance about its new advisory committee.

"The best compliment an organization can be given is if others are replicating," said Monique Drier, who worked as the community liaison in Brooklyn Center and now supervises the partnership program.

Many issues addressed by the partnership's community liaisons fall somewhere between police work and social work, said Hennepin County Commissioner Mike Opat, who Drier credits for championing the partnership since its start.

"This has created different venues for interactions between the police and various communities that aren't just always on the street," Opat said.

Brooklyn Center Police Cmdr. Rick Gabler said those relationships and the work of the committees have become especially critical amid the calls for police reform. The MAC was one of the first calls he made after an officer-involved shooting in Brooklyn Center on Labor Day weekend last year. He said officers were sharing information through MAC, and that created a "calming period and a little bit of patience" as facts came out.

"It's one of those things where, if we didn't have it, we'd really be struggling to reach out and build trust in our diverse communities," Gabler said, calling it "one of our best vehicles" for building relationships.

Crystal Police Chief Stephanie Revering said her department joined the partnership in 2017, the latest to do so. But Crystal officials already had leaned on the partnership for help when 10-year-old Barway Collins, a Liberian immigrant, was murdered by his father in 2015.

"We found out very quickly that we didn't have a collaborative partnership with our population of Liberian immigrants," Revering said.

A liaison with the Joint Community Police Partnership, who had previously traveled to Liberia, helped during the homicide investigation.

Since Floyd's death on May 25 in police custody and the subsequent unrest, Crystal's MAC has met to discuss the city's police policies and training, particularly its use-of-force tactics.

"This was really the first time in our history ... where I felt like we finally had the trust from our MAC members," Revering said. "They could really be honest and just have these difficult conversations regarding race, saying what it is that we as police officers need to know."

Revering said the Crystal MAC is continuing to talk about police reform. The department is looking to make its use-of-force data more transparent to residents, as well as making the department's policy manual easier to find on the city's website.

Brooklyn Park Deputy Police Chief Mark Bruley said his city's MAC group "really take[s] the temperature of the community" while allowing residents to see behind the curtain of police work.

Brooklyn Park's MAC, in partnership with the city's Human Rights Commission, has recently started looking at police reform recommendations. Proposals include the creation of a civilian oversight board and hiring nonwhite officers who live in the city.

Suburbs advance policing models

While Brooklyn Park's work with the joint police partnership has built trust between law enforcement and immigrants, Bruley said, the city hasn't had much success getting African Americans to participate in the advisory committee.

"Our diversity is very diverse," Bruley said of the city, where 57% of residents are people of color and 28% are Black or African American. "Yet we don't have them consistently at the table part of MAC, and that's clearly what's broken."

Nigerian, Liberian and Hispanic communities are all represented on the city's MAC, he said, but not African Americans.

"If you look at where we're at today, it's really the African Americans that have the most mistrust with the police," he said.

Ahmed Issahak represents the Oromo community on the Brooklyn Park MAC group. He joined in late 2017 and has been working to recruit more African Americans. He sees the committee as a way to help identify ways to reform policing.

"There's always room for improvement," Issahak said. "[The committee] is so important because if we don't have this, then it would be like a black hole: no communication, no flow of information."

Garza is one of two Latinos on the Bloomington MAC. While the MAC model is a good one, she said, it's dependent on involvement and hinges on trust and awareness that builds over time.

"We are that community connection, the bridge of trust," Garza said. "But improving that trust is difficult. I now see how the police do want to listen and learn, but they need that input."

Mara Klecker · 612-673-4440

Kim Hyatt · 612-673-4751

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

Why are these shoe shiners polishing St. Paul officers' boots? To give back, find common ground

ARTICLE MCDXLVI.

WHY ARE THESE SHOE SHINERS POLISHING ST. PAUL OFFICERS' BOOTS? TO GIVE BACK, FIND COMMON GROUND

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 3, 2020 Monday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 684 words

Byline: Mara H. Gottfried

Highlight: "It's gratitude for their service and an attempt to improve our relations."

Body

As Glen Brown's brush and polish swish-swashed over St. Paul police officer's boots on Monday, the professional shoe shiner chatted with each of them.

They talked about their children - they wondered what would happen with school amid the coronavirus pandemic, and Brown shared stories about his own 14-year-old daughter.

They talked about sports and who they spotted in town when Minneapolis hosted the Super Bowl in 2018.

And, underlying the 12 minutes Brown spent with each, were the bigger messages he wanted to get across - sometimes discussed and sometimes unsaid about their shared humanity.

During this time of reckoning over policing and race, in the wake of George Floyd's death in Minneapolis police custody, Brown has gone twice to the St. Paul police department to give complimentary shoe shines to officers. It was the idea of Danny Givens, Sr., who owns DG Express Professional Shoe Shine, and he and Brown - an independent shoe shiner operator for the business - plan to keep it up.

Givens and Brown said they want to give back to law enforcement and also be a bridge to their Black community.

"It's a gesture of gratitude for their service and an attempt to improve our community relations," said Brown, 48. "I can't watch something on the news and say, 'I hate those people.' And they can't see me walking down the street and say, 'Oh that's my probable cause because of the way he looks.' I'm hoping the conversations we have here impact the relationship between St. Paul police and the African-American community."

Brown, who works at the Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport with Givens, said he's found there's no better place to have a good conversation than during shoe shining. If travelers or anyone in his chair isn't relaxed, he can usually get them laughing with a joke.

Why are these shoe shiners polishing St. Paul officers' boots? To give back, find common ground

Officers complimented Brown for his hard work on Monday and thanked him. They also left him tips in a box, which he and Givens hadn't wanted to begin with, but two deputy police chiefs insisted.

As Brown polished Jeremy Ellison's boots, the senior police commander told him, "We appreciate you coming out."

"Relationships and conversations are more important than people let on," Brown said.

"I couldn't agree more," Ellison replied.

"People are judging each other on stuff on the outside without ever talking to someone," Brown continued.

"We see that time and time again where there's those preconceived notions about somebody and then getting to know each other, even if it's just a little bit, it makes a real difference," Ellison said.

A common question for Brown has been: How's business with so many less travelers during the pandemic?

DG Express Professional Shoe Shine closed in March and reopened last month.

"It's kind of like a crawl, but at least there's movement," Brown said. "Slow business is better than no business. It sure beats sitting at home with the remote control."

Givens' business, which was previously in downtown St. Paul and now has locations at MSP Terminal 1 in the main mall and Concourse C, also does residential and commercial pick-up with a minimum of two shoes through their website at dgexpressshoeshine.com.

Brown and Givens both grew up in St. Paul, and learned the shoe shining business from family members. Givens has thought about the imagery of African-American men shining the shoes of mostly white men, and he says that's a narrative he also wants to change. Both say they love their work and Brown describes it as an art - perfecting shoe care while making connections with people.

"The men and women of law enforcement, first and foremost, they are human beings," Givens said. "First and foremost, as an African-American male, as a shoe shine owner/operator, I'm a human being."

Shooting near Mears Park injures 1 Sunday night Bear spotted near University of St. Thomas in St. Paul Minnesota cities, counties scramble to keep businesses afloat by dishing out CARES Act grants New Mitchell Hamline School of Law Dean Anthony Niedwiecki on gay rights, COVID-19 and the 'Trump bump' U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities

Graphic

Glen Brown, a professional shoe shiner, at the St. Paul police department on Aug. 3, 2020. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

Why are these shoe shiners polishing St. Paul officers' boots? To give back, find common ground

Glen Brown gives back to St. Paul police by shining their shoes for free at police headquarters in St. Paul on Monday, August 3 , 2020. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

Glen Brown buffs Senior Cmdr. Jeremy Ellison's shoes to a deep shine at police headquarters in St. Paul on Monday, August 3 , 2020. (Scott Takushi / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Bodycam videos published

ARTICLE MCDXLVII.

BODYCAM VIDEOS PUBLISHED

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 4, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 613 wordsByline: CHAO XIONG; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Daily Mail claims George Floyd footage was leaked to the media company.Body

A British media company on Monday published segments of two leaked body-worn camera videos showing the arrest and death of George Floyd in May at the hands of Minneapolis police.

The Daily Mail published an article with the videos on its website at 10:53 a.m. Central time. It showed about 10 minutes of video from former officer Thomas Lane's bodycam and about 18 minutes from former officer J. Alexander Kueng's bodycam.

The two former officers' bodycam videos were made available for public viewing inside the Hennepin County courthouse in mid-July, but were prohibited from being recorded or publicly distributed.

It's unclear how the Daily Mail got the videos. The article said they were "leaked" to the company.

Hennepin County District Court spokesman Spenser Bickett confirmed that the court was aware of the leak, and said an investigation was underway. "The court will provide no further comment on this matter at this time," Bickett said in an e-mail.

Attorney General Keith Ellison, who is leading the prosecution of the four former Minneapolis police officers charged in Floyd's death, issued a statement that he was not the source of the leak.

"We will continue to take the strictest precautions to ensure a fair trial," Ellison said.

Hennepin County District Judge Peter Cahill is presiding over the former officers' cases. Cahill had prohibited the videos from being distributed outside of the courthouse. He also prohibited the media and public from recording them when they were made available.

The videos published by the Daily Mail appeared to have been recorded on a device while they were played on a laptop in a courthouse conference room.

The courts had provided a large room and several laptops to view the videos, and required attendees to stow away their own personal laptops and cellphones during the hourlong viewing sessions. Sheriff's deputies and court staff were stationed throughout the room as several members of the media and public viewed the videos.

Bodycam videos published

The two videos, which totaled about 65 minutes, were viewable by the media and public by appointment only. Sixty-six slots were made available.

Attorney Earl Gray had filed the videos in court in early July as evidence supporting his motion to dismiss the charges against Lane, his client. Court filings make evidence, including bodycam footage, public data, according to state law.

A coalition of local and national media companies, including the Star Tribune, filed a motion in July seeking immediate release of the videos. Cahill took the issue under advisement and has not issued a decision on the matter.

The videos, which were viewed by Star Tribune reporters in July, showed that Floyd was given no explanation for why he was being questioned before Lane pointed a gun and swore at him, touched him multiple times and forced him out of his vehicle into the street.

Kueng and Lane had responded to Cup Foods on May 25 on a report that Floyd had allegedly used a counterfeit $20 bill. They arrested Floyd. Their former colleagues, Derek Chauvin and Tou Thao, arrived later to help them.

Kueng, Lane and Thao are charged with aiding and abetting murder and manslaughter in Floyd's death. Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and second-degree manslaughter in the case. Prosecutors have said Chauvin knelt on Floyd's neck for nearly 8 minutes, but Kueng's video showed that it was about 9 minutes and 30 seconds.

The bodycam videos and a video recorded by a bystander showed that Floyd repeatedly told the officers he couldn't breathe, and that several bystanders pleaded with them to stop, but were ignored.

Cahill set the matter for trial next March.

Chao Xiong · 612-270-4708

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

ARTICLE MCDXLVIII.

MINNEAPOLIS MAYOR: CITY SEEKS RIGHT MENTORS FOR NEW OFFICERS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 4, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 741 wordsByline: Mohamed Ibrahim, Amy ForlitiHighlight: Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey said the city is working to pair new police officers with "the right individuals" for field training following George Floyd's death, in which a senior officer rejected a younger colleague's question about how Floyd was being restrained.Body

MINNEAPOLIS - Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey said the city is working to pair new police officers with "the right individuals" for field training following George Floyd's death, in which a senior officer rejected a younger colleague's question about how Floyd was being restrained.

In an interview with The Associated Press as part of its AP Newsmakers series, Frey said the city wants to make sure that the training new officers get isn't undermined once they go into the field.

"We need to make sure that those who are in a supervisory role, those that are riding with new officers with new cadets, are the right individuals to be role models," Frey said. "You learn from who your role models are, and that can be a good thing and that can also be a bad thing."

Floyd, a 47-year-old Black man who was in handcuffs, died May 25 after Officer Derek Chauvin pressed his knee against Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes as Floyd pleaded for air. Chauvin, who is white, is charged with second-degree murder. Three other officers who were at the scene - Thomas Lane, Tou Thao and J. Kueng - are charged with aiding and abetting.

Attorneys for Lane and Kueng have portrayed the two officers as rookies who deferred to the far more senior Chauvin. Body camera video shows as Floyd repeatedly said he couldn't breathe, Lane asked Chauvin whether the officers should turn Floyd from his stomach to his side. Chauvin responded that they would keep Floyd as he was.

The police department has been under significant pressure to change its practices since Floyd's death, with a majority of City Council members in favor of eliminating the department entirely and replacing it with a new public safety unit. The city's charter commission is expected to vote Wednesday on whether to advance a proposal that could ultimately send the idea to voters in November.

Frey told the AP that he remains opposed to the idea.

Minneapolis mayor: City seeks right mentors for new officers

"We should not go down the route of simply abolishing the police department," Frey said. "What we need to see within this department, and within many departments throughout the country, is a full-on culture shift."

The mayor and Chief Medaria Arradondo have moved ahead with their own changes since Floyd's death, including requiring officers to document attempts to de-escalate situations whether or not force is used. They also have expanded requirements for reporting use-of-force incidents, ordering officers to provide more detail.

Arradondo also pulled the department out of negotiations for a union contract, saying he wanted a review aimed at making major changes to things such as the grievance and arbitration process that makes it hard to get rid of problem officers.

North St. Paul man killed in crash after fleeing Dakota County sheriff's deputy Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Cleric assaulted outside Bloomington mosque; police searching for suspects U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities Minneapolis man sentenced to 33 years in prison for sex-trafficking young women and girls out of massage parlor

Some local residents have voiced concerns about the prospect of dismantling the police department. There were 224% more incidents involving gunfire in June than in June 2019 and 166% more in July than in the previous one, according to a Minneapolis Star Tribune analysis of police data. The police department has also lost scores of officers to firings, resignations and medical leave in the two months that followed Floyd's death and the ensuing protests, some of which turned violent.

Asked about the perception that officers might be deliberately slowing their response, Frey said he's seen no evidence of that but acknowledged that the "significant attrition" of officers had slowed response times.

"We have officers in our department who wear the badge that they do, wear the uniform that they do, because they want to make the city a better place," Frey said.

Asked whether he supports reparations to Black Americans, Frey, who is white, said he does, noting that for generations, Black people have struggled to build wealth for various reasons, including that they've had unequal access to higher education and home mortgages.

"There are clear monetary financial impacts to the society that we are living in," Frey said. "I feel that that should be recognized at some point. ... It's something that I am very open to and I feel it's the right thing to do."

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCDXLIX.

ACTIVISTS SLAM CUP FOODS' OPENING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 4, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 843 wordsByline: MIGUEL OTAROLA; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Convenience store says it's time to stop blaming it in the death of George Floyd.Body

Cup Foods, the south Minneapolis convenience store whose 911 call led to the fatal encounter between George Floyd and Minneapolis police, reopened Monday, instantly challenging those who want the corner to remain a memorial to victims of police violence.

Dozens of protesters gathered in front of the store at the intersection of 38th and Chicago on Monday afternoon demanding it remain closed. The standoff was tense, with what sounded like gunfire nearby as opponents confronted people who showed up in defense of the store.

Jamar Nelson, a spokesman for the family that owns Cup Foods, said "it was absolutely time to open up" and that the store would stay open regardless of protests.

"We're not trying to hurt anyone, but if not now, when?" he asked. "How long [will] the store continue to be blamed for the death of George Floyd?"

On the night of May 25, a Cup Foods employee called the police to report that a man had used a counterfeit $20 bill at the store, according to charging documents and the 911 call transcript. Floyd was handcuffed and pinned to the ground by officers in front of the store less than 30 minutes later.

The store shut down as 38th and Chicago was barricaded and turned into a makeshift memorial and vigil site for Floyd. Cup Foods tried to reopen three weeks later but closed after a few days.

On Monday, neighbors said the owners attempted reopening a few times since then. Nelson disputed that claim, but admitted that "there should've been a longer mourning period before we opened up the first time."

A security guard stood by the entrance of the store Monday morning, a small neon sign on the window declaring it "OPEN." Employees stood behind the counters, the shelves fully stocked with drinks and snacks.

Activists slam Cup Foods' opening

Co-owner Mahmoud Abumayyaleh, wearing a T-shirt depicting a colorful memorial in tribute to Floyd on the store's southern wall, was opening a pack of disposable face masks. He declined to be interviewed.

For many at the intersection, it was as if a wound had been reopened. They described the store, which has been there for more than 30 years, as holding back the South Side and being a magnet for illicit activity on the corner.

After hearing the store was reopening, Carmen Means, executive director of the Central Area Neighborhood Development Organization (CANDO), was at the intersection early Monday morning denouncing the decision.

"They have a laundry list of just being harmful to this community," Means said. "It's time that we hold them accountable, and accountability looks like closing that door. Not furthering harm looks like closing that door."

Nelson said the store reopened because it served a need in the community, offering affordable food and other items. There are other grocery stores in the surrounding area, including the Seward Community Co-op just blocks away on 38th Street.

He added that the store has worked with neighbors since Floyd was killed, including by participating in food drives. Employees will undergo anti-bias training in coming weeks, he said, and the store would commission a mural and community garden.

But neighbors deserve better, Means said.

"We have to use the brilliance of this moment to create a solution," she said. "Seward Co-op is not the answer, and Cup Foods is not the answer."

Marcia Howard, a high-school teacher who lives just steps from 38th and Chicago, said Cup Foods caters to people in a pinch and a "desperate" regular clientele. Ultimately, she said, the market would decide whether the store survives at the intersection.

"Whoever shows up, whether to walk through those doors or to stand in front of them, are the ones who determine the fate of this as a commercial venture," she said.

On Monday afternoon, protesters held their fists in the air chanting, "Keep Cup Closed!" as Cup Foods employees and clientele looked out the store window.

Some in the crowd rolled trash bins in front of the store to create a blockade. Several young people then walked over and attempted to move the bins, leading to loud arguments.

What sounded like shots rang out from somewhere close by. A few minutes later, it happened again.

Hennepin County Commissioner Angela Conley spoke with Abumayyaleh outside the store, explaining to him that neighbors have yet to see justice in the killing of Floyd.

"It's something that really needs to be vetted by community," she said. "It's not a decision that can be taken lightly, especially when people are still grieving."

Activists slam Cup Foods' opening

Meanwhile, the Minneapolis Planning Commission met virtually to name Chicago Avenue between 37th and 39th streets as "George Perry Floyd Jr Place." If the City Council approves the name, the city would add a commemorative plaque on the intersection where he was killed.

"I think this is one step in a future of really trying to make amends for some of the challenges that our community has faced in the past," City Council Member Andrea Jenkins, who represents part of the community, said at the meeting.

The City Council will take a final vote on the commemorative name change in September.

Miguel Otárola · 612-673-4753

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDL. POLICE FACE NEW KETAMINE CRITICISM

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 4, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1075 wordsByline: ANDY MANNIX; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Partner says giving man sedative put him in ICU.Body

For the second time in two years, Hennepin Healthcare and the Minneapolis Police Department are facing public backlash for the use of ketamine, this time over allegations that paramedics sent a man to intensive care for two days after needlessly injecting him with the powerful sedative.

The patient, Max Johnson, suffered a diabetic seizure on July 26, according to a Facebook post from his girlfriend, Abby Wulfing. Minneapolis police and Hennepin Healthcare paramedics responded to Wulfing's 911 call and repeatedly pressed her on Johnson's drug use, unconvinced of Wulfing's explanation that low-blood sugar caused the seizure, according to the post. Experts and advocates called Johnson's ordeal "stunning" and evidence of a systemic problem despite calls for reform.

"This happened because Max is a 6'5" Black man," wrote Wulfing, a therapist in Prior Lake. "My whiteness was not enough to save him from the Hennepin Healthcare EMS and MPD's egregious racism and life-threatening decisions."

Over the weekend, Rep. Mohamud Noor, DFL-Minneapolis, called for an investigation into the "disturbing" encounter.

"This strong sedative was administered even after repeated pleas by the man's partner that he just needed sugar to stabilize his condition," said Noor. "It is unacceptable that this man, who was experiencing a medical emergency, was given this dangerous drug that can result in life-threatening conditions - as it did in this case. An investigation must be opened immediately to determine why this drug was used instead of less dangerous stabilizing methods."

Minneapolis police are investigating the incident internally, said spokesman John Elder.

"We have seen the social media discussion and Rep. Noor's concerns about the care a patient received in our system," Hennepin Healthcare spokeswoman Christine Hill said in a statement. "We do not discuss individual patient care publicly, but when a patient or family member has concerns we answer their questions about the medical decisions that were made."

Johnson declined to comment beyond Wulfing's post, which has been shared more than 10,000 times and reposted to other social media platforms.

The allegations come as Minneapolis police face widespread criticism of racial profiling following the death of George Floyd in police custody. They also come in the aftermath of a 2018 civil rights investigation that found paramedics sedated people in Minneapolis, sometimes at the urging of police, against the pleas of patients and in some cases without clearly explaining why.

"It's absolutely stunning to see this repeated again," said Carl Elliott, a bioethicist at the University of Minnesota. "Did Hennepin learn nothing at all from the events of 2018? ... Why would anyone believe what Hennepin executives say this time around?"

According to Wulfing's post:

She woke up to find Johnson seizing and bleeding from the mouth. "I thought that this would be the worst moment of my life - little did I know that what ensued after I called 911 would be much more violent and traumatic."

Wulfing told the operator and paramedics upon arrival that Johnson had Type-1 diabetes. Seven minutes later, EMS professionals injected Johnson with Glucagon, an emergency treatment for low blood sugar. Soon her small apartment was filled with paramedics, firefighters and at least five police officers, which she described collectively as "uniforms."

"Uniforms that repeatedly asked me what drugs Max was on. Uniforms that said 'I don't want to search your apartment, I just need to know what he's on.' Uniforms that kept me in the corner of the apartment to ask me question after question."

Paramedics sedated Johnson with Versed and ketamine, both sedatives used for severe agitation. "Because of the ketamine, Max was on a ventilator in the ICU for a tortuous 2 days where we could not visit him, talk to him, or advocate for him. It was hell."

Wulfing likened the incident to the case of Elijah McClain, a 23-year-old Black man in Colorado who went into cardiac arrest and died after being sedated with ketamine. Wulfing said paramedics injected Johnson with 500 milligrams, the same dose as in the McClain case. "ATTEMPTED MURDER," she wrote.

Wulfing said the medical director of the Department of Emergency Medicine at Hennepin Healthcare called her about the incident "and AGREED that this would not have happened if Max was White."

In 2018, the Star Tribune obtained an unreleased draft report from Minneapolis civil rights investigators that detailed a pattern of police urging paramedics to sedate people when responding to emergency calls. The Star Tribune later reported that some of the patients sedated were enrolled in a drug trial without prior consent. In June 2019, an FDA inspection found the hospital system continued to conduct the sedative research for months after saying they'd suspended the study.

Minneapolis elected officials vowed to investigate the police role in these encounters, and Mayor Jacob Frey announced he'd secured a contract with Sally Yates, former Acting U.S. attorney general, to complete an exhaustive review. But the City Council canceled the investigation in its early stages, calling the contract too expensive. In her unfinished report, Yates lamented that "important questions will remain unanswered" regarding the role Minneapolis police officers play in recommending sedatives like ketamine.

Dr. Michael Carome, a medical expert for the consumer advocacy organization Public Citizen, said the description of Johnson's case speaks to a systemic problem.

"We have an emergency medicine system that too often seems to involve significant police response," said Carome. "And there's this reflexive use of powerful sedatives." If a patient is suffering from low-blood sugar, "the last thing that person needs is treatment with potent sedatives."

In 2018, Public Citizen called for an investigation into whether Hennepin Healthcare's ketamine research violated federal guidelines. A spokesman for the FDA declined to answer questions about the investigation.

Hill, of Hennepin Healthcare, said it's "critical that we listen to the perspectives of people of color" on concerns over medical treatment.

"We see and acknowledge the data that shows huge disparities in health outcomes in Minnesota based on race," Hill said. "We own this reality as a health system and are committed to working to ensure that health systems do not contribute to these harms."

Andy Mannix · 612-673-4036

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

RACIAL EQUITY

ARTICLE MCDLI. RACIAL EQUITY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 4, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 7ALength: 796 wordsByline: STEVEN BELTON, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Take small steps, but take them now // There are many ways to combat systemic racism. This is my advice.Body

Two months have passed since George Floyd's final eight minutes and 46 seconds and white people still are asking me, and others who serve and lead Black organizations, "How can we help?" "What should we do?"

Like no other event in recent memory, the killing of George Floyd has ripped curtains of indifference and bashed barriers of otherness in this community and across the country. Young and old, Black and white, urban and rural, gay and straight - all who watched the video were leveled and equalized by our collective horror and outrage.

There has been no shortage of advice from Black folk to white folk on how to invest their resources and leverage this seminal moment. The advice tends to follow one of two streams: 1) Go big, meaning partner with an individual or organization that promises to disrupt systems and catalyze transformative change; or 2) go slow - that is, recognize that white supremacy and systemic racism were nurtured and built over centuries and will require strategic and sustained measures to dismantle. Figure out what part of dismantling racism you and your organization are good at doing, then do it.

Both strategies have appeal. The former offers delegation of the heavy lifting to an intermediary. The latter buys time. But sustainable systems change will happen only when the people who control, perpetuate and benefit from the systems engage and commit to personal change.

Fifty years ago, poet and singer Gil Scott-Herron sang, "The Revolution will not be televised." It also will not be fought by remote.

Instead of go big or go slow, I would offer a different and complementary guidance:

Go small; start now.

RACIAL EQUITY

The single, most powerful unit of capacity for transformation and good is yourself. Start there. Social system change begins with personal disruption. And the good thing is, you don't have to wait for a consultant or committee to propose metrics, recommend a strategy and allocate resources. You can start small, with yourself. And you can start now.

Here are five steps guaranteed to catalyze your capacity to lead and serve the work of dismantling racism. They are not easy steps, but they are essential and minimal requirements for personal transformation.

First, select a Black neighborhood as your primary destination for personal commerce, including groceries, pharmacy, hair care and personal grooming, hardware, etc. Forgo your favorite mall, internet peddler and local eatery. Instead, shop where Black folk shop.

Second, choose to worship at an African American church, mosque or other spiritual center and give your tithes and offerings there. If you are not a person who worships, recognize that the Black church is oxygen for African American life. Scholar James H. Cone said, "religion has been that one place where you have an imagination that no one can control." Volunteer at a Black worship center. Ask to clean windows, drive a bus or teach a class.

Third, join the board of a Black-led and -missioned nonprofit in the Twin Cities where Blacks are the majority on the board. Find a cause that aligns with your skills or interests and get involved.

Fourth, direct your personal philanthropy to Black led and missioned organizations. Support organizations and leaders you personally know and those recommended by your Black friends.

Fifth, develop personal friendships with African Americans who reside in a Black community. Not mentorship, but a relationship based on mutual respect and interests and the expectation of mutual learning and benefit.

This five-step challenge is not for everyone, but it can be. It promises to disrupt routine, waive privilege and dislodge comfort. The benefits will not be quickly realized, and no dashboard will guide and mark progress or achievement. The natural reflex will be to eschew personal change in favor of systems change from a distance. It is easier to write a check and wait for change.

But for those who are up to the challenge, the dividends will be substantial. Soon, and very soon, you will stop seeing Black people as "them" and Black communities as "there." Instead you will see people you know, places you shop and experiences you have shared. When you read or hear about a celebration or success, a part of you will share in it. When you hear about crime or violence, you will experience concern for your friends, wonder how and if they were involved, and perhaps call them.

More important, you will be able to stop outsourcing judgment about Black people to media, intermediaries and subordinates because you can rely on your personal experience and relationships. And, when the next atrocious assault on a Black life happens, you won't have to ask how to help. You already will be helping.

Steven Belton is president and CEO, Urban League Twin Cities (sbelton@ultcmn.org).

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

RACIAL EQUITY

End of Document

Some Minneapolis residents have distrust of the police, and also the effort to defund them

ARTICLE MCDLII. SOME MINNEAPOLIS RESIDENTS HAVE DISTRUST OF THE POLICE, AND ALSO THE EFFORT TO DEFUND THEM

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 4, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1511 words

Byline: John Eligon

Highlight: Proponents of defunding argue that having considerably fewer - or no - police officers could actually reduce crime because those resources could instead be invested into communities struggling with poverty. But that argument does not win over everybody.

Body

The burgundy Oldsmobile sped through an intersection in a tree-lined residential neighborhood on Minneapolis' North Side, and Lisa Williams shook her head in disgust.

"Look at this," she said, surrounded by four of her young grandchildren on the short stoop of her home. "They ride as fast as they can right down through here with no regard for the children."

It is in such moments - when she is reminded of the many dangers in her community, from speeding cars to gunshots - that Williams, 50, would welcome the presence of police.

But then she recalls the time several years ago when she and her husband arrived home to find several police vehicles parked on their front lawn. Officers told them to mind their own business when they asked what was going on, leading to an argument that ended with her husband getting handcuffed and taken to jail.

Minneapolis' North Side, with a majority Black population, has decidedly mixed opinions on the City Council's effort, following the police killing of George Floyd, to significantly reduce the size and scope of Minneapolis' police force.

Residents complain of rampant police mistreatment, but also of out-of-control crime and violence. That reality has left many Black residents here unenthusiastic about what has become known as the defund movement. Adding complexity to the debate, they say that they despise the police but need someone to call when things go awry.

"It does seem like a no-win situation," Williams said.

Proponents of defunding argue that having considerably fewer - or no - police officers could actually reduce crime because those resources could instead be invested into communities struggling with poverty.

Some Minneapolis residents have distrust of the police, and also the effort to defund them

But that argument does not win over everybody.

In a survey last month of likely voters in 10 battleground states, just under half of Black respondents said they would be more likely to support a candidate who made defunding the police a priority, according to the poll commissioned by Run for Something, which supports young, progressive candidates, and Collective PAC, which backs Black candidates.

Reducing police department budgets drew support from 70% of Black Americans, according to a Gallup poll released in July. Yet only 22% of Black respondents supported the more drastic measure pushed by some activists of zeroing out police department budgets altogether.

"What are they suggesting would be the answer if we didn't have police?" asked Bunny Beeks, whose mother was fatally shot in North Minneapolis four years ago. "I just don't understand what that would look like."

The Minneapolis City Council's proposal would not totally eliminate the Police Department. But some council members have said they would like to replace the existing department, which has been widely criticized for its aggressive attitudes toward Black residents.

Most North Side residents say they hope for major reforms, including requiring officers to live in their community and better training them to interact with residents.

Tiffany Roberson, whose brother, Jamar Clark, was fatally shot by police five years ago, suggested creating a community council that could work with and oversee the police in North Minneapolis.

Though skeptics say that decades of reforms have failed to create fundamental change, some residents said they had faith that Floyd's death, and the outrage it has prompted, could make this time different.

Many residents say they have confidence in Chief Medaria Arradondo, the first African American to hold the position, saying he has shown an appetite for change that past police leaders have not. But a reform-minded chief cannot overhaul a department alone.

Speaking from a North Side street corner where young men sitting on lawn chairs chat on sunny summer days, Royal Jones, 32, said he had had many brushes with law enforcement. He compared his feelings about police to his relationship with his mother growing up. He said she might "whoop" him for doing something wrong, and he might get mad at her for it, but at the end of the day, he still relied on her.

Similarly, he said, if someone broke into his house, he would have to rely on law enforcement to handle it rather than "go the street way," which would just prompt more violence.

"Even a person like me might need the police," he said.

Still, Jones said he believed that a better approach might be to employ community outreach workers to avert violence before it happens and interact with police officers once it occurs. Such efforts already exist, but Jones said they could be more robust.

Standing nearby, his friend Kentrell Grimes, a fellow North Sider, was not necessarily buying that approach.

Some Minneapolis residents have distrust of the police, and also the effort to defund them

"At the end of the day, that is still policing," said Grimes, 25, a cook. "This is what I'm saying, though: How can you defund the police and then bring another group to police? That's stupid. I'm sitting here trying to wrap my brain around this."

Minneapolis proponents of defunding the police have said that these are the types of discussions that community members needed to have to decide what works best for public safety in their neighborhoods.

Some may see the need for armed officers. Others may come up with a different model. Kandace Montgomery, the director of Black Visions Collective, a leading advocate of defunding in Minneapolis, acknowledged the difficulty of getting people to envision a system of public safety different from the only one they have always known.

"We do have to imagine," she said. "I recognize that is deeply scary."

City Council members have worked closely with Black Visions Collective and other Black-led organizations in an effort to defund the Police Department. That has stirred tensions.

Many North Side civic leaders and legacy organizations, like the Urban League and several Black churches, have accused elected officials of ignoring the voices of their communities as they create a path forward for policing. They point out that some of the defund movement's leaders are based on the South Side - where Floyd was killed by the police - which has a much smaller Black population.

"They've made this choice for us as Black people, when they don't necessarily live or engage with Black people," said Raeisha Williams, a North Side activist whose brother was fatally shot two years ago. "When my house is broken into, I want to be able to call the police. When my security alarm goes off, I want to know they're going to arrive and protect my family."

The council has proposed amending the City Charter to eliminate the Police Department as a core agency and replace it with a new public safety department. That move alone would not eliminate the police, but it would provide a blank canvas on which city leaders could create a new mechanism for public safety that could include social services and crime-prevention initiatives.

The two council members representing the North Side, Phillipe Cunningham and Jeremiah Ellison, have supported the effort to change the charter and defund the police.

"To say that Black North Siders have not had a voice erases the existence of two Black North Side council members," Cunningham said.

He said his constituents have told him they want to see "transformative change in the way that the city keeps our community safe."

He acknowledged that the police could not be eliminated in one fell swoop.

"We will likely need some form of law enforcement for the foreseeable future," Cunningham said. Yet he envisioned a system in which greater investment in things like community workers, health, housing and education would stabilize the community and drive down crime. But that is difficult for many to envision right now as Minneapolis, like many other urban areas across the country, is in the midst of a spike in gun violence. The Police Department's 4th Precinct, which covers North Minneapolis, has seen more murders and violent crimes this year than any other precinct in the city.

Some Minneapolis residents have distrust of the police, and also the effort to defund them

One of those victims of violence was Taona Mays, 24, who was sitting in the back of a friend's sport utility vehicle on a Saturday in late July when a man walked up alongside the car and began shooting. A bullet struck her left hip, leaving her with a severe limp.

"The presence of the police is definitely needed because without it, people definitely will just do anything," said Mays, who does medical transport at a hospital.

Yet she also embraces elements of what defund activists have been preaching. If there were fewer officers, she said, they would only be able to focus on major crimes rather than harassing people for petty things. She actually wants something to replace the police, she said, but she cannot think of what that would be.

"It's good to have good police," she said. "It's bad to have bad police." Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police Attorney for fired Minneapolis officer says Freeman should be removed from George Floyd case

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCDLIII. 2020 BEST PLACES TO WORK: PIONEER MANAGEMENT CONSULTING; CATEGORY: SMALL

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

August 4, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 943 words

Byline: Staff

Body

Pioneer Management Consulting receives its first Best Places to Work award this year, in part by staying on top of its team members' engagement. It conducts an annual engagement survey along with a quarterly pulse survey, and has used the feedback to adjust its meeting schedules and organizational design.

For more about why this company is a BPTW, we asked Human Resources Director Jon Koss:

How many jobs do you have open, and where do you post your job openings? None currently, but in the future, openings are posted to our website: thepioneerteam.com, or candidates can email their resumes to pioneercareers@thepioneerteam.com

What are some tangible benefits the company offers its employees? Four weeks of PTO, that resets every year on your work anniversary; eight paid holidays, plus a new holiday this year (election day); 401(k) match; and health insurance including medical, dental and vision. We also allot development hours to every consultant each year, so they can enjoy focused time on development in ways that are personal and impactful to them.

Do you have a formal or informal company policy regarding diversity and inclusion? We're people of action and we firmly believe that people of all backgrounds have a place with Pioneer. We took action after the tragic death of George Floyd and the riots in Minneapolis in the following ways:

- We launched the 8:46 campaign and invited our team, clients and community members to pledge a specific commitment to ending racism. Each of our employees is making personal commitments and then sharing it with their networks to keep those commitments going.
- Donating $846 to five charities - one fighting racism, one rebuilding black-owned businesses in Minneapolis, one supporting police reform, one fighting the education gap, and one to rebuild the Longfellow neighborhood.
- This Nov. 3 will be a company holiday - we've encouraged our employees to go vote.
- Joined forces with a grassroots effort to rebuild the Longfellow community.
- Hosting internal diversity and inclusion roundtable discussions for our team.

How has the coronavirus pandemic affected your firm's operations? Like many, we all began working from home, including 100% remote work for clients. Our leadership team created a resilience plan to keep our operations running smooth and our team in the know. We buckled down and leaned into technology capabilities to keep us connected, which included daily check-ins, virtual happy hours, and weekly Friday team calls complete with Zoom background contests and dance parties. One of our core values is remaining connected, and it is quite amazing that we have felt more connected than ever during the pandemic, even from afar.

We have been working diligently to ensure we come out of this time completely whole with no furloughs or layoffs. We've also tried to operate as normally as possible. Where many companies have canceled internships, we had committed to a former student at the University of St. Thomas that she would have an internship with us this summer, and we kept our word.

We also leaned into supporting our community during the pandemic, including a campaign to support 200 local businesses in two weeks. We were proud to surpass our goal. From sewing masks, to providing complimentary consulting services to small businesses in need, supporting local restaurants through gift card sales, sending flowers to teachers and treats to day care workers, making meals for nurses and sending cards to overwhelmed single parents - we have found a renewed value in connection.

Have you had any layoffs due to the pandemic? None

Have you had any furloughs due to the pandemic? None

If you implemented remote-work policies due to the coronavirus pandemic, how did you keep people connected? We use Slack and Zoom religiously, but really, we implemented intentional connections for the team. Leaders reached out regularly to each of their employees to check in, catch up and talk priorities. We had virtual happy hours, lunches, contests and games. We increased the number of our all-team meetings so the entire team was kept updated and in the know.

2020 Best Places to Work: Pioneer Management Consulting; Category: Small

The team has paid it forward in numerous ways throughout this time - enacting random acts of kindness and when impacted, paying that kindness forward. From delivering anonymous gifts, making homemade masks to the simple act of a hand written note, our remote team came together.

What additional resources have you offered employees during the pandemic? Mental health breaks (on Pioneer) whether 10 minutes, an hour, etc.

When and how did you start bringing employees back to the office? If you haven't returned to the office, when will that happen and what will it look like? Most of our leaders are back in the office, and consultants are working from home but can come to the office if they feel comfortable doing so. We rent space from WeWork, and they've implemented numerous guidelines and safety protocols so that we can all feel safe yet enjoy working together as a team again.

How will your use of remote work versus in-office work be different post-pandemic? We've always been flexible for our team and encourage our employees to work from home when needed for doctor's appointments, kid appointments, etc. We also work to meet our clients' expectations, so if companies are more flexible in work-from-home arrangements, our consultants follow suit.

First-time winner

Score: 97.6984

Top local executive: Molly Koenen

Minnesota employees: 25

Business: Management consulting firm

City: Minneapolis

Web: pioneermanagementconsulting.com

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: August 4, 2020

ARTICLE MCDLIV. BOTTINEAU LIGHT-RAIL ROUTE IS QUASHED

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 4, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 790 wordsByline: JANET MOORE; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Negotiations with BNSF freight line proved futile.Body

Transit planners have abandoned the long-established route of the Bottineau Blue Line - leaving the fate of the $1.5 billion light-rail project slated for the North Side of the Twin Cities unclear.

After years of "futile" discussion, Hennepin County and the Metropolitan Council said they could not reach a critical agreement with BNSF Railway permitting light-rail and freight trains to share 8 miles of Bottineau's proposed 13-mile route. The line was slated to link downtown Minneapolis to Brooklyn Park, with passenger service beginning in 2024.

Officials insist the project will continue as a light-rail line, although a new route needs to be determined, a complicated process. The existing alignment took years to plan and engineer; so far, $129 million in local money has been spent on the Bottineau line.

"I think we'll get it done, but it will take time to get it to the right place," said Met Council Chairman Charlie Zelle. "It's time to open our eyes - let's make the hard decisions and make the right decision."

Bottineau's planned route bisected some of the most impoverished and transit-dependent areas of the Twin Cities.

The news Monday that the route would not work "is extremely frustrating," said Ricardo Perez of the Blue Line Coalition, a group of nonprofit organizations that has worked for years to support the project. Still, Perez is hopeful that Bottineau has a new sense of momentum.

Reliable and safe transit is critical for members of the community to get to work, school, medical appointments and to access healthy food, Perez said. "For us to be able to have reliable transportation means a world of difference," he said.

BNSF's opposition to the project has been consistent. In a statement Monday, the Texas-based rail giant said the decision to seek a different alignment "is a good outcome."

Bottineau light-rail route is quashed

But the news infuriated mayors from the suburban cities along the line - Golden Valley, Robbinsdale, Crystal and Brooklyn Park - who, along with the Blue Line Coalition, wrote Gov. Tim Walz and others recently demanding "meaningful action" to push the project forward.

The letter's authors said the project has a heightened sense of urgency after the killing of George Floyd, which has prompted new conversations about racial equity in the Twin Cities, including access to public transportation.

"We had a plan for serving one of the most diverse areas of the Twin Cities, and now we don't," said Brooklyn Park Mayor Jeff Lunde, who criticized the "lack of transparency" that went into the decision to scrap the route.

Golden Valley Mayor Shep Harris said the parties have not exhausted all options to force BNSF into an agreement with the council and Hennepin County.

"It's not time to move on," Harris said. "There are ways to get them to come to the table."

Hennepin County Commissioner Mike Opat, whose district includes several cities that would be served by Bottineau, said the railroad "once conducted themselves as partners in this endeavor. BNSF's new obstinance cannot deter our work any longer. The time to forge ahead is now."

A Met Council advisory committee of elected officials and community members will meet Aug. 13 to discuss next steps. Zelle said sticking close to the planned alignment - although not on BNSF property - would be "a natural consideration" given the investment many cities along the line have already made to prepare for light-rail service.

Hennepin County Commissioner Irene Fernando, who took office last year, said "we want to be respectful of the work that was done before. We want to keep as much intact as possible."

The project will remain in the queue to qualify for highly competitive funding from the Federal Transit Administration (FTA), which was expected to cover nearly half of the cost to build Bottineau. The FTA did not respond with a comment Monday.

Nailing down agreements with "third parties" like BNSF is required before federal officials will fund construction of such a big project.

Rep. Paul Torkelson, a Republican member of the House Transportation Finance and Policy Committee at the Legislature, said "it's about time" the county and the council retooled the project.

Torkelson said it wasn't practical to run light-rail and freight trains side-by-side for much of Bottineau's route.

He said rapid bus service, whose frequent, high-amenity service mimics light rail for a fraction of the cost, is a better bet than light rail.

Since the Bottineau line's route was decided seven years ago, the C Line rapid bus has begun service between Brooklyn Center and downtown Minneapolis through the city's North Side.

Funding to complete the D Line, which would link Brooklyn Center to the Mall of America, is pending at the Legislature.

Bottineau light-rail route is quashed

Janet Moore · 612-673-7752 Twitter: @ByJanetMoore

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

End of Document

Bridgewater Bank's Uptown branch, repeatedly raided during riots, will reopen

ARTICLE MCDLV. BRIDGEWATER BANK'S UPTOWN BRANCH, REPEATEDLY RAIDED DURING RIOTS, WILL REOPEN

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

August 4, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 303 words

Byline: Patrick Rehkamp

Body

Bridgewater Bank's Uptown branch is reopening after it was looted on three separate nights during the riots after George Floyd's death.

The branch, located at 3100 Hennepin Ave. in the Uptown neighborhood of Minneapolis, will open on August 17, according to CEO Jerry Baack. It had been closed, except for the drive-thru window, since late May.

Damaged equipment, such as the ATM machine and interior equipment have already been replaced. New windows are being installed now, according to Mary Jane Crocker, Bridgewater's executive vice president and chief operating officer. Repairs cost roughly $200,000.

"Our priority after the unrest was to reopen our doors and serve our Uptown clients," the bank said in a statement. We found a way to do this quickly while ensuring our employees felt accommodated and safe in the renewed space."

Bridgewater Bank's Uptown branch, repeatedly raided during riots, will reopen

On the first night of the riots, only one door was busted. On the second night, numerous windows and doors and the drive-thru ATM were broken. And on Friday, rioters used a crowbar to open boarded-up entryways to get in and cause further damage; someone made off with $11,000 in coins.

The bank will also has full-time security officers at the branch and shortened hours going forward.

"We have adjusted our hours to an earlier closure with the safety of our clients and staff in mind," the bank said. "We also now also have a full-time security guard on staff during business hours. This is a new precaution that was not in place before the unrest."

None of the bank's six other branches in the Twin Cities were damaged during the unrest.

Bloomington-based Bridgewater Bank was founded in 2005. Its annual revenue is more than $67 million and the bank has roughly 180 employees.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: August 4, 2020

CUP FOODS FEELS THE HEAT

ARTICLE MCDLVI. CUP FOODS FEELS THE HEAT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 4, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1A

Length: 56 words

Body

Protesters tried to stop Cup Foods from reopening Monday, saying they want the corner to remain a memorial to George Floyd, who was killed by police outside the store in late May. Above, an activist confronted Billy Abumayyaleh, whose brother owns the store. Story, B1.

Photo by RICHARD TSONG-TAATARII · richard.tsong-taatarii@startribune.com

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDLVII.

DECISION TIME NEARING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 4, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: SPORTS; Pg. 3CLength: 691 wordsByline: MEGAN RYAN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: But calling off fall sports might not matter for college football anyway.Body

Big Ten Commissioner Kevin Warren sent a letter to his 14 athletic directors Thursday saying the conference planned to make a decision on when to start preseason "within five days."

That times out rather well with Tuesday's NCAA Board of Governors meeting.

The NCAA meeting of university leaders could make the Big Ten's decision easier by canceling all fall sports championships. It's the same move the NCAA made in March that effectively canceled all winter and spring sports, because there's not really any point to playing a regular season without a championship.

But the NCAA has had this opportunity before, even just two weeks ago, and tabled the matter, pushing it off to the future, with the hope that more information would reveal some way forward for the upcoming season.

The coronavirus pandemic, though, hasn't abated, and with football training camp scheduled to start this week and the season in another month, these leagues are running out of time to make a call. Another option is delaying to later in August.

For football, though, there is a unique loophole.

The College Football Playoff, the national championship for FBS teams, and the subsequent bowl game system are run outside of the NCAA's purview. That means even if the NCAA canceled fall championships, that wouldn't necessarily mean an end for football.

A Sports Illustrated report this past weekend detailed how the Power Five conferences have started looking into staging their own fall championships, potentially signaling a future breakoff from the NCAA for the 65 schools within the Big Ten, Atlantic Coast, Pacific-12, Big 12 and Southeastern conferences.

The SEC, Pac-12 and ACC have already announced their revised season schedules for football. The Pac-12, for example, will start training camp Aug. 17 and the 10-game conference-only season Sept. 26. But this plan, still in preliminary talks, would also allow for fall championships for the Power Five nonrevenue sports such as volleyball and soccer. Per the Sports Illustrated report, that is mainly for optics, as just playing the revenue-generating football season without other sports would raise ethics questions.

That's already happened within the Pac-12. A group of hundreds of student-athletes from that conference announced in a Players' Tribune feature Sunday their intent to opt out of the upcoming season unless the conference can reach an agreement with them on issues of health and safety, racial injustice and economic equity.

The potential boycott is one of the largest organized player protests in college sports, sparked from concerns about playing in a pandemic as well as renewed calls to end racial injustice after George Floyd's death in Minneapolis police custody about two months ago.

Some Gophers football players have weighed in on social media, with cornerback Coney Durr writing on Twitter July 9: "How does fall camp even happen? 110 guys around each other 12 hours a day for a month straight. Man, it's tough times right now."

Durr also retweeted a Sunday tweet from Sen. Chris Murphy, D-Conn., that said, "COVID has exposed a civil rights crisis in big-time college sports: unpaid kids - mostly of color - risking their lives to make millions for adults - mostly white. This needs to change. NOW."

Gophers quarterback Seth Green said July 23 he felt safe participating in the team's current workouts, walkthroughs and meetings, separated by position groups.

The Gophers athletics department is overdue to announce the latest round of COVID-19 test results for its student-athletes, something it planned to do at the end of every month. The most recent release from June 30 announced seven had tested positive of 170 administered tests across the football, volleyball, soccer and basketball teams.

But the next step is still unclear.

"I feel like as of now, there's not a super-safe procedure to have training camp in play, but I feel like that's what they're working on and that's what determines the start dates," Green said. "I feel confident that if they don't have a safe way to go about it, then they'll either push it back or reschedule it.

" ... I've got faith in them for the most part."

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

Frey: Walz delayed Guard order

ARTICLE MCDLVIII.

FREY: WALZ DELAYED GUARD ORDER

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 4, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1ALength: 1190 wordsByline: JENNIFER BJORHUS; LIZ NAVRATIL; STAFF WRITERS, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: E-mails and texts show urgency; state says requests were vagueBody

Jacob Frey has been cast as the mayor who lost control of his city, enduring criticism from the state's governor that the Minneapolis response to rioting in May over the police killing of George Floyd was an "abject failure."

Now Frey is speaking out, saying Gov. Tim Walz failed to take his requests for help seriously until it was too late.

In an interview Monday, Frey said that Walz hesitated to send in the National Guard to quell the growing violence and then blamed him for allowing the city to burn.

"Through an extremely difficult situation, I told the truth," Frey said Monday. "I relayed information as best I could to state partners. And we did what was demanded for the sake of our city."

Texts and e-mails obtained from Minneapolis by the Star Tribune through public records requests show the city was trying to give Walz and the state Department of Public Safety what they said they needed to move forward.

State officials, meanwhile, said the city did not provide the detailed information they needed to deploy the Guard until the next day. By then, dozens of buildings had been looted and torched.

On Wednesday, May 27, the second evening of unrest around the Third Precinct, Frey said Police Chief Medaria Arradondo called him at 6:23 p.m. to say that the Target store near the police station was being looted and that he needed the National Guard.

Frey said he immediately telephoned Walz, at 6:29 p.m., relayed information, and asked him to send in the National Guard. "We expressed the seriousness of the situation. The urgency was clear," Frey said.

"He did not say yes," Frey said of Walz. "He said he would consider it."

Frey insisted that he explicitly asked whether his verbal

Frey: Walz delayed Guard order

requests constituted a formal request, and the governor's staff confirmed that they did. The governor's office disputes that.

The documents, released by the city late last week, corroborate this sequence of events.

They show that at 6:28 p.m. Wednesday, Frey's spokesman, Mychal Vlatkovich, texted a small group of employees in the mayor's office: "Mayor just came out and said the chief wants him to call in the national guard for help at Third Precinct. Mayor appears intent on doing." Frey's policy director, Heidi Ritchie, later updated the group: "He called the governor just now."

In a separate text conversation later Wednesday night, Vlatkovich said Frey indicated "Walz was hesitating."

Frey said he received no confirmation the National Guard was coming the rest of Wednesday night or the following morning.

A city news release about his request for the Guard was drafted Wednesday but never sent.

Frey first revealed to the Star Tribune that he had asked for the Guard at 11:30 p.m. that night.

At 10:55 a.m. Thursday, Frey's office followed up with a written request for the National Guard, noting "widespread looting and arson" and that protesters and first responders had been injured.

"The ongoing situation is well-beyond the capability of our police and fire departments to respond," Frey wrote.

Walz was not available for an interview Monday, according to his office.

Walz spokesman Teddy Tschann said more information was needed to deploy the soldiers.

"As a 24-year veteran of the Minnesota National Guard, Governor Walz knows how much planning goes into a successful mission," Tschann said in a statement. "That's why he pushed the City of Minneapolis for details and a strategy. He ordered the Minnesota National Guard to start preparing Thursday morning which allowed them to deploy to both St. Paul and Minneapolis that evening, per the Mayors' requests."

The governor's office disputed several of Frey's assertions. According to the office: The Governor's staff told Frey a verbal request cannot be considered an official request for the National Guard; the city's request did not focus on protecting the Third Precinct; and the National Guard mobilized Thursday morning and was on the ground in the Twin Cities within 24 hours of Frey's informal request.

Walz activated the National Guard at 2:30 p.m. Thursday May 28. But eight hours later, only 90 National Guard soldiers were on the ground across the Twin Cities. By that time, officers had already evacuated the Third Precinct after it was besieged by protesters.

Public Safety Commissioner John Harrington said in an interview Monday that the city's early requests for assistance from the National Guard were "rather vague" and not detailed enough to activate the soldiers.

"They weren't specific about what they wanted or any details on what the mission would be," Harrington said. Then, when they received a list of areas they needed help with, "the list was so all-encompassing we could not possibly staff all the things they wanted."

Frey: Walz delayed Guard order

The records newly released by the city show that Minneapolis police and state officials corresponded multiple times that Wednesday night and into Friday regarding the city's National Guard request.

At 9:11 p.m. Wednesday, Arradondo sent an e-mail to Harrington that included an attachment requesting "assistance of the MN National Guard for immediate assistance with significant civil unrest occurring in the City of Minneapolis."

It said the department has "expended all available resources within our Department as well as all available law enforcement assistance from our neighboring jurisdictions."

It listed a four-point mission plan: "Area Security and Force Protection Operations," "Area Denial Operations," "Transportation assistance for law enforcement officers," "Logistical assistance for the overall security operation."

Arradondo asked for 600 National Guard soldiers "along with compliment [sic] of command and control," as well as vehicles. The National Guard would report to police department supervisors, who would coordinate with the National Guard's leaders.

At 12:23 p.m. the following day, Arradondo sent Harrington an e-mail that included a list of "critical infrastructure sites to be protected," listing the five police precincts and other government and medical buildings and businesses along Lake Street and other areas.

It also included a list of resources they thought the department might need the next week.

In an interview Monday, Arradondo said the city faced an "unprecedented, historical moment" and he hoped they would work with the state to learn more about the Guard's deployment processes should they be needed in the future.

"There are a great deal of complexities, now I've learned," he said.

Frey described his dismay watching Walz's news conference Friday morning as the Third Precinct smoldered.

With Major General Jon Jensen of the Minnesota National Guard next to him, Walz called the city's response an "abject failure."

Walz had not warned him this public rebuke was coming, although they had a meeting shortly beforehand, he said.

"It was a sharp departure from every conversation we had had at that point," Frey said. He described the governor's assessment as "definitely a hit in the gut."

"Not just for me, but for so many in our city that were doing everything they could. ... Everyone was pouring themselves into stemming the violence," he said.

Jennifer Bjorhus · 612-673-4683 Liz Navratil · 612-673-4994

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDLIX. JUST SOLD: GLASRUD SELLS VINTAGE RETAIL, OFFICE-WAREHOUSE PROPERTIES

Finance and Commerce

August 4, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 BridgeTower Media All Rights Reserved

FINANCE & COMMERCESection: NEWSLength: 890 wordsByline: Anne BrettsBody

Editor's note: "Just Sold" is a Finance & Commerce feature based on the newest certificates of real estate value filed with the Minnesota Department of Revenue for commercial sales throughout Minnesota and reports of sales across the country involving local parties. Research includes company and broker documents, online real estate listings, F&C archives, CoStar and other research.

[divider]

Veteran developer Ted Glasrud, head of Ted Glasrud Associates in Roseville, has sold two properties from its Minnesota portfolio in separate off-market transactions.

Glasrud sold a 52,487-square-foot office-warehouse flex building in Plymouth to a local private investment entity for $4.76 million, or $90.69 per square foot. The building was completed in 2006 on 3.58 acres at 2415-2495 Xenium Lane N. The one-story Class B masonry building features five dock doors, six drive-in doors and 14-foot ceiling height.

Glasrud bought it for $4.3 million in 2006. It was fully leased to six tenants.

And nearly four decades after developing the southwest corner of Lake Street and Nicollet Avenue South in Minneapolis with a pioneering retail-condominium building, Glasrud has sold the 23,000-square-foot first-floor retail space of 3000-3018 Nicollet Ave. S. for $2.835 million.

"It was pretty much how we got started," said Paul Buchmayer, senior vice president for commercial real estate. The company began in 1972 developing apartments, and the 1982 project helped make the company a leader in the new condominium market, he said.

The 72 condominiums sold to individual owners, but Glasrud held the retail space.

"The space was really easy to lease and [I] never really had to do a big marketing brochure," Buchmayer said.

The building is in the area heavily damaged during the protests in late May and early June after the death of George Floyd.

Just Sold: Glasrud sells vintage retail, office-warehouse properties

“It was damaged,” he said. “They broke most of the first-floor windows and looted the pharmacy. ”

The building was repaired, and when an investor approached the company this summer and made an offer on the property, Glasrud accepted.

The sale to NWD LLC and KJDW LLC, both of White Bear Lake, closed July 15, at a price that works out to $123.26 per square foot.

Glasrud’s portfolio now includes about 800,000 square feet of space in Minnesota and 1.5 million square feet of space in Florida.

Place: 3000-3018 Nicollet Ave., Minneapolis

Price: $2.835 million cash, 1031 exchange; $123.26 per square foot

Buyer: NWD LLC & KJDW LLC, White Bear Lake

Seller: Ted Glasrud Associates MN LLC, Roseville

Date: 7-15-20

[su_document url="<https://finance-commerce.com/files/2020/08/Just-Sold-CRV-3000-Nicollet-Avenue-3018-Nicollet-Avenue-Minneapolis.pdf>" height="800"]

Place: Plymouth Office/Tech Center, 2415-2495 Xenium Lane N., Plymouth

Price: $4.76 million, $30,000; $90.69 per square foot

Buyer: Xenium 55 LLC, Pine Springs

Seller: Ted Glasrud Associates MN LLC, Roseville

Date: 7-1-20/CRV released 8-3-20

[su_document url="<https://finance-commerce.com/files/2020/08/Just-Sold-CRV-2415-2495-Xenium-Lane-N-Plymouth.pdf>" height="800"]

[divider]

Crosstown Woods Office Center draws $3.2 million

A Moorhead-based buyer has paid nearly $3.2 million for the Crosstown Woods Office Center, a 47,591-square-foot, Class C multitenant office building at 10125 Crosstown Circle in Eden Prairie. The three-story building was completed in 1981 on 5.61 acres in the southwest quadrant of Highway 62 and Highway 169. The sale price works out to $66.71 per square foot.

The buyer is an investment entity related to Sandman Structural Engineers, which is based in Moorhead and has additional offices in Champlin, Brainerd and Grand Forks, North Dakota.

Kent Heimark, business manager at Sandman, said the company bought the building to accommodate a client who needed office space in the area. He declined to identify the client or how much space it will lease.

CoStar indicates the building is 88 percent leased.

The seller was Crosstown Woods LLC in Edina. CoStar indicates the selling entity is related to real estate veteran George Zeller. The building last sold in 2005 for $4.45 million, according to Hennepin County records.

Place: 10125 Crosstown Circle, Eden Prairie

Price: $3.175 million, $403,364 down payment; $66.71 per square foot

Buyer: Pinnacle Crosstown Woods LLC, Moorhead

Seller: Crosstown Woods LLC, Edina

Date: 7-31-20

[su_document url="<https://finance-commerce.com/files/2020/08/Just-Sold-CRV-10125-Crosstown-Cir-Eden-Prairie.pdf>" height="800"]

Just Sold: Glasrud sells vintage retail, office-warehouse properties

[divider]

Top Ten Liquors acquires site for Vadnais Heights store

Minneapolis-based Top Ten Liquors has acquired a former Vadnais Heights restaurant it plans to convert to its 10th suburban Twin Cities location.

YG Holdings LLC, Closed on the purchase of the former Mad Jack's Sports Caf restaurant at 935 County Road E E. The 8,153-square-foot restaurant was built in 2002 on 1.95 acres.

Top Ten has locations in Andover, Blaine, Chanhassen, Cottage Grove, Osseo, Ramsey, Roseville, St. Louis Park and Woodbury

Place: 935 County Road East E., Vadnais Heights

Price: $2 million, $50,000 down payment; $245.31 per square foot

Buyer: YG Holdings LLC, Minneapolis

Seller: MJ's Properties Inc., New Prague

Date: 7-31-20

[su_document url="<https://finance-commerce.com/files/2020/08/Just-Sold-CRV-935-County-Road-E-East-Vadnais-Heights.pdf>" height="800"]

Copyright © 2020 BridgeTower Media. All Rights Reserved.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDLX. MINNEAPOLIS FOUNDATION AWARDS FUND FOR SAFE COMMUNITIES GRANTS

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

August 4, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 515 words

Byline: Carter Jones

Body

The Minneapolis Foundation awarded its first round of grants for its Fund for Safe Communities on Tuesday.

Thirty-one community-based groups were awarded a total of $623,725 to help reduce violence in Minneapolis neighborhoods.

"Violence is a problem that has always been with us, and one violent death in Minneapolis is one death too many," said Chanda Smith Baker, senior vice president of impact at The Minneapolis Foundation, in a news release. "This summer's horrific challenges have only intensified the urgency of this issue, and we are doubling down on our efforts to support the many local leaders who are doing high-impact work to reduce violence in their communities."

The grants announced Tuesday are supporting organizations that applied for funding this spring, before the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis Police custody. After Floyd's death and the subsequent civil unrest, the Minneapolis Foundation committed an additional $500,000 to the Fund for Safe Communities. The second round of grants is currently under review and will be awarded later this month.

Minneapolis Foundation awards Fund for Safe Communities grants

The Minneapolis Foundation prioritized applications from groups that are led by Black, Indigenous and people of color.

The Fund for Safe Communities was established in 2018 to support meaningful actions to address and prevent violence. The fund was inspired by the leadership shown by students who were affected by the mass shooting at Marjory Stoneman Douglas High School in Parkland, Fla.

The fund is advised by a committee of eight young adults who have been personally affected by gun violence in Minneapolis. The committee reviewed grant applications and made funding recommendations to Smith Baker.

"I feel it's important to invest in communities directly, and that is exactly what this committee does," said advisory committee member Meti Regassa. "All of the members have a vested interest in watching Minneapolis become a safer version of itself."

The awards announced today will support the following groups:

- A Mother's Love Initiative
- African American Center of Minnesota
- American Indian Community Development Corporation
- Appetite for Change
- Art is My Weapon
- Be the Voice
- Circle of Discipline
- Conflict Resolution Center
- East African Integration Center
- Ghands, Inc.
- HAVEN International
- HIRED, Inc.
- La Oportunidad
- Lucy Laney Boxing Academy
- Me and My Sis-Stirs
- Metro Youth Diversion Center
- Minneapolis MAD DADS
- NAACP of Minneapolis
- Ostara Initiative
- Philando Castile Peace Garden

Minneapolis Foundation awards Fund for Safe Communities grants

- Philando Castile Relief Foundation
- Pillsbury United Communities
- Plymouth Christian Youth
- Pollen Midwest
- Professional Firefighters Association
- Restorative Justice Community Action
- Seward Longfellow Restorative Justice
- Somali Action Alliance of Minnesota
- Strength Group
- The Price Dynamic
- Urban Ventures Leadership Foundation

To make a tax-deductible online donation or to learn about future funding opportunities from the Fund for Safe Communities, go to <http://www.minneapolisfoundation.org/safe-communities/>.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: August 4, 2020

State Patrol cancels police academy class 'due to lack of funding'

ARTICLE MCDLXI. STATE PATROL CANCELS POLICE ACADEMY CLASS 'DUE TO LACK OF FUNDING'

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 4, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 481 words

Byline: Dave Orrick

Highlight: The Minnesota State Patrol has canceled its annual police academy to train future officers "due to lack of funding." The decision, which will effectively thin the ranks of the state law enforcement agency by several dozen, is the second noteworthy cut in state services resulting from looming state budget shortfalls, courtesy of the coronavirus pandemic [...]

Body

The Minnesota State Patrol has canceled its annual police academy to train future officers "due to lack of funding."

The decision, which will effectively thin the ranks of the state law enforcement agency by several dozen, is the second noteworthy cut in state services resulting from looming state budget shortfalls, courtesy of the coronavirus pandemic and its resulting hammer on the economy and state tax revenues.

On Monday, the Department of Corrections announced that it would close two minimum-security prisons for the same reason, and other state agencies are facing similar pressures.

The State Patrol's decision to scrap the academy class was revealed Friday in communications sent to prospective attendees. On Tuesday, the Department of Public Safety, which oversees the State Patrol, confirmed the details and reasoning to the Pioneer Press.

Here are the broad strokes:

The State Patrol tries to maintain a force of about 600 troopers. About 35 are expected to leave this fiscal year, when ends next summer, and another 35 are expected to leave the following year. Regular attrition like this is why the agency has generally for decades held a yearly academy at Camp Ripley, the Minnesota National Guard's training center near Little Falls. Each 15- to 17-week academy costs between $4.5 million and $5.5 million. (Last year's academy trained 32 future troopers for $4.9 million.) The State Patrol can't afford that, given current financial projections that foresee a $2.4 billion hole in the current two-year statewide budget and a $4.7 billion hole for the following two years.

State Patrol cancels police academy class 'due to lack of funding'

Gov. Tim Walz and the split-party Legislature could not agree this year on a revised taxing-and-spending plan that could have potentially patched the hole. (Walz is a Democrat; the House is controlled by Democrats, the Senate by Republicans.)

"Without a 2021 academy, the State Patrol will need additional funds to offer a larger than normal academy in 2022 in order to fill all vacant positions," DPS spokesman Bruce Gordon said in a statement Tuesday. "It is our hope that the Legislature will provide this funding to ensure we have the necessary troopers on Minnesota roads."

In communications to would-be academy attendees, Capt. Eric Barthel of the State Patrol's Training and Development Section expressed his "deepest apologies" that this year's academy would be canceled "due to a lack of funding." He said those enrolled would have to restart the hiring process in January.

North St. Paul man killed in crash after fleeing Dakota County sheriff's deputy Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Cleric assaulted outside Bloomington mosque; police searching for suspects U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities Minneapolis man sentenced to 33 years in prison for sex-trafficking young women and girls out of massage parlor

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCDLXII.

TAPPING INTO TIKTOK FOR SUPPORT

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 4, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 1BLength: 1108 wordsByline: ZOE JACKSON; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: The video-sharing service remains an unlikely platform in politics.Body

Watching state Sen. Matt Little dance around a tree to Justin Timberlake's "Suit & Tie" might seem an odd form of political expression, but a lot of people think the 35-year-old lawmaker from Lakeville might be onto something.

In a time when politicians are increasingly trying to connect with young people, established social media platforms like Facebook and Twitter have become a cacophony of political voices of all persuasions and ages,

Then there's TikTok, an app that many associate with viral dances and funny memes. "Gen Z," commonly understood as the generation born around the turn of the new millennium, dominates the platform with addictive viral trends - and increasingly with politics and social messaging.

Though youth on both sides of the partisan divide are creating political content, few politicians have devoted their time to engaging young people directly on the app.

Little, a lawyer in his first term in the Legislature, is one of a few who has connected with TikTok users in and out of his district, some on the other side of the world. With more than 130,000 followers, the DFL legislator believes he might be the most followed politician on the app.

"I've always had this methodology or goal that I could speak to people of all ages, on whatever platform they wanted to speak to me on. It started when I was on the City Council 10 years ago," Little said. "If someone wrote me a letter, I wrote them a letter; give me a call, I give them a call."

Though it can be more time-consuming than sending an e-mail or responding to a tweet, for Little, TikTok is no different.

"Young people, Gen Z, and the next generation are on TikTok, and I wanted to be able to speak to that generation," he said.

Tapping into TikTok for support

Little could use an edge in his re-election bid against GOP challenger Zach Duckworth, a veteran and volunteer firefighter who serves as chairman of the Lakeville school board. Little was elected in 2016 by a margin of less than 400 votes, and his suburban swing district is considered a Republican pickup opportunity in 2020.

Duckworth's campaign uses Facebook and Twitter, but he's not on TikTok. He had no comment about Little's TikTok strategy.

TikTok is a video-sharing social networking service founded by a Beijing-based internet technology company in 2012. By 2019, it was cited as the most downloaded mobile app of the decade. But some government officials and political campaigns, including Joe Biden's presidential campaign, have warned against using TikTok due to security concerns. President Donald Trump has threatened to ban the app in the U.S., but on Monday reversed course.

Little became active on the app in February and has quickly amassed a large following of young fans across the country. In the comments, some followers have lamented that they cannot re-elect him because they don't live in his Lakeville Senate district.

"When we first started we had a fairly sizable contingent out of South Africa," Little said. Now, the majority of his followers come from the U.S., Canada and the U.K.

In his videos, Little jokes about campaigning in the heat, shows off his office in St. Paul, and puts an issues-related spin on a viral trend. He has used the app to offer advice for young people interested in pursuing a career in politics and to organize a supply drive in the days following the Minneapolis police killing of George Floyd.

Little's success stems from his mastery of the language of TikTok, said Ioana Literat, an assistant professor at Teachers College, Columbia University. Literat and Neta Kligler-Vilenchik, an assistant professor at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, began studying political expression on TikTok after the 2016 election.

"I think he understands the core of expression on the platform," Literat said of Little. "He comes across as authentic. For young people, there's no worse thing than trying to seem authentic and then failing."

Peter Loge, a political communications strategist and professor at George Washington University, says politicians who are successful on social media are good at making sure their followers feel like friends or family. He cites New York U.S. Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez on Instagram, New Jersey U.S. Sen. Cory Booker on Twitter, and Little on TikTok.

"What they all do pretty successfully is create the illusion of intimacy. There's no conversation, but you still feel like you know them, because you spent a lot of time with them," Loge said.

Both Literat and Loge are surprised that there are so few political figures on TikTok, but they acknowledge that it's not an easy platform to do well on.

"The platform could be intimidating to older politicians that are not used to it. It's very intimidating to an outsider. Even the type of humor that dominates the platform, it's not something that adults really get," Literat said.

Tapping into TikTok for support

Producing enjoyable content is trickier than Instagram or Twitter, Little said. For a typical video, he has to find a concept, film, choose the song or audio, and edit.

Recently, Little asked for campaign dollars for the first time in a TikTok posting that raised $3,500 from followers who donated on Venmo, a mobile payment app. Little is the only Minnesota lawmaker using the payment app for campaign donations.

"I think small-dollar donations are good for our democracy overall," he said.

More politicians may eventually turn to TikTok for campaigning, Loge said. The app is free and allows politicians to connect with people without the costs associated with direct mail or TV advertisements.

"This is just straight up, 'Here's a free thing, can I have one dollar?' If one person says yes, it's been worth it because these are seconds long," Loge said. Still, the fact that many people on the platform are too young to vote and don't have a lot of money makes it unlikely that the app is the next best thing, Loge said.

Literat hopes that the app retains its roots as an outlet for youth expression.

"There's a sense of generational power, there's a sense of collective efficacy that's going on TikTok that I think is awesome. I love that it's youth-specific and grassroots, and I don't want politics to kind of muddy that," Literat said.

Though it's not traditional, Little has had a blast so far connecting with a young, active audience, even if it means dancing around a tree in his front yard in a suit and tie while a campaign staffer records on the senator's iPhone.

"I'm just super thankful that people think I'm funny and want to engage through TikTok," Little said.

Zoë Jackson covers young and new voters at the Star Tribune through the Report For America program, supported by the Minneapolis Foundation. 612-673-7112 · @zoemjack

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

Walz asks SBA for disaster help for businesses damaged in riots

ARTICLE MCDLXIII.

WALZ ASKS SBA FOR DISASTER HELP FOR BUSINESSES DAMAGED IN RIOTS

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

August 4, 2020 Tuesday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 270 words

Byline: Mark Reilly

Body

Gov. Tim Walz is petitioning the U.S. Small Business Administration for a disaster declaration that could clear the way for low-interest loans for businesses damaged in the civil unrest that struck the Twin Cities two months ago.

The Star Tribune reports on the request, which was announced Monday after Walz toured some of the hundreds of businesses that were badly damaged in civil unrest that followed the death of George Floyd during an arrest by Minneapolis police officers. The incident sparked a wave of protests that later spiraled into widespread looting and fires. More than 1,500 businesses were damaged; damages are estimated at $500 million.

RELATED: Police link mystery 'Umbrella Man' to white supremacist group

The Federal Emergency Management Agency turned down a similar request by Walz in June, saying the damage was "within the capabilities of the local and state governments." Walz, in his letter to FEMA, said the Minneapolis riots are estimated as the second-most destructive case of civil unrest in U.S. history, after the 1992 riots in Los Angeles. After those riots, which did an estimated $1 billion in damage, President George H.W. Bush declared the city a federal disaster area and began distributing more than $638 million in assistance within a month.

Walz asks SBA for disaster help for businesses damaged in riots

In his petition to the SBA, Walz said that surveys indicated that more than 25 homes or businesses suffered "uninsured losses of more than 40% of their estimated fair market value." That's the SBA threshold for declaring a disaster.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: August 4, 2020

Walz seeks federal loan aid for damaged businesses

ARTICLE MCDLXIV.

WALZ SEEKS FEDERAL LOAN AID FOR DAMAGED BUSINESSES

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 4, 2020 Tuesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: NEWS; Pg. 3BLength: 300 wordsByline: BRIANA BIRSCHBACH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Request made to SBA after disaster declaration denied by FEMA.Body

Gov. Tim Walz is requesting a disaster declaration from the U.S. Small Business Administration (SBA) to help repair properties that sustained extensive damage in Minneapolis during civil unrest following George Floyd's killing in police custody.

Walz announced the request Monday, after meeting with business owners on Lake Street in Minneapolis, which sustained the largest extent of the damage. If approved, the disaster declaration could free up low-interest loans for property and business owners.

"While many areas suffered damage, Minneapolis bore the brunt of the destruction. Arson was used to wantonly destroy local businesses, public buildings and other property," Walz wrote in the letter.

The move comes weeks after the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) denied a request from Walz for federal disaster aid to reimburse local governments as they begin to clear away rubble and rebuild structures.

Nearly 1,500 Twin Cities businesses were damaged by vandalism, fire and looting, according to the city of Minneapolis. Estimates of damage exceed $500 million.

In a July 2 letter to FEMA, Walz said it was the second-most destructive incident of civil unrest in U.S. history, after the 1992 riots in Los Angeles.

FEMA denied the request, which the state is in the process of appealing.

According to Walz's letter on Monday, a survey of damage verified that more than 25 homes or businesses in Hennepin County sustained "uninsured losses of more than 40% of their estimated fair market value," meeting the SBA's criteria for a disaster declaration.

"We need to work together to support Minnesotans who lost their homes and businesses to this destruction - that's why we've asked our federal partners to step in," Walz said in a statement.

Walz seeks federal loan aid for damaged businesses

Briana Bierschbach · 651-925-5042

Twitter: @bbierschbach

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDLXV.

LETTERS: WHAT'S THE ST. PAUL BUDGET PLAN?

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 5, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 572 wordsByline: Letter WritersHighlight: "Facts are stubborn things," President John Adams once said. "...whatever may be our wishes, our inclinations, or the dictates of our passion, they cannot alter the state of facts and evidence." Fact: St. Paul, like cities throughout the country, is facing a major budget crisis, as is the State of Minnesota. This year so far, [...]Body

"Facts are stubborn things," President John Adams once said. "...whatever may be our wishes, our inclinations, or the dictates of our passion, they cannot alter the state of facts and evidence."

Fact: St. Paul, like cities throughout the country, is facing a major budget crisis, as is the State of Minnesota. This year so far, the city lost over \$1.3 million in revenue from parking ramps and lots, and another $760,000 from parking meters as spaces sit empty. Parking ticket revenue has decreased 44% from last year. The city's general fund will likely see a shortfall between $19 million and $34 million, according to the St. Paul Pioneer Press.

Fact: St. Paul Mayor Melvin Carter has asked Chief Axtell and the St. Paul Police Department to trim \$9.2 million from the 2021 budget, eliminating the jobs of both sworn officers and civilians in an already lean department. As City Council Member Jane Prince pointed out in her Facebook blog, we will likely lose one of the city's most innovative programs, the Community Engagement Unit (CEU) that seeks to establish positive relationships between the most recent additions to the force and neighborhood kids who are growing up in the midst of a surge in gun violence.

Fact: The contract the city signed with the police union contains a "last in, first out" provision, signaling that officers lost in budget cuts will be the new, young, diverse hires trained under CEU.

Fact: Unlike Gov. Walz, who signed an executive order implementing salary cuts for the Minnesota governor, chief of staff, and cabinet members during the Covid emergency, the St. Paul mayor and the mayor's cabinet will not take pay cuts, nor will the mayor rescind a new position he created in contravention of the city's hiring freeze: that of "political director," another in a string of cabinet positions never before dreamed of.

Fact: The mayor has not yet communicated budget proposals to the city council, nor is the public aware of what cuts and tax hikes are likely to come and how they will affect ordinary citizens. That needs to change. People have a right to know what's going on in the mayor's office and to voice their opinions about priorities.

Letters: What's the St. Paul budget plan?

Jean Wulterkens, St. Paul

The sports pages of our local and national press have been busy with articles relating to the Black Lives Matter movement. While it may be considered admirable that members of the sports world such as Rocco Baldelli and have opinions, perhaps, it is time to direct some of the outrage to the daily bloody killings, including innocent children, that are occurring in our major cities controlled by liberal leadership.

Rather than defunding police using the Black Lives Matter mandate, our sports world heroes should be championing actions to eliminate lawlessness.

James T. Eichten, Stillwater

Signs in my neighborhood list a variety of slogans, such as "water is life." The same sign says "no person is illegal." The list also claims "women's rights are human rights." Since "women's rights" imply "reproductive rights" the underlying message is that an unborn child is not worthy to live.

Does anyone see the hypocrisy?

Ann Redding, Minneapolis Hey, State Fair ticket scalpers: you're tainted! Matt Dumba Letters: We need more good police, not fewer Letters: Mayor and governor point fingers but expect the federal government to pay? Letters: Is it the most-rigged election ever, win or lose? Letters: Talk about bad behavior!

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDLXVI.

ON THE WING

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 5, 2020 Wednesday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1ELength: 799 wordsByline: VAL CUNNINGHAM, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Opening up to new faces of birders // Getting underserved communities outdoors is a matter of making them feel safe.Body

As a woman bird-watcher, I've occasionally found myself in places where I didn't feel comfortable when out birding alone. It might be because the spot is remote and no one's around, or it could be that too many people are sharing the space.

But I've come to realize that people of color feel this way nearly all the time when they're out in nature. A park or natural area that to me is an escape from everyday stresses can feel unsafe, even threatening, to a Black, brown or LGBTQ person.

These kinds of concerns were amplified recently by a now-famous video, showing an encounter between a white woman walking her dog in New York's Central Park and a Black bird-watcher. She called the police to falsely claim that an African American man was threatening her, essentially "weaponizing" his skin color. In a horrific coincidence, this occurred on the very same day in May that George Floyd was killed by police in Minneapolis.

These events have led to intense discussions in the birding community, focusing on how to make the outdoors more welcoming and safer for other-than-white people.

Because, let's face it, bird-watching has been a predominantly white activity, and organizations dedicated to birds and nature are also overwhelmingly white. Nature and outdoors organizations have bemoaned the lack of diversity in their membership for a very long time, but not much has happened to move the needle on this issue.

'No go' places

But maybe the moment has arrived to start really working for change, so people of color see other people who look like them doing what they like to do.

ON THE WING

Black and other communities are now speaking up about their reality of being outdoors. The issues emerged pointedly in a recent series of podcasts featuring some of the young scientists and bird-watchers who created Black Birders Week in June in the wake of the Central Park incident and George Floyd's death.

Christian Cooper was the Black Central Park birder who encountered the toxic dog walker. During the podcast he noted, "There are so many places where we are vulnerable and perhaps feel unwelcome. There are so many swaths of this country where I won't go, as a Black, gay man."

Many on the panel agreed, noting that as graduate students in biology and other sciences, they'd had the experience of being outdoors, conducting field research, only to be challenged by police, questioning what they're doing.

As Corina Newsome, a graduate student in ornithology at Georgia Southern University, noted, "Outdoors is not a neutral place" to Blacks.

And a Black naturalist and educator told the panel that when he's outside, he makes sure his binoculars are visible so it doesn't look as if he's "up to no good."

White people simply don't have to deal with these kinds of issues when we head out the door. We need to recognize the chasm that lies between others' experiences and our own.

Equity and inclusion

Which brings us to the Urban Bird Collective, founded by St. Paul's Monica Bryand, a dedicated bird photographer and St. Paul Audubon member. For some years, she'd been posting bird photos on her Facebook page and kept hearing from people who wanted to watch birds but didn't feel comfortable outdoors.

"So I came up with the idea of training the trainers, people who would then take people of color and the LGBTQ community out birding, to help make the outdoors feel like a safe place," she says. Now in its third year, the collective has 20 active members and a steady following on its Facebook page. Using a grant provided by the Minnesota Ornithologists' Union, members have taken field trips locally and to birding hot spots like Duluth's Sax-Zim Bog and Hawk Ridge.

Bryand, who's a committee chair for St. Paul Audubon, and whose day job is co-executive director of Voices for Racial Justice, prefers to talk about equity and inclusion, as opposed to diversity. This is exactly the point made by the organizers of Black Birders Week - it's not about helping existing organizations to diversify their membership. Instead, it's about getting people out into nature and helping them feel comfortable there.

Like nearly everything in these COVID-19 days, much of the collective's work has moved online, but the group's dedication and camaraderie haven't diminished. And it's efforts like theirs that are starting to make the outdoors a safe place for us all.

As Urban Bird Collective member Loreen Ann Lee put it, "Like the Baltimore oriole who carefully weaves the fine fibers of its nest to cradle the young, let us intentionally weave new spaces where we hold each other with care, empathy and understanding."

ON THE WING

St. Paul resident Val Cunningham, who volunteers with the St. Paul Audubon Society and writes about nature for local, regional and national newspapers and magazines, can be reached at valwrites@comcast.net

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDLXVII.

DEED AWARDS GRANTS TO MALLS HOUSING ETHNIC-MINORITY OWNED BUSINESSES

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

August 5, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 439 words

Byline: Iain Carlos

Body

Finally some relief: The Minnesota Department of Employment and Economic Development announced Wednesday that it's awarding grants totaling $2.5 million to 12 Twin Cities malls housing ethnic minority-owned businesses.

The capital injection stems from the Minnesota Cultural Mall Operator Grants program, which is part of the $62.5 million Small Business Relief Grants package that was passed by the Minnesota Legislature during the 2020 first Special Session and signed into law by Gov. Tim Walz.

The grants range from $110,000 to $250,000, and will shore up the 12 malls' combined 1,150 tenant businesses.

The grants will likely be a massive boon for the malls, all of which have had to navigate the complexities of Covid-19, and some of them suffered riot damage after the police killing of George Floyd.

DEED awards grants to malls housing ethnic-minority owned businesses

"The Covid-19 pandemic has created undue hardships for small business owners," said DEED Commissioner Steve Grove in a statement. "These grants will provide much needed help to many of Minnesota's cultural malls, which are economic, cultural and civic cornerstones of their communities."

The awarded malls are:

- 24 Mall LLC/Village Market, Minneapolis: $250,000
- Al Karama Mall, Minneapolis: $187,500
- Global Center, LLC, St. Cloud: $110,000
- Hmong Village Shopping Center, St. Paul: $250,000
- Hmongtown Market Place, St. Paul: $250,000
- JigJiga Business Center/Plaza Verde, Minneapolis: $117,500
- Karmel Mall, Minneapolis: $250,000
- Madina Management Group, Minneapolis: $177,500
- Mercado Central, Minneapolis, $250,000
- Midtown Global Market, Minneapolis, $250,000
- Plaza Mexico, Minneapolis, $250,000
- Riverside Mall Inc., Minneapolis, $157,500

The grants will be administered by "qualified local and regionally based nonprofit organizations," according to DEED. The malls must use the allotted money to make subgrants to their tenant businesses - who in turn have to use 50% of their subgrants to pay rent to the mall.

To have qualified for a grant, the applying mall must:

- Be an operator of a privately owned, permanent indoor retail space and food market located in Minnesota.
- Be a facility that leases space to 25 or more tenants.
- Be a facility in which 50% or more of the tenants have fewer than 20 employees.
- Be a facility in which 50% or more of tenant businesses are majority owned by one or more individuals who identify as one or more of the following racial or ethnic categories: Black, African American, Asian or Pacific Islanders, Hispanic, Latinx, American Indian, Alaska Native, or other racial or ethnic minority.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: August 6, 2020

Minnesota tax law is blocking efforts to clear rubble from riot-damaged businesses

ARTICLE MCDLXVIII.

MINNESOTA TAX LAW IS BLOCKING EFFORTS TO CLEAR RUBBLE FROM RIOT-DAMAGED BUSINESSES

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

August 5, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 251 words

Byline: Mark Reilly

Body

Some Twin Cities business owners and landlords looking to clear the rubble from buildings burned during the recent civil unrest that they can't get demolition permits until property taxes on the destroyed buildings are paid up.

KSTP reports on the issue, the latest challenge facing businesses as they try to recover from widespread arson and looting in late May and early June. Nearly 1,500 businesses were heavily damaged in the riots, which spun out of protests following the death of George Floyd.

Minneapolis officials say that about 20 buildings have been torn down already, but they blame a state law that requires property taxes to be "fully paid" before clearing land.

That's been a problem for some businesses, who even before the riots were coping with a loss of revenue due to the Covid-19 pandemic.

Minnesota tax law is blocking efforts to clear rubble from riot-damaged businesses

Ruhel Islam, owner of Gandhi Mahal Restaurant, said he owes about $15,000 in taxes and has always paid them before - but has no cash flow to pay them this year, so his burned-out restaurant is still there. "It's been over two months and we are still able to see broken stuff here. It's painful, very painful," he said.

Minneapolis City Council member Andrew Johnson said that the problem could have been fixed by the state Legislature, which considered an amendment to the tax law as part of the state bonding bill. But the bonding bill failed to pass in two special sessions this summer.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

End of Document

SBA announces loans of up to $2M for damages from Floyd unrest

ARTICLE MCDLXIX.

SBA ANNOUNCES LOANS OF UP TO $2M FOR DAMAGES FROM FLOYD UNREST

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

August 5, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 360 words

Byline: Carrigan Miller

Body

The U.S. Small Business Administration has approved the issuance of disaster loans of up to $2 million to help Minnesotans recover from the civil unrest prompted George Floyd's killing by a Minneapolis police officer two months ago, the agency announced Wednesday.

Businesses and nonprofits can borrow up to $2 million to rebuild or replace real estate, equipment or inventory; they can also use the loan to relocate, the SBA said in a statement released Wednesday. Homeowners, meanwhile, can borrow up to $200,000 to repair their homes and up to $40,000 to repair or replace their belongings. There's no ceiling on the total amount of money that can be loaned to Minnesotans; the deadline to apply for a loan is Oct. 2.

Related: Click here to apply for an SBA disaster loan.

"The SBA is strongly committed to providing the people of Minnesota with the most effective and customer-focused response possible to assist businesses of all sizes, homeowners and renters with federal disaster loans. Getting businesses and communities up and running after a disaster is our highest priority," said SBA Administrator Jovita Carranza in the statement.

SBA announces loans of up to $2M for damages from Floyd unrest

The office of Governor Tim Walz announced Monday that it had asked the SBA for a disaster declaration so it could have access to the loans.

Minneapolis experienced a combination of protesting, looting and arson in the wake of Floyd's killing; the looting and arson caused an estimated $500 million worth of damages, and more than 1,500 businesses were damaged. Walz made a similar request to the Federal Emergency Management Agency in June but was denied.

The disaster declaration is for the seven-county metro area as well as Sherburne County, the SBA said. Chicago, Los Angeles and San Diego have all also received disaster declarations due to civil unrest related to Floyd's killing.

Interest rates are as low as 3% for businesses, 2.75% for non-profits and 1.25% for homeowners. The loans have terms as long as 30 years, though if business owners have credit elsewhere, their term can't exceed seven years.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: August 5, 2020

Want to support a black-owned restaurant? Here are St. Paul options.

ARTICLE MCDLXX.

WANT TO SUPPORT A BLACK-OWNED RESTAURANT? HERE ARE ST. PAUL OPTIONS.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 5, 2020 Wednesday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1304 words

Byline: Jess Fleming

Highlight: There aren't enough Black-owned or Black-helmed restaurants, but you'll find some.

Body

It really feels like Charles Carter was backed by divine providence.

The timing of the opening of his new restaurant, Taste of Rondo Bar & Grill, could not have been more meaningful, given the backdrop of unrest still lingering after the death of George Floyd.

Carter and his business partner Josh Howell purchased the building, the former Attucks-Brooks American Legion Post 606, in 2012. It had been the only African American legion in the city.

After trying to run it as a private club for a few years, Carter said he "would toss and turn at night" trying to figure out the best way to preserve the heritage of the building, which had long been a neighborhood gathering spot, albeit one with some drama in its past.

"This was one of the only businesses left standing when Rondo was destroyed," Carter said, talking about the construction of I-94 that went directly through the city's most prominent Black neighborhood in the 1950s and '60s.

Ultimately, the community-minded, financially savvy Carter, whose other job is working for St. Paul Catholic Cemeteries, decided the best use of the building would be a restaurant.

"I've never been a chef, but I've always loved to cook," he said.

And though he's not at the helm of the restaurant's kitchen, he's had a big influence on the elevated soul-food staples the restaurant is serving, like catfish, served blackened or fried, shrimp and grits, fried chicken, shrimp etouffee and even corn bread made from house-ground cornmeal.

Carter said the restaurant has been slammed since it opened, mostly filled with community members who are elated that the building is back in operation.

"I had a guy come in and say he wanted to cry, he was so happy we saved this building," he said. "This is like the heartbeat of Rondo. They never want to see it go away. That's the feedback I've been getting."

Want to support a black-owned restaurant? Here are St. Paul options.

There aren't nearly enough Black-owned or Black-helmed restaurants in St. Paul, but if you're interested in putting some of your hard-earned money in the hands of Black entrepreneurs, here are some of our favorite eateries that boast Black chefs and owners at the top.

Since it's so new, I've only sampled a few dishes, but everything we had, including the catfish, wings and etouffee, was worth returning for. I'm especially excited to give that cornbread a try. There's also a small patio if you prefer eating outdoors.

976 Concordia Ave., St. Paul; 651-348-2615; tasteofrondostp.com

This contemporary Jamaican restaurant's location in Keg and Case is currently closed, but the food truck is parked outside on the temporarily expanded patio (aka parking lot). Co-owner Tomme Beevas pays homage to his Jamaican heritage with jerk pork and chicken and curried dishes, served bowl-style with plantains and coconut rice and beans. Everything here is headily spiced and super delicious. The Minneapolis Eat Street location is also open for takeout.

902 W. 7th St., St. Paul or 2524 Nicollet Ave., Minneapolis; pimentokitchen.com

Honestly, I crave the vegetarian platter at this Ethiopian restaurant more than any other vegetarian dish in the cities. The stewed meats are delicious, too, but there's nothing better than scooping up little bits of lentils, greens or other vegetables with spongy, tangy injera bread. The restaurant has been run by Ethiopian immigrants since 2001 and is still going strong. They offer takeout in addition to indoor seating at the required reduced capacity.

510 N. Snelling Ave., St. Paul; 651-646-4747

Somali and other African favorites are on the menu at this bright, happy counter-service spot that has expanded since opening in St. Paul in 2015. Owner Abdirahman Kahin is not only a savvy businessman, but also a community-minded activist who has served 100,000 meals to people in need since the pandemic began. We are huge fans of the entire menu, but especially the chicken fantastic, a creamy, spiced curry-like dish served over rice, and the chapati wraps, which are best described as an African version of a burrito. The 7th Place and Stadium Village restaurants are open for indoor seating and takeout, but the skyway locations (Minneapolis and St. Paul) are both temporarily closed.

5 W. 7th Place, St. Paul; 651-888-2168; afrodeli.com

I hadn't heard of this tiny New-York-style pizzeria until recently, even though it opened in early 2019. When I finally got around to trying it out, I made my pizza order on the fly. That was possibly a mistake, as I ended up with two extra large pies, which are really, really extra large. In fact, my family was eating leftover pizza for most of a week. On the upside, these chewy-crust, loaded-with-cheese-and-toppings pizzas are so good that there was no complaining. Owner Tommie Daye and his family churn out these craveable pizzas themselves, so when it gets busy, which it has been recently, expect a wait, but know it'll be worth it.

1556 Selby Ave., St. Paul; 651-432-4743; tommiesspizza.com

I'd been meaning to drop by this cute little grocery and deli for quite some time, but then the pandemic hit, and everything was turned on its head. Now that I've given it a shot, I'm totally kicking myself for taking so long. African dishes like chooza chicken and suqaar steak are packed with flavor and served with some of the most addicting and gorgeous rice pilaf I've ever eaten, but the dish I'm still dreaming about is the wild veggie, a lush, greens-based curry of sorts that could 100 percent convince this meat-lover to convert to vegetarianism. On the other hand, Karibu also makes some American classics, and if you're a Philly steak sandwich lover, don't sleep on theirs.

Want to support a black-owned restaurant? Here are St. Paul options.

719 Payne Ave., St. Paul; 651-414-0799; karibu-grocery-deli.business.site

In some ways, chef Justin Sutherland has become the face of Black chefs in the Twin Cities, mostly because of his successful run on Bravo's "Top Chef." But look past his celebrity status and you'll find a guy who just really wants to feed you and knows how to do it well. The Handsome Hog is his first restaurant and the one that will likely stick around after the others have come and gone. Its new space on Cathedral Hill is gorgeous, especially the expansive, sparkly new patio, and the soul-food-based menu is top-notch from top to bottom. New items since the move include woodfire clams that might be my favorite clams ever, and pizzas loaded with Southern touches like brisket and jambalaya. If you want to eat there, plan ahead, because reservations are definitely a hot ticket right now.

173 Western Ave., St. Paul; 651-219-4012; handsomehog.com

This cute food truck, which serves Nashville chicken tenders and sandwiches, is the darling of local street food right now. On the night we visited, there was a constant line of at least 10 parties waiting to order, and it was parked outside a St. Paul brewery that is only offering takeout crowsers at the moment! A few people even drove across the river after the Minneapolis truck had sold out. Is it worth the hype? Heck yes, these spicy, crispy-outside, tender-inside sandwiches are up there with some of the best in town. Check the truck's social media pages for schedules - there is generally a St. Paul and a Minneapolis truck running every week.

Nashvillecoop.com

While chef Torrance Beavers is not an owner of this East Side establishment, he does have full creative run of the kitchen and huge admirers in owners Thomas and Molly LaFleche. Beavers has introduced St. Paul diners to flash-fried collard greens, which are bright green and so tasty, in his hoppin' john salad, and puts out a pub-food menu that is miles above average. Honestly, even the ham and cheese sandwich is amazing.

956 Payne Ave., St. Paul; 651-447-2483; brunsonspub.com

You ask, we answer: Special occasion eats in a pandemic, Lowertown patios and more New Twin Cities restaurant patios and outdoor dining hubs to get excited about

Graphic

Charles Carter, founder/owner of Taste of Rondo Bar & Grill in St. Paul. Photographed July 15, 2020. (Nancy Ngo /Pioneer Press)

Shrimp Etouffee at Taste of Rondo Bar & Grill in St. Paul, July 15, 2020. (Nancy Ngo /Pioneer Press)

Want to support a black-owned restaurant? Here are St. Paul options.

Tomme Beevas, co-founder and chief strategic officer of Pimento Jamaican Kitchen, July 11, 2019. (Nancy Ngo / Pioneer Press)

The vegetarian platter at Fasika in St. Paul. (Pioneer Press: Jessica Fleming)

Abdirahman Kahin, owner of the Afro Deli & Grill on East Seventh Place Mall in downtown St. Paul, July 16, 2015. (Pioneer Press: Scott Takushi)

Pizza from Tommie's Pizza on Selby Avenue in St. Paul, pictured in July 2020. (Jess Fleming / Pioneer Press)

Ribs and other menu items at The Handsome Hog on Selby Avenue in St. Paul, June 2020. (Jess Fleming / Pioneer Press)

The Nashville Coop food truck, pictured in July 2020. (Jess Fleming / Pioneer Press)

Brunson's Pub chef Torrance Beavers.(Nancy Ngo / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Lawyer for ex-officer says he only did crowd control during George Floyd's arrest

ARTICLE MCDLXXI.

LAWYER FOR EX-OFFICER SAYS HE ONLY DID CROWD CONTROL DURING GEORGE FLOYD'S ARREST

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 6, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 381 words

Byline: The Associated Press

Highlight: An attorney for one of the four former Minneapolis police officers charged in the death of George Floyd argues his client only handled crowd control. Defense attorney Robert Paule filed a memo Wednesday supporting his earlier motion to dismiss charges against Tou Thao for lack of probable cause. The memo said Thao had his back [...]

Body

An attorney for one of the four former Minneapolis police officers charged in the death of George Floyd argues his client only handled crowd control.

Defense attorney Robert Paule filed a memo Wednesday supporting his earlier motion to dismiss charges against Tou Thao for lack of probable cause. The memo said Thao had his back to what was going on as Officer Derek Chauvin, who is white, pressed his knee to the neck of Floyd, a handcuffed Black man. Chauvin pressed his knee to Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes on May 25 even after Floyd pleaded for air.

According to the memo, Thao offered a hobble restraint to the other three officers, but they refused it. The memo also argues Chauvin was using a non-deadly, Minneapolis Police Department-approved neck restraint, and that Thao and the other three officers "had been repeatedly trained to use neck restraints."

After the other officers refused his offer of a hobble restraint, Thao "immediately turned his attention to crowd control" and kept his back to Floyd and the other officers for the majority of the remainder of the arrest, the memo said.

"When Officer Thao turned his back to Mr. Floyd and the three other officers for the last time, Mr. Floyd was still alive and breathing," the memo said. "Officer Thao did nothing to aid in the commission of a crime."

Thao never placed his hands on Floyd, according to the memo, and asked about the status of an ambulance, radioing police dispatch to hurry up the response.

An attorney for another former officer, Thomas Lane, also plans to argue that charges against his client should be dismissed.

Lawyer for ex-officer says he only did crowd control during George Floyd's arrest

Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and manslaughter. Thao, Lane and another officer, J. Kueng, are charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and manslaughter. All four officers were fired.

Their next court hearing is scheduled for Sept. 11. Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Graphic

Former Minneapolis police officers Derek Chauvin, center, Tou Thao, right, Thomas Lane, top left, and J Alexander Kueng, lower left.

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Attorney for fired Minneapolis officer says Freeman should be removed from George Floyd case

ARTICLE MCDLXXII.

ATTORNEY FOR FIRED MINNEAPOLIS OFFICER SAYS FREEMAN SHOULD BE REMOVED FROM GEORGE FLOYD CASE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 6, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 366 words

Byline: The Associated Press

Highlight: An attorney for a fired Minneapolis police officer charged in the death of George Floyd wants the local prosecutor dropped from the case. The attorney for former Officer J. Kueng filed a motion Thursday arguing that Hennepin County Attorney Mike Freeman, the county's top prosecutor, has "compromised his ethics" and ability "to impartially prosecute" the [...]

Body

An attorney for a fired Minneapolis police officer charged in the death of George Floyd wants the local prosecutor dropped from the case.

The attorney for former Officer J. Kueng filed a motion Thursday arguing that Hennepin County Attorney Mike Freeman, the county's top prosecutor, has "compromised his ethics" and ability "to impartially prosecute" the case.

Kueng is one of four officers charged in the May 25 death of Floyd, a handcuffed Black man who died after Officer Derek Chauvin, who is white, pressed his knee against Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes even as Floyd pleaded for air. Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and manslaughter. Kueng and two other officers, Thomas Lane and Tou Thao, are charged with aiding and abetting. All four were fired.

In his motion, defense attorney Thomas Plunkett said Freeman has called Floyd's death a "senseless death" and that Freeman said a bystander's video of the incident "is graphic, and horrible and terrible, and no person should do that."

"Mr. Freeman's comments leave no doubt that justice is not his objective in the Kueng prosecution," Plunkett wrote. "He has abdicated his duties as a prosecutor and must be removed from the case."

Plunkett also accused Freeman's office of leaking information about potential plea negotiations. "(The Hennepin County Attorney's Office) knew the leaked plea negotiations would be widely reported and have a significant impact on the local community, potential jurors, and the nation," Plunkett wrote.

A spokeswoman for Freeman's office told The Associated Press that his office is not commenting on the case. Minnesota Attorney General Keith Ellison's office is the lead prosecutor in the case.

Attorney for fired Minneapolis officer says Freeman should be removed from George Floyd case

The next court hearing for the four former officers is scheduled for Sept. 11.

Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Graphic

This combination of photos provided by the Hennepin County Sheriff's Office in Minnesota on Wednesday, June 3, 2020, shows Derek Chauvin, from left, J. Alexander Kueng, Thomas Lane and Tou Thao. Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder of George Floyd, a black man who died after being restrained by him and the other Minneapolis police officers on May 25. Kueng, Lane and Thao have been charged with aiding and abetting Chauvin. (Hennepin County Sheriff's Office via AP)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MCDLXXIII.

MINNEAPOLIS CHARTER COMMISSION BLOCKS EFFORT TO REPLACE POLICE DEPARTMENT

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

August 6, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 393 wordsByline: Mark ReillyBody

A measure to replace the Minneapolis Police Department will not be on voter ballots this November, the Minneapolis Charter Commission ruled Wednesday, effectively killing a push to do away with the department - at least this year.

Minnesota Public Radio has a report on the 10-5 vote to delay a decision on a proposed change to the city charter that would replace the Police Department with a "Department of Community Safety & Violence" - though there were few details on how such a new agency might work. Commissioners said they needed another 90 days to study the proposal from the City Council, which means there won't be enough time to get the measure on the ballot.

The proposal had been passed by City Council members who pledged to "dismantle the police" in the wake of the death of George Floyd in police custody. Four police officers have been charged in the death, which triggered waves of protest that spiraled into widespread riots that destroyed or damaged roughly 1,500 businesses and buildings.

Minneapolis Charter Commission blocks effort to replace Police Department

The City Council's vote was lopsided enough to be veto-proof, meaning the Charter Commission was the only hurdle standing between the measure and an Election Day showdown.

The issue thrust the little-known group of volunteer commissioners into the national spotlight; The Wall Street Journal also had a story on the vote, talking with Chairman Barry Clegg, who said, "I don't think [the measure has] gotten enough discussion or input including from the communities it was designed to protect."

City Council members and some community activists bashed the decision. The Star Tribune reports that Sophia Benrud, an organizer with the Black Visions Collective, said in a statement that, "People in Minneapolis have been in the streets for months demanding change."

But support for replacing the Police Department is far from universal. Business groups warned that the measure was driving employers to consider moving out of city, and some community activists said that the discussion was ignoring input from the neighborhoods most victimized by crime.

The measure could come up again next year, of course. And City Council Member Steve Fletcher told the Star Tribune the Council could try and create the "Community Safety" department on its own.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: August 6, 2020

ARTICLE MCDLXXIV.

PROPOSAL TO DISBAND MINNEAPOLIS POLICE BLOCKED FROM BALLOT

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 6, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1048 wordsByline: Amy ForlitiHighlight: MINNEAPOLIS (AP) - A Minneapolis commission decided Wednesday to take more time to review a City Council amendment to dismantle the Police Department in the wake of George Floyd's death, ending the possibility of voters deciding the issue in November.Body

A Minneapolis commission decided Wednesday to take more time to review a City Council amendment to dismantle the Police Department in the wake of George Floyd's death, ending the possibility of voters deciding the issue in November.

Members of the Charter Commission expressed concern that the process to change the city's charter was being rushed after Floyd died following an encounter with police. While several commissioners said changing the Police Department was necessary, they said the amendment before them was flawed. Several said it faced legal barriers, was created without input from key community members who oppose it, and that it gave too much power to the City Council.

"It's appropriate to explore transformational changes in the department, but it needs to be done thoughtfully," said Commissioner Peter Ginder, who voted in favor of taking more time. "That hasn't been done here."

The five City Council members who authored the proposed charter amendment released a statement criticizing the decision, but said they will continue to work toward transforming the way the city provides public safety. They said they plan to put an amendment before voters in November 2021.

"It is not our legacy to use bureaucratic processes to circumvent the people in an attempt to 'protect' voters from themselves," said Council Member Jeremiah Ellison. "That is not democracy. In a democracy, the people decide. But I guess today the Charter Commission decided otherwise."

The proposed amendment followed widespread criticism of law enforcement over Floyd's death. It would have replaced the Police Department with a "Department of Community Safety and Violence Prevention" that backers said would take a more "holistic" approach, which wasn't fully defined. The proposal did allow for armed officers - creating a division of licensed peace officers, who would have answered to the new department's director.

Proposal to disband Minneapolis police blocked from ballot

"The council says 'Trust us. We'll figure it out after this is approved. Trust us.' Well I don't, and we shouldn't," said Barry Clegg, chairman of the Charter Commission. "Charter change is too important."

The 15-member commission, made up of volunteers appointed by a judge, voted 10-5 to take another 90 days to review the proposed amendment. Most of those who voted against taking the extra time said they would recommend rejecting the amendment.

But the issue would likely have gone to voters even if it was rejected because the City Council was required only to consult the commission and is not bound by their action. The lack of a final decision means the proposal won't clear deadlines to make the ballot this November, but it could be on the ballot in 2021.

"There is no democracy denied here. There is no denial of democratic rights. It's a question of when, not if," Commissioner Gregory Abbott said. "We can fix this. We can get police reform. We just need to find a different avenue to do it in."

A similar move by the commission effectively ended a proposed charter change in 2018 that would have given the City Council more control over the department.

Mel Reeves, a longtime community activist, said he was not surprised by the commission's decision. He saw it as a delay tactic.

"We talk about living in a democracy, but if you really want to be democratic, sometimes it's damn near impossible. If people really want to do something, there are all kinds of mechanisms to keep them from doing it," he said.

The process has unfolded during a violent summer in Minneapolis after Floyd's death, with shootings dramatically higher than last year. Many residents are worried about a proposal to "abolish" police officers.

Some City Council members promised a robust process to get public input on how a new department would look and work. Council member Steve Fletcher, one of the proposal's authors, said before the commission's vote that the city would continue to move ahead with the community engagement process.

Floyd, a Black man who was handcuffed, died May 25 after Derek Chauvin, who is white, pressed his knee against Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes, as Floyd said he couldn't breathe. Chauvin was charged with second-degree murder and other counts, and three other officers at the scene were charged with aiding and abetting. All four officers were fired, and Floyd's death sparked protests in Minneapolis and around the world.

Mayor Jacob Frey, who was opposed to abolishing the department, and Chief Medaria Arradondo have moved ahead with their own changes since Floyd's death, including requiring officers to document attempts to de-escalate situations whether or not force is used. They also have expanded requirements for reporting use-of-force incidents, ordering officers to provide more detail.

Arradondo also pulled the department out of negotiations for a union contract, saying he wanted a review designed to change the grievance and arbitration process.

According to draft language of the amendment, the new department would have had "responsibility for public safety services prioritizing a holistic, public health-oriented approach." The director of the new agency would have "non-law-enforcement experience in community safety services, including but not limited to public health and/or restorative justice approaches."

Proposal to disband Minneapolis police blocked from ballot

But the amendment included other provisions that some commissioners feared wouldn't be understood by voters.

Commissioner Toni Newborn, voted against additional review, expressing concern it would be seen as a delay tactic. But she said she did not support the amendment because it put the Police Department under City Council control.

Commissioner Andrew Kozak said many people who have fought for years for equality and racial justice have come forward to say the amendment wasn't ready, and that they were never consulted.

"They are the people most affected by police misconduct ... and I think I'm going to listen to them," he said. Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Local businesses damaged during George Floyd unrest can apply for disaster loans from SBA

ARTICLE MCDLXXV. LOCAL BUSINESSES DAMAGED DURING GEORGE FLOYD UNREST CAN APPLY FOR DISASTER LOANS FROM SBA

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 6, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 329 words

Byline: Nick Woltman

Highlight: Minnesota businesses that were damaged or destroyed during the unrest that followed the death of George Floyd can now apply for disaster assistance loans from the U.S. Small Business Administration. The nearly 1,500 Twin Cities businesses that were burned, looted or vandalized in late May and early June sustained damages estimated to exceed $500 million, [...]

Body

Minnesota businesses that were damaged or destroyed during the unrest that followed the death of George Floyd can now apply for disaster assistance loans from the U.S. Small Business Administration.

The nearly 1,500 Twin Cities businesses that were burned, looted or vandalized in late May and early June sustained damages estimated to exceed $500 million, according to a news release issued Wednesday by Gov. Tim Walz, who asked the SBA's Office of Disaster Assistance last month to make the funds available.

"These last few months, I have visited with business owners and community leaders to talk about the next steps in rebuilding. To them, rebuilding is about more than a store front - it's about maintaining the vibrancy and vitality of the community," Walz said in the news release. "I am grateful that our federal partners have stepped in to help. There is a lot of work ahead, and we must continue to commit the resources needed to rebuild together."

Business owners can apply for two different types of assistance from the SBA. The Economic Injury Disaster Loan program provides working capital loans of up to $2 million to offset lost revenue, while the Business Physical Disaster Loan program provides up to $2 million to help property owners repair or replace damaged and destroyed real estate, machinery, equipment, inventory and other assets.

Eligible business owners in Hennepin, Anoka, Carver, Dakota, Ramsey, Scott, Sherburne and Wright counties can apply for these loans on the SBA's website.

Walz's request earlier last month for a federal major disaster declaration was denied, but his administration is appealing that decision.

Trump's end run around Congress raises questions Business People: Sunday, Aug. 9 Minnesota cities, counties scramble to keep businesses afloat by dishing out CARES Act grants As shops struggle with

Local businesses damaged during George Floyd unrest can apply for disaster loans from SBA

coronavirus restrictions, White Bear Lake closes street to help Trump orders more unemployment pay, a payroll tax deferral

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

St. Paul police review commission seeks greater profile, additional funding

ARTICLE MCDLXXVI.

ST. PAUL POLICE REVIEW COMMISSION SEEKS GREATER PROFILE, ADDITIONAL FUNDING

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 6, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 956 words

Byline: Mara H. Gottfried

Highlight: A commission of St. Paul residents that reviews misconduct complaints about police officers is an ongoing example of the national conversation about police-community relations, a St. Paul city council member said Wednesday. Yet, many people in St. Paul don't know what they can do if they have a problem with a police officer, said Julian [...]

Body

A commission of St. Paul residents that reviews misconduct complaints about police officers is an ongoing example of the national conversation about police-community relations, a St. Paul city council member said Wednesday.

Yet, many people in St. Paul don't know what they can do if they have a problem with a police officer, said Julian Roby, coordinator of the Police Civilian Internal Affairs Review Commission.

Roby told city council members he believes the commission needs additional funding for operations and outreach.

"We want people to be aware that we exist," he said. "We need to be marketed to the people of this city, so they can know where to file complaints and that there is a process available to them."

City Council Member Jane Prince said Wednesday she wonders if there might also be funding opportunities through philanthropic organizations or possibly the U.S. Department of Justice.

The commission "is so much at the epicenter of what we are going through as a country in terms of police-community relations since George Floyd" died in Minneapolis police custody, Prince said.

The PCIARC's budget is $16,775, not including personnel costs. Valerie Jensen, director of the St. Paul Department of Human Rights and Equal Economic Opportunity, said she has a proposal in her budget for next year to increase commissioner stipends.

The $50 monthly stipend has been the same since the PCIARC was formed in 1993, but Prince said the hours that commissioners spend on their work is akin to a part-time job. There is 40 to 50 hours in training, and 15 to 20 hours a month reviewing case materials before deliberating about allegations against officers, according to Roby.

St. Paul police review commission seeks greater profile, additional funding

The PCIARC planned to release its 2019 annual report at an April community summit, but the event was postponed due to the coronavirus pandemic; it will be held virtually in late summer or early fall. Roby gave the first glimpse of data from the report to council members Wednesday.

The Police Civilian Internal Affairs Review Commission received allegations about 72 officers last year, compared with 70 officers in 2018.

A complaint can have multiple allegations - such as improper procedure and poor public relations - and the commission sustained 24 percent of 88 total allegations.

Shooting near Mears Park injures 1 Sunday night North St. Paul man killed in crash after fleeing Dakota County sheriff's deputy Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Cleric assaulted outside Bloomington mosque; police searching for suspects U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities There were 77 total allegations in 2018 and the commission upheld nearly 25 percent of the allegations. The commission sustained 14 percent of allegations in 2017 and 20 percent in 2016.

2017 marked the first year the PCIARC began operating in a reorganized form.

The city council voted in 2016 to remove two officer seats from the commission, leaving it all civilian-run. The council also made the commission more independent by moving it out of the police department to the city's Human Rights department.

Sixty percent of the complaints reviewed last year were about improper procedure and 3 percent about excessive force.

In nearly 70 percent of all the allegations, commissioners did not find facts to back up the claims or they said there was insufficient evidence.

In the 24 percent of sustained cases last year, the discipline they recommended most often (38 percent of the time) was termination, followed by a recommendation for an oral reprimand (29 percent of the time).

A final decision about discipline falls to the police chief. Information about how often the chief went along with the PCIARC'S recommendations or modified discipline is in the 2019 annual report, which was not available Thursday.

The St. Paul & Minnesota Foundation awarded the PCIARC a grant last fall for community connectedness - they plan to use the funds for a youth roundtable and a separate summit for people whose primary language is not English. Roby said they're finding people in those communities don't know how they can file complaints about police officers.

Roby said he doesn't want to see an increase in complaints "because we don't want people to have negative encounters with police officers, but we would like to see an accurate account of what's actually going on."

In 2018 and 2019, there were no complaints filed by youth and Roby said, based on national trends and community outreach, "we know that's just not possible."

The nine-member commission has two openings. This time a year ago, there were four openings - the chair and vice chair stepped down in June 2019 because they said they had "repeatedly seen evidence"

St. Paul police review commission seeks greater profile, additional funding that Mayor Melvin Carter and his staff were not serious about supporting their work. At the time, Carter said their service would "undoubtedly help inform our work moving forward."

The open spots were filled and now there are vacancies because one commissioner moved out of St. Paul, and the other's term just came to an end and the person didn't reapply, Roby said.

Prince said she's heard concern that geographic representation on the board could be better - four of the seven members live in Ward 4.

People can find out more about the PCIARC, including how to apply to be a commissioner, at bit.ly/PCIARCinfo. Shooting near Mears Park injures 1 Sunday night Bear spotted near University of St. Thomas in St. Paul Minnesota cities, counties scramble to keep businesses afloat by dishing out CARES Act grants New Mitchell Hamline School of Law Dean Anthony Niedwiecki on gay rights, COVID-19 and the 'Trump bump' U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities

Graphic

Julian Roby (Courtesy of the City of St. Paul)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Destroyed Gandhi Mahal restaurant will move to Chef Shack Ranch site

ARTICLE MCDLXXVII.

DESTROYED GANDHI MAHAL RESTAURANT WILL MOVE TO CHEF SHACK RANCH SITE

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

August 6, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 189 words

Byline: Mark Reilly

Body

Gandhi Mahal, one of the many businesses destroyed in the riots that followed George Floyd's death, will move to a temporary location while reconstruction efforts continue.

The Indian restaurant announced on Facebook that it will move to the site of the former Chef Shack Ranch in the Seward neighborhood.

Gandhi Mahal had been located at 3009 27th Ave. S., just a block from the doomed Third Precinct building, and was destroyed by fire on May 28 as riots flared across the Twin Cities. The Star Tribune reported on the destruction, including the reaction from Owner Ruhel Islam, who said at the time, "Let my building burn, justice needs to be served."

Islam's efforts to reopen at the original site have been stymied by a state law that forbids cleaning rubble from buildings that still owe property taxes. That's been a problem for restaurants, which even before the riots had been suffering big hits to revenue from the Covid-19 pandemic and the state's effort to slow the disease.

Destroyed Gandhi Mahal restaurant will move to Chef Shack Ranch site

Chef Shack Ranch closed in early 2019.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: August 6, 2020

End of Document

National ATF team joins investigation into blaze at downtown St. Paul hotel under construction

ARTICLE MCDLXXVIII. NATIONAL ATF TEAM JOINS INVESTIGATION INTO BLAZE AT DOWNTOWN ST. PAUL HOTEL UNDER CONSTRUCTION

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 6, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 530 words

Byline: Mara H. Gottfried

Highlight: A federal team of investigators on Thursday joined the probe into a major fire at a downtown St. Paul hotel that was under construction. The St. Paul fire department and Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives' St. Paul office requested the assistance of the ATF's National Response Team. They arrived Thursday with 20 members, [...]

Body

A federal team of investigators on Thursday joined the probe into a major fire at a downtown St. Paul hotel that was under construction.

The St. Paul fire department and Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives' St. Paul office requested the assistance of the ATF's National Response Team. They arrived Thursday with 20 members, according to Ashlee Sherrill, spokeswoman for the ATF's St. Paul Field Division.

Does their presence indicate a criminal investigation?

"Not necessarily," Sherrill said. The National Response Team is used for large-scale investigations, and they were requested "based on the size of the building, amount of fire damage and number of investigative leads," according to ATF Special Agent in Charge Terry Henderson of the St. Paul Field Division.

On Tuesday, firefighters responded about 4:20 a.m. to the $68 million Seven Corners Gateway development project, which includes a hotel and apartments, across from the Xcel Energy Center. The five-story Courtyard by Marriott Hotel, which was under construction since the fall, was ablaze and most of it collapsed. There were 86 members of the St. Paul fire department at the scene, of which 78 were firefighters.

The investigation process is extensive, said St. Paul Deputy Fire Chief Roy Mokosso.

"We are going to have to review hours of video, take numerous witness statements and delayer the collapse area in an effort to determine cause and origin of the fire," he said.

Henderson said the extra personnel from the ATF will help move the investigation along more quickly.

National ATF team joins investigation into blaze at downtown St. Paul hotel under construction

"The National Response Team is a tremendous asset and brings a wealth of knowledge and resources to assist local police and fire departments in large-scale fire investigations," he said in a statement.

They'll be working with the St. Paul fire and police departments, and the Minnesota State Fire Marshal Division.

The apartment complex that was under construction sustained minimal damage, if any, said Carl Kaeding, president of the Bloomington-based Kaeding Development Group. Structural engineers will be running a battery of tests on the building.

Kaeding said they plan to rebuild the hotel. He said officials haven't given them an indication of what caused the fire, but "it looks like they're going to throw a lot of manpower to get to the bottom of it."

The call-out of the ATF's National Response Team is the fifth in Minnesota this year. They assisted in more than 150 arson investigations in the Twin Cities after the unrest following George Floyd's death, along with the Press Bar and Parlor fire investigation in St. Cloud in January and an investigation of a February fire at a behavioral health clinic fire in Grand Rapids.

Before this year, the National Response Team had not been in Minnesota since 2004, according to the ATF. Shooting near Mears Park injures 1 Sunday night Bear spotted near University of St. Thomas in St. Paul Minnesota cities, counties scramble to keep businesses afloat by dishing out CARES Act grants New Mitchell Hamline School of Law Dean Anthony Niedwiecki on gay rights, COVID-19 and the 'Trump bump' U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Pamela K. Johnson: 55 summers have gone by since the Watts rebellion. How far have we traveled?

ARTICLE MCDLXXIX.

PAMELA K. JOHNSON: 55 SUMMERS HAVE GONE BY SINCE THE WATTS REBELLION. HOW FAR HAVE WE TRAVELED?

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 6, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 956 words

Byline: Pamela K. Johnson

Highlight: LOS ANGELES - In the summer of 1965, my birthday cake was stuck at a bakery across town. My mother couldn't get to it because Watts was on fire, which sent surrounding cities, like ours in the South Bay, into lockdown. No way could she have known when she placed the order for my fifth [...]

Body

LOS ANGELES - In the summer of 1965, my birthday cake was stuck at a bakery across town. My mother couldn't get to it because Watts was on fire, which sent surrounding cities, like ours in the South Bay, into lockdown.

No way could she have known when she placed the order for my fifth birthday that a white highway patrol officer would soon pull over a young Black man for reckless driving and, in the ensuing chaos, arrest him, his brother and his mother. It was a sequence of events that played poorly in a community already bristling at overcrowded housing, low-wage jobs and routine incidents of police brutality.

In those six days of rebellion - which some might call a fed-up-rising - residents clashed not only with police but also the National Guard. In the end, 34 people lay dead, more than 1,000 had been injured, and tens of millions of dollars in property was gutted.

That smoke lingers, and the people periodically erupt in outrage, as when officers were acquitted in 1992 following the brutal beating of Rodney King, or when George Floyd died after a cop knelt on his neck for nearly nine minutes while he lay face down and handcuffed.

As the New York Times columnist Charles M. Blow wrote recently, "The lulls you experience between explosive revolts of the oppressed should never be mistaken as harmony. They should be taken as rest breaks."

In the summers of the 1960s and early 1970s, my family could only hope for the best when driving while Black from Los Angeles to New York every other year. We went to reconnect with our East Coast kin.

To guide us, my mother ordered TripTiks from the American Automobile Association, small, spiral-bound books that outlined the best path. My sense is that my parents asked for directions that expressly avoided the South, out of concern that we might get pulled over by racist highway patrolmen during the turbulent civil rights era.

Pamela K. Johnson: 55 summers have gone by since the Watts rebellion. How far have we traveled?

In a time before major interstate highways, we connected to Route 66 and kept it moving along two-lane highways dotted with bad diners and dimly lighted motels. To pass the time, my mother read my father and me novels, such as "The Grapes of Wrath." The AAA TripTiks highlighted points of interest along the way, such as Native communities or petroglyphs, but we flew by them all to make "good time."

Once we were safely in New York, our people descended on us in my grandmother's Harlem kitchen. Over the next couple of weeks, we visited family around the tri-state area and in New Castle, Del., and binged on a buffet of delights at Coney Island.

Only on the way back did we slow down to sightsee. We might cruise the pulse of Chicago's Michigan Avenue or down a two-laner through Davenport, Iowa, stalks of corn swaying as if to the tune of "for amber waves of grain."

We wound our way up the Black Hills of South Dakota to regard the 60-foot faces of George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Teddy Roosevelt and Abraham Lincoln blast-sculpted into granite. We strolled around charming Coeur d'Alene, Idaho, and heard the church bells peel at noon.

When we entered a restaurant, hotel or curio shop, I secretly watched to see how people received us as a Black family. I can't remember coming across anyone who was unwelcoming.

At the same time, these were the same years when a president, a presidential hopeful - John and Robert Kennedy - along with three civil rights leaders, Medgar Evers, Malcolm X and Martin Luther King, were assassinated.

The tranquil beauty of the United States passing by my window over those summers seemed out of sync with our country's history of violent bloodshed. I began to perceive the image of America as a glossy brochure for a house, where the best features are well-lighted and captured with a wide lens while flaws, such as lead water, termites and a roof about to cave, were cropped out.

Of all the places we toured, Mount Rushmore made the deepest impression. At the time, I was ignorant that it was built on stolen Indigenous land by a sculptor with ties to the Ku Klux Klan. I just remember gazing up at those carved faces, particularly Lincoln's, farthest to the right, and noting that the pinch in his brow barely hinted at the pressure he faced watching the U.S. become engulfed in a civil war over slavery.

Though Lincoln tried to warn us that a house divided against itself cannot stand, our country has yet to mend its cracked foundation. Too many continue to hold the American brochure aloft, while stubbornly refusing to address the pressing repairs needed to fix the racism, inequality and police brutality.

Recently, I heard an NPR interview with the Rev. Raphael Warnock, the pastor of Ebenezer Baptist, Martin Luther King Jr.'s old church in Atlanta. He said that the current moment is not about burning ourselves out trying to squash all racial hate.

"I just want to make sure that our city and our state and our country is not too busy to love," he said. "And justice is what love looks like in public."

Pamela K. Johnson: 55 summers have gone by since the Watts rebellion. How far have we traveled?

As the 55th anniversary of those fateful, fiery days in Watts approaches, there's no AAA TripTik we can follow to show us a way forward. But I think James Baldwin sagely pointed toward the North Star when he observed: "Not everything that is faced can be changed, but nothing can be changed until it is faced."

Pamela K. Johnson is a writer and filmmaker based in Los Angeles. She wrote this column for the Los Angeles Times.

Will Bunch: From 9/11 to Portland, it was inevitable 'Homeland Security' would be turned on the American people Leah Mirakhor: How James Baldwin spoke to immigrants like me Ross Marchand: No more billionaire bailouts Michael Bloomberg: Let's hire laid-off oil and gas workers to fight climate change Noah Smith: Focusing on Facebook and Google's monopoly misses the point

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Penumbra Theatre will become Penumbra Center for Racial Healing, adding community resources

ARTICLE MCDLXXX.

PENUMBRA THEATRE WILL BECOME PENUMBRA CENTER FOR RACIAL HEALING, ADDING COMMUNITY RESOURCES

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 6, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 701 words

Byline: Kathy Berdan

Highlight: St. Paul-based Penumbra Theatre announced Thursday morning that it is "evolving" into the Penumbra Center for Racial Healing. The United States' preeminent African-American theater will still perform works for the stage, but also is expanding its community and racial equity programs. Started in St. Paul's Rondo neighborhood more than four decades ago, Penumbra Center for [...]

Body

St. Paul-based Penumbra Theatre announced Thursday morning that it is "evolving" into the Penumbra Center for Racial Healing.

The United States' preeminent African-American theater will still perform works for the stage, but also is expanding its community and racial equity programs. Started in St. Paul's Rondo neighborhood more than four decades ago, Penumbra Center for Racial Healing will also add a wellness center.

"We've been slowly seeding elements of this plan over the past five years, so it's not a sharp turn for the organization," said Penumbra Artistic Director Sarah Bellamy.

"The community is badly in need of resourcing," Bellamy said. Penumbra wants to add the arts to other efforts to mend racial inequities and "chip away at the great disparities."

Bellamy said the shift goes back to 2012 when the board approved her succession to the founder of the theater, her father, Lou Bellamy. She began looking at ways to "make sure our organization remains vital and resourced."

"It's particularly important, as Lou's daughter, to want to see the legacy continue," Sarah Bellamy said. Penumbra Theatre is nationally recognized for its work with Black artists, including Pulitzer Prize-winning playwright August Wilson - a former St. Paul resident who was inspired to become a playwright by Penumbra company members and whose work was given its first professional production by the theater.

Public discussions, screenings, community meals and educational programming have increased at Penumbra under Sarah Bellamy's leadership.

Penumbra Theatre will become Penumbra Center for Racial Healing, adding community resources

Though plans for the theater's evolution have been in the works, the May 25 killing of George Floyd, which turned Minneapolis and St. Paul into "the epicenter of global violence," prompted the team to "step out faster," Bellamy said.

When the coronavirus pandemic shut down theaters in March, Penumbra staff had a chance to pursue more strategic planning, Bellamy said. In the next 12 to 18 months, organizers will start work on curriculum development, commissioning new artistic work and the infrastructure of the building.

The three key features of the plan:

- The arts: Penumbra will continue to stage works from the Black theater canon, Bellamy said, as well as commission new work. The season will include an annual repertory festival.
- Racial equity: Year-round work led by artists will include lectures, workshops, seminars and a leadership training institute. "The center will offer an opportunity to learn about and address the enduring disparities facing the black community, raising awareness and offering tangible strategies for solution," according to Penumbra's news release.
- Wellness: Holistic, culturally specific healing services including meditation, yoga, acupuncture and massage will be part of a program "to detoxify bodies from the stresses of living in a racially stratified society and reclaim health and wellness," Bellamy said.

Part of the Penumbra legacy is the theater's location in the Hallie Q. Brown Community Center, which has been at Kent Street and Selby Avenue since 1929. Bellamy wants the Center for Racial Healing to remain in proximity to the community.

Penumbra has begun a multi-million dollar fundraising initiative for the project and Bellamy said philanthropic partners that have racial equity at the core of their giving have expressed interest.

Over its 44 years, Penumbra has had its share of financial struggles, trimming plays and slashing budgets when fundraising and ticket sales couldn't cover expenses. The theater consistently rebounded, but Penumbra faced its most dire situation in the fall of 2012, when the theater suspended programming and laid off nearly half its staff. After a community fundraising effort that netted $360,000, the theater resumed work on a reduced budget.

Penumbra intends to add staff for the Center for Racial Healing. Northrop season has mix of live stream, online and live performances Minnesota Fringe is still wacky, irreverent, heartfelt and online Minnesota Jewish Theatre Company season opens with show at Harriet Island Park Square whodunit has clues and characters, online in four installments Theater couple creates a show to take on the road - or at least to the driveway

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

TCF Bank, U.S. Bank, Wells Fargo make plans to reopen branches damaged during unrest

ARTICLE MCDLXXXI. TCF BANK, U.S. BANK, WELLS FARGO MAKE PLANS TO REOPEN BRANCHES DAMAGED DURING UNREST

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

August 6, 2020 Thursday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 494 words

Byline: Patrick Rehkamp

Body

The riots that followed George Floyd's death in police custody left more than a dozen bank branches in Minneapolis and St. Paul damaged or destroyed. Some banks have already reopened those branches or are planning to. Others aren't sure when the sites will return.

Here's a rundown of where they stand:

Wells Fargo had four branches suffer damage to various degrees.

- 3030 Nicollet Ave. in Minneapolis, just south of Lake Street, where many businesses suffered extensive damage. The building is a complete loss, according to Laurie Nordquist, Wells Fargo Minnesota's CEO and lead region president for the Upper Midwest. Currently, a mobile ATM machine is at the location. The bank expects to have a branch back on the nearly 2-acre site probably in 2022. The lot will likely have other amenities as well, but Nordquist said it's too soon say to what those will be.

TCF Bank, U.S. Bank, Wells Fargo make plans to reopen branches damaged during unrest

- 2218 E. Lake St. in Minneapolis will reopen in the first half of 2021, according to Norquist. The branch had to be gutted because the damage was so bad. A mobile ATM machine is being set up at the location.
- 4141 Lyndale Ave. N. in Minneapolis reopened in June. The damage was relatively minor and the branch was closed roughly a week.
- 1505 W. Lake Street in Minneapolis reopened in late July.

U.S. Bancorp

Minneapolis-based U.S. Bank had two locations in South Minneapolis and one in North Minneapolis that suffered serious damage, said spokesman Jeff Shelman. They are:

- 919 E. Lake St.
- 2800 E. Lake St.
- 1030 W. Broadway

None of the branches are open yet, but the bank said it's committed to reopening them at some point.

"We are serving our customers in those areas with our mobile branch," Shelman said. "It is at 2800 E. Lake St. on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays and at 1030 W. Broadway on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays."

TCF Financial Corp.

TCF Bank had five branches damaged. Four of them are already open again with one still to be determined. They are:

- 1444 W. Lake St. in Minneapolis reopened July 1.
- 459 Lexington Pkwy. in St. Paul reopened July 1.
- 3118 E. Lake St. in Minneapolis reopened July 10.
- 705 W. Broadway Ave. in Minneapolis reopened July 31.
- Plans for the damaged branch located inside a Cub Foods at 2850 26th Ave. S in Minneapolis are still up in the air.

"While we don't yet have a reopen date for the 26th Ave. location, the East Lake Street location is serving the Lake Street community," spokeswoman Randi Berris said.

BMO Harris

BMO Harris Bank had two branches damaged.

- 320 E. Lake St. in Minneapolis suffered extensive damage. A bank spokesman couldn't provide a timeline on when it will reopen.
- 522 Snelling Ave. S. in St. Paul is open again. The damage was minor.

Bridgewater Bank

TCF Bank, U.S. Bank, Wells Fargo make plans to reopen branches damaged during unrest

Bridgewater Bank's Uptown branch, located at 3100 Hennepin Ave. in the Uptown neighborhood of Minneapolis, will open on August 17. The branch was looted on three separate nights.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: August 6, 2020

End of Document

Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case

ARTICLE MCDLXXXII.

JUDGE: PROSECUTOR MIKE FREEMAN WILL STAY ON GEORGE FLOYD CASE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 7, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 348 words

Byline: Associated Press

Highlight: MINNEAPOLIS (AP) - A judge overseeing the cases against the four former officers charged in the death of George Floyd has denied a request to have a local prosecutor removed.

Body

A judge overseeing the cases against the four former officers charged in the death of George Floyd has denied a request to have a local prosecutor removed.

J. Kueng's attorney filed a motion Thursday arguing that Hennepin County Attorney Mike Freeman, the county's top prosecutor, had "compromised his ethics" and his ability "to impartially prosecute" the case.

Among other things, attorney Tom Plunkett said Freeman had called Floyd's death a "senseless death" and that Freeman said a bystander's video of the incident "is graphic, and horrible and terrible, and no person should do that." Plunkett also accused Freeman's office of leaking information about potential plea negotiations.

Judge Peter Cahill ruled Friday that Freeman can stay on the case, saying Plunkett failed to establish that there was a conflict of interest and "failed to provide legal authority for the removal of a prosecutor by the Court, even if the allegations of improper conduct are true."

A spokeswoman for Freeman's office said Thursday that the office would not comment on the case. Minnesota Attorney General Keith Ellison's office is leading the prosecution.

Kueng is one of four officers charged in the May 25 death of Floyd, a handcuffed Black man who died after Derek Chauvin, who is white, pressed his knee against Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes as Floyd said he couldn't breathe. Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and manslaughter. Kueng and two other officers, Thomas Lane and Tou Thao, are charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and manslaughter. All four were fired.

The next court hearing for the four is Sept. 11. Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police Attorney for fired Minneapolis officer says Freeman should be removed from George Floyd case

Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Vikings' Eric Kendricks has become a prominent NFL voice for social justice

ARTICLE MCDLXXXIII.

VIKINGS' ERIC KENDRICKS HAS BECOME A PROMINENT NFL VOICE FOR SOCIAL JUSTICE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 7, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1560 words

Byline: Chris Tomasson

Highlight: Kendricks, 28, has been a member of the Vikings' social justice committee since it was formed in 2018. He gained national notice when he called out the NFL in a tweet the week after Floyd's death, an incident that led to protests around the country.

Body

Eric Kendricks is coming off a season in which he became just the second Vikings linebacker to be named first-team all-pro. If you ask his brother, his offseason has been just as impressive.

Kendricks, his star status having given him a national platform, has become one of the NFL's most prominent voices on social justice. He has been outspoken since the May 25 death of George Floyd while in custody of a Minneapolis police officer.

"I'm very proud of Eric taking that stance with all this stuff going on," said Kendricks' older brother, longtime NFL linebacker Mychal Kendricks. "He just came to the realization that something needed to be said and he took that initiative and did just that. I think that it takes a brave soul to do righteous acts."

Kendricks, 28, has been a member of the Vikings' social justice committee since it was formed in 2018. He gained national notice when he called out the NFL in a tweet the week after Floyd's death, an incident that led to protests around the country.

On May 30, NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell put out a statement that read, in part, the "NFL family is greatly saddened by the tragic events across our country" and that "the protesters' reactions to these incidents reflect the pain, anger and frustration that so many of us feel."

Kendricks didn't believe Goodell's statement went far enough. So on June 2, Kendricks, who is Black, tweeted, "@NFL what actual steps are you taking to support the fight for justice and system reform? Your statement said nothing. Your league is built on black athletes. Vague answers do nothing. Let the players know what you're ACTUALLY doing. And we know what silence means."

The tweet included a logo similar to the NFL's shield with the words. "WE WANT ANSWERS."

.@NFL what actual steps are you taking to support the fight for justice and system reform?

Vikings' Eric Kendricks has become a prominent NFL voice for social justice

Your statement said nothing. Your league is built on black athletes. Vague answers do nothing. Let the players know what you're ACTUALLY doing.

And we know what silence means. pic.twitter.com/EOqzDjW1an

- Eric Kendricks (@EricKendricks54) June 2, 2020

About an hour after Kendricks' tweet, Vikings linebacker Anthony Barr, Kendricks' former roommate at UCLA and a member of the 10-person social justice committee, sent out a similar tweet. Later that week, the two appeared in a video with other Black NFL players calling upon the league to do more.

The reaction was swift.

On June 5, Goodell sent out a video in which he said, in part, "We, the National Football League, admit we were wrong for not listening to NFL players earlier and encourage all to speak out and peacefully protest. We, the National Football League, believe black lives matter. I personally protest with you and want to be part of the much-needed change in this country."

Mychal Kendricks believes his brother's tweet got that ball rolling.

"It made a pretty big impact," said Mychal Kendricks, a free agent who spent the past eight seasons with Philadelphia and Seattle. "It was a pretty big situation, a pretty big deal. We had spoken about things that could be done, and yeah, it was just a good thing that Eric did."

One reason his brother's tweet had such a big impact was Eric Kendricks' performance on the field, Mychal said. Kendricks made his first Pro Bowl after last season and joined Matt Blair (1980) as the only first-team all-pro Minnesota linebackers.

"A lot of these issues I've felt really strongly about throughout my whole career, but whether I decided to speak up so actively about it was kind of my choice at the time," said Kendricks, entering his sixth NFL season after being a second-round pick in 2015.

"I felt like since then I've definitely educated myself. I encourage everyone to just further educate themselves on the topic and ask questions and have difficult conversations and just surround yourself with people who challenge you and keep this at the forefront of conversation because these are important issues."

Kendricks has been active throughout the summer in speaking out on social media. He posted a video, which was tweeted out by the Vikings, in which he had to hold back tears when talking about Floyd's death and said it "breaks my heart" what happened.

.@EricKendricks54 in his own words.

- Minnesota Vikings (@Vikings)

Since Floyd's death on May 25, members of the Vikings' social justice committee have closely watched the video of former officer Derek Chauvin, who is white, kneeling on Floyd's neck for 8 minutes, 48 seconds before Floyd, gasping for air, died. Chauvin has been charged with second-degree murder and other charges, and three other officers on the scene have been charged with aiding and abetting him.

Vikings' Eric Kendricks has become a prominent NFL voice for social justice

On June 6, Kendricks was among 10 Vikings players to meet with Minneapolis Police Chief Medaria Arradondo and three officers about how the department can improve relations with the African-American community.

"I've been trying to involve myself with that a lot," Kendricks said. "We had conversations with the police chief in person, just trying to ask questions and get things answered, get a better understanding from both sides."

Kendricks said the social justice committee has discussed with the police department issues involving working with youth, those who are jailed and can't afford bail, and "rehabilitating the people who get in trouble."

Last Tuesday, Kendricks and Barr got on a conference call with individuals in custody at the Hennepin County Juvenile Detention Center.

"(We) just had a conversation with those kids," Kendricks said. "Those kids are locked up and quarantined right now in juvenile detention and a lot of the resources that they normally have are even further restricted and they can get a little lonely in there, so it's important for us to check in with them."

The Vikings' social justice committee has done work with Project Success, an organization that inspires young people to plan for the future, and All Square, an organization designed to help those that have been convicted of a crime get the opportunities they need.

pic.twitter.com/mX9xNnTGeP June 3, 2020

"I'm proud of Eric," said Vikings co-defensive coordinator Andre Patterson, a member of the social justice committee. "Eric is very smart, intelligent, but most importantly his heart is in the right place. He's a tremendous man. Obviously, he's a great football player, and we've all seen him grow throughout the years, but I have a lot of pride in the whole group of our social justice group."

Other Vikings members of the social justice committee include running backs Alexander Mattison and Ameer Abdullah, safeties Anthony Harris and Harrison Smith, quarterback Kirk Cousins, wide receiver Adam Thielen and tight end Kyle Rudolph.

The Wilf family, which owns the Vikings, has donated $5 million to social justice causes. The social justice committee, funded by the Wilfs, has started the George Floyd Legacy Scholarship with an establishing gift of $125,000. The scholarship will be given annually to a college-bound African-American student.

"Football is cool, I love playing football, I love representing myself like that," Kendricks said when asked about his work in the community. "But if I can represent my family in other ways like social justice issues or things like that that affect my community, I want to be able to do that because I do have a platform."

Kendricks grew up in Fresno, Calif., and starred at Hoover High School before attending UCLA. His former high school coach, Pat Plummer, has been impressed with what he has done on and off the field.

"He's a very smart young man and just a well-rounded individual, and they couldn't have a better guy speaking out and voicing opinions than Eric because he's well-respected and well-liked," Plummer said. "It's nice to see that he's at the forefront of this thing."

Vikings' Eric Kendricks has become a prominent NFL voice for social justice

Kendricks played quarterback and linebacker at Hoover and was a team captain in 2009. Plummer retired after the next season.

Vikings waive undrafted free-agent signee Tyler Higby Vikings hope dissing of their defense will motivate them Vikings LB Cameron Smith to miss 2020 season due to open-heart surgery Vikings make signing of LB Quentin Poling official, waive RB Tony Brooks-James Andre Patterson says Vikings will 'be just fine' at nose tackle

"I've noticed some of the things that Eric has been talking about and he is bringing attention to and I think it's a great thing," said Plummer, 70. "And I think he's a great young man to be able to do those things."

Kendricks played one season, 2007, on the Hoover varsity with Mychal. Seventeen months older, Mychal starred at California before the Eagles drafted him with a second-round pick in 2012. He said he has received a number of calls from teams and anticipates signing soon as a free agent.

Mychal said his brother encountered racism when growing up but he didn't offer specifics. He said he has talked regularly over the years with his brother about social justice and has been impressed with the manner in which he lately has addressed the subject.

"It just shows the true quality of leadership when you get people who are in positions like his and other NFL players like him that they use their platforms to bring awareness and stand up for what is obviously right," Mychal said. "Anytime anybody has a platform like his and uses it as such, I believe that it holds a lot of weight. I'm very proud of him."

Graphic

Minnesota Vikings middle linebacker Eric Kendricks (54) admonishes Atlanta Falcons after making a stop in the third quarter of an NFL football game at U.S. Bank Stadium in Minneapolis on Sunday, Sept. 8, 2019. (John Autey / Pioneer Press)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCDLXXXIV.

MINNESOTA UNITED LEAVING MLS IS BACK TOURNAMENT AS 'A FAMILY'

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 7, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1000 wordsByline: Andy GrederHighlight: It's not you; it's me. After 41 days and 40 nights in a "bubble" created to keep COVID-19 away from the MLS is Back Tournament near Orlando, Fla., the Loons finally headed back to Minnesota on Friday, a day after their extended stay ended in a 3-1 semifinal loss to Orlando City. While Minnesota United's [...]Body

It's not you; it's me.

After 41 days and 40 nights in a "bubble" created to keep COVID-19 away from the MLS is Back Tournament near Orlando, Fla., the Loons finally headed back to Minnesota on Friday, a day after their extended stay ended in a 3-1 semifinal loss to Orlando City.

While Minnesota United's contingent felt like they bonded as a team in an environment where they saw only one each other day-in and day-out in a hotel and on training grounds, they don't want to break up with each other but could use some time apart.

"I know what underwear half these guys wear," Ethan Finlay joked in a postgame video conference call.

Later, the Loons midfielder posted on Instagram, "Came here a team, leaving as a family."

"After being cooped up in their room for 20 hours a day," United coach Adrian Heath said the players will get some time off to spend with their families before reconvening the middle of next week for the resumption of the MLS regular season to be played in home markets, including Allianz Field in St. Paul. That schedule is expected to be released soon and start later this month.

"I think they need to get away from each other," Heath said. "As much as the team spirit has been incredible, they need a few days away from each other, and they need a few days away from me and the staff."

For himself, Heath was looking forward to seeing his wife, Jane, and walking around with a semblance of freedom near one of Minnesota's lakes, most likely one near his home, Lake Minnetonka.

Minnesota United leaving MLS is Back Tournament as 'a family'

"Just, enjoy what Minnesota has to offer this time of year," Heath said. "I always enjoy coming to Orlando, but, trust me, me and the players will be happy to get back in Minnesota."

While homesickness and monotony seeped in, and other teams were able to check out of the Disney hotel, Finlay said the Loons were intent on staying as long as possible. They bided their time playing cards, video games, some golf and bringing the soccer ball into the pool. They played pranks on each other's hotel room and .

Afterward, he acknowledged the stay was "probably one of the greatest challenges I've had in my career, and I think most guys would say that."

The desire to remain came with the thrill of winning.

"You win one game against Columbus and you feel a little bit of taste in your mouth: 'Let's make a real run here,' " Finlay said. "That's exactly what we did, and that was exactly our intentions. We kept on. It's not easy for anybody who's still here, but we were fully prepared and ready to be here for five more days and play in a final."

A bond was further established with the killing of George Floyd when players were here in Minnesota. Some visited the site of his death in Minneapolis, , and the team made a Black Lives Matter video at Allianz Field.

"I think when you think about what we had happen in our city back in May, and a lot of the social injustice that's really happened right in our backyard, I think it was a bit of a rallying cry for our group already going (through) COVID," Finlay said. "I think this tournament has only made us stronger because we've been able to spend a lot of that time together."

While players and staff wore "Black Lives Matter" T-shirts and each took a knee before games, teammate Brent Kallman of Woodbury drew a distinction, wearing an "End Racism" shirt while standing and bowing his head during those moments of silence.

The Loons missed out on winning the club's first trophy and the spot in the CONCACAF Champions League - and $1.1 million in prize money that goes with it - they sit in second place in the Western Conference. With two games in March and the tournament's three group-stage games counting toward the regular-season standings, Minnesota has 11 points to Sporting Kansas City's 12.

United was able to keep up its strong pace without MLS defender of the year Ike Opara, who remained in Minnesota with an undisclosed "preexisting condition." During the tournament, at times they also played without captain Ozzie Alonso, main playmaker Kevin Molino, top striker Luis Amarilla and all-star right back Romain Metanire.

Minnesota United's first home games at Allianz Field won't have fans intermingled more between traditional dinner tables Jacori Hayes spoke out on racism Minnesota United falls, 3-1, to Orlando City in MLS is Back Tournament semifinal Loons' Michael Boxall: 'Don't think there's any way we can be underdogs' Minnesota United signs Bakaye Dibassy, seeks resolution on Emanuel Reynoso deal Minnesota United's 'cohesion' has club thriving in MLS is Back Tournament

After struggling to create any scoring threats in Orlando's box Thursday - Amarilla and Robin Lod did not have a shot in 58-minute shifts - Molino's substitution helped unlock the Loons' attack.

Minnesota United leaving MLS is Back Tournament as 'a family'

With Molino's creative pass and Mason Toye's movement and finish, the Loons scored in the 83rd minute.

GIF: Here's how Kevin Molino can create and pick a pass - unlike any other #MNUFC player. With Mason Toye movement/finishing in semifinal, they carry their chemistry from 2019. (But before their entry Thursday, neither Robin Lod nor Luis Amarilla took a single shot.) <pic.twitter.com/nbaHSjXwGn>

- Andy Greder (@andygreder)

But in added time, Hassani Dotson's cross skimmed off the top of Toye's head directly in front of goal. While the ball appeared to be a bit too high for Toye to redirect, ESPN's Taylor Twellman said, "that's a dream ball for a center forward."

GIF: Here's how close Mason Toye got to a header equalizer late in #MLSisBack #MLSisBack August 7, 2020 semifinal. Maybe the ball is a bit too high, but ESPN's Taylor Twellman called it a "dream ball for a center forward." For years, #MNUFC has been working on improving Toye's execution in the air. <pic.twitter.com/g00rtSPPus>

- Andy Greder (@andygreder) August 7, 2020

That's how close the Loons were to evening up the game and potentially pushing it to penalty kicks, but now their time in Florida has come to a end.

"We're disappointed," defender Michael Boxall said, "but we'll get ready to go again."

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

ARTICLE MCDLXXXV.

MINNEAPOLIS LEADERS PUSH AHEAD WITH EFFORTS TO CHANGE POLICE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 7, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 787 wordsByline: Amy ForlitiHighlight: MINNEAPOLIS (AP) - Minneapolis leaders who pledged to dismantle the city's Police Department in the wake of George Floyd's death won't achieve the type of structural overhaul to public safety they hoped for - at least not this year.Body

Minneapolis leaders who pledged to dismantle the city's Police Department in the wake of George Floyd's death won't achieve the type of structural overhaul to public safety they hoped for - at least not this year.

A city commission on Wednesday blocked a November vote on the issue. So now, although political will for change may be on their side, city leaders face a more incremental and challenging path to rebuilding the oft-criticized department. But they're not giving up.

"The Charter Commission blocking this question from going on the ballot will slow progress because of the way our city government is structured and the realities of municipal government," Council President Lisa Bender said Thursday. "We are still pursuing all of this other work related to investing in violence prevention and reimagining public safety. ... It will not happen as quickly now."

Floyd, a Black man who was handcuffed, died May 25 after Derek Chauvin, who is white, pressed his knee against Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes as Floyd said he couldn't breathe. Floyd's death renewed calls for an end to police brutality and racial inequities, sparking protests in Minneapolis and beyond.

The City Council responded by proposing an amendment to the city's charter that would have replaced the Police Department with a "Department of Community Safety and Violence Prevention" that prioritized public health and a director with "non-law enforcement experience in community safety services." But the Charter Commission decided it needed more time to review the proposal, effectively keeping it off the ballot this year, though it could be put before voters in 2021.

Meanwhile, Mayor Jacob Frey, Chief Medaria Arradondo and others have been pushing ahead with other changes they say are designed to change the department's culture.

Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police

Frey said this week that the city wants to pair new police officers with "the right individuals to be role models" for field training. Another change announced last month requires officers to document their attempts to de-escalate situations, whether or not force is used.

Frey and Arradondo also have expanded requirements for reporting use-of-force incidents, ordering officers to provide more detail.

And Arradondo has withdrawn the department from union contract negotiations, saying he wants a review targeting the grievance and arbitration process that makes it hard to get rid of problem officers. Frey said the inability to fire bad officers is a "gigantic blockage in getting us to a place where we can see that necessary culture shift."

Frey also hinted that he would consider investing in public safety measures that go beyond policing when he presents the 2021 budget next week. He did not elaborate.

City Council Member Linea Palmisano said she has been working with the mayor's office on the budget, and has advocated for an independent monitor to do more audits of the Police Department.

The city recently revised its 2020 budget to address a $156 million revenue dip due to the coronavirus pandemic. In the process it diverted $1.1 million from the Police Department's $193 million budget to the Office of Violence Prevention for an outreach program geared toward those at high-risk for gun violence.

"I think in this constrained budget environment it becomes even more important to start to balance out those priorities and really start investing in prevention in a meaningful way," said Bender.

Bender said the City Council is also reviewing whether there is a more financially efficient way to respond to some 911 calls, and it's trying to get a better sense of the Police Department's staffing structure. The council is also moving ahead with a community engagement process, to get input from residents.

Don Samuels, who served on the City Council from 2003 through 2014, said one advantage the City Council and mayor have going forward is their now-more public relationship with the union. Traditionally, Samuels said, negotiations with unions are behind-the-scenes, giving unions the advantage.

"The more public the city's desires are, the more pressure there will be on the Police Department that has become out of step, not just with the city but with the nation and the world," Samuels said.

He said that whatever happens next, he hopes "cooler heads prevail." Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Attorney for fired Minneapolis officer says Freeman should be removed from George Floyd case

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Letters: Mayor and governor point fingers but expect the federal government to pay?

ARTICLE MCDLXXXVI. LETTERS: MAYOR AND GOVERNOR POINT FINGERS BUT EXPECT THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TO PAY?

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 7, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 428 words

Byline: Letter Writers

Highlight: I see Gov. Walz is once again going to the well to beg for federal funds to help rebuild the city he and Mayor Frey allowed to be burned and looted by rioters. Current damage estimates exceed $500 million. That seems like a lot of damage from "peaceful protests." Frey and Walz are pointing fingers [...]

Body

I see Gov. Walz is once again going to the well to beg for federal funds to help rebuild the city he and Mayor Frey allowed to be burned and looted by rioters. Current damage estimates exceed $500 million. That seems like a lot of damage from "peaceful protests."

Frey and Walz are pointing fingers at one another, laying blame as to who is responsible for failing to stop the violence. It is clear both failed to protect the citizens and business owners in the area from violence looting and destruction.

It is also clear the catalyst for the rioting, the killing of George Floyd, is due to the failure of local leaders to deal with systemic problems that exist in the Minneapolis police department. Frey and other Democrat leaders over the past 40 years have had the responsibility and authority to root out systemic problems in the police department, but failed miserably

Their latest idea? Abolish the police. Is the federal government expected to pay for the damage that will no doubt result from that brilliant idea too?

Walz and Frey had the authority and responsibility to deal with these issues. They now have the responsibility to pay the price. The root cause and the resulting violence are both state and local issues, not the responsibility of the federal government.

Jack Barbera, St. Paul

On Saturday night, July 25, we watched the graduation ceremony of St. Louis University High School, in Missouri, via screening. Our grandson was graduating from that high school.

Letters: Mayor and governor point fingers but expect the federal government to pay?

The ceremony was held at 8 p.m. at the high school football stadium. The graduates had chairs set up on the playing field. They were 6 feet apart and 6 feet back to front. All wore masks. The stage was set up on the sidelines where all the graduates could walk up on stage and be recognized and receive their diploma. After the ceremony some patriotic music was played and there were fireworks.

It was a great graduation ceremony to watch and great for the grads and their friends and family. The family and friends were in the stands with the same social destining. Perfect.

My question is, why couldn't every graduate in Minnesota, have had the same experience?? Most have football stadiums or some other type of place where the same scenario could have taken place. It would have been a great experience for the Minnesota graduates.

Jim Gustafson, Woodbury Letters: We need more good police, not fewer Hey, State Fair ticket scalpers: you're tainted! Letters: Is it the most-rigged election ever, win or lose? Letters: What's the St. Paul budget plan? Letters: Talk about bad behavior!

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say

ARTICLE MCDLXXXVII. VANDALS THREW SHOPPING CARTS, BICYCLES, SEWER CAPS AT SQUAD CARS DURING GEORGE FLOYD AFTERMATH IN ST. PAUL, CHARGES SAY

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 7, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 348 words

Byline: Sarah Horner

Highlight: A Wright County man and a Minneapolis man were charged with criminal damage to property and third-degree riot Friday for allegedly vandalizing squad cars parked outside a St. Paul Target store amid the aftermath of George Floyd's death. On May 27, as officers stood guard outside the Midway retailer after reports of looting, a group [...]

Body

A Wright County man and a Minneapolis man were charged with criminal damage to property and third-degree riot Friday for allegedly vandalizing squad cars parked outside a St. Paul Target store amid the aftermath of George Floyd's death.

On May 27, as officers stood guard outside the Midway retailer after reports of looting, a group of people gathered near squad cars in the parking lot and started hurling objects at them, according to criminal complaints filed in Ramsey County District Court.

The incident was caught on video, and law enforcement later identified Maurice Antonio Anderson, 29, of Minneapolis and Phillip John Williams, 43, of Otsego as among the vandals, the charges say.

Anderson reportedly threw and pushed shopping carts into the squads and also hurled a bike at a windshield, the criminal complaint said.

Williams was seen throwing a sewer cap through a rear window, the charges say.

Damage to the vehicles, which belonged to both the State Patrol and St. Paul police, totaled nearly $20,000 collectively.

Anderson's criminal history includes three prior felony convictions, including third-degree criminal sexual conduct, second-degree riot and failure to register as a predatory offender.

Williams has a pending obstructing legal process case in Wright County from a May 30 incident in which he reportedly refused to turn down this music and resisted arrest, legal documents say.

Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say

Both are expected to make their first appearance in court later this month. No attorney was listed for them in court records.

Others could face charges in the case as the investigation continues.

Floyd died on Memorial Day as he was being arrested by Minneapolis police. North St. Paul man killed in crash after fleeing Dakota County sheriff's deputy Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Cleric assaulted outside Bloomington mosque; police searching for suspects U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities Minneapolis man sentenced to 33 years in prison for sex-trafficking young women and girls out of massage parlor

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

Kyle, Spencer, Kulas: We love St. Paul. Here's how to help

ARTICLE MCDLXXXVIII. KYLE, SPENCER, KULAS: WE LOVE ST. PAUL. HERE'S HOW TO HELP

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 7, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 431 words

Byline: B Kyle, Joe Spencer and Chad Kulas

Highlight: In St. Paul, more than 275 buildings were looted, damaged, or even razed during the civil unrest that followed the senseless death of George Floyd on May 25. So many of these businesses remain shuttered. This on top of the ongoing pandemic. One devastating economic blow after another. In particular, businesses with Black, women, and immigrant [...]

Body

In St. Paul, more than 275 buildings were looted, damaged, or even razed during the civil unrest that followed the senseless death of George Floyd on May 25. So many of these businesses remain shuttered.

This on top of the ongoing pandemic. One devastating economic blow after another. In particular, businesses with Black, women, and immigrant owners have disproportionately been impacted by both.

We want to help. Will you join us?

Our region is blessed with civic pride, strong companies and leaders who invest in our community. Two of our most engaged CEOs, Chris Hilger of Securian Financial and Doug Baker of Ecolab, are asking for your support in helping to fund rebuilding efforts in the Midway Area and across St. Paul.

Here is their letter to us:

"Saint Paul has been home to Ecolab and Securian Financial for more than 200 combined years. This community is filled with our families, friends and colleagues.

"We mourn together over the killing of George Floyd and the subsequent unrest it triggered following generations of racial injustice. Our organizations are committed to building a better tomorrow with shared opportunity.

"There is a great partnership underway to continue the healing of our hometown. The We Love St. Paul/Midway Fund - a collaboration of the Saint Paul Area Chamber of Commerce, the Midway Chamber of Commerce and the Saint Paul Downtown Alliance - is raising money for the following priorities.

"Immediate funding for the more than 275 businesses the City of Saint Paul reports were damaged in the recent unrest

Kyle, Spencer, Kulas: We love St. Paul. Here's how to help

"Immediate funding for the smallest businesses and those owned by people of color

"Longer-term strategic planning and redevelopment

"Please join us in supporting this effort to help rebuild these local businesses, many of which were already struggling with the economic impact of the COVID-19 pandemic.

"Together we will make a difference."

How to help: Please go to www.welovethemidway.com or www.welovestpaul.com today and contribute. No donation is too small - or too big!

B Kyle is president and CEO of the Saint Paul Area Chamber of Commerce. Joe Spencer is president of the St. Paul Downtown Alliance. Chad Kulas is executive director of the Midway Chamber of Commerce.

Soucheray: Trust us, the Minneapolis Council said. We don't, said the Charter Commission. Banaian, Schmitz: Are 4-year degrees oversold? Not at all, even in the liberal arts Caryn M. Sullivan: Can we agree or disagree, or agree to disagree - and listen along the way? Soucheray: And our ability to reason is swept away Bonnie Blodgett: Focus on the fruit, tomato plant!

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

SBA steps in to aid victims of Floyd riots

ARTICLE MCDLXXXIX.

SBA STEPS IN TO AID VICTIMS OF FLOYD RIOTS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 7, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: BUSINESS; Pg. 1DLength: 635 wordsByline: NEAL ST. ANTHONY; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

The Small Business Administration (SBA) is offering disaster loans of up to $2 million to businesses and residents in the Twin Cities who incurred financial damage from the protests and riots in late May and early June.

The move comes after the Federal Emergency Management Agency denied a request from Gov. Tim Walz for federal disaster aid to reimburse local governments as they begin to clear away rubble and rebuild structures.

Meanwhile, state and local officials in Minneapolis and St. Paul have been slow to pull together financial assistance, in part because they're waiting to see what the other will do.

Nearly 1,500 Twin Cities businesses were damaged by vandalism, fire and looting that happened after protests over the police killing of George Floyd. Estimates of damage exceed $500 million.

The SBA said it will offer low-interest loans repayable over as long as 30 years for working capital and to repair damage that happened from May 27 to June 8. The agency will accept loan applications until early October.

"Businesses and private nonprofit organizations may borrow up to $2 million to repair or replace disaster damaged or destroyed real estate, machinery and equipment, inventory, and other business assets," Brian McDonald, the SBA's Minnesota district director, said in a statement.

For small businesses and small agricultural cooperatives, and most private nonprofits, SBA offers Economic Injury Disaster Loans to help meet working capital needs. They are available regardless of whether the business suffered physical property damage. Homeowners and renters who incurred related damage are eligible for loans of up to $40,000.

Interest rates are as low as 3% for businesses, 2.75% for nonprofit organizations and 1.25% for homeowners and renters with terms up to 30 years. Loan amount and terms are based on each applicant's financial condition.

SBA steps in to aid victims of Floyd riots

Hundreds of small businesses on E. Lake Street, W. Broadway and University Avenue in St. Paul that were torched and looted in the days following Floyd's death remain shuttered.

Kaltuma Hassan, who stood in July in the wreckage of her grocery store on the South Side in Minneapolis, wondered how she could rebuild. Like her neighbors, Hassan was frustrated by the failure of state lawmakers to pass legislation that would have put much-needed cash in the hands of struggling business owners.

"If they want to help us, what are they waiting for?" asked Hassan, who won't be able to rebuild Bismillah Grocery and Coffee without assistance because her insurance policy would cover just $100,000 of her $500,000 loss. "It makes you angry. It is destroying our chance."

Democrats have proposed giving small business owners as much as $300 million to cover uninsured damage, but Republicans have opposed the legislation, citing concerns over the size of the bailout as well as the role Minneapolis officials, accused of being slow to respond as demonstrations over the death of George Floyd in police hands turned to riots. Some key Republican leaders won't support the rebuilding effort unless local officials in Minneapolis and St. Paul contribute to the program.

SBA loans of up to $200,000 are also available to homeowners to repair or replace damaged or destroyed real estate, and homeowners and renters are eligible for loans up to $40,000 to repair or replace damaged or destroyed personal property, according to the SBA.

The SBA made the loans available in response to a request from Walz for a disaster declaration by the agency. The declaration covers Hennepin County and the adjacent counties of Anoka, Carver, Dakota, Ramsey, Scott, Sherburne and Wright.

The SBA's Virtual Disaster Loan Outreach Center will help prospective recipients apply online through the SBA's secure website at disasterloanassistance.sba.gov.

Neal St. Anthony · 612-673-7144

Load-Date: August 7, 2020

Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots

ARTICLE MCDXC. TURF CLUB ABOUT TO START A '90 PERCENT REBUILD' AFTER AN ARSON ATTEMPT DURING RIOTS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 7, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 514 words

Byline: Ross Raihala

Highlight: Construction is expected to start soon at the Turf Club, the St. Paul Midway nightclub that suffered an estimated $1 million in damages during the rioting that engulfed the neighborhood on May 28, three days after the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody. Insurance will cover the repair costs of the building, which [...]

Body

Construction is expected to start soon at the Turf Club, the St. Paul Midway nightclub that suffered an estimated $1 million in damages during the rioting that engulfed the neighborhood on May 28, three days after the death of George Floyd in Minneapolis police custody.

Insurance will cover the repair costs of the building, which would likely have burned down if not for the sprinkler system First Avenue installed when it bought the Turf Club in 2013.

Nate Kranz, First Avenue's general manager, got the first call around 11 the night of May 28.

"It was the alarm company," said Kranz. "The front and back door alarms had gone off and there was movement inside. Then at 1 a.m., I got the call that the fire alarm and sprinklers were going off. Obviously, we couldn't go there, we had to wait it out."

At 8 a.m. the next morning, Kranz met First Avenue owner Dayna Frank at the Turf and the pair found a "very friendly fireman" nearby who was able to shut down the sprinklers, which had been running all night.

"It was super dark and it smelled musty," he said. "We were standing in I'd say 6 to 8 inches of water. Everything was wet. And double that for downstairs. You could see water coming through the ceiling."

Within a day or two, the insurance company had people in the Turf surveying the damage. From what Kranz was able to gather, a small group broke in at 11 and took full advantage of the liquor behind the bar. "It seems like they had been partying in there for a while," he said. "There were booze bottle strewn about."

Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots

He's not sure if those were the same people who started the fire two hours later. "The fire was started at the back bar," Kranz said. "And it burned pretty hot, hot enough to melt parts of the beer coolers and an entire speaker behind the bar."

In the weeks that followed, crews took all the equipment out of the building and searched for anything salvageable. They also started the process of drying out the space.

"They would remove one layer of floor, test, and then remove another," Kranz said. "It was a process of various stages of peeling the Turf back to the studs. It's now basically an almost entirely empty shell."

Nestled near the busy corner of University and Snelling avenues, the Turf Club dates back to the 1940s and has offered live music for the past three decades. Tom Scanlon, who runs the nearby Dubliner Pub, sold the Turf to First Avenue in 2013. Crews spent three months renovating the venue, replacing the roof, fixing the plumbing and electrical and installing a sprinkler system.

Contractors will soon start what Kranz called a 90 percent rebuild using the same plans from 2013. He said he's only planning minor changes that the average patron won't likely notice. Beyond that, the venue will be restored to its pre-fire glory, including the much-loved basement bar dubbed the Clown Lounge.

Kranz said the staff is taking the glass half full approach toward construction. He said he obviously wished the fire hadn't happened in the first place, but since it did, at least it happened when the bar was already closed due to the pandemic.

Graphic

One of the few things to survive in the Turf Club's basement, dubbed the Clown Lounge, was the bar. (Courtesy of the Turf Club)

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

A film fest where only the screen is white

ARTICLE MCDXCI. A FILM FEST WHERE ONLY THE SCREEN IS WHITE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 7, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1E

Length: 802 words

Byline: JENNA ROSS; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: Saturday's Hothouse celebrates poets and filmmakers of color.

Body

This outdoor film festival needed a screen.

At first, Ryan Stopera tried projecting onto the Northrup King Building's old grain elevators. "It looked cool," he said, but their dips distorted the image. Then he spotted a walkway between warehouses. So he rented a truck with a lift and duct-taped a white screen across it.

On Saturday night, people will gather to watch on it 10 new works by local filmmakers of color, including Stopera. It's rare to have all the films on a lineup made by BIPOC artists, he said. Rarer still to see new works screened in person during this pandemic.

"It took a lot to get to this point," he said of Saturday's Hothouse Film Festival.

Five of the short films will have been created in the past week during a filmmaking challenge by an organization called Motionpoems, which pairs local filmmakers with local poets. Stopera is premiering his hip-hop and sci-fi-infused film, "The Return." Filmmaker D.A. Bullock will show new work, too - a six-minute film featuring conversations with young Black men about identity and masculinity.

In recent weeks, Bullock added to that piece an interview that delves into COVID-19 and George Floyd, who died in May after a Minneapolis police officer knelt on his neck for nine minutes. By adding that conversation, the film became "a rumination about how we exist right now," he said. "About life and death and isolation."

Getting together to tell and to hear those stories is important at this moment, said Bullock, who is also a panelist for this year's Hothouse challenge. A movie theater might not be an option. But an outdoor screening is. Artists are finding ways.

"It's something we need to do to take care of each other," Bullock said. "My hope is ... we're not losing that ability to be social around storytelling like this."

A film fest where only the screen is white

The premiere of Stopera's film was pushed back once, then twice.

First, the pandemic hit. Then, plans to project the film in a park were scuttled when the Minneapolis Park Board told Stopera he would have to staff the event with police officers.

"Well, the film itself is about an uprising against an oppressive police force," Stopera said. "So I didn't want to have a bunch of cops surrounding us."

"The Return" was born out of conversations with a friend of African, Chinese and British descent about mixed-race identity, "about Asian and Black solidarity or the lack of," about Wu-Tang Clan and Bruce Lee. In the year 2040, Black, Indigenous and other artists of color rebel against a police force intent on quashing music, art and other forms of communication.

Stopera started filming last fall, wrapping up a few scenes earlier this year.

"The artists speak of this revolution as an uprising," Stopera said. "I finished the film and then the uprising happened here. The language, everything - it feels a bit too true to real life."

Stopera is co-hosting the film fest with Motionpoems. The nonprofit gave five teams $1,200 each and a week to create short films using poetry as their scripts.

Spoken word artist Fatima Camara got paired with filmmaker Kobi. Before last week, they had never met.

"We're both first-generation West Africans," she said. "We clicked off the things that are important to us."

Camara, who grew up performing with the Twin Cities spoken-word nonprofit TruArtSpeaks, had never worked with film or video. Never done a voice-over. So she was anticipating every part of the process.

The challenge, too, is helping pull her from a creative slump. "I'm excited just for something that feels good in light of everything."

She had expected to use a Next Step Fund grant from the Metropolitan Regional Arts Council to travel to Gambia and research a massacre there in 2000, when Gambian police shot at protesting students, killing 14 people. She wants to delve into those events for a historical fiction novel.

But coronavirus paused those plans. Then there were the protests after Floyd's death.

Some artists "felt like, oh wow, this is the time to create," said Camara. "But I also felt like a lot of profiting was happening. I just couldn't relate to that."

When she first met with Kobi, she suggested two poems, one that grapples with grief and another the fear of motherhood. But then, going through her writing, she came across a third.

She called Kobi: "Can I read you this one?"

"We were the kids/ not allowed to go/ near the water," the poem begins. It goes on to describe a memory - her mother standing in the water, waist deep, among the waves.

On Tuesday, they drove north to Silver Bay, where they filmed her friend stepping into Lake Superior.

Jenna Ross · 612-673-7168 · @ByJenna

A film fest where only the screen is white

Hothouse Film Festival

Where: Parking lot of Northrup King Building, 1500 NE. Jackson St., Mpls.

When: 8-11:30 p.m. Saturday (or Sunday if rained out).

Admission: Free, but bring a mask and chair.

Info: facebook.com/MotionpoemsInc

Load-Date: August 7, 2020

End of Document

Bandcamp Fridays are here to stay

ARTICLE MCDXCII.

BANDCAMP FRIDAYS ARE HERE TO STAY

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 7, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 1E

Length: 1052 words

Byline: CHRIS RIEMENSCHNEIDER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)

Highlight: The monthly web sale has been a pandemic bright spot for musicians and fans.

Body

After plans for another "D4th" Fourth of July blowout party were scrapped last month, Twin Cities punk hounds Dillinger Four wound up celebrating Bandcamp Friday instead on July 3.

"The timing lined up so well," guitarist Erik Funk said. "It seemed like a really obvious chance to offer something as a consolation."

Fans certainly prized the backup offering: a live recording from the final night of Minneapolis' Triple Rock Social Club, which the band posted for one day only - the day that many indie music fans worldwide now know as Bandcamp Friday.

Each first Friday of the month, the Oakland, Calif.-based online music retailer waives its in-house fees on albums and other products it sells for shipping or download, so more money goes directly to the artists. It's a tradition that started in March, right after the coronavirus quarantine brought the music industry to an abrupt halt.

On tap again Friday, Bandcamp's monthly sale has become an event of sorts for musicians and music fans alike - a rare bright spot as the pandemic continues to keep most music venues dark.

The monthly offerings have proved so popular that the company announced last week it has waived more than $20 million over the first four Bandcamp Fridays, and that it plans to keep them going at least through the end of the year.

That's good news for superfans such as St. Paul's Will Crain, who said he has racked up Bandcamp charges every month during the pandemic.

"The lack of live concerts has freed up my music budget, and the artists and independent labels can use the support," he said.

Bandcamp Fridays are here to stay

In the Twin Cities, where the George Floyd tragedy and a rash of music-related MeToo stories have added to the drama of recent months, Bandcamp Fridays have also been used as a fun way to raise some serious money for social causes.

Jazz trio Happy Apple issued its first album in 13 years - cheekily titled "New York CD" - as an exclusive "pre-release" download via Bandcamp over the past month to raise money for north Minneapolis food nonprofit Appetite for Change.

Veteran rapper Longshot (aka Chad Heslup) donated all the Bandcamp money from his reactionary EP "I'm Sayin' " to racial justice charities - about $3,500 on June 4 alone, he noted. He's now using this week's Bandcamp Friday to release his new full-length album, "Champion."

"Not being able to perform, [Bandcamp] has helped," the prolific rapper said. "I make a lot of music, so now is really a crucial time for me to figure out how to effectively release things."

It's hard to keep track of all the causes that howling local rocker Laura Larson and her bands have supported over the past two months via Bandcamp.

Her new pop-punky power trio Scrunchies has a new split single and print poster with Cincinnati band Strobobean up for sale Friday to raise money for the Loveland Foundation, which offers therapy to Black women and girls. The members' other bands Kitten Forever and Bruise Violet have also sold Bandcamp items as fundraisers for Reclaim the Block and other Twin Cities charities.

"This is not new to us," Larson said. "Kitten Forever and Bruise Violet have for a long time been active in working toward racial justice and gender equity through show and merch donations."

What is new is the more immediate and direct payments Bandcamp offers to independent music makers and their various causes.

Patrick Davis, guitarist in the Bad Man, helped put together an all-star compilation album in April to benefit local food shelves, titled "Bands for Cans: Minnesota Musicians Against Hunger." It was sold as a Bandcamp digital album, and the spike each first Friday helped the cause.

"That money turns into food for people in need," Davis said.

Longtime DIY instrumental collagist Dosh (aka Martin Dosh) said he's been posting special releases to Bandcamp in recent months - including an excellent "Cesario Archives" live set from 2008 - mainly for the ease of using the site and its promotional tools. Those include an e-mail sent to prior buyers of his wares anytime he posts something new.

"It's like zero overhead," Dosh said, "so as long as you can put in the work of making the art and getting the audio sorted, it's kind of free money."

Most musicians see Bandcamp as a better alternative to Spotify, Apple Music and other streaming sites, which pay a fraction of a penny for each song stream. Bandcamp offers limited streaming for free but focuses more on download and physical album purchases, from which it takes 10 to 15% of each sale (on the other days of the month).

Many of the country's biggest indie-rock labels have also cozied up to Bandcamp and its Friday, including Sub Pop, Epitaph, Jagjaguwar and Merge.

Bandcamp Fridays are here to stay

Mac McCaughan, founder of Merge Records and singer in Superchunk, recently said of Bandcamp in online magazine Pitchfork: "When someone recommends something I've never heard of before, that's often the first place I'll go."

However, Minneapolis guitar wiz Mike Michel still thinks Bandcamp's fees are too high, calling it another music-tech company with "retired or failed musicians ripping off other musicians."

"I'm following my rapper buddies who are way more industrious," said Michel, who suggests that artists should sell their goods themselves through Venmo or PayPal payments.

As for Dillinger Four, the music-biz-eschewing punk quartet doesn't plan to release its Triple Rock farewell recording anywhere else anytime soon, or any other Bandcamp-only limited releases. But D4's guitarist still saluted the company and its fun Friday bonanza.

"Bandcamp's fees really aren't much," Funk said, "and the momentum they've built through doing the consistent Friday thing is awesome."

Local loot to look for this week on Bandcamp Friday:

Longshot: "Champion" (new album)

Scrunchies: "Boo/Sway" (split single and print)

The Prizefighters: "Flamewalk" (colored vinyl)

Felt: "Name in Ya Mouth" (single from Slug and Murs)

King Pari: "Sunshine" (7-inch)

Munson-Hicks Party Supplies: Self-titled album (John Munson sings, Dylan Hicks writes)

Dope Walker: "Save Save" (vinyl album by ex-Plastic Constellations leaders)

Various: "Quarantine Dream: A for Jessa Roquet" (digital benefit album)

Chris Riemenschneider · 612-673-4658

· @ChrisRstrib

Bandcamp Fridays

When: 2 a.m. Fri.-2 a.m. Sat., first week of the month.

What: All sales go directly to artists or labels.

Where: bandcamp.com.

Load-Date: August 7, 2020

Brown Venture Group plans to raise $50 million for minority-owned startups

ARTICLE MCDXCIII.

BROWN VENTURE GROUP PLANS TO RAISE $50 MILLION FOR MINORITY-OWNED STARTUPS

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

August 7, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 529 words

Byline: Iain Carlos

Body

Brown Venture Group, a Black-owned venture capital firm dedicated to investing in Black, Latino, and Native American-owned tech businesses, is looking to raise $50 million for its inaugural fund.

The Minneapolis-based firm is also expanding its team. Chris Dykstra, CEO of software company WareCorp, signed on as a minority owner of Brown Venture in recent weeks. Brown Venture has also lined up five portfolio companies.

"The purpose of venture capital is to fund unfunded talent," Dykstra said. "In my view, the largest pool of unfunded talent, certainly in the United States, is entrepreneurs of color."

Simpli Fi Automation, a Florida-based home automation and security firm, and MoneyVerbs, a Minneapolis-based app developer, are set to receive investments from Brown Venture. Brown Venture declined to disclose its three other clients.

Brown Venture Group plans to raise $50 million for minority-owned startups

Paul Campbell, co-founder of Brown Venture, started the firm to circumvent racism that people of color face in the business world. His inspiration was born from years of watching less-qualified, white colleagues be promoted ahead of him, he said.

Though the majority of his career experience was in sales, Campbell said focusing the firm on a lucrative sector like tech could see generational wealth quickly created in communities of color.

He founded the firm in 2018 with Chris Brooks, whose career experience mostly centered around education. Jerome Hamilton, chief operating officer of WareCorp, became a co-owner shortly after, and he would eventually invite Dykstra to join.

Originally, Brown Venture was going to be a venture accelerator. However, after doing some market research, the owners decided the venture studio model - which takes a more involved approach with its partner companies - fit Brown Venture better.

"Communities of color in particular do not have the luxury of going through an accelerator model where you're just gonna kind of throw spaghetti at the wall. Some are gonna make it, some are not, and those who don't make it, 'I'm sorry for you but that's just how it works,' " Campbell said.

Brown Venture is looking to draw on a number of private investors and grants to reach its $50 million goal - the owners have been on the phone with potential investors everyday. The firm hasn't named a lead investor yet, but it's close, Dykstra said.

Campbell suspects that the killing of George Floyd, which has inspired an international push for racial justice, could spell interest in the business world to invest in a venture firm focused on "brown success," he said.

The venture firm is currently applying for benefit corporation and community development financing institution status, and expects to be granted both in the coming months. Brown Venture was accepted into the National Association of Investment Companies on July 31.

"There's been a history of folks that have thought they knew what our community needed, and they gave money and it didn't really work out," Campbell said. "What we're saying is, give us money so we can invest where we know there's actual need, and then it can benefit everybody."

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: August 7, 2020

Mall of America could host Lake Street businesses destroyed in Minneapolis riots

ARTICLE MCDXCIV. MALL OF AMERICA COULD HOST LAKE STREET
BUSINESSES DESTROYED IN MINNEAPOLIS RIOTS

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

August 7, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 629 words

Byline: Carrigan Miller

Body

A coalition of Minneapolis business and civic leaders is proposing to try to rescue Lake Street businesses displaced by the civil unrest that struck in late May by moving them - possibly to places like Midtown Global Market or even Mall of America - while reconstruction work continues on their neighborhood.

The recommendations are among the first official steps from the The Minneapolis Forward: Community Now Coalition has made since forming in the wake of protests and riots that followed the killing of George Floyd by a Minneapolis police officer. The suggestions also include starting a small business academy within the city and create long-term land and business ownership among Minneapolis' people of color.

The coalition was announced by Mayor Jacob Frey and city council vice president Andrea Jenkins in June and is co-chaired by Allison Sharkey, executive director of the Lake Street Council; Felicia Perry, executive director of the West Broadway Business and Area Coalition; and Jonathan Weinhagen, president and CEO of the Minneapolis Regional Chamber.

Mall of America could host Lake Street businesses destroyed in Minneapolis riots

The coalition's work isn't to return Minneapolis to normal, Frey said, but to make it more equitable in the long-term. The coalition hopes to prevent gentrification in the wake of the unrest, and to create long-term land and business ownership among Minneapolis' people of color.

"This is an opportunity to transform. The eyes of the world are on Minneapolis," he said.

Finding temporary spaces for Lake Street businesses is one of the coalition's early priorities. Under the plan, the Mall of America will host some businesses in a project called Community Commons that will continue into 2021, Weinhagen said, while at least one business has made a deal to temporarily move into the Midtown Global Market, Sharkey said. The coalition is also looking at temporarily moving businesses into unused buildings along Lake Street, but hasn't settled on any locations yet.

The Mall of America declined to comment.

Sharkey also pointed out that Gandhi Mahal, an Indian restaurant that was burned down on May 28, has temporarily relocated to the former Chef Shack Ranch site in the Seward neighborhood while it rebuilds its location on Lake Street.

The Lake Street Council has given $5 million worth of grants to 400 businesses since the unrest, Sharkey said. Of those businesses, about half have already opened, while the other half are actively planning to reopen, she said.

About a dozen businesses on Lake Street have permanently closed since the unrest, she added.

But it's difficult to track for certain how many businesses have shut down because of damages, said Shauen Pearce, Mayor Frey's director of economic development and inclusion policy. The Covid-19 pandemic has also hurt businesses on Lake Street and elsewhere, like on West Broadway in North Minneapolis.

Some stores are closed because they're working on a new businesses model for a socially distant world; others remain closed because they're waiting to replace inventory or even their windows, Pearce said. Some businesses are still trying to clear rubble from their properties, but have been blocked by a Minnesota law that requires them to be current on property taxes before cleanup can begin - potentially a big hurdle for companies that saw revenue dry up even before the unrest.

The city's Commercial Property Development Fund has $3 million set aside to support business owners of color to retain ownership of their businesses and their real estate.

Much of the coalition's work is supported by the Minneapolis Foundation. Other benefactors include Steve Cramer, CEO of the Minneapolis Downtown Council, and the Pohlrad Family Foundation.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: August 7, 2020

Mall of America could host Lake Street businesses destroyed in Minneapolis riots

End of Document

Turf Club faces $1M in rebuilding costs after riots

ARTICLE MCDXCV.

TURF CLUB FACES $1M IN REBUILDING COSTS AFTER RIOTS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 7, 2020 Friday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 2ELength: 508 wordsByline: CHRIS RIEMENSCHNEIDER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: But insurance should cover most of the damage from May's rioting in St. Paul.

Body

Music fans let out a collective gasp over new photos that show just how badly the Turf Club was damaged during the May riots in St. Paul. However, the Turf's operators see a lot of bright sides as they rebuild one of the Twin Cities' favorite concert venues.

A 1940s-era watering hole on University Avenue that's been a staple of the music scene since the 1990s, the Turf was broken into just before midnight on May 28, three days after George Floyd's death in police custody.

Fortunately, the fire was contained to the ground-floor bar area and extinguished by a sprinkler system installed in 2013 after First Avenue bought the venue.

Unfortunately, because of all the other fires and calamity that night, nobody was able to enter the building until 8 a.m. to turn off the sprinklers. Both levels of the club were flooded, including the beloved basement space the Clown Lounge.

After two months of inspections and demolition - photos show the venue largely stripped to skeletal form - First Ave staff figures the repairs will be as extensive and costly as the roughly $1 million in renovations done in 2013-14.

"We're kind of back to where we started," First Ave general manager Nate Kranz said.

More upsides, though: Insurance should cover most of the repairs. Also, because the renovations were so recent, many of the same plans and materials can be reused.

The plan is to make it look just like it did before the riots, right down to the funky wood booths and tacky old light fixtures in the Clown Lounge.

"We're going to meddle with things a little, but I don't think there will be anything different that the casual observer will notice," Kranz said.

Turf Club faces $1M in rebuilding costs after riots

Of course, those repairs are going to take time. And therein lies another mixed blessing amid this seemingly cursed year: Time is something that music venues have way too much of these days, courtesy of the coronavirus pandemic.

"If we were going to have a fire and flood and be out of commission for several months, this is certainly a good time for it," Kranz glibly noted.

With music lovers clamoring to show their support, First Ave has put a bundle of new Turf Club merchandise on sale on its website, including T-shirts, hats and even a wall pennant and key chain.

Like most music venues, the Turf does not have any official concert dates until early next year. It's one of around 30 Minnesota music venues and promotion companies behind the National Independent Venues Association (NIVA), which is pushing for federal assistance via the Save Our Stages bill, co-authored by Sen. Amy Klobuchar, D-Minn.

NIVA is billing Tuesday as its "day of action," asking supporters to contact their representatives to support the S.O.S. bill as well the Restart Act and the Encore Act, which could also help music venues.

Just as First Avenue owner Dayna Frank urged supporters to focus on Floyd when the Turf Club was hit in May, Kranz also downplayed the Turf's rebuilding needs.

"It's sad what happened to it," he said, "but there are certainly worse things to worry about right now."

612-673-4658 · @ChrisRstrib

Load-Date: August 7, 2020

Turf Club, nearly burned down in riots, will pursue '90% rebuild'

ARTICLE MCDXCVI.

TURF CLUB, NEARLY BURNED DOWN IN RIOTS, WILL PURSUE '90% REBUILD'

Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal (Minnesota)

August 7, 2020 Friday

Copyright 2020 American City Business Journal, Inc. All Rights Reserved

Length: 247 words

Byline: Mark Reilly

Body

St. Paul's Turf Club, heavily damaged during the civil unrest that struck the Twin Cities in late May, is almost "an entirely empty shell" as work begins on an extensive renovation effort.

The Pioneer Press reports on the rebuilding efforts at the nightclub, which like many businesses along University Avenue was broken into during riots that followed the death of George Floyd during an arrest by Minneapolis police.

Nate Kranz, general manager at Minneapolis-based First Avenue (which bought the Turf Club in 2013), said that a group broke into the St. Paul building on May 28 and raided the bar area, as violence spread to the University Avenue corridor.

RELATED: St. Paul's University Avenue cleans up after fires, looting

Turf Club, nearly burned down in riots, will pursue '90% rebuild'

Later that evening, fire alarms went off. It's unclear whether the same group that broke in started the fire or if it came from elsewhere. The building was likely saved from destruction by a sprinkler system installed after First Avenue took over.

The sprinklers still left a lot of water damage, however. By the time they were shut off, Franz said, there was 6 to 8 inches of water on the floor. "And double that for downstairs." Damage was estimated at $1 million; insurance is covering repair costs.

Contractors have been stripping out the interior of the building ever since and plan a "90% rebuild," using the same plans from the 2013 renovation.

Did you find this article useful? Why not subscribe to Minneapolis / St. Paul Business Journal for more articles?

Load-Date: August 7, 2020

End of Document

Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case

ARTICLE MCDXCVII.

JUDGE ORDERS RELEASE OF BODY CAMERA VIDEO IN GEORGE FLOYD CASE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 8, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 291 wordsByline: Associated PressHighlight: MINNEAPOLIS (AP) - A Minnesota judge ordered the release of body camera footage recorded by former officers charged in the death of George Floyd.Body

A Minnesota judge ordered the release of body camera footage recorded by former officers charged in the death of George Floyd.

Judge Peter Cahill ruled Friday that videos from the body cameras of Thomas Lane and J. Kueng taken on the night Floyd died will be made publicly available, though it is unclear how or when the footage will be released.

The videos were filed with the court last month by Lane's attorney. Initially only transcripts of the audio were released, but a judge later allowed journalists and members of the public to view the footage by appointment. A British tabloid on Monday published parts of the videos.

The body camera videos and transcripts were filed in court by Lane's attorney, Earl Gray, as part of a motion to have Lane's case dismissed. Attorneys for the coalition of media organizations, including The Associated Press, had asked the judge to allow them to be published.

Floyd, a Black man who was handcuffed, died May 25 after Derek Chauvin, a white police officer, pressed his knee against Floyd's neck for nearly eight minutes as Floyd said he couldn't breathe. Chauvin is charged with second-degree murder, third-degree murder and manslaughter. Tou Thao, Lane and Kueng are charged with aiding and abetting both second-degree murder and manslaughter. All four officers were fired. Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say Judge: Prosecutor Mike Freeman will stay on George Floyd case Turf Club about to start a '90 percent rebuild' after an arson attempt during riots Minneapolis leaders push ahead with efforts to change police Attorney for fired Minneapolis officer says Freeman should be removed from George Floyd case

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case

End of Document

PROBLEM SOLVERS

ARTICLE MCDXCVIII. PROBLEM SOLVERS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 8, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: INSPIRED; Pg. 3INLength: 872 wordsByline: GAIL ROSENBLUM; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: new fund for traumatic timesBody

In her more than 25 years working in education and youth development, Danielle Grant said she's always been amazed by the resilience, creativity and positivity of Minneapolis' young people. But the president and CEO of AchieveMpls acknowledges that the past several months - defined by abrupt educational shifts and the economic fallout of COVID-19, as well as the traumatizing death of George Floyd - have tested the limits of even the most resilient Minneapolis Public Schools (MPS) students. In response, AchieveMpls has launched the MPS Student Support Fund to offer mental health counseling, school-based programs and interventions to let students know how deeply they are valued.

Q: After George Floyd's killing, what needs arose among young people you serve?

A: I think what happened was a lot of different things coming together. Following all of the challenges of life during a pandemic - including months of distance learning and social isolation, the murder of George Floyd and the ensuing unrest in our community - more and more people began to understand that our Minneapolis children and youth have significant needs, and they wanted to help. We began to get calls and e-mails about how to donate money for immediate needs, such as food, but also how to help students with their social-emotional needs. The new support fund (achievempls.org) provides some immediate needs support, but is primarily about ongoing support.

Q: How much is in the fund and where is it coming from?

A: So far we have received approximately $54,000. The money has come from small donations, as well as a generous $50,000 grant from the Cargill Foundation. AchieveMpls holds the fund in our role as the nonprofit foundation for Minneapolis Public Schools, but it is administered by staff at MPS who understand the specific needs of our students and school communities. They will determine the specific use of the fund to best support the safety, care and social-emotional well-being of our students.

Q: Students across the district?

PROBLEM SOLVERS

A: Yes, this is a districtwide fund that will serve all MPS students. Students across the community have been impacted in so many different ways by the murder of Mr. Floyd. While some students have seen the impacts directly in their neighborhoods, others are impacted less directly but still have questions and need help dealing with their emotions. I'm also excited to see so many of our high school students mobilized to activism, and we will be looking to them to generate ideas on how to make our school district and community better.

Q: Did students come to you to share their distress, or were you hearing more from the adults in their lives?

A: Our team works with thousands of MPS students through our Career & College Centers in 11 high schools, so we've been hearing their stories firsthand and providing as much support as possible during these past several weeks and months. This spring, like everyone else, we transitioned from in-person support to connecting remotely via phone, e-mail, online video chats and other online tools. Students shared the challenges they were navigating through the pandemic, and then their grief and trauma over George Floyd's murder and the ensuing unrest. In addition, we were contacted by concerned parents and community members who wanted to know how they could be a part of financially supporting efforts to help young people process their feelings and heal. And MPS teachers and other school staff were also taking on their own fundraising efforts to help their students. So we believe that the new fund provides a good structure to manage and distribute all of these donations.

Q: With MPS planning to go online-only until November, do you have the stamina to keep going at this high level?

A: Fortunately or unfortunately, we have all become much more adept at communicating and meeting online through Zoom, MS Teams, Google Hangouts or Google Classroom. We're confident that we will be able to adapt opportunities to allow for social distancing.

Q: How has your esteemed STEP-UP program fared this summer?

A: The Step Up Youth Employment Program, a partnership of AchieveMpls with the city of Minneapolis, Career Force Minneapolis and Project for Pride in Living, also had to pivot and redesign how to deliver workforce readiness training. We've done that through virtual internships, paid summer online training and mentoring opportunities. Fully 1,800 Minneapolis youth completed Step Up work readiness training this year, with 450 now doing internships at 61 companies and 1,000 participating in a five-week, paid Summer Online Learning Program. But our mission remains the same, to rally community support to inspire and equip Minneapolis students for careers, college and life.

Q: What's the message you want young people to hear during this tumultuous time?

A: That their community cares about them. We have their backs. I want youth to know that so many people are coming together to help them during these truly difficult times. It is pretty amazing and inspiring to see how many people care, even while they are dealing with their own difficult challenges with COVID-19. We may be socially distanced, but people still want to unite to help others however they can.

Load-Date: August 9, 2020

PROBLEM SOLVERS

End of Document

U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities

ARTICLE MCDXCIX.

U.S. ATTORNEY EXTENDS TASK FORCE OPERATIONS TO COMBAT GUN VIOLENCE IN TWIN CITIES

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 8, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 256 words

Byline: Isabel Saavedra-Weis

Highlight: U.S. Attorney Erica H. MacDonald announced Friday that a federal task force focused on a surge in violent crime in the Twin Cities has extended its operations for another 30 days. The Twin Cities Violent Crime Task Force was first introduced July 7 in response to a spike in gun violence that followed civil unrest [...]

Body

U.S. Attorney Erica H. MacDonald announced Friday that a federal task force focused on a surge in violent crime in the Twin Cities has extended its operations for another 30 days.

The Twin Cities Violent Crime Task Force was first introduced July 7 in response to a spike in gun violence that followed civil unrest sparked by the death of George Floyd during a Memorial Day police arrest in Minneapolis. Since then, the command center says it has aided local law enforcement in confiscating 94 illegal firearms and charging 15 individuals with federal firearm violations.

The task force is made up of federal agents and analysts from the FBI, U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, U.S. Secret Service, U.S. Marshals Service, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, the Minnesota Bureau of Criminal Apprehension, the Minneapolis and St. Paul police departments, Hennepin, Ramsey and Dakota counties sheriff's offices, and federal and state prosecutors.

The public can report information by calling 800-225-5324 or submit photos and/or videos at www.fbi.gov/violence.

North St. Paul man killed in crash after fleeing Dakota County sheriff's deputy Judge orders release of body camera video in George Floyd case Cleric assaulted outside Bloomington mosque; police searching for suspects Minneapolis man sentenced to 33 years in prison for sex-trafficking young women and girls out of massage parlor Vandals threw shopping carts, bicycles, sewer caps at squad cars during George Floyd aftermath in St. Paul, charges say

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

U.S. attorney extends task force operations to combat gun violence in Twin Cities

End of Document

ARTICLE MD. MINNSPIRATIONS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 8, 2020 Saturday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: INSPIRED; Pg. 1INLength: 783 wordsByline: KELLY SMITH; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Small nonprofit garage survives unrestBody

Cathy Heying's nonprofit is surrounded by rubble, yet she only sees signs of hope and second chances.

The former social worker and pastoral minister started the Lift Garage in Minneapolis to repair cars for people in need and give them a boost in a time of crisis.

Now, in front of the shop, East Lake Street is in crisis after the unrest following the death of George Floyd at the hands of Minneapolis police. A few yards away, twisted wire and charred rubble is all that's left of an Arby's and across the street Target is shuttered.

"It was dystopian," Heying said. "I feel tremendously grateful we survived relatively unscathed."

As the city builds anew, Heying, 49, is expanding the Lift Garage to meet the demand for services as the first full-time, full-service nonprofit auto shop in Minnesota. This fall, she hopes to buy the building to make it the shop's permanent home and add a 600-square-foot office and lobby for the growing nonprofit, which has a $1.3 million annual budget and 11 employees who do 70 car repairs a month.

"They're walking through the door in crisis," Heying said of clients. "We're big believers in second chances. We believe in opportunities for redemption at every level."

Heying decided to remake her career after 20 years in social work, studying auto mechanics at Dunwoody College of Technology. Working with the homeless, she had met people living in their cars, unable to afford repairs.

So in 2013, she opened the Lift Garage off Nicollet Avenue, fixing four cars a month. By 2018, the organization had outgrown the space and moved to East Lake Street. Clients who meet low-income guidelines pay $15 an hour for labor, compared to $90 to $120 per hour at a commercial garage, and parts are sold at cost.

The shop loses money on every repair, which it limits to fixes that ensure the car is drivable and safe. The nonprofit relies on donations and grants to bring in the remaining two-thirds of its revenue.

MINNSPIRATIONS

But fundraising has become more difficult during COVID-19, which forced nonprofits to scrap galas or move events online. This spring, a fundraiser for the Lift was postponed and then scaled back, and a fundraiser in the fall at a brewery is up in the air. Heying is still seeking donations and hiring the Lift's first development director to lead fundraising.

"It's really such an important service," said Susan Greenberg, a volunteer who helps raise funds. "They really treat the whole person, not just the car."

'Can I help you?'

As nightfall descended in Minneapolis on May 27, crowds filled the streets near the police Third Precinct. Heying paced outside, guarding her tiny nonprofit with friends as looters ran by clutching armloads of Target items. Two blocks away, AutoZone was engulfed in flames.

"Can I help you?" she asked a group carrying baseball bats, who scattered when they realized she was the owner. "I have no doubt that first night the building would have been looted and a lot of damage done if we weren't here."

Smoke billowed out of the Arby's next door. But authorities were too busy, so Heying and her group grabbed hoses and fire extinguishers to put the fire out. Then they kept watch until sunrise.

The next day, they boarded up the Lift's windows before the precinct was set ablaze and arsonists struck Arby's again. This time Heying, worried about the escalating violence, evacuated staff and volunteers. At home nearby in Longfellow, she watched a news station's livestream as looters tore plywood off her shop. She sobbed, thinking of the low-income clients whose cars were inside.

"This is it," she thought.

But she was graced with a second chance. Another auto shop owner passing by saw the looters and chased them away. Strangers and customers scurried to the shop to stand guard until the sun rose again.

In the days that followed, Heying, her staff and supporters rotated overnight shifts guarding the nonprofit until violence subsided. A few days later, the Lift reopened, despite broken windows and stolen equipment and computers.

Heying knows other stores along East Lake Street weren't as fortunate, and she hopes the city can rebuild again.

"I don't want this to turn into a neighborhood of chains and high end condos. That isn't East Lake Street," Heying said. "So many of our neighbors have suffered greatly."

So have many of her clients, who have few places to turn for car help and wait up to three months for an appointment. She's exploring operating on weekends or opening a second site.

"There's clearly a lot of unmet need," she said. "We want to be a stable part of the neighborhood and part of the regrowth. We're trying to be different - not just by charging people less, but how we treat people."

Kelly Smith · 612-673-4141

Load-Date: August 9, 2020

End of Document

Soucheray: Trust us, the Minneapolis Council said. We don't, said the Charter Commission.

ARTICLE MDI. SOUCHERAY: TRUST US, THE MINNEAPOLIS COUNCIL SAID. WE DON'T, SAID THE CHARTER COMMISSION.

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 8, 2020 Saturday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 721 words

Byline: Joe Soucheray

Highlight: The Minneapolis Charter Commission wisely, if unpredictably, told the Minneapolis City Council that its plan to reimagine public safety was not ready to go on the ballot this November. Predictably, this was met with outrage from the activist class who insisted the delay was an example of democracy denied. Jeremiah Ellison, for example, a council [...]

Body

The Minneapolis Charter Commission wisely, if unpredictably, told the Minneapolis City Council that its plan to reimagine public safety was not ready to go on the ballot this November. Predictably, this was met with outrage from the activist class who insisted the delay was an example of democracy denied.

Jeremiah Ellison, for example, a council member in favor of abolishing the police department to be replaced by a Department of Happy Thoughts and Good Wishes, said of the commission's decision, "this is not democracy. In a democracy the people decide. But I guess today the Charter Commission decided otherwise."

Ellison is wrong. The way it works is that the charter is the city's constitution. To amend it requires adult thinking, not some rushed-into plan that has not been fully thought out. The proposal to create a new Department of Public Safety could very well be on the ballot in 2021, but it had better be a more all-encompassing plan and not some pie-in-the-sky belief that the citizens will be made safer by further delegitimizing of the police.

The Charter Commission did not say if, they merely said when. The proposed ordinance is simply not ready to be voted on because the citizens wouldn't really know what they are voting for. A democratic process compels clarity, Jeremiah Ellison and Lisa Bender and the rest of the activist class that masquerades as the Minneapolis City Council. Your proposal lacks clarity and is nothing more than a rush job to signal your virtue while you have the momentum you are riding on the back of George Floyd.

In the meantime, the police are more pressed than they have ever been as violent crime and gunplay continue to increase in Minneapolis. Bender herself had to file a police report concerning some anti-police vandalism at her home. Her home and the homes of all the city council members should be left alone. But it's more than ironic that Bender had no place to turn except to the police department that she so apparently loathes.

Soucheray: Trust us, the Minneapolis Council said. We don't, said the Charter Commission.

The Charter Commission voted 10-5 to take another 90 days to review the proposed amendment. The commission is composed of 15 volunteers appointed by the chief judge of the Hennepin County District Court.

The chairman of the Charter Commission is a Minneapolis attorney named Barry Clegg, who said the following of the commission's decision: "The council says 'Trust us. We'll figure it out after this is approved. Trust us.' Well I don't and we shouldn't. Charter change is too important."

Amen.

That is the single most adult comment about public life in Minneapolis that any of us ever heard in the last three months of the abolish-the-police hysteria. Finally! An adult in the room! Clegg, run for mayor, run for governor, run for president. Get together with a fellow Minneapolis attorney, Joe Anthony, who had a piece in the Minneapolis Star Tribune in June that brilliantly dissected the strong-council/weak-mayor arrangement of the city's dysfunctional government.

I should say I believe Barry Clegg is a Minneapolis attorney. All charter commissioners must live in Minneapolis. My search came up with his law practice. Repeated calls to his office were met with a busy signal. Maybe he was swamped with others calling him with their own thanksgivings.

It's the city council/mayor arrangement in Minneapolis that needs reform. The police department certainly needs to establish better and more consequential discipline protocols, but to remove them from the streets would be absolute folly. That would turn Minneapolis into a war zone.

The ordinance that should be on the ballot would be the call to replace the current system with a strong-mayor/weak-council dynamic. Currently, the city council can veto anything a mayor comes up with. Then Minneapolis needs to find a strong candidate based in reality to run for office.

You think Lisa Bender and the activists she works with would allow the citizens a chance at that proposed ordinance?

But get enough names on a petition to demand such an ordinance and you could make it happen. Soucheray: And our ability to reason is swept away Soucheray: Those cheering and jeering have something in common Soucheray: Lawless people are shooting up the towns. That's not the fault of the police. Soucheray: This progressive transfer of wealth from renters to developers and big corporations

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

Will Bunch: From 9/11 to Portland, it was inevitable 'Homeland Security' would be turned on the American people

ARTICLE MDIIL. WILL BUNCH: FROM 9/11 TO PORTLAND, IT WAS INEVITABLE
'HOMELAND SECURITY' WOULD BE TURNED ON THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

August 9, 2020 Sunday

Copyright 2020 St. Paul Pioneer Press All Rights Reserved

Length: 1659 words

Byline: Will Bunch

Highlight: Even in the hazy, flag-waving days surrounding the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attack on the United States, there was something about America's rush to create a massive state apparatus called the Department of Homeland Security that made some people's skin crawl - and not just the usual patchouli-scented, granola-sated leftist suspects. "The word 'homeland' is [...]"

Body

Even in the hazy, flag-waving days surrounding the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attack on the United States, there was something about America's rush to create a massive state apparatus called the Department of Homeland Security that made some people's skin crawl - and not just the usual patchouli-scented, granola-sated leftist suspects.

"The word 'homeland' is a strange word," George W. Bush's Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld told staffers in a memo after some floated the idea of combining federal functions around immigration, customs, domestic intelligence and law enforcement into one vast department even before 9/11. "'Homeland' Defense sounds more German than American."

The USA had functioned just fine for 226 years without a Department of Homeland Security, and the decision to create DHS was never cast in stone. Even the hawkish Bush administration wasn't sure it was needed - politically, the pressure came from centrist Democrats like former Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman eager to show their post-9/11 cojones. Yet once planted in the ground, DHS has grown wildly like choking, invasive kudzu, causing even the libertarian, Koch-Brothers-funded Cato Institute to call it wasteful and declare "Americans are not safer."

Donald Rumsfeld was very wrong about many, many things - remember the WMDs east and west and south and north of Baghdad? - but his qualms about a homeland security state on U.S. soil were right on the money. The bureaucratic waste and the nation's failure to confront its real threats from stronger hurricanes to a global pandemic have been bad enough. But the real risk of creating a state-security force was that it would follow the beaten-down jackbooted pathway of every state security force before it and get turned against the American people.

It would be trite and arguably wrong to label as "unthinkable" the scenes out of Portland, Oregon, over the last several weeks involving unbadged and anonymous federal agents hiding behind their dark visors and layers of camouflage. They fire choking tear gas at protesters demanding racial justice, or just-barely-less-than-lethal rubber bullets that can fracture skulls. Meanwhile their comrades take activists off the streets in unmarked vans, or arrest them so a judge can order them to avoid protests and thus surrender their First Amendment rights.

Will Bunch: From 9/11 to Portland, it was inevitable 'Homeland Security' would be turned on the American people

These DHS agents from militarized units within Customs and Border Patrol or Immigration Customs Enforcement have become a kind of secret police accountable only to President Donald Trump, some 3,000 miles away, and his appointed lackey now running DHS - even as public officials in Oregon begged them to leave.

Now the first wave of serious-but-threat-obsessed Republicans who initially ran Homeland Security for Bush 43 claims to have been shocked by the nightly footage out of Portland. "It would be a cold day in hell before I would consent to a unilateral, uninvited intervention into one of my cities," Tom Ridge, the former Pennsylvania governor who was Bush's initial DHS Secretary, told a radio interviewer. The Afghanistan-style "blowback" of a U.S. government agency waging war on American people was never the idea!

It never is ... at first.

"This is an experiment that has failed and needs to be radically rethought," Elizabeth Goitein told me. She is co-director of the liberty and national security program at the Brennan Center for Justice and co-author of an article last month urging Congress not to mostly write DHS a blank check in its current spending bill but to insist on major reforms, as well as the naming of a permanent secretary after acting chiefs for the last 15 months.

Those of us who warned about a Portland-style scenario in flag-pinned days of the early 2000s were called alarmists, cranks, dirty (bleeping) hippies and much worse. The November 2002 vote to consolidate 22 federal agencies into the massive, now-240,000-employee DHS passed the Senate 90-9, as few listened to then-Wisconsin Sen. Russ Feingold - a seer on rising authoritarianism who would be booted from office for Russia-friendly kook Ron Johnson - warn we were "weakening protections against unwarranted government intrusion into the lives of ordinary Americans."

To be sure, the 3,000 deaths on 9/11 exposed flaws that required a major tuneup. The CIA and the FBI didn't talk to each other, NORAD (North American Aerospace Defense Command) was caught flat-footed, and airport security - then close to nonexistent - needed the overhaul that's been a bumpy success in the 19 years since. But the massive changes wrought by DHS - largely in response to an international terrorism threat that now seems greatly diminished - were just part of a broader "homeland security" mindset. It saw every problem in America, from desperate refugees on the border to marginalized people demanding jobs and justice, as a nail to be jackhammered by a harsh, militaristic response, powered by armored personnel carriers and private prison cells.

Just as Feingold tried to warn us, the homeland security state began spying on everyday Americans from Day One, first demanding to see your library card and moving up to bulk collection of your emails, enabled by fear-inspired bills like the Patriot Act that seem impossible to get rid of once they're on the books.

The panic-stricken notion that al-Qaida would throw America a curveball by attacking some remote town in Idaho or the Pumpkin Festival in Keene, New Hampshire, which obtained one of the Pentagon's surplus

Will Bunch: From 9/11 to Portland, it was inevitable 'Homeland Security' would be turned on the American people

APCs, was the spark that led to the rise of the militarized warrior cop wielding those spare weapons of war. I'm pretty sure it was Chekhov who advised writers never to introduce body armor or rubber bullets in Act One unless someone's going to use them in Act Three - even if Act Three is Americans marching against systemic racism.

The surge of new, young recruits who signed up to become Border Patrol or ICE agents in post-9/11 America found there weren't that many al-Qaida terror plots to thwart - but they fostered an authoritarian culture that found other outlets (no group more enthusiastically backed Trump's 2016 election than the union representing Border Patrol agents) and shared a distrust of immigrants, liberals and dissent.

They've been saying this quiet part out loud for years, and it's getting louder in the George Floyd era. Trump's Pentagon is now training soldiers to see protesters and journalists as "adversaries." At DHS, it was inevitable that 77 local "fusion centers" that were supposed to help federal, state and local officials cooperate on terrorism would increasingly monitor legitimate dissent like antiwar activists, Occupy Wall Street or Black Lives Matter. Or that 15 cities including Philadelphia would ask the feds for help spying on protests with its high-powered drones.

For everyday Americans who weren't paying attention as the frog of free speech sat in this pot of boiling water, Trump's immigration crackdown at the southern border should have been the alarm whistle. Again, there were voices back in 2002 that tried to warn us about the militarized, punitive regime that would be created with the formation of ICE, and with viewing immigration not as a social issue but a national security threat.

Goitein told me that some "mission creep" seemed inevitable with DHS, but the arrival of a president without respect for the rule of law has taken things to today's current dark place. "Customs and Border Patrol - he has let them off the leash, although there's a culture there that's predisposed to Trump's "strongman" approach.

Bill Ong Hing, now a professor at the University of San Francisco School of Law, testified back in 2002 against putting ICE under DHS and says today that "Congress created a monster" that conflates immigration and terrorism. Now that monster is putting peaceful protest and legitimate dissent under that same umbrella - and this approach is bleeding down to the local cop on the beat.

Last week, we saw armed, shorts-wearing plainclothes New York City detectives mimic the feds in Portland by taking a suspect accused of property damage, shoving her into an unmarked Kia van, and driving off. At the same time, about 100 local police departments in Wisconsin are refusing to provide security for the drastically downsized Democratic convention in Milwaukee because they're terrified the city will not allow them to deploy tear gas.

Enough already! America had muddled through much of its glorious history without tear gas, or camouflaged robocops - or a massive, now out-of-control Department of Homeland Security. If Joe Biden can hold onto his lead and become America's 46th president in January, with a more progressive Congress, they must begin the serious work of dismantling one of America's first great mistakes of the 21st century.

DHS should be abolished - its component parts rethought, then rebuilt from scratch - not only because the department is wasteful, inefficient and ineffective against actual threats, but because we'll be tearing down a neo-fascist mindset that slowly corrupted America society until it crawled fully formed from the sewers near a Portland courthouse.

Will Bunch: From 9/11 to Portland, it was inevitable 'Homeland Security' would be turned on the American people

It would help in that mission if our policy leaders began to think deeper and realize that DHS wasn't only one spectacularly bad idea, but symbolic of a militaristic society that can find the directions to send armed forces to Iraq and then to El Paso, Texas, and finally Portland - yet utterly lacks a moral compass. Yes, even deluded Donald Rumsfeld got one thing right: "Homeland Security" was a dumb concept that sounded worse in the original German. Leah Mirakhor: How James Baldwin spoke to immigrants like me Ross Marchand: No more billionaire bailouts Pamela K. Johnson: 55 summers have gone by since the Watts rebellion. How far have we traveled? Michael Bloomberg: Let's hire laid-off oil and gas workers to fight climate change Noah Smith: Focusing on Facebook and Google's monopoly misses the point

Load-Date: August 10, 2020

End of Document

ARTICLE MDIII. GARDENS THAT GIVE

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 9, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: HOMES; Pg. 1HLength: 783 wordsByline: KIM PALMER; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: A caring crop of gardenersBody

This has been a year like no other. First, Minnesotans faced the challenges of a global pandemic and stay-at-home order. Then the world was rocked by the killing of George Floyd and the civic unrest and time of reckoning on racial injustice that followed.

In this extraordinary summer, the Star Tribune's annual Beautiful Gardens contest is different, too. This year, we asked readers to nominate gardens that are beautiful in spirit, with a mission that benefits the greater community.

Reader response was overwhelming. We received more than 360 nominations this year. We read deeply touching descriptions of gardens that have impacted people in countless ways. We would like to offer a heartfelt thank-you to all our readers who took the time to nominate a garden this year.

With so many diverse gardens to understand and appreciate, it was challenging to choose just a few winners. A panel of four judges reviewed the submissions, and ultimately narrowed the field to a few gardens that we will highlight in the coming months.

You'll see and read more about these gardens and the people who tend them in upcoming issues of the Sunday Homes section and online at startribune.com.

1. Kenny Turck, Forest City, Minn.

Turck's home and garden near the farm where he grew up is ground zero for the Dirt Group, a nonprofit he founded to help youths learn, thrive and recover from early trauma by growing food together.

A social worker, Turck is passionate about food access, food security and its importance to health and well-being. In his home, a former church parish, there's a large kitchen in the basement where he teaches canning and food preservation. This year, with the pandemic and limited in-person interaction, the Dirt Group delivered kits to help youths grow food for their households.

2. Olivia Nienaber, Scandia

GARDENS THAT GIVE

At her family's farm, Nienaber, 17, has created gardens that give back to wildlife. Her goal is to improve the environment for early-migrating birds, as well as create a more diverse habitat. Every plant must provide food, shelter or cover to birds, hummingbirds, bees, butterflies or moths.

She transformed a formerly weed-filled area near the garage into a variety of native wildflowers, grasses and shrubs. With the help of her family, she also revitalized two small ponds to ensure that wildlife had sources of water, has built birdhouses and feeders and helped build brush piles so that birds and small mammals have a place to hide and raise their young.

3. Bethany Husby, Roseville

Husby tends a large garden and pond at her home, where she divides hundreds of plants every year, recruits volunteers and holds a plant sale to benefit a charitable organization. Inspired by a trip to Tanzania and the people she met there, she and her husband started a nonprofit, Heart to Care, to build a school in Tanzania. This year's sale raised $54,000 for the school, which is now under construction.

4a. Harmony Neal, St. Paul; 4b. Devin Brown, Minneapolis

Harmony Neal, a writer, teacher and laid-off restaurant server during the pandemic, decided to use their extra time to grow food for the neighborhood. Neal transformed the boulevard in front of their rented triplex on a busy corner into Giving Gardens, where the veggies, fruit, herbs and edible flowers are free to all.

After reading about projected food shortages and the closing of grocery stores damaged during the unrest after the George Floyd killing, Devin Brown was inspired to turn her north Minneapolis yard into a food source for her neighbors. With help from volunteers for Growers Unite Minneapolis, Brown created a vegetable garden on the boulevard and another near the alley, where neighbors can help themselves to fresh produce.

5. Andy Lapham, Minneapolis

At his home at 36th and Chicago and on the vacant lot next door, Lapham has created a permaculture demonstration site, where he grows and propagates fruit trees and berry vines and also raises chickens. He built a bench next to the sidewalk that has become a community giveaway spot, where people leave food to share with neighbors in need. Lapham also redesigned and tends a community veggie and fruit garden at a nearby school where neighbors are welcome to pick the produce.

6. Christina and Stephen McHenry, Minneapolis

After the pandemic ended the live music concerts that their family previously enjoyed, the McHenrys began hosting social-distance concerts in their garden, where neighbors can connect, enjoy music and help support musicians who have lost income as a result of the pandemic.

The couple and their children also have an organic vegetable garden and keep chickens, sharing the veggies and the eggs with their neighbors in the Lynn-Lake neighborhood.

Load-Date: August 9, 2020

End of Document

BOOKMARK

ARTICLE MDIV. BOOKMARK

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 9, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 4ELength: 607 wordsByline: LAURIE HERTZEL; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Highlight: Readers reveal pandemic readingBody

You read to avoid news of pandemics. Or you read to learn about pandemics.

You read to soothe yourself. Or you read to immerse yourself in new, enormous worlds.

Recently, I asked readers if this crazy year - the pandemic, lockdowns and social upheaval - was changing what you read. You said yes. You said yes to everything.

David Bornus, Shoreview: I had been accumulating a pile of books to read in retirement, but when libraries and bookstores closed it became a lifesaver. I've read down my piles several feet since March, including several series - the Ruth Ware novels, political biographies, novels by Anthony Quinn and a five-volume set of lectures on Martin Luther. I am feeling a great deal of satisfaction clearing away those piles.

Ian Krouth, St. Louis Park: I have a large to-read shelf so I thought myself well-equipped when lockdown began. Then I realized that half of my fiction pile was dystopian or post-apocalyptic, and a good chunk of the nonfiction books were prison memoirs. I found myself diving into comforting rereads like "The Lord of the Rings." After the murder of George Floyd, the comfort food yielded to a search for discomfort through books like "Between the World and Me."

Peter L. Steiner, Mankato: I am nearly finished with Albert Camus' "The Plague." What has struck me most are the uncanny parallels to COVID-19: issues of randomness, denial, fear, death, quarantine and the vast changes it brings to daily life. Next up: "Love in the Time of Cholera."

Carol Sherwin, Eden Prairie: When this pandemic started, I discovered Agatha Christie's autobiography. She was adventuresome, curious, creative and intriguing. After that, I couldn't stop reading her. Besides being mysteries, her stories are travelogues. They are moral tales where good triumphs over evil. They are an escape to a civilized time I wish I had lived in.

BOOKMARK

Annie Possis, Grand Marais, Minn.: I've always preferred nonfiction over fiction. But right now our current reality is enough nonfiction for me. I find myself gravitating to mysteries, crime thrillers - anything super absorbing that will take me away.

Heidi Holtan, Grand Rapids, Minn.: I pulled out "Excellent Women" by Barbara Pym. Now I'm working on reading all of her clever tales that have me wishing for a vicar next door I could invite over to tea. These women she wrote about are indeed excellent.

Jerry Kohl, Grand Marais: Courtesy of John Le Carré, I have traveled - England, France, Switzerland, Russia, East and West Germany, and pretty much all of Eastern Europe. I feel transported from my worries of today by the espionage and intrigue of that era.

Walter J. Roers, Bloomington: I'm a little over 100 pages into the 600-plus page "The Personal Memoirs of Ulysses S. Grant." His work is surprisingly readable and provides a very human and unique perspective on cultural and ethical issues that are still with us today.

Linda Eckman, Plymouth: I am fixated on books and films about dystopia, novels of pandemics and epidemics, and nonfictions about disease - "The End of October," by Lawrence Wright; "Epidemics and Society," by Frank M. Snowden; "Moloka'i," by Alan Brennert, and I have a lot more on reserve from Hennepin County Library.

Lisa Von Drasek, St. Paul: Since the pandemic, I am reading cookbooks, short stories and nonfiction. Right now I am reading "Becoming a Teacher," a profile of LaQuisha Hall by Melinda D. Anderson. It is not just about teaching but also about growing up in a marginalized community with scarce resources. Ms. Hall's journey is a compelling one.

Laurie Hertzal is the Star Tribune senior editor for books. On Facebook: facebook.com/startribunebooks.

Load-Date: August 9, 2020

TV CRITIC'S PICKS

ARTICLE MDV. TV CRITIC'S PICKS

Star Tribune (Minneapolis, MN)

August 9, 2020 Sunday, METRO EDITION

Copyright 2020 Star Tribune All Rights Reserved

Section: VARIETY; Pg. 8ELength: 388 wordsByline: NEAL JUSTIN; STAFF WRITER, STAR TRIBUNE (Mpls.-St. Paul)Body

Legendary

Guillermo del Toro's "Tales of Arcadia" trilogy won't make you forget "Pan's Labyrinth" or "Hellboy," but it's still a terrific animated adventure in which plucky teens team up with underground creatures for a high-risk version of Dungeons & Dragons. The final installment, "Wizards," isn't as clever as the past two chapters, leaning way too heavily on the Camelot legend, although the premise does offer the thrill of seeing King Arthur cross swords with a multi-eyed troll.

Now streaming on Netflix

Trailblazers

The standout stars of "On the Trail: Inside the 2020 Primaries" are CNN reporter Kyung Lah and her assistant Jasmine Wright, who were both assigned to cover Amy Klobuchar during the presidential campaign. Both speak bluntly - and with more than a few curse words - about how challenging it is to be on the political beat, especially for women of color. Their observations and work ethic are so impressive, they may want to consider running for office themselves.

Now streaming on HBO Max

Something wild

In "Wild Bill," Rob Lowe plays a hot-tempered police commissioner forced to relocate to Boston - the one in England. It doesn't take long for the fish-out-of-water to become a Yankee Sherlock Holmes, wrapping up whodunits before tea is served. There's just enough twists and Brat Pack charm in each episode to justify taking a break from your "Law & Order" marathon.

Now streaming on Britbox

New York state of mind

TV CRITIC'S PICKS

Thirty-one years before the death of George Floyd, an NYC teenager was killed in a racial attack, triggering protests that would impact a mayoral race - and little else. "Yusuf Hawkins: Storm Over Brooklyn" looks back at the tragedy through the words of Hawkins' family members and friends, as well as the man sitting in prison for pulling the trigger. The documentary packs a wallop, especially in the wake of current events.

8 p.m. Wednesday, HBO

Crowded house

If you love "Big Brother" but are afraid to admit it, start boasting instead of getting hooked on "Five Bedrooms," a scripted drama from Australia about five very different people who impulsively decide to go in on a house together. It doesn't take long before flirting and fighting rule the roost. The accents and top-notch acting help disguise the fact that you're watching a trashy soap.

Starts streaming Thursday on Peacock

NEAL JUSTIN

Load-Date: August 9, 2020